mon trout fry in there, and two years ago fishermen began to take the fish that were hatched here in Ottawa and deposited in that lake. I gave the Minister a letter last fall from the president of the anglers' association certifying to the fact that the increase of the fish in the lake by the deposit of the young fry was very material, as shown by the quantity of fish taken in that water. I got similar reports from the Rideau Lake at the north end of my county. They have been putting fry there for five or six years, and the quantity of fish taken is very much increased. There is no difficulty in seeing the difference between the fish that had been deposited and the old stock that were in those waters before. So there is no question that this fish propagation results in great good. I have received numerous letters from parties upon this subject, and one or two of them I handed to the Minister. Whether they are embodied in the report or not I do not know. But I know that the anglers' association which oversees Charleston Lake are asking every year for a further supply of fry, because those that have been already put in have increased the sport to a large extent. I am satisfied that in my county any quantity of evidence can be furnished of the value of propagating fish.

Mr. SCRIVER. I would ask my hon. friend whether, owing to the effects of this anglers' association, the fishery regulations have not been better enforced of late, and if the increased catch of fish is not due rather to this fact than to the placing of the fry in the lakes?

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not think so. When the anglers' association was formed there we had no valuable fishing, and there was none until two or three years after we commenced depositing this fry in the lake.

Mr. CORBOULD. I would like to ask the Minister whether he intends to introduce lobsters into the waters of British Columbia? Last year the Acting Minister promised that this should be done, as a lobster hatchery in the Maritime Provinces was in operation and there would be no trouble in having the spawn introduced in the western waters.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I may tell the hon. gentleman that I have not much faith in this, personally, owing to the fact that in the United States efforts have been made to introduce the lobster into Pacific waters and without success. However, their attempts may not have been carried on as well as another one could be, or there they may be some advantage on our side in the difference in temperature in our waters from that of the waters further south. I find, from the statements recently made, that it would take a very small sum of money to make another experiment, and I am waiting in order to get the benefit of the advice of a gentleman in the lower provinces who has looked into this subject and who says that he can pack them so that our officers can take delivery of them in New Brunswick and ship them through so that they may stand the journey across the continent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is gratifying to hear any evidence showing that these experiments have been successful in any part, whether in the inland waters or in the sea. There is very great difference of opinion upon this subject. As to lobsters, the departmental report shows us that during the last two years they have deposited two hundred and fifty million of fry. Of course it will be some years before the results of this experiment can be known. I suppose the Minister of Fisheries knows that this is the best season for catching lobsters for many years. We do not yet know what are the causes which bring about a plentiful supply of lobsters upon the coast. I should be loth to see these experiments given up. We have been experimenting since 1873, when we began on a small scale; but we have been working on a large scale since 1876, and I see that we have deposited one thousand two hundred and eighty-four millions of fry, of which two hundred and fifty millions were lobster fry, the others being salmon-trout and whitefish. No doubt, in the near future, we should have some results, unless the whole thing is a failure. But I think the hon. gentleman would do well not to incur increased expense until he has satisfied himself that the system is a success.

Mr. GILLMOR. I have paid some attention to this question in my own section, and I confess I have never had much faith in the result of the hatchery. However, five or six years ago, I prevailed on the Government to build a fish-way in the river where I live. I had never heard of any salmon in that river, except an occasional one in the fifty years I have known it. A considerable quantity of young salmon were planted about five years ago. Last year three or four salmon were found dead, having evidently tried to get up the river through the fish-way, and several others were seen about. Since I have been here this spring I have heard that two land-locked salmon had been caught in the inland waters, in a little lake near where they were planted. I am now under the impression that the experiment is going to prove a success. At first I did not think it would be because this was not a river to which salmon went naturally, and I did not think they could be induced artificially to come that way. The fish that have been seen there are about the size one would expect the salmon planted there five years ago would have attained by this time.

Salaries of officers and inspectors of excise, and to provide for increase, depending upon the result of excise examinations $305,771 25

Mr. EDGAR. Are these large increases that are expected to be caused by the examinations?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). They are the ordinary increases by promotion examinations.

Mr. EDGAR. Are these the examinations that took place in Montreal where those candidates got into trouble?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I do not know that they were connected with our branch of the service.

To provide for extra duty-pay to officers at large distilleries and other factories $6,000

Mr. FORBES. Who is the officer in charge of the distillery in Halifax, and what are his duties?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That is the distillery of McDougall & Co. I cannot tell you just now. As the hon. gentleman knows, we always have at every distillery and at every tobacco factory, an officer whose duty it is to watch the taking out of liquors or tobacco from the bonded warehouse. The duty is paid when they are taken out of the warehouse.

Mr. FORBES. My reason for asking is this. The distillery in Halifax is rather a new one, and it has been to a certain extent unfortunate in its financial affairs. I believe it is still manufacturing liquors, which I would like the general public to feel assured are of good quality. As long as the laws of the country allow liquors to be manufactured, I want to see them impartially carried out, and a first-class article produced if the Government persist in permitting it to be manufactured at all. I may say that there is a feeling abroad that the liquors made in that establishment are not of first-class quality, in fact, that there has been a certain concession made to them in that respect. I do not know how that is. I know the distillery is run by competent men, and as long as the laws allow liquor to be manufactured, I want an assurance from the Government that they are properly carried out as regards that particular distillery. If the law is such as to limit their production, possibly that is the fault of the law; and if they want to carry on greater operations, they must have more capital. But at the same time, I want the distillery officer to have a foothold under the existing law, and I want to have this distillery put upon the same footing with other distilleries throughout the Dominion which produce good articles. Canada has not yet adopted a prohibitory law, and in the meantime it is our duty to see that the liquor turned out by these distilleries is of first-class quality, and will not poison those who are compelled to use it for medicine or other purposes. If I can have the assurance of the Controller that his officer there is a competent man, that he is there regularly, and does his duty efficiently, and that there is no complaint from the public, I think it would be a good thing for the Controller to say so; and I think it would be for the benefit of the distillery also if he could say so.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Mr. Borrodaile is our inspector, Mr. Grant is our collector, and Mr. King is our deputy collector. The hon. gentleman can not expect me to name all the employees just now. But I would ask the hon. gentleman what reason he has to believe that the quality of the liquor produced at the distillery of McDougall & Co., is inferior to that of Gooderham & Worts?

Mr. FORBES. I do not say it is as I never tried it. Did the Controller ever try it?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). No, I never tried it, though I am told it is a very good quality of liquor. I may say to the hon. gentleman that McDougall & Co. brought out from Scotland a plant quite different from that which is used in other Canadian distilleries. Whether it turns out as good liquor as the others, I do not know. At all events, it is their own business.

Mr. FORBES. That is what I want to know. If the hon. gentleman can tell me on the authority of his own officials that the product of this distillery is as good as that of any other, I will be only too glad to hear it.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I think it is.

Mr. FORBES. Has the Controller ever had any complaint?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Never.

Mr. FRASER. In case a brewer or distiller becomes insolvent, does the Controller permit the assignee to go on manufacturing?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The ordinary courts will determine that, as a rule. I do not see what I have to do with it.

Mr. FRASER. If a man fails, would you not have to have some security that the assignee who goes on with the business, manufactures as good liquor as the owner did?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Certainly. I may explain to the hon. gentleman that the only claim we have on any brewer or distiller is this: That before the goods can leave the bonded warehouse over which our own officials preside, the owner has got to pay the duty, that is all. If a man fails, then I take it that the Government has the first lien for the amount on the bonded spirits.

Mr. FRASER. Then I understand that the department exercises no control at all over the quality of goods manufactured?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). A law was passed a few years ago by which we compel these distillers to keep the whisky or spirits in bond for two years before it can be sold.

Mr. FRASER. Is there no process at all of testing the quality of liquors, or is it only a question of age?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). They are inspected.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We would have to appoint a tester.

Mr. FRASER. I think a tester would be the most popular officer the Government could appoint. I fancy there would be more applicants in certain places for that office, than for any other I know of. I am not personally interested in this matter, and cannot give an opinion of the quality of liquor as can my hon. friend from Queen's N. S. (Mr. Forbes). No doubt he is speaking from experience in this matter.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I should say that he got hold of a poor quality.

Mr. FRASER. I have no doubt he takes it straight. It is of the greatest possible importance that there should be control exercised in this matter. So long as intoxicating liquors are manufactured there should be some authority to see that they are the very best. Nothing has done more to promote drunkenness than the fact that much impure liquor is sold. Medical men express the opinion that much of the liquor sold is of such an inferior quality that it makes men crazy. We know very well that the Anglo-Saxon gets beastly wild from the effects of alcohol.

Mr. EDGAR. Does not the Celt?

Mr. FRASER. No; whether the Celt is found in Scotland or in Ireland he is most abstemious. While I am not able to suggest the means to bring about the result I desire to be brought about, I hope the Controller will consider the question and make inquiries in other countries as to the methods pursued there, so that there may be a strict surveillance by the Government in order that nothing but the best liquors may be produced. If it is only a question of ageing, I suppose the chemical process will produce that effect. But at all events it will be worth while for the Controller to inquire what is being done elsewhere in regard to this matter.

Mr. EDGAR. The Controller referred to the legislation that was passed a few years ago, requiring all whisky and spirits to remain in bond two years before they could be sold. Whether the object was to maintain the existing monopoly among the distillers or not, it certainly accomplished that object, and made it almost impossible to have opposition to existing distilleries. But the excuse put forward was that this provision would improve the quality of the liquors, and thus meet the view that has just been presented to the House by the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser). I desire to know whether the liquor thus kept in bond during two years is stored in metal tanks or in wood. I have been told by people who claim to be experts that while the storing of whisky in wood would have a most beneficial effect upon it as regards the wholesome character of the liquor, the storing of it in metal tanks is really of little or no effect. I should like to hear from the Controller how that is done, and what is considered to be the effect on the liquor.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). From all I can learn, some of the distillers store their spirits in wood, and others in metal tanks.

Mr. EDGAR. Surely the Controller has had an opportunity to obtain information upon which to form an opinion on this very important subject, because if the difference between the effects of storing spirits in wood and in metal is what I have heard stated, the Government should insist on the liquor being stored only in wood. I should like to know what proportion of the liquor is stored in wood, and what in metal tanks.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The commissioner, Mr. Miall, informs me that when liquors are stored in metal tanks they must be tanks ventilated under the direction of the department. I understand the hon. gentleman wishes to know the principle on which it is supposed by some that storing liquor sometimes has a beneficial effect on it.

Mr. EDGAR. It is said that if liquor is stored in wood the fusil oil is absorbed.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). There is some dispute as to that. Ageing has pretty much all to do with it, no matter how the liquor is stored. I know that some of the liquor is stored in iron tanks and some in wooden ones. There is no law to prevent distillers keeping spirits in metal tanks.

Mr. LANGELIER. If there is no law, there should be one. I have received the same information as the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar) with respect to storing whisky and brandy: that you might keep those liquors a hundred years in metal tanks and they would not improve. The result, however, is quite different in the case of wines. Wines improve by age in bottles or in metal tanks, but brandies and liquors, I have been informed by a large French manufacturer, might be kept in bottles or in metal tanks for a century without showing any improvement. It is a gross fraud on the public to keep spirits in metal tanks. When the Act was passed some years ago it was considered that it gave practically a monopoly to the large distillers, but it was said that advantage would be given to the public from the fact that liquors sent out would be in better condition for consumption. But if the large proportion of liquor is kept in metal tanks, that is a gross fraud on the public; we have given a monopoly to the existing distillers for which the people have obtained nothing in return. I remember some years ago that a vessel with a cargo of Jamaica rum was wrecked on the English coast. Some of the hogsheads drifted ashore and the people drank the liquor and became perfectly frantic. There was a severe fracas, and some people were even killed. It was stated at the time that the people were poisoned by drinking freshly-made rum. Every one is agreed that these liquors are not fit for consumption immediately after they are manufactured, and that in order to improve them they must be kept in wood which absorbs the fusil oil. If they are kept in bottles the poisonous substance remains there.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I have just been told by the commissioner that that is not so. The oxygenation by being put in ventilated tanks has the same effect as oxygenation through the pores of the wood.

Mr. LANGELIER. The general opinion is that it is impossible to get the fusil oil out unless the liquor is kept in wood.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). What difference does it make whether the evaporation takes place through the wood or through the air?

Mr. EDGAR. Perhaps the Controller by inquiring from the commissioner could let us know what proportion of the whisky now stored in bond is in metal tanks, and what proportion in wood?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). My information is that about two-thirds is in wood. I think Walker has it pretty much all in wood.

Mr. LANGELIER. I think not only should there be a law compelling them to store these liquors in wood, but that there should be a provision that it should be stored in comparatively small wooden tanks. Some years ago there was a brand of brandy well known in the province of Quebec called the Chaloupin brand, which the Minister of Public Works must have heard of, and after a certain number of years every one complained that that brandy had deteriorated. The representative of the French firm who sold that brandy told me that it was the same brandy that he sold some years previously, but that the brandy of the later date was too fresh and too recently manufactured. The brandy he sold first had been in wood for five or ten years, but in order to compete with the other importers of brandy and to sell it cheaper he could only keep it in wood for one or two years, and hence it had deteriorated. He also told me that it was the wood which absorbed the fusil oil, which is to be found in all these liquors, and he further stated that you could keep brandy in bottles for a hundred years and it would not improve it. I do not see how it would improve any better in metal tanks than in bottles.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. Under the present system of distillation, which is called "double-distillation," all the fusil oil is extracted, and according to authorities on the subject it does not make much difference whether it is kept in iron or wood.

Mr. EDGAR. Or kept at all.

Mr. HAGGART. It does make a difference whether it is kept at all. The fact of keeping whisky for a certain number of years changes the chemical form. A process goes on with age, which, strange to say, chemists cannot account for, and do not know the reason of. But they agree that it makes no difference whether it is kept in wood or ventilated iron tanks.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not know this from personal experience, but I have heard that whisky nowadays is sold in bottles—Walker's Club and other whiskys like that, and on these bottles there are dates, 1889, 1884, and so on, purporting to be the age of that whisky, the year of its birth, I suppose. I would like to know from the Controller what guarantee the public have that the labels on those bottles show the right year. There is an excise stamp on the bottle, of course, but that does not show the date.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The stamp shows the date. The stamp that covers the top of the bottle extending over the cork has the name of the commissioner and the date on it.

Mr. FRASER. The Controller says that the stamp shows the date, so that if there is a variation between the manufacturer's label and the date on the stamp, it could be detected.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Yes.

Mr. EDGAR. Are the stamps marked before the Government issues them?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Yes; and it is not the distiller that stamps it, but the officer. I can hardly conceive how the department can be more careful than they are now in this regard. But if an hotel-keeper wishes to buy a very inferior quality of Walker's rye, or a quality of rye that is not Walker's at all, and he chooses to put that in a bottle, the label of which is Walker's club rye, I hardly see what we could do.

Mr. FORBES. Will your commissioner put a stamp on that bottle?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). No.

Mr. EDGAR. Does the date on the stamp show when the whisky was made or when it was bottled?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). When it was made.

Mr. EDGAR. There is another matter which I think is important, relating, not to whisky, but to ale. I would like to know how far the Government have taken in hand the regulating of the quality of the malt drinks manufactured and sold in Canada? I have heard temperance people often say that almost universally nowadays—at least to a very large extent—the lager beer and the ale made in this country are concoctions of a most poisonous character, and most injurious to health—that the colouring matter used to make them as light in colour as champagne is very poisonous. I would like to know what is done to regulate their quality. I would impress on the Government that this is one thing which it is most important for them to look after.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I have very much pleasure in answering the hon. gentleman on that point. He knows as well as I know, perhaps better, that beer is nothing more nor less than malt, hops and water.

Mr. EDGAR. It ought to be; but they say it is not.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Will the hon. gentleman give me his authority? Because I have had a very careful examination made of all the ales made in this country since I have had charge of the Department of Inland Revenue—I am not sure that instructions were not given to my predecessor before I took charge of the department; and that examination has revealed the fact that the ales are all good. It was suspected, when sugar became so cheap, that some brewers were using sugar instead of the saccharine matter extracted from malt. Although that was defrauding the revenue, it was not producing an unhealthy article. You could not call it adulteration; they would simply be getting the saccharine matter direct from the sugar instead of indirectly from the malt. If the hon. gentleman will give me his authority, I shall be glad to look into the matter. My own impression is that in no country in the world are there as pure ales and beers made as in Canada.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not profess to be an expert in ales and beers; I do not drink them; but I have often been told—

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). By whom?

Mr. EDGAR. By many people. I do not intend to turn myself into a detective and give names, when the Government have a department for looking after such matters. I have been told that there are establishments in different parts of the country for furnishing supplies for brewers—I do not know this of my own knowledge—where you can buy chemicals for taking the place of hops and other chemicals for taking the place of malt, and much cheaper than the genuine materials; and that these are sure to be deleterious to the health of the people who drink the liquors. I think the department might spend a portion of this large vote in looking into that matter, and letting the public know whether these statements are true or not.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I am very sorry that I have no information from the hon. gentleman. I have told him that our analyst, Mr. Macfarlane, has made a very careful analysis of all the ales made in this country, and has found nothing to verify what the hon. gentleman says in the slightest degree. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken. We verify every pound of malt that goes into every brewery, through the officer in charge. I would like very much if the hon. gentleman would give me some information that would put me on the track of something.

Mr. EDGAR. Do the officers check in any way, by the quantity of beer made in a brewery, the quantity of hops and malt that ought to go into it?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Yes; I am told the returns show that.

Mr. EDGAR. I mean by inspection.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Yes, and by inspection.

Mr. EDGAR. What is the excise duty on?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The malt alone.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I may state, in furtherance of what my hon. colleague has stated, that samples of beer have been taken from all the breweries of the country, and we have found no injurious ingredients. The policy has been to encourage the production of a wholesome beer, and in furtherance of that policy, in the duties imposed there has always been an advantage given to the beer produced from malt, because it is the most wholesome.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman says the policy has been to encourage the use of malt. Instead of what?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). You cannot produce beer from anything except malt, hops and water. Malt simply means the sugar extracted from it, and we have an officer in charge of each brewery to see that sugar is not used instead. If they use sugar, they use it surreptitiously and fraudulently, and against our knowledge; but from all I can learn, I do not think they do use it. Since I have taken charge of the Department of Inland Revenue I have given this subject very special attention, and I shall be very glad if the hon. gentleman can give me information that will enable me so to regulate matters as to ensure the people getting a good quality of beer.

Mr. EDGAR. No doubt the hon. gentleman can tell me at once what the brewers use to clarify the ale to make it so bright in colour as some of it is? That is not either malt or hops, but water and something else.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I never thought there was anything else, and the commissioner tells me there is nothing else. Nothing else is permitted, certainly.

Mr. FRASER. Are the manufacturers aware of the collecting of samples when the officers go their rounds?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The samples were got in the different stores throughout the country without the manufacturers knowing anything about it.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. Minister should give all possible attention to the question of malt liquors. There are those who hold that if the drinking habits of this or any other country are to be cured, it must be in the direction of permitting more malt liquors to be used, whether to wean away the taste for stronger liquor or not, I am not prepared to say. But Germany is pointed to as an example of a country where there is a large amount of malt liquor used, and consequently less drunkenness than in Great Britain. In that case, it is, of course, of the greatest possible importance that the malt liquor should be good and I am glad to know that the Minister has found that the malt liquors drunk in this country are as pure as anywhere else.

Mr. LANGEЛИER. A large quantity of wine is now being manufactured, especially in the western part of Ontario, for the Canadian market, and a pretty large quantity is being made out of dried grapes. There is a man in Quebec who pretends to have discovered a process of manufacturing wine from dried grapes. I would like to know whether any supervision is exercised over these manufacturers, or whether they are allowed to put their wines on the market as they choose, whether healthy articles or not?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That subject has been before the department for a good many years—the question as to what jurisdiction the Government can exercise over the production of spirits. For instance, in ginger ale there is 1½ per cent of alcohol, and in the ordinary wine made in western Ontario, 3 or 4 per cent. But it has never been thought wise heretofore to have the department take cognizance of the industry of every man who manufactures wine, and their number is legion. The matter is receiving the attention of the department, but no decision has been arrived at.

Preventive Service..... $15,800

Mr. FLINT. What are the special duties of the preventive service, as distinguished from the regular service?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The preventive officers are engaged in trying to put down illicit manufacture, etc., and the payment of men who give information is included in this vote. Of course, their names cannot be mentioned.

Mr. FLINT. Are these preventive officers located in special places?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). There is one officer, Mr. Curless, who has a travelling commission, and who is called the chief preventive officer. The policy of the department has been to get our own regular officers in the different districts to do as much of this preventive work as possible. Instructions have been given them to visit the small stores and places where tobacco is sold with the view of making known the regulations rather than fining the parties.

Mr. FLINT. Is it contemplated to make Yarmouth the head of a new district? At present, Halifax is called the district of Halifax for the whole of Nova Scotia, and the suggestion was made that possibly we might make a new district, and it seems to me that could be done with advantage to the service.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The matter is now before the department, and there is very much to be said in favour of making Yarmouth the head of a division, as well as Halifax.

Mr. FLINT. That would be advisable in many respects, because Yarmouth is now getting to be a railway centre, and a very convenient point for the head of a division.

Mr. LANGEЛИER. What proportion of this vote goes to the informer, and what to the regular officers?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I cannot give you that. A considerable amount is paid in salaries. The amount spent last year altogether was $11,000. But as to the exact proportion of salaries, fines and amounts paid to informers, I cannot tell.

Mr. LANGEЛИER. I would prefer to pay large amounts to regular officers of the department rather than to pay any amount to informers.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I am not at all sure but that you are right there.

Mr. LANGEЛИER. Every one knows that there is danger of these informers entrapping people into violation of the law in order to get blood money from them or denounce them so as to get a share of the penalty imposed. This is a system which should not be encouraged by the department. I would prefer that even high salaries should be paid to the officers of the department who would have no interest in the penalty.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to ask the Controller how it comes that the inspector in Manitoba has to pay for office rent—why he should not have an office in the Government buildings?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I do not know, but I will inquire. I suppose there is no room for him there; that is the only reason I can imagine why he should pay office rent.

Mr. MARTIN. It is strange if there is no room in the Government building in Winnipeg, for it is a most magnificent building; it cost the country an enormous amount, and I must say it is a very excellent building and is a credit to the Government and the city. I should imagine it would afford accommodation for far more than those engaged in Government work. Mr. Barrett, however, it seems, is obliged to rent an office, and, very conveniently, the office he rents is a part of his own house, for which he receives $25 a month. I suppose it does not take a very large room for Mr. Barrett's business as an inspector. If the hon. gentleman will look at page D—276 of the Auditor General's Report he will see the item: "Allowance office rent, J. K. Barrett, $300." Even though house rents are rather high in Winnipeg; you can get a fair house complete for $25 a month. While I am on my feet I may call the Controller's attention to the very heavy expenses of inspection in Manitoba as compared with other districts. In Ontario the inspectors' salaries amount to $7,400. There are three inspectors, and for contingencies—travelling expenses, &c.—they spend $2,038. In Quebec, where there are two inspectors, the salaries amount to $4,899, and the contingencies to only $667. In New Brunswick the figures are, salaries, $1,700; contingencies, $531; Nova Scotia, salaries, $2,400, contingencies, $1,040. For Manitoba and the North-west the salaries are $2,500, contingencies, $1,981—almost as much as the province of Ontario, and much more than any other province. Of course it must be admitted at once that the long distances in Manitoba must cause additional expense, but one would imagine that in the province of Ontario, for instance, the very much larger of places which are to be inspected would make up for this. There three inspectors in Ontario spend only $2,038, or about $700 each, while Mr. Barrett manages to spend $1,981, of which $300 is the office rent to which I have drawn the Controller's attention. Of course it is difficult for a person looking at the accounts to come to any conclusion as to whether the expenditures are justified or not, but the comparison of other expenditures with those of Mr. Barrett seem to call for explanation. For instance, for livery, Mr. Barrett charges $78, while all the officers of the department in Winnipeg—and there is a considerable force, as the Controller knows—the salaries being $11,000—charge only $24. I know that all the breweries in Winnipeg—there are no distilleries—are on the line of the street cars, and a person going to look at them would naturally take the car. Of course a livery would be necessary when coal oil inspections are to be made.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). And cigar factories, &c.

Mr. MARTIN. Exactly. Still it seems strange that Mr. Barrett should spend three times as much as all the others. I notice that his postage account is almost equal to that of all the other officers. He has a separate post office box, and so on—in fact he seems to be a very expensive man. I would like to ask also if the Controller is aware that, in addition to being inspector, Mr. Barrett is editor of a newspaper, and a political newspaper at that.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I was not aware of that; I never heard of it before. Mr. Barrett's reputation is that of a very efficient officer, and his range of territory is greater than the districts of Ontario and Quebec put together, as he has to travel from Winnipeg to Calgary.

Mr. EDGAR. Is he supposed to give his whole time to this work?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Yes, I think recently a brewery was established at Calgary, and since then one at Edmonton, and some at other places. Breweries are constantly being established throughout the North-west, and just as constantly Mr. Barrett must be on hand to initiate the officers in their work. I can quite understand why his travelling and living expenses should be greater in the North-west than in the older provinces.

Mr. MARTIN. I would gather from the accounts that a different arrangement has been made during the year as to these expenses. It would appear that up to the first of March, $3.50 were allowed daily for living allowances, and since that time, only his actual money disbursements were allowed. I do not know whether Mr. Barrett is an efficient officer, but I do know there is a general opinion that his expenses are very large, indeed. I also know that a man that receives $2,500 a year should devote his whole time to the duty of his position, and I am glad to hear the Controller say that he expects him to do so in the future. I also know that his duties as editor of the North-west 'Review,' a weekly paper published in Winnipeg, must take a good deal of his time; I would imagine that it would take pretty nearly the whole of his time.

Mr. FRASER. On this question of editing papers, I would like to call attention to some cases of the kind in Nova Scotia. It seems that when a man gets an office, he thinks he ought to run a newspaper. Whether it is that he feels so well in getting a salary, I do not know.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He becomes patriotic.

Mr. FRASER. Yes, that is the patriotism which is the last refuge of a ——— real worthy man. I think myself that if a man gets a good salary, he ought not to engage in newspaper work, unless he writes non-political articles for a review, or wishes to follow a literary life. I would not object to that. Indeed, I would like to see more men of genius put into office in this country. I was very glad when the Government gave a position to a very worthy man not long ago, and I would not be very exacting even if the duties of the office were not as well performed by a man of that kind as by others. We are growing a little older, and we must follow in the footsteps of older countries which recognize genius. But the genius which always finds vent in scurrilous articles about the opponents of the man himself, or the Government that put him in, I do not think ought to be encouraged. I do not think the country should pay a man his salary and allow him to edit a paper. He cannot, of necessity, attend to his duties as well. We know that the paper will soon add considerable influence to the man. If a man has a paper and he writes well in it, and it has a large number of readers, and he assists the party, it is very difficult, if that man goes astray, for the Government to say anything against him, by reason of his political influence. The influence of a paper is worth something, and we are all more or less liable to look at that power back of a man, and to judge very often of his merits from that point of view. I think an officer of this kind who receives a fair salary, ought not to be permitted to do that. As to the amount of rent paid, I think it is a scandal. I have no doubt the Controller will look into that; $25 a month rent for a house where he not only does the duties of his office, but writes articles for the paper, is too much. There is another thing to remember: This editing of a newspaper irritates the opponents both of the Government and of the man himself, and will lead to retaliation some day. Now, that is a bad thing. An officer ought so to conduct himself and so to do his work, that there may be no spirit awakened against him when a change of Government takes place, by which the country may be deprived of a good officer. Therefore, I think it is in the interest of the service that the Government should not allow that man to edit a paper.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hope my hon. friend, the Controller, will give orders that this gentleman shall confine his attention to the duties of his department. There are special reasons in connection with the excise department why the officers should be prohibited from doing any other work. If I recollect aright, the law forbids them from voting; at least, we provide that they shall not meddle in political matters. More than that, all these newspapers depend more or less on advertisements and the patronage they receive, and it is not at all desirable, it is contrary to all sound policy, that an officer should be deriving emoluments from contributions made to him by outside parties, whether they are brought directly in contact with him in the discharge of his business, or not. I think the hon. Controller, on reflection, will see, now that the facts have been brought to his attention, that it is contrary to proper discipline in his office to permit any of his officials to be editing newspapers, whether they are of his political stripe or not. All kinds of inconveniences may arise from it, and I think he will find unless I am greatly deceived, that the practice of his department with regard to these officers is that they shall attend to their official business, and nothing else.

Mr. FORBES. Can the Controller tell me how many preventive officers there are in Nova Scotia now, and who they are?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I can give the hon. gentleman that information to-morrow. Some of them have very small salaries.

Mr. FORBES. Is Mr. Curless one?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). He is in New Brunswick. I think I am quite safe in saying that there are not more than six in Nova Scotia, if that number.

Mr. FORBES. I understand Mr. Curless's jurisdiction is limited to New Brunswick?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Yes. His official title is that of chief preventive officer.

Mr. FORBES. But he has a right to operate in any other province?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Yes; he may have been in Nova Scotia during the last year.

Mr. FORBES. I do not know any of his exploits last year, but some serious charges have been made against him. Can the Controller tell me whether he made any seizures last year in Nova Scotia, and if he did, what share of plunder he got out of it?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). He did not make a seizure in Nova Scotia last year, or at all events I will say for the last fiscal year. The policy of the Government has somewhat changed in regard to the preventive service. I am trying to get the local officers thoroughly instructed in the work and have them perform as much of the work as possible, with a view to instructing them in regard to the law regulating the sale of the different articles, and also in regard to the law to illicit distillation. Looking at the revenue, we have apparently not lost anything, and I am so far much pleased with the record.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman has not given any reply to the question I asked with respect to this officer, who is at once an excise officer and a newspaper editor.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I never heard of that before, and it has been brought to my attention now for the first time—and even now I do not know it as a matter of fact. I must say that we have no more efficient officer in the public service than Mr. Barrett. I am safe in saying that no charge has ever been made against him, and the oldest officers in my department say there is not an officer more thoroughly conversant with the details than he. My attention was never drawn to anything of this kind, and I felt called on to travel out of my road to make inquiries.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. Minister has told us that this gentleman was a very well posted official; that his duties were onerous, and had recently been increased by some breweries being established at Edmonton, and the hon. gentleman also explained that he was expected to give his whole time to his duties. On all those points the Controller spoke correctly. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has, however, stated that he also is editor of a newspaper published in Winnipeg, which certainly is not opposed to the Government. Whether that be so or not, I think the Controller should at least be prepared to say that if he found this to be the case, he would not permit Mr. Barrett to continue to fill both positions.

Mr. MARTIN. I have here the evidence of the fact I stated. Here is the paper: 'The North-west Review,' printed and published at 178 Prince Street; J. K. Barrett, LL.D., editor in chief.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Is that the Mr. Barrett who is the inspector?

Mr. MARTIN. It is the same person.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I will endeavour to ascertain the facts.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The paper does not give us much support.

Mr. MARTIN. He is not altogether satisfied with the Government's position on the Manitoba school question.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am not indebted to him for anything.

Mr. MARTIN. He was satisfied with your action up to a certain point. He is not only, it appears, a very efficient inspector in Manitoba and the North-west, and to that we have had the evidence of the Controller, but he is also editor in chief of this newspaper, and he is also the same gentleman who acted for the Government in carrying through the litigation in connection with the Manitoba school case.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I can assure the hon. gentleman that he did not. When a supporter gives his support to a certain extent and no more, his assistance is apt to be considered not very valuable.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you not think he should confine himself to the duties of his office?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do.

Mr. MARTIN. Do I understand that he was not the representative of the Dominion Government?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; he was the plaintiff.

Mr. MARTIN. Was he plaintiff at the instance of the Dominion Government?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes. Instead of Mr. Barrett being our representative we were his representatives.

Mr. MARTIN. My understanding is that he brought the suit at the instance of the Dominion Government.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He did not do anything of the kind.

Mr. MARTIN. I think I can show it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Perhaps you can show it, but it was not the fact. The fact is that we brought the suit and indemnified him against expenses. He did not bring the suit.

Mr. FRASER. If he brought the suit, and the Government adopted it, it was about the same thing.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We indemnified him.

Mr. FRASER. If the Government did not want to continue the action, they could drop it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was necessary to have the suit brought to test the question, and we secured the consent of this gentleman who was interested in the question on a certain side, and we indemnified him against expenses. He gave us the use of his name.

Mr. MARTIN. I should like to substantiate the statement I made. The way I came to the conclusion that Mr. Barrett was acting for the Dominion Government was from reading the account of a dispute which arose in London as regards the services of Sir Horace Davy. Sir Horace Davy was retained by the Dominion Government to act for them.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to make a remark? There is no difference between us as to the facts, what I objected to was the mode of stating that Mr. Barrett was our representative. What I say, and what the records show, is that it being desired to have a suit instituted for the purpose of testing the question of law involved, we got the consent of a member of the minority, who was interested pecuniarily and otherwise in having the question of liability and of fact settled, and having got his consent to bring a suit in his name, we indemnified him against expenses.

Mr. MARTIN. Did the Government not only indemnify Mr. Barrett against, but arranged to indemnify all parties? As Mr. Barrett is acting for the Government in the sense indicated by the right hon. gentleman, I suppose any judgment obtained against him would be paid by the Dominion Government?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman places his question on the paper I will ascertain what has been done.

To pay collectors of customs allowances and duty collected by them $5,500

Mr. FLINT. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would explain this item.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). In order to prevent the permanent appointment of extra officials at small outposts, we take advantage of the services of the customs officers and give them a certain percentage for making collections. The business has increased during the past year, and therefore the cost has increased by $1,000.

Mr. FLINT. This practice, I think, might be more widely extended to advantage. Many of the customs officers receive very small salaries, and they might be supplemented in this way.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). We take advantage of the services of the collectors in small outposts, and we pay them 5 per cent on the sum they collect, which does not exceed $100 in each case. We prefer to do this rather than appoint additional officers at $400 and $500 each.

Mr. FLINT. The point I made was that it was desirable to increase the system of utilizing the services of officials in this way, and giving this work to collectors of customs rather than having separate Inland Revenue officials in places where the amount of collection is small.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That is just what we do.

To enable the department to supply methylated spirits to manufacturers, the cost of which will be recouped by manufacturers to whom they are supplied, and to pay for salaries, &c. $85,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Explain this.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Some years ago it was found that the manufacture of what is known as wood alcohol was made potable, or allowed to be converted for use which defrauded the revenue; and the Government undertook to make this spirit and supply it to the trade. It is a rather profitable business, as the excess of net revenue over the expenses was last year over $18,000.

Mr. EDGAR. As to this question of methylated spirits, I see in the Auditor General's Report, on page D-291, the question of wood alcohol and non-potable spirits bought from different distillers. There is an entry there which I think must be a mistake. There is $4,500 worth bought from H. Corby. That surely cannot be the member of this House. It is quite a serious thing affecting the independence of Parliament as the hon. the Controller will see, and I think it ought to be explained.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What amount was it?

Mr. EDGAR. Four thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Perhaps that is what was used for the Five Nations.

Mr. EDGAR. It cannot be that, because it is non-potable. It is not fire-water.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The 167 barrels may have been required at the christening of the drill-shed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Was the hon. gentleman there?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I notice the name of Hiram Walker and some others and also H. Corby. That appears to be the case.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What H. Corby, is he?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Of course we have to buy this methylated spirits.

Mr. EDGAR. But all the persons from whom you buy spirits do not happen to be members of Parliament.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They would like to be.

Mr. EDGAR. They could not remain long members of Parliament. Does the Controller understand H. Corby to be the member for Hastings?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I do not know, but I should say so. He is the only H. Corby I know who is a distiller.

Mr. EDGAR. That amount was purchased according to the Auditor General's Report in 1892-93. Now, in 1893-94, have spirits been bought from H. Corby under the same classification?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I do not think there has been any direct communication whatever between the department and Mr. Corby. The orders are sent to Gooderham & Worts as a rule, and they arrange with the other distillers for a certain proportion of spirits, and I think it will be found that any communication that took place, took place between Gooderham & Worts and Mr. Corby.

Mr. EDGAR. There seems to be a communication in the shape of a payment of $4,500.02, to Mr. Corby. That is the trouble.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I apprehend that this must have been paid directly to Mr. Corby from the department, or else it would never have appeared in this par-particular shape in the Auditor General's Report. The Auditor General would undoubtedly have demanded a voucher, and that voucher must show that this money has gone directly to H. Corby himself.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I will have to look into that.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman will give us further information.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How was it necessary to purchase from H. C. Collier, of New York, 4,600 gallons of wood naphtha?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). We usually got our supplies from Rathbun & Co., Deseronto, but they were out of a sufficient supply and we made up for it by purchasing in New York.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I notice that the wood naphtha was purchased abroad for $1.10, but in the case of the naphtha or wood alcohol bought from Rathbun, the charge was $1.60, which is 50 cents more. How does that come?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). When that matter was brought before the department it was found that we had a contract with the Rathbun Company—an arrangement entered into by the department before I took charge of it, and which appeared a reasonable one. Offers did not come from one firm in the United States proposing to supply the wood naphtha at a price lower than the Rathbun Company, but taking the average price for three or four years it was found that the price of the American article was greater than that for which we could purchase it in Canada, and we did not think it wise to break the contract for one consignment.

Mr. FRASER. How did the two articles compare in quality?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That made by Rathbun cannot be excelled.

Mr. FRASER. Was the United States article equally good?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). We did not think it was quite so good, and manufacturing as the Government are for the country, they could not afford to run any chances and take risks.

Mr. FRASER. If it was equally good I can scarcely understand how there could be such a discrepancy at that time.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Prices have been lower in the last year or two.

Mr. FRASER. They may have been in that particular article; but the falling prices occurred after this purchase was made. If the hon. Minister says that he compared the prices for the period covered by the contract with Rathbun & Company, I can understand that. Does the hon. gentleman not think that in such a condition of things it is better to buy in an open market?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That is a very broad question. All I can say is that I had a comparison made for several years of the prices prevailing in several countries, and found it to be favourable to the Canadian producer.

Mr. EDGAR. There was another item of purchase from Mr. Corby—167 barrels at $2.50 a barrel. That must be pretty good. I would like to ask the Controller what is the real justification for the Government going into this kind of trading?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I have explained that about four years ago it was found in the city of Quebec that spirits made from wood naphtha were being used for the production of potable spirits, to the great injury of the revenue, and it was decided as a matter of policy that the Government itself should make this spirit and sell it to the trade.

Mr. EDGAR. Do you allow any one else in Canada to make it?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). No.

Mr. EDGAR. Have you statutory regulations to that effect?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Yes.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Where is it made?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Down here near the station.

Mr. LANDERKIN. How many hands are employed?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Two or three.

Salaries of officers, inspectors and assistant inspectors of weights and measures $55,150

Mr. FORBES. I want to ask the hon. Controller whether a man of the name of Kelly is an assistant in the weights and measures office in Halifax?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I think so. He is the deputy inspector. I met the gentleman myself there last year.

Mr. FORBES. Do I understand that it is the policy of the Government that these officers should not interfere in election matters?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I never knew he interfered.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We never interfere ourselves.

Mr. FORBES. I understand the Controller to say that it is a rule that the Government do not desire these officials to interfere.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I did not say that. It may be the rule.

Mr. FORBES. May I infer that it is the desire of the Controller that these officials should interfere? Are they permitted to do so by a secret understanding with the head of the department?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). If the hon. gentleman wants me to answer, I think that all officials at times interfere. I cannot say whether Mr. Kelly has done so or not.

Mr. FORBES. I want to draw the Controller's attention to the fact that this official's interference is making his office obnoxious to the people. Merchants and others on whom he must wait in the course of his ordinary business find it a matter of serious moment to them to have their weights and measures subjected to his inspection, while at the same time his open interference in political matters, and his determined efforts on behalf of the Government, are not only countenanced, but actually recognized and approved of by the Government. It is a matter of regret, because it tends to weaken the work done by the officer. I draw particular attention to this case, which is an open and notorious one. I do not think the hon. members representing the county of Halifax would say anything to the Controller about it; it is not natural that they should. I do not want the officer to lose his place, but I think a caution on the part of the Controller might deter him from prosecuting in the future this unfair and unjust work on behalf of the Government.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I never heard of that case before. I never heard that this officer interfered in politics at all. Whenever a charge is preferred, I never hesitate to recommend to the Government what should be done, but I do not feel called upon to go out of my way and make inquiries to ascertain whether any charge can be made against an officer. Some charge should be made, and then it will be looked into.

Mr. FORBES. I do not know that any man should be required to make a deliberate charge, but when it is brought to the Controller's attention that the rules of the department are flagrantly violated, and when we are told that it is contrary to the policy of the Government that their officers should interfere in elections, I think the Controller should quietly make inquiry, and if my statement is correct, should caution the officer so as to prevent a repetition of the offence.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Some years ago a number of weights and measures inspectors were legislated out of office. They were efficient officers, but their services were dispensed with on the plea of economy. It appears, however, that the real object was to get rid of men appointed by the Mackenzie Government. If it was necessary to abolish them, they were certainly entitled to some superannuation. If there was reason for superannuating the officers, I do not see how the hon. Minister can pass over the inspectors of weights and measures, who were put out of office without any fault being found against them.

Expenses under the Act respecting the adulteration of food and fertilizers and the amendment of the Act respecting frauds on the market. $25,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the department prosecuted any considerable number of persons for adulteration of food with deleterious substances during the past year?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). One of the first subjects that to me appeared very difficult, when I became Controller of Inland Revenue, was the prosecuting of people who had in their possession goods claimed to be compound articles of food and not so marked. The law permits the sale of a compound article of food, such as cottolene, which is healthy and not deleterious. Quite a number of people went into business who knew nothing of the law, and they had in their possession spices, and articles like ginger, which some of our inspectors found did not possess the necessary degree of alcoholic strength. The analysts and the commissioner explained to me that that resulted from evaporation. At all events, the average person who goes into business does not really know he is violating the law. In some cases we did prosecute and in others we did not; but in every case I endeavoured to exercise my best judgment. I shall gladly furnish a list of the cases prosecuted. I personally have great sympathy for many men who have been tried and fined, notwithstanding that they have violated the law, because they did so unknowingly.

Mr. GIBSON. Were the prosecutions taken indiscriminately?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The prosecutions depended very largely on the reports of the analysts.

Mr. GIBSON. Complaints have been made by different people in various cities that the law has been put into effect against them, whilst their neighbours, who were selling the same goods from the same factory, were not prosecuted, the reason being that they were of a different political stripe.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I am sorry to hear that. I never got those names, and I usually hear those things.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I draw a wide distinction between adulteration in the technical sense, that is to say, introducing substances which in themselves are wholesome, for the purpose of reducing the price of the article sold, and the practice, which ought to be put down with the utmost rigour of the law, of selling articles adulterated with substances injurious to human health. What I want to know is what is being done by the department in the way of punishing parties who are selling articles adulterated with substances injurious to health or life? I should be disposed to look with very considerable indulgence on the adulteration with non-deleterious substances, but it is the duty of the Controller, and it was the intention of Parliament when we passed this Act, to take very stringent steps against all parties who undertake to sell goods for food without taking the trouble to ascertain whether they are compounded of wholesome substances. This negligence is only a shade less criminal often than the adulterating, of deliberate set purpose, with injurious substances. In England and other countries this is done to a very great extent, and I believe even in Canada it is not at all unknown that articles are sold by grocers and others which are not at all fit for human food. I would be glad to hear from the hon. gentleman what his intention is in dealing with that class of articles?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). If the hon. gentleman will refer to the report he will find the name of every person convicted of any offence such as he describes. The department can only go on the information that comes to it. Our inspectors throughout the country procure samples wherever they can. They cannot be in every village, in every store, on every corner of the street where articles are sold. Occasionally they can go into a store and take a sample for analysis. The department tries to take a reasonable view of every case. For instance, a man may have recently bought his stock and begun business. In case some article in that stock is found to be adulterated the department tries to take a reasonable view of the case.

Mr. BOWERS. In such a case, who is fined—the man selling the goods or the man putting them up?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The provision of the Act is that the purchaser when he buys should get an invoice from the manufacturer stating that the article is not compound but pure. If he does not do so, the burden of proof is upon him, and, in that case, he would suffer and not the person from whom he buys.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have not had an opportunity to go into the hon. gentleman's report in detail, having had other matters before me. He will allow me, therefore, to ask how many persons were found guilty by these officers of selling articles adulterated in a manner likely to be injurious to health and how these persons were punished?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). We had hardly any cases of that kind.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If that is the case, I am afraid the law is not as well carried out as in many other countries.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I do not know how it is in other countries, but the hon. gentleman will see that it is of necessity a very difficult thing to administer a law relating to the adulteration of food.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know that, and for that reason we passed a special Act, and for that among other reasons we appointed a Controller of Inland Revenue and give a vote of $25,000 to pay the expenses of overlooking this matter. I know the hon. gentleman cannot attempt to investigate the stock of every shop in every small village in Canada. But we have a considerable number of cities where the hon. gentleman's officers reside and where they could investigate these matters, these cities being the very places where this evil of food adulteration is most likely to show itself.

Mr. BOWERS. I would ask the Controller how it would be possible for a retailer, not being an analyst, to know whether the food he was selling was compound or not?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). He does not know.

Mr. BOWERS. Then, would it not be a hard law that would condemn a man in such a case.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). It is an extremely hard law. The retailer goes into business, having been perhaps a farmer, and having had but little experience in goods. An inspector comes and seizes some tinctures because they do not contain the necessary degree of alcoholic strength according to the British pharmacopoeia. He is liable to a heavy penalty. That is the law as I found it, and I try to administer it as well as I can. I admit the justice of what the hon. gentleman has said. It shows that such a law must be tempered with mercy.

Mr. FRASER. Could not the hon. gentleman have the officer of weights and measures or excise do this work for the largest cities, by visiting the markets, for example?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Of course that can be done—they can go into a store, take a sample and have it analysed by one of our analysts.

Mr. FRASER. When I am in a large city I like to visit the markets. On such occasions I have noticed that there is a good deal of material exposed for food which, if I am any judge, ought not to be exposed.

Mr. HAZEN. The health officer of the city should look after that.

Mr. FRASER. But they do not do it. There is more or less of parish politics mixed up with the administration of the law upon this subject.

Mr. HAZEN. Any well-regulated market condemns that kind of thing.

Mr. FRASER. But I think it is not often done. There are other things than flesh and fish to which the law applies. I understand that it is the practice of those who have little shops in the market to buy cheap articles. Such places ought to be subjected to inspection at times. I do not say I know exactly how it should be done, but I know that no more important subject could engage the attention of the Minister than that of the purity of the food that is sold to the people. Our knowledge of the character of disease shows us that the most terrible maladies may be conveyed through the medium of food. I think the Government would do well, even if there is to be a considerable expenditure upon the service, to look carefully into this matter. This work is better done in the older countries than in the newer countries like ours.

Mr. EDGAR. I see that last year the public analyst inspected a number of samples of milk in the largest cities of the Dominion. I would like to know what was done. The work, I believe, is generally left, as a matter of municipal regulation, to be carried out through the health department.

Mr. FRASER. That proves just what I say, that the cities do not look after it.

Mr. EDGAR. They make some regulations, some more and some less, and some insufficient, I suppose. But does the Dominion Government come in here and supplement their work? Does the Dominion Government come in here at the request of the local authorities to sample this milk, and when they have done that, how do they publish it? Because merely sampling a lot of milk in Toronto or Montreal is not of much use to anybody, unless it is done in some systematic way and published.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). They are all published in the returns, and also in the newspapers. In the locality where I live, I have always seen published in both papers a list of the names of the parties who sold the milk, and the analyses that were made. I may say here, that if Parliament chooses to vote money enough, we may do a great deal of this work you speak of; but all we can do now is to exercise a sort of general supervision.

Mr. BOWERS. Do I understand the Controller to say that the invoice would show whether the goods were compound or pure, or whether a man could get over this fine by throwing the responsibility back upon the manufacturer of the goods, or by showing the invoice of the man from whom he had bought?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). No. In order to protect himself against the person from whom he buys, he must get a certificate of the invoice, and must show that it is a pure article and not a compound article. But I must add that a compound article of food is perfectly lawful, the law recognizes it.

Mr. FRASER.

Mr. BOWERS. That seems to me all nonsense. You never can get a man to say in an invoice whether the article is pure or whether it is compound. I might have in my store fifty different articles that might not pass inspection, and I may be innocent of intent to defraud.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Your invoice should state whether they are compound or pure. I do not mean to say that if it is a compound article of food, bought as such and sold as such, that a man is not liable for the quality of the article.

Mr. EDGAR. This question of inspection of food is one that comes home very closely to the people. I think we ought to understand what the Dominion Government is proposing to do with regard to milk inspection, and what people can get done by the Dominion Government in different places. I see by the Auditor General's Report that the only testing of milk that was done last year was in St. John, Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, Quebec, London, Winnipeg and Ottawa. Those are the only places named. Well, that is very local, very partial, and not of much general service to the country. It is more experimental than anything else. In Toronto the analyst is Dr. Ellis, an exceedingly good man, the best man for the place. He analysed a good many specimens of milk at a cost of $1,582. At whose request does he do that?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Does not that $1,005 cover lard and some other things?

Mr. EDGAR. The report gives among the items paid to W. W. Ellis, Toronto, a retaining fee of $200; analysing so many samples of milk, $110; analysing so many more samples of milk, $1,072. There are some items for rent, apparatus, &c. There is nothing about lard. Nearly $1,200 are paid him for analysing samples of milk, apart from his salary. Now, can any citizen of Ottawa, for instance, go to Mr. Valade, who is the analyst here, and ask him to analyse milk at the expense of the Government, and give him a certificate of it? Or how is that done?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That is not the procedure. The hon. gentleman can understand that the analyst would require to have a great many assistants if he were to be at the beck and call of every person who wanted him to make an analysis. As I have already said, if Parliament chooses to vote an immense sum of money for this work, we can make it just as extensive as you like.

Mr. EDGAR. Dr. Valade has a retaining fee of $200 a year.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That is not very much.

Mr. EDGAR. Besides being paid for each analysis he makes.

Mr. FRASER. I see the samples analysed were lard, milk, beer, oils, soap, drugs, fertilizers and vinegar. Were these samples supplied to these analysts by the Government, or through the Government, or who gave those samples to be analysed?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The inspecting officer made the selections himself, and gave them to the analyst.

Mr. FRASER. Take Halifax, for example. What are his orders about selecting those samples for analysis?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). His instructions come from Mr. McFarlane, who is the chief inspector. The hon. gentleman can understand that Mr. McFarlane does not write the inspector every day to make inspections. The latter officer must exercise a wise discretion in making his selections. Mr. McFarlane does not ask him to go into every shop in Halifax upon every street, and get samples every day in the year; but he exercises his own judgment as to time, place and all that. That is the only answer I can give the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FRASER. There should certainly be some principle underlying the thing. Will he go out to-day and get an article, and then lay by for three months before getting another? For aught I can see here the nine genuine articles and the eight adulterated articles might have been analysed in one day, or might have been taken from one place. I want to know the methods by which this analysis is carried on. Could a citizen of Halifax go to him and get all the facts about these nine genuine and eight adulterated articles? Could he get information as to the character of the lard sold, and where he could get the best lard?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). We have to observe some limit in order to keep down the expense, otherwise $25,000 a year is nothing to meet the expenditure that would be required. The Commissioner of Inland Revenue requires the inspector, at least twice a quarter, to furnish samples of food. He is acting under his instructions.

Ordnance Lands, including amount required to pay expenses, $500, in connection with repairs to roads at Grand Falls, N.B. $1,775

Mr. FORBES. Does that ordnance matter refer to one item, or can the Controller give me any information with regard to other ordnance lands?

Mr. DALY. The ordnance lands at Annapolis are under the charge of the Militia Department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are the ordnance lands referred to in this vote?

Mr. DALY. Those we have for sale, the others are reserved for military purposes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where are those principally situated?

Mr. DALY. At Point Pelee, Lake Erie; along Niagara River, some at Quebec, and at points in Ontario.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this vote asked to pay expenses for management of those lands?

Mr. DALY. In connection with legal expenses. We have had the suit of Magee against the Queen, in the city of Ottawa, and another suit, Niagara Falls Parks Commissioners against Howard.

Immigration—Salaries of agents and employees in Canada. $22,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It will be convenient if the hon. gentleman will state what is his policy, the present position of immigration, and the prospects.

Mr. DALY. During the past year the department has carried out what I stated during last session was the policy of the department, so far as our work in Great Britain is concerned. In the first place, as hon. gentlemen are aware, we have an agent at Liverpool, Mr. Dyke; another at Glasgow, Mr. Grahame; another at Bristol, Mr. Down; and one agent in Ireland in place of two agents who were there formerly, a year ago, there being Mr. Connolly at Dublin, Mr. Merrick at Belfast. They have been retired, and Mr. Leary has been appointed. In addition to these permanent agents, we have at work in the north of Scotland, Mr. Bailey Stuart; in the south of Scotland, Mr. Peter Lang, and in the Midland Counties, with headquarters at Birmingham, E. F. Wood. These agents work under the direction of the High Commissioner, Sir Charles Tupper. From the reports of the department, it will be found these gentlemen have been very assiduous in their work, and the reports we receive from time to time are very encouraging in so far as extending a knowledge of Canada, particularly the North-west and Manitoba as a field for emigrants, is concerned. There has been a large falling off in emigration from Great Britain to all parts of the world; emigration has fallen off 52 per cent during the last two years to the United States, and 45 per cent to Canada. At present there is a movement towards South Africa on the part of emigrants, on account of the facilities offered in prepaid passages by the South African Government; and the Queensland Government have developed great activity in connection with a movement directed towards the establishment of villages and hamlets, and by encouraging people to go there in a way we are not doing, and do not propose to do, and could not do with the limited means at our disposal. Particulars as to the work performed in the north of Scotland will be found on page 61 of the immigration part of the report of the Department of the Interior. Mr. Stuart's work, he having his headquarters at Inverness, has been called out all through the northern counties. Between January and the date when he sent his last report, he had visited all the towns and villages and rural districts in the north of Scotland, lecturing and delivering public addresses in regard to emigration. He had also distributed to the best advantage, pamphlets and hand-books relating to the Dominion. He had also translated into Gaelic, information respecting the different provinces, and stimulated an interest in the Dominion by means of short articles and paragraphs, in the press. He also attended cattle shows, markets, and fairs with the object of distributing pamphlets and giving verbal information and advice regarding the Dominion. In an appendix to the report is given a list of the places where Mr. Stuart delivered addresses. Altogether, he delivered 146 lectures on Canada. It was only by the last mail that we received the final report of Mr. Stuart. Both he and the other agents furnish Sir Charles Tupper with a monthly report, which is transmitted here, containing a diary of their work, and other information, and it is evident that those gentlemen are prosecuting the work with the greatest possible vigour. Both Mr. Stuart, Mr. Fleming, and Mr. Wood, in their latest reports, state that, owing to the depression among the agricultural classes in England and Scotland, and particularly among those classes which we want in this country, we cannot expect, this year, the number of immigrants we otherwise might have obtained. A large number of men, during the winter, made up their minds to come to the North-west, but, unfortunately, they have not the means they expected to have had, and our agents are particularly instructed not to encourage people to come to this country unless they are in a position to make a fair start. In addition to the work done by Mr. Stuart in the north of Scotland, Mr. Fleming has been equally active in the south of Scotland, and there will be found at page 58 of his report the number of places he visited and the work he did, and it will be seen from his report that he has been indefatigable. I might say, in passing, that Mr. Fleming was for twenty odd years in the employ of the Australian Government, and has had large experience in immigration matters, and that a year ago he made a tour through Canada from Cape Breton, and thus became thoroughly conversant with the country. I find that from February to December he visited 170 places, delivered lectures and attended some fairs. Mr. Wood, whose headquarters are at Birmingham, delivered 38 lectures between February and December, and visited twelve towns and sixty-one fairs. At these different fairs and towns visited, these gentlemen distributed literature to the people, and lectures were illustrated by lantern views and were largely attended. In addition to that, it will be seen by a resume of the report of the High Commissioner that so far as the distribution of literature is concerned, it has exceeded that of any previous year in the history of the work in Great Britain. It will be found on page 4 of this report :

An important department of my work during the year consisted in the editing and supervising the publication and distribution of the following pamphlets :

	Issue.
Emigration to North-western Canada.	25,000
Western Canada and its great Resources.....	50,000
A special folder for distribution at Chicago Exhibition (with map and illuminated cover).....	50,000
Leaflets and small folders in various languages.....	300,000
Official Hand-book for 1894.....	80,000
Lettres de Canadiens Repatriés.....	7,500
Swedish Hand-book.....	10,000
Danish-Norwegian pamphlet.....	10,000
German pamphlet.....	5,000

In addition to the above, the undermentioned pamphlets, published in previous years, have been reprinted and are now in circulation :

	Issue.
La Colonisation Française (P. Foursin)	5,000
Vermont Delegates' Reports.....	25,000
Report of Mr. P. R. Ritchie on Manitoba and the North-west.....	70,000

Various leaflets and pamphlets in foreign languages. The total number of Scandinavian pamphlets, circulars, &c., sent out during the year was 83,000.

So, on account of the energy displayed by Sir Charles and the other agents, Canada has been put in a position before the old country people that she has never been in before. In addition to the work done by the agents of the Government, we have had considerable assistance from gentlemen who have visited Canada during last year, and particularly from the British delegates who were selected by Sir Charles Tupper, as will appear from his reports. These delegates were selected from different parts of England, Ireland and Scotland after thorough inquiries were made as to the standing of the delegates and their fitness for the work. The English tenant farmers were : Mr. Reuben Shelton, Nottingham ; Mr. Booth Waddington, Derbyshire ; Mr. John Cook, Shropshire ; and Mr. Joseph Smith, Yorkshire ; also, Mr. W. Weeks, Wilts ; Mr. T. Pitt, Devon ; Mr. A. J. Davies, Worcestershire ; Mr. J. T. Franklin, Northamptonshire ; R. H. Faulks, Rutland ; Mr. C. E. Wright, Lincolnshire. The delegates from Scotland were Mr. John Stevens, Ayrshire ; Mr. Alexander Fraser, Inverness. The delegates from Wales were Mr. John Roberts, North Wales ; Mr. W. H. Dempster, South Wales. And the delegate from Ireland was Mr. Guiry of Clonmel, south of Ireland. Some eight hundred thousand copies of the reports of these delegates published in small books were distributed. Without taking up the time of the House, I might be permitted to quote a few words from the concluding part of the report of the Scotch delegates. Mr. John Stevens, says :

In concluding this record of my tour, throughout this Dominion, I must say that my opinion of Canada as a suitable place for our surplus population is very favourable. There is cheap land, and plenty of it, and a farmer can begin with a small capital, with a good chance of succeeding well, if he is industrious. Canada being a country of vast extent—as large as Europe, taking away Turkey, and as big as the United States, with the exception of Alaska—it presents a diversity of climate, soil and production, as a matter of course. The different provinces of the Dominion have so many special claims on the attentions of the intending emigrant, that he is often at a loss to know where to locate himself. The old country farmer with a little capital will find in Ontario an old province, with good land and cheap, social conditions, and schools and churches as at home—in fact, little difference between it and Scotland or England. Then Manitoba has special advantages open to all, both to the capitalist and those who are willing to work themselves up. There is excellent soil of a rich black loam, resting on a clay subsoil, and producing the finest quality of wheat in the world; indeed, it took this year, the first prize at the World's Fair, as it did at the Bakers' and Millers' Exhibition, in London, in 1892. Then the North-west Territories present a field for mixed farming and ranching not to be surpassed anywhere; these have deep soil and large crops are generally produced. * * * Then British Columbia has special claims and advantages to hold forth. It is a splendid climate, good soil—no better in the world—and good markets for farm produce. It has also large mineral resources, fish in abundance, and wood which will sooner or later, be a source of wealth to the Dominion. * * * Having seen this vast country from Manitoba to the Pacific, in common with the rest of the delegation, and having talked with farmers in every district I visited, meeting them on their own farms and hearing what they had to say, I must confess that I was not surprised to find both contentment and a look of prosperity in nine cases out of ten prevailing. Every man we interviewed appeared to us to be speaking the truth, and each seemed to think the particular spot in which he happened to be located to be the best in the Dominion and the world. * * * In the way of summing up my remarks, I might state that everywhere we went we met with successful Scotchmen both in connection with farming and mercantile pursuits. They seemed to carry the secret of prosperity wherever they go in the Dominion.

Mr. Fraser says :

In concluding this report, I would like to make a few general remarks on the country, the class of emigrants most likely to succeed there, and also to give a general idea of the impressions conveyed to my own mind during my trip. * * * It is of the first importance that intending emigrants should possess physical strength and powers of endurance, with a fixed determination to succeed, which must not be too easily upset by difficulties which are certain to arise at the outset of a settler's career. The amount of capital possessed at starting does not appear to have so much influence as might be expected. Numbers of men we encountered who went to the country with large sums of money are now in comparatively poor circumstances; and, on the other hand, numbers who have landed with very little are now in good positions. Unless the settler is prepared to rough it, and work out for a considerable time, however, he ought not to go to Canada without from £200 upwards. With this sum a man of resource and energy could make a fair start. It is very much better to work out for the first year, or if this is not considered desirable, live on a farm with friends until experience of the ways of the country, the prices of stock and implements, and of the quality of land, is acquired. * * * Within the last few years, the price of cereals has fallen to such an extent that there is now not very much profit in their cultivation, and farmers in Canada are beginning to turn their attention more to mixed farming and dairying. I would like, before closing, to say a few words on this head, and point out to Scotch farmers, who have the knowledge of cattle feeding and dairy farming, the great advantages held out just now in the Dominion to any persons having the knowledge of cattle and cattle feeding.

In conclusion, I venture to tell my fellow countrymen that if they emigrate to Canada, they will be more independent than most of them can ever hope to be in the old country. They will have to work hard, if they do not, it is no use their emigrating, but they will in all probability reap the fruit of their labour sooner than in their old homes.

Mr. Dempster says :

Gentlemen farmers would do better in the older settled parts of the country, such as Ontario. Improved farms may be bought or rented on reasonable terms; there need be no unnecessary expense; and there is a good society with all the usual home comforts. Children may be educated at a very small cost. This, I may say, is the most delightful country I have seen; magnificent fruit of all kinds is grown and its scenery—hills, valleys, and lakes—is all that can be desired.

Then Mr. Dempster concludes his report :

We here completed our task, and prepared to return to England. We were unanimously of the opinion that Canada is a great but undeveloped country, with unbounded wealth both in minerals and agriculture. It undoubtedly has a great future before it. Many thousands of families who are striving against the tide of fortune in Great Britain, will obtain in Canada what they never can expect to, where they are, namely, the privilege of being their own landlords with, as I have before said the law and liberty of the old country."

Mr. Franklin, from Northamptonshire, says :

The districts visited were very various. The impression which I believe exists in some quarters, that we were only shown the best parts in Canada is one needing correction. We did see the best parts of Canada, but the Canadian Government gave us at the same time every facility to go where we liked, even assisting the delegates individually to visit English friends now settled in Canada, irrespective of distance and locality. My general conclusion is like that of others, that the resources of the country are enormous, and only require capital to develop them at a faster rate. A large increase of population is doubtless needed, but I consider that money is even more urgently required than additional settlers. * * *

With regard to the kind of farming most desirable for those who have obtained land, I would strongly urge the superiority of mixed farming. Manitoba, in my judgment, is scarcely farmed as it ought to be. In many places one cannot call it farming at all, but a mere tickling of the soil; but where one meets with an industrious man who understands farming and has sufficient resources to work the land, there a much better yield will be found—amounting, indeed in some cases to as much as 40 bushels an acre of wheat, from 60 to 70 bushels an acre of barley, and a hundred bushels an acre of oats. Speaking generally, there are good spots to be found in all districts, though it doubtless requires judgment when choosing the locality, and fixing upon a quarter section: and I advise the intending emigrant to inspect thoroughly for himself what he thinks of buying, and to trust to the opinion and advice of no man. On the other hand, a man of capital wishing to settle in Canada with as little roughing it as possible would naturally choose the province of Ontario. There he would be able to find the comforts of the old country; land is at a reasonable price, and rates (so unlike England) nominal. And as in the Dominion generally the free schools are excellent, as all classes of society send their children to these schools, it can easily be understood the advantages derived from them are in many ways superior to those obtained at the Board or National schools in this country. The number and character of the various church buildings indicate the prosperity of the country; for the erection of handsome edifices by voluntary contributions within the comparatively short period during which parts of the country have been settled, shows that there must have been money free for this purpose as well as the disposition to support these churches. In British Columbia, also, the conditions are somewhat different from those in the rest of the Dominion. With these few observations on Canada as a field for agricultural emigrants, I conclude my report. I have endeavoured to describe what I saw and to give the conclusion to which I have come as plainly and as impartially as I can and I would end by expressing my strong sense of gratitude for the unvarying kindness I have received both from those who were officially concerned in our trip and from all sorts and conditions of Canadians with whom I had the pleasure of being brought in contact.

This is from the report of Mr. Wright, the delegate from Lincolnshire:

The following are the men most wanted in Canada:—First, farmers and their families who can do all kinds of work, with some capital; second, single farm men, who can content themselves on small farms, where only one man is kept, and save their wages until they have enough to start for themselves; third, men with a large capital, who understand, cattle, horses, and sheep; fourth, married farm men with some capital, to take 160 acres of land, and work as well for others, for a time.

Mr. Guiry, the Irish delegate, concludes his report as follows:—

I recommend mixed farming in preference to continual and exclusive wheat-growing. The place can be best selected by the settler. Every facility will be given to inspect districts: the government have in all towns and villages land agents, whose business it is to look after the interests of the immigrant. Besides, farmers are always delighted to see a new man, and are ever ready to give him a hand and sound advice. The reason is, there is room for all. I cannot recommend clerks or shop assistants to go; the same may be said of the professions. Lawyers, in particular, have no opening in Canada; the Canadian Government think that the laws were made for the people, and not the people for the lawyers. The idler has no chance of living in Canada, and it is no place for the gentleman who is above his business. I have seen men fail in Canada, but they were men who would fail at home. There is a kind of man pointed out as a failure; he is the man who has been sent away, and is supplied with a sum of money as long as he remains. He is known as the "remittance man." When he returns home he is pointed out as a Canadian failure. Such a man is hard on Canada. A steady, industrious man, can make a happy, comfortable home there. I cannot conclude this report without saying that, in making it, I have tried to avoid any exaggerations: I only give what I saw and heard. The truth can be told of Canada, for it will bear the truth.

These are samples taken from a few of these reports, showing in general terms what are the conclusions of the delegates. These gentlemen visited the various provinces of Canada, and they speak of what they saw from the commencement of their journey to the end, and the advice we have from the High Commissioner, Sir Charles Tupper, is to the effect that he is receiving continually at all times demands from all directions for copies of these reports. In addition to the general distribution of these reports, the commissioner has distributed them to school teachers throughout Great Britain and Ireland. A great interest is being taken in Canada, and our Hand-book of Canada is being used as a text book in various schools, and is eagerly sought after by the different school teachers. In addition to these reports, we have had papers printed by the Rev. John Lightfoot, vicar of Cross Stone, Todmorden, Yorks.; the Rev. J. Cavis-Brown, minor canon of Chichester Cathedral; and the Rev. F. W. Webber, a Canadian clergyman. These gentlemen made a tour through Canada last year, and gave Sir Charles Tupper the benefit of their experience and observations here by writing these reports, which are being circulated and are doing a great deal of good. Then a special report upon the agricultural resources of Canada was made by Professor Robert Wallace, Professor of Agriculture and Rural Economy in the University of Edinburgh, and author of "Farming and Live Stock in New Zealand" Professor Wallace made a tour through the country last year, it being the second occasion on which he visited Canada, and he speaks very highly indeed of the improvement he saw on all hands as compared with his previous visit to Canada some years ago. We have also had printed in England a hand-book in relation to the district of Algoma in the province of Ontario. It appears that there has been a general inquiry in England for information about the district of Algoma, and in order to meet that inquiry, we have had correspondence with some gentlemen in that district who take an interest in colonization work, and the information obtained has been compiled in this hand-book, which is being circulated. In addition to the work done in Great Britain and Ireland, we have adopted another feature—the offering of prizes for papers by students in schools in the United Kingdom on the history, geography and resources of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. Two sets of prizes are offered for England, one for Scotland, one for Ireland and one for Wales. Each set of prizes consists of a first prize of £5, a second prize of £3 and a third prize of £1, and the matter has attracted a great deal of interest. About this, Sir Charles Tupper says:

The matter has already attracted a great deal of interest, and much correspondence has been the result. In all probability a large number of papers will be sent in, and I quite expect that the perusal of them and the awarding of the prizes will require a great deal of time and will not be an easy matter.

We also have the co-operation of the steamship agents in Great Britain, who number five thousand, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have been indefatigable in assisting our agents in every way, having had a car containing cereals and other products of Canada constantly on the go from one part of England to another. We have also advertised; our agents have attended all the leading agricultural shows in England, Scotland and Ireland; and it is safe to say, from the reports made by all the agents, that at no time in the history of Canadian immigration work has our country been more thoroughly advertised or talked about in Great Britain and Ireland than at the present time. We are not getting the return that might be expected from the work that is being done, for the reason that I have stated, the people are not emigrating—in the first place, because there is a great depression, and they have not the money to enable them to go; and, in the second place, because the wages of farm labourers are high, and they do not care to leave England or Scotland while they are being well paid for their work. Owing to the migration from the farms to the cities, farm labourers are scarce and are being well paid, and are, consequently, loth to leave and come out here. In addition to the work in Great Britain and Ireland which I have described, we are doing a special work in Normandy, Brittany and other portions of France, in Belgium, in Holland, in Norway, and as far as possible in Sweden and Germany. Owing to the laws that exist in relation to emigration in Germany and Sweden, we are debarred from having active work done in those countries through agents; and we have been able to perform our work there only by advertising in newspapers and by the distribution of our literature through steamship agents and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Immigration into Canada this year has fallen off 45 per cent to the present time as compared with what it was at this time last year; but from the reports which we have had from our agents at Halifax and Quebec, the immigrants, as a class, are superior to those who have come to us from Great Britain and other parts of Europe in times gone by. People are realizing that it is not well for them to come out without proper means to give them a start, and we are not encouraging any to come who are not in that position. But, so far as the report of the Local Government Board is concerned, Canada is getting more than its share of immigration; and it stands in a better position to-day, so far as the prospects of settlers are concerned, than any other of the British colonies. In addition to what we are doing on the other side of the Atlantic, we have had an active work in progress in the United States. This work was commenced three years ago, when the immigration was done under the Department of Agriculture, and has been continued by the Department of the Interior since it was intrusted with that work. It has been brought about by inquiries that have been continually made by people writing from the various states of the Union with reference to the possibilities of their coming over here and getting land and becoming settlers. The immigrants that we are getting do not come exclusively from the western states, because we have had a large immigration from Vermont and Massachusetts and other eastern states, comprising a number of Swedes and returned French-Canadians. The immigrants from the western states are principally old country people, a great many of them having lived in the States for a number of years, but are still British subjects, and there are Canadians and Germans and Scandinavians, and very few Americans indeed. The stream of immigration just now, and it has been for a year past, is particularly directed to the Edmonton district, one of the finest in the North-west. There has been no particular desire or intention on the part of the Government agents to attract immigration to that particular portion of the North-west, but the idea has got abroad, based on undoubted truth, that it is a very fine section of country, particularly adapted to mixed farming. We find it will be no longer necessary to have the same number of agents that we have had in the United States during this last year, for the reason that the people who have gone there from Michigan, Kansas, Nebraska, Washington Territory and other states in large numbers, will of necessity become immigrant agents themselves. In addition to the work done in that direction, we had men at Chicago during the World's Fair. Literature was distributed there, samples of our wheat in small bags were distributed, and we met with very great success, so far as distributing knowledge of our western country is concerned. It was extraordinary what ignorance was displayed by people on the other side of the line as to the facts of our having land open for settlement in any direction; and the consequence is that we brought to the notice of the people on the other side, the fact that we had a country open for them to come in and settle upon, and that our land laws were liberal. And the outcome of the work is being evidenced in every way by the continued inquiries made by people in the United States who were fortunate enough to see the exhibit which we made at the World's Fair. During the California exhibition, one of our agents was there with a supply of cereals and minerals, and he met with considerable amount of success. There is at present in the Edmonton district a delegation of five or six farmers from California who are desirous of emigrating, and so far as information goes, they are well satisfied with the country. They were delegated by a large number of farmers in that state desirous of going up to our western country. Taking it altogether, the work that has been done by the department with the money at its disposal has been as effective and successful as we could possibly expect.

Mr. FRASER. While I have listened with a good deal of interest to the hon. Minister's explanation, I cannot help contrasting his own report of the results achieved of the year's work with what he has said. I find, for example, that despite all the expenditure we have made in advertising, that there has been a woeful falling off during last year in the immigration to this country, and the falling off has been just from the country from which we would like to see immigration come. Evidently there has been a good deal of advertising. The number of agents at work has been large. I see by the report of the High Commissioner that there is a large number of officials. The hon. Minister says that there is a large number of officials now, but he has to confess that, so far as the practical results go, the number of people coming into the country this year is not larger than last year. I understood him to say that the results of this year have not been more satisfactory than those of last year. I must join issue with the hon. gentleman in saying that the people are not leaving England. If he will look at the statistics he will find that the immigration from Great Britain is large to India, Africa, and the Australian colonies. There must always be a large emigration from a country like England, not only because of the character of the people, but because in a country like that, with a limited acreage of land, men will always of necessity seek new countries. Nor must it be forgotten that both the character and the condition of emigrants are entirely different from what they were in the past. Men emigrated in the past because there was something of a spirit of adventure in emigrating. The means of transit were so slow that they had almost to forego all communication with the country they left. It is different now, and men only emigrate to where they have the best chance of improving their condition. Once upon a time, the settler that came to us from abroad had no choice in the matter. He was living on a small holding, and often, when the building was pulled down over his head, he had to go away, either because the owner of the soil wanted a deer park, or because of the congested population of the country. Nowadays emigration has become a commercial matter with him, he has the whole world to seek, and he chooses the country where he can most easily better his condition. In reading the report, I find that last year there was a decrease of 317 in the number of homesteaders from Great Britain, and a falling off of 119 homesteaders from Continental Europe. The only country from which we had an increase is the United States, and that increase was not sufficient to make up for the decrease from Great Britain. The hon. Minister says now that he understands from the agents in Halifax and Quebec that the character of the immigrants is better than it was in the past. Sir, it is impossible for an agent to tell that. There is nothing that decides the character of an immigration except the country from which it comes. I need not be told that the appearance of an immigrant is going to indicate his character. All that results from nationality and the surroundings in the country from which he comes. There are countries in Europe, the immigrants from which must of necessity be inferior to those from other parts of Europe, so that unless the agents can tell that the immigrants come from certain countries, they cannot say that they are better than others. The men from Great Britain are of necessity better than those from any other country. But we have a falling off from Great Britain. I do not look upon emigration from Ontario to the North-west as immigration at all. It is simply a change from one part of the country to the other, and that is not to be encouraged. What we want is men from the outside to settle Ontario and Quebec and the older provinces, as well as the North-west. Simply to change population from one district to another is not to increase our population more than to change wealth from the country to the town is to increase our wealth. The question of the cause of our failure to attract population is a very serious one. I do not profess, for my part, to be able to say what those causes are. But I do know that men who think of emigrating from the country in which they live find out as much as possible about the state of the country to which they are going. The question with each man is: How can I get the greatest possible return for my labour? One would suppose, from the beautiful description of our country given in these pamphlets that emigrants would rush here. There was a time when to tell of a country well wooded and well watered was sufficient to attract immigration. But that day has gone by. I was talking with a clergyman from the old country the other day and he was telling me of a discussion he had with some workmen in the United States as to the wages they received. In that discussion the fact came out that the workmen in the old country was about as well off as the workman in the United States, if not better. And this criterion, the comparison of wages with the cost of living, is the one by which emigrants are decided to-day. The intending emigrant considers as intelligently as a business man the investment of his capital. His capital is not in money or in goods, but it is in his hands and his brain, and he wants to invest his capital so as to make the most of it. To my mind this question of immigration is the most serious problem before the people of the Dominion to-day. I hold that to-day Canada needs more than anything else that the North-west should be filled, that the uncultivated acres in Ontario and Quebec should be brought into industrial use. We have a debt, in round numbers, of three hundred millions of dollars. How can we meet that debt more easily than at present? Simply by increasing our population. The development of the North-west is the hope of the Dominion. We look to that great country with its possibility of the production of goods required not only in Canada, but in the outside world. If we can get the people to go in there by hundreds and by thousands, the problem of the future of Canada is solved. But until that is done, talk as we may, we move at a snail's pace. I think we will all agree that the present Minister has at least put some energy into the department. Still we are not attracting the immigration from the old world that we ought to attract. I believe that one of the reasons is that we give too much importance to internal matters, devoting thought to the question how we shall make certain people in Canada wealthier than they are to-day. Our policy ought to be broader than that. All our legislation is in the direction of walling ourselves in, of protecting ourselves. We must have a wider outlook if we are to bring people into the North-west—and about that country I believe everything that is good that has been spoken by the Minister or by anybody else. But the report of the Minister himself honestly states that last year the effort to bring in immigration into Canada was a failure. I can hardly conceive of a greater failure. Here are millions of acres of fertile land.

with a railway from one shore of this great country to the other, with railways traversing the older provinces, north, east, west and south, and yet the number of homesteaders from Great Britain went back three hundred during the past year. I am quite willing, for my own part, that even larger sums should be expended, if they are wisely expended, to get the people to come here. I speak for myself and for myself alone, when I say that I am ready to go further and to vote in favour of appropriating any reasonable sum to purchase back from the various corporations the acres we put into their hands. I believe we made a mistake when we gave our millions of acres of land away, and I believe we shall never start right until we get this land back. Put a proper value upon it as at the time when it was given, and add reasonable interest, and then let us vote the money to purchase this land so that it may be kept for the people. Every man in Canada knows that there is enough land in Ontario to give a farm to every farmer's son in Canada for the next twenty or thirty years. In the older countries, you find five or ten acres supporting a family in comfort, while we here have our farms divided up in areas of two hundred acres. I believe that that is a mistake, and that we are trying to farm too large quantities of land. I believe that we should unite our efforts, that men on either side of the House, and men throughout the country who have the best interests of Canada at heart, should try to find some better method than we have had in the past of bringing people into this country. We all want these people in Canada. I am satisfied there is not a member of the House, there is not in the country an intelligent supporter of hon. gentlemen but agrees with me that the only hope for Canada is that she shall receive immigrants. We cannot stand still. The census has indicated that we were about standing still: we are losing our own population. I have always contended that many of those who leave us would be better if they stayed in the country. But the stubborn fact remains that they do go, and you cannot stop them. Now, if they go and we can not stop them, why can we not get them back? For my part, although I may be told I am a crank, I think there is a way which we can get them back. There is only one way by which we can get them back, and that is by adopting a more liberal trade policy, by breaking down the miserable walls by which we keep out the rest of the world, when we learn the great truth that if we want to grow, we must not hoop ourselves around with tariff walls. Then we shall have solved the problem, but not before. I believe that the question of immigration is greater than the question of internal revenue we have been discussing. It is in importance next to the preservation of the peaceful homes that are inhabited by peaceful citizens. We have not been advancing as we should. I hope that the efforts that have been made will be successful. For my own part, I have very little faith in the agency work that is carried on in Great Britain. It has not produced very definite results in the past. I see some parties are asking the Government to support a repatriation scheme in the province of Quebec. It was charged that this was a French society which desired only to bring back French-Canadians who had emigrated, but I saw the other day that that is repudiated, and that they want to bring back English as well. For my part, I have not much confidence in that scheme either. You cannot go over and instruct many men and induce them to come back. Men move from one country to another accordingly as they see clearly where they are going to better their condition. Make this country a cheap one to live in, and you will have immigrants coming in. I hope that next year the result will be more favourable; but I can see decay, and decay only, written on our history if we do not receive considerable immigration year by year. We are going back just as surely as we are sitting in this House, unless year by year our population is increased by immigration coming into this country. Believing that this subject is the greatest subject that can engage our attention, I hope the time I have taken up will be excused. I feel as a Canadian that our future depends upon building up this country by increasing its population. It is the plain expression of a truth that I believe every true Canadian feels in his better moments. I approve of any expenditure of money for this purpose if it is wisely done, not confining it merely to spreading pamphlets or offering a few pounds in prizes. What is the use of that unless results are shown? If the money expended shows results I will make no objection, and I shall be willing on all occasions to vote money for promoting immigration when I can see that results are obtained.

Mr. MARTIN. In my opinion a large portion of this sum of $200,000, so far at least as it applies to Manitoba and the North-west Territories, is entirely wasted. I do not believe that immigrant agents are of much use in directing immigration to this country. The United States stands as a bright and shining example of countries that have been built up by immigration, but I believe the United States never spent any money for immigration purposes. Why have the United States attracted so large a number of immigrants? For the reason that those who came there in the first place were satisfied with the change they had made and brought their friends. The hon. Minister expects that that will occur in the North-west, he expects that he will be able to decrease his expenditure in the United States because those who have come from there and settled in the North-west, will bring their friends. If they do, then I am quite prepared to justify the expenditure he has incurred, although I must say that I think he has expended a great deal more money than was necessary to obtain the very small number of immigrants which he actually has obtained from the United States. However, I would not cavil very much with that expenditure if these persons whom we have settled in the Calgary district or the Edmonton district, do bring in their friends in large numbers. I may say, however, I do not share his anticipations. I think it is fair in a matter of this kind to turn to our experience in other portions of the Territories and in the province of Manitoba. Immense sums of money have been spent by the Dominion authorities and by the local authorities in attempting to attract immigration to Manitoba and the Territories. It was natural to suppose that the stream of immigration having started in that direction, the country would fill up from the causes alluded to by him, and that these immigrants coming from the old country would induce their friends to follow them. There was some reason to expect that. The country was a good one, and it was possible to cultivate the soil easily, instead of the new settlers having to hew their farms out of the forest as they did in the older provinces. In that new country they had their farms ready to their hands, with nothing to do but go on and plough them, and they were soon ready for a crop. However, those anticipations that were indulged in both by the Dominion authorities and by the local authorities, have not been fulfilled. So far as Manitoba is concerned, immigration is at a stand still; so it is also with regard to the Territories, except possibly in the district to which the hon. gentleman referred, as to which extraordinary efforts have been made and a very large sum of money spent. The only answer can be, that the people who have gone there are not prepared to advise their friends to come. The Local Government of Manitoba have recognized this position. They for years past have annually increased their expenditure, until it had reached for that province, considering its revenue, a very considerable sum. In the estimates of the province for the present year it will be seen that the Government have practically abandoned all immigration work. They have discontinued their agents in eastern Canada and in the United States, and have almost closed up their work in the old country; they still retain one man there, but they have practically closed up the work. That is not done because the province is not anxious to obtain immigrants. There never was a greater desire that the province should fill up, from a local standpoint as well as from a Dominion standpoint, as alluded to by the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser). In the Edmonton district there is a temporary movement, and I shall be very glad to find Edmonton become the permanent home of a largely increased number of settlers from the United States. The committee, however, will understand that where a new settlement is started, there is always at first a sort of boom or movement. The new comers are at hand to purchase the produce grown by those already there. This has been repeated time and again in the different settlements in the North-west. While the settlement is young, entirely apart from the question of permanent success and settlement, there have always been good times, because the new men coming in with a certain amount of money require outfits, seed grain, grain and provisions to carry them on for a year or two until they grow a crop. But that is no evidence of the prosperity or success of the settlement, because so soon as a sufficient number come in to raise a surplus they get down to hardpan, and the success of the settlement has to depend on permanent forces, and then the real success of these settlements is reached. I am sorry to say that in other portions of the Territories and of Manitoba this experience has been undergone, and we have the position existing to-day. I do not anticipate any different result in the Edmonton district, because while I am prepared to subscribe to what the hon. Minister alleges as to its natural resources, it is certainly not better than very many other portions of Manitoba and the Territories, and it is probably not so good as some; so that we have no reason to suppose that what has occurred in other portions of the North-west will not be repeated in that district. What we have to come back to is the question as to whether the people will settle in that country, and in the long run be prepared to advise their friends to come. That is the true test measured by which we must admit, that at present in that country there is a great deal to be deplored. The hon. gentleman has told the committee that immigration has fallen off this year. We know that times are hard in the old country on the whole, and I suppose to a certain extent that prevents emigration, but at the same time it must encourage emigration. Those who are at all able to emigrate are much more likely to do so when times get hard in their old homes. I would suggest that the hon. Minister's explanation, so far as regards farm labourers, is not very much of an explanation of the falling off, because we never have had a very large immigration of farm labourers from the old country to the North-west, and I do not think it would be advisable to have such immigration. Farm labourers without some little capital are not the most suitable men to come to that country. It is quite true there is a great demand for farm labourers at a short season of the year, but I would hesitate to advise farm labourers in large numbers to go to the North-west permanently to locate, with the expectation of obtaining employment, because the demand prevails during only a short period in July, August and September, and after that there is practically no work to be had. The settlers we desire and need in that country are those who come in not to work for other persons, but, possessed of some little means, to take up either a homestead or purchase a little land and settle down as farmers themselves. To do this does not require a great deal of capital, but it requires a little money. There is every opportunity given to such a class. While homesteads are not very available, except possibly in the Edmonton district generally they are too far distant from the railway to be generally available, but lands are cheap. The finest land in the North-west may be obtained practically for nothing, or at all events, for such small sums that it is better, in my opinion, for a man to buy his land and not attempt to homestead, because although the homestead may cost nothing, the land for which the settler pays from $2 to $5 per acre is much nearer railway accommodation, is better surrounded by other settlers, so that the settler can easily make up the difference in the cost of the land. The district for homesteading is one in which a man has practically no neighbours and if he has any spare time at his service he can get employment if he is in an old settled district. With respect to the present condition of the country, I desire to say that if a person undertakes to tell the truth about the country then he is not patriotic, he is described as a blue ruin man, he is running down his own country. Well, I am prepared to take every responsibility for what I say. I am satisfied after watching this matter for many years in Manitoba that nothing whatever is gained by telling anything untrue about the country, that it is absolutely necessary in order to remove our difficulties in regard to that country, and in order that the country may have an opportunity of going forward, that those upon whom rests the responsibility of legislating and governing the country should understand exactly the position in which it is placed. It would be idle for men in this House to make a statement with respect to that country which is not borne out by facts, because the statement of the representatives of the people are those on which the House must depend to consider the questions that come before it, so far as they affect that portion of Canada. That is the position the farmers and the people who live there take. They believe it is best to tell the truth. They believe that where there are laws or circumstances that are hindering the progress of the country, they must point out distinctly and clearly where they exist in order to get them removed. If the country is a good country, if the resources are such as the hon. gentleman's pamphlets declare, if it can, as has been asserted, sustain millions of people, then there must be some reason for the failure, after ten or twelve years of most assiduous efforts, efforts made not alone by the Dominion and Local Governments, but efforts supplemented by the Canadian Pacific Railway, because they also have spent large sums of money in endeavouring to attract emigration to the country. If, in the face of all that, the country is not developing as it ought, and the inhabitants are not prepared to advise their friends to come there, there must be some reason outside the country, arising from causes which are removable, which will explain the position we find ourselves in to-day. I have no hesitation in re-affirming, and I am sure all the representatives from that country will reaffirm, every statement made on the floor of this House as to the capabilities of the country. The people who live there all agree that it has all those resources which have been claimed for it, that it is capable of supporting these millions of people if they could be got there. What, then, is the difficulty? I know, Mr. Chairman, no better means of answering that question than to read a statement of the case which is presented by the Patrons of Industry. I may say that I have already brought this matter before the House, but this seems a most proper time to again draw the attention of the House to a calm and candid expression of opinion, given, not by politicians, but by farmers of both sides of politics as to the condition of things there. From that resolution, the House will see to what these farmers attribute the difficulties, and the responsibility is then upon the House to remove these difficulties if we can. I may say that the Patrons of Industry have taken a very strong hold upon that country. They have a large membership, numbering more than 6,000 farmers. They have taken hold of a number of matters, and have been of great benefit to themselves in those matters—notably, binder twine. They have been very successful in any business venture they have undertaken, and, so far as they deal with any question of public interest, they endeavour to base their deliverances entirely upon the ground of the interests of the country. I know myself that the Conservative farmers are very largely represented in these lodges, and on the executive board which passed this resolution. They appreciate fully all that has been said as to the lack of wisdom in thus exposing the difficulties of the country. But they have acted on a contrary policy so long, they have waited so patiently for these people that have been promised to them, they have waited patiently for the alleviation in their condition that has been promised, and having failed to find it come they passed this resolution unanimously, which, I may say, I entirely subscribe to myself, and which, I believe, is a fair statement of the position of that country to-day, and a fair answer to the Minister's complaint that immigration is falling off:

Whereas the freight rates charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway on both imports and exports are excessively high:

And whereas the local rates of freight, coupled with discrimination against small shippers, are still more exorbitant;

Mr. MARTIN.

And whereas these rates are maintained in spite of the fact that the Canadian people have granted this same Canadian Pacific Railway $100,000,000 in money, land, and completed sections of road, and also that this same company are operating their lines in the United States, built largely through the credit given them by the Canadian people, at rates from 30 to 40 per cent lower than those charged in Manitoba and the North-west:

And whereas such excessive charges are levied upon the people of Manitoba and the North-west, in order that they may be the better able to compete with the American railroads, as for instance charging us $2 per 100 lbs. from Montreal to Winnipeg—1st class—and only charging the Americans $1.20 per 100 lbs., 1st class, from New York to St. Paul, about equal distances:

And whereas the tariff regulations of our Federal Government erects barriers to prevent us from trading in a central market only 500 miles away, compelling us to trade with Eastern Canada at a distance of 1,500 miles, and thus forcing us to become the unwilling victims of a grasping monopoly, since we have no competing outlets:

And whereas the burdens above set forth, depreciating as they do the value of all our products and unnecessarily increasing the cost of all our necessities, render it impossible for us to make farming a success, and compels us to till the soil on shares with the Government and the railroad corporations.

That is a strong statement "that these things have rendered it impossible for the farmers of that country to make farming a success." You will notice that they do not say a word against the capabilities of the country, but for the reasons set forth they make the strong statement "that these things render it impossible for us to make farming a success."

Therefore, we, on behalf of six thousand farmers, emphatically protest against the spending of any further sums for emigration purposes, fast Atlantic steamship service, or for any other purpose that does not promise us deliverance from the burdens that are crippling us. We ask for lower freight rates and less taxation, and if our request is unheeded, we will declare to the world the true state of affairs, and while we have unbounded faith in our country and believe there is none offering better inducements to intending settlers, yet under the existing condition of things, we cannot conscientiously recommend it to our friends unless such changes are made as will cause this country to become prosperous.

CHARLES BRAITHWAITE, Grand P.

W. C. GRAHAM, Grand Secy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I say, I fully endorse that resolution, and I believe that it is a calm, careful, and correct statement of the exact situation up there. If the reason is not, as these farmers allege, will the Minister of the Interior give us the real reason? The facts are admitted. There have been large expenditures of money for immigration purposes; yet the immigration to the country is not satisfactory, and is becoming year by year less satisfactory. What is the explanation? If the explanation offered by the Executive Board of the Patrons of Industry is not true, then what is the true explanation? If the reduction of the high freight rates and the removal of the burden of the National Policy are not what is required to render the country happy and prosperous, what is it? It may be answered that the trouble is the low price for the time being of grain. I admit that that is a difficulty; but that difficulty only accentuates these other conditions which it is in the power of this Parliament to control and alleviate. At one time wheat ran to $1.15 a bushel, and it has run from 65 cents to 90 cents a bushel until very recently; and was the immigration satisfactory even then? Has there ever been, since the railway was built, even a reasonable fraction of the immigration that was promised by the Government of the day when they submitted the Canadian Pacific Railway contract for the approval of this House and the country? There never has been. The immigration has been always disappointing, and it is becoming more and more so every day. As this resolution points out, while the growing of wheat is unprofitable on account of the low price, and especially on account of the great cost of raising wheat by virtue of the taxes the farmers have to pay on everything they require to buy in order to bring their crops to maturity, and by virtue of the great expense of carrying those crops to the seacoast and to the old country, it would be of great advantage to them to have reciprocity with the United States in order that they might diversify their farming. A great many cereals and other agricultural articles that could be produced profitably in that country, are not produced profitably, because the natural market for those articles is in the United States, and that market is closed to the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west on account of the tariff policy of this Government. As they allege, through the tariff policy and through the practical monopoly which the Canadian Pacific Railway holds, they are forced in these matters to trade with people 1,500 miles away, instead of with people 500 miles away. There is another matter to which I wish to allude, that is: that even the immigration which we are supposed to get, which the Government records say we have got, is really not there. That will be proved by adding up the yearly returns of immigrants who are supposed to have settled in the North-west, and comparing them with the census returns. The reason that they are not there is that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, by their energy, for which they are to be lauded, carry a large number of immigrants, who enter at Halifax and are classed as Canadian immigrants, but who go to the United States, principally to the state of Dakota. That fact was never more fully emphasized than last year when a train load of immigrants came to Winnipeg, and it was found that small-pox was among them. When they reached Winnipeg a child was found to have died from small-pox, and the whole party were dumped out on the prairie near the city and kept there for several weeks at a very large expense to the city, which the citizens think was very hard upon them. Those immigrants were isolated in tents and kept there until the disease was conquered; and what was found to be the fact? It was found that instead of being immigrants intending to settle on the plains of Manitoba or the Territories, they were all on the way to Dakota; and as soon as they had been cleaned up and put in a sanitary condition at the expense of the people of Winnipeg, they took the Great Northern train for Gretna, and disappeared in the United States. I say it is quite a common occurrence for large numbers to come in at Canadian ports and be classed as Canadian immigrants, who really go to Dakota. That could be largely avoided by the Government. I do not say that the Government could prevent their going to Dakota; but if they took the proper means, they could prevent their being entered as immigrants coming to this country. These people either had their tickets, or arrangements were made by which they could get their tickets for Dakota at Winnipeg. I am under the impression that they had some order which enabled them to get their tickets from the Canadian Pacific Railway ticket seller at Winnipeg. It certainly would be more satisfactory to the country to have the proper number of immigrants credited for Manitoba and the North-west. It would be much more satisfactory if we found, when the next census is taken, as it will be in that country in 1896, that the figures reasonably correspond with each other.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to ask the hon. Minister to explain what is meant by the phrase "return man," which frequently figures in these immigration matters. It is not very good English, but we will pass over that if the explanation is otherwise satisfactory.

Mr. DALY. The "return man" is a man who has been living in our North-west for some years, who has farmed there and been successful, and who is sent home to the people from whom he came; it being a matter of experience that such a man, not being very much given to letter-writing, does far more good by sitting down by his fireside and telling his friends what he has seen in the country. That man was called a "return man."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is a good many of those parties. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman can give us anything but a very vague general idea of the results achieved by these people, but I should be afraid that but little practical good has been accomplished. There is a pretty great temptation on the part of persons who desire to have their expenses paid home, to promise seas and mountains if they are only allowed to come back in the capacity of "return men," or whatever else the hon. gentleman likes to call them, but the practical results are likely to be out of all proportion. Can the hon. gentleman tell us whether any real results have been achieved?

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman is quite correct. There is a desire on the part of a great number of people to go home at the expense of the Government, and they promise all sorts of things if sent. Last fall, when the question of sending home "return men" was under consideration, there was a conference held between the steamship companies, the Canadian Pacific Railway agents, the Deputy Minister of the Department, and the chief clerk of the Immigration Branch; and the result was that some twenty-four men were selected by the Canadian Pacific Railway land commissioner at Winnipeg, whose circumstances and record were first inquired into. Some of them have reported and others have not, but they are paid this year upon the results of their work. The Canadian Pacific Railway gave them a passage from Winnipeg to Halifax, and the steamship company gave them free transportation home, and we gave them $24.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Have those who returned reported?

Mr. DALY. I think so.

Mr. MARTIN. Was there not some arrangement by which the railway companies or the steamship companies are paid a certain amount for each immigrant they brought into Manitoba or the Territories at any time?

Mr. DALY. There was an Order in Council passed a number of years ago in reference to bonuses, but that was done away with two years ago. So far as the continent of Europe is concerned, we still give bonuses; but so far as Great Britain is concerned, we pay a bonus to the shipping agents of $1.75 over the commission they get from the steamship companies. This is to meet the commission which the steamship agents get on booking to Australia, South Africa and other places. In the conference held at Montreal, in December, 1892, it was considered that the only way we could retain the services of the 5,000 booking agents in Great Britain was to raise their commission by the addition of $1.75 bonus on each passage to Winnipeg, so as to equal the commission they get on booking to Australia, South Africa and other places. This has had a good effect. We find they take more interest in booking people to Canada than before.

Mr. MARTIN. When is this money paid to the booking agent?

Mr. DALY. On a certificate issued by the commissioner at Winnipeg, a month or two after the immigrants have arrived, showing that they have settled in the country.

Mr. MARTIN. I understand that the booking agents get no money unless the commissioner reports that the settler has actually settled?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN. I moved for a return in regard to this matter, being under the impression that the bonus was given to the steamship companies, and received a return in blank. I think it would have been better for the department to have put me on the right track, and have made the return of the moneys paid these booking agents, because they could see what it was I was trying to get. I suppose the hon. gentleman could bring down a return giving the quarter section and particular description of land upon which each one of these immigrants, for whom we paid to the booking agents, have settled. I asked for the return so as to check the correctness of a report which came to me, from one who is in a position to know, that these small-pox patients, who were in Winnipeg most of last summer, out on the prairie, and who went to Dakota—most if not all of them—were paid for to the agents at the rate of $1.75 per head.

Mr. DALY. They arrived here as Dakotans. We were advised from the time of their arrival that they were for Dakota.

Salaries of immigration agents and employees in Great Britain and Ireland	$9,350
---	---------

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I want to inquire touching several items, such, for instance, as advertising, and now is the proper time to make the inquiry. Ten thousand dollars appears to have been paid for that. What is that small pamphlet "Now is the time to emigrate" charged on page B—173 of the Auditor General's Report?

Mr. DALY. I cannot give the hon. gentleman the information, as this expenditure was made at a time when immigration was under the Department of Agriculture. I presume it must have been some advertisement in newspapers in Great Britain and Ireland. I will get the information for the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are other items such as printing 20,000 Bohemian pamphlets, printing 20,000 Polish pamphlets. I have great doubts as to the wisdom, under existing circumstances, of endeavouring to bring more of this class, Polish immigrants particularly, into the North-west. The Americans have discovered, and I fancy we shall discover, that immigrants from these countries are not a desirable addition to the population. I would infinitely rather see the sums at the disposal of the hon. gentleman concentrated. If we are to go outside the British Isles, I would like to see the money used in promoting Norwegian, Swedish or Danish immigration rather than in promoting the immigration of Bohemians or Poles. No doubt the hon. gentleman knows that the most disorderly element in the United States at the present time are the Poles and Hungarians, and, I fancy, the Italians.

Mr. DALY. I agree with what the hon. gentleman says about the Poles, and no effort has been made since I took charge of the department to induce these people to come in. These Polish pamphlets were printed in 1892, when a movement of emigration from Poland was made by the agricultural classes.

Mr. MARTIN. I sent to the proper office for the return which the hon. gentleman says he brought down, and I am told it has not been brought down. I have asked for a good deal of information, but all I have received is the valuable return I alluded to a moment ago, consisting of two letters, one from one department saying they knew nothing about the matter, and another from another department declaring an equal lack of knowledge on their part. The information I asked for and which I should much like to have before attempting to discuss these questions is still in the department. The anticipations of the First Minister as to the return respecting half-breeds' lands that it would take months to prepare and cost thousands of dollars seems likely to prove true.

Mr. DALY. I laid that on the Table this afternoon.

Mr. MARTIN. It is nearly three months since I asked for this.

Mr. DALY. It required tremendous research. As to the other return the hon. gentleman speaks of, I am under the impression that I laid it on the Table. However, I will inquire about the matter.

Women's Protective Society, Montreal $1,000

Mr. MARTIN. What is this?

Mr. DALY. It is the annual grant which has been made for many years to a body of philanthropic ladies in Montreal who look after girls coming in.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is not the worst money we vote for the immigration service.

Immigration Expenses $150,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If I were to express my own opinion, I should say that we might almost as well save this entire sum of money, for I doubt extremely whether the country is receiving any return of the smallest importance from this expenditure. And, though I speak with some reserve, I am very much disposed to believe that we should do better—if we are to vote the money—by putting a large part of it at the disposal of the Manitoba Government and others to see what they can do to bring in immigrants. My impression is that this money simply goes into the pockets of a number of shipping agents and of individuals who find it convenient to report themselves to the Government as desirous of repatriating our countrymen from the other side of the line, and who do very little indeed for their money. But, as we are in committee, I suppose no particular service will be done by moving to strike out this item, so I shall try to get all the information I can as to how the money was spent last year. As to these bonuses, which account for a large part of the expenditure, and would seem to be paid at the rate of $5 per head of adults brought in, what security has the hon. Minister that any real settlement takes place?

Mr. DALY. These bonuses were paid to different shipping companies, whose names are given, under the provisions of an Order in Council passed a number of years ago which provided for the payment of bonuses of $5 per head for adults, and for children in proportion, upon a certificate being produced showing that homestead entry had been made by the person for whose immigration a bonus was demanded. In this way we are safeguarded against the possibility of these people going elsewhere.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Take the item: "Hamburg-American Steam-Packet Company, 205, $1,025." Do I understand these 205 people took homestead entries?

Mr. DALY. I understand that the arrangement with respect to homestead entries applies to immigrants from Great Britain and Ireland. But that condition did not obtain so far as continental immigrants were concerned. They did not require to establish the fact of their having made a homestead entry, but it had to be established they had actually settled in the country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Now, will the hon. gentleman glance at that item of continental bonuses? Does he believe that the department, if called upon, could produce all those parties as actual settlers?

Mr. DALY. Well, there is nothing certain in this world but death and taxes, and I would not undertake to produce them all. This was some three or four years ago. But the matter was so carefully looked into that it was established by indubitable evidence that the people were there before the bonuses were given.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman remembers—it did not occur under his administration, I admit—the evidence which was laid before this House from the returns of the department, proving that of the people who were alleged to have settled in this country, numbering about 900,000 all told, in the course of ten years when we took the census, scarcely 150,000 remained. While I am bound to say that I think the returns the hon. gentleman is now getting out are much less deceptive than those of his predecessors, still they are liable, I fear, to very large deductions. There is another item on which he might give the House some information, that is the bonuses on children at $2 per head. Now, Dr. Barnardo and a number of other gentlemen appear to be in receipt of considerable sums of money under this head. I have nothing in the world to say against the philanthropic objects of Dr. Barnardo, but I am by no means certain that the class of pauper children that he brings to this country are always very desirable settlers. What has the hon. gentleman got to say to us about that?

Mr. DALY. I was trying to ascertain how long this arrangement has been in force, but it has been in force for a great many years. I may say to the hon. gentleman that all these children who are brought out by Dr. Barnardo, Miss Birt and others, are first certified to be children who are at least physically fit subjects to be sent out. The examination is made, and the certificates are granted by the Local Government Board. We report every year to the Local Government Board as to these children when they arrive, and the whole matter is conducted in conjunction with the Government of Great Britain. It was on that understanding, I believe, that the original arrangement was made; so that the conditions under which they are sent here are surrounded by that safeguard.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Now, let us understand. When these boys arrive on this side of the Atlantic, what precaution does the department take to see that they are reasonably healthy and fit to become settlers? Have we any medical examinations?

Mr. DALY. No; there is no medical examination.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We take the word of the English Local Government Board?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, English Government boards are apt to take optimistic views of the youngsters they send out, I am afraid. I would feel very much more secure if proper medical examination was had of these people when they arrive, at any rate before we pay any money to them. It may be a very philanthropic object and purpose on the part of Dr. Barnardo and his friends; at the same time it is a thing that requires a great deal of caution on our part. I have heard a variety of statements in various parts of the country as to the class of children that are brought out in this way, and they have not all been favourable, I can assure the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. DALY. I am reminded by the deputy that after the discussion in the House last year in connection with this matter we request medical certificates to accompany these children.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But I think we should have medical certificates of our own.

Mr. MARTIN. Of course, the matter of physical perfection is very well in its way, but I think the real difficulty is the moral trouble. In Manitoba there is a very strong sentiment, in which I share myself, that instead of paying for each one of these boys brought into that country, it would be much better to prohibit them from coming altogether. They are a dangerous class; they have turned out to be so, and it is very natural to expect that they would be. They are boys who have been brought up in the slums of the old country, and they are turned loose upon us in Manitoba. They get employment amongst the farmers throughout the province, and while some of them do fairly well, a great many of them turn out very badly. Their early training shows itself, and in my opinion they are a dangerous class in the community. I believe it would be far better to exclude them from the country rather than give a bonus for bringing them in. We do not want in this country the dregs of the old world. While it is important to fill up the country with settlers, it is more important that Canada should maintain the character of the citizens she possesses to-day, and bringing that degraded class of boys into the country has a tendency to degrade the character of our citizens, when they become mingled with the population. I may say that the grand jury at Brandon on one occasion presented the judge with a very strong presentment on that subject; I fancy the presentment was forwarded to the Minister of Justice. I appreciate the motives which induced Dr. Barnardo and others to go into that work. No doubt it is all right from their standpoint, but it is no benefit to the country upon which these boys are unloaded. While a fair proportion of them turn out well, there are others in whom their evil character develops itself, and sometimes very disastrously. We have had some startling cases in Manitoba of these boys committing very serious crimes. There being a scarcity of farm labour, farmers are disposed to take them into their homes, and while, as I say, many of them turn out satisfactorily, so many on the other hand turn out very badly, as to create a considerable amount of public apprehension with regard to them.

Mr. DALY. I am sorry I have not a report which was furnished by Dr. Barnardo in answer to newspaper correspondence which took place after the presentation of the Grand Jury of Brandon, to which the hon. gentleman has referred. In justice to Dr. Barnardo, and the boys sent out by him, it should be said that a wrong impression was made in regard to the conduct of his boys owing to the presentation made by that Grand Jury. The statement made was based entirely on an erroneous proposition, and that was that a boy charged with murder at Brandon was a Barnardo boy, whereas he turned out to be a Canadian boy, of Canadian parents, and that Dr. Barnardo had nothing to do with him. I do not see that it is possible, out of 493 boys brought out that more of them should turn out ill, especially when we find as regards our own Canadian boys we have to establish reformatories for them, and so we must remember that there must be a small percentage that are not good, but I think from my recollection of the report sent by Dr. Barnardo he shows that not over 5 per cent of all the boys sent out to Canada—because he has a home at Peterboro' as well as at Manitoba—had turned out badly, and some of those who had turned out badly had been returned home. I simply make this statement in justice to Dr. Barnardo and those associated with him in the work.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In view of the large number of lads sent out, it is a matter of no small importance that they should be of fairly good character. I observe that about 1,000 have been brought out. I desire to ask who is the Rev. R. Wallace, to whom 214 are credited.

Mr. DALY. We have had nothing to do with him since I have had control of the department. The only people have been Dr. Barnardo, Mr. Burke and Mr. Macpherson.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It will never do to make this grant, let it be large or small, indiscriminately to everybody who chooses to claim it. You must deal with some parties you know, and exercise some hold on them.

Mr. DALY. Only to the people I have named have bonuses been given.

Mr. MARTIN. I understood from the remarks of the Minister of the Interior that no bonuses had been paid to steamship companies. I suppose he meant steamship agents. I have here a return granted on April 10th, showing the amount paid railway and steamship companies as bonuses for bringing settlers to Manitoba and the North-west in 1891, 1892 and 1893, and the list of settlers that were brought, showing the names and locations. I find among the payments in the Auditor General's Report one to the American-Hamburg Steamship Company, $1,025 as a bonus. The return shows that no payments have been made to steamship companies. I cannot understand that payment, except as a bonus.

Mr. DALY. It was perfectly correct.

Mr. MARTIN. What did that payment to the Hamburg-American Steamship Company represent?

Mr. DALY. Payments made to their agents. I cannot understand it, and my deputy says he cannot understand it, owing to the manner in which it has been entered in the accounts by the Auditor General. I presume the American-Hamburg Steamship Company sent in the accounts of their agents, and the Auditor General, instead of specifying the names of the agents, put all the accounts under the head of the American-Hamburg Steamship Company.

Mr. MARTIN. Then the return is a complete evasion of the information I desire to obtain. What is the difference between a bonus given to a steamship company, and a bonus paid to its agents?

Mr. DALY. We are only allowed to bring down to the House the exact information that is ordered, and nothing more. It will be a dereliction if we did anything else.

Mr. MARTIN. I have had considerable experience in regard to returns. In the Manitoba Local House we never would have thought of avoiding the granting of information on such a small technicality.

Mr. DALY. There is no withholding it, we have given it.

Mr. MARTIN. There is not the slightest hint of the mistake on which I had dropped that instead of the money being paid to the steamship company, it was paid to agents. If the information had been brought down, I am sure the head of the department would not have been in contempt with this House. I was very much surprised when I got the return in that shape, and the hon. gentleman's department has shown no desire whatever to put me right when I made a little slip.

Mr. CASEY. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has made his point correctly. It has not been usual to take advantage of a trifling technicality.

Mr. DALY. We did not take advantage of a technicality.

Mr. CASEY. Advantage was taken of the technicality to furnish a return that did not show the actual state of facts. The House knows that the money was paid as bonus for immigrants, although it was paid to the agents of the steamship companies. As to the Barnardo boys, no one wishes to attack Dr. Barnardo. The great question is whether it is desirable in the country's interest to import children of the class from which we know they come, because they come from the criminal or neglected classes of England, or they could not be obtained by the doctor for exportation to this country. They may have been carefully trained in his home, and behaved very well when they were under his care, but they inherit physical and moral taint, and can hardly be classed as proper immigrants. I notice the amount paid has been considerable, $2,176, and it will be remembered that the Minister stated that he had only dealt with Dr. Barnardo and Mr. Macpherson.

Mr. DALY. You misunderstood me; I said "now."

Mr. CASEY. I notice that last year there were eight persons dealt with for various amounts, and some of them appear to have been speculators in children who had collected batches and sent them out here, one sending eighty-six, another sixty, and one as few as six children. There are two ways of looking at this matter. In the first place the Canadian who adopts one of these children often gets a complete failure, and in the second place the children so adopted do not always get what they expected. I have known many cases where children were nominally adopted in families, but were afterwards treated as "slavies" to the whole family. In one or two cases, the children were so badly ill-treated in families of the highest respectability that the courts had to be called in to interfere. This importation of young humanity, whether girls or boys, and especially girls, is a bad speculation. In regard to the general subject of immigration, I have been disappointed from year to year lately in finding how little was done in reduction of our immigration expenses by the authorities of the Canadian Pacific Railway. There is no doubt they have done a great deal in spreading information, but that has been in addition to the expenditure of the country, and consequently no relief to our treasury. In the United States they rely almost entirely on railways and other corporations to whom large grants of land are given to look after immigration; and when the Canadian Pacific Railway was inaugurated, it was held out to us, that they would pay almost all the expenses of inducing people to come here. The immigration has been falling off in spite of their efforts and ours, and I do not think any satisfactory explanation of this fact has been given. I wish to call particular attention to the efforts to induce immigration from the United States. I do not think the results justify the large amount we have spent in that direction. I find that $28,500 in round numbers was spent for immigration in Great Britain and Ireland, outside of the High Commissioner's office, and $52,300 in round numbers, or nearly twice as much as was spent in the United States. We all know that prima facie, our great source of immigration must be from the old country, including Great Britain and Ireland, and that any immigration from the States must be casual, depending on the temporary existence of hard times. It is practically conceded in some reports from our agents in the United States that the immigrants we get thence are those who have been failures under circumstances in the western states similar to those of our own North-west. We had agents in Ohio, Illinois, Kansas, New England, Michigan, Nebraska, North and

South Dakota, Washington, Wisconsin, and an agency for the United States generally. The largest amount for any one agency was that of Michigan amounting to $14,243, or half the amount of our immigration expenditure in Great Britain and Ireland. The result for Michigan was, as reported by Mr. McInnes, that 186 entries were made in the North-west Territories during the year, and whether they have all stayed there or not I do not know. In the eastern and New England States we spent $11,200 and got from 60 to 70 entries, which is an extremely bad showing. In Nebraska we paid $4,740 and got 90 settlers and 40 families, whatever the report means by that. In North Dakota we spent $4,850 for the magnificent result as the agent reports: "that several persons contemplate going to the North-west." In South Dakota for an expenditure of $3,500 we got 100 entries. In Wisconsin we spent $3,780 and we have no report that anybody came from that state. In Minnesota we paid $2,400 for 40 families; or on the whole we got about 700 entries from the United States up to the 1st of November, for this large expenditure of $52,298; whereas we obtain the great bulk of our immigration from Great Britain at an expense of $28,500 outside of the High Commissioner's office. In comparing the expenses in England, we find that Belfast agency only cost us $4,650. The Bristol agency, $950; the Birmingham agency, $1,184; the Dublin agency only $2,287; the Glasgow agency, $4,958, and the Liverpool agency, the chief point from which our immigration comes, $11,587, or about the same as that spent in the eastern and New England states from which we only got 60 or 70 entries, and several thousand dollars less than Michigan, from which we only got 186 entries. Apart from the quality of the immigrants obtained from the United States and the old country, these results show that the attempt to obtain immigration from the States generally has been a miserable failure, as a matter of fact, and has been disgraceful so far as it has been continued at such vast expense with so little return. As the Minister said to-night, we got from the United States some Scandinavian families who had not succeeded in the States and got poor there.

Mr. DALY. I beg your pardon, they all succeeded in the States and brought money in with them.

Mr. CASEY. I only heard the words of the Minister casually, and must have mistaken them. I see in the report that in one place the people they got were people who had failed; and I take for granted that those who emigrated were men who had not made a success where they were, and to that extent had failed. I find it stated here that some immigrants from Iowa could take from $400 to $1,000 each with them in addition to a team. These men were not satisfied with their surroundings in Iowa, they must have failed there, or they would not have left to go to the North-west. So I say that the different classes of immigrants we have got from the United States are chiefly those who have not succeeded under similar conditions to those prevailing in our own country. The only others we got are some who are said to be Russian-Jews, not a very desirable class of immigrants. We must come down to the serious bottom fact that the main immigration that is going to build up the country must come from Great Britain and Ireland or in scattered instances from Scandinavian and Teutonic countries; and that should be attended to rather than immigration from the United States. The stream of German immigration sets too strongly towards the United States to be diverted to us. Now, I must ask the Minister whether these agencies in the United States are going to be carried on in the coming year at the same scale of expense as in the past?

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. CASEY. Then, he admits that to that extent they have not been a success.

Mr. DALY. Not at all.

Mr. CASEY. What does he estimate for these particular agencies?

Mr. DALY. I cannot tell exactly. I do not admit by withdrawing them that they have failed. The work for which they were intended has been done, inasmuch as we have diverted the stream of immigration, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman has said; and by people writing back to their friends, and by sending some back temporarily, we shall be able to accomplish all that is required.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman is very hopeful if he calls 700 or so, obtained at a cost of $3,000, a stream of immigration.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman is mistaken in his figures.

Mr. CASEY. I have taken the figures as given by the different agents in each State and added them together, with the exception of one or two cases where families are mentioned, where I have had to guess at the ordinary figures per family.

Mr. DALY. On page xiii the hon. gentleman will find that homestead entries by people from the United States numbered 818.

Mr. CASEY. Perhaps some of the entries have been made for some people who have not yet come up.

Mr. DALY. They have all come. These are 818 heads of families, representing 2,360 people, as the hon. gentleman will see.

Mr. CASEY. That is an estimate. They do not necessarily mean heads of families.

Mr. DALY. No, it is an actual fact.

Mr. CASEY. I cannot reconcile those figures with the statements given by the agents in their reports. But even if the top figure were correct, it is a miserable result for the money spent compared with what is spent in getting immigrants from the old country. Coming to Michigan, I find that Mr. McInnes has represented himself as being an agent for the Canadian Pacific Railway. I know the young man, and I consider him a very proper man for getting immigrants. He may have obtained salaries from both the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I see that has cost us for himself $1,800; but his agency costs us altogether something over $3,000. Does the Minister know whether he was in the employ of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company also?

Mr. DALY. He was not. He was at one time, but not while in the employ of the Government.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister says he has no idea what the expenses for the United States agencies will be. It is very strange that he has not laid out some campaign.

Mr. DALY. I have not the money yet.

Mr. CASEY. The usual thing is to plan the campaign, and then get the money. Can the hon. gentleman not give us some idea of the general plan of campaign in the United States?

Mr. DALY. Speaking shortly, we expect to continue the work in Michigan, Washington, Idaho, the northern part of Iowa, the northern part of the State of New York, Kansas, Nebraska, and the New England States. That is about the same territory, but we can now do the work with fewer men.

Mr. CASEY. Has the hon. Minister formed any idea of what the cost will be?

Mr. DALY. It will be considerably less than the cost last year. We have not really outlined the work yet, and I cannot give the exact amount.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister has not outlined the work in the latter part of June. I supposed the work must be in progress now.

Mr. DALY. Yes, it is in progress.

Committee rose, and reported resolutions.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 1 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 22nd June, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT—H. CORBY, M. P.

Mr. CORBY. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to an article in the Montreal 'Herald' with reference to purchases from me by the Government and I desire to explain my position. Not having good health for the last two weeks, I decided to go to Montreal to consult Dr. Roddick. I left here by the Canada Atlantic train at three o'clock yesterday, and waited on the doctor last night, and he advised me to go into the hospital for a short time. I was to go back to see him again at 9.30 o'clock; but this morning my attention was drawn to an article in the Montreal 'Herald' regarding myself. I at once took the early train and came here as soon as I possibly could to make an explanation to this House, and, after I have done so, I propose to place my resignation in your hands. I exceedingly regret that I am the person referred to in the Auditor General's Report. I may say that previous to the Government taking over the methylated spirits business, the vinegar works at Montreal and other places were in the habit of making methylated spirits, and I had been in the habit of furnishing these concerns with rough spirits for that purpose. When the Government, for reasons best known to themselves, caused a law to be passed providing that methylated spirits should be manufactured by no other than themselves, I received an order in the usual way from the Inland Revenue Department for their warehouse which, I understood, had been established in this city. The order was filled in the regular course of business. I had not the slightest idea that I was violating the law of the Independence of Parliament until I saw this article in the paper. I assure you, Sir, that I have not the slightest feeling against the hon. member who brought the matter up in this House last night; I think he has done nothing more than his duty; and had my attention been drawn to it by any one in the House or outside, I would have taken the same course as I intend to do now. I should be very sorry to sit here as member for West Hastings with this against me. Whatever I have done in this matter, I assure you it was done not knowing that I was violating the law or the Rules of this House. I am sure hon. gentlemen will know that I am simply stating the fact when I say that my business is a very large business, running up close to half a million dollars a year, so that it is impossible for me to watch every item that goes through. I had not the slightest idea that these orders being filled was against the Rules of the House, but they were filled in the regular order of our business. Had I desired to profit by my position, I should have pursued a different course. The Government purchased very large quantities of this spirit—I have just got back from Montreal and have not had time to go to the Inland Revenue Department to inquire as to the quantity, but I should think that their orders must run up in the hundreds of thousands of gallons—and all I furnished was $4,552 worth in that year. Besides, this is a class of spirits that we do not make a cent on. I do not ask hon. members to take my word for that, but I would refer them to Messrs. Gooderham & Worts, Mr. Seagram, Messrs. Walker, or any other distiller. It is a coarse, rough spirit, only fit for methylated spirits. It is run up to 65 and is made from the very coarsest spirits we have, and the Government buy it and mix it with wood naphtha, and it is then sold as methylated spirits, free of duty. It is used for liniment and for burning, but not internally, I believe. Had I, as I say, been anxious to benefit by my position as a member of this House, it would have been no trouble for me to secure a larger share of that business in a legal way. As you can understand, I am not a man to come here for the sake of selling a few thousand gallons of spirits and for the sake of that to place myself in the position I stand in before this House to-day. As hon. gentlemen are aware, this spirit could have been transferred to any licenseholder in Belleville and placed here in his name, while I would have got the benefit of the sale of the goods. When I was informed in Montreal this morning of the proceedings that took place here last night, it was the first knowledge I had that I had done anything wrong. I only desire to add, in handing in my resignation, that the violation of the law which impels me to that course was committed with absolute want of knowledge that I was in the slightest degree acting contrary to the law. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that my pleasant relations with the members of the House, and the pleasant hours I have spent with the members of the Government and with the members on this side of the House as well as those on the other side of the House, will be long remembered, and I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. gentlemen, for the kindness and courtesy that has always been shown me by members on both sides.

Mr. EDGAR. I think that under the circumstances of the case, the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has taken a manly and straightforward course. I am glad also to hear him say that he did not consider that my having brought the matter to the attention of the House yesterday was any evidence of ill-feeling towards him or anything he could complain of. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the discovery of the case was accidental, almost. We were in Supply, considering the items of the Excise Department, and we were discussing the manufacture by the Government of methylated spirits. I turned up the Auditor General's Report of the transactions under that head last year. There was a list of distilleries from which the Government have made purchases, and among others appeared the name of H. Corby. I inquired whether that was the hon. member for West Hastings, and, as the answer was in the affirmative, it undoubtedly raised a serious point. I am sure that every member on this side of the House, as well as on the other, will feel that Mr. Corby was unwittingly a breaker of the law, and the open, above-board manner—I would say the clumsy manner, if there had been any intention of concealing the transaction—would show that he had no design of breaking the law, and would show that he did not know of the transaction, or did not know it was wrong. But, Sir, the example he has set to members of this House in resigning as he has done, is one which we can admire and one which should any of us find ourselves in the same unfortunate circumstances we shall do well to follow.

Mr. McCARTHY. I rise for the purpose of suggesting that the circumstances would perhaps justify the leader of the House in bringing to the notice of the House a Bill to relieve Mr. Corby from the penalties of sitting and voting as a member. That has been done in a very prominent case, and I think that if ever circumstances warranted interference with the ordinary course of the law, the present circumstances do.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no one regrets more than I do the circumstances which force the hon. member to resign his seat in this House. The explanation which I have received from the Department of Inland Revenue corroborates to the fullest extent what the hon. gentleman has said with regard to the unwitting manner in which the violation of the Independence of Parliament Act was committed, and I beg to say that in view of that, as well as in view of his own statement—which itself would have been amply sufficient for this House from what we all know of him—it is a matter of regret to everybody that the case has arisen. But the hon. gentleman has done himself the highest credit by the promptitude with which he has come forward and made the statement that he has violated the law and is prepared to take the consequence.

Mr. LAURIER. It is perhaps useless to add anything to what has been said. But I may say that the Opposition will be only too happy to do anything to promote any measure that the Prime Minister may see fit to introduce to exempt Mr. Corby from the penalties which he has incurred.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved :

That Government Orders have precedence on Mondays for the remainder of the session, after Questions to be put by Members and Private Bills.

Mr. LAURIER. I am sorry that I cannot agree, for my part, with this motion; I am sure, however, that my opposition will not deter the hon. gentleman if he wants to carry it. But I would remind him that there are several important Bills which have not yet been called, and I would be glad if he would at least give us one day more. I would suggest that at all events he should give us Monday, and that his motion should apply to the Monday following.

Mr. BRYSON. I concur in the remarks of the leader of the Opposition with reference to the Monday following next Monday. I have a notice on the Order paper which has been there for some time; it is the first notice of motion on the paper for Monday next, and I would be exceedingly pleased if the Government could see their way to acquiesce in the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition, and allow Monday next to remain for the use of private members.

Mr. McCARTHY. I beg to add my voice in the same direction. I would point out to the First Minister that really we have had very little time this session for Public Bills and Orders. After this notice was put on the paper by the First Minister, I looked through the records and I find that all the time that has been devoted to Public Bills and Orders has been eight half days—that is, eight days after 8 o'clock. Three of those days were taken up by the Bill of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon); two days and parts of two days were taken up by the Bill with reference to Sunday observance, and parts of two days were taken up by the Bill with reference to the Criminal Code, in the hands of the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth). Now, when the last day was taken from us, the Prime Minister held out hope that this Bill with reference to the Criminal Code would be put upon the Government Orders and dealt with at that time, and he also flattered us with the prospect that the Bill with reference to Sunday observance would occupy only a short time upon the following Monday, and that then the Bill which was in the hands of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), and which was first reached last Monday, would be probably reached on the following Monday. Since then three sittings open to us have taken place, and yet these Bills have not been reached: so that I trust the First Minister will yield to the suggestion and give us yet only one day.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I was under the impression that my proposition would meet with universal acceptance, inasmuch as it held out some indication that, in spite of the opinion I formed some time ago, we might leave here before the middle of September, which, under other circumstances, seems quite out of the question. At the rate of progress we are making now, I am afraid we shall go into October, in which case it would hardly be worth while to rise at all. I think the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is somewhat mistaken in his reckoning. We had two or three whole days for Public Bills and Orders, the Thursdays early in the session.

Mr. McCARTHY. They were taken for the Budget debate.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We had one or two. We spent one or two very exciting days on the Bill of the hon. member for Albert.

Mr. McCARTHY. Not before the Budget debate.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I mean after the Budget debate. But if, after taking eight days, we have only the result to show of having passed the Bill of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) and the Sunday Bill—which failed to become law, after all—what could I hope with regard to the extension of one day more? It seems to me that very little progress is to be found in that direction. What I said with regard to the Bill of the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) was not so much with the intention of putting it upon Government Orders, but with the idea that there was a Government Bill to which it might be appended, if the pleasure of the House was in that direction. We recognize the importance of the Bill with regard to cattle rates, and the interest which attaches to it in the House, and the courtesy of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), who has had it in hand, and who, I know, was willing to suit our convenience with regard to its discussion. I must say that we are unable to concur in the passage of that Bill; we think it would not be wise to adopt it, and that the remedies which are sought for, if they are necessary, must be sought for in a somewhat different direction. I have been very much struck in the discussions on the Bill itself, and the discussions by deputations who have met us with regard to it, not only by the manifestation of deep interest in the subject, but by the fair statement of all the hon. gentlemen who have spoken in this House, and the gentlemen who have spoken on behalf of deputations on the subject, that they recognize the difficulty of undertaking to deal with that subject by establishing a maximum rate such as this Bill proposes to establish. They have expressed a strong desire that the subject should be considered, that their interest should be taken into consideration, after an examination of the facts which they have put forward, especially with regard to the steamship rates in Canada and the steamship rates in other countries, and the dispute between themselves and the steamship companies as to what the practice has been with regard to Canadian ships. We recognize the need of making an inquiry with a view to giving any redress within our powers, if the measure before the House should not be found to be adequate, appropriate or safe with a view to their business relations, and these gentlemen have requested above all things that the recitals in the preamble of the Bill itself, which sets forth the allegations of fact which are disputed by the shipping companies themselves, should be inquired into before we pass any legislation. We recognize the importance and urgency of the request that this whole subject should be examined, and we propose, therefore, to make a very careful departmental inquiry on the subject, with a view of ascertaining these facts. We think we will, therefore, be obliged to oppose the passage of the Bill as one not in the interest of either of the two businesses named. It is generally conceded that during the present season no grievance has existed. It is said that one very good reason for that is the fact that the price of cattle has declined, so that there is not the same amount of competition in the carrying business, and not the same inducement, therefore, to make combinations, which are hurtful to the cattle-raising interest. Another ground that is alleged why the combinations have not existed this year is that under pressure of the investigation on the subject by this Parliament, the steamship companies have been induced to give way. However this may be, we think the allegations in the preamble of the Bill should be investigated, and the object is to investigate them as quickly as possible, and departmentally, so as to make the inquiry as cheaply as possible, and carry it out in connection with the Department of Marine and Fisheries. For that reason, I think we shall be obliged to resist the second reading of the Bill, and therefore, its going over will not be attended with any detrimental results. There is a Bill on the paper on the subject of the Franchise, which will form the subject of discussion when we come to the Government Bill on that subject. In regard to the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), I understood he was not entirely without hope to avail himself of another opportunity to bring it forward. However, I think I ought, with a view to have the business of the House terminated without waiting for the heat to reduce our size or numbers any more than they are already reduced, to press the taking of the remaining day of the week in order that Government business may be pressed forward.

Mr. LAURIER. I again insist that the hon. gentleman should allow private members to retain next Monday, and I do it with the object of having a discussion on the Bill to which the hon. gentleman has alluded at some length, that is the Cattle Bill. The hon. member for North York was unfortunately not able to be here last Monday, but I understand he will be here next Monday, and from the attention he has given to this matter he will be in a position to give the Government valuable information, even if, after he has been heard, the Government insist on their resolution not to agree to the second reading of the Bill. There was a great deal of force in what the right hon. gentleman said in regard to the Bill being an extraordinary one; in fact it could be justified only if the preamble be proved. If the preamble be proved, that there has been fraudulent action by the shipping interest, I can well understand that this should be met by exceptional measures, otherwise I do not think the Bill could be maintained. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) possesses valuable information, which will assist the Government in conducting their inquiry which the Government propose to institute at a later date. I do not think that until the 26th of this month very great progress can be made with the business of the House. There is something going on in the province of Ontario which has depleted the ranks on both sides of the House, and it would be just as well for hon. members to make up their minds that until after the 26th not much business can be accomplished.

Mr. IVES. I think if the ranks were depleted further by two or three members it would be better.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And if a few more Ministers were absent.

Motion agreed to, on division.

INQUIRIES RESPECTING RETURNS.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I want to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to a return brought down respecting the change in a station on the Prince Edward Island Railway. Although this may appear to be a small matter, there is much feeling respecting the change made, and the matter is calculated to cause more trouble than the hon. gentleman imagines. I call attention to the fact that a number of papers mentioned as appearing on the return, do not appear. The petition for the removal of the station was dated July, 1891. Nothing appears to have been done, and no correspondence from that time up to 4th December, 1893, appears, when Mr. Schreiber writes Mr. Pottinger to have the flag station removed from Mill River to Howland Road, without delay. He says that Mr. Unsworth is familiar with the matter. But this correspondence is not brought down. In Mr. Pottinger's letter to Mr. Schreiber, dated 7th February, 1894, he says: "I return you number 51,037 from Hon. George E. Foster and Hon. L. H. Davies, referring to Mill River station." No copy of Mr. Foster's letter is brought down. In a letter from L. K. Jones to Mr. Pottinger, he says: "I inclose papers Nos. 51,189, 41,917, 51,057." No copies of these papers are given. Then, in a letter from Mr. Pottinger to Mr. Schreiber, dated 17th March, 1894, he says he incloses a letter from Rev. Hugh E. Burke to Mr. Unsworth, dated 8th March. No copy of this letter appears in the return. It is important that when orders are made by the House they should be strictly complied with, and I am quite willing to accept the statement that these papers have been inadvertently omitted, but I trust that they will be brought down.

Mr. HAGGART. All the official papers have been brought down. The only letters not submitted are of a private nature, one from Hon. George E. Foster, and one from Mr. Howland. I shall, however, be glad to receive a memorandum from the hon. gentleman and make further inquiries.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 121) to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting the North-west Mounted Police Force.—(Mr. Ives.)

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES TO QUEBEC.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the House resolve itself into committee on the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that, notwithstanding anything in chapter eight of the Statutes of 1884, intituled: "An Act to authorize certain subsidies and grants for and in respect of the construction of the lines of railway therein mentioned," the Governor in Council may, at the request of the Government of the province of Quebec, pay to the Treasurer of that province the principal of either or both of the subsidies which by the said Act the Governor in Council was authorized to grant, on the terms therein set forth, to the Government of said province in consideration of their having constructed the railway from Quebec to Ottawa, that is to say: for the portion between Quebec and Montreal, one hundred and fifty-nine miles, a subsidy not exceeding six thousand dollars per mile, nor exceeding in the whole nine hundred and fifty-four thousand dollars, and for the portion between Montreal and Ottawa, one hundred and twenty miles, a subsidy not exceeding twelve thousand dollars per mile, nor exceeding in the whole one million four hundred and forty thousand dollars.

He said: I wish to give a short explanation, Mr. Chairman. Chapter 8, of the Railway Subsidies Act of 1884, authorized the Governor in Council to grant two subsidies to the Government of the province of Quebec for the railway from Quebec to Ottawa—$954,000 and $1,440,000—in all, $2,394,000; such subsidies to be capitalized and interest paid thereon. There was an Order in Council of the 30th March, 1885, a copy of which I will lay on the Table, approving of the arrangement proposed by Quebec that interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum should be paid half-yearly on the above amount until 30th of April, 1894, at which time further arrangements could be made. I will also lay on the Table a copy of a letter from the Prime Minister of Quebec, dated the 29th of May last. It is as follows:—

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
QUEBEC, 29th May, 1894.

The Honourable Sir JOHN THOMPSON, K.C.M.G., Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

MY DEAR SIR JOHN,—Referring to the interview that I had with you in Ottawa respecting the legislation by the Dominion Parliament which would be necessary to enable us to give effect to the Act passed at the last session of the Legislature of this province respecting the Public Debt as regards the capital and interest of the amount granted to this province under the Act 47 Vic., chap. 8, and the capital and interest of the amount on which is based the additional subsidy granted under the Act 47 Vic., chap. 4, and any amount that may become payable to the province in connection with the arbitration now proceeding between the Dominion of Canada and the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, I would beg leave to remind you how important it is to this province that this legislation should be granted during the present session of your Parliament.

Our idea is (1) to have it permissive for the province, at its request, to obtain the capital of the above-mentioned amounts, or of any one of them; (2) to have the Act so worded that on request by the Government of this province, the Dominion Government would pay the principal amount of the above-mentioned sums, or of any one of them, to the province, or would pay to trustees appointed to receive the same, or to any other persons the province might name, the principal or the interest of the above-mentioned amounts, or of any of them, in connection with the redemption of our public debt, or any arrangement for its conversion in whole or in part.

Legislation would also be required to enable the provinces of Ontario and Quebec to give effect to the Acts passed at the last sessions of each of the Legislatures, to provide for final settlement of the Common School Fund.

I am sending you a copy of the statutes of last session, in which you will find copies of the two Acts referred to.

I remain, my dear Sir John,

Yours very truly,

L. A. TAILLON,

Premier and Acting Treasurer, P.Q.

There is a statute on this subject passed by the province of Quebec in January, 1894. in relation to the public debt of the province. Chapter 2, "An Act respecting the Public Debt" recites in its preamble: That these subsidies have been granted by the Canadian Parliament and that there is a further sum constituting a railway grant accorded to this province by the Act of Canada 47 Vic., which sums have been appropriated as sinking funds for the loans of the province, of 1874, 1876 and 1878. That there is a further sum of $2,549,213.61 due to the province of Quebec under the Act of Canada 47 Vic., chapter 44, and there are also further sums that may be received by the province in connection with the arbitration now proceeding between the Dominion of Canada, the province of Ontario, and the province of Quebec, and it concludes:

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

And whereas it is in the public interest to provide that these various sums of money should be utilized and appropriated towards the perfecting of the sinking fund and the redemption of the public debt, or in connection with the conversion of the debt.

The first section provides for the payment to the trustees either in Canada, England, France or elsewhere, all these sums of money; the application of the surplus after providing sinking funds to conversion of the public debt, and there are various other provisions with regard to the management of the public debt of the province. I may mention, that from a Dominion point of view the change recommends itself on the ground that these moneys are now bearing to the Government 5 per cent interest, and that we can pay them off at probably less than 4 per cent.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman has rightly said, that from a Dominion point of view we cannot see at first blush what the Dominion could lose by this transaction; this being a valuable asset bearing 5 per cent in favour of the province of Quebec. But the proposition is quite the converse from the point of view of the province of Quebec. It may seem to be a valuable arrangement from a Dominion point of view, because while the Dominion can borrow at less than 5 per cent, it is still obliged to pay 5 per cent on this capital sum of money which by the Statute of 1884, the Dominion owes to the province of Quebec. If that be true in favour of the Dominion it seems to me that the argument is equally the converse with regard to the province of Quebec in regard to this arrangement. As the papers have only just been laid on the Table it would be impossible at the present time to form an exact opinion as to the merits or demerits, whatever they may be, of that proposition. In 1884, when the statute to which the right hon. gentleman has referred to was passed, to recoup the province or the building of the North Shore Railway as a branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, instead of paying the capital it was arranged between the two Governments that interest at the rate of 5 per cent should be paid semi-annually to the province. I fail to see in any of the correspondence that has been brought down by the hon. gentleman anything which would justify any departure by the province of Quebec from that arrangement. The Treasurer of the province only says this :

Our idea is (1) to have it permissive for the province, at its request, to obtain the capital of the above-mentioned amounts, or of any one of them; (2) to have the Act so worded that on request by the Government of this province, the Dominion Government would pay the principal amount of the above-mentioned sums, or of any one of them, to the province, or would pay to trustees appointed to receive the same, or to any other persons the province might name, the principal or the interest of the above-mentioned amounts, or of any of them, in connection with the redemption of our public debt, or any arrangement for its conversion in whole or in part.

With regard to this latter contingency, that is to say: the possibility of having the sum granted to the trustees, I fail to see at present why the Government of Canada should not remain as they are, trustees for this money. They are just as competent to be trustees for the province as any trustees that can be selected by the province. With regard to the last alternative, "our idea is to have it permissive for the province at its request to obtain the capital of the above-mentioned amendments, or any of them." I would like to have further explanation. We may be told that this is no business of ours, that the province of Quebec is the best judge of its own finances. That may be true; but unfortunately it is a matter of notoriety that the finances of the province are in such a condition that it is of interest to this Government, who by the constitution are obliged to pay a yearly subsidy to the province, to have proper explanations given why any deviation from the present rule is demanded. I therefore hope the hon. gentleman will agree not to have the resolution passed to-day, but simply to report progress, so that an opportunity may be given us to look at the papers and to consider more fully what is the nature of the proposals now made.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is a point, not touched upon by my hon. friend, as to which I would like some information from the Government. As I understand the Prime Minister, we are paying 5 per cent on a sum of $2,500,000 roughly. Can he inform me where that debt figures in our liabilities? I have here the table of the liabilities of Canada under date of the 30th of June, 1893, amounting in all to $300,000,000, and running over that cursorily I do not see exactly where this $2,500,000 comes in. It is, of course, a debt, which I should imagine ought to be placed among our liabilities. It certainly cannot come under the head of the sums due to Ontario and Quebec together. These have not varied to any appreciable extent since this arrangement was come to; and, moreover, we have an offset against them to a somewhat larger extent under the head of our own assets. Does the hon. Prime Minister know where this debt of $2,500,000 is placed?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not. I will get the information. With regard to what the hon. leader of the Opposition has said, I would ask him to allow me to suggest that we should dispose of the resolution to-day, and to permit me to introduce the Bill; and on the second reading of the Bill, I will give him any information I can get. Although I would not undertake to go elaborately into an explanation of the financial arrangements of the province, I will give him such information as I can with regard to the scheme framed by the Provincial Treasurer.

Resolution considered in committee and reported.

THE COMMON SCHOOL FUND.

House resolved itself into committee on resolution (p. 4719) respecting the distribution of The Common School Fund.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This fund was brought into existence under chapter 26 of the Consolidated Statutes of the province of Canada. By the award of the arbitrators under the British North America Act in 1870, sections 7, 8, 9 and 10—see pages 5 and 6 of accounts between the Dominion and the late province of Canada, published in 1883—the Dominion of Canada was to continue to hold the fund, and divide the income between the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The amount now held by the Dominion is $2,582,373.80. Ontario and Quebec last session each passed an Act providing for the final division and distribution of the fund between the two provinces on their agreement, or, if they could not agree, the Acts provided for reference to the arbitrators appointed for the settlement of the disputed provincial accounts; and this Bill is to give authority to the Dominion Government to pay over the amounts to the provinces as soon as a basis of apportionment can be reached.

Mr. LAURIER. I would like to have the information from the hon. gentleman whether the award of the arbitrators is to be final, or whether it has to be ratified by the Legislatures of the two provinces?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is to be final.

Mr. LAURIER. Binding on both provinces ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes. The Quebec Act is a transcript of the Ontario Act. I believe, a copy of which provides as follows :—

The Lieutenant-Governor of this province in Council, is hereby authorized to agree with the Government of the province of Quebec, upon an amount to be paid by this province for the acquisition by it of the uncollected balances of the price of the lands mentioned in the preamble of this Act, and for the payment by this province of what may be considered the value of the lands remaining unsold.

2. It shall be lawful for the Lieutenant-Governor in Council to enter into an agreement with the Government of the Dominion of Canada, and that of the province of Quebec, respectively, for the purpose of effecting a final division and distribution between the said provinces and final payment of the principal of the said Common School Fund, and to enter into such agreement with the Dominion of Canada and the province of Quebec as may be necessary for the division, distribution and payment of the said principal, and for granting and giving to all parties concerned such receipts and discharges, and signing such deeds as may be necessary in the premises.

3. In the event of the Governments of the two provinces failing to agree on the proportion of the said division, distribution and payment, the question may be referred to the arbitrators appointed in pursuance of the Act passed in the 54th year of Her Majesty's reign, and chaptered 2.

Mr. LANGELIER. There is no doubt that under these Acts the arbitrators have a right to determine finally the shares of the two provinces in the Common School Fund : but they do not and cannot provide for the disposal of the share of each province after that share has been determined by them. The disposal of the share of each province is to be regulated by the decision of the arbitrators appointed under the British North America Act, which states most positively that the fund is to be kept in trust by the Dominion Government. This is not a fund belonging to the province of Quebec particularly. It does not belong to the consolidation fund of that province, but was created a trust fund, and was dealt with as a trust fund by the British North America Act, and has always been a trust fund. I do not see how the Legislature of Quebec can dispose of a fund regulated by a law passed before Confederation and has been sanctioned by the British North America Act. That Act provides that the fund is to be divided between Quebec and Ontario by arbitrators to be appointed, one by the Dominion and one by each province, who shall determine, not only the share of each province, but the disposal of the fund. Their award states most positively that this is to be kept in trust by the Dominion Government and the interest paid only to the provinces.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no trust created by the award of the original arbitrators except a trust, so far as the Dominion of Canada is concerned, to hold the property and pay over the interest to the two provinces.

Resolution reported.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Relief of distressed Indians and seed grain, province of Quebec $4,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a common enough item, but are we in the habit of furnishing seed grain everlastingly to the Indians of Quebec ? One would think that by this time they would have been sufficiently instructed to obtain seed grain for their small needs.

Mr. DALY. This seems to be absolutely necessary. We have no farm instructor there, and these people have to be supplied every spring with this seed. It is about the only thing they get.

Mr. LAURIER. Who distributes it, and how much go to Caughnawaga Indians ?

Mr. DALY. It is distributed by agents, and about two hundred dollars went to the Caughnawagas.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How many Indians in the province of Quebec ?

Mr. DALY. 11,779.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand that the hospital at Roberval has been closed. What is the reason ?

Mr. DALY. It appears that an inspection was made last year, and it was ascertained the hospital cost too much—about $800 a year ; and an arrangement was made for the locating of these people amongst their friends on the reserve, who are paid for their services. This costs much less than before. It appears there is a number of paralytics and others.

Mr. LAURIER. What officer made the report ?

Mr. DALY. The chief clerk of the department, Mr. Scott.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would call the hon. Minister's attention to an answer to a return that I moved for. On the 16th April last, the House ordered a return showing the amount of money paid out of the fund of the Six Nation Indians for the payment of debts incurred by individual members thereof since the year 1886, and giving (1st) the names of the several persons who incurred the debts, with the separate amounts, the date or dates when incurred, and the proportion thereof that has been paid; (2nd) the names of the creditors to whom the payments were made, the dates when paid, with the total sum paid to each of such creditors; and stating in each case the authority given for incurring the debt, the authority for payment of the same, and whether such amounts have been repaid to the fund in whole or in part out of the annuities of the individuals on whose account the payments were made, and whether such was the condition on which such payments were authorized. The answer to that motion is as follows:—

OTTAWA, May 9th, 1894.

SIR,—I have the honour to return your reference No. 60, covering an Order of the House of Commons for information respecting debts incurred by individual members of the Six Nation Indians since the year 1886; and to state that no money has been paid out of the funds of the Six Nation Indians for payment of debts incurred by individual members of that band since the year 1886.

Your obedient servant,
HAYTER REED.

I do not quite understand that. I might say to the Minister that I can hardly think that his information is correct. It seems to me there have been advances made to members of the band within the past eight years.

Mr. DALY. I believe that the answer given to the hon. gentleman is quite correct. The advances to which he refers must have been made in some other way. Has the hon. gentleman reference to accounts of merchants in Brantford?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes.

Mr. DALY. I presume the hon. gentleman has reference to the state of affairs that existed before 1886 when merchants were in the habit of allowing the Indians to get on their books and then looking to the department to pay them. That was put a stop to as far back as 1886, and any reductions that are being made now are made with the consent of the Indians and applied on the old accounts.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I suppose we may look upon this as a permanent grant? There is no development among these Indians.

Mr. DALY. No; they are in a wretched condition.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I see the Deputy Superintendent General says that many of them are enjoying the advantages of civilized life, while others show no signs of improvement. What is the reason for this difference?

Mr. DALY. The old Adam that is in them—that is the only way I can account for it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But it seems strange that in members of the same tribe there should be such a difference.

Mr. DALY. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), who has had experience with the Indians, will agree with me that there is an astonishing difference between individuals. Their characteristics so far as advancement in life are concerned, are a good deal like those of white people. One family will adopt the habits of life of white people, will become prosperous and send their children to be educated, while others remain in the old rut and show no improvement. A percentage of the Indians throughout Canada show a very marked improvement.

Relief of distress and medical attendance, Ontario $800

Mr. LAURIER How is that applied?

Mr. DALY. This is for cases of destitution or sickness where the tribe has no funds. So far as Ontario is concerned it is used mainly for the Indians in the Lake Superior district, who are in a very destitute condition and who have a great deal of sickness among them.

Blankets for Indians of Ontario and Quebec..... $1,600

Mr. LAURIER. Who distributes these?

Mr. DALY. The agents. The blankets are supplied under contract.

Mr. LAURIER. Is there any rule for their distribution?

Mr. DALY. No; it is in the discretion of the agent.

Mr. LAURIER. So many blankets are sent to each reserve?

Mr. DALY. To each agent—yes.

Schools, Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces..... $28,100

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How about these schools?

Mr. DALY. The total expenditure was $36,542.50. According to denominations it was as follows:—Methodist, $1,562.50; Church of England, $1,400; Government, $24,080. Contributed by bands out of their own funds, $9,500. The number of day schools is 76, and the number of industrial schools is 6. The rate of attendance is 1,437, divided as follows:—Church of England, 183 ; Methodist, 267 ; Roman Catholics, 397 ; non-denominational, 590.

Payment of Robinson Treaty annuities $16,806

Mr. O'BRIEN. What position does this fund stand in ? Has any progress been made in settling the differences between the province and the Dominion ?

Mr. DALY. The matter is before the arbitrators, and I cannot say what position it has reached.

Surveying Indian Reserves..... $500

Mr. O'BRIEN. Has the hon. Minister managed to get what I was asking for with regard to the Temisgamingue Reserve ?

Mr. DALY. Not yet.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It is a great shame. I must say, that a dispute between the province of Ontario and the Dominion of Canada should prevent a small band of Indians getting a reserve which they require and which is of no value. It is a scandal upon our administrative power that such a dispute cannot be settled to the extent of giving a place to a few families of Indians who are really suffering.

Mr. LAURIER. Who is in the wrong ?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I do not know ; but somebody is in the wrong.

Mr. LAURIER. We should ask this Government to yield. They claim to be the more reasonable of the two.

Mr. DALY. The matter is before the arbitrators to whom have been referred the questions pending between the Dominion and the province of Ontario.

Mr. LAURIER. Does that come within the scope of their arbitration ?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. I understood the dispute was between the Government of Ontario and the Government of Canada.

Mr. DALY. That is one of the matters before them now—the question of the Indian lands.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Could the Minister say what reserve he proposes to survey this year ?

Mr. DALY. This is only for the purpose of surveying reserves where the Indians have no funds of their own. Where surveys were made on reserves where the Indians have funds, we charge it to their funds.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Where do you expect to use this money this year ?

Mr. DALY. It may not be necessary to use it at all.

Mr. DALY.

To provide for the following over-drawn accounts :—Indian Lands Management Fund ; Province of Quebec Fund and Indian School Fund.....$14,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I want to know under what circumstances this overdraft occurred ?

Mr. DALY. I think the most satisfactory way to answer the hon. gentleman is to read to the House the memorandum that has been prepared, so that it may be put upon 'Hansard,' and a proper explanation may be had by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, and by all parties concerned, as to the origin of the fund, the reason this overdraft occurred, and the position in which the matter now stands. I was not able until last fall to get at the bottom of this matter. I will read the statement that has been prepared :

PROVINCE OF QUEBEC INDIAN FUND.

This fund originally consisted wholly of grants from the Government of Lower Canada and from the Imperial authorities, and after the lapse of years the unexpended balances of these grants amounted to a sum sufficient to capitalize.

The fund which was commenced in this manner was in 1867 augmented by the capitalization of $80,000 at 5 per cent to produce $4,000, the amount of the annual grant for the relief of the Indians of the province.

The capital was reduced in 1876 by the transfer of $58,000 to the Indian School Fund. As it was thought advisable to have the teachers' salaries, which had been paid from the province of Quebec Fund, paid from Indian School Fund, an amount of capital sufficient to produce interest to pay these salaries was transferred, and the charge of the said salaries was transferred also. The capital of this fund should stand at $49,766.30, but owing to an over-expenditure of interest account of $37,885.69 the actual capital upon which interest can be calculated is $11,880.61.

The revenue of the fund failed to meet the necessary expenditure, expenditure which was perfectly legitimate, which has been properly vouched for, and passed by the Auditor General ; it appears printed in the Public Accounts, the Auditor's Report, and the Indian Department Report. From 1872-73 to 1877-78 the balance was reduced from $113,743.18 to $49,587.61, including the transfer of $58,000 to Indian School Fund ; from 1877-78 to 1892-93 it was reduced from $49,587.61 to $11,880.61.

The expenditure for the year 1892-93, to be found in detail at page 462 of the Report of the Department of Indian Affairs, was as follows :—

Salaries to agents, province of Quebec.....	$ 1,380 15
Point Bleue Hospital.....	848 20
Expenses of liquor prosecutions..	149 16
Travelling expenses	35 40
Expenses opening line Restigouche Reserve.....	6 00
Medical attendance and medicine.	630 20

The expenditure for the nine months of 1893-94, already past, has been $1,274, and the expenditure for the year will probably be about $2,000.

The revenue for 1892-93 was $2,404.71, and the revenue for 1893-94 has been, in interest alone, about $549.10 up to 31st March, 1894.

INDIAN LAND MANAGEMENT FUND.

This fund was formed upon the recommendation of a commission appointed in 1856 to look into Indian Affairs generally. This commission, attempting to make some arrangement for the management of Indian lands, suggested that 10% of the Indian Funds in the hands of the Receiver General should be set aside as the capital of a fund for the aforesaid purpose. This suggestion was acted upon, and when the funds were finally assumed by the Receiver General by Order in Council of 16th January, 1861, the capital of Management Fund was $148,833.07.

To-day the capital, if unimpaired, would be $156,680.61. Since 1861 it has been increased, upon the whole by $7,847.54. The interest account was on the 30th June last, overdrawn by $78,978.76, which reduced the capital bearing interest to $77,791.85.

The overdraft of interest has been annual since 1870, and it arose from the revenue of the fund not being sufficient to meet necessary expenditure. This expenditure has been quite legitimate, and has been passed every year without comment by the Auditor General and the Public Accounts Committee, and appears printed in the Public Accounts, the Auditor's Report and the Report of the Department of Indian Affairs.

From 1870-71 to 1872-73 the balance was increased from $191,096.98 to $191,426.59; from 1872-73 to 1878-79 it fell from $191,426.59 to $111,636, a loss of $79,790.59 which amount included a transfer of $44,000 to the credit of the School Fund to meet payment of teachers' salaries, which were before charged to Management Fund, as it was deemed advisable to have all such payments made from the same fund. From 1878-79 to 1890-91 the balance was reduced to $69,904.21, a loss of $41,731.79. Since that date up to the 30th June, 1892-93 it has been increased to $77,791.85. The following statement shows the expenditure for 1892-93. It will be found in full detail at pages 463 to 466 of the Report of the Indian Department for 1892-93.

	$23,961 77

The revenue for the same year was:—

Interest on invested capital	$ 4,367 35
Share of $19,000 voted by Parliament.	14,270 00
Percentage on collections.	9,469 31
Fees, fines, &c., collected.	786 62
Transfer to close Government of British Columbia account.	0 58

The expenditure for the first nine months of the current year, 1893-94, has been $14,423.23; the revenue $5,997.51. The expenditure for the whole year will probably be about $20,000; the revenue may be less than for the past year, as there has been a considerable falling off in collections.

INDIAN SCHOOL FUND.

This fund originated from contributions from various Indian lands for educational purposes. These contributions were continued until the invested capital reached $42,650, from which expenditures from time to time were made for buildings to the amount of $1,757.67, leaving the capital $42,912.33, and this sum was augmented in 1876 by a transfer from Management Fund and from province of Quebec Indian Fund of $44,000 and $58,000 respectively. These transfers brought the capital of the fund up to $142,912.23, and if it were not impaired by an overdraft of interest it would now stand at $141,222.83. The interest account is overdrawn $41,500.55, and the actual balance of capital drawing interest is $99,722.28.

From 1870-71 to 1875-76, the balance was reduced from $41,528.86 to $40,817.76; in the year 1876-77 the transfer of $44,000 from Management Fund and $58,000 from province of Quebec Fund raised the balance to $142,912.83; after this year the balance was gradually reduced, owing to the increasing expenditure, and on 30th June, 1892, it was $97,317.31; on 30th June, 1893, it had increased to $99,722.28. The expenditure from this fund has been passed annually by the Auditor General, and has been printed in his report, in that of the Indian Department, and in the Public Accounts. The expenditure for 1892-93, which will be found in detail at page 467 of the Indian Report for 1892-93, was as follows:—

Salaries of Missionaries.	$1,702 19
Salaries of teachers, and grant to Industrial Schools.	1,264 75
Inspection, fuel, and books for schools.	1,574 02
	$4,540 96

The revenue was, for the same year:

Interest on invested capital.	$3,961 11
Refund	5 00
Share of $19,000 voted by Parliament.	2,979 82

The expenditure for the first nine months of 1893-94 has been $4,220.71, an increase over the same period of 1892-93, owing to increased attendance at the Industrial Schools. The revenue for the same period has been $3,033.96.

In 1892, the matter was submitted to a sub-committee for joint action, composed of the Deputy Minister of Finance and the late Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, and the following is a copy of the Order in Council based on their joint report :—

CERTIFIED COPY of a Report of a Committee of the Honourable the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the 29th September, 1892.

A Sub-Committee of the Privy Council have had under consideration the condition of the province of Quebec Indian Fund, the Indian Land Management Fund, and the Indian School Fund, and a joint memorandum from the Deputy Minister of Finance and the Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs dealing with the same subject, which is hereto attached.

The Sub-Committee observe that the interest accounts of these funds upon the 31st of May, 1892, were overdrawn :—

Province of Quebec Fund....	$37,231	22
Indian Land Management Fund.....	114,992	34
Indian School Fund.....	44,987	41

And the interest-producing power of the capital of these funds has in consequence fallen so low that the necessary expenditure cannot be met without some assistance from without. To furnish this assistance, and at the same time to avoid the possibility of making it a charge for all time upon the consolidated revenue, has been the subject of grave consideration. The only plan which seemed at all feasible, and of which the Sub-Committee could recommend the adoption, is the one which may now be briefly outlined.

It is proposed at once to reduce the rate of interest upon that portion of the Indian Fund now bearing 4 per cent to 3½ per cent ; as this amount is $1,860,000, the saving in interest would be, for the year 1892-93, about $9,300. The saving in this item of interest will constantly increase, as the amount on which 3½ per cent will be payable will be augmented, annually, at the rate of about $50,000. This saving in interest will be offset against the amount to be granted yearly from the Consolidated Fund, which, for the year 1892-93, will be $19,000. With the exercise of economy the Department of Indian Affairs will be enabled to reduce the expenditure gradually until a limit is reached which will represent the lowest point at which the service can be managed without endangering its efficiency. It will therefore be possible to reduce this annual grant from year to year, and it is thought that for 1893-94 not more than $15,200 will be required, and for 1894-95 not more than $14,000. It is confidently expected that with proper economy in expenditure, and with this aid from sources outside the fund, the present debit balance may be reduced, and, as any such reduction will at once be felt to the benefit of the funds, as it will increase the revenue-producing power of the capital, it will be seen that the capital of the funds may, after the lapse of some years, be restored to their full amount. When this is accomplished, which may not be for a considerable time, all aid from outside sources will cease ; but, in the meantime, the saving in interest by the reduction to 3½ per cent would form such a valuable offset to the annual grant that, in the space of seventeen years, the one will balance the other.

The Sub-Committee, with the hope that this plan will be found workable, recommend that authority be granted for the reduction in the rate of interest paid upon that portion of the Indian Fund now standing at 4 per cent, to 3½ per cent, the change to take effect on the 1st of July, 1892, and that the sum of $19,000 may be included in the supplementary estimates for the current year, to be submitted to Parliament at its next session, as a grant to the province of Quebec Indian Fund, Indian Land Management Fund, and Indian School Fund.

It would seem proper, in order to make the best possible use of this grant, and after the precise amount required by each of the interested funds has been ascertained, that it should be distributed annually at the close of the year, with the authority of Council, upon a joint report of the Deputy Superintendent General and the Accountant of Indian Affairs.

The Sub-Committee further recommend, as it may be possible, from time to time, to make such changes in the manner of meeting the expenditure, for the management of the land and timber, as will result in a saving to the funds, that the authority of the Governor in Council should be obtained for such changes, based upon a joint report of the Deputy Superintendent General and the Accountant of Indian Affairs, and that a similar joint report should be submitted for any change in existing appointments.

The Sub-Committee, in conclusion, are strongly of opinion that no new appointments of agents, physicians or missionaries should be made, if their salaries will become a charge upon the overdrawn accounts.

The Committee, concurring in the above, submit the same for Your Excellency's approval.

JOHN J. MCGEE,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So far as I can follow the hon. gentleman, the proposition strikes me as one partaking a good deal of the character of taking money from one pocket and putting it into the other. Who are the parties who are entitled to the interest on this million and a quarter dollars on which the hon. gentleman proposes to reduce the rate from 4 per cent to 3½ per cent? For whom does the hon. gentleman hold the money in trust?

Mr. DALY. For the Indians of Ontario and Quebec.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much belongs to each?

Mr. DALY. I do not think I can give the hon. gentleman the information at the present time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it is almost entirely the property of the Indians of Ontario, and that a very small portion belongs to the Indians of Quebec.

Mr. DALY. So far as the Quebec Fund is concerned, that is exclusively theirs, except so far as that was increased by the Land Management Fund.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman says that he is going to indemnify the Consolidated Fund by raising the rate of interest on $1,200,000. In order that we may understand how far this is an equitable arrangement, I should like the Minister to state to the House how much of that sum belongs to the Indians of Quebec, and how much to the Indians of Ontario.

Mr. DALY. I cannot give the exact information at the moment, but it can be found in the report of the department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think nearly the whole belongs to the province of Ontario, and at all events only a small portion to the province of Quebec. Prima facie it would look as if the arrangement was made rather at the expense of the Ontario Indians.

Mr. DALY. There is no desire to do that at all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That would be the practical effect.

Mr. DALY. Any overdrafts would be for the benefit of the Indians, both of Ontario and Quebec.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much for each?

Mr. DALY. It will be very easy to have a statement made up showing the various amounts.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It occurs to me that the accounts should be kept distinct, and it appears to me that it would be rather "hard lines" on the Ontario Indians that the rate of interest should be reduced in the interest of the Indians of Quebec.

Mr. DALY. The Indian population of Ontario is 117,525 against 11,000 in Quebec.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Quebec Indian School Fund is for Quebec solely, but the arrangement proposed by the hon. gentleman will be carried out chiefly at the expense of the Indians of Ontario. Have we no permanent arrangement with the Indians, are we entitled to reduce the rate of interest at our pleasure?

Mr. DALY. This fund has been administered by the Government irrespective of any direction on the part of the Indians. It is in that respect not like tribal funds. So far as the Quebec Indian Fund is concerned it originally consisted entirely of grants made by the Government of Lower Canada and by the Imperial Government, and after a time the moneys became capitalized.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They are very small.

Mr. DALY. In 1867 they were capitalized at $80,000 at 4 per cent. This amount was reduced since 1876, by the transfer of $58,000 from that to the Indian School Fund, so that Ontario got the benefit of that $58,000 which was taken from the province of Quebec Indian Fund. The Indian Management Fund was reduced by $44,000 which was also contributed to the School Fund, so that the Ontario Indians got the benefit of that equally with the Indians of Quebec. I fancy there will be no difficulty in preparing a statement to answer the hon. gentleman's query.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would get it. He has had the advantage of reading a somewhat complicated Order in Council, and I was obliged to follow it as he read. I confess that the impression left on my mind was this: That while the two sets of Indian in Ontario and Quebec would get the benefit of this $14,000—although I should imagine it would chiefly go to the benefit of Quebec—the burden of the reduction of interest would fall almost exclusively on the Indians of Ontario.

Mr. DALY. I see, looking at the report I read which is to be found in detail from pages 463 to 466 of the Report of the Indian Department for 1892-93, this $23,981 was made exclusively for the Indians in Ontario.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And diverted from what fund?

Mr. DALY. From the Indian Lands Management Fund, and went entirely to the Ontario Indians.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was not almost all that provided by the Ontario Indians out of their property?

Mr. DALY. Yes, principally all sales of Ontario property.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So that it would be nothing but fair that they should get the bulk of the money appropriated for it.

Mr. DALY. Yes. I will have that statement prepared for the hon. gentleman. I simply read the Order in Council so as to put in on record.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is quite right that that should be done. As to the other point, I suppose we are justified in saying that if money can be borrowed at 3½ per cent or thereabout that the Indians, like other 'cestui qui' trusts, must take the consequence of the fall in money.

Mr. DALY. That was, I believe, the opinion arrived at by the Council at the time they considered it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is reasonable unless some special arrangements were made.

Mr. DALY. There was no arrangement made at all

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The House will note that the practical result of the matter is : that the one set of Indians would provide the chief amount that went to joint benefit.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). As the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says, it is almost impossible to fully understand it from the reading of it. I think it is well that it is going on 'Hansard' so that it can be examined, and before the Supplementary Estimates are reached, I presume the Minister will provide us with the information he promises. This is a point that the Indians themselves would probably like some information upon, and it would be well if we were able to understand it.

Mr. DALY. With the permission of the House I would also like to put on record in 'Hansard' the joint memo. of the Deputy Minister of Finance and the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. It will take a long time if I have to read it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The House for a purpose of that kind could fairly allow it to go on 'Hansard.'

Mr. DALY. The following is the memo. I referred to :—

OTTAWA, July 15th, 1892.

MEMORANDUM.

To His Excellency
in Council.

The undersigned have had under consideration the condition of the province of Quebec Indian Fund, the Indian Land Management Fund, and the Indian School Fund, and a joint memorandum from the Deputy Minister of Finance and the Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, dealing with the same subject, which is hereto attached. The interest accounts of these funds upon the 31st of May, 1892, were overdrawn: Province of Quebec Indian Fund, $37,231.22; Indian Land Management Fund, $114,992.34; Indian School Fund, $44,987.41; and the interest-producing power of the capital of these funds has in consequence fallen so low that the necessary expenditure cannot be met without some assistance from without. To furnish this assistance, and at the same time to avoid the possibility of making it a charge for all time upon the Consolidated Revenue, has been the subject of grave consideration. The only plan which seems at all feasible, and of which the undersigned could recommend the adoption, is the one which may be briefly outlined.

It is proposed at once to reduce the rate of interest upon that portion of the Indian Fund now bearing 4 per cent to 3½ per cent; as this amount is $1,860,000 the saving in interest would be, for the year 1892-93, about $9,300. The saving in this item of interest will constantly increase, as the amount on which 3½ per cent will be payable will be augmented annually at the rate of about $50,000. This saving in interest will be an offset against the amount to be granted yearly from the Consolidated Fund, which, for the year 1892-93, will be $19,000. With the exercise of economy the Department of Indian Affairs will be enabled to reduce the expenditure gradually until the limit is reached which will represent the lowest point at which the service can be managed without endangering its efficiency. It will therefore be possible to reduce this annual grant from year to year, and it is thought that for 1893-94 not more than $15,200 will be required, and for 1894-95 not more than $14,000. It is confidently expected that with proper economy in expenditure, and with this aid from sources outside the fund, the present debit balance may be reduced, and as any such reduction will at once be felt to the benefit of the fund, as it will increase the revenue-producing power of the capital, it will be seen that the capital of the fund may, after the lapse of some years, be restored to their full amount. When this is accomplished, which may not be for a considerable time, all aid from outside sources will cease: but in the meantime the saving in interest by the reduction to 3½ per cent would form a valuable offset to the annual grant, that, in the space of seventeen years the one will balance the other. With the hope that this plan will be found workable, the undersigned have to recommend that the authority of Your Excellency in Council may issue for the reduction of the rate of interest paid upon that portion of the Indian Fund now standing at 4 per cent to 3½ per cent, the change to take effect on the 1st of July, 1892; and that the sum of $19,000 may be included in the supplementary estimates for the current year to be submitted to Parliament at its next session, as a grant to the province of Quebec Fund, Indian Land Management Fund, and Indian School Fund.

It would seem proper in order to make the best possible use of this grant, and after the precise amount required by each of the interested funds has been ascertained, that it should be distributed annually at the close of the year, with the authority of Council, upon a joint report of the Deputy Superintendent General and the Accountant of Indian Affairs.

As it may be possible from time to time to make such changes in the manner of meeting the expenditure for the management of land and timber as will result in a saving to the funds, the undersigned beg to recommend that the authority of Your Excellency in Council should be obtained for such changes based upon a joint report of the Deputy Superintendent General and the Accountant of Indian Affairs, and that a similar joint report should be submitted for any change in existing appointments.

In conclusion, the undersigned are strongly of opinion that no new appointment of agents, physicians or missionaries should be made, if their salaries will become a charge upon the overdrawn accounts.

GEO. E. FOSTER,
Minister of Finance.

E. DEWDNEY,
Superintendent General of Indian Affairs.

MEMORANDUM respecting the future Indian Land Management and other cognate funds.

In response to a series of questions put to the Accountant of the Department of Indian Affairs by the undersigned it appears that for the approaching fiscal year, 1892-93, the total expenditure for these funds, calculated at the lowest possible point, would be $30,000.

The total revenue for the funds for the same year, made up of interest and percentage and a proposed Government grant of $19,000, would be $34,000, leaving a probable surplus of $4,000 to reduce the lost capital.

Against this proposed grant of \$19,000 it is recommended that on that portion of the tribal funds which now bears interest at the rate of 4 per cent, interest should be allowed in future at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent only, that being the rate of interest allowed to depositors on deposits in the Government Savings Banks, and that this rate commence from the 1st July, 1892. The saving in interest by the reduction of one-half per cent would probably be \$9,300, and deducting from that the Government grant of \$19,000, it would mean an actual expenditure from Consolidated Fund of \$9,700 per annum.

In the year 1893-94 the department expects to save a certain amount of money, and they calculate their total expenditure for that year as $26,000, and a revenue of $15,200 from accrued interest and percentage (being an increase of revenue of $200 over that of the year 1892-93), with a Government grant of $15,200, thus leaving a probable surplus for 1893-94 of $4,400, to reduce lost capital. Taking the Government grant for 1893-94 at $15,200, and a saving in interest of $9,560, the excess to be granted by Parliament would be $5,640, as compared with $9,700 in 1892-93.

In the year 1894-95 the department trusts to make a further reduction in the expenditure to \$25,000, and estimates a revenue from interest and percentage of \$15,000, and a Government grant of \$14,000. As at that time the principal will be still further increased by collections received from the sale of lands and timber, the reduction of $\frac{1}{2}$ % in the rate of interest would be \$9,860, which amount against \$14,000 Government grant would mean an outlay by the country of \$4,140. Thus, in the three years there would be an expenditure in aid of the Indians of \$9,700, \$5,640 and \$4,140, or a total of \$19,200.

Beyond 1894-95 there would be but a slight reduction in the way of expenditure, but the balances drawing interest would be increased probably at the rate of $50,000 a year, which would mean a reduction of $250 a year in the interest alone, so that apart from any percentage or savings that might occur, the grant would be reduced and wiped out in about seventeen years, through the accumulation of interest saved by the reduction of the rate.

If the ideas proposed in this memorandum are approved by Council, it would not be necessary to take effect in the asking for the grant until the next session of Parliament, when the matter can be arranged for in the supplementary estimates, as there are still sufficient funds in the several accounts to enable the department to carry on its affairs. The only necessity is that some understanding should be arrived at as to the management of these funds in future.

In conclusion, the undersigned is very strongly of opinion that no new appointments should be made in the way of missionaries, agents, physicians, &c., &c., that would be chargeable on the funds, and that all existing appointments shall, when vacancies occur, be cut off, if on inquiry it be found that the positions can be abolished.

I concur in the foregoing.

FINANCE DEPARTMENT,
OTTAWA, 10th May, 1892.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would like the Minister to give a fuller explanation with reference to the note he will find at page 435 of this departmental report in regard to the Mississaugas of the Credit. I think it would be well for the Minister to explain in full to the committee, just how it came to pass that an Order in Council should have been passed appropriating $68,672.01 to that band of Indians and the interest to be paid to them for eight or ten years, amounting, as I understand it, to $27,998.87. With that action taken by the Order in Council of 1884, how did it come to be reversed by the Treasury Board on the 31st of March, 1893?

Mr. DALY. I am not in a position to give the hon. gentleman information as to why the Order in Council was passed, but the matter will possibly be the subject of litigation as between the Mississaugas and the Government. The matter has been referred to the province of Ontario and to the province of Quebec as to whether or not in their opinion—as they are both interested because this matter was occasioned before Confederation—a fiat should be granted to the Indians for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are entitled or not to this $68,672. It is a matter that appears to have arisen a number of years ago in connection with their trust funds dating away back, almost to the original administration of Indian affairs in Ontario. I can furnish to the hon. gentleman this information. I can give the hon. gentleman the Order in Council of the 30th of June, 1894, and the subsequent Order in Council, and I think they go fully into the matter. But I have not at hand the information the hon. gentleman asks for.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I have no doubt that the Orders in Council were passed, but what seems strange is, that the same administration should have decided and acted upon a question, and without any further facts so far as I can judge with reference to that question, that they should eight or nine years after reverse their decision. I thought there would be some explanation for that. Their action at one time or the other must have been ill considered.

Mr. DALY. So far as the reversing is concerned, it was considered upon looking into the matter that the Order in Council of the 30th June, 1884, should not have been passed, but why the Order in Council of that date was passed I am unable to say, and I cannot get the information. I was unable to get it when I asked for it, and owing to the death of the late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, and the inability of the late Superintendent General of Indian Affairs to inform me, I am just as much in the dark as the hon. gentleman is.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Can it not be found out?

Mr. DALY. If I remember rightly, the memo. to Council upon which the Order in Council of June 30th, 1884, was based, will give all the information that can be got, and I will furnish the hon. gentleman with a copy of that.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I see you are directed by the Treasury Board to make good the amount of $27,998. What plan are you adopting for that? Is that to be kept out of their annuity yearly?

Mr. DALY. No plan has been adopted, owing to the possibility of the litigation that I spoke of. The plan that was suggested to be adopted was: That annually we should take off from their annuities a sufficient sum spread over a number of years so that they would not feel it very much. As the Indians desire litigation and as the matter has been referred to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, we are at this moment awaiting their action as to whether a fiat should be granted.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The band, of course, will not willingly relinquish $68,000 that came to them by Order in Council. That should be prima facie evidence that it belonged to them, and I can quite understand that they will not wish to have that amount debited to them now without some reason being assigned. When you speak of the litigation, what form will it take? Do you mean a question of law, to be decided between this band and this Government, or a matter of litigation between this Government and the Provincial Government?

Mr. DALY. As between the band and this Government, as to whether or not they are entitled to certain lands which they claim as theirs, which they allege were taken from them and alienated, and which they have not got the benefit of. It is an amount claimed to be due from the old province of Canada, and this Government does not feel disposed to enter into litigation in reference to the matter until we have the consent of the Government of Ontario representing the old province of Canada. The claim was substantially this amount, and I presume that the Ontario Government, as successor of the old province of Canada, will have to pay it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The defect in the Order in Council was that it merely put this sum of $68,000 to the credit of the Indians; but obviously it could not be placed practically to their credit until the money was got, and the Ontario Government disputes its liability. So that the matter will have to be investigated. Before the money can be made available at all, it must be obtained. There can be no litigation in the ordinary sense of the term, because it would be a case of a band of Indians against the Crown, alleging a breach of trust on the part of the Crown. I presume it may be necessary to have a commission appointed to adjudicate upon the rights of the Indians; but obviously Ontario must be brought into the matter, because Ontario is the party who must eventually pay, if any one does.

Mr. LAURIER. With regard to the reduction of the fund of the Indians of Quebec. I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to a part of the memorial which he has just read to the House:

The capital was reduced in 1876 by the transfer of $58,000 to the Indian School Fund. As it was thought advisable to have the teachers' salaries which had been paid from the province of Quebec fund, paid from the Indian School Fund, an amount of capital sufficient to produce interest to pay these salaries was transferred also. The capital of this fund should stand at $49,766.30, but owing to an over-expenditure of interest account of $37,885.69, the actual capital upon which interest can be calculated is $11,880.61.

The revenue of the fund failed to meet the necessary expenditure—expenditure which was perfectly legitimate, which has been properly vouched for, and passed by the Auditor General; it appears printed in the Public Accounts, the Auditor's Report and the Indian Department Report. From 1872-73 to 1877-78, the balance was reduced from $113,743.18 to $49,587.61, including the transfer of $58,000 to Indian School Fund; from 1877-78 to 1892-93, it was reduced from $49,587.61 to $11,880.61.

I do not know that, because the expenditure was passed by the Auditor General and the Public Accounts Committee, and was mentioned in the report of the Indian Department, it was for these reasons a legitimate expenditure. It passed unobserved; that is all you can say of it. It seems strange that this fund should have been allowed to be reduced from year to year until, at the end of some ten or twelve years, it had been reduced by $38,000. I do not believe the whole of this expenditure can be called legitimate. If I remember rightly, the surveys of the Caughnawaga Reserve were charged to this fund.

Mr. DALY. No; to their own fund.

Mr. LAURIER. Has the hon. gentleman any information to give as to what were the expenditures which caused this enormous reduction?

Mr. DALY. The only explanation I am able to give is that the capital was never originally intended to bear the burdens that were placed upon it subsequently, that it might have been sufficient, with the revenues obtained, to pay the salaries of the teachers, but that it appears that out of it, schools were built and other expenditures incurred which were never contemplated; and the department, instead of regarding the fact that the Indians were overdrawing the interest, allowed them to draw from the capital. It was not until 1882, when my predecessor took charge of the department, that the matter was discovered.

Mr. LAURIER. We cannot censure the gentleman for the faults of his predecessors, otherwise he would be liable to a heavy censure.

Mr. DALY. From the time the funds were administered from Confederation up to the time Mr. Dewdney took office, no person discovered it. I think the hon. gentleman will get more information in the Public Accounts Committee, where, I believe, the matter is to be ventilated.

To pay expenses of prosecution of persons selling liquor to Indians belonging to bands in the older provinces which have no funds of their own..... $250

Mr. DALY. We find this absolutely necessary. The local constables will not take hold of these matters, and we have to send up a policeman to look after them; and it has a good effect.

Nova Scotia—Medical attendance and medicine..... $2,000

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There is an increase here.

Mr. DALY. It is just $1 a head for the population. The population is 2,129. We did not find last year's appropriation sufficient.

New Brunswick—Medical attendance and medicines $1,295

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The doctors and the gentlemen who look after the Indians get rather more than the Indians receive in food or anything else. It is an expensive mode of serving the Indians, and I rather think the white man comes out ahead.

Manitoba and North-west Territories—General Vote $770,106

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. According to the report which I hold in my hand, the total number of Indians with whom we have treaty obligations amounts to barely 24,000.

Mr. DALY. Twenty-three thousand six hundred and eight.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do we expend anything on Indians with whom we have no treaty obligations?

Mr. DALY. About $1,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that this matter has come to a point when it requires very serious consideration. For rather less than 24,000 Indians, representing about 5,000 families, we expend about $770,000. That is at the rate of over $150 per family per year. That is a very heavy expenditure, and the results attained are very disproportionate. While nobody would desire to break faith with the Indians or in any way diminish what they are rightfully entitled to, under their treaty arrangements with us, still it appears to me that in this branch of expenditure of very nearly $800,000 a year, there ought to be room for a very large reduction. I cannot understand how the management of 5,000 Indian families cannot be conducted on less than $770,000 a year. No doubt in this case you are doing, on a large scale, what, in the item I previously referred to, you are doing a small one. The greater part goes into the hands of white people, administering to the wants or supposed wants of the Indians, and comparatively little to the maintenance and support of the Indians themselves. The people of Canada generally will be disposed to consider $150 per Indian family an extremely large amount to pay for their maintenance and support.

Mr. DALY. Of that $770,000, $233,000 is for day, boarding and industrial schools, $215,000 is for supplies for destitute working Indians; $128,000 is for annuities and commutations. That only leaves about $150,000, taking out the buildings and so on, for the administration. We have in the North-west Territories eighty-four reserves, seventy-seven bands, and nineteen agencies. In Manitoba we have eight agencies, ninety reserves, and sixty-four bands. The Indian population in the North-west Territories is 14,216, and in Manitoba 9,392. As to the proportion which goes to the white people administering Indian affairs, the hon. gentleman will see that although we have eighty-four reserves in the North-west, we have only nineteen agents. The agent at Birtle has seven reserves; Mr. Jones, of Pelly, has four reserves; Mr. Campbell, of Moose Mountain, has three reserves; Mr. Finlayson, of Touchwood, has six, and so on. These men have to look after the large number of Indians on these reserves, and for the pay they get, have to work very hard. I visited last year a number of these reserves in the west, and was struck with the class of men the Government got to accept the agencies—men of education and intelligence and of good family, and who took deep interest in the work. It seems extraordinary that some of them would be content to live so far from civilization and put up with the discomforts they do. To give the House some idea of the results of the work done by our agents in the Northwest, I would like to give three examples of the mode in which the affairs are being conducted. Take for example, the agency of Crooked Lake. The total cost, as shown by the Auditor General's Report, of the management of this agency was $14,279. A dissection of the account is as follows :

Annuities (treaty obligation)	$ 3,195 00
Implements do	294 00
Seed do	40 00
Cattle do	252 00
Education (policy and treaty).....	988 00
Clothing do	318 00
Ammunition do	100 00
Buildings (capital).....	910 00
Destitute Indians.....	2,582 00
Management and supervision.....	5,600 00
	$14,279 00

The population, according to the census, as shown in the last Indian report, is 574, consequently the cost of management and supervision was, per capita :

Approximately.....	$ 9 75
	$14 25

Of course annuities, ammunition and twine, and a certain proportion of implements, seeds and cattle, have to be supplied every year in compliance with treaty rights, as also has a large proportion of education. Proper management and close supervision of the Indians have brought the cost of food supplies down to a minimum, as the above statement shows. This is owing to the large amount of supplies that the Indians now raise themselves, and being near to the railway, and in a comparatively settled part of the country sale can be had for their produce, and employment can be obtained. On the reserve in question, during the season just closed, the following grains and roots were raised, and for the purpose of comparison an estimate of their value has been made. The return of grain the past year was not equal to the acreage put in, owing to the season not being so good as former ones.

	Bushels.	Valued at.
Wheat	6,947	$2,778 80
Oats	1,806	541 80
Barley	150	75 00
Potatoes	935	233 75
Turnips	50	50 00
Peas.....	13	10 00
Garden produce.....	60	50 00

Mr. DALY.

And the individual earnings of Indians on the same reserve were as follows :—

Sale of cattle and pigs.....	$ 834 70
do grain and roots.....	2,383 59
do wood and hay.....	733 50
do lime, bones, &c.....	82 60
do seneca root.	360 00
Labour, freighting, &c.	64 00
Sale of beef.....	75 13
Miscellaneous.....	301 75
Hunting, furs, &c.....	555 00
	$5,390 27

The crops of grain and roots the past year not being up to expectations, the falling off in the revenue to the Indians is considerable. Their individual earnings were expended in the purchase of wagons, mowers, binders, twine, provisions, clothing, &c. It must be borne in mind that the Indians who sell grain and other produce are rationed proportionately less by the Government. The sales are surplus produce raised. It must also be remembered that the cost of $4.50 per capita per annum expended on destitute Indians for food, &c., is simply an average. Many Indians receive nothing at all from the Government, while the old, destitute and infirm receive sufficient food to support them. It will be seen from the foregoing statement that the Government paid to manage and superintend these Indians $5,600, or $9.75 per head. Owing to this supervision the Indians raised during the past season produce to the value of $3,714.25, which will be used by them under the advice and direction of the agent, and the earnings of Indians during the past season by their own exertions, under the guidance and management of the agent and his assistants, aggregated $5,390.27. From this it will be observed that, by an outlay of $5,600, the revenue of $9,104.62 in food and labour alone accrued. If this were the only benefit that the Government received from this expenditure for management it might be considered a sufficiently good investment, but, in addition, the Government not only discharged, through its agents and other employees, all the obligations imposed upon it by treaty, but made great progress in its policy of civilizing the Indians and training them in agriculture and other pursuits, besides keeping them on their reserves, and ensuring peace and quietness throughout the country. Taking another agency near the main line of railway, Muscowpetung's, which is north of Regina, where a somewhat better market exists for produce raised by the Indians, and where there are great facilities for obtaining employment, it is found that the expenditure on destitute Indians is much less, namely, $3.30 per capita, as against $4.50 at Crooked Lake. Mr. Agent Lash and his assistants have 682 Indians to manage, and last year the expenditure was $13,386.69, and $213.45 for the Sioux band, which, dissected, is as follows :—

Annuities (under treaty).....	$ 2,715 00
Implements do	206 70
Seed grain do	57 80
Cattle do	260 00
Ammunition and twine (under treaty)...	113 00
Clothing (under treaty)	292 46
Education (policy and treaty)	316 88
Buildings (capital).....	1,060 97
Management and supervision.....	6,325 40
Destitute Indians.....	$2,038 48
Sioux	213 45
	2,251 93
Total.....	$13,600 14

The cost of management was, therefore :

Per capita.....	$ 9 26
Destitute Indians.....	3 30
	$12 56

On this reserve the Indians raised last season :

	Bushels.	Valued at
Wheat	1,341	$ 536 40
Oats	295	88 50
Potatoes.....	1,051	315 30
Turnips.....	698	349 00
Carrots	2	2 00
Corn	73	54 00
Garden stuff.....	355	150 00
		$1,495 20

And the individual earnings of Indians in this agency, during the past season, were :

Sale of live stock.....	$ 51 00
Sale of grain and roots	352 25
Hunting, sale of furs, &c.....	250 00
Sale of wood and hay	2,071 47
Labour and freighting	659 46
Miscellaneous and manufactures.....	182 70
Sale of beef.....	26 90
	$4,594 78

This was expended by the Indians in provisions, implements, clothing, building material, and so forth. It will be seen from the above that it cost to manage and superintend the Indians of this agency $6,325.40, or $9.26 per capita. Owing to this supervision the cost of supplies to destitute Indians was brought down to $2,251.93, or an average of $3.30 per capita, and the Indians raised during the season produce to the value of $1,498.20, which will be used by them under the direction of the agents, and the earnings of the Indians by individual effort aggregated $4,594.78, making a total of $6,092.98. Owing to the unfavourable season the return of grain and roots was not nearly as large as it would otherwise have been. Had expectations been realized the gross returns of produce raised and the earnings of Indians would have exceeded the cost of management and supervision, and destitute Indian expenditure would have been brought down. Take an agency in the north, Edmonton, as a third example. The total cost, as shown in the Auditor General's Report, is $23,553.74. A dissection of the account shows as follows :—

Annuities (treaty obligation).....	$ 3,875 00
Implements do	424 12
Cattle do	1,215 00
Ammunition and twine (treaty obligation)	300 00
Education (policy and treaty).....	5,204 67
Buildings (capital).....	174 07
Destitute Indians	7,593 08
Management and supervision.....	4,767 80
	$23,553 74

The population, according to the census, as shown in the last Indian report, is 645, consequently the cost of management and supervision was :

Per capita.....	$ 7 08
Destitute Indians.....	11 75
	$18 83

On the reserves in this agency (Edmonton), during the past season, the following quantities of grain and roots were raised, and for the sake of comparison an estimate of their value has been made :

	Bushels.	Valued at.
Wheat.....	1,500	$ 600 00
Oats.....	1,255	376 50
Barley.....	2,062	1,031 00
Potatoes.....	2,178	653 40
Buckwheat.....	55	22 00
Flax.....	3	5 00
Garden produce.....	1,073	400 00
		$3,087 90

And the individual earnings of Indians on the same reserves were as follows :—

Sale of hay and wood.....	$ 35 00
Sale of furs.....	33 90
Labour, freighting, &c.....	530 00
Miscellaneous and manufactures.....	275 00
	$4,230 00

I think that these three examples will show that the department has made considerable saving, as compared with what would have been required, if we had not been there to teach them farming and keep them at their work. It might appear to one not conversant with the work that the expenditures made by the Government through their agents were large. But it must be remembered that these people are like children, and must be kept at their work, or the money already expended upon them would go for nothing. For instance, desiring to economize the Government withdrew the farmer at Onion Lake. That season the Indians allowed their fences to go down, their gardens to become overrun with weeds, and, as a result, they wandered from the reserves, and it cost us more to feed them afterwards than it would have cost us to keep the farmer there. Had the farmer remained, it is natural to suppose the Indians would have produced as good a crop as they did the previous year. As to the schools, we are making the same effort as is being made by the Government of the United States to educate those people, not only to teach them reading and writing, but to give them trades.

At the industrial schools we have men learning to be carpenters, shoemakers, blacksmiths, and at some places tinsmiths and farmers. And we find that a number of those who have been taught at the school are earning their livelihood at these trades, and at some of the schools we have some assistant instructors chosen from among these young men, youths who came there from the tepee with the blanket on their shoulder, but who have become skilled mechanics. There is a balance of $34,357 from the estimate of last year, and, although that balance includes $15,140 of general expenses of management, there is a probability of these expenses of management being reduced year by year. But I would call the hon. gentleman's attention in this respect to the report of one of the agents. At page 57 of the report of Mr. Wright, he says :

SIR,—I have the honour to submit this my third annual report of this agency for the fiscal year ended 30th June last, also a tabular statement and inventory of Government property under my charge on that date.

I am pleased to be able to report that these Indians are still advancing towards being self-supporting, as the following statement of the total expenditure for the past four years will show, viz.:—

1889-90—Total expenditure...	$14,588	80
1890-91 do	10,708	85
1892-93 do	5,800	00

From the above will be seen at a glance the saving that has been effected during the past three years, being nearly eight thousand eight hundred dollars less in 1892-93, than in 1889-90.

The limit of economy possible for some time to come has been nearly, if not quite reached.

The reason of that reduction is that the Indians have become self-supporting, and from time to time as they progress in their agriculture and means of supporting themselves, other agents will present the same state of facts as is shown here by Mr. Wright.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. gentleman state generally the difference between the number of Indians at present entitled to the annuities under the treaty, and the number last year ?

Mr. DALY. In 1891 the number was 25,195. That was reduced in 1892 to 23,852, and in 1893 to 22,608. The comparative statement shows a diminution of 200 to 250 each year. Whether that means that they have died or gone away, I cannot tell. These figures are from the census taken for treaty payments on the treaty reserves.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I notice one thing stated here frequently, and that is commutation. Under what circumstances are the Indians permitted to commute ?

Mr. DALY. It appears that when an Indian woman marries a white man or a non-treaty Indian, they commute her annuity to ten years, if she resigns it, under section 11 of the Indian Act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then she and her posterity cease to become charges on the state ?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Manitoba and N.W.T.—Live Stock, $7,001

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are these supplied to special bands, or are they supplied all round with live stock ?

Mr. DALY. One or two special bands. For instance, of this sum that is required now, we give a bull, 100 ewes and five rams to the Indians at the Pelly agency ; 50 heifers to the Blackfoot, 50 heifers to the Bloods, 4 oxen to the Piegiens. They are distributed all round.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the experience of the department as to the distribution of stock ? Do the Indians keep it or eat it ?

Mr. DALY. They used to eat it, but the experience now is more satisfactory. For instance, the year before last we gave some cattle to the Piegiens, and living as they do amongst the ranches, they found out from experience of the way cattle increased that there was more money in keeping them than there would be in keeping their ponies. When I had a pow-wow with the Bloods, one of their requests was that they were to be given cattle the same as the Piegiens, because the Piegan chief who was present at the pow-wow had told them how satisfactorily they were getting on. The class of cattle we are giving them are the Polled Angus, or Aberdeens.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If they could be trusted, I should imagine that a good deal of the supplies given to the Indians might be dispensed with, and a large number of cattle given.

Mr. DALY. I would not like to take up the time of the House, but I could show to the hon. gentleman that in some of the reserves the supplies given have decreased. For instance, at the Crooked Lake agency only 13,000 pounds of beef were given ; at the Assiniboia agency only 10,000 pounds ; at the File Hills agency, 10,000 pounds ; at Muscowpetung no beef at all was given. At Touchwood Hills agency it runs up to 33,000 pounds. In some of the agencies they have begun to be self-supporting out of their own herds. At the Carlton agency the supply has been very much reduced, and at the Onion Lake agency they do not get any at all, they are self-supporting. At Saddle Lake agency it has been reduced to 30,000 pounds from the large allowance made previously.

Indians. $215,693

Mr. MARTIN. I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to some items in the Auditor General's Report, page F-238. I see that Peter Maclaren, I suppose the late Senator Maclaren, seems to be indebted to the amount of $6,520 to the Indian Department, on the 9th May, 1893. Has that been paid?

Mr. DALY. No. It appears there were claims against Mr. Maclaren in connection with a mill that was sold to him somewhere in 1882 or 1883. A settlement, so far as my advice goes, was arrived at between the Government of that day and Mr. Maclaren, covering all matters in difference between them. But that settlement was made with the Department of the Interior, and it appears that the Department of Indian Affairs had not been advised of the settlement that was made between the Government and Mr. Maclaren, and the question that the Auditor General brings up here is in relation to the purchase of the mill mentioned, which mill was purchased from the Indian Department. The matter is now under advisement, it having been brought to my attention when this report was issued, and I think it will be adjusted.

Mr. MARTIN. Do I understand that the statement includes this amount?

Mr. DALY. Yes; that is Mr. Maclaren's contention, and it would seem that he is about correct.

Mr. MARTIN. So he owes nothing?

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the hon. gentleman explain the next two letters, respecting Colonel DeWinton's cattle arrangement?

Mr. DALY. It appears that in 1880 or 1881 the Department of Indian Affairs bought a large band of cattle in Montana or one of the western states for the purpose of inducing one of the Indian bands to go into cattle-raising. Owing to the long distance from civilization and absence of control over cattle, the Indians, instead of looking after them, commenced to eat and destroy them. The cattle also got mixed with other bands, and at length the balance of the cattle were sold to Col. De Winton. The colonel declares that all the cattle sold to him were not delivered, that Capt. Stewart, who had something to do with ranging up the cattle in order to deliver them to Colonel De Winton, delivered 312 two-year-old steers short. I understand those 312 cattle were not in existence. The claim for this number of cattle is still standing on the books of the department, and consequently the attention of the department was called to it by the Auditor General. The matter is explained in a letter of May, 1893, from Mr. Vankoughnet.

Mr. MARTIN. That letter explains nothing.

Mr. DALY. The letter reads as follows:—

DEPT. OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
OTTAWA, May 8, 1893.

SIR,—Referring to your letter of the 5th instant, relative to the claim of this department against Capt. Stewart on account of 312 two-year-old heifers not delivered by him; in respect of which you inquire whether anything has been realized and in what condition the transaction now stands, I beg to inform you that, on inquiry recently made of the Department of Justice, this department was advised that action was brought to recover $8,255, a defence was put in and the defendant was examined for discovery in the winter of 1886, and that shortly afterwards the late Premier, Sir John Macdonald, directed Messrs. O'Connor, Hogg & Balderson, the agents of the Department of Justice, not to proceed any further with the suit until they were further instructed. The Deputy Minister of Justice further stated that the action was in such a position that it could be set down for trial at any time it will be convenient for the officers having charge of the matter, and the trial proceeded with.

Upon submitting the question to the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, it was decided that a further stay of proceedings should be made, as it was not certain that Mr. Stewart was now worth the amount claimed, even if judgment were recovered against him. On the question of Mr. Stewart's solvency, the Indian Commissioner for the North-west is being written to for information.

Your obedient servant,

L. VANKOUGHNET, D.S.G.I.A.

The Auditor General.

That was the last action taken by the department.

Mr. MARTIN. Then the hon. gentleman can give no explanation as to how the Government stood with respect to Capt. Stewart's position?

Mr. DALY. I think Captain Stewart's services were secured for the purpose of delivering the cattle, and his contention was that the cattle were not there. The hon. member for Alberta can explain the transaction.

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta). I happened to be in the country when the cattle referred to were driven in—1,200 cattle were driven in. The Indian Department purchased those cattle, which were intended to be turned over to the Indians. Those cattle were herded by men paid by the Government. About three years ago, after the herd had been there, a contract for beef was let to Baker & Co., originally, and was subsequently sub-let to Ford & Stewart. During the winter they ran short of beef, and among the herd there were 300 or 400 head of steers which had grown up during a couple of years. They borrowed the beef from the Indian Department, and it was understood that for each steer they would return two two-year-old heifers in the spring, and these were very good terms for the Indian Department. During this time, the herd had been sold as breeding stock to the Alberta ranche. They were subsequently sold to the Alberta Ranche Company. The cattle included two-year-old heifers that were to be returned to the company by Ford & Stewart. In the spring, they drove in the herd from Montana, they did not have a sufficient number of two-year-old heifers to supply the number promised. I happened to be in the locality when the cattle were there, and I am able to say that Captain Stewart was not herding the cattle. He was simply turning the cattle over from Ford & Stewart to the Indian Department, which was receiving them for Colonel De Winton's Alberta ranche. As they could not furnish two heifers for each steer, the agent took a cow and a calf in place of two-year-old heifers, and afterwards Col. De Winton refused to pay for them, because the bargain with the Government was not carried out. That is the explanation.

Mr. LAURIER. Then they were never paid for?

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta). I do not think they ever were paid for.

Mr. MARTIN. Then Ford & Stewart delivered all they were bound to deliver?

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta). I am satisfied they delivered the full number, counting a cow and calf for a two-year-old heifer. They were not all two-year-old heifers, but they got the full number.

Mr. MARTIN. It would be very satisfactory to the committee if a complete explanation were given subsequently. The hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Davis) simply knows the matter in a general way. He does not know what has been done by the Government.

Mr. DALY. What was done by the Government was to institute a suit.

Mr. MARTIN. The Government allowed matters to rest until the time arrived when, owing to changed circumstances, they were unable to recover the amount. I should like a full statement in order to be able to ascertain whether the Alberta Ranche Company could not be sued.

Mr. DALY. The papers were brought down this session. The reply answers the question:

DEPARTMENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
OTTAWA, July 4th, 1893.

SIR,—In reply to the inquiries made in your letter of the 26th ult., respecting a deposit made by the Indian Commissioner in the Bank of Montreal, Regina, on account of a transit purchased by the department for A. W. Ponton, I have the honour to inform you that Mr. Ponton has allowed his payments to fall into arrear. Four instalments remain unpaid, two of which are now due, and Mr. Ponton has been asked to forward the amount of these two instalments at once, when it will be accounted for.

He has since paid some of them.

Mr. LAURIER. I submit that the committee is entitled to a little more information with regard to that suit against Capt. Stewart. What has become of it. The only thing we know is that the suit was taken and then by the order of Sir John Macdonald it was suspended, pending something, I suppose. At that time, the late Sir John Macdonald was Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, I think. What was the reason of that suspension of proceedings and what is to take place afterwards? Is the matter to rest there?

Mr. DALY. I do not know what reason Sir John Macdonald had for suspending, but if the hon. gentleman will look at page F-239 of the Auditor General's Report he will find the following letter:—

DEPARTMENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
OTTAWA, 8th May, 1893.

The Auditor General.

In the meantime Capt. Stewart died.

Mr. MARTIN. It would appear to me from what I heard from the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Davis) that it is not Capt. Stewart at all that the Government has the claim against, but the Alberta Ranche Company, or Col. De Winton. If this is so, I think we are entitled to some explanation as to why he is not made to pay. Capt. Stewart resisted payment and put in a defence, and according to what we have heard he had a complete defence, because he was not liable for the cattle if he delivered all he had agreed to. But if the De Winton Rancho Company made a bargain, and they repudiated it afterwards, and refused to pay the $8,255, it appears to me that the Government ought to sue them, or at all events find out whether they were worth suing.

Mr. DALY. The matter will be looked into.

Mr. LAURIER. Are we to understand that the matter is to rest there?

Mr. DALY. A memo. has been made of it, and it will be looked into. My recollection is that owing to the death of Capt. Stewart, no proceedings were to be taken until administrators were appointed to his estate. As to the point about the Alberta Rancho Company, the facts being before the Department of Justice, I suppose they knew who to sue as being liable to the Government.

Mr. MARTIN. Perhaps the Minister of Justice can tell us, if it was not before his time?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was not before my time, but I have not the slightest recollection that I ever had anything to do with it.

Mr. LAURIER. That is the way the money goes.

Triennial Clothing $5,182

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where is that manufactured?

Mr. DALY. At the Kingston Penitentiary.

Schools..... $233,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the explanation of this?

Mr. DALY. The number of boarding schools are 22; day schools, 111; industrial schools, 11. Number of pupils, board schools, per day, 1,686; industrial schools, 1,130; total number, 2,316. Of these 82 are under the Church of England, 37 Roman Catholic, 6 Presbyterians, 17 Methodists, 2 undenominational. There is an increase of $6,000, which is accounted for as follows:—Qu'Appelle, $3,100; 200 pupils, $125, instead of $115; additions to their buildings for smaller pupils, $5,000; blacksmith shop, $350; stables, $200.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman tells us that for this sum of $233,000 there is an average attendance of 2,300 children, between the boarding-schools and day schools. That seems to be but a poor result for an expenditure of nearly a quarter of a million. Here is a cost of $100 roughly, per head per annum, including those who attend the day schools, who are the larger number. I must say that, making all allowances possible, an average expenditure of $100 per head does appear to me to be a very extravagant figure, and it does appear that a very much larger number of Indian children ought to be instructed for the sum we spend. There are about 1,000 on an average at these boarding and industrial schools, the balance being at the day schools, so that speaking generally, the sum that we spend for each pupil at these industrial schools would probably be $160 or $180.

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should think that that was an excessive amount.

Mr. DALY. That includes everything. We find them in clothes and board and lodging. The hon. gentleman will remember that it includes the erection, maintenance, and repairs of buildings.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much of that $233,000 went for buildings?

Mr. DALY. About $22,625.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Even so; the hon. gentleman will see that the amount expended is very large indeed for the results produced.

Mr. DALY. Yes, but you will understand that when you take the per capita allowance you must take into consideration the long distance that some of these schools are from the railways, and from civilization, and the difficulty we have in getting men to undertake to run the schools as principals or as teachers, as also the cost of provision. We do not buy the provision or the clothing, as the denominations who look after these schools supply all that, and of course the amounts they pay for supplies are larger in proportion to the distance they are from the railways.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many of these boarding-schools are there?

Mr. DALY. The total number of boarding and industrial schools is eighteen.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here you have all told some 23,000 or 24,000 Indians, representing roughly 4,000 or 5,000 families, for whose benefit we maintain these eighteen establishments. I just put it to the hon. gentleman whether that is not an enormous disproportion. I could understand the necessity of having three or four industrial schools in which to instruct these Indian children; but the idea of having eighteen does appear to me to be a very improvident idea, and it accounts for the miserably poor results we derive from the expenditure of a quarter of a million dollars. If the whole Indian population of school age were in attendance at these schools it would amount to about $40 a head. I think the number of the schools ought to be reduced; they ought to be consolidated.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 99) respecting the St. Lawrence Insurance Company.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Bill (No. 79) respecting the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Carpenter.)

Bill (No. 141) respecting the Canada Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Montague.)

CALGARY IRRIGATION COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta) moved second reading of Senate amendments to Bill (No. 53) respecting the Calgary Irrigation Company.

Mr. EDGAR. I see that this amendment by the Senate is rather material, and I do not think it is quite right. One of the sections provides that as soon as the whole amount of stock has been subscribed and 50 per cent paid thereon, an increase on the capital stock may be made. I do not think it is unreasonable, before the company gets leave, to increase its stock, to require that 50 per cent of the original stock should be paid up, but the Senate have altered it to 25 per cent. If the company can only pay 25 per cent of its original stock, it ought not to have leave to increase its capital. It is very often 75 per cent that is required to be paid on the original stock before an increase is allowed. I do not think the House should assent to that amendment.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Better adjourn the debate.

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta) moved that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Day, Boarding and Industrial Schools.....	$233,000
--	-----------

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Just before the House rose, I was pointing out that apparently this expenditure gives but very poor results. Some 2,200 Indian children appear to be all that we have under instruction. The Minister explained that this amount was largely due to the very large number of industrial schools in the hands of the various denominations. My impression is that a great deal of this money is utterly wasted, and that it would be far better policy to concentrate our resources on three or four considerable schools, instead of frittering them away over eighteen. In any case, the expenditure of a quarter of a million dollars or thereabouts for the education of 2,300 children, most of whom are attendant on day schools, strikes me as altogether disproportionate. No one will object to spending a reasonable amount, but we must recollect that the resources of the older provinces have been fairly taxed indeed for the development of the North-west, and it is about time we got value for every penny that goes in there.

Mr. FRASER. Under whose charge are those eighteen schools?

Mr. DALY. If the hon. gentleman had been here this afternoon he would have got the information. Seventy-seven Church of England, thirty-four Roman Catholic, five Presbyterian, fifteen Methodists, seventeen nondenominational. Industrial schools: five Church of England, three Roman Catholics, one Presbyterian, two Methodist.

Mr. FRASER. My objection is to giving a single dollar to any of the schools conducted by religious bodies. I do not believe in it. If the Government are going to have schools, let them have them not under any particular denomination. If there is religious instruction to be given, those denominations, if they have at heart their mission, as I believe that they have, ought to give their labour for that purpose without being paid by the Government. We can well understand the difficulties the Government will have with these various schools. For example, each denomination, not in the North-west alone, but throughout the whole locality, will be called upon at any time to stand by the Government for any expense they make in this matter. There are 80 odd Presbyterian schools out there. The whole Episcopalian body will say all right to that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No, they will not.

Mr. FRASER. Of course they will. There are so many Catholic schools, and the Catholics will naturally say the same thing. The Presbyterians, of course, will say it is all right—they are getting money from the Government. That is not a correct method of carrying on schools among the Indians. Over $231,000 is the expenditure of the Government on these schools for the education of between two and three thousand children. That is more than the total Provincial Government grant to schools in Nova Scotia, a province with half a million of people, and that grant is given to public schools not controlled by denominations, and for which the whole people are responsible. In speaking against denominational schools, I speak generally, because it will be seen that each of the large religious bodies in Canada has its own schools among the Indians. I think the Government should stop these grants at once. Another thing. I am not sure that the best training in the public interest will be given at these schools presided over by the religious element. I believe the results will not be so good as if the schools were directly under the Government control. These bodies that control the schools will depend upon the sympathy of the members of their denominations and will not be so anxious to achieve substantial results. What the Indians want is such training as will make them useful citizens. I do not know how many Indians have become good citizens through the work of these schools, but by this time there ought to be a very large number. I see by the report of the Minister that one characteristic of the Indians is the more you do for them the less they will do for themselves. I know they are our wards, and we must attend to them. I should be the last in this House to say that the Indian should not be looked after. But I do not think they are best looked after by simply subsidizing denominations for them. I do not think it is worth while for this Government to pay for the education of the children to have them turned out one a Presbyterian, another an Episcopalian, and so on. The same policy should be followed in this that we follow with regard to education generally—the children should be educated in schools provided by public money, leaving their religious education to be carried on by the representatives of the various denominations.

Mr. MARA: It would be ridiculous to draw a comparison between the cost of educating children in Nova Scotia and the cost of educating children in Manitoba, the Northwest Territories or British Columbia. In one case you have to pay the cost of education alone, but in the other you have to pay for education and for maintenance and clothing as well. With regard to the other point, those who know anything of the Indian character, are aware that these schools must be of a religious character. To teach the Indian, you must begin with religion; otherwise the education is thrown away upon him. Moreover, the schools should be boarding-schools as it is necessary, in order to produce good results, that the Indian children should be removed from the tribe. The only way to educate the Indian is to give him a religious training and to remove him from the evil associations of his tribe. I am not quite sure that the Government is right in—as I consider it—losing all control over these industrial schools. I think that, while the schools should be religious schools, the Government should retain a firm hold upon them, and that the inspection should be much more rigid than it is at present.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I cannot agree with the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Mara). It does not seem reasonable to me that as good results can be obtained in these schools as in schools under the control of the Government. I agree with the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) that there is no reason for making these denominational grants. The only justifiable object to be gained by devoting public money to the education of these children must be that of making them good citizens and fitting them to earn their livelihood. In that case I imagine, secular education is what they require, and, as the hon. member says, if the denominations desire to carry on their work, by teaching these people religion, they have every opportunity to do so. I am satisfied, from the experience we have had from the various provinces in establishing schools in which to give the children a secular education under properly qualified teachers, and with proper inspection, that better results would be obtained by observing the same principle in this case. I believe there is a feeling throughout the country that this is wasted. I know that some entertain strong feelings on this question, but that is the result of sentiment from my point of view. I am satisfied that the object in view, the education of these children, could be much better achieved by schools under the control of the Government with properly qualified teachers and proper inspection. This money, to a great extent, is not spent for the benefit of the children. Every person who has looked into the matter knows that a considerable portion of the money goes in salaries for those who give but little real return in the way of educating the children. The hon. member for Yale was quite right in saying that it would not be fair to compare the cost of educating 2,000 Indian children in boarding-schools with that of educating the same number of children under the public schools system of one of the older provinces. But the difference should not be so great as it is. I agree with the hon. member for Guysboro', that it would be well for the department to look into this and stop these grants. I am satisfied that it would be found that for very much less money we could get better results.

Mr. MARA. The hon. gentleman's arguments would be very strong if you were dealing with the children of Christian parents. But you are dealing with savages who know nothing about religion or morality, who have all the vices of their tribe as well as those they may have learned from bad whites. It is well known by those who have anything to do with Indians that if you want to make a bad Indian you can do it by teaching him to read and write while teaching him nothing of religion. That has been the experience of the United States, and every observer, in Manitoba, the Northwest or British Columbia will agree that that has been the experience in Canada.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I realize that the problem is not so easy of solution as it appears at first sight to be. It must be a good thing, of course, to educate the Indians in Christian principles. But as to the whole question before us, I believe we have not sufficient information to enable us to reach a conclusion. I remember that about five years ago this question came before the House. I gave some attention to it and read the report very carefully and gave my views upon the subject, not in the hope that any immediate change would be brought about, but in the hope that the system of subsidizing denominational schools would at least be arrested. Whether we can entirely abolish the system or not I have not sufficient information to be able to judge. I confess that the statistics and reports before the House are very unsatisfactory. From these I cannot form any opinion of the quality or quantity of the Christian education given in these schools. Personally, apart from special consideration which, if I knew them, might change my opinion, I am opposed to subsidizing denominational schools at all. If it is desirable to Christianize, or to civilize—which, I should imagine, was the first to be done—these Indians, I should imagine it will be better done in industrial schools carried on by the state. I do not agree with the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Mara) that it is desirable to Christianize them first, and civilize them afterwards. I think he will find that the experience of the great missionary societies is in the opposite direction. I think that public opinion in this country will not endorse the granting of large sums of money to denominational societies. My hon. friend from Guysboro' seems to think that because a vote is made for Episcopalian schools, all Episcopalians would support the principle. I think he is mistaken.

Mr. FRASER. I said that the denomination generally would be influenced in favour of the system by the grant.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The church, as a corporation, might be inclined to favour the system, but a large number of members of the Episcopalian Church are as strongly opposed to the support by the state of sectarian schools as is my hon. friend. It would appear to an outsider that if the great Christian denominations desire to Christianize the Indians who are right at their doors, there should be sufficient faith and generosity among them to do it. We know that the churches of this country respond very liberally to demands made for the support of missionary efforts in all parts of the world, and I believe that if the matter were put before them and they were left to themselves, they would do their duty in this regard. In reading the statistics a curious fact struck me. I may be misled through not understanding the method followed in the preparation of the figures, but I may bring the point to which I refer to the attention of the hon. Minister. Take British Columbia, for example. The schools to which grants are made are all denominational in their character, except one, which is given as "undenominational." They have 786 pupils attending the schools, with an average attendance of 471. Of these pupils, it appears that only 168 are learning scripture. The rest are all being taught reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic, geography, history, music, drawing, and composition. And the curious part of it is that that school which has the largest number of pupils who are instructed in the Scriptures is the undenominational school. The same peculiarity seems to run through these tables with reference to Ontario and the other provinces. I do not care to discuss this question of denominational grants further than to say that it seems to me that we are introducing a system which will create untold agitation and trouble in the future, and that our policy should be to restrict denominational grants as much as possible, and not to increase them, but rather to diminish them. And my own personal view is that the more we can diminish them and the more industrial schools we can establish free from denominational influences, the better for the state, and for the Indians.

Mr. MARA. I desire to correct the false impression the hon. gentleman has received from the statistics. All the scholars are taught religion, but not all under the head of Scripture.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The statistics may have misled me. But there are eight or ten columns here showing different branches of study and under none of these heads, except that of the Scripture, can religion be taught.

Mr. DALY. I am sorry it is omitted, but it will certainly be put in next year in large print. Common sense should teach a person that schools carried on under different religious denominations must teach religion.

Mr. FRASER. But why do the statistics show that some are taught Scripture, while others are not?

Mr. DALY. That is a separate branch of study, just as you might teach the Greek testament.

Mr. FRASER. While I admit that no pagan Indian will ever make a good citizen until he is taught the principles of Christianity, my point is that the Government should not pay the denominations for schools established to give secular as well as religious education under denominational auspices. We have an object lesson on this subject in Nova Scotia. Many years ago, the Roman Catholics undertook the education of the Indian children in the province. And we have never had any trouble with our Indians. All of our Indians belong to the Catholic denomination, but that denomination have received no aid from the state for the work which they voluntarily took up. Not only have they educated the Indians, but I know of half a dozen churches of this denomination attended by the Indians. As to the amount being large, I still maintain that to spend nearly a quarter of a million dollars a year for the education of two or three thousand Indians is not reasonable. We have no indications in these reports what the results are, but I am satisfied they are not adequate for the money expended. Of course, I am not seeking to judge of the value of Christianizing of these Indians according to merely material standard. These schools should be conducted simply as secular schools, and every possible advantage should be given to the religious denominations to afford religious training to children.

Mr. HASLAM. It is hardly correct or fair to institute a comparison between Nova Scotia, where there are very few Indians, with the North-west, and with British Columbia.

Mr. FRASER. Does the hon. gentleman know how many Indians there were in the savage state when Nova Scotia was discovered?

Mr. HASLAM. There never were as many as in British Columbia and the North-west. I know, too, that a little more intimate acquaintance with the work done in the industrial schools in British Columbia and the North-west would enable hon. members to speak with a good deal more intelligence on the subject. One of the latest established schools as an industrial school is at Kuper Island. The children attending there had not the advantage of being able to talk English, yet they acquired a knowledge of the language in a very short time; they can write and read well, make their own clothes and boots, build their own boats, and do all the work in connection with them. I took it upon myself to visit the school on two occasions to examine it, so that I might be able to speak intelligently on the subject whenever it should come up in Parliament. At Alberni there is another denominational school, which is in charge of the Presbyterians. I do not think it has made the same progress which the school at Cooper Island has made. The Cooper Island school is under the charge of the Roman Catholic Church, and although I am not a Roman Catholic myself, I would not hesitate to place the Indians under the care of the Roman Catholic Church, for I believe that considering the matter as a fair business proposition, throwing religion aside, the best value for the amount of money spent is got from the Roman Catholics in handling the Indians. That is the experience all over the coast in British Columbia, and also in the North-west. I think in comparing Indians with whites in the matter of education, we are acting erroneously. White children have implanted in them from infancy a knowledge of religion, while the Indians have no such knowledge, and to make a comparison of the cost of education for the whites and education for the Indians in the west is not a fair comparison. There are one or two schools in British Columbia at which the cost of educating a child is $49.50 for the bare cost of education, there being no boarding-school attached. So it is apparent that it is impossible to conduct industrial schools there at as low a cost as they can be carried on in the east. Before condemning the present system, it would be wise on the part of hon. members to try and obtain as full knowledge of all the circumstances connected with the education of Indians as possible, for I am sure there is more accomplished in that direction than most people imagine. I think a further knowledge of the subject would be beneficial to every one. As regards religious education, I may say that on general principles I am opposed to it, but not so far as the Indians are concerned, for I believe it is almost impossible to educate Indians without first implanting in them a knowledge of religion. You must show the effects of their bad actions on their lives before they will acquire any kind of secular education; it is altogether out of the question to try to implant plain, secular education in the minds of the Indians. It must of necessity be combined with a religious education, and instruction cannot be carried on without it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are two totally distinct questions at issue, and it may be as well for the House to keep them separate. One is the policy of furnishing education by means of religious denominations. The other question is, and it is one of considerable importance to the people, whether we are obtaining any adequate value for the amount of $233,000 expended in the North-west in educating 2,200 Indian children. Without entering for the moment into the question of denominational education, I hold that we are expending a large sum and obtaining exceedingly poor results from it. I find on looking at the returns that there are eighteen industrial schools, far too large a number in my opinion. Three or four properly conducted industrial schools, having a larger number of pupils in them would be very much more advantageous. But entirely apart from that, looking at the returns which the hon. Minister has placed in my hands, a very large sum of money is given to schools as at which, to quote from one page at hazard, there are the following numbers of scholars in daily attendance, 7, 4, 6, 8, 7, 7, 3, 4, 7, 8, 7, 6, 6, 3, 7, 5, 4.

Mr. DALY. From what page is the hon. gentleman reading?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. From the tabular statement showing the condition of the Indian schools, page 292; and I find very much the same state of things in the adjoining page, namely, schools with an attendance of 5, 9, 4, 5, 5, 8, 3, 6, and so on. It appears to me we have some duties to discharge to the people of the older provinces. We are not bound by a treaty or by anything except moral obligation to tax the people of Canada for the education of a couple of thousand Indian children. I regard this expenditure for them as shown in the statement submitted as a piece of monstrous extravagance. Instead of maintaining such a large number of schools, we should support three or four properly conducted industrial schools. I purposely avoid raising the question as to whether you can or cannot usefully employ religious denominations managing them; my contention is; that we are getting extremely poor value for our money. We have only 23,000 Indians in Manitoba, and the North-west, according to the hon. gentleman's statement, and the day, board, and industrial schools cost us $233,000. In British Columbia we have 25,000 Indians, and there the charge for schools is about $44,000, a little less than one-sixth of the amount that is required in Manitoba and the North-west for the service of a smaller number of Indians. Well, there may be circumstances that warrant that. I do not believe, and I cannot see any evidence here which warrants an expenditure of nearly a quarter of a million of dollars which, be it remembered is a voluntary contribution on our part—we are not bound by treaty to do that, but simply and solely by our desire to benefit these people. I do not see that that money has been used at all to the best advantage for the Indians themselves, and that is my objection to the vote we are now asked to pass.

Mr. BOWERS. I wish to ask the Minister whether there is not a denomination that refuses to accept the money, and whether the schools of that denomination give a religious education?

Mr. DALY. Would the hon. gentleman state the denomination he refers to?

Mr. BOWERS. I understand from reading the newspapers a year or two ago that the Baptists refuse to accept aid for denominational schools in the North-west.

Mr. DALY. Possibly so, but I do not know whether it is so or not. If the hon. gentleman saw it in the papers it must be so, but I know nothing about it.

Mr. BOWERS. I simply ask for information whether it is or is not the case?

Mr. DALY. I cannot tell. We have no Baptist schools. I never knew a religious denomination to refuse any money.

Mr. MARTIN. What is the arrangement with any particular church as to any particular school. What part does the religious denomination do, and what part does the Government do?

Mr. DALY. I tried to explain that, but so many gentlemen have aired their opinions and knowledge on this question that I had not an opportunity of answering the hon. gentleman for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), as I intended to do. Although we are compelled by treaty to have day schools, and all they cost is $300, and about $50 a year for biscuits and so on to give to the children, we looked upon them as a failure, and it is impossible to get the children to attend. With a view of trying to make them attend, a section of the Act I introduced here some weeks ago provides for compulsory education. The hon. gentleman will understand that it is rather difficult to keep children at school who have been brought up from the cradle with a desire to roam abroad and enjoy themselves, and the parents are equally hard to get to send their children to school. Not having the power to compel them to go to school there is a very small average showing. But so far as the boarding and industrial schools are concerned, I will give the hon. gentleman as briefly as possible the information he wants. for Guysboro' to read the reports of the different superintendents of these industrial schools, by which he will find that the pupils are making very great progress in the way in which he desires, namely, in learning trades. For instance, at the Battleford school there are 11 pupils taught blacksmithing, 15 carpentering, 12 farming, 5 shoemaking, 2 pointing and 3 printing. At the Qu'Appelle school, 6 are taught blacksmithing, 8 carpentering, 6 shoemaking and 6 farming. At the High River school 5 are taught carpentering, 8 shoemaking and 8 farming. At the Regina school 10 are taught carpentering, 10 farming, 5 painting, and 11 shoemaking.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. FRASER. That is what I say ought to be the case, and I am glad to find that that is the result. It is the religious matter I referred to.

Mr. DALY. I will come to that. This shows that blacksmithing, carpentering, shoemaking, painting and printing are taught to the boys; and the girls are taught all the useful work which their sex ought to know. At the High River school there are 120 pupils at $140 per capita; at the Regina school, under the Presbyterian body, 150 pupils at $130 per capita; at the Red Deer school, under the Methodist body, 50 pupils at $140 per capita; at the St. Paul school, under the Church of England, 100 pupils at $135 per capita; at the Elkhorn school 90 pupils at $110 per capita; at the Brandon school, 50 pupils at $120; at the St. Boniface school, Roman Catholic, 100 pupils at $105; and at Emmanuel College, Prince Albert, Church of England, 20 pupils at $100. The Church of England Industrial School at Calgary is not yet in working order. Now, the hon. gentleman has objected to these schools being conducted by the different religious bodies. In reply to that, I may say that the history of the civilization of our Indians on this continent shows that religion and education must go hand in hand. It has been the experience in the United States and in every province of the Dominion, particularly in the North-west, that were it not for the efforts made by the missionaries, many of whom who have given their lives to this work, some of whom I know having spent forty-three or forty-four years in it, it would be impossible for us to-day to have a single Indian child attending a school on any reserve whether a day, or an industrial or a boarding-school. It is only through the influence of the missionaries that we are able to get the parents of these children to consent to their attending these schools. The hon member for South Oxford has stated that there are too many of these schools—that we ought to have only three or four. The reason we have so many is that the country is a country of magnificent distances, and we have to locate the schools at as convenient points as possible

I may say for the information of the hon. gentleman that up to two years ago the Government conducted these schools themselves, but that was found unsatisfactory, and a tabulated statement was made of the expense of conducting each of the schools, and from that they arrived at a basis of what they would cost per pupil to carry on for maintenance, for clothing and so on, and to conduct the schools in the manner in which they had been conducted previously. In the industrial school at Qu'Appelle, which is one of the largest, I found that $125 per pupil was the very lowest cost at which the school could be carried on. The inspection in these schools is of the most rigid character. Every school is compelled to keep a set of books, giving details of the expenditure of every dollar of public money, even to the last cent. At least twice a year the schools are inspected and their books gone over. In fact, one of the complaints they make is on account of the rigid inspection to which they are subject. At the Qu'Appelle school we pay $125 per pupil for two hundred pupils; and the school authorities have to show that there are two hundred pupils in attendance, the number of days that each pupil attends, everything they buy from a bar of soap up. At the Qu'Appelle school, there are some improvements to be made this year.

Mr. MARTIN. Does this account refer to a time prior to that arrangement?

Mr. DALY. Yes, the Auditor General's report refers entirely to the old condition of things. In the report of the department it might be interesting for the hon. member over the whole area from Winnipeg to the Rocky Mountains. At the same time, the rule has been adopted by the department and is continued—although I think I can say that no more schools will be erected either in the North-west or in Manitoba—to locate the schools so as to take in the children whose parents profess the religion under which they are respectively conducted. We also remove them as far as possible from the different reserves, so that their parents will not frequently visit them and camp in the neighbourhood for the purpose of getting grub also, and in order to remove the children as far as possible from their old habits and associations. For instance, at the school at Elkhorn we have Blackfeet, Piegans and Bloods, removed about eight hundred miles from the influence of their parents and their early surroundings. From the inspection I made of the different schools from St. Boniface to St. Albert, north of Edmonton, it was evident to myself, as it must be to every other person who visits these schools, that the work done in them and the progress made reflects the highest possible credit on the different denominations and the different principals who have them in charge. If any hon. gentleman, who were not at the World's Fair and did not see there the samples of work done at these industrial schools, will come to my office, they will find a portion of those exhibits, showing the work done by the female and male pupils; and I think they will come away with the same feeling that all who have visited the exhibit have had, that the work could not be better done. The expenditure may seem large; but when you take into consideration the number of the schools I have mentioned, and the fact that a large portion of the expenditure is for day schools, and that we are compelled by treaty to expend a great deal of this money—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are the terms of the treaty in regard to schools?

Mr. DALY. I could not give the exact wording without having the treaty; but it is to the effect that we should give them education, and that the schools must be on the reserves. In the schools I visited in Manitoba and the North-west Territories I was more than surprised at the work done. It can only be a high sense of duty on the part of the sisters and the laymen and the clergymen of the different denominations who are conducting these schools, that enables them to continue the work, which hon. gentleman can well understand is not at all encouraging. But I am glad to say that the efforts of the missionaries and of those who have taken great interest in the education of the young are bearing fruit; and instead of these young people growing up in idleness, with the idea inculcated in them from their youth, of letting the squaws do all the work, we find them coming out as blacksmiths, farmers, carpenters, shoemakers, painters and printers; and I am sure that if hon. gentlemen visit the exhibits which I have mentioned, they will see that the work done in these schools reflects great credit on their management.

Mr. MARTIN. In the Qu'Appelle school are there any salaries paid to any officers of the Government in addition to this amount of $125 per pupil?

Mr. DALY. No, nothing more. I think they get the benefit of Dr. Simard at Qu'Appelle, who is the Indian doctor there.

Mr. MARTIN. The school buildings belong to the Government.

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN. Who looks after those and keeps them in repairs?

Mr. DALY. The inspector looks after them. Anything in the way of ordinary repairs, the authorities there are bound to preform. If the hon. gentleman will look at the report of the Battleford schools, he will see on pages 100 and 102 what work we have been enabled to get the pupils to do. Take the report of the carpenter's branch:

Mr. Gatley, who has had charge of this branch since 1886, continues to give instruction to the children placed under his tuition.

This industry has now become a source of revenue to the school. The principal work performed by the pupils was:—

(a.) The erection of a blacksmith's shop, fifty feet by thirty feet, and boot, painting and printing shop.

(b.) As soon as these were completed, the boys were sent to Moosomin's Reserve to erect a dwelling house for the farm instructor. This was a commodious building and took about one month to complete.

(c.) A large root-house was next constructed at the school, which was executed with despatch.

(d.) Then there were the necessary repairs to the main building and out houses, needed before the cold weather set in. During the winter, work was found for the pupils in the shop, making window sashes, doors, relaying floors, &c.

This shows that we are economizing, so far as regards the work to be done, by using the labour of the pupils that have been taught. Of course, that per capita allowance includes the salaries of the different instructors—carpenters, blacksmiths, &c.

Mr. MARTIN. I see in the report of the Qu'Appelle school a statement of what becomes of the pupils that have left the school. It is a very important matter for us to consider. Unless the pupils become citizens, and are improved by the schooling they get, they are of very little use to the community; and so far as I can judge by the report, they nearly all die shortly after they come out. Take Qu'Appelle school No.

2. we find in the report showing status of discharged people that No. 2 died of consumption; No. 3, poor health; No. 5 died of consumption; No. 7 died of softening of the brain; No. 8 left without authority, gone back to Indian habits; No. 13 died of bilious fever; No. 15, taken away by his father, who left treaty and country; No. 16, parents left treaty, boy was weak minded; No. 18 deserted, forgetting his English, Indian habits, works well; No. 20 died of pleurisy; No. 21 deserted, works well, Indian habits; No. 23 died of heart disease; No. 25 died at home; No. 30 taken away by parents, who left treaty and country; No. 31 died of consumption; No. 33 died at home; No. 35 died of consumption. These numbers are not consecutive, and I do not know why some numbers are left out. No. 45 died; No. 49 was a white boy, taken home by parents, delicate health; No. 50 died of consumption; No. 52 died of consumption; No. 54 died of consumption; No. 57 went with his parents to the United States; No. 58 died; No. 70 died at home; No. 71 died at home; No. 78 died here of consumption; No. 81 was sick, taken home by his father; No. 82 went home sick and died; No. 83 died of consumption; No. 85 went home without leave, left district; No. 88 died at home of consumption; No. 96 died; No. 97 went home sick, died; No. 101 died since transferred to Regina school; No. 105 taken home, constantly ill, died at home; No. 106 kept at home, not improved, died; No. 110 taken home by mother, died since; No. 113 died of consumption; No. 116 went home sick and died; No. 117 went home sick and died; No. 122 deserted, went to the United States, not much improved; No. 124 went home on sick leave, died; No. 125 sickly, died 6th January; No. 126 kept at home, not improved; No. 133 left on sick leave, died; No. 149 died of consumption; No. 165, white boy, unfit for school; No. 178 discharged in an advanced state of consumption. These are consecutive, although the numbers are not. Almost every one discharged died very shortly afterwards. The next one died of consumption. These are the boys, and next we come to the girls. No. 2 died in 1890; No. 3 taken away by her mother, who left the treaty; No. 4 went to Dakota with her family; No. 7 died; No. 8 sick, taken home and died; No. 9, imbecile, sent home, incapable of education, died; No. 12, taken away by her parents, who left treaty; No. 14 died on the 1st of April; No. 16 deserted, unfit for school; No. 27, white girl, taken home by her parents. The next one went home sick and died. Then Rosa deserted, unfit for school; No. 37 died.

Mr. MARA. How many years does that cover, and out of how many children did these deaths occur?

Mr. MARTIN. It covers all those discharged from the school since it commenced.

Mr. MARA. How many years?

Mr. DALY. Seven years only.

Mr. MARTIN. Apparently this one was established August 19th, 1885, and this is a list of all that got out. I do not know how many there were altogether.

Mr. MARA. That is during nine years.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, but it is all those who left the school, and many of them have died. Once in a while one went away and got married and is doing well, but a great many have died since they left the institution.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Does the hon. gentleman infer from that that the religious education was thrown away?

Mr. MARTIN. No, but what is the object of educating these children, if it costs their lives to educate them? It is not worth while spending $233,000 for the purpose of killing them. It is suggested that the system of management of the Department of Indian Affairs has the effect of killing off the Indians. No doubt at all Indians are decreasing in numbers. I just draw attention to that. I may say with regard to the general question that I agree with those who have spoken before as to the impropriety of the Government getting this work done by denominations. I do not discuss it from the standpoint of expediency, as was done by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Mara). From my standpoint, it makes no difference whether it is cheaper or better for the Government to employ religious denominations to do this work. I claim that it is wrong as a matter of principle for the Government of Canada to interfere at all as between denominations in the question of education. So far as they give money towards the education either of white children or of Indian children, it should be given entirely irrespective of denominations. It was suggested by one hon. gentleman that there would be trouble between the different denominations as to the distribution of this Government patronage; well, I believe from what I have read and learned of this matter, that that observation need not be directed to the future, but it can be directed to the past and to the present. I say there has been a great deal of hard feeling and a great deal of trouble amongst the various denominations as to the amount of money that this and that denomination is getting.

Mr. DALY. Where?

Mr. MARTIN. Amongst the denominations.

Mr. DALY. Where does this trouble occur?

Mr. MARTIN. I have seen discussions at synods about this matter.

Mr. DALY. That is news to us.

Mr. MARTIN. I have seen it in newspapers. Of course, they may not be correct.

Mr. SCRIVER. Perhaps the hon. Minister does not read reports of synods, and that kind of literature.

Mr. DALY. I think I read a little more than the hon gentleman's friends do.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, I happened to read this.

Mr. DALY. That is probably the only time you ever read anything of the kind?

Mr. MARTIN. I am not going to blow my trumpet in that respect.

Mr. DALY. The only reason I interrupted the hon. gentleman was that we have never heard of it in the department.

Mr. MARTIN. I say that the Government should have nothing to do with this question as between different denominations. The reports of the industrial schools for the Indians show that these schools have not turned out a very large number of good citizens, because so many have died. I say that if we are going to spend money in educating these Indian children, the Government should do it themselves and do it independently of the denominations. That is the only ground upon which Government education of Indian children can be defended. The Government has no right whatever to hand over the public money to this or that denomination. If it be true, as I saw some statement to that effect, that the Baptist denomination have refused to accept Government money for this purpose, then I honour them for it, because that is the principle which, it seems to me, should rule in these matters. We have in Canada entire separation between Church and State, and the moment grants of this kind are made, you bring back to a certain extent connection between Church and State, which is a principle we have refused to adopt heretofore.

Sir JAMES GRANT. I have listened for some little time this evening to the discussion of this subject of schools in the North-west Territories. A few years ago I had the pleasure of making a visit to that country and seeing the operation of these various schools, and I can assure you that I was never more favourably impressed in my life than I was with the admirable manner in which they were conducted. It is all very well to say that they should not be denominational, but having been a member of this House when the late Sir John A. Macdonald inaugurated this system of schools in the North-west Territories, I know that there was then great difficulty in giving any kind of an education to the Indian children in the North-west Territories. These schools were then merely in the initial stage of development, and since that time great good has been accomplished by them. In a new country like that where there are many conflicting interests to consider, it is extremely difficult, under all the circumstances, to manage matters so as to please every one. In listening to the observations of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) it seems to me that nothing the Government has ever done with reference to the control of affairs in the North-west Territories, has been right in the slightest degree. He occupied the attention of this House some days ago in a discussion of the land question, the recklessness that was displayed by the Government in the management of lands in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway; and to-night we would almost infer from his observations that these schools were being conducted in a manner discreditable to this country. I can assure the hon. gentleman that long before he made his appearance here, the affairs of the North-west were well conducted, and it is not for the hon. member for Winnipeg to come down here and lecture us upon everything pertaining to the North-west. We would fancy that he held a censorship over everything that was right or wrong, and that nothing could be properly done with reference to the North-west Territories unless it emanated from the representative for Winnipeg. We know very well he is a man of ability and force of character; but at the same time we know perfectly well that everything he says about the North-west is not gospel. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that the North-west is of great importance to this Dominion. I look upon the North-west as the very thorax of Canada, it is going to mould the destiny of the rest of the Dominion; and when our public men are working well and energetically to forward the interests of that portion of our Dominion, I say it is not right to malign the character of that country, and to express opinions here which would be detrimental not only to the interest of that country, but to that great party which has actually made the North-west what it is to-day. What was the North-west before the time of the late Sir John A. Macdonald, when a measure was introduced into this Parliament to acquire possession of that territory? What has been done since that time? It has been brought from a state of chaos to one in which we have reason to feel proud. And let me say that I know of no subject in reference to which the Government of this country deserves greater credit than in extending the principles of education to the poor Indian, and bringing him from a savage condition to that of refinement and civilization, such as I had evidence of when I visited that country. The manner in which those poor Indians performed the duties and responsibilities with which they were charged on the occasion of the visit of Lord Derby to that country, is creditable in the highest degree to the system of education established among them by the Government. To see addresses presented to the representative of Her Majesty from these poor Indians who hardly knew English a few years ago, is an evidence of the beneficial results of the system of schools established there: These schools, whether sectarian or otherwise, whether Methodist, or English, or Catholic, or whatever they may be, are of a character to show the world at large that the Government is keeping abreast with the progress of the times, in the educational system they have established in the Northwest.

Mr. DEVLIN. I would like to ask the Minister if he thinks these schools could be conducted at less cost to the country, if they were not denominational?

Mr. DALY. No, I am positive it could not be done. They are being conducted now as economically as possible. In fact, the feelings of the inspectors and of every person who has to do with them, is that these different schools, particularly the larger ones, are conducted with an expenditure so small that the results they produce are marvellous.

Mr. DEVLIN. There were one or two points made in the discussion to which I take objection. It would be absurd if I were to keep my seat after a declaration of principle such as has been made by some hon. gentlemen. Of course they are entitled to all the respect that is due to their opinions, just as the opinions I hold, which are different from theirs, are also entitled to the same measure of respect. I would be the very last man in the House to sanction the reckless expenditure of one dollar in connection with the Indian industrial schools in the Northwest. I am not criticising the expenditure that has been made upon them. It is possible that in certain details there are expenditures which could be better controlled, and it may be, as the Minister pointed out, that if these schools were not denominational, they would entail greater cost to the country. But previous to the consideration of this point that was brought out a few moments ago by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), other questions were debated at considerable length. We were treated, for instance, to an exposition of individual opinions on the part of hon. gentlemen as to the advantages that may be derived from purely secular schools. That opens out a very large subject, into which I do not propose entering this evening: but I simply wish to enter my protest, so far as I am concerned against the idea that schools, because they are denominational, cannot be as efficient as schools which are not denominational. I believe, for instance, that our Catholic universities and our Protestant universities, that our Catholic convents and our Protestant ladies' colleges, are just as good and just as efficient, and in them are to be found teachers as skilled and as well trained, as are to be found in schools which are not denominational. I believe that we are living in a country in which the doctrine which was put forth here to-night, will not be accepted by the large majority of the people. We must not forget that we are living in a Christian country, in a country in which it is not held to be a shame to pronounce the name of the Creator, and to teach the child the love, the respect and the reverence that he should have for the Creator. I believe, consequently, that the opinion of this country is in favour of a system known as Christian schools. I am not at this moment referring to Catholic schools, nor am I advocating a system of Protestant schools; but I hold the belief, and I think that belief is shared by the large majority of the people of this country, that it is better that the child should be educated in the love of religion, than that he should obtain all the requisites of a secular education and still have no knowledge of the religion to which his parents may belong. This is a great question to-day in this country. It cannot be denied that this question is provoking more disturbance in Canada than any other question, and it may be just possible that before long, other questions that are considered of vital importance, other questions that are constantly being debated upon the public platform, will sink into insignificance in comparison with this question which to-night has received some attention at the hands of hon. gentlemen in this House. Is it not a known fact, for instance, that those who believe as I do, have in the majority of instances, so far been obliged to suffer? Hon. gentlemen who have things pretty much their own way can naturally give very plausible colour to their opinions, because they know that their inward convictions are sure to triumph. Hon. gentlemen know that perfectly well. I do not, for myself, undertake to say, for instance, that my hon. friends who spoke on this subject a few moments ago, may not be correct. It is quite possible they may be; it is quite possible that those who have so long advocated, and have so earnestly advocated, as I myself earnestly advocated, the maintenance in this country of the system known as separate schools, may be entirely wrong. But whether right or wrong, it is well for hon. gentlemen to know this, that we will cling to the proposition that in Canada where these schools are established, we shall have them, and we shall enjoy them, and if, in order to enjoy those schools, it would be necessary for us to break away from political affiliations, still, animated by the love which we have for those institutions, sooner than sacrifice them, we will sacrifice our political affiliation and the dearest ties that bind us to party. I simply enter my protest against some of the charges which were made here to-night. A great man passed away this morning, a man whose name will be long and reverently remembered in Canada, a man against whom not a word can be said, a man who had strong opinions and who fought for what he believed to be the right of his people. Sir, that man will be long and affectionately remembered by the whole Catholic population of Canada, because he was a champion of this principle in which Catholics fully and firmly believe, the principle of Catholic education. I rose merely for the purpose of saying that I believe the Government is right, since it does support these schools in the North-west, to allow them to be conducted by the religious denominations. The money which is taken for the support of these schools is not taken from one denomination, it is taken from all denominations, and is given back to all denominations. Having adopted this policy, the Government make no distinction in the distribution of the money, they simply give what they have received from all denominations. I think they are carrying out towards the children now living in the North-west the very best principle of education, a principle that I would like to have seen continued in the province of Manitoba, that I would like to see continued in the North-west Territories, that I hope will continue to triumph in Ontario, and that I am sure will continue to exist in the province of Quebec.

Mr. FRASER. Are these Indians farmers?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. FRASER. How many are there? Are they on their own farms, and is it necessary to supply grain to them?

Mr. DALY. Yes; to supply rations to the farmers on different reserves. They are farm instructors, who instruct the Indians in farming.

Sioux..... $4,597

Mr. DALY. There is a decrease of $796 from last year. This sum provides approximately for about a thousand of these Sioux at Bird Tail, Oak River, Oak Lake, Turtle Mountain, Qu'Appelle, Moose Head, Prince Albert and Moose Jaw. They are straggling Sioux from the United States..

Mr. LAURIER. Relics of Sitting Bull's band?

Mr. DALY. Some of them.

Buildings..... $5,953

Mr. LAURIER. What are these buildings?

Mr. DALY. The expenditure will be made in the different agencies for general repairs at Pelly Lake, office building rent at Birtle, general repairs at Crooked Lake, Assiniboine, File Hills, Muscowpetung's, Touchwood Hills, and Duck Lake; in fact, more or less at all the agencies.

General Expenses..... $114,256

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the meaning of a general expenditure charge?

Mr. DEVLIN.

Mr. DALY. That means all the agents, and the Regina office.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How have you been able to reduce it?

Mr. DALY. By the transfer of Mr. Reed, and by the discharge of several of the men that were there. They were necessary at the time they were appointed.

Indians, B. C., salaries..... $19,140

Mr. MARA. Will the hon. Minister explain the reduction of $580 in salaries?

Mr. DALY. The explanation is as follows:—Decrease—Agent's salary, Kamloops and Okanagan, $600; agent's salary, Queen Charlotte's Island (not required), $1,000. Increase—W. McLaughlin, $200; R. E. Loring, salary, $100; assistant clerk at Victoria, $720, making a total decrease of $580.

Mr. MARA. I am informed that the Government has reduced the salary of agents at Kootenay and Cariboo. Is that correct?

Mr. DALY. In regard to the agents at Kootenay and Cariboo, I may say that we have not reduced the salaries. In one case, however, the agent resigned, and in the other case the agent was obliged to resign on account of defective sight. The salaries were $1,200 each. We gave the new appointees $1,000 each. As these officers gain experience, there is a possibility that their salaries will be increased.

Mr. MARA. I must enter my protest against the salaries of these officers being reduced. When appointed they certainly expected to receive the salaries of their predecessors. Caribou and Kootenay are two of the most expensive portions of British Columbia to live in. The agencies are large, the Government require the whole of the time of the men filling those positions; they are good men in every way, and worth more than the salaries paid. It is false economy to attempt to reduce the salaries of good officers, for thereby the Government places itself in the position of being unable to obtain good men if the officers resign.

Relief of Distress..... $5,000

Mr. DALY. The Indians on the coast are exposed to great dangers; they also suffer largely from consumption, and many members of the tribes have become old and feeble, and require increased assistance. The young men are the best workers among the whole Indian tribe, but owing to depression in the lumber trade and the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, they are at present without the employment they formerly obtained, and are compelled to look to the Government for aid.

Seed grain and implements..... $1,200

Mr. MARA. This item is altogether too small; it is an average of 4 cents per Indian. The Indian agents at the different agencies are not able to render that assistance to the Indians they should obtain in the spring of the year by furnishing them with seed grain and sometimes with implements. Apart from that matter, I call the Minister's attention to the late flood in British Columbia, and I ask him to place a considerable sum in the Supplementary Estimates to assist the Indians in purchasing seed grain, that they may be able to secure a crop this year. The Provincial Government are furnishing seed grain to farmers on the banks of the Fraser and in other parts of the province, but they cannot be expected to look after the Indians, who are under the care of the Dominion.

Mr. DALY. So far as the items of seed grain are concerned, the experience last year was that this amount was quite sufficient. In respect to Indians on the Fraser, who have had their crops destroyed this year, an item of $500 will appear in the Supplementary Estimates.

Medical attendance, &c $6,000

Mr. MARA. Upon what plan or principle is medical assistance now given to the Indians? A great many complaints have been made that the Indians have not received that medical attendance they require, and have not been furnished with medicines as in times past.

Mr. DALY. The expenditure for medical attendance in British Columbia, amounted in 1889 to $7,000; 1890, $6,793; 1891, $7,791; 1892, $6,800; 1893, $11,044; 1894, $12,214. I think the hon. gentleman will come to the conclusion that a considerable sum has been spent for medical attendance; in fact, if he had as much difficulty with British Columbia medical bills as I have with the Finance Minister, he would see that we were spending every dollar possible. The reason for the increase is the small-pox epidemic, which broke out, necessitating a largely increased expenditure. But we have had difficulty with the medical men there, because we have considered that the charges made by them were outrageous, and when we wanted to pay them what we pay the medical officers in the North-west, who were just as far removed from the reserves, the physicians complained. So far as the Indians are concerned, it is not the fault of the department if they do not get the treatment provided for them. It must be remembered that there are 945 Indian reserves in British Columbia, scattered over an immense territory; but all the Indians within reach of physicians get medical attendance, and all the agencies are provided with medicines. The department is doing its best under the circumstances to provide all the medical attendance possible.

Mr. MARA. I wish to repeat that the Indians in British Columbia are not receiving the medical attendance or assistance to which they are entitled, and they are not able to procure medicines as they should be able to obtain them. I am informed that by a rule of the department an Indian can only get medicine on an order from the Indian agent. The Indian may live one or two hundred miles from an Indian agent, and he has to travel that distance to get an order to procure medicine. That is not a right system. I believe there are a great many bills from doctors and druggists standing over from last year, and the consequence is that many druggists will not fill orders for Indians from the Indian agent, because they do not know when they will get paid.

Militia—Pay of staff, permanent corps and active Militia including allowances..... $585,782

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Perhaps the hon. Minister of Militia would make a general statement with regard to his proposed policy and expenditure.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I want to reduce that item to $482,282, a reduction of $103,500 on that item. In view of the fact that I have considerable additional expense thrown on my department this year by the purchase of new rifles, it has been decided that we will not have any camps of instruction this year. The camps of instruction during the months of June in Ontario were abandoned, and there will be no camps this autumn in the other provinces.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) None this summer at all?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). None until next June. We cannot have both camps and rifles, and the militia would rather get the rifles and go without the camps for one season. We cannot have both unless the House is willing to give me a larger amount of money than I would feel justified in asking.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will that only save the difference between the amount in the Estimate, and the amount you substitute for it?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). It will save other amounts under items 102 and 103, provision, supplies and remounts and transport and freight. This will not apply to the artillery or cavalry, who are being drilled at their company's headquarters. Wherever they can be drilled at their company headquarters they will be drilled, but there will be no camps.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How much will it cost to substitute a new rifle?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). In addition to the 1,000 stand of arms for which we supplied the money last year, I have entered into an arrangement with the Imperial Government for the purchase of 8,000 stand of rifles, and I am spreading the payments over three years. I am having 5,000 Martini-Henrys converted into Martini-Netfords, and that will be done also by the Imperial Government.

Mr. SCRIVER. Is it the intention not to have any camp of instructions for the rural battalions of the province of Quebec this year?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). None.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What will the cost of substituting the new rifle be?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). $16,500 were expended last year for 1,000 stand of arms. I have an agreement with the Imperial Government for 8,000 stand of Martini-Metfords with bayonets complete at £3 3s. sterling each, amounting to £25,000 sterling, or $122,640. I have entered into an agreement for spreading this payment over three years: $47,750 this year, the same next year, and $31,140 the following year. Of course there will be additional cost for transport and freight, arm chests, &c., which will make it this year $49,537. The conversion of the Martini-Henrys, 5,000 stand, will come to about $58,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) So that all the saving on the camps of instruction is eaten up?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). No, the entire saving on that will be $159,800.

Mr. SCRIVER. Has it been decided what distribution is to be made of these new rifles when they are received?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). That has not been considered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Do I understand that there are to be no camps of instruction at all throughout the Dominion this year?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). No; except at company headquarters. For instance, the artillery would suffer more than any other branch of the service. They would become disorganized if they had not camps. The artillery corps and the city battalions are having instruction at headquarters.

Mr. FLINT. What is to be done with the old abandoned rifles in store?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). That I cannot say at present. We will collect them from wherever they are not wanted. I have been lending them to rifle associations under bonds to be cared for and to be returned when demanded.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Inasmuch as we are paying out of this year's grant one-third of the cost of the 8,000 rifles which the hon. gentleman is purchasing in England, he will either have to continue the system of not having camps of instruction, or he will have to ask the House for an increased grant of some $50,000.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). At present there are other charges on the department which like this are not of a permanent character. For instance, we have the charges in connection with the defences at Esquimaux, which are also spread over three years. Perhaps the buoyancy of the revenue may be such next year as to enable us to continue the ordinary camps of instruction, and also to pay for the guns.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But in the meantime the hon. gentleman will have to have $50,000.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Yes.

Modern Fire-arms..... $16,500

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). This is only a part of what I require. I shall require in a supplementary estimate to ask for $33,000 more to cover the purchase of these arms in England.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I thought the hon. gentleman was saving that?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Yes; but I shall have to have the money voted. I am reducing these other items.

Provisions, supplies and remounts.. $179,600

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I wish to reduce that amount to $150,500.

Mr. LAURIER. That decrease requires explanation.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). These reductions are made owing to our not having the rural camps.

Grants in aid of Artillery and Rifle Associations and Bands and Military Institutes..... $36,800

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would suggest to my hon. friend, particularly if he is not going to have camp instructions, that he might very reasonably make a moderate allowance to the various rifle associations in the shape of ammunition, either gratuitously or at a very low rate. I think the department does grant it at a reduced rate, but not at so low a rate as to encourage practice. I know that a great many of the privates and non-commissioned officers who practise complain of a good deal of the expense to which they are put for the purchase of ammunition.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I have done that during the past year to a greater extent than before; but I will accept my hon. friend's suggestion, and make provision for that in the Supplementary Estimates.

Monuments for Battlefields of Canada. $2,000

Mr. LAURIER. What has the hon. gentleman to say of these monuments? Are they decided upon?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I have had plans prepared and estimates furnished by one of the architects of the Department of Public Works, and I find that no monument worthy of the name can be obtained for this amount, and I intend to ask the House later, when I will make a full explanation, for a larger amount. I hope to go on this year with at least two of the monuments.

Gratuities to officers of the active militia staff who are to be placed on the retired list..... $12,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman had better inform us as to whom he proposes to retire.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I am not in a position to tell my hon. friend what changes the general wishes to make on the staff, or whom he wishes to suggest should be retired. A similar sum was voted last year, and the officers who were retired on account of old age or incapacity were allowed a moderate gratuity.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have no doubt that my hon. friend will do what is fair and just in these cases. There is no doubt that some of the gentlemen who were retired were subjected to considerable hardship. I think that when the department requires to dispense with the services of these officers, it should deal reasonably liberally with them. I believe, however, that my hon. friend has an item in the Supplementary Estimates intended to provide for that, and if I am correct in that understanding, I will not raise the question further.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I have not an item in the Supplementary Estimates, but am paying an additional sum to two deputy adjutant-generals, who were retired at an amount lower than I thought they were entitled to, and an Order in Council has been passed giving them an additional gratuity. I refer to Colonel Villiers and Colonel Van Straubenzee.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Would the hon. gentleman explain whether he has arrived at any conclusion with reference to the district of Prince Edward Island?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). With the consent of the Governor General in Council, Prince Edward Island is established as an independent military district. We intend to appoint a deputy adjutant-general for the district. We have restored the paymaster, Major Doherty, to his position, and intend to try and have, if possible, a detachment of the permanent corps of artillery stationed at Charlottetown.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has the hon. gentleman made up his mind as to the appointment of a deputy adjutant-general?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). There has been a great effort made on the part of our political friends to appoint a gentleman a resident of the island. The military authorities are opposed to that, and desire that an experienced military man be sent there. As it is not really a political appointment, but for the greater efficiency of the troops on the island, it is a matter for serious consideration. I have not finally decided, and have not as yet made any recommendation to His Excellency the Governor General in Council.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We will not know until the House rises.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). If I am at liberty, I will communicate to my hon. friend before he leaves for home, if I can get the consent of the Governor General in Council.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not personally interested in receiving the information, but a very large number of gentlemen seem to take the deepest interest in the appointment, and if the hon. gentleman will communicate with the island and let them know who is appointed he will confer a great favour on them.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). We will try and send you some one who will be an acquisition to the island.

Expenses in connection with the distribution of Parliamentary documents..... $1,000

Mr. LAURIER. In whose charge is the distribution of these documents? Last year we did not receive the 'Hansard' until September, though the session was prorogued in April.

Mr. COSTIGAN. This has nothing to do with the distribution of 'Hansard,' but Mr. Dawson will be very glad to have had his attention drawn to the delay by the hon. gentleman, and will give an explanation.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Dawson is very attentive, I know; but it was certainly very late after the close of the session when we got the 'Hansard.'

Mr. MARTIN. What documents does this cover?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Queen's Printer explains that this is to cover the distribution of everything outside the session, except what Mr. Botterell distributes.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman agree to rise now?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I was in hopes that we could get through the miscellaneous items. We could finish then in a few minutes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I believe it was the general desire that we should rise early, and I am satisfied the hon. gentleman would facilitate business by yielding to that desire. We arranged that we should adjourn at the close of the Militia Estimates.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman has done very well to-day.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 148)—(from the Senate)—for the relief of James St. George Dillon—(on division).—(Mr. Sutherland.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 25th June, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPRESENTATION FOR WEST HASTINGS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that Henry Corby, Esq., member for the electoral district of West Hastings, having resigned his seat in this House, I have issued my warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 71) to incorporate the New York New England and Canada Company.—(Mr. Flint.)

Bill (No. 131) to incorporate the Nova Scotia Steel Company.—(Mr. Fraser.)

Bill (No. 109) for the relief of Joshua Nicholas Filman—(on division).—Mr. McKay.)

Bill (No. 119) for the relief of William Samuel Piper—(on division).—Mr. Northrup.)

Bill (No. 120) for the relief of Joseph Thompson—(on division).—Mr. Northrup.)

Bill (No. 136) for the relief of Orlando George Richmond Johnson—(on division).—(Mr. Metcalfe.)

CALGARY IRRIGATION COMPANY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Davis (Alberta) :

That the amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 53) respecting the Calgary Irrigation Company, be concurred in.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) One of these amendments is of such a character that it should not receive the assent of this House. The second section of the Bill provides for increase in the capital stock, and it says :

Mr. LAURIER.

2. Section four of the Act incorporating the company, being chapter seventy-one of the Statutes of 1893, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the words: " provided, however, that the directors may, so soon as the said amount has been subscribed, increase the capital by by-law to a sum not exceeding two hundred thousand dollars."

When the Bill passed through committee of this House it was amended so as to provide that at least a payment of 50 per cent should be made, which is a very moderate sum indeed, before the capital stock could be increased by the directors. It would be very unwise for this House to lay down a precedent that any company having its capital stock subscribed, should be able to increase it by vote of the directors after one fourth only of that subscribed stock is paid up. I consider that such legislation would be unwise, as tending to speculation and inflation. I, therefore, move :

That this House do disagree to the amendment of the Senate to the second section of the Act respecting the Calgary Irrigation Co. reducing the amount required to be paid on the subscribed capital, before the capital of the company can be increased from 50 to 25 per cent, because it is not right to permit the capital stock of a company to be increased by the directors thereof while 75 per cent of the existing capital is unpaid, and because such increase is calculated to promote unwise inflation and speculation and offers a bad precedent for future legislation.

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta). On behalf of the promoter I desire to say that I am quite willing that this motion should be adopted and that the payment should be 50 per cent.

Motion agreed to.

YAMASKA RIVER DAM.

Mr. MIGNAULT asked, Whether the Government are aware that at the time of the breaking of the dam constructed by the Government in the Yamaska River, one of the piers of the said dam was carried into the channel by the ice, in the spring of 1892, and has obstructed it ever since, and rendered the navigation dangerous at that point? If so, is it the intention of the Government to have the obstacle removed?

Mr. OUMET. The Public Works Department has been informed that pieces of timber coming from the dam in question have become deposited in the channel of the river, and I have given instructions to have them removed.

LUMBER FURNISHED TO THE I. C. R.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, 1. What is the value of the lumber or wood furnished to the Intercolonial Railway by Messrs. Talbot and Parent between the year 1885 and January, 1894, and what is the amount paid to them for the said lumber? 2. What was the quantity of wood or lumber furnished by J. A. Talbot to the Intercolonial Railway between 1892 and 1894? 3. What is the amount received by Messrs. Talbot and Parent, or J. A. Talbot, for completing a contract for fence building on the Intercolonial Railway, originally awarded to Odilon Mignault, of Amqui? 4. How much was paid to Messrs. Talbot and Parent for sleepers furnished to the Intercolonial Railway by Ignace Lavoie, of Amqui?

Mr. HAGGART. I am unable to answer this question to-day, and it will take the officers of the Intercolonial Railway some little time to prepare the information so as to enable me to answer the question fully. But I find that Messrs. Talbot and Parent were in partnership in connection with the delivery of timber to the Intercolonial Railway, and they evidently had a disagreement in the settlement of their affairs. Mr. Parent has applied to the general manager of the Intercolonial Railway for such a statement as is now asked for by the hon. gentleman, which has been refused.

EXCISE PROVISIONS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the House, to-morrow, resolve itself into committee to consider the following resolution:—

That the Department of Inland Revenue may, under regulations made for that purpose, allow on the exportation of goods which have been manufactured from articles subject to a duty of excise, and on which such duty of excise has been paid, a drawback equal to the duty so paid, with such deduction therefrom as is provided in such regulations.

That the Department of Inland Revenue may, under regulations made in that behalf, allow on the destruction, under excise supervision, of goods subject to a duty of excise and upon which such duty has been paid, a drawback equal to the duty so paid thereon, with such deduction therefrom as is provided in such regulations.

Motion agreed to.

SUPREME COURT JUDGES.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the House, to-morrow, resolve itself into committee to consider the following resolution:—

That if any judge has held the office of judge of the Supreme Court of Canada for fifteen years, or the said office and that of judge of the Exchequer Court, or the said office and that of judge of one or more of the superior courts or of the courts of vice-admiralty in any of the provinces of Canada, for periods amounting together to fifteen years or upwards, and if such judge has attained the age of seventy years and resigns his office, he shall during the remainder of his life continue to receive his full salary, which shall be payable to him in the same manner as it was payable at the time of his resignation; provided, however, that nothing here-in shall apply to a judge who has held the office of judge of the Supreme Court of Canada for a period less than five years.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT.

Mr. DALY moved that the Order for second reading of Bill (No. 133) to amend the Act respecting the North-west Territories, be discharged.

Motion agreed to, and Order discharged.

Mr. DALY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 149) further respecting the North-west Territories.

Mr. LAURIER. What is the reason for this?

Mr. DALY. The Bill I have just introduced is similar to the other Bill, except that clause 12 of that Bill is struck out, because clause 12 of the old Bill conflicts with clause 14, as the hon. gentleman will see upon perusal. Clause 1 of the new Bill provides that the Assembly of the North-west Territories may incorporate tramway and street railway companies which they have not the power to do at the present time. Section 15 of the North-west Territories Act is repealed. The Act as it now stands gives the Lieutenant-Governor in Council power to make ordinances respecting the administration of justice. They have already got that power and have passed ordinances in respect to it, so that there is no necessity for its forming part of this Bill. Section 49 is amended by striking out the word "any." The Act as it now stands contains the words "and any three judges of the court shall constitute the court," and it is proposed to make it read: "and three judges of the court shall form the court." Section 50 of the Act is repealed and amended by adding "provided that the judge by or before whom the judgment or decision then in question was rendered or made, shall not sit as one of the judges composing the court." That means that the trial judge whose judgment is appealed against shall not sit en banc. Section 59 is repealed and a section substituted for it: That each sheriff shall be paid a salary of $500, and the Lieutenant-Governor, by and with the advice of the Legislative Assembly, may legislate with respect to remuneration by fees or otherwise by sheriffs and clerks, including the registry court. The change is: That the Lieutenant-Governor now fixes the fees and this Act will give power to the Assembly to do that. The clause of the Bill in relation to the appointment of justices of the peace and police magistrates as it appears in the old Bill will be amended by adding to subsection 4 the following words: "or unless he is a magistrate of not less than three years' standing in Canada." This means that no person shall be appointed a police magistrate unless he has been admitted to practice as advocate, barrister or solicitor in any one of the provinces of Canada for a period not less than three years, or unless he is a magistrate of not less than three years' standing. Section 9 provides that any one charged with treason, or an offence punishable with more than five years' imprisonment, may challenge peremptorily; as the Act now stands it is only in cases of felony and treason that there is a peremptory challenge.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You extend it to what?

Mr. DALY. To treason and felony and acts punishable by imprisonment for more than five years. Section 21 of the new Bill provides that the Legislative Assembly shall have power to confer upon territorial courts jurisdiction as to matters of alimony; a question having arisen as to their power to do that. By section 22 the Lieutenant-Governor, with the consent of the Governor in Council, may close up any road that is transferred to the Territories or vary its direction. That is the law in a separate Act, but we are introducing it into the North-west Territories Act, and providing that the Lieutenant-Governor may with the consent of the Governor in Council, do in this respect what the Assembly now does. As the law now stands a great deal of delay is occasioned by requiring the assent of the Assembly. These are all the changes.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES, QUEBEC.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of resolution (p. 4818) respecting certain railway subsidies to the province of Quebec.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There was a question raised by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who is not in his place to-day, as to whether this amount, which was assumed as a liability of the Government some years ago, appears in the statement of the Dominion liabilities in the Public Accounts. On looking over the schedules we have been unable to discover where this liability is embraced, or whether, indeed, it is put in as a liability of the Government at all. I would like to ask the hon. First Minister if it is embraced in the statements of our liabilities, and if so, in what column?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The capital sum which the interest would represent never appeared as one of our liabilities. It was treated ever since the passage of the Act as an annual charge on the Budget.

Mr. DALY.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) So that our public debt is larger by a couple of millions or more than it appears.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think so.

Resolution read the second time and concurred in.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 150) respecting certain subsidies to the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE COMMON SCHOOL FUND.

Resolution (p. 4719) respecting the distribution of the Common School Fund, was read the first and second times, and concurred in.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 151) respecting the Common School Fund.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LAND GRANTS TO THE MILITIA.

Bill (No. 54) to make further provision respecting the granting of land to members of the force on active service in the North-west, was read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DALY. There are a few military bounty warrants out now, which people seek to apply to unsurveyed land, and until the land is surveyed they will not be able to make entry for it. We have been extending the time, and this Bill is to extend it further to 1896, which will be a finality.

Mr. MARTIN. I am agreeable to the Bill, but it might be an advantage to some of these parties if a clause were added, giving them the right to transfer this privilege.

Mr. DALY. We could not agree to that.

Mr. MARTIN. Any reasons?

Mr. DALY. There are reasons. It is to stop speculation. If we were to agree to transfer, there would be no end to it.

Mr. MARTIN. In this case the right is already earned. The right to a homestead may not be of any particular value to many of them, and why should they not have a right to sell?

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman will understand that these military bounty warrants are applied on homesteads, and the holders have to perform the necessary conditions. We do object to giving power of transfer when they apply for it. You can transfer a military bounty warrant. It can be sold by one person to another; and in these cases provided for, no doubt the warrants have changed hands three or four times. The conditions have existed all these years since 1885.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

SEIGNIORY OF SAULT ST. LOUIS.

Bill (No. 97) respecting the seignior of Sault St. Louis, was read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAURIER. I would call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to these words:

The Governor in Council may, on such conditions as he deems expedient, and with the consent of the Iroquois Indians of Caughnawaga, accept from the ceusitaires of the seignior of Sault Saint Louis seventy-five per cent of the arrears of rents due by the said ceusitaires on the eleventh day of November, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-two, as payment in full of the said arrears.

The provision seems right enough if the Indians agree to take 75 per cent. That may be just as good a way as another to dispose of the matter. But I would like to know what is contemplated by the words "on such conditions as deemed expedient"?

Mr. DALY. Those words relate to the mode in which we propose to settle as to whether we will take the money by instalments. We do not propose to be paid the 75 per cent at once. We have already got the consent of the Indians.

Mr. LAURIER. I should imagine that when the creditor knocks off a certain amount, you would pay him cash. If you extend the payment over years, you have the same difficulties to go over again.

Mr. DALY. The majority are in a position to pay, they have cash. It is proposed not to extend the time longer than two or three months after the Bill passes.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

JUVENILE OFFENDERS, N. B.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 144) to amend the Act relating to the custody of juvenile offenders in the province of New Brunswick. He said: Owing to the benefactions of Lady Tilley and a number of other charitable persons in New Brunswick, at her instance, the penitentiary property which was formerly occupied as a provincial penitentiary has been fitted up as a reformatory for juvenile offenders, and the New Brunswick Government has aided the scheme to some extent. The Dominion Government has agreed to lease the property for that purpose, and this is to give the railway requisite authority to have young persons conveyed from the penitentiary to that reformatory.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION ACT.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 37) further to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act.

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We discussed this change on the resolution, but I may say briefly that there is no change in the administration of the law since 1867, but this is practically to remove doubts in reference to certain classes of vessels which, under the Act, are exempt from the requirements of the Act, except as regards their boilers and machinery, so as to make them still liable, as was always intended, and is still held, to the fees for the inspection.

On section 3,

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In discussing another Bill, it was understood by the committee that I should introduce a clause amending the Steamboat Inspection Act so as to make it correspond with the Act respecting the safety of ships, therefore, I propose that section 4 of Bill (No. 98) respecting the safety of ships be introduced.

Amendment agreed to.

On motion to report the Bill, as amended,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I suppose that no suits are pending?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. None whatever.

Bill reported, as amended, and read the third time and passed.

CERTIFICATES OF MASTERS AND MATES.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 130) further to amend the Act respecting certificates of masters and mates of ships.

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I may state now shortly what this Bill proposes. It provides for an extension of the certificates that are granted so as to enable vessels to coast between Canada and the ports practically down and up both sides of the American continent to British Columbia. At present they can go down to the West Indies and thence all the way round to British Columbia. This is an anomalous position. Although there are several sections here, we simply repeal all the old sections, then introduce a definition of "West Indies," substantially as in the Safety of Ships Act, adopting the Admiralty definition, and South America we define according to the same standard for the sake of uniformity. We go on and amend all the sections to correspond. The next substantial change also is a relaxation of the rules. Under the law as at present, only those who have been domiciled in Canada for three years, even as British subjects, can take part in the examination. I know of one case of an Englishman who wished to take out his certificate under this Act, but was not allowed to submit himself for examination because he had not been domiciled in Canada the required length of time. He had to go to England and get a Board of Trade certificate, which, of course, entitled him to take command of a Canadian ship in Canada. These are the only substantial changes, except that in the last section, which we considered in committee the other day—an increase of fees for certificates in consequence of the diminution of funds for the board of examiners.

On section 3,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Any person not a British subject must be domiciled for at least three years?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is the law now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You only relieve the candidate from disability so far as being a British subject is concerned?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is all.

Bill reported, and read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY—THE CATTLE TRADE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MULOCK. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the attention of the House for a few moments while I refer to a matter that has already received a good deal of attention at the hands of the House and the country—I refer to the cattle question. Of course, I cannot refer, on this motion, to the Bill that I introduced on the 20th March last, dealing with the matter, and if by accident I should do so, I hope. Mr. Speaker, you will be considerate, inasmuch as the matter is one of considerable importance. The Order of the House last Monday having terminated any chance of moving the Bill, and as I have observed from the discussion that the Government contemplate, not absolutely setting their faces against all legislation, but only against my proposed measure, and to make inquiries, I thought perhaps I might be permitted to refer to the question in the abstract, at all events, without reference to any proposed legislation. Now, if you look at the figures of the cattle trade, I think the House must come to the conclusion that public interests and the public welfare would seriously suffer if this trade were destroyed. The trade in live cattle with Great Britain within the last few years has assumed national importance, and its destruction must affect the national welfare. If we proposed to ignore any cause that destroyed, we will say, the products of the mines, the whole country would unanimously say that if any legislation could prevent such a disaster, such legislation should be forthcoming; and yet the products of the mines have not brought back to Canada within the last four years, within eight million dollars what has been brought back to Canada by the cattle trade. I dare say the statistics I have referred to, if extended prior to 1890, would show similar results. But I am only taking the figures for the years 1890, 1891, 1892 and 1893. During the last four years the gross amount of manufactures of Canada exported was $25,944,284; while the gross value of the cattle exported from Canada to Great Britain during the same period, amounted to $29,874,532; in other words, the live cattle exported brought back to Canada over $3,950,000 more than was brought back to Canada from the sale of manufactured goods. Now, if you were told that the exports of manufactured goods from Canada was in danger, and in all probability would be absolutely terminated, that there would not be a dollar's worth of the manufactures of Canada sold abroad unless legislation intervened, public opinion would demand such legislation, and I have no doubt that a response would be found in the Parliament of Canada. When, therefore, I show that the magnitude of the trade exceeds that of the mines, and also that of manufactured goods, not both together, but separately, and show that within four years it has been within five millions of the value of our fisheries, surely the trade itself is one of sufficient national importance to demand the best attention and consideration of Parliament. It is one of such far-reaching consequence that I am satisfied that it demands legislation, if it is in the slightest degree in danger of destruction. It is not as if the farmers could now abandon the production of cattle and turn their attention to some other branch of husbandry. The time was when their principal efforts were the production and sale of grain, but we know what has become of that trade. We know how countries able to produce grain more cheaply entered into keen competition, so that our farmers had to change their method and turn their attention to the production of something in respect to which they occupied a specially favourable position, and that was the production of live stock and the products of live stock, such as cheese, butter, &c. It is impossible to satisfactorily carry on even the dairying industry unless there is a profitable market for live stock. If we treated dairying as the main object, then the sale of live stock becomes as it were a by-product to that industry. It will not do to say the trade in live stock is of no consequence, and that the farmers can still change their methods and give their attention solely to the products of live stock, because the time comes sooner or later, when all the cattle have to go to the shambles, either here or abroad. So, however you look at the matter the farmers are driven to the last ditch. Grain growing is a thing of the past, and the only remaining industry is the production of live stock, with a view to selling it or the products of live stock. The trade in horses is practically a thing of the past. We have lost the American market, and while it is said there is a valuable market in Great Britain for certain classes of horses, it does not happen that we have the horses to any great extent to meet such a demand as exists in England. So that the cattle trade is one that directly and indirectly affects to a very large extent the Canadian farmer to-day, and whilst the matter has received much attention at the hands of the House this session, it has not received more than it was entitled to, nor do I think quite all that attention to which it was entitled. The fact that the public feel interested in the measure has been sufficiently verified, for almost since the session opened we have had daily recurring the presentation of petitions coming from all parts of Canada, asking for legislation to deal with the evil referred to in the measure I submitted to the House. It, therefore, cannot be said that the measure is not one of national importance, and it cannot be that there is no evil existing, because we have evidence of it in the Journals of the House during almost every day of the last three months. What are those evils? Hon. gentlemen are aware that there can be no live cattle sent to England now, except through a Canadian port. If it was proposed to send them through an American port, Canadian cattle would be subjected to quarantine regulations in the United States for a period of 90 days, the same regulation being imposed as regards American cattle entering Canada. I find no fault with the American regulation, for it is a counterpart of our own, but I merely mention it to show that there is really only one avenue by which cattle from the Rocky Mountains can reach here to Europe, and that is through a Canadian port, which practically is Montreal. It is true there are other ports, but it is equally true that the vessels which ply between these ports and Great Britain are under the same control as those which at the present time have carried on the trade principally from the port of Montreal. It might be argued that the law of supply and demand would regulate this question, and I myself being in favour of free trade as nearly as we can obtain it, would, in the abstract, concur in the argument that the law of supply and demand should be allowed to regulate this as all other matters. But if artificial means are adopted to prevent the law of supply and demand applying, and if those artificial means are such as to make the application of that principle impossible, then the time arrives for Parliament to intervene, and, as nearly as possible, apply the principle of supply and demand, and overcome the selfishness and greed of those who endeavour to prevent the application of that principle. Therefore if we cannot ascertain at Montreal the cost of carrying Canadian cattle to British ports on account of interference between supply and demand, we will be able to find the true value as a result of the application of the principle of supply and demand in adjacent ports, and transfer that rate and make it apply to the trade as conducted between our own port and foreign ports. It has been charged by the Dominion Live Stock Association, and it has not been contradicted, that the Canadian vessel companies carrying on business from Montreal have, for several years, entered into a combination whereby they exact excessive rates for Canadian cattle. There are five lines of steamers engaged in the cattle trade (there may be an odd tramp or two besides) namely, Allan, Donaldson, Dominion, Beaver, and Hansa. Some of the lines have, during the period, received subsidies from the Dominion Government for carrying the Dominion mails. Those subsidies, during the four years to which I allude, aggregated at least half a million dollars. Certainly, to that extent, to the extent of our patronage, the lines should show fair dealing towards the Canadian people, but I do not rest our contention on any such incidental or accidental circumstance as that. The Dominion Live Stock Association presented to the public in the early part of April a statement, a manifesto it has been called, which has been published throughout the country, and appeared in every journal of importance. It has, therefore, been brought before the attention of the vessel owners, and I think I am correct in saying that, up to the present time, no persons interested in the carrying trade have ventured to contradict any of the charges contained in the document. I have here a copy of the document. For two months it has remained uncontradicted, the only recognition of it, so far as we can see, being that for the time being the combination has collapsed, or has suspended operations, to resume them when opportunity arises. I remind the House of that possibility, because it may be argued that no legislation is now needed, inasmuch as the companies have improved their methods; but inasmuch as they have maintained their combination, not only during the four years in question, but many years anterior to that date, it is not safe to run the risk of leaving the cattle trade, even for a comparatively short period, at the mercy of the steamship companies, which, in this respect, have such a very bad record. Now, I think it is fair that we should take as correct, statements which are admitted by the steamship companies to be correct. What are the charges which the men engaged in the cattle trade make against the combination of vessel representatives? The Dominion Live Stock Association, speaking of the representatives of the steamship lines, assert:

They have their agents in England cabling over constantly, as to the prices of cattle. If it goes up, they put up the freight rates, including rates for cattle already on board.

Where does the freedom of contract come in here? Exporters have large numbers of cattle at the port of Montreal—practically the only Canadian port from which they can be exported—these cattle are in the stock-yards or on the cars awaiting shipment; and the only possible way by which these animals can be marketed is to send them by the vessels, all of which are in the combination, and which follow the practice that is here charged against them. Where, I ask, is there any freedom of contract under circumstances like these? The theory as to fair and free contract is, that both parties should be free to submit or not to submit to its terms if they choose; but in this case there is no freedom whatever, because the cattle trade is entirely at the mercy of the carrying trade. If this statement is true, and it is not contradicted, and we must accept it as correct, it shows what greed will accomplish. The Dominion Live Stock Association goes on to say:

Each line has its representative at Montreal, and what is easier than for these representatives to meet weekly or oftener, and combine as to, cattle rates. They have their agents in England cabling them constantly as to the price of cattle. If it goes up, they put up the freight rates, including rates for cattle already on board. If the price falls, rates do not come down in proportion. If there is a large quantity of cattle at Montreal, the vessel men combine to exact excessive rates.

If the markets improve and shippers want to ship in time to take advantage of such improvements, up go the rates. In fact, every state of the market or exigency of the cattle trade seems to be taken advantage of by the vessel men to levy excessive rates. Buyers cannot ascertain before buying what the rates will be.

Thus with a well-grounded fear of being charged excessive rates, they have to buy in ignorance of what the vessel men will charge to carry the cattle to market.

Mr. MULOCK.

The rate may be $7 a head, or it may be $17.50. This uncertainty alone makes cattle buying extremely hazardous, to the great prejudice, in some cases, of the farmer who sells, in others, of the buyer. Why should a legitimate industry be reduced to the level of gambling?

Buyers, who in buying have not reckoned on a sudden squeeze by the vessel men, have lost heavily, some even being ruined or driven out of the trade. In any event this very element of uncertainty renders it extremely difficult for the buyers to know what they may safely offer for cattle. As a rule, shippers do not know what the rates are to be, until the cattle have been purchased, brought to Montreal, and loaded, and the vessel is ready to sail.

In some cases the rate is fixed after the ship has sailed with the cattle on board. In securing space, the shippers at times have to agree to pay whatever are the going rates. This means whatever the agents of the vessel owners combine upon, when the shippers are in their power.

In these and other ways the whole export cattle trade of Canada is now being paralyzed by one of the hugest combinations in Canada.

The first principle of a contract is that both parties to it are free to assent or not to assent to its terms. Here we have two interests, the cattle industry and the vessel industry, the latter dictating terms to which the former must submit. It is powerless to resist, for no other route is open, and the principal steamship lines coming to Montreal and engaged in cattle trade being subsidized by the Government and enjoying other advantages are practically able to keep other vessels, except an occasional tramp steamer, off this route. Thus the conditions render this monopoly possible, and it exists, and is exercising its arbitrary powers most tyrannically.

With practically no competition in rates from Montreal, our cattle carried from Montreal at excessive rates are landed at Liverpool, on the same dock, by the side of American cattle carried at competitive rates from Boston, New York, &c.

Both bring the same price in the English market, but the American farmer was paid more for his cattle than was the Canadian farmer, because of the lower rates. Thus shipping cattle are worth more in the Buffalo than in the Toronto market.

It now remains for the Canadian people to determine whether this condition of affairs shall be allowed to continue. Shall steamship lines, some of them largely subsidized by the Canadian Government, and all enjoying the advantages of Canadian ports, harbours and waterways, upon which millions of Canadian money have been expended, be allowed of their own arbitrary motion to exact just such rates as they choose from the products of this Canadian industry? or shall Parliament be called upon to intervene, as it has done in the case of railways and other powerful organizations, to protect the people from oppression?

In the unequal contest, the cattle dealers have struggled in vain against the powerful vessel combination but are unable to break it.

They now bring the matter before the public.

It directly concerns the Canadian farmer. If he is to be paid the fair value of his cattle it must be possible to market them at reasonable rates, in fact as cheaply as his American rival does.

But this question concerns more the Canadian farmer. The farmer in old Canada especially is being obliged to change his mode of farming by feeding his grain instead of selling it. If the market for his cattle is destroyed what becomes of his industry?

Now, Sir, these are charges made by men engaged in the cattle trade, who know what they are talking about. One of these is the president of the Dominion Live Stock Association.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is his name?

Mr. MULOCK. T. O. Robson. The next who signs his name to these charges is Thos. Crawford, vice-president of the association, and it is also signed by Henry Bracken, John Dunn and A. J. Thompson. All of these gentlemen are, or have been engaged at one time or another in this trade. It would not, perhaps, be fair to charge that all the decline in the cattle trade is due to these practices of the vessel representatives; but from what those engaged in the trade have stated, I think it is fair to assume that the practices of the vessel representatives have had a very great deal to do with the decline, and I think I can very accurately remember a statement made by one of these gentlemen, when he was laying the grievances of the trade before the Government a short time ago. The First Minister will, perhaps, remember what I am about to refer to and will correct me if I am wrong. One of these gentlemen said somewhat as follows:—"Sir John, I may tell you, that I speak as a long life supporter of your party. I have been engaged in the cattle trade for many years, carrying on business largely in the city of Toronto, which was my headquarters for some years, but owing to the practices of the vessel owners I saw my colleagues in the trade ruined, and many of them who are not ruined abandoning the trade for fear of losing what was left to them, and I determined before I lost all my money to cease to be a buyer and shipper to England of Canadian cattle, so long as we buyers are at the mercy of the carrying trade. He further said: I have been obliged to transfer my buying and selling operations across the line to Chicago, where I can get competitive rates which I cannot get in Canada. My home is in Canada, my interest is in Canada, my people are living in Canada, but I am compelled to transfer my business to the States, because I refuse to imperil the rest of my fortune in the Canadian cattle trade until this state of affairs is put an end to. And he said further: Unless this is put an end to, I prophesy that in five years, the export of live cattle to England from Canada will be a thing of the past. That, Mr. Speaker, is the language of a man who knew what he was speaking about, a man who was well versed in the whole question, and who has suffered in connection with the Canadian trade. Now,

Sir, if that is reliable evidence, and there is no doubt that it is, we must not stand idle and fold our arms and wait until this valuable trade is destroyed. Feeling the importance of this matter, when I introduced the Bill, I was extremely solicitous that coming from a member of the Opposition, no circumstances should arise which would in the slightest degree prejudice a fair consideration of the measure and I was anxious that it should bring from the House the best opinions of the members from all sides, so that the case might be impartially dealt with without reference to party, but wholly in the interests of the trade, which I deem to be the interests of the country. For that reason, at the introduction of the Bill, and from every stage until now, and now as well, I have assumed the attitude of asking the House—the Government, of course, specially—to regard the measure and my attitude upon it as simply in the interests of the trade, and not to allow the slightest degree of partyism to intervene, which might, if introduced, prevent a proper solution of the question being arrived at. I hope that in dealing with the question in the future, it may be viewed from that non-party standpoint, and if so, I feel confident that in some way or other we will arrive at a proper solution. I know that it is customary when there is an effort to destroy a measure, to attract attention to some weak feature and to condemn a desirable movement by alluding to some immaterial incident connected with it. For example, it might be possible, if there were any members in this House so disposed, as I hope there are not, to create a prejudice against the granting of relief by pointing out objections to the measure which I had the honour to introduce. But that is not the way, I submit, in which the matter ought to be dealt with. If my Bill is not sound, if it will not meet the case, let somebody else propose a better method; that is the way to meet the case. I will lay down these propositions: that the facts will show that the trade in question is of national importance, and that its destruction will be productive of national evil. If we admit these two propositions, are we to confess that Parliament is powerless to redress a wrong or prevent an evil of this gigantic character? Or are we to admit that Parliament is able and willing to grant the necessary relief? It has been said that the Bill which I offer is a novel one. I admit that it is a novel one, but novel diseases require novel remedies; and I venture to say that you will not find another case on record of the whole carrying trade of one class of goods in a nation the size of Canada, practically under the control of one man. Therefore, if the proposition I offered was a novel one, I plead as a defence the novelty of the disease. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will not take up the time of the House any longer. The House knows what has happened in the past. I need not point out the practical difficulties in the way of the successful carrying on of the cattle trade. It must be apparent to every hon. member that if the buyers who go out into the country to buy cattle for shipment to England, do not know what it is going to cost to land them in England, they are going to assume everything against the Canadian farmer in making the purchase. They have the argument in their mouths to enable them effectually to reduce the price they offer; and that it is not an unsound argument is shown by the fact that in the United States prices for cattle are higher than in Canada, because the freights from the United States to England, except in the immediate present, are lower than those from Canada, while our farmers are obliged to land their cattle on the docks of Liverpool, Bristol and London in competition with American cattle. The result has been that American farmers have got more per hundred pounds for live cattle in England than Canadian farmers. I am not going to be drawn off the discussion of this general question by the mere circumstance that during a portion of the present season, the rates from American ports have been higher than the rates from Canadian ports. There may be temporary reasons for that. I think the long-continued wrong done to the Canadian cattle trade entirely overcomes any such argument as that. While I rejoice to know that temporarily better treatment is being furnished by the vessel owners at Montreal, yet, in view of the past, I have no great confidence in the permanent conversion of the vessel owners. I have not the slightest doubt that if public opinion is drawn away from this question, and the opportunity again arises, history will repeat itself, and the Canadian cattle trade will again be at the mercy of the vessel owners. For these reasons, while I regret in one sense that my Bill is not likely to be discussed this session, owing to the Government requiring all the remaining days for their own work, I trust that some good may come out of it, if the Government will carry out the pledge given by the First Minister to investigate the question with the view to granting relief. I am sorry that the Government, through the First Minister, have declared themselves hostile to the Bill; but I am going to minimize that attitude as far as I can in my own mind, by taking the expression of hostility as applying simply to the particular form in which I have proposed relief. I am going to hope that it is a hostility not to the principle that we must grant relief, but simply to the particular form in which I have proposed to grant it. If I am right in that hope, then perhaps a better measure than I proposed will be the outcome of my action. At all events, until I am assured to the contrary, until I learn that the Government are going to be as bad as the vessel owners, I will be charitable to them and will assume that they are going to act on the lines of my measure or improve upon it, with the view of preventing a recurrence of the evil in the future.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman has enjoyed a very great advantage on the present occasion in discussing the question rather than in making any defence of his particular Bill; and, although he said once or twice that he would not discuss the Bill, and did not attach great importance to that particular measure or to the manner in which his proposed remedy should be brought about, he now and then intimated that the slightest hostility to that form of dealing with the question would be hostility to the cattle shippers.

Mr. MULOCK. Excuse me; I did not say so.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then I am very glad to be corrected, and it does not matter which of us is correct in that particular, though by way of introduction to the brief statement I propose to make, that preliminary criticism appeared to me to be a proper one. Though this is not the time to go into the reasons why that Bill should not be adopted in its present form, I think the hon. gentleman would have very great difficulty in showing that it was either practicable or that it would in any way be of advantage to the farmers, for whom he seems to speak, in giving them an increased price for their cattle; though it was introduced ostensibly in the interest of the shippers or the buyers of cattle, not the producers. In dealing with a measure of this kind, I would desire not to curry favour with either of these three classes, pitting them one against the other. I am certain that the large majority of hon. members on both sides of this House will want to protect the interest of the farmer, the interest of the shipper and the interest of the ship-owner, and will not bandy about the figures to see who happens to have the largest amount invested in any particular interest; and I complain of the spirit in which the hon. gentleman has brought this question up, while saying that he hoped that no party spirit would be shown in the matter. I think that, viewing the subject from every standpoint, I could prove to this House without the slightest difficulty that the hon. gentleman does not understand the subject he has in hand. I could show that the speech he made in introducing his Bill is based on erroneous information, information which I was glad to see he did not use on the present occasion. His talking about rates showed that he had not looked into those rates in any year, and that he was years and years away from the record. I could go through that speech and show that the hon. gentleman is not able to give to any commission that might be obtained the slightest assistance in regard to the cattle trade. I have consulted the book, and I have failed to find any one man interested in the shipping of cattle who took any particular interest in the measure of the hon. gentleman, and I know that not one of them corroborates the statements made by him in the preamble of the Bill, or in the speech with which he introduced it. I would not have referred to that if I did not believe, from what the hon. gentleman has said on several occasions, that there is more or less of a desire to put these shippers of cattle and the farmers in an aggrieved position, and to hold the Government responsible. I do not think it is the right of the hon. gentleman to say, over and over again, that his statement that there is and has been an unfair combination on the part of ship owners to the detriment of shippers, is uncontradicted. I contradict that statement. I say there is no evidence to show that that charge is seriously pressed or can be seriously pressed, or has ever been seriously pressed.

Mr. MULOCK. I know you are wrong.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I can back up my opinion by facts.

Mr. MULOCK. You cannot.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Let the hon. gentleman take the prices of cattle and the rates of freight in the English market, and I can show him that every year there has been a lowering of rates to correspond with the lowering in prices. Are we to be told that it is a combination of ship-owners which has lowered steadily the rates of freight charged?

Mr. MULOCK. Does the hon. gentleman say that there has been no combination among the vessel men that I have alluded to?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not intend to repeat what I did say. I have said distinctly my opinion.

Mr. MULOCK. If the hon. gentleman says that, he says what he knows is not true—no, I do not mean that. He says what I know is not true. If the hon. gentleman asserts here that no combination has existed among the vessel owners or their representatives with regard to the freights that they were to charge on Canadian cattle to English ports—if the hon. gentleman says there was no such combination, I tell him he is in error.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is rather milder. The hon. gentleman is in a most ridiculous position to-day. He is handling a subject which he is showing his complete incapacity to understand, and when I put to him a question about the rates, the hon. gentleman uses language which is coarse, and then has to follow it with language which is weak, and which he would not use if he were not quite so sure that he is wrong and I am right. The House will be surprised, after what the hon. gentleman has said, touching the manner in which the ship owners have handled their business, when I tell them that this fluctuation of rates, which I have pointed out, is common to every shipping country in the world. And the hon. gentleman from Queen's (Mr. Davies), whose opinion perhaps the hon. gentleman will value more than mine, will tell him that rates of freight fluctuate very much. When prices are good, rates go up, and the ship owners make a little more money. Unfortunately they are down to-day, all over the world, and he is a rare bird who owns a ship and finds it giving him any return. Ship-owners have to take what they can get; and there is no country in the world that has undertaken to step in between them and the shippers and dictate to them how to manage such a delicate business in which such extreme fluctuations occur. I will give the hon. gentleman a little information, which will show him that my opinion is not without foundation. He will be a little surprised when I tell him that as few years ago as 1880, when a very small quantity of cattle apparently was being shipped from our ports, 34 dollars per head was the price charged. Does the hon. gentleman know the price per head to-day from Montreal, for instance?

Mr. MULOCK. I read the figures you quoted.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman know the rates at which cattle are being shipped from Montreal to-day?

Mr. MULOCK. No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yet the hon. gentleman is raising a cry about the manner in which ship-owners are imposing rates. The rates to-day are 27 shillings and 6 pence, as compared with 34 dollars in 1880. Take 1890, which was a very big year, 1891, which was a good year, but in which less cattle were shipped than in 1893, and the subsequent years, and you will find the following rates were charged at this port, where there is a combine to keep up the rates and where the cattle shippers, according to the hon. gentleman, are at the mercy of the ship-owners:—

In 1891.....	57s.
In 1892.....	51s.
In 1893.....	43s.
In 1894.....	30s. to 27s. 6d.

I am not prejudging the case between the different parties, but that there is an exaggerated view taken by the hon. gentleman, which is not taken by the shippers and which cannot be substantiated, there can be no doubt. That there is cause, however, for inquiry we do not deny. When a body of men, such as these shippers of cattle, are not satisfied, when there is shown to exist on the part of the farmers the fear that some unfair advantage is being taken—and there are other questions than those rates to which the hon. gentleman has alluded—it is our duty to have a full and fair inquiry, and not to treat the ship-owners as though they were already judged to be wrong. The business is one which requires most careful attention, being often in the most precarious condition through the extraordinary competition and lowering in prices, and the hundred and one difficulties ship-owners have to meet. But in 1891—and I ask the hon. gentleman to remember this, so that he may realize the so-called grievance is not so great as he would have it—what was the rate ruling then? It was 57 shillings, as against 27 shillings and 6 pence.

Mr. MULLOCK. What was it in Boston at the same time?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman cannot draw me from my point, and I will refer to Boston later. My point is this. This subject was before Parliament in 1891. It was preceded, as it should be and will be again, by an inquiry, and the evidence was in the hands of members, the reason of the inquiry being the necessity of regulations respecting the shipment of live cattle and the authorizing their slaughter if they were not carried through in a proper condition. The subject now before the House was incidentally touched upon, and yet neither in Parliament nor in the country was there any challenge of the position the ship-owners were taking in the management of their own private property and affairs, although the rate then was 57 shillings, as against 50 shillings in 1893, and 27 shillings and 6 pence in 1894. The official information given me was 30 shillings in 1894, but an hon. gentleman who is in the business has told me that since then—the earlier part of the month—rates have come down to 27 shillings and 6 pence. The hon. gentleman asks what the rate was in Boston. Of course the rates vary every year, according to the cattle coming forward; and in order to make a fair comparison you must not merely compare the rates, but the corresponding conditions. In 1891, for instance, when we were charging 57s. in Canada, they were charging 42s. in Boston; and in 1893, when they were charging 43s. in Canada, in Boston the charge was 43s. But, this year, the rates in Canada are less than those in Boston or New York or Baltimore. So the hon. gentleman can see that Parliament can hardly come to a quick conclusion on a mere statement of these rates. One year the comparison is against us, another it is in our favour, but in every year there has been a marked falling off in these rates. Another subject I would mention is that there is an interesting journal published in Montreal called the 'Cattle Exporters' and Butchers' Advocate,' dealing thoroughly with the cattle export trade. While they mention a steady falling off in these rates, and the satisfactory adjustment of this question between the two interests involved, no prominence has been given to what the hon. gentleman pretends is a very burning and serious question. What I complain of, and I think it is a ground of fair complaint, is that when the hon. gentleman finds that a full and fair inquiry is to be had—a thing that should be asked for before legislation is suggested—he should put in an unfair position an interest that every man should seek to cultivate and guard as carefully as any other, the shipping interest. The allegation that there is a combination I have never seen a particle of evidence to justify. The rates must be fixed by vessel owners often acting in conjunction, but such a thing as a combination of the character the hon. gentleman has referred to, I do not believe exists to-day, and I do not believe it ever existed in connection with the cattle trade. The evidence, so far as I have been able to investigate, conclusively shows the contrary. Now, the hon. gentleman talks about the rates going up with the price of cattle, but he fails to add that the rates go down as well with the price of cattle. He seems to think it an extraordinary thing that the vessel owners should find out what the cattle are likely to sell for. But, with all due respect to him and to those interested in this trade, I think it reasonable that this should be done, for it is done in connection with everything carried in a ship. That is the way rates are fixed. The owners find out what the markets and the conditions will stand and endeavour to make the best bargain that they can. Another reason why we should hasten slowly and go into this matter with the greatest caution is, that no measure in any country in the world has ever ventured to go so close to a ship's business, as this does. The hon. gentleman could not instance a case of such a law being adopted. The conditions are admitted now to be such that no great complaint can be made. It may be said that is due to this agitation. Whether it is so or not is another question. I do not believe that the agitation has had anything to do with the change. The rates are low now because the cattle trade is not in the position we should like. There are many reasons for this, and the House is aware of what those reasons are. There is still another thing to consider. We have spent millions in making these Canadian ports attractive to shipping, seeking to bring to them ships having great tonnage. Now, will it be wise—and that is the question that requires very careful consideration—to make Montreal the only port in the world where the ship-owner is not free to make the best he can out of his ship's business? I put that same question to the cattle shippers, and they acknowledged it that it was a very difficult question to deal with, and they have not been able to give me a satisfactory answer. I hope they will be able to do so on a full inquiry being made. The point as I put it to them was this: Suppose a maximum rate is fixed—and it is a maximum you want, that is all you are interested in. You want to have as many ships as possible come into port at Montreal. Are you going to encourage vessels called tramps—that is, vessels that are not on a regular route—to call at Montreal, when the owner knows that he will not be permitted to take advantage of the market so far as rates are concerned, but must submit to governmental supervision or a maximum figure which might be most unfavourable. I think that is a question that requires very careful consideration before you mark a port in that objectionable and novel way. I contend, therefore, that all these things call for very careful and thorough and impartial inquiries before Parliament can be in a position to form an opinion on this vexed question.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Mr. LAURIER. The House will be sorry. I am sure, that the hon. Minister of Marine did not adopt the moderate tone in which my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) opened this debate.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Did you say moderate tone?

Mr. LAURIER. Yes, he adopted a very moderate tone.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I thought the language exceedingly coarse.

Mr. LAURIER. Surely the hon. gentleman could not have heard my hon. friend's words. He represented his case in a very moderate tone. He made a statement which did not seem to sound agreeable to the ear of the hon. Minister. He stated that there had been a combine among the ship-owners at Montreal, and that statement seems to have grated upon the ears of the hon. Minister, for he immediately flew into a passion and denied the truth of the statement. That is a question of fact which has not yet been ascertained. My hon. friend says he has reason to believe that there is a combine. Would such a thing be so very extraordinary? Is it the first time that we have heard in Canada, or in this House, of combines among those of the same interest? Is it not a fact that such combinations of those having the same interests are daily recurring, combines to further their own interests? There may be such a combine or there may be not—I do not know. That is the question at issue. My hon. friend has asserted in the Bill, which, unfortunately, I fear, cannot be reached this session, that there is a combine. He gives that as a basis for his Bill. The legislation, he admits, is of an extraordinary and exceptional character, not at all in consonance with his views as a free trader, of what should be the ordinary legislation of this country. I am altogether of his opinion that the Bill is an exceptional one, and that it should not be passed under any circumstances unless the preamble to the Bill stated and it was believed to be the fact, that there was a combine among the ship-owners in the port of Montreal. If there is such a combine, then I submit to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat: Would there not be occasion for extraordinary legislation in order to meet that evil, in order to meet that conspiracy against the public interest? I say there would then be an occasion to meet such a condition of things. I do not care to say that the measure proposed by my hon. friend would be the most adequate and the most conducive to the interests which he has in view. I am not prepared to say it ought to be adopted: but I have no hesitation in saying that if it were true, as stated by my hon. friend from North York, that there was a combination of the ship-owners against the cattle shippers, and against the farmers, and against the buyers of cattle, certainly it is the duty of the Government to interfere in that matter. Now the Government tell us, through the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that there is to be an inquiry. An inquiry into what? I want to know if there has been no combination? The hon. gentleman tells us there is no combination because the rates fluctuate, and, on the whole, they have a tendency to go down. But surely he has no evidence that there is no combination.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will allow me to correct a statement he has made once or twice. I did not wish to give evidence, personally, nor do I wish to be understood by the House as giving evidence that there is no combination. I objected as strongly as possible to the statement that there was admittedly a combination, and certainly I was able to contradict the statement that there was admittedly a combination. I did not pretend to have any evidence of my own.

Mr. LAURIER. I did not understand the hon. gentleman to give evidence of his own that there was no combination, but certainly I understood him to resent in a positive manner the assertion of my hon. friend that there was a combination.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Simply because it was not supported by any evidence.

Mr. LAURIER. This is the question at issue, whether there is such a thing or not. I am now pointing out that there is an assertion on one side and an assertion on the other side. The hon. gentleman tells us that there is to be an inquiry into the subject, and if so, I want to know what the inquiry is to be about if there is no combination. I should think the first thing to inquire into would be whether there has been a combination or not. There may not be any combination at the present time, but because on this 25th June there is no combination, it does not follow that in the month of April, when complaints were first made, there was no combination. If there is no combination now, and there has been none, I am at loss to know what there is to inquire into.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I said nothing directly or indirectly to suggest that the inquiry would not cover the question of a combination. I certainly did not wish to limit the scope of an inquiry in that particular; on the contrary, I said we would approach the question from a fair and impartial standpoint, and hear all that could be said on behalf of the farmers, the shippers and ship-owners.

Mr. LAURIER. That may be, and that only justifies what I said a moment ago, that the hon. gentleman would have done better to adopt a moderate tone, in which case he would have expressed himself more clearly and more satisfactorily to himself and to the House. Then I understand that after all what the hon. gentleman meant, though he spoke somewhat in anger, was there would be an inquiry about everything, whether there was a combination or no combination. If such is to be the case, while I deplore that the hon. gentleman was not more explicit in his remarks—and, perhaps, he will understand that it is better to keep his temper under all circumstances—since he meant to say that the whole subject would be inquired into, that is in keeping with the remarks of the hon. member for North York, who stated in the concluding portion of his remarks that, to some extent, he was not sorry that his Bill would not come up for discussion this year, because the Government would undertake to make an inquiry into the ins and outs of this question, and what is the present condition of the trade? It is not enough to go into the question of rates, but the inquiry should cover the main question, of whether the ship-owners in the city of Montreal take advantage of their position to impose extra rates upon the shippers.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Certainly I would have no objection to taking advice from the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He is certainly quite capable of giving it, and he is my senior in this House; but I must deny his statement that I spoke in temper. I may have shown indignation in reference to the charges made against the shipping interest, which I thought were unfair, but that I was in temper I deny. But I was a little hot, it is true.

Mr. DAVIN. As representing the farmers of the North-west, I congratulate the Government and the House, and I congratulate the farmers, that there is an intention on the part of the Government to inquire into the question raised by the Bill and by the speech of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). I confess that if it were necessary to discuss that Bill I should find it very difficult to agree with some of its principles, but I do not think it can be established that a reason might not be forthcoming why the Government should not take a course that would affect ocean freight rates in the interest of the farmer and the shipper. Now, it appears to be established that the ship-owner regulates his rates of carriage across the Atlantic by the prices that the cattle he carries will bring in Liverpool; and it would seem from the rates that the cost of carrying cattle is sometimes low and sometimes high. But there must be a rate for carrying cattle across the Atlantic that will give a fair profit to the ship-owner, and we can easily understand that a rate that would give a fair profit might fall very far below what he feels himself entitled to exact from the shippers of cattle, because of some price that happens to be ruling in Liverpool. I cannot agree with the principle that the ship-owner is entitled to regulate the price at which he will carry cattle across the Atlantic by the rate those cattle will bring in Liverpool, for that means simply that he himself becomes a speculator, he deals with the cattle almost as if they were his own. I do not intend to trouble the House at length on this question; I merely rose to express my satisfaction that an inquiry would be held into this matter. The question of the freight rates, the cost of carrying cattle from this country to Liverpool is vital to the west, especially, and of the greatest moment to Canada at large. It is a question that goes to the very marrow of our prosperity, and if it should be proved that the ship-owners have taken a course unjust to the farmer and to the shipper, then I consider that a case would be made out why the Government should interfere, and I will give you my reason. Who deepens the channel of the rivers, who builds the lighthouses, who gives all the facilities for the business carried on by the ship-owners? The Government of Canada, or in other words, the people of Canada; and, therefore, if it should turn out on inquiry that the ship-owners are guilty of any unfair dealing either to the shippers or to the farmers, I for one would believe that the Government should take action, and dealing with the ship-owners under those circumstances they would have my strenuous support.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Government of North-west Territory--Expenditure on Lieut.-Governor's house..... $10,525

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I observe an increase under this item of about $2,000. There was considerable discussion a year or two ago in regard to the expenditure under this head, and in regard to the extravagance that had characterized it, to use a very mild term, and some facts were given, which were never controverted, showing extravagance that was intolerable, and deserving of very severe censure. This feeling was shared by hon. members on both sides of the House. Under these circumstances, to find an increase of expenditure in connection with that office is somewhat startling, and the increase requires explanation.

Mr. DALY. I have no idea to what the hon. gentleman refers. The proposed vote is made up as follows:—Travelling expenses, $2,000; private secretary, $600; clerical assistance, $2,000; contingencies, $500; stationery and telegrams, $500; subscriptions to newspapers, $100; Government House service, $2,500; light and fuel, $2,000. The increases are in connection with travelling expenses, clerical assistance and newspapers, the total increase being $1,925.

Mr. MULLOCK. Is coal $10 a ton in Regina?

Mr. DALY. Yes; and anthracite coal for furnace purposes is cheap at that there.

Mr. MULLOCK. Cannot native coal be used?

Mr. DALY. Anthracite is used generally for furnace purposes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not care about haggling about trifling expenses, except where it is necessary. But this is not exactly the time when an increase should take place in unnecessary expenses. Mr. Royal, the late Lieutenant-Governor, did not certainly incur the reproach of being an economical administrator. He managed to expend a fair and reasonable amount, and he seemed to have travelled all over the Territories, and also visited Ottawa, for which he received $500 or $600 in addition to payment of his travelling expenses through the Territories. I am not aware that the present circumstances justify any very large increase in expenditure. This is a small increase now, but if the House gives way to the demand of every Lieutenant-Governor, there will be increases from $2,000 to $3,000 within a very few years, and the Government will find itself face to face with an expenditure that will not be tolerated by the country. There is abundant evidence that in the present financial condition, when stringency exists everywhere, when private individuals are seeking to curtail instead of increase their expenditure, owing to the hard times and the difficulty to make ends meet, these constant and daily motions to increase the expenditure of public officials will not meet with a favourable response at the hands of the people. I am entirely opposed to this increased expenditure. I think the Government are yielding improperly to demands made in the direction of improper expenditure at the present time. There may be a day, when times are good and the revenue elastic, when Parliament may be disposed to be somewhat bountiful in disposing of the taxes of the people, but the present time is not one when we should increase the controllable public expenditure, and I wish to place my opinion on record in protest against it.

Mr. MULLOCK. What is the meaning in the accounts contained in the Auditor General's Report at page D—186 of the following: Bell Telephone Co., rent, Government House stables, 12 months, $36; rent, Government House and stables, $36; and above there is another item, Bell Telephone Co., Government House, $36. Are there telephones to the Government stables?

Mr. OUMET. When the new residence was built it was placed nearly one mile from the old House. The stables have not yet been built, and therefore the present stables are about a mile from the present residence. A special messenger would be necessary to communicate between the stable and the Government House, and so a telephone service is used.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I thought the Minister of the Interior would have given an explanation of the increase of 100 per cent in travelling expenses. Last year Governor Royal paid two visits to Ottawa at an expense of $600, and the balance of the $1,000 was expended in travelling through the Territories. You now propose to take $1,000 for additional travelling expenses. The distances in the Territories are not increased, and the points which the Lieutenant-Governor has to visit are not different from those Lieutenant-Governor Royal visited. I venture to say that you cannot blame Lieutenant-Governor Royal for being particularly parsimonious in his expenditure. I think he generally managed to keep up the dignity of his office so far as the expenditure was concerned, and I think the committee ought to have some information from the Minister as to why it is desirable that the travelling expenses of the Lieutenant-Governor should be larger than those of his predecessor.

Mr. DALY. It was found that the $1,000 voted last year was not sufficient, and the present Lieutenant-Governor being new to his office will, of necessity, have more travelling to do. It must be remembered that the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories occupies a different position from any of the other Lieutenant-Governors. He is the executive officer of the Government, and it is necessary for him to visit the people from time to time who live long distances apart. I do not think any person can complain of the work that was done by Lieutenant-Governor Royal in that particular, or of what is proposed to be done by Lieutenant-Governor Mackintosh. The Lieutenant-Governor must travel to bring himself in contact with the people, and to ascertain their condition. As I have said, he occupies a different position from the other Lieutenant-Governors.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He certainly does to some extent occupy a different position. But it must be remembered that he occupies a very different position now from the position occupied by the incumbent of that office three or four years ago. Some years ago he had the administration of the affairs of the North-west, but to-day the North-west Territories is governed by an Assembly which possesses powers almost equivalent to those of Local Legislatures, and the Lieutenant-Governor there is now very much in the position of the Lieutenant-Governor of one of the other provinces. He has to be advised and controlled by the advice of his Council in almost everything.

Mr. DALY. You are mistaken.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman looks at the powers delegated by this House to the North-west Assembly, he will find that they are nearly equal to the powers given to the Legislatures of the different provinces. This increase of $1,000 will not be a temporary increase. I have no doubt at all but that it will become a permanent addition to the Lieutenant-Governor's salary, if it is voted by the House now. It is the experience of those of us who have been here for the last thirteen or fourteen years that once you make an increase like this, you are not going to get it back again. Every Lieutenant-Governor on getting into office will expect as a matter of course that he will be paid this perquisite, and will look upon it as a sort of a contract. This proposition to-day may not now arouse the people; the people may be interested in some other matters, but I venture to say that in the present temper of the people this increase of $1,000 will not be sanctioned or approved, but that rather it is their desire and wish to economize and to reduce such expenditure.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman will understand that this item in years previously was always $2,000; but it was cut down to $1,000 last year. That was found insufficient, so that we are now bringing the vote up to what it was before.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman says that the amount of $1,000 was found to be insufficient last year?

Mr. DALY. It was.

Mr. LAURIER. In what respect, and in what way was it insufficient? The Minister is in the secrets of the department, and we are not, and when he states that the $1,000 was not sufficient he ought to be prepared to give the reasons why, and all particulars about it. What does the Lieutenant-Governor propose to do this year that he could not do last year for $1,000? Are we to understand that the Lieutenant-Governor of the Territories was last year unable to discharge some duties which he should have discharged, because he had not at his command sufficient money? Had he to do anything which he was prevented from doing on account of this insufficiency? If a statement in detail is given to us to that effect, then we can understand the position, but the Minister simply comes before the House and says that the amount last year was insufficient. I do not dispute the accuracy of that, although it does seem extraordinary, but the House which votes the money has a right to know in what respect the Lieutenant-Governor could not discharge the duties which were incumbent upon him, and if that can be shown to the House, then I can understand why the Minister is asking for a vote of an extra $1,000.

Mr. DALY. I made the statement to the House that the sum of $1,000 voted last year was insufficient, and if the hon. gentleman looks at the Supplementary Estimates he will see a sum there of $1,900 to recoup the shortage for the present fiscal year 1893-94. It is in order to avoid any future contingency of that kind that this sum is asked for. As a matter of fact, the present Lieutenant-Governor had to pay travelling expenses out of his own pocket, and he has to remain out of the money until such time as this is voted by the House.

Mr. LAURIER. It does not follow that the expenditure was necessary.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) More than that. It is a matter very much to be regretted that when this House votes a certain sum of money for a specific purpose, that any public official should undertake to incur two or three times the amount of that expenditure, and then come to this House and ask to be recouped. If the House has one function which it ought jealously to guard it is the function of watching closely over the public expenditure, and when the House votes $1,000 or any sum whatever for a specific purpose, it ought not to lie—and constitutionally it does not lie—in the whim or the power of the officer who is to expend that money to incur increased expenditure. He is bound by the vote of the House, and he has no right to incur $1 expenditure beyond that. I see by the Auditor General's Report that the expenditure of the Lieutenant-Governor in 1892-93 involved two trips to Ottawa. I suppose it is not intended that the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories shall visit Ottawa semi-annually at the public expense. I do not see what reason he would have to come here on public business twice a year. If the House votes a certain sum for the Lieutenant-Governor's expenses that sum should not be exceeded; but the fact of the matter is that we are losing control altogether of the expenditure of Government House in the North-west Territories.

Mr. DALY. In justice to the present Lieutenant-Governor I may say that it was not he who over-expended the money at all. Lieutenant-Governor Mackintosh found when he arrived there that there was an over-expenditure, and in order to discharge what he considered to be his duty he has had to expend the money for his travelling expenses out of his own pocket.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman does not understand me. I had no reference to the present occupant of the office, any more than to his predecessor.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories can now reach almost every town within his jurisdiction by railway.

Mr. DAVIN. No, no.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Well, nearly every town.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). No.

Mr. O'BRIEN. He can go to Edmonton and many other towns by railway. It must be remembered that this vote is giving the Lieutenant-Governor $12 a day for travelling expenses for 150 out of the working days of the year. Will any one tell me that the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories is a man who needs to travel in such state that he has to pay $12 a day during 150 days out of the twelve months?

An hon. MEMBER. Why one round of drinks costs that in the North-west.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I do not know what one round of drinks costs, but I do not think this country is bound to pay for the drinks of the Lieutenant-Governor. I dare say that there are men who would like to see things done on that scale, but the country should not pay for it. This is a ridiculous proposition to allow so much for travelling expenses.

Mr. MULOCK. It is, in my opinion, an entirely wrong step to propose to increase this expenditure. We have the Governor-General's establishment at Ottawa, and we have Lieutenant-Governors throughout the country, and every year the expenses in this respect are greatly increased. The increase proposed to-day is treated as a fair expenditure, and if we approve of it, and if it is adopted by the House, we are practically fixing it as a charge upon the country for all time to come. We are asked to-day to adopt an item involving an increase of about $2,000 in the expense of Government House, which at 4 per cent represents the interest on $50,000. Instead of our voting an increase, the proper thing would be to try to vote less. The Minister has not told us, for example, why an extra clerk is required, or why the Lieutenant-Governor should travel so much. All he says is that the Lieutenant-Governor is a Dominion officer. He occupies a sort of dual position, being a Lieutenant-Governor nor under the control of his Cabinet up there, and an executive officer of this Government. Every Lieutenant-Governor is a Dominion officer, and yet we do not have to put items in the Estimates to pay their travelling expenses.

Mr. DALY. No, because the province pay them.

Mr. MULOCK. If that is the case, it is a good reason for the same being done in this case—for the expense being paid by those who will see that the travelling is done in the public interest. This $2,000 for travelling expenses of the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories is practically an increase to his salary. I do not see how he can legitimately spend $2,000 a year in travelling; and if it is in the interest of the North-west that he should travel, he is a constitutional ruler, and let those who are in a position to see that his travelling is in the public interest, pay his expenses. I do not think this vote should be conceded, and if no other hon. gentleman will do so, I will move that it be reduced by $1,000. Before making that motion, I would like to know what clerical assistance is required, who is the proposed new clerk, and why he is to be appointed?

Mr. DALY. The only explanation I have is that the amount for clerical assistance required is $2,000, that the amount voted last year was $1,500, and that the existing staff are entitled to an increase, having been employed for some years on very small salaries.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman says that the provinces pay the travelling expenses of the Lieutenant-Governor. I am not aware that the provinces make any allowances to the Lieutenant-Governors for travelling expenses.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). The present position of this question strikes me as remarkably interesting. So far as my observation goes, hon. gentlemen's friends in the west are just now actively agitating in favour of the entire abolition of the Government House in Toronto, and the consequent saving to the province of $20,000 or $30,000 a year. I see my respected friend, the Controller of Customs, looking me in the face. He has, I suppose, just returned fresh from the field, and ready to gather the laurels of the campaign. He has been travelling during the last fortnight through Ontario, where his friends have been advocating economy in this respect. I understand that there is a strong feeling there that the rural population have to be content with a reduced income in consequence of the lower prices they get for what they have to sell. I do not know what line my hon. friend, the Controller, took, but I know that his friends in the west who are pressing so actively for economy in the administration of affairs of the province, are calling loudly for the abolition of Government House in Toronto. Then, on what principle do hon. gentlemen propose that we should grant the Lieutenant-Governor of the Northwest sufficient to enable him to travel for half the year at $12 a day, leaving out Sundays? I say it is simply preposterous, and the sooner we realize that the community are in earnest in wishing to have our expenditure kept within reasonable bounds, the better it will be for all concerned. But what I am chiefly concerned about, is to have hon. gentlemen opposite reconcile the position taken by their friends in the west with the position taken here to-day.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the hon. gentleman will have to settle the matter with his own friends, who hold a different view in the province of Ontario from what they do in this House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not in the habit of finding fault with any proper expenditure in connection with the expenses of the Lieutenant-Governor; but I agree with the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain) that this particular time does not seem favourable for making so large an increase. If it is necessary for the Lieutenant-Governor to make visits throughout the Territories—and I can understand it might be so—the expenses should be provided for in a more businesslike way; a return of the expenses might be made, and then they might be paid by the Government, the Government taking the responsibility of their having been incurred in the public interest. It is hardly fair for the hon. leader of the House to say that my hon. friend ought to reconcile the matter with his friends in Ontario, because I understand that the hon. Controller of Customs has been actively supporting the position taken by the present Opposition in the province in favour of abolishing the Provincial Government House altogether. I think that hon. gentleman and others have referred to the hon. Premier of that province as corrupt and extravagant—

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND—and that he should be voted out of power for maintaining that expensive establishment. It does seem rather inconsistent that we should be called upon at the present time to vote such an increase for such a purpose, especially without more explanations than we have received.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friends have not, I think, been altogether fair to the Controller. It was not only a question of expense that he was discussing, but, if I am to believe a report which I saw in the 'Citizen' of this city the other day, he was also defending the sacred cause of Protestantism, which is in danger at the present time in the province of Ontario. But coming to the question before the committee, the reasons which have been given by the Minister of the Interior show conclusively that this item should not be allowed. I would not myself, under any circumstances, scrutinize this expenditure too minutely, but what is the fact stated by the Minister of the Interior a moment ago? Up to last year the amount allowed for travelling expenses was $2,000, and last year the House, in its discretion, decided to reduce the amount by $1,000. Now, the hon. gentleman says that sum is found insufficient, and we have to recoup the Treasury by an amount in the Supplementary Estimates to the tune of $2,000, because the Lieutenant-Governor deliberately chose to ignore the will of the House. I want to know who is to govern this country—the Parliament of Canada or the Lieutenant-Governor of the Territories? When the Parliament of Canada, wisely or unwisely, limits the Lieutenant-Governor to an expenditure of $1,000 in a certain particular, and when the Lieutenant-Governor deliberately, in defiance of that decision, spends what Parliament refused to allow him, it is trifling with the dignity of this House to say that we must grant the amount because His Honour chose to spend it. He should have confined himself to the limit fixed by Parliament. What reason can be given why the Minister of the Interior should endorse the action of the Lieutenant-Governor? He says that His Honour will have to pay it out of his own pocket. So much the worse for him. What reason can we give for setting aside the will of the representatives of the people? Every argument used by the hon. gentleman shows that the vote should be reduced to the amount of $1,000.

Mr. MULOCK. I will move to reduce the item. Before doing so I wish to call the attention of the committee—

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The House again in Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Expenditure connected with the
Lieut.-Governor's office... $10,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) was about to move an amendment. I do not know whether the Government have determined to accept the amendment.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is quite evident he has thought better of it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not quite so sure. He was just about commencing a speech in favour of the reduction when the House took recess.

Mr. FLINT moved that the expenditure connected with the Lieutenant-Governor's office be reduced by $1,000.

Amendment negatived.

Legal Adviser..... $1,200

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move that the Solicitor-General be sent up as legal adviser to the North-west Territories.

Insane Patients—Manitoba..... $30,000

Mr. DALY. The increase is inevitable. The increase of patients, especially among the females, has been such that we require this increased vote. Under the arrangement made with the Manitoba Government in 1892, the insane patients of the North-west are kept in the insane asylum at Brandon, and at Selkirk, at $1 per diem. There is also the cost of transporting the patients from their homes. We may not spend the whole amount, but we want to provide against the contingency that arose this year, when we had not sufficient funds to meet the cost.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Are there one hundred patients in that asylum?

Mr. DALY. That is the number it is estimated to accommodate, I believe.

Mr. MARTIN. I see that in the case of a person charged with insanity at Yorkton, for instance, he is taken from Yorkton to Portage la Prairie, thence to Regina, is committed for trial in Regina, and afterwards sent back from Regina to Brandon—and with two or three escorts during the whole trip. It seems to me there ought to be a better arrangement than that. What is the use of taking them to Regina to be committed. Cannot a justice of the peace commit?

Mr. DALY. There must have been some exceptional circumstances in that case, because the insane are committed by justices of the peace under the territorial law.

Mr. MARTIN. My impression is that, as a rule, they are taken to Regina.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). Under the statute a magistrate has to commit to Regina so that the Lieutenant-Governor can examine them.

Schools, clerical assistance, printing,
&c..... $200,534

Mr. MARTIN. How much for schools?

Mr. DALY. The amount voted by the Assembly was $108,000.

Mr. MARTIN. Then the $92,000 odd, I suppose, is for clerical assistance to the Governor and—

Mr. DALY. We give it in a lump sum and they distribute it. In order to learn the items you have to see the records of expenditure of the North-west Territories.

Mr. MARTIN. I should like to say a word upon this item. I should more properly have spoken on the first item, but as I came in the question was about to be put by the Chairman, and it was passed as I rose to speak. When I was in the Terriories, just before the House met, I found very great satisfaction among the people generally—at least those to whom I spoke—with regard to the present Lieutenant-Governor. But, Sir, I wish to enter a protest against his action since then. It is the custom for the Lieutenant-Governor to go about addressing meetings of various kinds. The Lieutenant-Governor held a series of meetings, in February or March last. I think it will be admitted by gentlemen on both sides of the House, that, no matter how strong a partisan the Lieutenant-Governor may have been prior to his appointment, after accepting such a position, he should be very careful indeed to say nothing that could be construed as partisan in its nature. At the meetings to which I refer, His Honour took occasion to discuss a question which, up there, is the prominent political question—the tariff. And he discussed that question, to my mind, very much from a party standpoint. I consider that his speeches in that respect were very ill-advised, and, while I say that, I wish, at the same time, to couple it with the remark that I have already made, that, in other respects, his administration, short though it has been, has been very satisfactory to the people on both sides of politics. I hope that this slight departure from what ought to have been his course, his falling back for the moment into his old habits, was more accidental than intentional. I am quite satisfied that his administration will be very much more popular if he abstains entirely from any reference to these disputed questions. It may be possible that, in discussing this question, he intended to discuss it from a non-partisan standpoint. But we can all understand how unlikely it would be that a gentleman who still, no doubt, holds very strong views upon these questions—having been a member of this House for many years, and having been engaged actively in the discussion of questions relating to the National Policy—could make his utterances on a question of that kind sound non-partisan to his opponents. I hope, therefore, that, in future, at any meetings His Honour may address, he will abstain entirely from any political allusion. I do not feel so much afraid of any harm that such allusions may do to the party to which I am attached, but I object, as a citizen, to the Lieutenant-Governor of the Territories, or of any province, entering in the slightest degree upon a discussion of the political questions of the day.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). May I ask where these meetings took place, and what was the reference to which the hon. gentleman objects?

Mr. MARTIN. One of the meetings took place at Moosomin, and another at Grenfell or Wolseley, or one of those points around there. Of course, I have to depend for my knowledge of what occurred upon the newspaper reports of these meetings. So far as my information goes, I have found that these newspaper reports were quite correct; and, if they were correct, I certainly have to object entirely to the tone of the hon. gentleman's remarks.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). I heard His Honour at four of those meetings, and I have to dissent from the statement that my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has made. His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor did not refer to politics, and all the people who heard him were perfectly satisfied. The audience was a mixed one in every case.

Mr. MARTIN. I must thank the hon. gentleman for undertaking to speak for all the people there. It just shows the correctness of the remarks I am making. The hon. gentleman thinks that the Lieutenant-Governor's allusions were quite correct. No doubt they were from his standpoint, no doubt they were quite non-partisan from his standpoint; but from my standpoint, they were wrong. His views upon the National Policy do not coincide with my views, nor with the views of the people up there who think as I do. It is painful for any one to go to a meeting such as this and listen to remarks upon the burning questions of the day such as His Honour's remarks were. Will the hon. gentleman pretend to say that His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor did not refer to the question of the tariff at all in his speeches?

Mr. McDONALD (East Assiniboia). In a non-partisan way. The 'Free Press' had a report, and the hon. gentleman might read that.

Mr. MARTIN. I did read it, and that is the report I object to. His Honour warned the people against demagogues who were advocating tariff changes, and he was referring generally to the Liberals who took the opposite view. I am surprised that hon. gentlemen opposite should approve the Lieutenant-Governor going on to a platform and undertaking to say that those who advocate contrary opinions to his own upon the political issues of the day, were demagogues, and then undertaking to say that his opinion was the correct solution of the trade question. I say that it is all wrong. I do not complain, as I said before, because I think the attack has done the Liberal party any harm; but I say it does our institutions harm. My opinion is that it will help the Liberal party. People up there can easily understand why a man receiving $7,000 a year salary and $2,500 a year for travelling expenses, would think that the right hon. gentleman opposite was the great man of Canada, and that the party who had furnished him with this very nice situation were all patriotic individuals, and that those who sought to remove this gentleman from power were demagogues. I can quite understand His Honour Lieutenant-Governor Mackintosh taking the view that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and those who support him, were mere demagogues and not fit to be placed in power in this country, because it is not likely that the leader of the Opposition would appoint to office Mr. Mackintosh or anybody like him. So you can see at once that there would be good reasons for that gentleman seeing and talking the way he does. But I say that is not the way to lend dignity to the position of a Lieutenant-Governor. Would that be tolerated in the province of Ontario? Would the present popular Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, who was quite as strong a partisan as the Lieutenant-Governor of the Territories, think for one moment of going upon the stump in any part of Ontario and alluding even in the most indirect manner to questions of that kind, undertaking to say that Mr. Mowat or any of the Liberal members from Ontario in this House were demagogues, because they advocated a different policy on those public questions from himself? Why, it is absurd, it is ridiculous. We never dreamed for a moment that the Lieutenant-Governor's conduct would be justified in this House, although from the applause that was given to the utterance of the hon. member for Assiniboia, it would seem that hon. gentlemen opposite think that it was quite a proper course for the Lieutenant-Governor of the Territories to go upon the stump and go into the question of free trade and protection, and to discuss what amendments should be made to the tariff, to say that in his opinion it would be wise that the tariff should be reduced in some instances, and so on—because that is what Mr. Mackintosh did on this occasion. Now, I take the position that he has no right to allude to these subjects, because it is impossible for him to allude to subjects of that kind in a non-partisan way, as the hon. gentleman claims he did. Then sentiments he expressed were directed against the policy of the Liberal party as laid down in this House, and as laid down in the country by the Liberal party. His views do not harmonize with the views we hold; he had no right to express any views upon this question, and certainly he had no right to attempt to abuse gentlemen throughout the country who were undertaking to advocate these doctrines.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think there would be any substantial difference of opinion on the two sides of this House on the subject of the attitude which Lieutenant-Governors of the Territories ought to assume in addressing public audiences or in discussing public questions there. But if the assertions of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) are sustained by his friends, there will be a profound difference of opinion as to what took place at the meetings in the Territories which Lieutenant-Governor Mackintosh addressed. I myself have read with some interest the reports of addresses which he delivered there—I cannot undertake to say that I read all the reports, and it may be that the reports which the hon. gentleman has read differs altogether in character from those which I have read, but those which I have read convey to my mind a totally different impression of the addresses which the Lieutenant-Governor delivered in the Territories, from that which was made upon the mind of the hon. member for Winnipeg. But if the reports which he has read bear out the statements which he has made to-night, I will undertake to obtain for this House a complete refutation of them from Lieutenant-Governor Mackintosh himself; for I know not only his personal character and feelings, but I know perfectly well the disposition with which he performs the duties of his office and the feelings which have inspired him—I know them from personal correspondence—in going from place to place in the Territories, and endeavouring to bring himself into accord with the feelings of the people there and endeavouring to obtain their confidence, so that they might feel an assurance that they were ruled by a non-partisan Lieutenant-Governor, one who sympathized with their feelings and interests as regards public questions. I certainly do not blame Lieutenant-Governor Mackintosh for having warned the people of the Territories against demagogues; but from what I have read of his addresses and what I know of his feelings, I do distinctly repudiate for him the assertion that he characterized the Liberal party of this country as demagogues. I know such are not his feelings, and that he would be very far from giving expression to any sentiment so inappropriate as such sentiments would be. I admit that the line of argument the Lieutenant-Governor addressed to various meetings, might be considered in some parts of Canada, and might be considered by some in the Territories, as trenching upon politics; but we who are acquainted with the politics of the country in its widest sense will realize that he was patriotic in those utterances, and that he was well advised in the expressions which he used in regard to them. An attempt has been made to arouse a feeling throughout the Territories that the people there are being taxed for the benefit of the rest of Canada; and the burden of the speeches and the arguments which the Lieutenant-Governor has addressed to the people in the Territories, has been directly in the line of the arguments of the Liberal party in this House ever since I came here. He has taken upon himself the task of showing the people of the North-west Territories the great sacrifices which the people of the older provinces have made for the purpose of establishing the Territories upon a sound basis of government, and giving them conveniences for civilization and growth of population. He has taken great pains at the public meetings which he has addressed, so far as I have read his speeches, to show the great expenditure which the Parliament of Canada has willingly incurred for the benefit of the people of the Territories. By that course he was making to the people there a complete refutation of the argument of the demagogues, and urging and cautioning the people on their part to guard against those who would endeavour to sever their interests from those of the rest of the people of Canada. But by any one who has followed the arguments and the discussion on public affairs in this House in relation to the Territories, it was distinctly observable that he was showing the people of the Territories that their duties and interests lay with the people in the other parts of Canada, and that there was not any disposition on the part of the people of the provinces to tyrannize over them with regard to the tariff or any other matter. He was showing them the burdens which the people of the other provinces were undertaking in respect to them, and in so far as he was admitting in their presence in the course of his argument the necessity of a reduction of the tariff in their interests, he was presenting those views which the people of the Territories pressed on him at various points with respect to their peculiar and local wants in relation to the revision of the tariff. In so far as he was dealing with the subject of demagogism in the Territories, he was calling attention to the fact which is pointed out everywhere, and which has received no more full recognition than in the ranks of the Opposition, that the increase in the burdens from which, during the past twelve months, the people of the Territories had suffered, had been incidental to the nature of their occupation and had been more widespread than the Territories themselves. In so far as that line of argument was concerned, and it is the line of argument which the Lieutenant-Governor pursued everywhere, he was doing a patriotic duty to the people of the country, and I would be the first to express regret if in relation to any of the great parties of the country he stigmatized them in the terms which the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) said had been applied to them. I say at once that is the view which I have gathered from the reports I have read of His Honour's addresses, and I have read many of them; it is the view which I am confident can be sustained by those who heard the Lieutenant-Governor, and even if the hon. gentleman should produce from partisan sources reports of a different character, which left on his mind the impression he has given to-night, I know sufficient of Lieutenant-Governor Mackintosh to be able to say that he will be able to produce evidence that the hon. gentleman has been mistaken and misinformed.

Mr. MULLOCK. I think the First Minister has rather admitted the case made against the Lieutenant-Governor. He has said that the drift of his argument was in a certain line, and that among other arguments adduced by the Lieutenant-Governor was that the people of Old Canada had made large expenditures on behalf of the Territories, and that the North-west has not been tyrannized over in regard to the tariff or otherwise. What sort of argument did he address to the people of the North-west to prove that they had not been tyrannized over with respect to the tariff? He had, of course, to produce a feeling of contentment among the people with regard to the tariff, and to establish in their minds the feeling that the tariff was not an unfair one for them. He had, therefore, to take up the line of argument adopted by every protectionist in this House and on every platform in the country. The First Minister gave away his whole case when he said that His Honour endeavoured to produce a feeling in favour of the tariff among the people, that he tried to show them they were not sufferers from, and were not prejudiced by the tariff. The First Minister went on to give an account of what had occurred, and if the First Minister's account is correct, he gave away the case.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Then I will persevere in it.

Mr. MULLOCK. Then it will be the duty of the House to persevere in denouncing the impropriety of His Honour's conduct. I thought the First Minister had overstated the case. If His Honour proceeded to try and satisfy the people of the North-west in regard to the tariff, that is what every Tory politician is endeavouring to do. Has not every one of them defended it?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did not say His Honour had defended it.

Mr. MULLOCK. The hon. gentleman said that the Lieutenant-Governor proceeded to show that the people were not tyrannized over, that they were not being unfairly treated; on the contrary, that they were being fairly treated and that the tariff was in their favour—which is another way of putting it. That, however, is what every Government candidate has been advocating. That is what the Lieutenant-Governor has done officially, and it appears to have been done after consultation with the head office, and after an interchange of opinions with the Government, and His Honour then put forward those views with the weight of his office behind them. The case is a very serious one, in view of the admission of the First Minister, and if the Lieutenant-Governor does expose himself to such criticism, the hon. member (Mr. Martin) can simply be found fault with because of his moderation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Dominion Lands—Commissioner's salary $5,000

Mr. MULLOCK. Who is the commissioner?

Mr. DALY. Mr. H. H. Smith.

Mr. MULLOCK. I think an attempt should be made to reduce the cost of the staff at Winnipeg. The sales of the land have fallen off.

Mr. DALY. When I come down with the Estimates to the committee next year, I hope to be able to show a considerable reduction.

Mr. MULLOCK. I think $5,000 is an extremely large salary.

Mr. DALY. That was the salary paid his predecessor.

Mr. MULLOCK. What was the amount of sales last year?

Mr. DALY. The net revenue for the last financial year was $374,000.

Mr. MULLOCK. How many officers are under him?

Mr. DALY. There are fourteen clerks in the office.

Superintendent of Mines $3,200

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What are the duties of this office?

Mr. DALY. The title is a misnomer; the officer is not only inspector of mines, but inspector of timber and Dominion lands. Mr. Pearce, of Calgary, possesses a special knowledge of the country from Winnipeg to the coast, and he is continually inspecting ranches, timber and minerals. He is one of the most efficient officers in the service. He is really in charge of the Dominion lands in the North-west Territories, and has to do with the inspection of the ranches, timber and everything connected with the general superintendence of the Dominion lands from there to British Columbia.

Mr. MULLOCK. Does he report to his superior or to the department?

Mr. DALY. To the department. He is also a member of the Land Board, which is composed of that officer and the inspector.

Inspector of Agencies' salary . . . $2,200

Mr. LAURIER. Who is that inspector?

Mr. DALY. Mr. Gordon, whose headquarters are now in Ottawa. He inspects all the Dominion lands offices and immigration offices throughout the country.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As the removal from Winnipeg to Ottawa has proved so beneficial, in one case as the Minister says, I imagine that it might be possible advantageous for another gentleman to move here too, because his work is on somewhat the same line. Each of them is a member of the Land Board.

Mr. DALY. It is not quite the same, because Mr. Gordon is inspector of offices and he goes through the books and examines them about twice a year. He also inspects the immigration offices from Halifax to Vancouver.

Mr. MULOCK. Does that Land Board keep a minute of its proceedings, and forward them for record to the Government at Ottawa?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. It seems to me that it is as desirable, as good sound principles will admit of, that the administration of the Northwest lands should take place nearer the lands than Ottawa is. In fact if it were possible I believe it would be the proper place for the Minister of the Interior to carry on his operations.

Mr. DALY. The object of the creation of the Land Board was to have it on the ground.

Mr. MULOCK. The only thing about it is that I am afraid your commissioner devotes too much of his time to politics?

Mr. DALY. No; you are mistaken.

Mr. MULOCK. He must have given it up very recently.

Mr. DALY. Oh, no; I think your friends will certify that he does not interfere.

Mr. MULOCK. If so it is quite recently.

Mr. DALY. Ten years.

Mr. MULOCK. It is Mr. H. H. Smith. I think we met him in politics in a quiet way last election.

Mr. DALY. It must be another Smith—John Smith.

Mr. MULOCK. Oh, no; I know Mr. Smith quite well.

Secretary's salary..... $2,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Would the Minister state briefly what duties he has to perform?

Mr. DALY. Mr. Burpee is the secretary, and he has a general supervision of the office, and has to do with the expensive correspondence at the commissioner's office, and the correspondence that takes place between the commissioner's office and the different agencies.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How many clerks in that office?

Mr. DALY. Fourteen.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Can the hon. gentleman state from his own knowledge that that very large staff is required there?

Mr. DALY. From what I saw of it when I was up there last, and from what I saw of it previous to my being a Minister of the Crown, I think they have all they can do. I expect to make some reductions there during the coming year, because I believe that some of the things for which the office was originally created do not exist.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman does not promise any retrenchment, because he takes the same vote this year as last year.

Mr. DALY. It takes a little time to make reductions. You must understand that this has been engrafted on the system for some years.

Homestead Inspectors' salaries... $8,400

Mr. FLINT. How many of these offices are there?

Mr. DALY. There are seven, each receiving $1,200 a year, and $1.50 a day for travelling expenses. The fees that are obtained more than repay the expenditure.

Mr. LAURIER. Are they not supplied with a horse and buggy each?

Mr. DALY. Yes; and that $1.50 a day covers their own keep and the keep of the horse. I do not think you can do it much cheaper than that considering the expense of travelling up there.

Mr. LAURIER. I see by the Auditor General's Report that they also swap horses. Is that a part of their duty?

Mr. DALY. They could not do that without the instruction of the commissioner, and probably the horse got played out. If everyone in the service earned their money as well as the homestead inspectors the Government would lose nothing. They are out at all seasons.

Mr. MULOCK. I see on page E-152 of the Auditor General's Report, that Mr. Thompson is allowed $2 a day living allowance. Why is he allowed more than the others?

Mr. DALY. At the time the Auditor General's Report was made out, there was no railway communication between Calgary and Edmonton, and probably he had extra per diem allowance.

Dominion Lands and Crown Timber Agents' salaries.....$24,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This seems to be an outrageous state of affairs. If the figures I have before me represent the true state of facts it seems that we actually pay $24,000 for salaries to these agents, and the receipts on account of Crown timber, including permits, seizures, &c., from November in one year to November in the other, footed up $98,000. What do they receive besides that $98,000?

Mr. DALY. $37,739 in homestead fees, $93,000 for cash sales of lands, $77,000 for scrip, and so on. On page xix of my report you will find the whole statement set out. You will also find a report from each agent in the report.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How many subordinates have they ?

Mr. DALY. In Winnipeg there are six, at Minnedosa one, at Yorkton two, at Brandon four, at Estevan two, at Regina four, at Calgary three, at Prince Albert two, at Kamloops one, at New Westminster three, and at Edmonton three.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the total cost of working these agencies ?

Mr. DALY. $43,726. The hon. gentleman must not overlook the fact that we do not get anything for homesteads except the $10 entrance fee. We get scarcely anything from Dominion lands ; there are no pre-emption receipts, and the cash sales are very few compared with what they formerly were ; but the work is just the same.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is not as much work in making one entry as there is in making ten. I see that away back when the staff was about the same as it is now, the net revenue in one year was $1,795,000, and in the following year $1,042,000.

Mr. DALY. That did not keep up.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It has been steadily dropping until last year it was only $374,000. I do not want to take up time criticising, because I do not know enough about the work to be able to offer a very intelligent criticism ; but if the receipts have been dwindling down continuously, it is about time the pruning knife were used to lop the mouldering branches off.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman will see that in those years he has mentioned the pre-emption fees were $39,843, $54,000, $28,000 and so on. We do not get any of these fees now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I was struck by the totals, which have no doubt induced the hon. gentleman to come to the conclusion, which he says he has reached, that he will curtail the expenditure in his department. To pay $40,000 or $50,000 a year to collect so small an amount seems to me a state of affairs to demand the serious consideration of the hon. gentleman, and a very large reduction of expenditure.

Mr. MULLOCK. Is there any uniform salary for the registrars ?

Mr. DALY. The average salary is $1,600, except at Prince Albert, where the registrar gets $1,200, and at Battleford $2,000.

Mr. MULLOCK. Running through these accounts in the Auditor General's Report, on page E-153, I see that there are a great many extra clerks employed. Who authorizes the appointment of these extra clerks, and on what are they employed ?

Mr. DALY. I think all the extra clerks mentioned there are authorized by Order in Council. Many of them have been in the service for ten years.

Mr. DALY.

Mr. MULLOCK. Is that not a violation of the Civil Service Act ?

Mr. DALY. No ; they do not get any superannuation. I think the term extra clerk is used only by the Auditor General. They are not on the civil service staff at all.

Mr. MULLOCK. You seem to be loading the thing down with extra clerks. In one office as many as fourteen are employed. In Calgary there are eighteen officials in the land office.

Mr. DALY. The Auditor General has the registry office and land office mixed up.

Mr. MULLOCK. There are eighteen clerks in Calgary in the public service, and surely there cannot be work for that number. I recognize the fact that they are not there all the year round, but a good many are. If there are eighteen in the land and registry offices, how many more are there in the Excise, Customs and Post Office Departments ?

Mr. MARTIN. I fancy the hon. member for North York is correct when he says these clerks in Calgary have plenty of spare time, for I noticed that at last Winnipeg election, they had plenty of time to come down and vote and spend a couple of days there, although it takes a couple of days to get to Winnipeg from Calgary, and a couple of days to get back.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman will turn up Mr. Rowe's report, he will see that the receipts on account of Crown timber for twelve months only amounted to $10,714, a ridiculously small sum to justify the retention of so large a staff.

Mr. DALY. That is the timber branch of his office. In addition, he is the agent of Dominion lands. That is the smallest part of his duties. There are thirteen clerks, and not eighteen as mentioned by the member for North York (Mr. Mulock).

Mr. MULLOCK. What other receipts are there besides timber dues ?

Mr. DALY. Homestead fees and everything pertaining to that branch of the service. On page 68, the hon. gentleman will see there is $11,316.48 collected from Dominion lands.

Mr. MULLOCK. There are $22,000 collected from the two branches at a cost of $10,191. Do you suppose that any land company, conducted on financial principles, would maintain this office at such an expense ? The thing is perfectly ridiculous. We know that the land companies have reduced their expenses on account of the falling off in the value of business ; yet though the Government business has fallen off, we find no attempt at a reduction.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman has taken the Auditor General's Report of 1892-93. There are three or four men mentioned in that report who are not now employed at all. The amount of receipts do not indicate the labour of the offices at all. We have ceased to sell pre-emptions, and consequently the receipts from Dominion lands have decreased and will continue to decrease, but the amount of work that has to be done is just the same.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand perfectly well that the amount of receipts do not indicate entirely the amount of work done. But still 50 per cent of the receipts paid out in salaries is so ridiculously out of all proportion, that no country would stand it, if the facts were made known. In 1882, when the receipts amounted to $1,500,000, and everything looked booming, it was right that we should have a large staff, and the offices were filled in anticipation of the work we might fairly look forward to. But everything has since collapsed, and our receipts are nothing compared to what they were, and it is about time that we put our staff on a footing commensurate with the work.

Mr. DALY. The actual salaries paid are $4,440, and that includes $1,200 to the agent.

Mr. MULOCK. There are a lot of other expenses.

Mr. DALY. You cannot have an office without expenses. That amount includes everybody there at present. The Auditor General's Report is no criterion as to how the office stands at all, because it is the report for 1892-93.

Mr. MULOCK. That is the account up to 30th June ?

Mr. DALY. For the year ending 30th June, 1893, just a year ago.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But the hon. gentleman must see that he is not asking any smaller sum than he asked for last year. Therefore, even though there may be a slight reduction in one town, there must be an increase in some other. The vote this year is $24,000 ; last year it was $23,700.

Mr. DALY. I admit there is no reduction ; but I think that before the end of next year there will be a considerable reduction.

Mr. MULOCK. Just to show how little is being done, I call the attention of the Minister and the committee to page 57 of the report of the Minister of the Interior. Crown Timber Agent Rowe writes to the Deputy of the Minister of the Interior under date of 6th January, 1894, as follows :—

SIR,—I beg leave to submit the annual report of the Crown Timber business of this office for the year ended the 31st October, 1893.

The output of timber for the Calgary Timber district has been much larger this year than heretofore, owing to the large number of settlers coming in.

Then he goes on to refer briefly and vaguely to the business done, and, proceeding to discuss mining, says :

No mining claims have been recorded during the past year in this agency, the only mining business done being the issuing of permits to settlers to mine coal under royalty for their own use.

There was practically no business in the Calgary office with respect to mining, either to accommodate settlers or to bring in money. The only thing this officer did apparently was to look after the timber business. Turning to page 59 you see what he had to do about the timber, for there is given a tabulated statement of the work of the office. As my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) says, the number of letters written was 2,234, or an average of about 7 a day. The number of letters received was somewhat larger than the number written. The number of free permits issued was 176, or an average of one every other day. The number of permits issued subject to dues was 10, or one every month and a fifth. The number of timber seizures issued was 3, or one every four months. The number of mill returns received and verified was 34, or about three a month. And schedule C, on the same page gives the number of saw-mills operated at 7. Now for that volume of business, the cost to the country is about $11,000. Comment is unnecessary. It is a disgrace to the department, and a gross waste of public money.

Mr. MARTIN. Hon. gentlemen who have been discussing these matters and who are surprised to find so many officials in this office, are perhaps not aware of the circumstances of that country. I may say though I have been in the North-west for some time, it has only recently come to my knowledge what the employment of a large number of these officials is. On going into the Territories on a political mission just before the assembling of this House, I found that many of the presidents and secretaries of the Conservative associations, the active officers who do the political work of the party were these very officials. So, while it may not be necessary for the purpose of collecting Government money that there should be so many clerks at Calgary and other points, these gentlemen have very large additions to their duties in the way of active political work for the party of gentlemen opposite. I understand that complaint is made that the Government employ gentlemen in the older provinces nominally in the public service, their time being devoted secretly to political work for the party. But, in the North-west, these gentlemen publicly accept the positions of president and secretary of Conservative associations. So hon. gentlemen must remember that, even though the duties of the department may not require such a large staff, the duties required of these gentlemen may be much heavier than we suppose.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Carried.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think the hon. gentleman should ask that the item be carried without an explanation. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has made statements which are very serious and which, if true, call for the instant dismissal of these officers. It is only recently that a man named Campbell, keeper of a lighthouse in the Maritime Provinces, expressed in a letter to a friend his wish that he should support some particular candidate in the municipal election, because it would assist in bringing the Liberals into power. He was dismissed from his office, I understand, without superannuation or anything else, although he had paid regularly—

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not a word of explanation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think the hon. gentleman should say there is not to be a word of explanation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I was not speaking to you.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman spoke loud enough to be heard across the House, and I supposed he was addressing the chair. Of course he can please himself about giving explanations. The statements made by the hon. member for Winnipeg are startling, and it is disgraceful to the Government if it allows officers of this kind to continue to hold office. It is an accepted principle that men cannot discharge their duties properly if they accept positions of prominence in political societies and devote their time and energies to a work of any political party. It has been recognized on both sides of the House, ever since I came in the House, that it is a sufficient cause for the instant dismissal of any official that he has become an offensive partisan. If these men are paid from the public funds of this country to do their work they should hold themselves strictly aloof from political societies of either party. If these men are acting openly as presidents and secretaries of political societies they deserve instant dismissal, and I hope that the Prime Minister will not resist the request for explanation upon this point. The statements of the hon. member for Winnipeg are made not from hear say but from personal knowledge. If, after such a charge has been made, the Minister has not a word to say, these officers will accept it as an endorsement from the department and an intimation that, instead of discharging their duties they may devote themselves to political work for their party.

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta). I rise to refute the statement of the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), so far as Alberta is concerned. I do not say a word with regard to any other constituency in the North-west. There is not now, and never has been, within my knowledge, a president or a secretary of any Conservative association, or of any other association connected with any political party holding any position under the Government. So far as Alberta is concerned none of the officers of the Government have interfered in the slightest degree with any of the elections that have been held in that constituency.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). I represent Eastern Assiniboia, and I desire to speak for that constituency. There has never been but one case of a Government officer holding a position of secretary of a Conservative association, and he has ceased to hold office under the Government.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am much surprised at the declaration of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), that after the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) the Minister of the Interior should rise and make some explanation. We have been for over two hours on one resolution, the salaries of a number of officers in the North-west connected with the service of the Dominion lands. If there is a complaint to be made as regards the conduct of any of those officials whose salaries we are voting, let us have the complaint stated and let us have his name. In relation to scores of officers, to make a general assertion that these men are members of Liberal-Conservative associations and spend their time in politics, is to make an assertion which ought not to be replied to; because the hon. member who makes that assertion can either specify the names of the offenders or he cannot; if he cannot, his statement is a disgraceful one, which merits no reply; if he can, justice to the public service requires that he should mention them, and until he mentions them, it is not surely for the Minister of the Interior to prove a negative with regard to all the officials in his service. Now, I would make in all calmness this statement with regard to our progress to-day. We went into Supply a few minutes after four o'clock, we have not yet passed the second resolution, and it is nearly ten o'clock. If it is the intention of our friends opposite that we shall not make any progress in Supply until after the Ontario elections are over, let us have a fair understanding on the subject, and we will go to other business; because the procedure of this House in Committee of Supply is such that a very few members can entirely obstruct progress in committee. I was reminded that the leader of the Opposition had given us to understand that we need not expect to make any progress until after the Ontario elections had been concluded; I really did not suppose that was the meaning of his observation upon the subject of our taking Mondays. But if it is understood that at this season of the year, when the heat is intense and the sittings of the House so uncomfortable, that we are not to be allowed to make any progress until the elections are over, let us know it at once, and we will go to something else.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the Prime Minister's statement is entirely incorrect. There has not been the slightest attempt to delay or obstruct the progress of proceedings. The hon. gentleman knows that the last session of the House on Friday witnessed a larger and more rapid passage of Estimates than on any previous occasion in the fourteen years I have been in the House. I have never in my life seen so much business carried through as was carried through on Friday night last. The hon. gentleman knows that the House did not meet to-night until half-past eight o'clock, it is now a little after half-past nine, and we have voted estimates amounting to $170,000, including the whole of the Dominion lands chargeable to income, and we are on the last vote now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You began by asking about the duties of officers whose salaries have been voted for eighteen years.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Because we had noticed that the receipts from all those offices had been reduced so enormously that we thought it was time the staff should be reduced too, and we could not find out what the duties of some of them were.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As if you did not know what the duties of the land commissioners were?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think any one is able to tell.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You did not expect a very detailed answer.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I asked a reasonable and fair question, to which I expected a reasonable answer, and with the report I have now in my hands, but which I had not under my hand at the moment, I think my hon. friend should see that I have asked no questions except what were legitimate. What I expected from the Minister was this, that when a statement was made such as my hon. friend made here with reference to these civil servants being engaged in political work, I expected to hear the Minister of the Interior make some answer.

Mr. DALY. Do you know why I did not answer? Because I did not believe it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He stated that he could name parties who took part in political work.

Mr. DALY. I put no faith in the hon. gentleman's statement, I did not believe it. Let him specify names and then I will answer.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He made such a statement as ought to call from the Minister a declaration as to whether he sanctioned such conduct.

Mr. DALY. I do not sanction it, because I say such a thing did not exist.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to say, with regard to the constituency of Alberta, whose member has spoken here, that the remarks I have made with regard to civil servants joining Conservative associations and taking an active part in politics do not apply to that constituency. But with regard to the hon. gentleman's constituency, I can give the names of two officials from Calgary, Mr. Amos Rowe, head of the office there, whose duties have been under discussion here for some time, and Mr. J. R. Sutherland, his assistant. These two gentlemen spent a week or ten days last November in political work in Winnipeg. They left their offices and came down to Winnipeg, and spent, I should think, a week or ten days endeavouring to prevent my being elected for the city of Winnipeg. Now, these are specific names that I offer. As to the constituency of Eastern Assiniboia, I repeat and emphasize the remarks I made before with regard to homestead inspectors. I am not very sure about their names, and therefore I will not mention them. But I can say this, that when I went there I was assured by most responsible and straightforward men, men whom I know to be reliable, that this was an ordinary practice. They did not make the charge as to one man, or as to two men, but as to the practice of the officials of the Government, saying that it was an understood thing that these men were active in political work, and held the secretaryship and presidentship of the local association. I took up the question on the platform in the presence of my opponents, and in no case was the charge denied. I may say that I will furnish to the hon. gentleman the names of those officials in Eastern and Western Assiniboia who have been active in elections and who have accepted those positions. I took it for granted, from the fact that I was assured this was the practice there for years, that these gentlemen considered it part of their duty to attend to this political work, to canvass for Government candidates, to join associations and become active in this way. But since the hon. gentleman repudiates that position, I will furnish him with the names of those who have done it. I may say that I spoke fully five or ten minutes in reference to this matter at Regina, at a public meeting which was largely attended by Conservatives, and there was no attempt whatever, either publicly or privately, to deny the statements I made. I may say that while I am able to mention some individuals there, I will not do so for fear I might mention some who are not as active as others. Under the circumstances, I shall not attempt to particularize now, but I will furnish this House with the names of those gentlemen who have taken the stand I have referred to.

Mr. McDONALD (East Assiniboia). I am very sorry the hon. member did not specify the names. I have lived for years in Assiniboia, and am one of the pioneers of that country. I am proud to say I have always been connected with the Conservative party, and I make the statement once more that I have never known but one of the Dominion officials to be an officer in a Conservative association, and he, to-day, has ceased to be such an officer.

Mr. LAURIER. Before this item is adopted, I would like to say a word with reference to the observations which fell from the First Minister. I am sorry to believe that hon. gentlemen on the other side are not in good humour to-night. It may, perhaps, be the result of the weather, which is very warm; at all events, on this side of the House we try to keep our heads cool. Now, I think the remarks of the Prime Minister were altogether unwarranted. Let me call attention to what took place to-day. We went into Committee of Supply at twenty minutes after five o'clock. We spent forty minutes, I admit, upon the first item for the expenditure in the Lieutenant-Governor's office, and I think the discussion was quite proper. At eight o'clock we had a division upon it; then four or five items were carried without a word of objection or even criticism, schools in unorganized districts, incidental justice, &c., addition to salary of clerks of Legislative Assembly, legal adviser, registrars, insane patients, Manitoba—not a word was said upon any of those items. Then we come to the next item, and not a word was said on that, but the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), and very properly so, called attention to some speeches made by the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west, which elicited some remarks from the Prime Minister, which were quite proper. Then we went into the subject we are now discussing. It came up under item 254, but the hon. gentleman opposite will admit there are different subjects grouped under one head. We wished explanations as regards the commissioner's salary, but not a word more was said than was necessary. As to the duties of the superintendent of mines, some criticism was offered, and it was elicited from the Minister of the Interior that the title "Commissioner of Mines" is a misnomer, that he does not superintend any mines at all.

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. LAURIER. Some criticism followed as regards the inspector, but certainly none of it went beyond the length that was legitimate. Now we are at the last item, and we have the statement made that certain officials under cover of their offices are carrying on political advocacy. I am glad to see by the silence of the Ministers that they do not approve of officers going into politics. I submit to the First Minister that these remarks were not uncalled for, and that there was not one remark offered that was unnecessary.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am not in the habit of reviewing discussions. If I chose to follow the example of the hon. gentleman I could give a rather ridiculous account of what has taken place to-day. Before six o'clock we were two hours in Committee of Supply, when the most rambling discussion heard in this House for years occurred. A discussion of one hour was carried on respecting the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories, and it took place on a vote for schools in the North-west, and while two or three items were allowed to go through without discussion, they were all subsequently discussed on items to which they were not relevant. I move that the committee rise and report resolutions.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 153) respecting the incorporation and regulation of Joint Stock Companies—(from the Senate).—(Sir John Thompson.)

Bill (No. 152) respecting Insolvency—(from the Senate).—(Sir John Thompson.)

TRIAL OF JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

Bill (No. 112) respecting arrest, trial and imprisonment of youthful offenders was read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MULOCK. What is the difference between section 1 and section 1 of the code as repealed?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The object of the section is to make a separate time and place for the trial of juvenile offenders. That is now left optional. It is observed by a great many magistrates from motives of humanity, and a statute of Ontario provides that this shall be done in respect to offences against the law of the province.

Mr. MULOCK. There is probably no objection to young people, sixteen or under, being so tried, but I hope this measure will not be made a precedent, and the age extended to adult persons. The administration of justice should take place publicly, and not in camera, as is now becoming the fashion in many parts of the country. The administration of justice is educational in its effects on the general public, as well as punitive in regard to the persons under trial. Both features should be regarded and all trials of criminals should be conducted in public with the exception, perhaps, of such cases as are covered by this Bill. I do not know how far this measure goes, but perhaps it is justifiable. Whenever trials take place secretly there is a danger of justice being interfered with through favouritism, influence, perhaps under regard for humanity, tenderness of heart and so on. As a rule I think it is unsound to withdraw the trial of accused persons from the eye of the public.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In reply to the hon. gentleman's inquiry, I desire to say that the language of the code is: "such persons under fifteen years shall so far as it appears expedient and practicable." This section is to make it obligatory with the justices in every case.

Mr. MULOCK. Have cases arisen calling for this change?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. A great many magistrates decline to observe the code as not being obligatory in that respect.

Mr. MULOCK. I suppose there has been some recommendation from some of those various charities in favour of this Bill.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, the change has been urged upon us by persons interested in the care of children. The Children's Aid Society has been very strongly recommended on account of their good work among children. The Ontario Government has joined their intercession with those of philanthropists to have this change adopted. The idea is that a person under twelve years, if a male, and under thirteen, if a female, shall be dealt with to a large extent by the magistrates and police, with the assistance of the officers of the Children's Aid Societies, whose business it is to see that homes are got for them, if it be possible; to see that their antecedents are looked into for the purpose of ascertaining whether their surroundings at home are such that they can be safely entrusted to their parents or guardians, or are such that in the cause of humanity they should be removed from their care. It is also intended to carry out more effectively the system of suspended offences with regard to children.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

CONSOLIDATED REVENUE AND AUDIT ACT.

Bill (No. 127) to amend the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, was read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The object of the Bill is this: the officers who are engaged in the collection of the revenue were, when the Revised Statutes were passed, almost entirely officers of the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments, and the Acts with respect to the officers of these departments gave ample protection against actions and prosecutions for the things which were done by them in relation to their duty. But certain changes have been made during the last five or six years, by which the collection of revenue is in many cases entrusted to a different class of officers. For example, the rents which formerly were collected by the officers of the Inland Revenue are now collected by the officers of the Railways and Canals Department and the protection which exists in the Act relating to the Railways and Canals Department, does not extend to their officers engaged in the collection of revenue. That is an example, and for this reason it was thought better to introduce this as an amendment to the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, in order that it shall have general application to all our officers engaged in the collection of revenue.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has the hon. gentleman considered about our jurisdiction in this matter?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Because the general impression is, and some of our courts have so decided, that we have no jurisdiction to describe the manner in which the pleadings shall be given, and notice of action.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It strikes me that we have the power to enact—I am only stating the argument, because no one can be dogmatic on such a point—by what class of officers our revenue shall be collected, and what shall be the conditions under which these officers shall perform their duty. We therefore have the right to limit the powers and rights of persons with whom they deal as well as to describe the rights and powers of the officers themselves. That is the principle upon which enactments of this character have been passed in former days. The only question which can be raised in regard to it—and a question which is more specious than otherwise—is: that while the power seems more clear when we are dealing with the special subject itself—as for example, with Customs or Inland Revenue—it appears more closely connected with that branch of legislation to say that the officers of those departments shall be clothed with the protection usually given to public officers as regards limitation of action and so forth; and it may seem more remote from the subject of legislation when we come to deal generally with those officers who are not immediately associated with the legislation affecting their department. Still, I think that the principle extends equally to the other class of legislation; that is, legislation which deals with our officers generally and does not deal with them in relation to the legislation of their particular department. The Imperial Parliament has passed an Act of a like character (chapter 61 of the Acts of 1893). I have had that carefully examined, but I have not found anything instructive in it, or any improvement upon the provision that we had with regard to our officers previously. I am aware that during the proceedings in trials it has been customary to contest the right of our Parliament to legislate with regard to the protection of its officers, and with regard to evidence that should be received in proof of charges; but so far as my experience goes our right has not been negatived by any decision.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not challenge the justice underlying legislation of this kind. I think it is fair and right that the different officers should be protected in the discharge of their duties when they proceed loyally to discharge them, even if in the discharge of them they commit trespass for which they are civilly liable. Nor can I challenge our right to legislate upon the performance by them of their several respective duties, and everything which is necessary and incidental to the performance of those duties of course entirely falls within the purview of our powers. But when you come to describe the manner and form in which actions shall be brought, the notice which must be given before it is brought, the mode in which the proceedings and pleadings must be conducted; then it seems to me that you are entrenching upon powers which are relegated exclusively to the Local Legislatures. At all events so it has been held in one or two cases in which I was interested, and it seems to me that the argument was irresistible that this was a civil procedure exclusively. However, if Parliament chooses to proceed along the line which I admit we have followed in the past, I have nothing more to say about it than to express my opinion that we are dealing with matters beyond our powers.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

SPEAKER OF THE SENATE.

Bill (No. 89) respecting the Speaker of the Senate, was read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I believe that this Bill received the attention of the House to some extent last session. It has passed the Senate in two successive sessions. The circumstances which gave rise to it were connected with the indisposition of the present Speaker of the Senate, whose duties have been sometimes too onerous for him, considering his state of health, and whose duties have been, once or twice, interrupted by illness of a member of his family; the attention of the Senate having been in that way called to the inconvenience of there being no provision by which the Chair could be taken in his absence by another member of the Senate. It is not proposed by this Bill to provide for a permanent officer as a Deputy Speaker of the Senate, but it is proposed that when the Speaker is unable to proceed, or in his unavoidable absence, the Senate may call some other member to the Chair to take his place and discharge his duties. I am aware that important objections have been raised to the constitutional validity of a measure of this character. These found expression last session in a very learned and elaborate argument in the Senate by my good friend Judge Gow-an, and I think his observations on the subject were renewed this session; and I saw by 'Hansard' of last session that in this House they were challenged by very high authority, and considered worthy of an elaborate argument here. I do not profess at all to be such an authority as to undertake to override the objections which have been urged; but I submit to the House this principle is sound, namely, that a difficulty of that character should no longer remain unsolved, but should find a prompt remedy; and the proposition I have to make is that this measure shall be passed, providing that the Senate may call to its Chair in the unavoidable absence of the Speaker, a substitute, who may discharge his duties, but that the Act shall not come into force until its provisions have been carefully considered and reviewed as to their constitutionality. For that reason the Bill closes with a clause providing that its operation should be suspended for Her Majesty's own assent, to be announced by proclamation in the 'Canada Gazette.' Then only shall the Act come into force. In the meantime, my proposal is that we shall call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the arguments which have been advanced against the constitutionality of the Bill, setting forth, in detail, those arguments, with such observations on the other side, as shall appear suitable and proper; that we shall ask Her Majesty's Government that the Bill be made the subject of consideration by the law officers of Her Majesty, in order that, if the doubts of its constitutionality are shared by them, Her Majesty may be pleased to give direction that Her Majesty's Government may initiate in Her Imperial Parliament, legislation to amend the British North America Act to the extent of authorizing the Senate to elect a Deputy Speaker under the circumstances I have mentioned. It seems to me that that is the most satisfactory way of solving the difficulty—better, perhaps, than the way proposed last session, which was simply to take hold of the subject by the force of a statute, passing it into law and leaving its validity to be questioned and settled afterwards. I need not, this evening, review the objections which have been raised against the constitutionality of this measure, although they are exceedingly interesting. They arise from this contention, that this power has not been expressly conferred upon the Senate, although it has been expressly conferred on this House, by the British North America Act. In these circumstances, I think this is the most appropriate way of meeting a difficulty which, I think, ought to be met and ought to be solved.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

THE RATE OF INTEREST.

Bill (No. 129) further to amend the Revised Statute respecting interest was read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Those who were present when I introduced this Bill will remember that I explained its operation in relation to British Columbia, where a question arose in consequence of legislation in this House repealing the provisions of the interest Act, in so far as judgments were concerned in that provinces. A memo. on the subject, which was prepared for me states the case briefly, and I propose to read it. Certain correspondence has taken place relating to a draft Bill amending the law of interest, in so far as British Columbia is concerned. The Bill is in terms the same as 52 Victoria, chapter 31, which applies to the North-west Territories only. The occasion for the Act is that two judges of the Supreme Court of British Columbia have held that a judgment debt in that province carries interest at 4 per cent only; and as to county court judgments, under the decision of the Queen versus the County Court Judge of Essex and Clarke, 15 Queen's Bench division, page 704, it has been held that the judgment of a county court in England would not bear interest under the 1 and 2 Victoria, chapter 110, section 17, which enactment would appear to be inapplicable in the case of British Columbia. At any rate there would appear to be sufficient doubt on this question to justify the Act. Now, the language of the first and second Victoria, chapter 110, section 17, which is the authority applying to the question of interest on judgments, is as follows:—Every judgment debt shall carry interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from the time of entering up the judgment until the same shall be satisfied, and such interest may be levied under writ of execution on such judgment.

Mr. MULOCK. Is that a local statute?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is an Imperial statute, and it applies to British Columbia, in consequence of the extent to which they have adopted the Imperial statutes. It appears to be the only provision left on that subject, and as hon. members will know, from the memo. I have read, in the first instance that only gives 4 per cent interest on judgments, and has been held not to extend to county court judgments. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Corbould) is more familiar with the subject than I am, and he will give any further explanations that may be necessary.

Mr. MARTIN. It strikes me that this question of interest upon judgments is a matter of provincial concern. I did not catch from the First Minister's statement that there were any circumstances which distinguished British Columbia from the other provinces; and unless there are, the other provinces, in undertaking to regulate the interest upon judgments, have exceeded their jurisdiction. Of course the British North America Act provides that the question of interest shall belong to the Dominion Parliament; but my understanding is that the word "interest," as there used, applies only to commercial cases. It appears in connection with bills of exchange and promissory notes, and I would understand how interest in commercial matters, for instance a law respecting usury, should be passed here. This question was brought up before the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of Morden vs. South Dufferin, two or three years ago. The question in dispute was whether the Manitoba Government Legislature has jurisdiction to provide for interest upon taxes. A law was passed in Manitoba providing that if taxes were not paid on a certain day, 10 per cent would be added as interest. The Manitoba court held that the Act was unconstitutional, and the Manitoba Government took the case to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court decided both ways. In the first instance, the court decided that it was not necessarily interest, but the court went further and held that if the Manitoba Legislature had said that interest at the rate of 10 per cent was to be added to these taxes, that would have been perfectly constitutional. Of course, I do not desire to oppose this Bill, because it cannot do any harm, if the British Columbia authorities desire it. But it strikes me that if the course we are asked to adopt be right, then the course we have taken in Manitoba and the other provinces must be wrong.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have not overlooked the view presented by the hon. gentleman. One could hardly do so because all the provincial statutes contain provisions of a similar character as regards taxes, and likewise provisions as regards the awarding of interest for non-payment of debts certain while they are in liquidation. I think that the view generally adopted is that the interest in those cases is awarded as a penalty for non-payment of the principal. In other words, it is damages for the delay in payment, and therefore comes within civil procedure. So, I think the line of reasoning with regard to taxes, is that the interest is prescribed as a penalty for non-payment of the amount within a specified time; but the general view adopted here has been that as regards general legislation concerning all debts bearing interest, without any specified contract to that effect and without relation to civil procedure respecting litigation, such legislation is within our jurisdiction, and this Parliament has passed legislation with respect to the interest which judgments shall bear in the different provinces. We had such legislation with respect to British Columbia, but for some reason that is not in my mind at the moment, that legislation was dropped. Hence the difficulty that suggested itself to the courts in British Columbia and which we propose to remedy.

Mr. LAURIER. Does the hon. gentleman regard this question as free from doubt?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not entirely.

Mr. MARTIN. I would draw attention to the case I refer to of South Dufferin vs. Morden. Supreme Court reports, Vol. 19, page 224. As the hon. gentleman has said, the decision of the court went more upon the question he has referred to, as to its being a penalty for non-payment, but Mr. Justice Patterson said:

I have no idea that either process, as employed in the adjustment of the amount to be exacted under the enactment in question, is a subject of the class denoted by the word "interest" in article 19. We find that article associated with others numbered from 14 to 21, all of which relate to the general commercial and financial system of the country at large. No. 19 is 'ejusdem generis' with the others, and does not, in my judgment, include the matter of merely provincial concern with which we are now dealing. This is a phase of the subject which it does not appear to me that we are required to consider exhaustively at present. It would appear that interest on judgments is just such a matter of provincial concern as interest upon taxes.

On section 1,

Mr. MULOCK. If it had been proposed to extend that clause to all the provinces, I think I would have suggested that the word "six" should be struck out and a lower rate substituted. But if British Columbia, through its representatives, declares that it is satisfied with the rate of six per cent, I would not interfere. But, as the rate fixed by statute—what is known as the legal rate of interest—has always been a somewhat lower rate than that which rules between individuals, to fix 6 per cent for the older provinces would be too high, however, since, as I suppose, they have a higher rate in British Columbia than this, I am not going to object to this rate being fixed.

Mr. CORBOULD. The rate of 6 per cent is a very reasonable one for British Columbia. We have been in the habit of paying a very much higher rate. When I first went to British Columbia the rate was 12 per cent. Since that time it has been 10 per cent, and later it has come down to

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

8 per cent. We pay bank interest of 8 and 9 per cent regularly.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It appears to me that in this matter—and I have thought over it a great deal since the Bill was brought in—the measure is within our jurisdiction. English common law, as I understand it, does not give interest on a judgment—

Mr. MULOCK. Until the verdict is entered.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No, not even when the verdict is entered, does it bear interest. The judgment itself does not bear interest. You might afterwards sue upon a judgment and ask a jury to give you a verdict with interest. But the law is absolutely plain—and I have had it argued out and decided—that a judgment does not bear interest under the common law. Then, if it were true that each legislature had a right to regulate the interest on judgments, some of them might fix the rate at 10 or 20 per cent, contrary to the policy of this Legislature. I think we have the right to say that a debt, whether it is on a note of hand or secured under judgment and does not bear any specific interest, shall not bear more than 6, or 7, or 8 per cent. I think it comes within the provision of the British North America Act and is under our jurisdiction.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

BOARDS OF TRADE.

Bill (No. 142) to amend the Act respecting the incorporation of boards of trade, was read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the meaning of that?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The whole object is to give validity to the organization of some boards of trade that have been established in the North-west Territories, and as to which the legislation was not specific. Under this section this would describe a district as it is defined in the Territories.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This deals with the whole Dominion.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes; but the change applies only to the North-west Territories. I was going to say that the question has arisen with reference to a board of trade at Edmonton. Application has been made to have the jurisdiction properly defined. The Minister of the Interior is anxious to relieve the board of trade from the difficulty in which they find themselves and that is the reason for making the Bill retroactive; we have all rights, of course.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

CULLING TIMBER.

Bill (No. 124) further to amend the Cullers' Act, was read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAURIER. What is the difference between the amendments and the present law ?

Mr. SPEAKER. I have seen the Bill just now for the first time, but I think the difference is this, that in the old Act it was provided that timber should be measured or counted, and with regard to square timber, it is a matter of absolute necessity for statistical and other purposes that the measurement at least should be made by a licensed culler. I think that is the difference between this Act and the old Act.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will read the old Act, section 42 :

Nothing in this act shall make it compulsory to have any article of lumber measured, culled or assorted, under this act, if such lumber is shipped for exportation by sea on account, in good faith, of the actual and bona fide producer or manufacturer thereof ; but all other lumber shipped for exportation by sea, shall be either measured culled or counted, at the option of the person interested, by a licensed culler.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

IRRIGATION IN THE N.W.T.

Bill (No. 134) respecting the utilization of the waters of the North-west Territories for irrigation and other purposes, was read the second time, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 4.

Mr. DALY. The chief provisions of the Bill are founded on legislation on the subject of irrigation passed by the Legislatures of New South Wales, and Victoria, and the Australian colonies generally, and by California, Idaho and Colorado in the United States. The most important provisions are contained in sections 4 and 5 in the Bill. Section 4 provides :

The right to the use of all water at any time in any river, stream, watercourse, lake, creek, ravine, canon, lagoon, swamp, marsh or other body of water whether surface or subterranean shall, for the purpose of this Act, in every case be deemed to be vested in the Crown until the contrary is proved by establishing any other right than that of the Crown to the use of such water ; and, save in the exercise of any legal right existing at the time of such diversion or use, no person shall divert or use any water from any river, stream, watercourse, lake, creek, ravine, canon, lagoon, swamp, marsh or other body of water, whether surface or subterranean, otherwise than under the provisions of this Act.

This clause is taken from the Australian Act, the Act of the Colony of Victoria passed in 1886. It means that the right to the use of all waters at any time in any river, stream, &c., is forbidden ; also in so far as the riparian proprieties are concerned on lands for which the title is vested in the Crown, these rights are done away with entirely. It has been found in regard to irrigation in California that the question of riparian rights has given rise to more litigation than any other matter, and millions have been expended on it. The necessity for irrigation has arisen in the North-west Territories in that portion lying between the international boundary on the south and the Missouri Coteau on the east, which would cross the Canadian Pacific Railway at Mortlake, and run up to the Bad Hills and from there to the Rockies, covering forty-three million acres, and, therefore, it is necessary that measure of this kind should be passed and particularly as regards that portion of the North-west to which the Bill will be applicable. Irrigation has been commenced there on a small scale and has been productive of much benefit. At a meeting of the Irrigation League at Calgary resolutions were passed as follows :—

That this Convention, consisting of representatives of the agricultural and commercial of Central and South Alberta, desirous to impress upon the Dominion Government the importance of irrigation to the portion of the North-west Territories in question and the desirability of all action possible being taken by the Dominion Government and Parliament for the promotion thereof.

That in the opinion of this Convention it is most desirable in the best interests of the North-west Territories that a statute should be passed of the Dominion of Canada in which it shall be enacted that from and after the passing of such statute no person or corporation shall take, acquire, receive, or become entitled to any riparian right in any rivers free, watercourse, lake, creek, canyon, lagoon, swamp or marsh.

That this Convention impresses on Parliament the necessity of adequate protection of all existing water rights in the events of applications of irrigation charters.

The clauses in the present Bill will meet the views expressed by the Irrigation League at their convention.

Mr. MULOCK. They will go much further. They will interfere with a man owning a well on his own lot.

Mr. DALY. All those matters are provided for. In the literature entitled "Irrigation in the Territories" which has been spread broadcast, the Irrigation League say :

It has been demonstrated beyond all possibility of cavil that irrigation has worked wonders in the arid lands immediately to the south of our North-west Territory. It has also been shown by actual experience that in the Territories themselves the same results follow the application of water to arid soils. Wherever irrigation has been attempted in Southern Alberta it has been absolutely successful. Many gardens in Calgary have been irrigated by means of the Calgary water works and although the soil of the Calgary bottom has not been regarded as very favourable either for farm or garden product the yield of roots and vegetables with the assistance of the water has been most abundant, great in size and excellent in quality.

The case of Messrs. Hull is mentioned, also that of Mr. John Quirk, on Cheap Creek, some ranchers on High River and Elbow River. In explanation of the sources from which we expect to obtain water the supply for irrigation purposes will be chiefly from the following rivers:—First, those which obtain their waters from the Rocky Mountains, and are at their flood when the water is most required, namely, between 20th May and 20th August: Red Deer, Ghost Bow, Kananaskis, Elbow, Sheep, High River, Old Man, Waterton, Belly, St. Mary's and South Saskatchewan. The water in them and all other sources of supply can no doubt be greatly increased in value for irrigation purposes by the erection of reservoirs or in the vicinity of said waters, storing the same. Second, those which head in the foot hills of the Rocky Mountains where, however, there is generally for a greater portion of the year a very considerable source of supply of water, namely: Beaver Dam, Dog Pond, Little Red Deer, Fish Creek, Little Bow River, Willow, Trout, Beaver, Lee's Creek and Milk River. Third, those which obtain their source of supply chiefly from the Cypress Hills and Wood Mountain, namely: Maple, Piapot, Skull, Swift Current Creek, Wood Mountain, Big Muddy, Poplar and White Mountain Rivers.

Mr. MULLOCK. How will water be distributed over the land?

Mr. DALY. By ditches, as in other countries. The same rules will obtain as in California, Idaho and Colorado, and in all States of the Union, and the parties will be subject to rules prescribed by the Order in Council, regulating the quantity to be used. The question of irrigation has become a most important one in many states of the Union. I find according to the report of the select committee on irrigation of the United States Congress, that over two-fifths of the area of the United States requires irrigation. It is estimated that one million two hundred thousand square miles, or one-third larger than British India, is covered by this area. All the country west except Washington and the northern portion of California require irrigation. We find that irrigation was first begun by the Anglo-Saxons of the United States in Utah, and the amount of land under cultivation by irrigation in Utah is 600,000 acres, which can be increased to about 3,000,000 acres. Why I mention Utah in this connection is, that as the hon. gentlemen may be aware, we have had a settlement of Mormons from there in the southern portion of the territory which is sought to be irrigated. These men have brought with them their knowledge and experience of irrigation and have illustrated there what can be done by irrigation. From conversations I have had with them, they tell me that this being a clay subsoil they can cover twice as much land with half the water that they could in Utah. As I explained previously this clause which we are considering, is taken from the Acts of the Victoria Legislature passed in 1886, and was the outcome of the experience that our cousins in Victoria had in relation to irrigation legislation. It was found that unless the principle was laid down that the right to the use of water at any time, in any river, stream, watercourse or body of water vested in the Crown, should be held by the Crown to be disposed of as it saw fit, that it would lead to interminable litigation and to the troubles the people of California had experienced. So far as subterranean wells are concerned, this Bill differs from the legislation of Victoria, as they did not provide for subterranean waters: but we took our provision in this respect from the legislation of California and Colorado.

Mr. DALY

Mr. MULLOCK. To what extent will you control subterranean waters? Suppose a man sinks a well on his own land himself, is he to own that?

Mr. DALY. Certainly and no person would have a right to interfere. He would first have to make application for a license, and then if he intruded on any other person's land, or deprived him of the water, he would have to make compensation. Clause 5 is intended to do away with the exclusive rights of riparian proprietors.

Mr. MULLOCK. Clause 5 goes further than that, and if that is what is intended the clause will have to be amended.

Mr. DALY. I propose to amend that clause by adding the words, "until the contrary is proved" before the first part of the clause.

Mr. MARA. The objection taken by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) is a good one. If a man sinks a well on his own farm, he certainly should have the right to that water and the Government should not attempt to deprive him of the water he requires.

Mr. DALY. That is provided for in a subsequent clause of the Bill. It is not the intention to deprive him of the water.

Mr. MULLOCK. Suppose a man sinks a well on his own farm which has been granted to him in fee simple, is he to have the exclusive use of that well or is he not? What is the policy of the Government in that?

Mr. DALY. He is to have the exclusive use of the waters in that well, but any person desiring to go on the land for the purpose of sinking another well in order to get at the spring will be enabled to do it under the provisions of the Act. But he must compensate the owner, and he must not deteriorate or diminish the water of the owner in this well.

Mr. MULOCK. If it is intended to allow the owner of the land to have exclusive use of any water he succeeds in making available it will be necessary to amend sections 4 and 5.

Mr. DALY. Clause 30 provides for that.

Mr. MULOCK. Not at all. It does not give the exclusive use. The question is: is a man to own a well which he sinks on his own land or not?

Mr. DALY. Most assuredly he does. If the hon. gentleman will read section 30 in connection with section 5, he will see that that is provided for.

Mr. MARA. If a man sinks a well on his own property he should have not only the right to use that water himself, but to sell it to his neighbours if he wishes.

Mr. DALY. Under sections 5 and 30 he has the right to use the water for domestic purposes; but if by sinking an artesian well he takes water from people who have already sunk wells in the adjoining properties, he will be liable.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister is going further than any of the Bills asked for, and I think he is getting into deep water.

Mr. DALY. I am not attempting to go further than the legislation that already exists in the states to the south of us. Ours is surrounded with greater safeguards. In Colorado and California the powers are broader than ours.

Mr. LAURIER. The case submitted by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), and the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Mara), is this: has a man a right to sink a well and use it exclusively for domestic purposes?

Mr. DALY. Most assuredly he has.

Mr. LAURIER. That may be the hon. gentleman's intention, but it is not expressed in the Bill.

Mr. MARA. But I maintain that a man who is successful in finding water on his own farm should have the right to use it, not only for domestic purposes but also for irrigation.

Mr. DALY. I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to section 8 and section 9.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the hon. Minister is confounding two principles. The ownership of water that comes in small quantities, percolating through the surface and ultimately creating springs from which wells may be made to supply sufficient water for domestic uses, is always considered as vested in the owner of the land. The case is different where you are dealing with a flowing stream which may be intercepted by riparian owners, and may be used as it passes along without diverting the stream. A flowing stream does not become the exclusive property of any one, and therefore I can realize the justice of the Government protecting and making the very best use of streams, creeks and even large bodies of water in the form of lakes and basins. But the other class of water has always been recognized as the property of the owner of the land, and I would recommend the hon. Minister not to legislate further than the one class to which I have alluded. I would regard it as prejudicial to the settlement of the country. If a man is considering whether he will settle in the Northwest, and he is told that under our laws he may sink a well and yet not own it, and that his neighbour will have the right to set the machinery of Government at work and take from him a large portion of the fruits of his labour, he will be discouraged with the enterprise, and with such an unfair law on the Statute-book, may hesitate to take up land in our midst. Unless the principle has already been in force in other countries and the hon. gentleman has evidence as to how it works, he should hesitate before making the experiment here. The document representing the views of the people of the North-west does not, I understand, ask for legislation of this kind.

Mr. DALY. Subterranean waters have been recognized in California and Colorado as one of the chief sources for irrigation purposes, and it is just as necessary that the subterranean waters should be controlled, as the waters of creeks, lagoons, marshes and the other sources from which they come. We do not seek to take away from any one any rights he enjoys at present as regards water for domestic purposes.

Mr. LAURIER. You do.

Mr. DALY. Our legislation is based exactly on the legislation of other countries.

Mr. LAURIER. I have no doubt the Bill is a very useful one, but it would be well that we should know at once how we stand. Objection is taken, and rightly, I believe, that this law should not be so rigorous as to prevent a man sinking a well on his own property and using it. The hon. gentleman refers us to clause 8, which says that any water, the property in which is vested in the Crown may be acquired for domestic, irrigation or other purposes. But clause 4 provides all waters are vested in the Crown, subterranean as well as surface. Then clause 8 provides that all applications shall have precedence, according to the date of filing, and the purposes for which the right to water may be acquired are three classes: first, domestic purposes; second, irrigation purposes; and third, other purposes. So that, if application be made for domestic purposes by a neighbour or a second neighbour, the proprietor of the land on which the water is found may only come third in rank, and his neighbours will be served before him, even for domestic purposes. The owner of the soil has not at all a privilege, but must take rank according to the order in which his application was filed. I understand that is not the intention of the hon. gentleman, but that his intention is to reserve to the owner of the soil his right in the water on his own land for domestic purposes. If that be so, the Bill does not carry out that intention.

Mr. DALY. I am sorry that I am not able to make myself clear or that the Bill does not explain itself. Section 30, it seems to me, preserves the right of the owner of the land to sinking wells thereon and using the water, and no person can take that right from him. According to clause 4, all waters are vested in the Crown, but a reservation is made protecting the exercise of any legal right existing at the time, and that legal right would mean the use of water for domestic or other purposes. However, as we are not likely to make much progress with the Bill to-night, I move that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 89) respecting the Speaker of the Senate—(from the Senate.)—(Sir John Thompson.)

THE JUDGES OF THE SUPREME COURT OF CANADA.

House resolved itself into committee to consider resolution respecting the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will explain briefly what the nature of the resolution is.

Mr. LAURIER.

The scheme for improving the salaries of the judiciary of Canada did not include, and does not include, any improvement of the salaries paid to the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada ; but it is believed that a concession might properly be made in regard to that particular Bench, which would tend to the improvement of their position and render to some extent more desirable the offices they hold, and that is by making provision that some of them may retire on full salary, instead of the two-thirds pension which falls to other judges for the time to come ; that is to say, when a judge has served for fifteen years and has reached seventy years of age it will be optional on his part to retire on full salary instead of the two-thirds salary allowed.

Mr. LAURIER. I am sorry to say that I cannot at all agree to the legislation now proposed. This resolution applies only to a certain class of judges, namely, to the judges of the Supreme Court. If there was any reason whatever for this legislation, there was no reason why it should apply to one class of judges and not another, and why it should not apply to all judges appointed by the Dominion Government. The hon. Prime Minister has given no reason why the course now proposed should commend itself to the judgment of the committee, and, moreover, I am at a loss to see why the judges of the Supreme Court, or the judges of any court should be allowed to retire on full pay and not submit to the ordinary law, that is to say that a judge should receive pay as long as he gives his services to the state, but as soon as he ceases to give an adequate return, he should no longer receive the full amount of his salary. The reason the hon. gentleman has given—in fact, he has given no reason but has simply made a statement—is not such as can commend itself to the judgment of the committee. I cannot agree to the motion, and if carried, it must be carried by the power of the Government, which of course they can exercise ; but at the same time I must say to the hon. gentleman that I do not believe the course he is pursuing will commend itself to the judgment of the people.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the argument developed by the hon. leader of the Opposition commends itself to my judgment as quite logical ; as the principle involved in this proposition, if adopted, would, sooner or later, be made applicable to all the judges of the several courts of the Dominion. Should the Government not follow that course, they would not be dealing fairly by the other members of the judiciary, for the judges mentioned in this resolution receive a higher salary, and on resigning their office are given a larger retiring allowance than their brethren of the judicial order. The resolution now before the House, providing that judges shall retire on full pay whenever, after having reached the age of seventy years, they have served for fifteen years, is not one which should commend itself to our favourable consideration. A judge who has reached the age limit cannot invoke as an excuse for remaining on the Bench, and for drawing a large salary, the expenditure connected with the maintenance of his family, for, at that time of life, his family is provided for, and all he needs is an annuity sufficient to enable him to support himself and his wife. Further, the salary of the Supreme Court and Superior Court judges are high enough, and their two-thirds pension is quite sufficient to maintain them in the position in which they should be maintained, even after leaving the Bench. It is not fair for judges, as they are sometimes wont to do, to compare their salaries with those received by judges in other countries. Their functions are just as exalted here as anywhere else; but as regards the remuneration of their services, it is quite different. In England and in the United States, judges are paid higher salaries, in proportion to the population and resources of those large countries. I fully concur in the remarks which fell from the hon. leader of the Opposition. We ought to bear in mind the fact that ours is still a young country, whose resources and wealth, being in course of evolution, have not yet reached their full development, and our means, therefore, are limited. On these grounds, I would urge the Government not to press the resolution now before the House. The salary of the Supreme Court judges is fixed at a rate high enough for the country to boast of its generous and fair treatment of the judiciary.

Mr. AMYOT. I fully concur in the resolution before the House, and I consider it a step in the right direction. I believe that all the judges of our superior courts should have the same privilege, not as a personal matter to them, but for the public good. The work imposed upon our judges of the Superior Court—I speak, of course, for the judges of the province of Quebec, because I know the amount of work they have to do is immense. When they have been on the Bench for fifteen years and have attained the age of seventy, surely they should have the right to withdraw, and not be compelled to stay on the Bench, enfeebled as they may be at that age and physically weak enough to prevent them from bringing to their important duties all the clearness of intellect which the proper discharge of their duties requires. I hope that this resolution is only a preliminary step towards a general law in the same direction regarding all the judges of the superior courts.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I regret that I cannot at all agree with this resolution, or with the remarks of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). It will be noticed by the committee that if there is any value at all in the reasons of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Amyot) this resolution ought not to pass; because if his reasoning is sound the resolution should be broadened in its scope and made to apply to the judges of all the provinces. Now, what is the resolution before us? We have a law at present which provides that in cases where the faculties of the judges are impaired, or where they become sick or unable to perform their duties, that ipso facto they can retire and receive two-thirds of their salary. There is a provision further, that whether they be sick or well, if they have served a certain length of time, irrespective of the state of their health, they can also retire and receive two-thirds of their salary. Speaking for myself, and speaking as a lawyer, I think that is a very liberal, a very generous and at the same time a just law. I know of no reason in the world why judges should be singled out, apart from and beyond all other officers of the public service, and be enabled when they have attained a certain age to retire, and to receive, after they have ceased to do any work for the community, the full salary that they received when they were actually doing the work. A few years ago there was a strong feeling existing in the province of Quebec and Ontario to increase the salaries of all the judges, or at any rate to increase the salaries of those of the judges who in the larger cities of the Dominion were supposed to do an exceptional amount of work. But, Sir, that proposition—if it ever went as far as a proposition—that suggestion was not received with approval by the general mass of the public, and I think I may go so far as to say that it did not meet with the approval of the majority of the members of this House. At any rate the expressions of opinion that were given in the House when the proposition came before it, would lead one to the conclusion that a large majority of the House were opposed to increasing the salaries of the judges. If that were the case a few years ago, I would like to know: are the conditions of the country so changed that it is desirable now to do in this respect what the House would not do a few years ago? I think myself that there are perhaps a few judges who do an exceptional amount of work in the city of Montreal, and perhaps in the city of Toronto, and that possibly it may be, in consequence of the extra duties they have to perform, that their cases might be supposed to require exceptional treatment. But, apart from that, I think it is pretty generally acknowledged that in the existing condition of things in this country, and compared with the salaries we pay to other officials, our judges are not underpaid. It has been very often questioned whether, with the salaries we pay at present and with the inducements we offer, we are able to obtain the services of the best men for the judiciary. But it must be apparent to hon. members, that it is not only the salaries we pay which induce eminent lawyers to accept the position.

The salaries may not be as large as the earnings of a first-class counsel; but a prominent counsel, who, perhaps, may be in receipt of from $10,000 to $20,000 a year, knows that if his faculties become impaired, or if ill-health visits him, his income disappears like snow before the summer sun and he loses it entirely. The practising lawyer, however eminent, is not guaranteed an income in perpetuity, but a judge who goes on the Bench and receives his $6,000 or $7,000 a year, knows that in good health or in ill-health, after he has served some fifteen years, he can retire from the Bench and receive two-thirds of his salary. And, if after he has served one year his faculties become impaired or his health becomes such that he cannot discharge his duties, he is enabled to retire instantaneously and also receive two-thirds of his pay. There are, therefore, very great inducements—and I do not say they are at all improper inducements—to leading counsel to accept positions on the judiciary. Glancing over the judiciary of the several provinces, we find very excellent men on the Bench. At any rate, it has been expressed in this House time and again, that, speaking generally, and with very rare exceptions, we have a right to be proud of the judges of the land. We have no reason to doubt that we have men whose experience and intellectual attainments fully justify their appointment to the positions they hold. Our experience since Confederation in Canada has shown us that so far from not having been able to obtain first-class men at the present salaries we pay our judges, and on account of the extra inducements we offer, we have succeeded in obtaining the best men for nearly all the judicial positions. That being the case, I submit that some very strong reasons should be given to this House to induce us to consent to what is undoubtedly a permanent addition to the taxes of the people. Have any good reasons in support of the passage of this resolution been given? I appeal to hon. gentlemen on both sides, whether any reason has been given for this increased taxation which should weigh for a second with anybody. The conditions of the country are not what they were a few years ago. Men are struggling in every condition of life to retrench their expenditure, and to try to live within their means. We know that times are hard. We know that men are looking forward, perhaps not with trembling, but at any rate with anxiety to the near future, and we know that prudent and cautious men in every walk of life in this Dominion are to-day curtailing their expenses in every possible way they can in order that they may live within their means. We know that there is a very large mass of the community who to-day are struggling to maintain a bare existence, and this is the time we are asked to increase the salaries and to improve the condition of men who are certainly receiving sums which place them not only beyond the reach of want, but—I won't say in affluence—but, at any rate, in comfort. It may be asked, what is the particular proposition before the House? The proposition before the House is: that when any judge of the Supreme Court or Court of Exchequer has been fifteen years upon the Bench, whether he has been one year upon the Supreme Court Bench and fourteen years on the Bench of an inferior court: if he has spent fifteen years on the Bench and has reached the age of seventy he has the right, even though his faculties be unimpaired, and even though his health be perfect, to retire from the Bench, and for the rest of his life receive the same salary as if he were doing his work. I ask the House: can any precedent be found in any British-speaking colony or in any part of the Empire for this proposition? So far as I have been able to look at this proposal there is no precedent for it. There is no such precedent in England or in Ireland.

Mr. AMYOT. We will make one.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) says we will make one. Well, I am trying to show him, that this is a most unfortunate time in the history of Canada to begin to establish such a precedent as that. If we are to begin a precedent of this kind, I think it would be well for us to allow the Imperial Government to show us the way. It will be time enough when a rich and wealthy nation like England deems it necessary to take this course, for us to follow a long distance behind in their footsteps. I submit to the House, there being no precedent to be found, that some very strong reasons should be given to induce us to form a precedent. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) has not attempted to offer my reasons to the committee in support of his proposition. He has simply submitted that the resolution does not go far enough, and if his argument is correct and his reasoning adopted, this proposition to allow a judge after he has been fifteen years on the Bench, and has reached the age of seventy years, to retire on full pay, must be applied to the Superior Court judges of every province in the Dominion. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to accept that?

Mr. AMYOT. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He is prepared to accept that, and therefore he is logical. But I point out to the committee that we are most assuredly taking the first steps which will land us in the logical position which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Amyot) asks us to take. I ask the members of this House: are they prepared to do that? Why, Sir, it does not follow that if we want to compel men to retire at a certain age—and I am not adverse to that proposition—it does not follow at all that if you compel them to retire you are to pay them their full salaries while they are doing no work. On what principle can you undertake to do that? Compulsory retirement at a certain age may be defensible, but why seek to compel them to retire, and at the same time continue to pay them the same salary as when they are discharging their work? I do not think it is right. At all events, it is not the principle adopted in England, in Ireland, or in any of the British provinces, so far as I know; and, if adopted by the House, it will have unfortunate results, and, as the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) says, it must be carried to its logical conclusion and be made to apply to the judges of all the provinces. Now, what are the special circumstances? Have hon. gentlemen heard them? I know of no special circumstances. There is no reason for the Supreme Court being made strong by this resolution that does not exist in the case of the courts of appeal in the various provinces, if that reason exists at all. I do not think there is any ground for us to impeach the strength of the courts at present. If any of the judges require to retire, let them do so on the two-thirds pension! which is a very handsome pension, and is as much as this country can afford. I deprecate the introduction of the resolution, in the first place, because it introduces a precedent here which exists nowhere else—for you cannot stop where you are, but must make the same principle applicable to the courts of all the provinces; in the next place, because it involves an expenditure which the people of this country at the present time are not prepared to shoulder; and, in the third place, because it is inherently unjust. I deny the right of any man, I do not care whether he is a judge or other official, if he wishes to retire into private life, to receive the same salary as that which is a fair and reasonable one for the full exercise of his faculties, and the full discharge of his duties. Under these circumstances, I think the hon. gentleman would be wise to proceed slowly. I have no doubt that he has introduced the resolution with the best of motives; no doubt he has done so with the earnest desire to promote the efficiency of the courts; but this is the wrong way to do it. If the hon. gentleman brings in a proposition to provide for the compulsory retirement of the judges at a certain age, I have no doubt that such a proposition will receive fair consideration, irrespective of politics, on both sides of the House. This resolution should be considered without the least symptom of political feeling, for it is one above politics. I oppose it for the reasons I have stated, and I hope it will be opposed at almost every stage.

Mr. IVES. I agree with my hon. friend when he says that this is not a question of politics. It strikes me as being entirely a practical question. The Supreme Court of Canada is in one sense altogether different from any other court. It is the court of last appeal in Canada; and, considering the fact that the expense of an appeal to the Privy Council in England is so heavy as practically to prevent the ordinary citizen from taking advantage of a resort to that court, it becomes all the more important that the last court of appeal in Canada should, at all times, be maintained in the highest state of efficiency, and that at all times the very best legal talent, the very soundest and highest wisdom, should be possessed by the judges of that court. Now, we are not speaking at all with reference to the court as at present constituted. No one has the slightest desire or intention of casting any imputation upon the skill, the wisdom and the ability of that court as at present constituted. But we are legislating, if we legislate at all, for all time in the future, or at least until some other Parliament shall find some better course to pursue. The hon. gentleman is quite right in saying that there is an alternative course—the course of compelling the judges to retire at a certain age. I must tell him that that course has been considered. I myself, for one, have entertained the idea, and have considered it and discussed it; but it seems to me, considering the salaries that we pay to the judges of the Supreme Court, that it is sufficiently difficult to get the best men under the present arrangement of a retiring allowance, with the permission for them to remain until they see fit to retire; and it would be absolutely impossible to obtain even third-rate men to take those positions if it were enacted by Parliament that the judges would have to retire without pension or salary at seventy years of age.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman must not misrepresent me. I never suggested that a judge should be compelled to retire without pension or salary.

Mr. IVES. If it were enacted by this Parliament that the judges were to be compelled to retire at seventy years of age, even on the present retiring allowance, it would be absolutely impossible to get the best men to take the position. It is only because of the honour and dignity of the position, and the fact that the judge may hold the salary as long as he may see fit to hold the position, and that the question of when he may retire from the position is entirely in his own hands, that we are able to get first-class or even second-class men to take the position for the salary at present paid, which is very much less than that paid to gentlemen in the same rank in England or in the United States. The hon. gentleman knows that the leaders of the Bar in the lower provinces, in fact, all over the Dominion are making much larger incomes than the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No. I challenge that as far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned.

Mr. IVES. And the hon. gentleman knows that if you enact a law that the judges must retire at a certain age, on the present retiring allowance, even the salaries of the judges will be just as uncertain as the incomes of the leading members of the Bar. The hon. gentleman says that every member of the Bar knows that under certain circumstances he is liable to lose his practice. I deny that, unless he loses his health entirely, and is unable to work. The hon. gentleman knows that as a practical question this matter works out in this way: The judges of the Supreme Court continue in the position until they die, and, so far the hon. gentleman would not be able, I fancy, to point to a case where a judge asked for superannuation, or desired to retire on a superannuation allowance.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Oh, yes. Judge Taschereau and Chief Justice Richards.

Mr. IVES. I may be wrong as to the fact; but as a practical question, in the great majority of cases, the judge, after he becomes old and unable to sit regularly in court, is obliged to ask for leave of absence. He is unable to attend the sittings of the court, frequently there is no quorum, frequently cases have to be re-argued before other judges, and an immense amount of inconvenience and detriment to the public is occasioned. Considering the smallness of the salary as compared with the salaries of judges in other countries, considering the age limit fixed, which is the limit of a man's life, according to the Good Book, considering the improbability of these men long enjoying the salary without doing the work, considering that the resolution and the measure proposed by the Government is calculated to give us a live, active, vigorous court as the highest court of appeal, and considering the importance of such a court, I do not see how any man, irrespective of politics, can object to the proposition.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would not have spoken again, but when I find that our friends of the Opposition who have spoken had not heard what I had offered on behalf of the resolution, it is only right for me to assume that the remainder of the committee did not catch my remarks. If the leader of the Opposition and my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) had heard what I said, I presume they would have had a better reason to advance against the resolution than the mere statement that I had said nothing. Therefore, I shall have to repeat what I said as regards the place which the Supreme Court of Canada is supposed to occupy in the scheme or policy of the remuneration of judges; but first of all, I beg to say that my own view is totally different from that which has been advanced as to the sufficiency of the remuneration of the judges of the superior courts of our provinces. I shall leave out of consideration, for the moment, the question of the salaries of county court judges, because that involves other considerations. It involves necessarily the adjustment of remuneration from other sources, and there are two classes of judges there who have to be considered; but coming to the cases of the judges of the superior courts of the provinces, I contend that, even as regards the judges of the Maritime Provinces, the salaries are quite inadequate. They are very far below the emoluments derived by leading members in the practice of their profession. But saying nothing about that, they are quite below the suitabilities of the position of judges in the higher court of a province; and if you judge them by that standard, if you judge them by the standard of the emoluments a successful professional man makes in his practice, or by the salaries given in commercial life by monetary institutions, the salaries are twenty years behind the time. But when you come to greater centres, like Montreal for example, you find hard-worked judges—judges who were eminent and most successful in their practice at the Bar, asked to receive for administering justice in the highest court of that great province and metropolis a salary of $5,000 a year, for which no respectable bank or large commercial institution would obtain a manager to-day. You ask a chief justice—I need not mention names—presiding over a judiciary like that of the province of Quebec, to serve us with his skill, eminence, and the labours which devolve upon him, for a salary of $6,000 a year. I should suppose that merely to state the position would be sufficient to refute the argument that the judges are well enough paid. Go to Ontario, and we find there that the inadequacy of the salary is so glaring that the province of Ontario, and I think the Legislature, without any division upon political lines, stepped forward and said: The allowance made by the Federal authorities, charged by the British North America Act with the maintenance of our judiciary, is so glaringly inadequate that we will put it upon the statutes that every judge in our province shall receive from the province $1,000 a year over and above what the Dominion Government allows him, until the Dominion Government makes up that allowance from its own treasury. Surely there could be no better indication of the public opinion of that province as to the gross inadequacy of the salaries we pay our judges there. They constitute the highest judiciary of a magnificent province—magnificent as regards its business, its wealth and its population; and they constitute a judiciary, not only of the highest character as regards attainments, but a judiciary fully and amply worked. No one can say that one of the judges of the higher courts of Ontario eats any idle bread to-day. But what I wish to call attention to, as justifying this particular resolution and the limits within which this policy is confined, is this: While it is our intention, as soon as the circumstances will permit, to improve the salaries of the judges of the superior courts of the provinces, and while we think that a case has been made out clearly for the improvement of those salaries, it is not part of the policy of the Government, and I think it would be a policy to which it would be very difficult to get the approval of this House, to increase the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. They are now as high as Minister's salaries are. Seven thousand dollars a year appears to be a very liberal allowance for a judge of that court, and I have not heard of any proposition or any claim put forward for improving the salaries there. It would be very difficult to do it on account of the necessity which would follow for the readjustment of the other salaries, in respect of which there would be a comparison drawn. But I do assure the House that the necessity impresses itself upon me of improving in some way the position of that court as regards its emoluments; and I thought that, instead of pressing a measure for the increase of the salaries of the court, it could be more economically done, and done in a satisfactory way to the judges, by making the position a little more desirable by this addition, that after reaching the age of seventy years, with fifteen years at least of judicial service—at least five of which must be spent on the Supreme Court of Canada—they may then retire upon full pay. The grievance with regard to the judges of the provincial courts is not so much the inadequacy of the retiring allowance. It is the inadequacy of the annual remuneration, and to that we hope to apply a remedy. But with regard to the Supreme Court of Canada, the grievance is not owing to the salary, but there is—I shall not call it a grievance—but there is at least a favourable opportunity to improve the position of those judges without great outlay by improving the allowance on which they shall retire. And it has this advantage of tending to strengthen in the country that court, which, as my hon. friend, the President of the Council, says, requires everything we can possibly do to make it a strong court, as a court of last resort, as a court of appeal from the judiciary in Quebec and Ontario, to say nothing of other provinces, where the appeal comes from a strong judiciary, and where it is absolutely necessary, if we are to maintain our judicial system at all—if we are to maintain the structure at all in its present proportions and plan—we should make the keystone of the arch strong, durable and admirable. For these reasons, I thought this would be a convenient way, and an economical one, to improve that position and give an opportunity to make that court a strong one. I had two considerations in view: first, as regards the judiciary of the present, and I speak of them not only with the greatest respect, because I entertain that, in my inmost heart, for the members of that Bench, but on account of the delicacy of speaking at all with regard to remuneration when it comes to individuals. I shall say simply this, that there are judges there who have served their country long, faithfully and efficiently, and who ought not, when they have attained the age of seventy years, to feel that they are constrained by the force of personal circumstances to remain on the Bench after the time arrives when they have not their full powers. Under the present system a judge is induced to remain upon the Bench by reason of this fact: that if he retires he must submit to a diminution of one-third of his income, which he may find it very inconvenient to submit to. As regards the future, we have something to do in the way of strengthening that court. I may take the province of Ontario as a very fair sample, because when we improve the circumstances of the judges of the other provinces we shall have them upon the same plane with the judges of the province of Ontario. Can we hope to strengthen the Supreme Court in the province of Ontario, where it is most desirable to strengthen it, when we find, as regards the Bar, that we cannot hope to secure for that high position the foremost men, for the reason that they make more than double the allowance of the Supreme Court judges? But we may have some hope—we should have some hope—of appointing to the Bench here some of the members of the judiciary of that province. For it would be all the better that they should have had training upon the Bench, a training which a judge of first instance gets, or the training which a judge of the Appeal Court of the province gets. But here are the facts: A judge in the province of Ontario receives $5,000 from the Dominion Government; he receives $1,000 from the province until the Dominion Government makes up that sum; he receives another $1,000 from his circuit allowances, or else as additional salary as chief justice. So he receives now in his own province, without being required to move to Ottawa, fully the amount of the emoluments he would get by coming here to become a member of the Supreme Court. Can we expect that they will come here, even for the nominal promotion, if they receive no additional emolument, and there is no other attraction? We present to them that additional attraction which the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), says is an inducement even to the members of the Bar who are earning far greater emoluments than the judges' salary, permanence of position and income. But we need to present the inducement of an opportunity of retiring on a liberal allowance. In this way we shall induce them to come here and replenish the strength of the highest court of appeal of the Dominion. These are the reasons why, at present, until we adopt a larger scheme for the improvement of the salaries of the judges, I think we should do this in the interest of the court which is the highest court in Canada, and which we all desire to see the strongest court.

Mr. LAURIER. I have listened very carefully to my right hon. friend, but I must confess that the new reasons he has given have not at all modified the conclusion I had arrived at already. The right hon. gentleman has based his argument, to a large extent, upon statements which go to show that the judges in the superior courts in the different provinces were not sufficiently remunerated. That is a question which has been debated for some time, and upon which there seems to be some difference of opinion. It does not seem to be the opinion of this House that judges are not sufficiently remunerated. On two or three occasions the right hon. gentleman has introduced a measure with a view to increasing the salaries of the judges of the superior court, and on each of these occasions he has had to abandon the measure, evidently because the House, rightly or wrongly, is of the opinion—an opinion shared by many members on that side of the House as on this—that there was no cause for any increase of these salaries. At all events, let us suppose that the contention of the right hon. gentleman is sound, and that the judges of the superior courts of the provinces are not sufficiently remunerated. The logical sequence of such an argument would be the introduction of a measure such as the right hon. gentleman introduced a few years ago for the increase of these salaries. Such is not the measure now proposed; it is, indeed, of a very different character. What is the reason which has been adduced, first by the President of the Council, and then by the right hon. Prime Minister himself, in favour of this measure? The only reason is that this measure is calculated, as the Premier stated, to maintain the Supreme Court in the highest state of efficiency. I admit that the Supreme Court should be maintained in the highest state of efficiency, not for the reason which has been stated by the President of the Council and by the Prime Minister—that this is the court of highest resort in Canada—but simply for the reason that every court should be maintained in the highest state of efficiency. And, if every court were maintained in the highest state of efficiency there would be far less labour for the Supreme Court. So the argument applies no more to this court than to any other. Coming to a consideration of the court itself, if I understand my hon. friend aright, there is no complaint as to the sufficiency of the salaries paid to the judges of the Supreme Court. And, if we consider that the judges of the Supreme Court receive the same salaries paid to the Ministers of the Crown, they can hardly complain that they are not sufficiently paid. They have not the same responsibility, nor have they half the labour of a Minister of the Crown.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) And they have a permanency.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. LAURIER. And they have a permanency. A judge is paid the same salary as a Minister of the Crown, and he has this before him: that after a certain number of years, if his health fails him, he can retire upon the very liberal allowance of about $5,000. Now, it is stated, however, that, in order to make the court still more efficient, the judge should be given his full salary if he withdraws from the Bench. I think that this proposition is altogether indefensible. I do not object, for my part, to the continuance of the present system, so that judges who have become disabled through age or who decide because of other causes to withdraw, may be assured of a very fair allowance, such as will enable them to maintain their station in life. But I challenge the opinion and judgment of every man in this House to say whether there can be any reason why a judge withdrawing from a court, and giving up his labours, should continue to receive the same emoluments from the country as while he was on the Bench. If the salaries are not sufficient let them be increased, but I enter the strongest protest possible against putting upon the Statute-book a law involving the principle which, as the hon. gentleman has indicated, may become applicable to all the courts, that the judges, whether they serve the public or not, whether they are able to discharge their duties or not, are to receive the same compensation from the public as if they were discharging their duties. The principle is a wrong one, and is not made to appear reasonable by any argument which has been advanced hitherto. Certainly I agree with my hon. friend that this proposition should not be assented to, but it should resisted at every stage.

Mr. SCRIVER. The right hon. gentleman himself has set the example of departing somewhat from the question which is under discussion before the House, and he has spoken at considerable length in regard to what he calls the inadequacy of the salaries given to other judges than those of the Supreme Court. In the few words I have to say on this question I shall speak from an experience limited to my own province, and I would say that with regard to that supposed inadequacy, we should make the question a practical one. Have we not already, with these so-called inadequate salaries, been able to obtain for the judiciary of the province of Quebec, men fully competent to discharge the duties intrusted to them? I would say that I do not believe that a man's professional income should be the only test of his fitness to occupy a seat on the judicial Bench. There may be accidental reasons. It may be that some lawyers have enjoyed opportunities of making a larger professional income than some of their brethren at the Bar, either by reason of some peculiar talent, or some peculiar branch of practice, or from other reasons. Speaking from my own knowledge of the Bar in Montreal, I do not hesitate to say that there are men now at the Bar, that there were men at the Bar who have been on the Bench, whose professional income was not half of that which forms the professional income of some members of that Bar who are quite as well qualified to occupy a position upon the Bench with dignity and efficiency as their brethren who have made an income very much larger. So I do not think this question of income should be the sole test of efficiency or fitness for a seat upon the Bench. But in all that has been said so far in the discussion of this question, the financial point of view has been the only one taken. I think we ought to consider that there is something in the position itself aside from the income attached to it, which makes it a desirable one for any man at the Bar to occupy. Look at the social advantages it gives, look at the opportunity which it gives a man, if he is such a man as he ought to be for that position, to inscribe upon the jurisprudence of this country opinions which will be carried down to all time. I think these are considerations which may fairly be supposed to operate upon the minds of men who make some sacrifice from a financial point of view in accepting this position. So far as my opinion goes, I am quite prepared to believe that not only have we been able, but that we shall be able in the future, to command the services of the most competent men for this position, among those who are now members of the Bar, either in Quebec province or in other provinces. So far as this particular question before the House is concerned, I must say that I fully agree with the hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), in their opinion that the reasons given by the leader of the House have not been sufficient to justify us in adding to the emoluments of the men who are now upon the Bench. Those emoluments are large, and they have enabled us, I think we may fairly say, notwithstanding what the hon. President of the Council has been pleased to say, that even with the advantages that are now offered we can only obtain second-class men—I think they have enabled us to obtain first-class men, and that the judges upon that Bench have discharged their duties in a way to do credit to themselves and to be of very great advantage to the country. But I am not a professional man, and it is, perhaps, somewhat presumptuous in me to say anything on the subject at all. But I firmly believe that any attempt on the part of this House to increase the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court, or the judges of the superior courts, would be frowned upon by the tax-payers of this country.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, having promised to pair with my hon. friend, the member for Two Mountains (Mr. Girouard), who is on leave of absence, and in order not to give a silent vote on the present resolution, I desire to enter the strongest protest possible against it. I have listened very attentively to the reasons given by the hon. Prime Minister and the hon. President of the Council (Mr. Ives), as also by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), and I must say that I failed to see how the Government could be actuated by any other than political motives in introducing this measure. I think this resolution is a mere attempt on the part of the Government, on the eve of a general election, to prevail upon certain members of the Supreme Court to come down from the Bench, and, if political report be true, thus to create vacancies for political friends, even for a Minister of the Crown. The hon. member for Bellechasse ventured to inform the House that the salaries so far paid to our judges were inadequate, and that he would support the resolution before the House providing that they should retire on full pay, such pension to continue during their natural life, and such provision to apply especially to the judges of the Quebec province. Now, when we bear in mind the course pursued by the judges in the past, I am of opinion that, far from being overworked, as stated, some of them had leisure enough to come down from the Bench to sit on certain "small Benches," to gain thereby the political favours which have since been lavished on them. Therefore, the reason offered by the hon. member, namely, that the Quebec judges do an exceptional amount of work is no reason at all, and on no such ground can either the resolution now before the House or the demand of the hon. member for Bellechasse be justified. The Quebec judges, or at least some of them, have no exceptional amount of work to do; on the contrary, they have plenty time to interfere with politics, and to further the political ends of the party which placed them on the Bench. Let us now see the reasons put forth by the hon. President of the Council. The efficiency of the Bench can only be promoted by paying judges sufficient emoluments, and at the actual salary, eminent lawyers cannot be secured to fill the judgeships. Now, how is it that, so soon as a vacancy occurs on the Bench, as many as fifty applicants apply for the position, and among them even Ministers of the Crown, comptrollers, solicitors-general who sit opposite? If the salary were inadequate to the exigencies of those who wish, through sheer spirit of sacrifice, to ascend the Bench, how can the fact be accounted for that so many seek the office? Moreover, should the statement of the hon. President of the Council be accurate, it would follow that, up to the present, none but second or third rate lawyers have been secured to fill up the judgeships. But we know that, in a great many cases, the Quebec judges appointed to the Bench, or the judges appointed to the Supreme Court, were lawyers of the highest standing in their profession. Should the resolution now before the House pass, history would repeat itself and superannuated judges, like Judges Chagnon and Doherty would be seen, who after serving for 15 years or even less, begin to build up their practice anew as counsels. Such judges, not satisfied with their retiring allowance, enter into active competition with professional members of the Bar. Let me quote another case to show the adequacy of the salary paid to our judges, and in support of the contention that the position would readily be accepted by a large number of my hon. friends who sit opposite; I refer to the case of a lawyer, who made a yearly income of fifteen thousand dollars, holding besides the position of Senator, that of Speaker of the Senate, with an additional yearly salary of five thousand dollars. Now, so soon as the position of Chief Justice had been become vacant through the demise of the former incumbent, the Speaker of the Senate, Sir Alexander Lacoste, resigned his office and his Senatorship, gave up his practice, yielding a yearly income of $15,000 as above stated, in order to accept a judgeship with a salary of $6,000. Sir Alexander Lacoste, Mr. Chairman, it may be noticed, was no second-rate lawyer, but a man who commanded general esteem and respect. His political acts are open to criticism; but he is a man whose skill and attainments are unquestioned, and who commands general respect. Now, a judgeship is eagerly sought for and readily accepted, because of the permanency and on account of the fixed salary attached to it. The earnings of a practising lawyer may reach fifteen or twenty thousand dollars a year; still he is not guaranteed an income in perpetuity: he may suddenly lose his practice, if ill-health visits him or if his faculties become impaired; and then his practice dwindles into nothing and his income disappears, while no such thing takes place in the case of a judge. The judge knows that, if after he has served a fortnight, his health becomes such that he cannot discharge his functions, he can maintain his existence and that of his family. The case just quoted, in the instance of Chief Justice Lacoste, who was a lawyer of great eminence, amply demonstrates how unsound are the reasons given by the hon. President of the Council in support of the resolution now before the House. Although, as a rule, I am adverse to increasing the salaries of judges, still I would rather vote for an increase of salary, rather than give my assent to this resolution. I deprecate the introduction of that resolution, because it was brought forward by the Government, on the eve of a general election, to compel some of the Supreme Court judges to retire from the Bench, as above stated, in order to enable the Ministers to appoint political friends, and especially one of the Ministers. Under the circumstances, and on the ground of my inability to vote against the resolution, I thought it my duty to give a few words of explanation. I have done so in good faith and in the most moderate terms, in fulfilment of a duty I owe my constituency and my electors.

Mr. CHOQUETTE.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I feel warranted, because of the stand elsewhere taken by me on the question of the judiciary, to say a few words on the same. It always sounds strange to my ear to hear it stated that the judges are paid an inadequate salary. I have lived, for forty-five years past, in the province of Quebec; and I may boast of a quarter of a century of experience acquired in the enjoyment of a fully developed intellect. I got acquainted with most of the lawyers who have since ascended the Bench. I could, without any trouble, go through the whole list of the names, and prove that two-thirds of the men who are now sitting on the Bench, were not making, when they were lawyers, one-half the salary they are receiving to-day. The hon. members from the province of Quebec will bear me out in my statement.

Mr. IVES. Does not that prove the very statement I made?

Mr. TARTE. I am saying just the reverse. I am saying what my hon. friend knows to be true: that one-half of the men who are to-day judges, were not making, when they were lawyers, one-half the salary they are receiving to-day. (Translation.) To say that the judges do not receive a fair and reasonable salary is a most unfair statement, totally at variance with the facts. From the standpoint of a fair administration of the law, it is most important that none but men of sterling integrity and unimpeachable honour, men of the highest character as regards attainments, should be selected. I think it is also of the utmost importance that appointments to the Bench should not be made on the exclusive ground of political services to the party in power. Were the judiciary, as suggested by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), to be made absolutely and entirely independent of the country, and of all principles of honour and integrity, the outcome would be a corrupt Bench, that would set at defiance public opinion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. The Bench is already so.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) I hear several hon. members crying out: "The Bench is already so." I am not ready to go that length. Had I any good ground for expecting that a serious investigation might be made, I would not hesitate to move for it, and it would be of short duration. I could prove, I venture to say, that men have been appointed to the Bench because of their political services to the party. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), who might have been one of my witnesses two years ago, has no doubt forgotten several circumstances which, it strikes me now, he ought to remember perfectly well. While listening to the panegyric he has just been bestowing upon the judiciary, I was carried back to the day not far distant when he hesitated not in stating, on the floor of this House, that there were found in the province of Quebec judges guilty of such a dereliction of duty that he, the member for Bellechasse, found himself under the necessity of protecting me against the outrageous tyranny and partiality of these magistrates. And this statement was borne out by the facts. At the time when I was exposed to the attacks of men who ought to have been sent to the penitentiary, and who, later on, were sentenced to prison, the hon. member for Bellechasse was then Crown Attorney at Quebec. At the time he exerted himself to protect me, and, although I believe he would not now exert himself in my favour to the same extent, still I am thankful to him all the same. But for the hon. member to come and tell us that the judiciary of the province of Quebec is above reproach, is to begin by the wrong end of the road, for everybody nowadays calls for an immediate and thorough reform of our judiciary by the Government, so as to give the ratepayers upright judges, commanding general respect. I am happy to state that, in the province of Quebec we may boast of having among our judges, men of the highest character, of unimpeachable integrity and honour, and worthy of the public confidence. But I should also add that some of our judges do not deserve the same eulogy. This is a state of things which calls for a change. I am then the only one to point out this fact? Or am I not rather voicing the public feeling? Is it not true that the Bar—there are lawyers among the hon. members who listen to me, and I invite them to correct me, if I am wrong—that the Bar has no confidence in some of the judges of the land? Members of the Bar in both cities of Montreal and Quebec called upon me, a few years ago, and told me: "Cause a parliamentary inquiry to be held and you will see how little confidence some of our judges deserve." But at the critical moment, when the necessary evidence was needed, the lawyers who had denounced the judges, told me: "If we were caught in that business, our position at the Bar would no longer be tolerable; we would lose all our cases before the judge." So that at the last hour, I was compelled not to move in the matter. Under the circumstances, I think it would be incumbent upon the Minister of Justice to take the initiative in the matter, and to order an inquiry to be held on the general administration of justice in the province of Quebec, for it is easy to realize in what a critical position a private member would find himself on undertaking to perform such a task. They say that the judges have no idle bread to eat. This is saying too much. Go and ask the members of the Bar, and you will hardly find ten lawyers to deny the fact that judges have so little to do that they spend most of their time doing extra work foreign to their functions. And at this time of speaking, are not several judges busy making laws for the government of the province of Quebec? This is assuredly no proof of overwork in the judicial line. Those are undeniable facts. Sooner than bringing in resolutions to improve the salaries of the judiciary, and trying to make people believe such cock-and-bull stories about our hard-worked judges, let rather the Government reform the administration of the law, let them compel to retire men unworthy to sit on the Bench, let them lop the mouldering branches, let them cut to the quick and give us an unimpeachable magistracy. There are judges who, while ascending the Bench, have kept their political bias. You will often hear Liberal lawyers say that pleading before certain judges is tantamount for them to a certainty of losing their law-suits. I could substantiate this allegation by calling to witness several eminent lawyers of the Montreal Bar. At the time when I made a particular study of the issue now before the House, a suggestion was offered me as to how to remedy this state of things. It was to the effect that the Council of the Bar under the law, should have the right to suggest a certain number of names among whom the Government might select the candidates to fill up the vacancies occurring on the Bench. I was told by a number of lawyers that this mode of appointment seemed preferable to the one now enforced. I avail myself of this opportunity to convey the scheme to the knowledge of the House, and to the consideration of the Minister of Justice. I am perfectly aware that I lay open to the reproach of not having insisted upon an inquiry being held in connection with the administration of the law in the province of Quebec. Upon reflection, however, considering that the hon. Minister of Justice was conversant, as I believe he was, with public rumour, I think I was warranted in waiting for him to take the initiative. I am not the only one who has complained of the conduct of the judges of the land. The whole press, irrespective of parties, has loudly complained of it. It seems to me it was incumbent upon the Minister of Justice not to wait till a private member should undertake to impeach the judges. This was no easy task; far from it. The hon. Prime Minister, who is at the same time Minister of Justice, should consider those grievances and order an investigation to be held. When inviting the right hon. gentleman to take action in the matter, I think I am but voicing public opinion.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I cannot allow the remarks just fallen from the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) to pass unchallenged. I do not stand up here as counsel for the judiciary of the province, to vindicate the honour and integrity of the Bench. Our magistracy stands in no need of being screened against such assaults; the record of our judicial Bench, in the province of Quebec, is well known; they have a right claim to the respect and admiration of the people; go back as far as you like in the history of the province, and you will find that never did men of more distinguished unimpeachable character sit on the Judicial Bench. Talk about playing demagogue and wreaking revenge on those who have been instrumental in making you lose a law suit, but it is useless to attempt passing a general condemnation on the judges, unless you were prepared to make a charge and define your charge and name the individuals accused. It is not fair to cast aspersions to besmirch the Bench and then intrench oneself behind one's privileges as member of the House. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) has just stated that he did not press the move for an investigation, because he had no evidence. Then, it is glaringly apparent, from his own statement, that his charges against the Judicial Bench were utterly groundless. His aspersions against the integrity of the judiciary were so many libellous and slanderous statements. Let the hon. gentleman give the names of those members of the Bench against whom he brings charges, and whose conduct he wishes to challenge. I am acquainted with all the judges of the Quebec Court of Appeals, and I may say, without any fear of contradiction, that they are all men of the highest character as regards attainments, uprightness of minds and loftiness of purpose. Take, for instance, Sir Alexander Lacoste, the Chief Justice of the court; can any man breathe even a suspicion about his conduct on the Bench? Is not his name the very synonym of honour and integrity? This eminent man used to make, as practising lawyer, from twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars a year, and he yielded to the entreaties of his friends and of the Government, and accepted a position on the Bench, with the understanding that his salary would be increased. Take the other members of the judiciary: had not Mr. Bossé, when he was appointed to a judgeship, a professional income of from twelve to fifteen thousand dollars a year? And are not the hon. Justices Blanchet, Wurtele, Hall and Baby men well qualified for the eminent position they occupy on the Bench? I have no hesitation in saying that more eminent men than we now have never sat on the Bench. Take the chief justice of the Superior Court, Sir Napoléon Cazeau. Did not the hon. member from L'Islet devote much space in his journal to extol his merits? I must confess that on a certain issue brought before that judge, I was less lucky than my hon. friend from L'Islet; still—despite the fact that the jury gave in a verdict in my favour—I never impugned the judge's motives. Are the hon. Justices Caron, Routhier and Andrews in any way open to the criticism of the hon. member for L'Islet? I have just quoted, Mr. Chairman, the names of four men who have inscribed upon every page of the jurisprudence of our country opinions which will be carried down as monuments of science, integrity, disinterestedness and independence of mind. Now, as a member of this House has thought it fit to use the privilege he momentarily enjoys under the constitution, not only to cast insinuations, but to launch accusations of a sweeping character against the judges, I may say this, as a practising lawyer for many years past, that the judges of the Supreme Court and of the Superior Court are men whom any country in the world would be proud of. The Supreme Court judges are really an ornament to the Bench. Opposition is offered to the proposition to allow a judge after he has been fifteen years on the Bench, and has reached the age of seventy years, to retire on full pay. Objection is offered to the principle of the measure. I do not wish to argue now the principle involved in the proposition; I merely say that, were our Supreme Court judges paid the same salary as judges in England, $30,000 a year, they would, on retiring on their two-thirds allowance, have a salary sufficient to maintain themselves. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) asked the House if there were any precedents on the matter; I find that there are precedents for it in England. What salaries are the judges paid there? Some of them receive as high a salary as $30,000 per annum. In England, any judge who has served ten years, can save enough money to have a competency in his old age. Should we wish to follow in the footsteps of England, let us first pay our judges a reasonable emolument, enough to make them independent, so that, when ascending the Bench, they may feel themselves above the reach of outside influences, calculated to bias their judgment, if not their conscience. The salaries now paid to the Supreme Court judges, in my opinion, are inadequate. The proposition now before the House provides a remedy for that deficiency to a certain extent. I submit that the principle of the measure should be further extended to all the other judges. Should this anomalous inadequacy, as stated by the Prime Minister, be remedied, then, I think judges would no longer need retiring on full pay, the two-thirds allowance being quite sufficient. And in this I think I am voicing the opinion of the enlightened portion of the community, of those who would secure for the country judges fully competent to administer the law; commanding general respect; and, with this end in view, favour an improvement of their salaries, fully adequate to the requirements of their exalted position. Complaints are also made of two judges who are actually busy with codifying the laws of the province of Quebec. Now, I do not contend that all their time is taken up in the performance of their judicial functions; and, where they think it fit to codify laws, I do not see why they should not do it. But I maintain it is irrelevant to the issue to bring in such matters as the "small Bench" and judges who have resigned their charge. And why so? Who presided over that "small Bench" ? The hon. Justice Jetté, as the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) is aware.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) You did yourself attack the "small Bench" at the time.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) I stated at the time that I felt proud of a man like Justice Jetté being called upon to preside over that commission, for he is a man who for learning and integrity is in the first rank of judges.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) It is the other judges, his colleagues, you spoke ill of.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) If the hon. gentleman would only keep silent and listen to my remarks, that might enable him to understand the debate. The "small Bench" having been presided over by Justice Jetté, I submit that it was very unfair for the hon. member for Montmagny, to speak disparagingly of the same. So doing, the hon. member for Montmagny necessarily belittles also Justice Jetté who presided over it. Now, the hon. member for Montmagny just stated that Justices Chagnon and Doherty, superannuated judges, were, as practising lawyers, coming into competition with the Bar. What hence ? It follows thence, I think, that their two-thirds pension is quite inadequate, and that they have to resort to other means of livelihood, a proof that they should not have retired from the Bench. In my opinion, judges who feel their health too impaired to allow their prosecuting the fulfilment of their judicial duties any longer, will, in the future, be less impatient to give up their position, and retiring on a two-thirds allowance, quite inadequate for the maintenance of their families, as once they have resigned their charge, they will be compelled to build up their practice anew. A proof that the allowance granted them is quite inadequate. To sum up, I say that any scheme introduced in connection with the retiring allowance provision, or the increase of judges' salaries, with a view to securing their independence by improving their salaries, and thus remedying their actual inadequacy, shall meet with my approval ; whether it pleases or not demagogues, who are only too happy to seize upon any occasion of furthering their interests.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) The hon. member has thought it fit to trouble himself about my concerns. Possibly my business may not be quite as flourishing as his own affairs. But such is not the question at issue. The hon. member wants me to name the judges who have been spoken ill of. I know of a lawyer who, not so very long ago, commented very freely on the conduct of the judges. During the trial of the case alluded to during this debate, between the hon. member for Montmorency and myself, the tribunal was presided over by Mr. Justice Caseault. The hon. member has just told us that we have a judiciary of the highest character ; but, I still recollect all the harm he said with regard to that judge, what frightful stories he went repeating about him, how he stamped the ground with his feet, how he foamed with rage, when writhing under the unmerciful lashes of the judge's whip ! The hon. member has apparently lost the recollection of an interesting episode of his life. The hon. member wants me to give the names ; I am going to gratify his curiosity. At the time when I was being persecuted by the scoundrels who had installed themselves in the Public Works Department, I was summoned before Mr. Justice Bossé. I have just as vivid a recollection of a fact then witnessed by several of our colleagues as if it were being enacted on the floor of the House at this very moment. We saw the member for Bellechasse entering the judge's room, holding in his hand a warrant of "nolle prosequi" ; we heard him say to the judge : "If you do not do right, I am going to file before the court the paper I hold in my hand." At the same period, this judge, we are told, was handed over a cheque, signed by Mr. Thomas McGreevy, for professional services in the days of yore. Such is the tenor of the statement made in prison by Mr. McGreevy.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) What does that prove ?

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) I will not attempt the task of convincing the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley.)

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Substantiate your statement.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) asks for some more names. Here are some, in connection with the Mercier trial. Prior to his leaving the Bench, I knew, as well as several other persons, that Justice Bossé would go to Beauce to attend his son, whose sickness was problematic enough. I see on the Treasury Benches, a Minister now listening to me, who knew, at two o'clock in the morning, that Justice Bossé would leave the Bench during the trial.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Name him.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) The hon. member's interruptions are of no avail. As to what I shall say, I am my own master ; as to what names I should give to the House, I am the best judge. This I am prepared to state under my own responsibility as a member of this House : Let the Government order an investigation to be held, and they shall see whether the complaints I am now conveying to the House are well founded or not. Why not impeach, some will say, the judges whom you think guilty. Professional men who hear me are aware of the difficulties this course of action is beset with. Were a general investigation into the administration of justice to be held, it would come out how Mr. Justice Wurtele sat on the Bench vacated by Mr. Justice Bossé, during the Mercier trial. Justice Bossé came down from the Bench, through fear of being impeached; such is the actual and true reason of the course followed by him, and the evidence will, sooner or later, come out. The course of justice is slow but sure. For a long time past, I had been looking, with some political friends, for the clue to the labyrinth where robbers were secreting themselves, and behold, at last, after many repeated attempts, we have succeeded in our efforts. A fortuitous circumstance has enabled us to track the robbers and denounce them. I am proud to say that there are to be found among our judges, men of unimpeachable character and integrity; but I am sorry to add that there prevails a state of frightful corruption in the province of Quebec. The names of Sir Alexander Lacoste and Mr. Justice Caseault have been mentioned. Mr. Justice Caseault's reputation stands high; he deservedly commands public confidence. Mr. Justice Blanchet comes in also for a share of that eulogy. I shall refrain from mentioning other names, lest I should hurt the feelings of those passed over in silence. As to Mr. Justice Davidson, he is now being rewarded for sending his report to Quebec. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) knows where the finishing stroke was put to that report.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) It was at Spencerwood.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) No, no.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) You don't agree.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) The issue before the House is too important to warrant my paying any attention to an interruption from the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley). Where was the finishing stroke put to that report which brought about the dismissal of an administration supported by a majority? At midnight, on the eve of the day when the report was put in shape, Mr. Justice Davidson repaired to the residence of Mr. Justice Jetté, and there, he mistook a servant girl for a sister of charity. An hour later, he told somebody that it was a sister of charity who had opened the door for him at Mr. Justice Jetté's house. That occurred on the very night when he was discussing a report which put the whole country in a flurry and created a political crisis, the like of which had not yet been witnessed. If you are in earnest about that investigation, this fact alone should warrant its being held. But how is it that I had to interfere with this question of the judiciary? For twenty years past, it was my good, or ill, luck to be connected with the press. An editor has the privilege of learning many secrets; a lot of information is brought to him; many complaints are confided to him. So that it was in the exercise of my calling that I was made acquainted with these facts, which are also known to the hon. member of Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot).

Mr. TARTE.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) I deny that.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) The hon. member is aware of the fact that during the McGreevy trial, Mr. Justice Bossé behaved most shamefully. The hon. member, who was a witness to these facts, now denies knowing anything about them. It is fortunate that he is not the only witness; there are also other witnesses who are acquainted with the facts. As a lawyer, he knows that what I say is the unvarnished truth. In 1891, the hon. member for Bellechasse passed a eulogy on me, which, I confess, was underserved; still, in the course of his remarks, he said:

Previous to resuming my seat, I wish to re-echo the congratulations offered by the other members of the House to the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Tarte), for the courage evinced by him in bringing before the House this question; I know the difficulties he has had to cope with. As a crown attorney, I had to shield him from power influences, before the courts. He later on sat in this House; and I venture to express the hope, that, as the facts of the case are now before the country, we may expect from that quarter some measure of support.

I have here, Mr. Chairman, seven or eight witnesses who know that the hon. gentleman protected me from the knavery and malice of Mr. Justice Bossé. These are stern words, but they are just, because true. The question has been raised of increasing the salaries of judges. I submit that judicial reform ought to be attempted first of all. The facts I have just conveyed to the knowledge of the House are proof that the stand I have taken on this question is the right one. The incident which has just occurred here, the gravity of which cannot fail to attract attention, leads me to doubt whether I should not move for the immediate holding of the investigation already alluded to. Were this debate to be considered as a notice of motion, I am prepared to give such notice immediately. I do not want this investigation to be held at this late stage of the session; but let the hon. Prime Minister appoint a commission composed of eminent men, not members of the House, judges, for instance—although a parliamentary investigation would be more in conformity with our traditions—and I shall produce the evidence. I have made some researches in that connection, and whether any precedents for it are to be found in the English parliamentary records I am not prepared to say, but it is a fact that two or three investigations into the administration of the law have been held in the House of Commons of England. Should a similar investigation be held here, you may rely upon it, Mr. Chairman, that the administration of the law would be thereby much improved and public confidence in the tribunals now so greatly impaired, would be restored.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) The hon. member for L'Islet has just stated that the hon. member for Bellechasse had afforded him protection in the course of a criminal trial at Quebec. The hon. member for Bellechasse, in his capacity of Crown Attorney, said to have brought in court a 'nolle prosequi,' to stay the proceedings in the event of the judge taking a certain position. I am not aware that the hon. member for Bellechasse has done so; but I say that should he have acted that way he made, as Crown Attorney, an egregious mistake. Should such an assertion prove true, it would give us a fair insight into the system inaugurated under the Mercier régime, previous to the elections of 1892. No sooner was a person charged with a serious offence in the criminal court, and should the person so charged happen to be a political friend of the Mercier Government—I had myself evidence of the fact in the county of Chicoutimi—they brought in court a 'nolle prosequi,' in order to stay the proceedings. The same system obtained. I presume, in the case of the member for L'Islet. Now, whether the retiring allowance of the Supreme Court judges should be increased or not, is a matter I am not prepared to discuss, as I wish to confine myself to the question raised by the hon. members for L'Islet, for Montmagny and for Bellechasse. The contention of the hon. member for Montmagny is that the Superior Court judges at Quebec have time to spare, as evidenced by the fact that they preside over commissions appointed for political purposes, and find time to serve upon commissions of inquiry into the scandals of the Mercier Government. Now, Mr. Chairman, I take it for granted that judges, under the circumstances, are bound to sit upon those commissions, when required to do so by the authorities, and such a course has been invariably followed by all political parties, not only in this country, but in England as well. The hon. member for Montmagny censures the judges for having served on commissions of inquiry. But who appointed them to those commissions? Who appointed the commission over which Mr. Justice Jetté presided? Was it the Conservatives or the Liberals? Why, the Hon. Charles Langelier, himself, the Provincial Secretary at the time, published the appointment of the commission. Now, Mr. Chairman, the Mercier Government, who had assumed the responsibility of appointing that commission, was bound to respect it, and would have acted more honourably in doing so, in view of the fact that they have to shoulder such responsibility in the future. Were the judges answerable for the Baie des Chaleurs steal of $100,000? Were they responsible for the Langlais scandal as to the $50,000? Was it not the Liberal party which derived all the benefit from those transactions at the elections of 1891? Were I disposed to cast such empty imputations as the hon. member for L'Islet has launched against the judges, I could ask him whether the money was not distributed among the Liberals? Of course, the judges disclosed those facts; but they were not the guilty parties: the guilty parties were the Liberals, who have since sworn to be revenged upon the judges, because of the courage displayed by them in unearthing scandals unparalleled in the political history of the province. The hon. member for L'Islet further said that the judges were corrupt. Now, this is the first time since 1892 that we hear anything about the matter. During the electoral campaign of L'Islet in 1892, the hon. member had to resort to the fabrication of scandals which he scattered broadcast through the country; for the electors placed no reliance on him. The inhabitants of L'Islet said: "True, we do not repose any confidence in the gentleman, but as he states that corruption prevails among the judiciary, let us return him to Parliament so as to enable him to bring his charges before the House." At the time when the charges were made, they created quite a sensation, not only in the province of Quebec, but throughout the country; for people could not be brought to believe that corruption had crept in the judicial body to the extent stated by the hon. member for L'Islet. I have still a vivid recollection of the facts stated in his political platform. He therein said: "The magistracy is corrupt, and if you return me to Parliament I shall go and denounce on the floor of the House the corruption of the judges." The hon. member was duly returned to Parliament. He sat here last session. What has become of the charges he was to bring against the judiciary? Did he point out the name of a single judge?

An hon. MEMBER. (Translation.) He has just given two or three names.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Was there a single judge impeached before the House last session? Not a single one? The hon. gentleman did not move in the matter, and now, at this late stage of the session, on the occasion of the resolution introduced into the House by the hon. Prime Minister, the hon. gentleman raises his voice, only to plead that he is powerless; but such a plea will not meet with the approval of the province of Quebec, for all are agreed that the charges are utterly baseless, concocted out of a spirit of political revenge. The hon. member for L'Islet stands up in his place not to impeach the judiciary, but to tell hear-say stories, heard from McGreevy or from Montreal lawyers, statements which he says they are no longer able to substantiate. He further states that Mr. Justice Bossé did withdraw from the Bench, on the Mercier trial. I do not know whether the latter statement is correct or not. But in my opinion there is a wide difference between an act of weakness on the part of a judge and an act of corruption.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Will the hon. member allow me to correct him, and say that Mr. Justice Bossé did not withdraw from the case. Two judges sat on the Bench, and one was enough. Mr. Justice Bossé, called suddenly to the sick bed of his son, had to come down from the Bench.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) The hon. member for Bellechasse may rely upon my word that I did not stand in need of being corrected at all on the point at issue, for the good reason that I do not believe one single word of what the hon. member for L'Islet stated. The veracity of the hon. gentleman is well known. The contention is that it is not legitimate for judges to preside over such commissions. I submit that they are bound to do so, when required by public interest. Under the Mercier régime, a commission was appointed, on which sat Messrs. Beique and Malverin, with a view to investigating a charge brought against members of the Conservative opposition in the House. The newspaper 'l'Electeur' had charged the Conservatives with having received a bribe of ten thousand dollars, and pledging themselves, for that consideration, to the passage of an item of the estimates. After that commission had been appointed, what was the result? No sooner had the commissioners begun the investigation than the proceedings were stayed, because they were not vested with the necessary authority to compel the witnesses to give evidence. The hon. member for L'Islet, himself, who was one of the witnesses in the case, knows something about it. When he had been examined, he stated that he declined to answer, for fear of incriminating himself.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) I never made such a statement.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) I think it was in the case that the hon. member made the statement.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) I never made such a statement before the commission of inquiry.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) The hon. member, I think, declined to answer certain questions put to him regarding the use he had made of certain sums handed over to him.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) I say it again, I never made such a statement.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) At any rate, the hon. member stated, on another occasion, and that time before a court of justice, that he declined to answer, lest he should incriminate himself. All are agreed, and the hon. member for L'Islet cannot deny the fact, that should the investigation in the Mercier case have been conducted by others than judges, right would not have been done to the same extent, and never would the horrors of that régime have come to light.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) I do not intend, Mr. Chairman, going into the questions raised by the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley) beyond saying a few words in explanation of the attacks directed against me by the hon. gentleman. He has just spoken of facts which took place at a time when he had not yet emerged from obscurity into political life, thanks to the ballot-box of Pointe-aux-Esquimaux. At all events, we have him now in our midst, sitting in this House, interfering with matters quite beyond his comprehension, matters, I say, he had better not drag into the region of acute parliamentary controversy, as while proving harmless in my case, they might prove very damageable to other parties the hon. gentleman has every reason, in his own interest, not to hurt. I have been treasurer of the Conservative party and never did I reveal party secrets. There are among the members who now listen to me, those who could bear witness to it. I have remained true to the friends with whom I sided at the time; it is only for an unexperienced man to come and talk after the inconsiderate manner the hon. member has done. The statements he has made to the House are so many untruths and he has been venturing on very dangerous ground. I have acted as treasurer of the Conservative party during three electoral campaigns, and when I was examined before the Royal Commission, the position I took was taken only after I had consulted with my political chieftains for the time being. The hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley), who is quite a juvenile member yet, ought to act with more circumspection. I say again the position I took on that occasion, and for which I am now censured, was determined upon after consulting with and on the advice of my political chieftains for the time being.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) That money never reached the county of Chicoutimi.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) I repeat it, I acted on the occasion mentioned, with the knowledge and advice of my former political chiefs.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. gentleman is wandering from the question before the committee.

Mr. TARTE. The hon. gentleman has accused me of things which he should know are not true, and am I not to be allowed to answer him? I am perfectly prepared to take my seat, but before doing so I must put myself right before the committee. The hon. gentleman says that in a certain inquiry, held in Montreal, I refused to answer certain questions, giving as one of my reasons that I was afraid of incriminating myself. I wish to state that I said nothing of the kind. I will add only this at present: that in taking the stand I took on that occasion, I acted with the advice of the Conservative leaders, and some of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House know what I mean. That matter has already been brought before this House. I stated at the time that if a responsible man on the other side of the House was prepared to say that I had acted in a dishonourable way, or that I had kept one dollar of money that was, as they say, intrusted to me at the time, I would give up my seat. I said more than that. I said that I had prepared a full statement of all the facts which I had sent to the 'Minerve' newspaper of Montreal, and that after having seen this statement, Messrs. Tasse and Lacoste came to my hotel in Montreal with that statement in their hands, and asked me not to publish it. I acted as a loyal man. Some of the Ministers know that I have been acquainted with the secrets of the party during a number of years in the past. I have been treasurer of the party during three different elections. I did nothing dishonest, and I never gave away any of the secrets of my party. I am reproached to-day, by men who know nothing at all about what they are saying, with doing things that I have done in the interest of the party which I served so long, and in which I must say I have left friends who are still dear to me.

Mr. BEELEY. (Translation.) I never stated that the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) had pocketed the money handed over to him as treasurer of the Conservative party. His conduct as treasurer was altogether out of question, and I did not utter a single word on the matter. The hon. member is only trying to divert the attention of the House from the question at issue. I stated that an inquest was ordered to be held in connection with an editorial published by the 'Electeur,' of Quebec, charging the Conservative Opposition in the Quebec Local House with having taken a bribe of $10,000 in order to let an item of the estimates pass, but I never said the hon. member had pocketed money when acting as treasurer of the Conservative party.

Mr. AMYOT. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) boasts of never having divulged any secrets intrusted to him. I say when he was intrusted with certain papers concerning the McGreevy enquête, it was not to publish them, but it was to show them to the chief of the party and to get advice from him, and it was a breach of good faith on the part of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) to publish them. I assert that fact, and I defy him to get a contradiction from those who intrusted him with the papers. That is the way in which the hon. gentleman keeps secrets. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) has said that in Montreal he did not refuse to answer a question put to him about a sum of $10,000 given by Mr. Whelan, that he did not refuse to answer because he was afraid to incriminate himself, but he refused to answer so as not to incriminate others. I meet the hon. gentleman squarely there.

That accusation has been made before, and I will quote to him what 'Le Courrier du Canada' said on 23rd May, 1890, and he will find a like statement in 'L'Événement,' in the Quebec 'Chronicle,' the Quebec 'Mercury,' and in the press of the whole country. Messrs. Taillon, Flynn, Blanchet, Casgrain, Faucher de St. Maurice, Tourigny, Martel, and many others, declared that they never had received any part of the $10,000 paid by Mr. Whelan. An enquête took place in Montreal.

Mr. TARTE. Let me look at the paper.

Mr. AMYOT. I will allow the hon. gentleman to look at the paper, although it is my private property. I will allow him to compare it with the original, which he will find in the library. An enquête took place in Montreal before Messrs. Beique and Malouin, when the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) was questioned in regard to those $10,000 said to have been used to buy the Quebec Opposition. Those gentlemen could not obtain an answer from him. He said: "I refuse to answer because I do not wish to incriminate myself." Where are those $10,000 now? The hon. gentleman refused to answer so as not to incriminate himself. Some time before that the hon. gentleman said that he did not want to divulge secrets. The whole secret remains still—where are the $10,000? Because those accused of having received them never obtained one cent of them. But this is not the only time when the hon. gentleman refused to answer. There was a criminal suit in Quebec. Mr. Trudel, who had something to do with the Quebec waterworks, was accused of perjury. I am sorry I have not the papers here, but there is a whole pamphlet about the matter. The hon. member (Mr. Tarte) when he was examined as to his participation in the boodle paid by Mr. Trudel to buy councillors—when Mr. Tarte was asked under oath, "Did you receive any of the boodle?" What did he say? "I refuse to answer, so as not to incriminate myself." This man is so pure that he never revealed secrets, he is too kind. This man when the Mercier Government was in power, went to that Government and obtained a letter of credit for $3,000. He got it discounted by Mr. Demers, a good Liberal. Later on he was asked why he had not done the job of printing for which he had received $3,000, in order that Mr. Demers would be paid. What did he answer under his own handwriting in the press? It is reported in 'Le Moniteur' of 22nd December last, as follows: "Foreseeing difficulties I did not execute the order for printing." But he had $3,000 in his pocket, and Mr. Demers lost them, and this was the conduct of a good and pure man whom everybody must believe. When this House knows him, as the country knows him, hon. members will attach no importance not only to his words, but even his handwriting. He writes against me in the press, for he knows I have no paper to defend myself. But I charge him here, first, that in order not to incriminate himself he refused to answer at the enquête in Montreal, before Messrs. Beique and Malouin, whether he had received any part of the $10,000 in respect to which charges had been brought against him.

Mr. TARTE. I never said anything of the kind; there is not a word of truth in it.

Mr. AMYOT. I charge the hon. member, in the second place, as appeared in the Quebec 'Chronicle,' that he refused under oath to state what part of the boodle he received from Mr. Trudel, and that he refused to answer the questions because he said "I do not desire to incriminate myself." I charge him with that, and when the hon. gentleman next attacks me in the House I hope to have the papers here and be prepared to read them. I charge him with having received $3,000 upon an order of the Quebec Government, that he received that amount from a friend, and he did not execute the contract afterwards, and that he kept the money. I say that the man who throws accusations against his late friends is not worthy of belief, either when he writes statements with his pen or whether he makes them by speech.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TARTE. Before cheering, I think the Minister should at least have waited and heard what I have to say, because when such accusations are brought against a member of this House, even if he is not as high in station as a Minister, he is entitled to some little attention. The hon. gentleman, of course, is better known to the House than I am, as he has been longer in Parliament than myself. The hon. gentleman for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) and myself have not always agreed—we had at one time a very big lawsuit. I was then working in the ranks of the Conservative party and the hon. gentleman allied himself with the Opposition. He was a Nationalist—he was defending his country and its provisions. He was a Nationalist, receiving very large sums of money every year as patriotism increased in Quebec. I have in my hand some accounts which will prove to the entire satisfaction of the House the full measure of patriotism of the hon. gentleman. The hon. member became a patriot and a Nationalist in 1885, after having returned from the celebrated war in which he played so important a part. He came back and became a great patriot and a great Nationalist. In 1887 the Liberal party, that he sends to hell every day, came into power in Quebec, and then the hon. gentleman, with a friend of his at the time, Mr. Pelletier, became very deeply interested in the Liberal party of the province of Quebec.

Mr. AMYOT.

Mr. AMYOT. The National party was formed by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. TARTE. Let me deal first with the patriotism of the hon. gentleman. It is a very interesting question for us to-day. He has accused me of being a very bad man, of having received money, of having kept money. If half what the hon. gentleman has said were true, I would not be worthy of a seat in this House for half an hour. But the House knows, hon. members on the other side of the House know, for I was long enough with them, that what the hon. gentleman says is not the fact.

Mr. AMYOT. Oh!

Mr. TARTE. I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman (Mr. Amyot), so let him take his medicine in patience.

Mr. AMYOT. I say that there is no charge of boodling against me.

Mr. TARTE. When I was on the other side of the House we always used to cheer my hon. friend (Mr. Amyot) when he got up on the Liberal side of the House, because we knew that he was going to put his foot into it, and he has put his foot in it pretty deeply to-day. He has spoken about his purity. Well, let us see a little about it. He was very deep in the favours of the Liberal party of the province of Quebec, and each year the moneys that he received from the treasury of the province were increasing.

Mr. AMYOT. It was for professional services, and there was no harm in that.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. This is going too far altogether. Here we are going into an interminable washing of dirty linen that nobody has the least interest in, and I hope you will call the question and let us vote upon it.

Mr. TARTE. Sir, it is only fair to me that I should not be left under the allegation of the hon. gentleman without an opportunity to defend myself. Here are the amounts paid him year after year—

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would not object, and I did not press my objection a little while ago, to the hon. gentleman making a reply to the attack that was made upon him. But if it is allowed to become a question of new attack and counter-attack there will be no end to it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TARTE. If the hon. gentleman allows me only one minute, I am prepared to give to the House the figures which prove that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Amyot) was paid by the Quebec Government year after year, more and more, and that he turned to the other side of politics when he ceased to be paid. I am prepared—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is not the question before the House, nor has it relation to any attack made upon the hon. gentleman.

Mr. TARTE. I am not prepared to take my seat without giving the exact figures, if I am allowed to state—

Mr. McNEILL. I wish, Mr. Chairman, to rise to a point of order. So far this matter has been very disgraceful to the House of Commons, and if it is possible at all, I hope you will put an end to it.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The committee have been out of order for certainly over an hour. It commenced by degree, as it always does on those occasions, and now it has gone so far that I am afraid if I put a stop to it, it would be an injustice to the man whom I think is purely and simply defending himself upon the present occasion. I hope it will be short. As the member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) says, I think that for the sake of the dignity of the House, the sooner we put a stop to it the better.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that any controversy arising out of the fact that an attack was made on the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte)—irregularly it may be—should be confined to a defence against that attack. But I do protest, in the name of this committee, against a new attack being made now by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) on a ground which, if admitted, will open up a discussion entirely new.

Mr. TARTE. I quite agree with the Prime Minister.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) is not opening up a new line that is irrelevant.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, he is.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) is simply defending himself against his accuser by proceeding now to discredit his accuser who has made a charge against him.

Mr. TARTE. I quite agree with the Prime Minister that no new charge should be made, and I quite agree that we have gone pretty far outside the question. I may be guilty, to a certain extent, but I am neither the real nor the original culprit. Sir, I only wish to defend myself against the accusations which have been brought against me by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Amyot). He has said that I have refused to answer before the courts of justice. I have explained a minute ago that before the Beique-Malouin Commission, I refused to answer a certain question, not because I was afraid to incriminate myself, the facts are there, and my word is just as good as the word of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Amyot). The other accusation that was brought against me was that I received from the Mercier Government, $3,000 for work that I never executed.

Mr. AMYOT. That is not what I said.

Mr. TARTE. What did the hon. gentleman say?

Mr. AMYOT. I said that a lettre de crédit was given for $3,000, was discounted for the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) by Mr. Demers, and that the money came from Demers. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) did not comply with the promise he made for his contract and Mr. Demers lost his money, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) kept it. He has it in his hands.

Mr. TARTE. What took place is this. During the McGreevy-Langevin inquiry, I received an order for printing from the Quebec Government. I never received one cent of money from that Government. I attached the order to a note of mine that I had endorsed by Mr. Demers in Quebec. Unfortunately for me, later on my business was completely ruined. I am very sorry to be obliged to give an account of my personal affairs before this Parliament, and I congratulate the hon. gentleman (Mr. Amyot) that he is in a better position than I am in that regard. I did not execute the work ordered by the Government for the simple reason that the Government changed at the time, and I was ordered by the DeBoucherville Government not to execute the work. I did not get a cent from the Quebec exchequer; the Quebec Government never gave me a dollar. The man who endorsed my note has since put me into insolvency, and he has taken hold of my property. I gave up even my books to him, and yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Amyot) is not even satisfied with that. My crime consists of not having executed the work, because the order to do the work was cancelled by the Quebec Government, and I never drew a cent from them. Now, Sir, this is the crime that I am charged with committing. It is made a reproach to me—not by a responsible party. I must say—that I refused to divulge secrets which the commission named by Mr. Mercier asked me to divulge, and which they had no right to ask from me. I insisted on my privilege before that commission, there was no crime about it. I am not going to go back on my old friends, and to say that they did dishonourable things, and that I did dishonourable things with them. I have suffered on account of this accusation, and I will suffer a great deal longer before I make public things that occurred between past friends and myself. If any of my hon. friends who were my peers at the time bring accusations against me I will be free to speak. But when men like the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) accuses me—he was a Liberal at the time, and did not know what passed—I am perfectly justified in keeping silence. I was never reproached for that by responsible men. These are now what I am reproached with by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Amyot), but they are not crimes. I have the misfortune of being ruined financially, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Amyot), it seems to me, should have the good grace not to call the attention of the House to that. He knew very well that I did not pocket that money, and he knew very well that the Quebec Government never paid a cent of it. I want to know why he has entered into my private business? Are we to enter into the private business of every member of this Parliament? I do not say that there are dishonourable men here, but I do say that there are a great many political transactions which cannot very well bear the light of day. We are not all saints and angels here. Those of my hon. friends on the other side of the House who acted with me in the past, are, I suppose, just the same men that I knew them at that time. They use money now in elections as they used in the past—not for dishonourable purposes, but for organization purposes. Well, suppose I got some money in my hands, suppose I got some money to be used against the hon. member for Bellechasse, is that the reason he is cross with me? The hon. gentleman reproaches me with having received money from the Quebec exchequer. I did not receive money from the Quebec exchequer; but the hon. gentleman did—lots of money. Will you allow me, if I am within the rules of the House, to put before you the amounts which my hon. friend was receiving from the Quebec Government year by year?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not want to curtail the hon. gentleman in his defence. He may defend himself, but if he brings new accusations, he will only prompt the other member to get up in reply, and there will be no end of it.

Mr. TARTE. I only want to defend myself. This is what the hon. gentleman received—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. TARTE. I take the account from 'La Minerve,' a paper sacred to him at the present time—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. TARTE. 'La Minerve' of May 28, 1890, says that he received in 1887, $2,334; in 1888—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman not to bring these matters up, as they are new. The hon. member for Bellechasse will feel obliged to defend himself against them. They have no relation to this Parliament, and I ask the hon. gentleman not to do it.

Mr. TARTE. Then I will give only the total amount—$13,000.

Mr. AMYOT. I positively declare that I never received a cent from the Quebec Government with the exception of taxed costs or duly earned fees for professional services—costs which were duly earned in the courts. I was never accused of boodling. It is true. I was looked on, wrongly perhaps, as a good lawyer in criminal matters, and also in civil cases, which I generally won. All my accounts for those cases have not yet been settled by the Quebec Government; I hope they will be. But I never was accused of boodling in my life. I spent some years in the same political camp as the hon. gentleman, and all sorts of charges of boodling were made against him; but there never was one charge laid at my door. I came out of that dirty camp, pure and honest and clean.

Mr. TARTE. Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman has repeated his accusation against me, that charges of boodling were laid at my door. Well, Sir, I must answer that accusation. He says he has never been accused of boodling. The present Postmaster General, when Minister of Militia and Defence, accused him of having stolen public money. I repeated the accusation in my own paper. The hon. gentleman sued me. I pleaded the truth of the charge; and I gained my case against him. He was before the courts of Quebec, accused by Judge Casault himself of having stolen a horse, of having sold the horse, and kept the money. Twelve of his countrymen declared that I was right in accusing him of being a dishonest man. He had sued me for $25,000 for making the charge against him. I think I can lay my hand on the charge of the hon. Mr. Justice Casault. The hon. member was accused of having had the colt in the North-west. It was a fine colt, it appears. The hon. gentleman brought the horse back from the North-west, and sold it and pocketed the money. Mr. Justice Casault said: "I could understand that an officer might become attached to a horse that he liked—"

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I must appeal to you once more, Mr. Chairman, because if this conduct is allowed, no decent man will sit in this Chamber.

Mr. AMYOT. I am not going to be accused of new offences without offering a denial.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman may bring the matter up on something else.

Mr. AMYOT. I claim the justice of the committee. They are new charges, and I must have an opportunity of answering them. I will ask the hon. Postmaster General if he ever accused me of having stolen—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I asked the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) to sit down, and he has done so.

Mr. AMYOT. Yes, after he made the assertion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I know the hon. gentleman is entitled to a defence; but I will ask him in the name of the committee to make it at another time. It seems to me that we have gone too far, and that this is disgraceful to the House.

Mr. AMYOT. I want only to say this, Mr. Chairman: you will allow me to answer the charge—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; Chair.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I ask the hon. gentleman not to proceed. There will be no end to it if he is allowed to continue. I know it is a personal matter, but if the hon. gentleman goes on, the hon. member for L'Islet will commence again afterwards. If the committee will sustain me, I will ask the hon. member for Bellechasse not to speak about the matter.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We can surely agree on the rule we have been acting on all along. This altercation began when hon. members came to discuss the Quebec judiciary, and to name them, and to find fault with one after another. But every one will agree that when the discussion has gone so far, and imputations are made upon an hon. member, he has the right to reply, but not to make an attack on new grounds. That was what I urged. I conceived that the hon. member for L'Islet ought to be allowed to reply, and I refrained from pressing any objection to his replying to the charge made by the hon. member for Bellechasse; but I interposed when he made new accusations, and I submit that you disregarded my objection, and allowed the hon. member for L'Islet to make so gross an accusation as that another hon. member for this House stole a horse. While this was an outrage on the order of the House, it was equally so not to permit the hon. member for Bellechasse the opportunity of denying the truth of the accusation.

Mr. AMYOT. I will only say this, that I sued the hon. gentleman, and, in spite of the charge of the judge, twelve jurymen declared that he was a vile calumniator.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I want to make a few calm remarks on this question. I have had the pleasure of being a member of this House now for eight years, and I never saw it turned into such a bear garden as it has been this afternoon. I think we should conduct ourselves more in accordance with the rules of the House than we have been doing to-day. I want to say a few words with regard to the salaries of the judges. A few years ago the hon. Premier brought before the House a resolution to increase the salaries of the judges; but it was found, after a few days' conversation among the members on the subject, that the feeling of the House was strongly against any increase. So strong was that feeling that the hon. leader of the House thought it best to withdraw the resolution. He has seen fit to-day to bring in another resolution, not of the same character, but somewhat similar. I think he is adopting the Napoleonic style of defeating his enemies, by taking us in detail. This year he brings in a resolution to increase the retiring allowances of the judges, and probably next year he will bring in another to increase their salaries. I think it was the hon. President of the Council who said that it would be fair to compare the salaries paid to the judges in this country with those paid in the United States. I am one of those who believe that every man who is called to discharge his duty in the interests of the state should be well paid—should be paid not only for his time, but for the ability he brings to the discharge of his duties. I am far from being one of those who would like to see the salaries of judges lower than they should be. But when I compare their salaries with those of other people, I feel they are reasonably high, and that it would be an injustice to the other classes if they were increased, or any advantages given them more than they possess at present. The right hon. First Minister said that the salaries of the judges in Ontario were about equal to those of Cabinet Ministers. I would ask any hon. gentleman if he does not believe that the salary given to a judge is sufficiently high when it is equal to that given a Cabinet Minister? Every one knows the arduous duties a Cabinet Minister has to discharge, and the great responsibility and the varied expenses entailed upon him on account of the position he occupies. Therefore, I think the judges are more than equally well paid as Cabinet Ministers. Again, we are told that living in the country to-day is much dearer than it was when the salaries were first fixed. If that be so in the case of the judges, it is equally so with regard to every other class in the community, and if living now is higher than it was formerly it would be unjust to tax other classes for the purpose of benefiting one or two. I wish to draw a comparison between the salaries of judges in this country and in the United States. The Federal judges of the United States are eight in number. The chief justice receives $10,500, and his associates $10,000 each. We have no court in this country comparable with the Federal court, because that is the highest court of jurisdiction in the United States, and although our Supreme Court is the highest court in Canada, yet is not the highest court of jurisdiction, because we send a large number of our cases to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England. Therefore, the Federal judges of the United States are of a higher character than those of the Supreme Court of Canada. Take the circuit court judges of the United States, who are nine in number. Their salaries are $6,000 a year, and they have to live in cities just as well as the judges in Canada, where their expenses are just as great. Mr. Justice May lives in Boston, where living is as dear as in Montreal or Toronto. Judge Blachford lives in New York; Judge Harlam lives in Chicago. Chief Justice Fuller lives in Washington, where the expenses are as high as any city in the Dominion. Take, again, the United States Court of Claims. The salaries of the judges there are $4,500 per year. Then there is the district courts of the United States, where the salary amounts to $3,500 per year for fifty-one of the judges, $4,000 per year for ten of them, and $5,000 per year for one of them. Those judges are distributed throughout the various states, where living is, if anything, higher than it is in any of our provinces. In the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the chief justice gets $5,000 and his associates only $4,000, although they have to live in Washington, the centre of fashion and expense. Let me make a few other comparisons. Take the province of Ontario, with a population of 2,112,000. We pay our chief justice $6,000 per year, and his associates $5,000 per year. But in Ontario they receive about $1,000 each in addition, which would make $7,000 for the chief justice and $6,000 for his associates. Compare with that province the state of New York, whose population is 5,918,000, and in that large state the chief justice has $7,500 per year, and his associate judges $7,000 per year. Take the province of Quebec, with a population of 1,489,000: its chief justice gets $6,000 per year, and his associates $5,000, while in Michigan, with a population of 2,094,000, the chief justice and the associate judges receive $5,000 per year each. In Indiana, with a population of 2,192,000, the chief justice and his associates receive only $5,000 per year. Take New Brunswick, which has a population of 320,000, the chief justice there receives $5,000, and the associates $4,000, while in Maine, with a population of 661,000, the chief justice and associates get $3,000 a year. Again, in Nova Scotia, with a population of 450,000, the chief justice receives $5,000 salary, and the associate judges $4,000, whereas in New Hampshire, having a population of 376,000, the chief justice receives $3,500 salary, and his associates $3,200. Compare Prince Edward Island with Vermont. Prince Edward Island has a population of 109,000, and its chief justice gets a salary of $4,000, and the associate judges $3,200, while in Vermont, with three times the population, the chief justice and his associates get only $3,000 a year. Let us take Minnesota and compare it with Manitoba. In Minnesota, with 1,300,000 population, the chief justice has $4,500 per year, and his associates $4,000, whereas in Manitoba, with only a population of 154,000, the chief justice has $5,000, and his associates $4,000. Compare Dakota with the Territories. Dakota has a population of 500,000, and her chief justice and associates receive $3,000 per year each, while in our Territories, with only 67,000, the judges receive $4,000 per year. In Montana, with a population of 132,000, the chief justice and his associates receive $3,000 per annum. The chief justice in British Columbia, whose population is 97,000, gets $5,000, and his associates $4,000. In Washington Territory, with a population of 349,000, the judges receive $3,000 per year. You will see by this comparison, which the President of the Council (Mr. Ives) said would be a fair comparison, that we are paying our judges a very fair sum. It is said that it is difficult to obtain good men at those salaries, because many advocates make twice as much. But it must be remembered that the very best advocates do not always make the best judges. There are certain qualifications which a judge requires. He requires particularly good sense, an equitable temperament, a keen sense of justice and great patience; and you will frequently find these qualifications in attorneys who do not make $10,000 or $20,000 at the Bar, but who would make better judges upon the Bench than probably many first-class advocates. This will be admitted by every one, because all you want, other things being equal, is a man with broad common sense, a wide sense of justice in his heart, and a knowledge of the law. He does not require that technical or extensive knowledge of the law that an advocate does, because he hears the points discussed by the advocates before he has to form a conclusion. Further, Mr. Chairman, we know that the selections made in Ontario have been, on the whole, very good. We have nothing to complain of with regard to our judges in Ontario. It appears that the Quebec people are always at each others' throats about the judges in their province. I must say, from a knowledge of our judges for the last twenty-five or thirty years, that they are an ornament to the position they occupy, and I am glad to know that we are able to boast that our judiciary is one of the purest in the world. But if it has been possible to obtain these men in the past for the salaries the Government has given, it surely is possible to continue to obtain them. Particularly this will be seen to be the case when it is considered that the selections in Ontario have been made from one party only. Very seldom within the last fifteen years has a judge been taken from the Reform party. Good men have been secured from one party, and there are just as good men in the other party who have never been asked to sit on the Bench. I think there is nothing in the argument that it is impossible to get good men to occupy these positions. It must be of great advantage to the judge of the Supreme Court that he is able to retire with an allowance of two-thirds of his salary, giving him an income of over $4,000. This annuity or superannuation must be taken into account when you consider the amount of their salaries in comparison with the income of the members of the Bar. Compare the position of our judges with that of the judges of the United States. There are many advantages on the side of judges here. In the first place, the judges in the United States have lower salaries than judges here.

There a man at the Bar is elected to a judgeship in the state of Michigan, let us say. He is elected to fill the place for a certain period. He must stand the expense of his election, and when he is defeated or retired, he must go back to build up his practice anew. Yet they have very excellent judges in many of the states, it being quite frequently the case that a man is chosen on his merits irrespective of party. If good men can be got in the United States to fill the judgeships under these conditions, surely in Ontario and the other provinces we should be able as we have been hitherto, in Ontario at least, to secure good men. Therefore, I think we should not increase the salaries of these judges, especially in the present depressed state of trade. The working people of this country have to work early and late in order to make both ends meet, and they cannot stand it that salaries of $6,000 or $7,000 should be increased by annuity or superannuation, or in any other way. Just let me give you a few facts, Mr. Chairman, which the people generally ought to know, and which hon. gentlemen of this House ought to know. The total average wages earned by men in the cities, towns and villages in this country from 1884 to 1890 was $447 per year.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I regret that, before recess, hon. members of this House, obeying the promptings of political animosity, should have made insinuations calculated to destroy public confidence in the judiciary of our province. I enter my protest against these insinuations, believing as I do that our magistracy is fully up to the standard of any other province of the Dominion. The hon. magistrates of the province of Quebec, irrespective of the political party from which they have been selected, are, in general, admired for their impartiality, their sense of justice and their legal skill. The respect evinced by the community for their judgments, is the best proof of their integrity. The insinuations made against the judges by the hon. members for Montmagny and L'Islet, are most unfair, harmful and calculated to injure the Bar and the Bench of the province, as well as the whole community. I look upon those insults as altogether gratuitous, baseless and prompted by political animus, for similar judgments were given by the judiciary of the province, under similar circumstances, against the Conservative party, and there was no outcry, no outburst of feeling from the Conservatives, who, on the contrary, respected and bowed to the decisions of the courts, without attempting to discredit them in public opinion. It is within our recollection that in 1874, judges who sat on a royal commission gave judgments against the Conservative party. Under the circumstances, I do not recollect the magistracy having been attacked by the Conservative party to any extent as it has been insulted to-day by members of this House. Despite the fact that the judgments in question had been instrumental in bringing about the downfall of the Conservative Ministry in 1874, we did bow to the decision of the court, which was presided over by eminent judges; this decision we did look upon as the law of the land. There is still another occasion when a judge of the province of Quebec, Sir A. A. Dorion, a Liberal in politics, was called upon to give judgment against a Conservative Legislative Councillor, and although the blow struck at the latter gentleman was a severe one for himself and his political friends as well, nobody animadverted to any such extent upon the decision given by Mr. Justice Dorion against the Hon. Pierre Lavallée. I do not wish to hold the Liberal party as a whole responsible for the invectives uttered by some of its members against the judiciary of our province; but I may say that, whenever the judgments of the courts affect the Liberal party, hon. members of this House, belonging to that political persuasion have no other answer to the decisions of the courts, however just they may be, but abusive language and invectives of the most revolting nature, uttered on the very floor of this House. I, for one, do protest against such unbecoming language, not to use a stronger term. Now, Mr. Chairman, I must say that from motives quite different from those which actuated the hon. members who addressed the House before recess, I am opposed to the resolution introduced by the hon. Prime Minister making provision that Supreme Court judges may retire on full salary. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, we should look to England for precedents as to salaries paid to judges. It is a matter of notoriety that in England it is the great landed families which are called upon to shoulder public expenditure and to contribute most heavily to the public exchequer. The burden of taxation falls more heavily upon the aristocratic classes, who have also decreed that the eminent judges to whom is intrusted the administration of the law should be paid very high salaries. I am not ready to admit that the fact of paying large salaries is calculated to promote the efficiency of the courts. With lower salaries, I am of opinion, that as good judges can be secured as those now administering the law, and that the burden of taxation borne by the people would be less heavy, without the administration of the law being less efficient. A comparison has also been instituted between judges and bank officers, and high officials in great monetary institutions. I think it is not fair to compare the salaries paid to magistrates administering the law with those paid by great financial or manufacturing establishments to their managers, to enhance their credit, and not with a view to remunerate services. Such a comparison is neither fair nor reasonable. The salaries paid to judges should not be compared with the princely income paid to magnates of finance and trade. No adequate comparison can be instituted between judges and men drawing salaries as bank officials or managers of industrial or commercial establishments. There is a striking contrast evolved out of the comparison between salaries paid to judges with those paid to most wage-earners, especially in our community. All things considered, I am inclined to believe that the judges are being paid salaries far from inferior to those paid to wage-earners who struggle from one end of the year to the other, and who have to bear, in addition to that, a much heavier burden than that borne by the magistrates. The complaint is made that in some large cities our judges have an exceptional amount of work to do; that their average daily work is considerable, and on those grounds their position should be improved. I am of opinion, that should the judges be too hard-worked in those important localities, the Government should appoint new judges, instead of increasing the salaries of those who are in active service. It is better to increase the number of servants than to increase the salaries of those who are in active service. For should you increase salaries, the staff would still remain the same, and with a more considerable outlay, a better and more efficient administration of the law would by no means be secured, and complaints about the law's delays and the arrears in the legal business would still continue to be heard. I do not think that a higher salary will cause a judge to be more honest; and the question of income and amount of salary is not the only test of efficiency and honesty; impartiality in a judge is quite independent from the question of salary; in short, a judge who has at heart the case of his reputation and of his personal dignity, and who is fully alive to the sense of his exalted social position, will not be more so, whatever may be the scale of the salary he is paid. For, as a rule, when salaries paid either by monetary establishments, or by the Government, are on too high a scale, they constitute a danger to society. I think that, when a man is paid too high a salary, he may possibly not be inclined personally to lead a bad life, but the danger is that his children who rely on the father's salary, may, out of a belief that they are independent, eat the bread of idleness. Such is the danger which threatens the country with the loss of useful citizens whose lives are too often wrecked through idleness. Children would grow into better citizens, should they not rely upon the fortune of their parents—a fortune too often amassed at the expense of the community, of the citizens in all the walks of life, from the farmer to the merchant, and the toiler who struggles from one end of the year to the other to earn a paltry salary. The immense majority of our population look with a feeling of envy at the enormous salaries paid by the Government and by financial institutions, which have to charge high rates of interest and realize extravagant profits on their customers, in order to meet the expenditure. A feeling of jealousy is thus fostered in the lower strata of society against the upper classes. Such is the ground out of which European socialism has evolved with an alarming growth, which social and religious authorities are now trying to stay. I think the judiciary should be the first to set the example of a simple and austere life to the community; instead of striving to emulate the conduct of those upstarts, of those millions of fortune, who try to dazzle our people with their scandalous exhibition of their wealth. I say the judges of the land should so conduct themselves, and to bring up their children in such a way as to make of them citizens useful to the state.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Before Six o'clock, in speaking of the salaries of the judges, I was about to draw a comparison between the average salary of the judges of this country and the average salary of the wage-earner; and while I think there can be no approach of the salary of the wage-earner to that of the judge, because they work in different spheres of life, still there should be a reasonable similarity between the two. I find on looking over the Bureau of Statistics that the average wages paid to families in cities and towns from 1884 to 1890, were $447; and the expense of living during those six years averaged $407, leaving a balance to the wage-earner and his family of only $40 at the end of the year. Now, I find that the average salary of the judges is $5,500; so you will see that one judge earns as much as twelve families. We will suppose now that each family averages five persons, that would give $81.81 to each person in the workingman's family; but each member of a judge's family of five persons would have $1,120; in other words, the salary of a judge would maintain sixty-eight labouring people. Now, I think that is a fair way to look at the question, and I am sure it is from that standpoint that the labourers of this country will look upon it. These men, whose earnings at the end of the year average a little more than the expenses during that year, will say that the Government have asked this House to increase the salaries of men who are now drawing as much as eleven or twelve families of labouring men. It may be said that we cannot draw a comparison between these two classes of people. But we must always remember that we should not impose a burden, as I said before, upon those who are struggling from one end of the year to the other to make both ends meet. The Government claim credit this year for reducing taxation upon the labouring people of this country, and if they are to retain credit for that, they must not increase the public expenditure by increasing the salaries of judges which we believe are now sufficiently high. I think that the principle of superannuation is entirely wrong when applied to civil servants or to Government officials of any kind. I think no argument can be adduced to justify that practice. There is only one class that, in my opinion, should be pensioned, and that is the class of men who are drawn from various occupations in life, to fight the battles of our country, those who expose their lives in the interest of the country, who receive very little from it in wages, and who have to leave happy homes and families, and leave their country in many cases, to fight for us. This is the only class, in my opinion, that should receive a superannuation or a pension. We are now paying $333,000 for pensions, superannuations and gratuities. We pay no less than $33,000 for the superannuation of judges, and when the people of this country know that they are paying nearly a third of a million dollars every year into the pockets of men who are sufficiently paid when in the employ of the Government, they will come to the conclusion that there is a partiality shown in the distribution of the funds of this country. I think the Government would be unwise, especially at this particular juncture, in burdening the people of this country any more and any longer by increasing the superannuation given to the judges. As I said before, this is only the beginning of the end. Two years ago a resolution was brought down to increase the salaries of the judges all round, public opinion in this House and out of it was opposed to the measure, and the leader of the Government withdrew it. Now, this is the entrance of the thin edge of the wedge. Next year we will probably find an increase in some other department of the judiciary, and in less than five years we will have just what the resolution two years ago promised us. Therefore, I would urge upon the Government not to choose this time to impose additional burdens upon the people. Let the Government show economy in this matter by cutting down extravagant salaries and making the taxes of the people lighter, and I am sure they will receive the thanks of the people as well as the thanks of every member of this House.

Mr. GILLIES. In approaching a question of this kind, that appertains to the maintenance of the judiciary, we should endeavour to divest ourselves of bias and all feelings of political partisanship. Therefore, it behoves us not to give utterance to any expressions that would tend to lessen the respect for the judiciary which the people now entertain for them. I was pleased when, a few years ago, a resolution was introduced into this House to increase the salaries of the judges, and regretted that the Government saw fit to abandon, at least for a time, their position on that question. For some time I have been of the opinion that the judges of the land were an underpaid class of civil servants. I was surprised at the reasons put forth against this resolution by the leader of the Opposition. He said that the salaries of the judges were either too low or they were high enough; if they were too low, they should be increased, and therefore he thought this resolution was radically wrong. I think that was the essence of the reasons he gave for opposing the resolution. I quite agree with the President of the Council who said that we should endeavour to have a strong court in the land, and if there is any court in Canada that should be composed of strong minds, it certainly is the court of last resort. Now, this resolution, I take it, is tantamount to increasing the salaries of the judges, and I think that is right. The resolution does not propose to increase the scale of their salaries, because that would affect, probably, a long list that cannot at present be disturbed, and therefore the salary is being increased indirectly, as expressed by the last speaker, and therefore meets the argument or objection of the hon. the leader of the Opposition. Now, the resolution says that a judge before he can come within the provisions of this resolution, must have been fifteen years on the Bench, or five years on the Bench of the Supreme Court of Canada. Now, if we want to have a strong court at Ottawa, we must hold out inducements to the very best men in the profession to take positions on that court. If we pursue a parsimonious policy such as has been pursued since that court was established, we shall necessarily fall short of attaining the object at which we are aiming. At present, a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, if he seeks a superannuation, only gets two-thirds of the present salary of $7,000, or a sum of about $4,600 a year. Now, it may be very inconvenient indeed for a judge of the Supreme Court to retire upon any such salary. He may feel that the best part of his usefulness is gone, he is holding on very much against his will, and very much against his inclination, because the retiring allowance is not sufficient to maintain him and his family in the position in which they should be maintained. If this salary is continued at its present rate, he retires upon a sum equivalent to that which he is now receiving, and therefore when he finds that, through ill-health or otherwise, he does not perform the duties that devolve upon him with acceptance to the country, he will retire from the position, feeling sure that his maintenance will not be endangered. Now, it is absurd to compare the salaries of judges with those of labourers or people in similar walks of life, as the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McDonald) attempted to do. He is a physician, and he would be very sorry indeed if a scale of fees were adopted for his profession at the same rate as navvies are paid upon our railways. It is absurd to institute any such comparison, and he himself would doubtless be one of the first to oppose any such a rate. Therefore it is only tardy justice that is now being done to the judiciary. As I say, they have been underpaid, and the move that is being now made should have been made years ago. The judges of the land should be independent of every adverse financial wind that blows, and should therefore be in a position to keep their minds at rest in regard to their financial affairs, so that they may devote their entire attention to the duties that devolve upon them. As was mentioned by the Prime Minister this afternoon, we have bank officials, bank presidents, and bank cashiers who are paid much higher salaries than even the highest salary that is paid to the judges of our land. When we compare salaries received by judges in the Dominion of Canada with those received by judges in the other British colonies enjoying responsible government, we find that our judges are paid considerably less. Take, for instance, the colony of Victoria, Australia, with a population of only 1,104,000, or one-fifth of that of the Dominion of Canada, and we find that the chief justice is paid a salary of $17,500, and six puisne judges are each paid a salary of $15,000.

Mr. MULOCK. Would you recommend that scale for Canada?

Mr. GILLIES. I am simply showing a comparison between a colony much inferior to us in population and territorial extent. Take New South Wales, with a population of one million, and the chief justice is paid $17,500, and five judges are paid $13,000 each. Take Queensland, with a population of less than 400,000, and the chief justice receives $12,500, and four judges each $10,000. Take South Australia, with a population of 300,000, and the chief justice receives $10,000, and three puisne judges, each $8,500. Take Tasmania, with a population of only 145,000 and the chief justice receives $7,350, and each of the judges, $6,000. Take Cape Colony, with a population of 1,500,000, and the chief justice receives $12,500, and the eight puisne judges, $8,750 each. These facts show that in each of these seven colonies, every one of the judges are paid far in excess of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, not to mention the judges of the different provincial courts. Victoria, with a population of only one-fifth of ours, with a territory only one-thirty-fourth of ours, pays its chief justice $17,500, and each of the six judges, $15,000. This fact alone shows how far we are behind our sister colonies in this respect. It has been said that inasmuch as the judges are paid as much as Cabinet Ministers therefore they receive a sufficient salary. To my mind, our Cabinet Ministers are entirely underpaid, and I say that wholly regardless of what party may be in power. In the colony of Victoria, the Prime Minister there receives $10,000, and the Treasurer, who corresponds to our Minister of Finance, receives $10,000. If that is done in a sister colony like Victoria, how much more should we pay than we are now doing. I would be very sorry indeed to see the leader of the Opposition at any time when leading a Government in this House in the enjoyment of so small and miserable a salary as is paid to the present Prime Minister. If we go across to the United States, into that realm of democracy, where the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. McDonald) roamed this afternoon, we will find instances that will not at all bear out the proposition he was endeavouring to maintain when he instituted a comparison between salaries paid to judges there and here. What do we find? The judges referred to by the hon. gentleman to-day were purely state judges, and paid by the state. Their system differs radically from ours, inasmuch as all our judicial machinery is maintained throughout the Dominion by the Federal authority. In the United States the different States maintain their own judges. The only charge upon the United States general Government is for the maintenance of the Supreme Court of the Western States at Washington. The Federal judges in the United States are admittedly underpaid, and there is not a lawyer with whom you discuss the question in the United States who will not tell you that the Federal judges are lamentably underpaid. But take the city of New York. It has seven judges, each receiving $17,500; twelve judges, each receiving $15,000; five judges, each receiving $12,000; and six judges, each receiving $10,000. These facts show how miserably underpaid are our judges in comparison with the judges in the United States, and also how far astray the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. McDonald) was when he was labouring through figures connected with the United States for examples to bear out his argument. I therefore am strongly in favour of the resolution now proposed. While on this subject I would earnestly and respectfully draw the Prime Minister's attention to one branch of the judiciary in the province to which I belong, with the hope that he may direct his attention in that direction at the most favourable opportunity. In my province we have seven county court judges, some of whom, I venture to say, would favourably fill and fitly occupy seats upon the Bench of any court in the land. And in this connection I particularly refer to the gentleman that fills the position of county court judge in the district in which I myself live and practice my profession. Each of these judges is paid a small salary of $2,400 a year. I speak with full knowledge of the subject when I say that they are sadly underpaid, considering their duties, skill and attainments.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must remind the hon. gentleman that this is outside of the subject under discussion. I ask the hon. gentleman not to proceed with the subject.

Mr. GILLIES. I will not press that matter any further at present. I simply mentioned it for the reason that when the Government are again considering the matter I hope they will bear in mind the underpaid and under-salaried county court judges throughout Nova Scotia. I have given these instances to show how underpaid the judges of the Dominion of Canada are in comparison with the judges of other colonies, and how well directed the present resolution is in bringing about a remedy in regard to a matter that has, to my mind, been long looking for reform.

Mr. MULLOCK. I understand that the discussion is practically limited to the proposition involved in the resolution, namely, that this provision for retiring on full pay should be confined solely to members of the Supreme Court, or those who have graduated through the Superior Court or the Exchequer or Vice-Admiralty courts into the Supreme Court. That being the case, the issue before the House is comparatively simple, I think. It is proposed to have a system of retiring allowances applicable to the Supreme Court in marked contradistinction to the system in force as regards judges of the Superior Court. Take the case of a judge of the Superior Court. Take a puisne judge who receives from the Dominion exchequer $5,000 a year. It is true that while he actually serves he receives from the provinces a certain other salary and he also receives some perquisites from the Dominion; but should that officer desire to retire he would only receive two-thirds of the $5,000, or $3,333, whilst if he should be so fortunate as to be promoted to the Supreme Court, and linger there perhaps after his usefulness has largely disappeared, he will be able to retire on a pension of $7,000. I do not propose to consider the question altogether from a financial aspect, but still that is one of the views that cannot be lost sight of. Let me remind the committee of the growth of the expenditure on the administration of justice since the present Administration took office—I speak of the present Administration, assuming that it is the same Government as that which took office in 1878. At the time of Confederation the total expenditure upon administration of justice by the Dominion of Canada was $291,242. From the time of Confederation to 1879 this expenditure had grown under the two Administrations which had during that period ruled the country, to the sum of $577,896. Since that period fourteen years have elapsed, and the cost of administration of justice has grown to the sum of $736,457, this amount being that which appears in the Public Accounts for 1892-93; in other words, the expenditure upon this branch of the public service has increased by nearly 30 per cent. Is there anything to warrant that expenditure in the increased paying power of the people? Has the population increased? Has the National Policy increased the wealth of the country and our purchasing power to that extent? Will any hon. member pretend to assert that such is the fact? Does the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) know that the people are able to sustain salaries on the scale paid by the Australian colonies?

Mr. GILLIES. I cited those salaries as a good guide.

Mr. MULLOCK. I am aware that if any one travels over the whole of the universe he will be able to find isolated precedents for almost any proposition. Whenever it is thought to incur expenditure beyond what can be done with due regard to our own resources and conditions, all that is necessary to be done is to cite examples of extravagance in some other colonies which have not yet gone into bankruptcy, and to cite this as a precedent to bolster up the case submitted. But hon. gentlemen will find that the salaries quoted as being paid by the Australian colonies were salaries fixed before the date of responsible government, when the Australian colonies were Crown colonies, when there was extravagance all along the line. To-day in many Crown colonies enormous salaries are paid.

Mr. GILLIES. Not so large as those.

Mr. MULLOCK. Take the salaries paid in the West India colonies

Mr. GILLIES. They are not so large as those.

Mr. MULLOCK. They are enormous, considering the resources of the people. To quote such salaries as precedents for the people of Canada is only harmful. It has ever been the case that if people could help themselves to the public exchequer they did so with a lavish hand. But, Mr. Speaker, the member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) will not have the courage to suggest that we should follow the example of these Australian colonies. He would not say that because this Dominion is five times more populous than some of these colonies, that we should pay our judges five times more than they pay them. Nor would he venture to say that the salaries paid in these colonies ought to be adopted as the standard in our country. Although the question of the expense is a most important element, I do not think we should altogether discuss the question from that standpoint alone. I agree with hon. gentlemen who say that cheap justice, might turn out in the end to be extremely dear, and if the salary attached to the office was necessary in order to maintain efficiency, it would be unwise economy to stop at any price short of getting the most perfect system of administering justice. But it is not the salary which causes a judge to be honest. The position in society that a judge occupies will always be a powerful incentive to the very best lawyers that the country can produce to ascend the Bench. Now, supposing the Minister carries out his scheme, what would be the result? We will have a very unwise discrimination between Superior Court judges and Supreme Court judges in the system of retiring allowances. Already we have seen what I think is a most reprehensible practice: the promotion of judges from a lower to a higher position. In my opinion—although it may not be a popular view—when a man is appointed to a position on the Bench it should be understood that that is the position in which he is to remain. It is well enough to hold out the inducement of promotion for good service, but all things considered, I am of opinion that when a judge once takes the emine, he should remain in the position to which he has been appointed, and he should have no inducement to look to one side or the other for promotion; but should discharge his duties unbiassed by any consideration: as to whether the manner in which he discharges those duties shall meet with public approbation or otherwise. There can be no perfect confidence in the Bench so long as the system obtains which has now become the fashion in the land, of judges being promoted from one court to another as they may please the powers that be for the time being. There should, therefore, be no inducement of a financial character to cause these judges to seek to leave the places to which they have been appointed in order to get a higher and more lucrative office. But under this scheme it is proposed not only to ignore the great Superior Court judges, but to establish a rule by which you discriminate against them and intensify the evil, if such has existed, of puisne judges regarding their present position as but temporary resting places, by holding out substantial inducements to them to seek promotion. Far be it from me to suggest that any judge of the land has sought promotion by any improper means, but human nature is human nature, and judges cannot be blind to the advantages of being in a position where the retiring allowance is $7,000 a year instead of $3,333.34. It would be too much to expect from human nature that these gentlemen should not endeavour, by means to them seeming strictly honourable, to reach the promised land. I, therefore, Mr. Chairman, in the public interest, deprecate this discriminating measure that the First Minister has proposed. If we compare the responsibility of the Superior Court judges—I speak more particularly with reference to the Bench of the province of Ontario—with the responsibilities of the judges of the Supreme Court, I venture to say, with all due respect to the judges of the Supreme Court, that the judges of the Superior court discharge more onerous duties, and that the efficient discharge of their duties more intimately concerns the welfare of the people. How many cases come to the

Mr. MULOCK.

Supreme Court? But a mere sprinkling of all the cases in the whole Dominion; while in the superior courts the mills are grinding daily and hourly almost all through the year. The volume of business done in the superior courts is many times greater than that disposed of by the Supreme Court judges; and only a very small percentage of the cases which pass through the Court of Appeal, say in the province of Ontario, ever find their way to the Supreme Court. In fact, in my judgment, the constitution of the Supreme Court is unsound. I never could see the wisdom of an appeal to the Supreme Court on matters of fact at all. At the furthest, the appellate powers of the Supreme Court should be limited to matters of a constitutional character arising out of the construction of Dominion statutes, and so on. The provision for an appeal to the Supreme Court from every superior court in the land, as exists to-day, is, I think, an unwise one; and, instead of moving in the direction in which the hon. gentleman is now moving, I think we should move to reorganize the constitution of the Supreme Court, and to provide for the superannuation, 'nolens volens,' of a judge who has ceased to be able to discharge his duties properly. Why, we have on the Superior Court Bench of Ontario to-day some of the most distinguished jurists to be found in the country. Think for a moment of the invidious comparison which the hon. Minister proposes to establish between their case and the case of the Supreme Court judges. Take the Court of Appeal of the province of Ontario. That court enjoys the unanimous confidence and respect of the profession, and of the whole public. There are upon the bench of the Court of Appeal judges who have passed the seventy years' limit mentioned in this resolution. Mr. Justice Burton, a distinguished jurist, of whom every member of the profession speaks with the utmost respect, who has been upon the Bench for more than twenty years, is now approaching his seventy-fifth year, if I dare venture to tell any one's age here; and yet that gentleman is to be retired, we will say, upon $3,333.34, while some gentlemen who may be on the Supreme Court Bench for a much shorter period, and may be much younger men, are to be retired upon $7,000 a year. Take the case of Chief Justice Galt, the Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, who has served his country in his judicial capacity for a quarter of a century. He is over seventy-eight years of age. This Bill is not to apply to a chief justice who has served as he has and who has reached his age, but it is to apply to some person who may have served fifteen years in an Exchequer Court or a Vice-Admiralty Court and five years in the Supreme Court, and who happens to attain the age of seventy years. By a mere accident, through some circumstance beyond the understanding of the average man, the latter gentleman has succeeded in graduating from the Bench of the Supreme Court instead of from the chair of the Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas. Take the chief justice of the province of Ontario, Chief Justice Hagarty, whose life has practically been spent on the Bench, who has been an ornament to the court, whose name is synonymous with all that is judicial and upright both as a citizen and as a judge, who has spent nearly forty years on the Bench, and who is now approaching fourscore years of age; yet he has to retire on two-thirds of his salary, while a seventy-year-old gentleman—I cannot call him a juvenile—because, forsooth, he happens to occupy a much more easy and comfortable position in the quiet of the Supreme Court, is to be favoured in the way proposed. I only point out these cases to show how unfair the scheme is, because there can be no question of the public service rendered by members of the Bench who have filled, as they have done for so many years, the high positions of chief justices of the provincial courts. But because I am drawing this comparison I am not now arguing in favour of a general increase. We must look at this question purely in the public interest. We must have due regard to the Treasury, and we must have due regard to the administration of justice; and if there is one on the Bench, I care not whether it is in the Supreme Court or in any other court, any man who has passed his period of usefulness, the law should be so amended that his case might be dealt with, and perhaps it would be wise to say that there should be a time limit beyond which no man should occupy the Bench. To-day, instead of amending the law, and dealing with cases if the public interest demands that they should be dealt with, it is proposed to offer a bribe to the members of the Bench to induce them to retire from the public service. That is not the way in which the public interest should be served in this House, or the manner in which the public moneys should be dealt with by the people's representatives. For these reasons I oppose this measure. It rests upon no principle. It looks to me as if it was formulated to deal with some individual case, which is covered up by a few words to make the measure appear general, whereas it is going to be special in its application. If so, it is more indefensible than could otherwise be supposed. But taking it as it appears upon the surface, as a scheme, if such it can be called, for relieving the Bench of those who have survived their period of usefulness, it is, in my judgment, radically wrong and indefensible in principle, and will be vicious in its influence and application.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) The question put to the House is, whether this resolution shall pass. Judging from the past, I am inclined to think so, considering that propositions of the most extraordinary nature are wont to be adopted by a majority of votes. This resolution ought to be voted down by the House, as it involves principles of the worst description. In order to give more prestige to the position occupied by the Supreme Court judges, it makes provision that those judges, on retiring from the Bench, and giving up their labours, shall receive from the country the same emoluments as while they were on the Bench. I confess that never have I heard such an extraordinary proposition. These judges, after having first made an income in the practice of law, have occupied, if not the most conspicuous, at least one of the most honourable positions within the gift of the country, a position to which as considerable a salary as $7,000 per annum is attached. It is now proposed that the people of this country, who are already groaning under the ever-increasing burdens of heavy taxation, shall be saddled with this further burden; that those judges, whenever they shall think fit to retire into private life—or rather, when the Government shall need a vacancy on the Bench to be filled up by one of their friends—shall receive the same salary as if they were doing the work, and fulfilling the important duties of their position. Now, Mr. Chairman, that this proposition is altogether indefensible, is evident from the debate that has been going on to-day. On the Government side, no argument has been adduced in support of the proposition. Two of the Ministers have explained the nature of the proposition, without giving any strong reasons for its passage. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) has addressed the House on that issue, but his utterances, I think, had better be relegated into oblivion. Another hon. member has endeavoured to impress upon the House the necessity of paying the Supreme Court judges an adequate salary. Have any good reasons been given in support of the passage of this resolution providing that judges, whether they serve the public or not, should be paid the same salary as if they were discharging the duties of their office? I do not think so. Plain common sense tells us that such a proposition should be resisted and voted down; the principle, if once adopted, should be carried to its logical conclusion and be made applicable to all the other courts. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) has given, among others, sound and plausible reasons why the Government should not press the passage of this resolution. It has been alleged, on the Government side, that the salary of the judges should be increased. Were it really necessary to do so, Mr. Chairman, I submit that their salary should be increased, while they are working. I deprecate the passage of a measure calculated to encourage them to eat an idle bread; for, should the judges, on retiring from the Bench, be guaranteed the same emoluments as while on the Bench, that would be an incentive to them for applying for superannuation and giving up the duties the country expects them to discharge. If judges were actuated by no loftier motives than mere financial considerations, by a greediness and love of pelf, their sole ambition will be to retire from the Bench as early as possible; and the higher the salary paid to them, the less work they will do, as in the case of other high officials, whose services are in the inverse ratio of the high rate of their salary. Of course, man aspires to rest, and to procure a well-earned repose for his old age. These judges would be the first to apply to the Government for their superannuation. Another consideration I would point out is the advisability of putting into the hands of the Government such a dangerous weapon. Are not the members of this House deeply impressed with the danger of such a course? Who is blind to the fact that the Government are aiming at nothing less than creating a system of superannuation whereby judges may be tempted, in the expectation of a large pension, to vacate their judgeships in favour of friends of the Government? It was not fair to institute a comparison between the salary paid to judges and the income which some lawyers derive from their practice. As to the salary paid to the judges of the Supreme Court, I think it is quite adequate. There might possibly be found in large cities like Montreal and Toronto, practising lawyers who make a larger yearly income than the salary paid to judges. These, however, are an exception to the rule. Many lawyers, by way of advertisement, like to boast of their practice, and to magnify their income, far beyond the reality; so much the more so, as their statements cannot be controlled, and their practice thereby gains in importance. Besides, it is a well known fact that whenever a vacancy takes place on the Bench, the greatest trouble the Government experiences is not so much filling up the vacancy as making a selection out of so many candidates. Many lawyers, who are far from having a large and paying practice, are, however, men of great integrity and legal skill, with an extensive knowledge of the law, and very well qualified to occupy a seat on the Bench; they lack nothing in fact but the necessary influence to command a large practice among business men and litigants. They are none the less respectable for all that, and, if they were called upon to sit on the Bench, they would administer the law in a creditable manner. The question of salary is not only one that the Government should take into consideration, in order to secure good judges. Financial considerations may weigh to a certain extent in the balance; the Government may even look upon the increase of salary as a necessity—a proposal to which I cannot assent; but this is no reason for the Government to give judges a life allowance equal to the salary they receive while they serve the country, and to make it optional with them to retire from the Bench and live in idleness the rest of their lives. This is nothing else but an extension of that grievous and unjust system which has come lately under discussion in this House: I mean the superannuation system, the advocacy of which the Government was loath to take, at the last session of Parliament. It will be remembered that when the superannuation question came up before the House last year, important reforms were promised for this year. Some changes did, no doubt, take place; still we find that there has been paid this year out of the public exchequer for that purpose a larger sum than the average yearly amount paid heretofore. Let the existing system be broadened and additions made to it in the shape of retiring allowances paid to judges, such as now in contemplation, and the community may, at last, awaken to the reality of the fact that after all, this is but a continuation of the odious superannuation system by which the public exchequer is drained in favour of civil servants, who, during their years of active service, have drawn large salaries. In my opinion, the fact that civil servants, on retiring from active service, should not have the means of maintaining a bare existence, evinces nothing else but improvidence on their part. I refrain from speaking at any greater length on the resolution, as nearly all the arguments put forth by those who spoke before me have been adverse to the measure. I only wish to enter my protest now against so strange a measure, lest I should not be in my seat when the House is called to vote upon the measure.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER. When shall the report be received—now?

Mr. LAURIER. I move in amendment that the report be not now received, but that it be received this day six months.

Amendment negatived..

Mr. FORBES. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) was not in the House when the question was put.

Mr. SPEAKER. Was the hon. member for Richmond in the House and did he hear the question put ?

Mr GILLIES. I was not in the House and did not hear the question put.

Mr. SPEAKER. The name of the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) must be struck out.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Haslam) did not vote.

Mr. SPEAKER. Was the hon. member for Vancouver in the House, and did he hear the question put, and did he vote for or against the amendment ?

Mr. HASLAM. I was in the House and voted against the amendment.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). The hon. member for South Leads did not vote.

Mr. TAYLOR. I was paired with the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland).

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How would you have voted ?

The Clerk. Nays, 51.

Main motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Dominion Lands and Crown Timber Agents—Salaries .. $74,000

Mr. MULOCK. Can the Minister say now how many persons are in the service of the Government in connection with these departments in Manitoba ?

Mr. DALY. Seventy-six employees from Winnipeg to Vancouver.

Salaries of Clerks in Outside Service, Forest Rangers and Intelligence Officers..... $43,726 25

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Looking at the exceedingly small returns in the shape of revenue, I should like the Minister to state his views with reference to this expenditure, of which we have very little details except in the Auditor General's Report. Does he not think that considerable reduction could be made ?

Mr. DALY. This is made up of all the salaries of the officers in the commissioner's offices at Winnipeg and the different land offices from Winnipeg to Vancouver, also the forest rangers and all the other officers in the different offices of which I gave a detailed account the other night. I think I went into it pretty exhaustively, and hon. gentlemen opposite discussed everything.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose I must take it for granted, if you tell me that you have duly put through—

Mr. DALY. I was. I think the hon. member for Queen's will agree—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I can give assurances that we tried to put questions, but I will not say that we got a great deal of information.

Stationery, rent of rooms and contingent expenditure of Board of Examiners of Dominion Land Surveyors.....$200

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With reference to the receipts for land, there was one particular item which I wish to understand. Among the items making up the $254,000 credited to us, there is an item of $11,313 which is put down as trust receipts. What does that mean ? The hon. gentleman will find it on page F—76 of the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. DALY. The agents at the different points mentioned there were in the habit of depositing to their own credit in a trust account moneys they received from parties making application for land whose applications were in suspense. The Auditor General has since objected to that, and the money goes to the credit of the Receiver General. I do not think the account in the old form exists at the present time.

Mr. MULOCK. Can the hon. gentleman say how many candidates appear for examination each year, about ?

Mr. DALY. That information for last year is contained in the report of the department. If the hon. gentleman will look at the report of the Surveyor General in Part II. of the report of the department :

Meetings of the Board of Examiners for Dominion Land Surveyors were held as usual in February and August. At the former meeting Adam Fawcett, of Uffington, Ontario, and W. D. Wilkinson, of Toronto, Ontario, passed the examination prescribed for Dominion Land Surveyor, and J. H. Antliff, of Montreal, passed the higher examination and was granted a certificate as Dominion Topographical Surveyor. Mr. G. G. FitzGerald, of Mill Brook, Ontario, passed the examination for admission as articulated pupil.

Mr. MULLOCK. How many candidates were there ?

Mr. DALY. The information is not given there. I will get you the information tomorrow.

Mr. MULLOCK. It is costing us $1,200 to examine these four or five gentlemen. That is too absurd. I have never yet been able to see the necessity for this system of examination. The provinces examine for Dominion land surveyors.

Mr. DALY. No ; they examine for provincial land surveyors.

Mr. MULLOCK. What is the difference between the qualifications of Dominion and provincial land surveyors ? The duties of a Dominion land surveyor are to survey lands, I suppose. They are recognized under the same Act as the proper officers to deal with Dominion lands, and the attainments and skill required are the same, whether the land belongs to the Dominion or to the provinces. It is simply a multiplication of boards of examination. Can the hon. gentleman say whether a provincial land surveyor, but for some statute in the way, would not be able to discharge all the duties now discharged by a Dominion land surveyor ?

Mr. DALY. I do not think so. They have a different system of surveying in the provinces from what we have.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is a difference in the qualifications required.

Mr. MULLOCK. If it is a survey of Dominion lands that is wanted, I should think that a surveyor capable of surveying provincial lands, would be able to survey Dominion lands.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Dominion Lands Act prescribes a higher standard of qualification with a view to greater accuracy.

Mr. DALY. I understand that Dominion lands are surveyed on the rectangular system, while under the old provincial system they were surveyed in concessions and townships. Of necessity, provincial land surveyors would have to serve an apprenticeship in order to get the necessary information to enable them to survey Dominion lands.

Mr. MULLOCK. That may be so, but it appears to me that if a surveyor understands how to take his bearings, if he knows how to secure his point of commencement, he can then survey in any shape he is told. It is ridiculous to suppose that a provincial land surveyor, who knows how to lay out a lot, say of a quarter of a mile, or a mile and a quarter, could not also lay out a square mile of lots. That explanation won't go.

Mr. DALY. That is the best explanation I can give. I am stating what is the fact, although it may not appeal to the hon. gentleman's mind.

Mr. MULLOCK. It will be news, I think, to the provincial land surveyors to be told that they are not competent to lay out a piece of land in a rectangular form.

Mr. IVES. It will not be new to the provincial land surveyors to be told that they have to pass an examination and be admitted under the law before they can act upon a Dominion land survey. That is the law, and until the law is repealed, there is no use discussing the matter. The provisions of the law require that they shall pass an examination and be admitted as Dominion land surveyors, before they can work on such surveys.

Mr. MULLOCK. That is a very poor reason for continuing a bad law. If there is a stupid law like that on the Statute-book, it ought to be removed. We are told that four candidates passed this year, and one gentleman was passed as a cadet, and it cost $1,200 to examine these gentlemen. The only reason given for maintaining a Dominion board of examiners is that provincial land surveyors who are educated how to lay out lots according to the provincial policy, may not be able to lay out a lot according to the Dominion policy.

Mr. DALY. Why don't you admit lawyers from Quebec to practice law in Ontario ?

Mr. MULLOCK. That is not the same thing. There are local laws.

Mr. DALY. Any man may read the statutes.

Mr. MULLOCK. That is not a good reason. An acre is an acre, whether it be in one province or another. You might as well pass an Act saying that no person could serve the Dominion in any capacity unless he passed some special examination that the Dominion laid down.

Mr. IVES. Allow me to correct the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman said a few moments ago that once the starting point was ascertained, it was easy for a surveyor to measure a rectangle. That is quite so. But the principle of establishing a starting point in surveying Dominion lands in the North-west Territories, is quite different from the principle of ascertaining the starting point in the surveys in the older provinces. In the North-west Territories they survey from longitude and from parallels of latitude as reckoned from Greenwich. In a provincial survey their base is a river, or some concession line running along a river; they have no reference whatever to parallels of latitude or longitude. The chief part of the examination that Dominion land surveyors have to pass is how to ascertain the exact latitude and longitude from Greenwich, and that is entirely different from the system which is used under provincial surveys.

Mr. MULLOCK. I won't controvert the hon. gentleman, for I have no information on the subject. But I would remind him that that cannot be the reason, because nearly all the North-west lands were laid out by provincial land surveyors.

To pay salaries of extra clerks at head office, Ottawa, advertising, copying, etc. $5,000

Mr. MULLOCK. The volume of business has gone down many fold. There should be a greater decrease.

Mr. DALY. It is not gone down an inch. The work is more onerous to-day than it was five or six years ago.

Mr. MULLOCK. It may be so, but from general observation it looks as if there was no head to the department.

Mr. DALY. There is no pumpkin head anyway, and that is what you have got on your shoulders.

Mr. MULLOCK. That is a very strong argument.

Mr. DALY. It is about as strong as the allusions you made, anyway.

Dominion lands, chargeable to capital—to provide for the amount required for surveys, examination of survey returns, printing of plans, etc. . . . $100,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would be glad to know generally what the hon. gentleman proposes to do. It appears to me we have enough land surveyed and to spare in the North-west, for the wants of many millions of population; and really there is little use going on with further surveys until the land we have there now is occupied.

Mr. DALY. The amount asked for 1894-95 is proposed to be spent as follows:—Surveys in Manitoba: It has been found necessary to re-survey three detached blocks of land, one in the neighbourhood of Deloraine, one in the neighbourhood of Oak Lake, and one north of Shell River. The cost is estimated at $25,000. It is also proposed to survey, for the purposes of Icelandic settlement three or four townships at the Narrows of Lake Winnipeg. The cost will be about $3,400. North-west Territories: In the country lying between the second and third meridians, it is proposed to survey two detached townships. Estimated cost, $1,783. West of the third meridian the work will consist of the survey of the trail from Saskatoon to Battleford, which will cost about $2,000. The bulk of the work will be west of the fourth meridian, where trails are required to be surveyed from McLeod to the international boundary known as the Fort Benson Trail, and to the Crow's Nest Pass; also from McLeod to Lethbridge. The cost of this work is estimated at $4,000. In addition to this, it is proposed to subdivide and set out for settlement ten townships on the west side of the Calgary and Edmonton Railway, extending from the Red Deer River on the south, to the Battle River on the north. The cost of this work will be in the neighbourhood of $7,600. Small detached surveys or road allowances will be required, which will bring the total cost of the work in the North-west Territories to about $16,000. British Columbia: The needs of settlement will require that two parties be placed in the field next year, the cost of which will be $10,000. Other surveys: To meet the demands of incoming settlement it will probably be necessary to make detached subdivision surveys in various localities other than these already specified, and for this purpose it is proposed to set apart a sum of say $12,000. Office expenses: This includes the salaries of the clerks who are engaged in the examination and correction of the returns of survey, lithographing of maps, township maps, &c.; estimated cost, $33,000, of which about $20,000 will be required for salaries.

Mr. MARTIN. Why have new surveys to be made at points in the province of Manitoba?

Mr. DALY. Because the surveys made ten or twelve years ago were found to be defective. At that time there were not the same system as has been carried out during the last three or four years, and the surveyors did not do their work properly. It has been ascertained, as settlement has gone in, that the boundaries were not correct in some instances, and that the corner posts had not been put in or the mounds constructed. It is in order to correct that state of affairs that as immigration is taking place into that part of Manitoba, this work is required to be carried out.

Mr. MARTIN. What is the need of surveys of three townships at the Narrows of Lake Manitoba?

Mr. DALY. It is needed for settlement.

Mr. MARTIN. That would appear to verify the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) with respect to carrying out an extensive system of surveys in advance of settlement. The hon. gentleman is, no doubt quite correct as regards many of the surveys having been badly done. I think that might be said to apply to the whole province of Manitoba.

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. MARTIN. That has been my experience. I have found the surveys to have been rather badly done; complaints have been made that the mounds are not where they should be and that a great many inaccuracies have occurred in the surveys. But that is not the only reason. Where surveys have been made far ahead of the settlement, prairie fires have burnt the stakes out and the annual growth of vegetation and the tramping of cattle have caused the mounds to disappear, and the result has been that when settlers came along the country was practically as badly off as if surveys had never been made. So long as the surveys are carried out in a temporary manner, as they are in that country, force is given to the argument of not having surveys carried out until settlement is actually about to take place. The hon. gentleman may be right in regard to surveying townships near Lake Manitoba, although my impression was that there was plenty of land at present for the Icelandic settlement at Gimli. I do not speak positively, but I know there has been great trouble with the surveys. When the settlement came to take up the country it was found that the survey had been so badly made to start with, and on account of the system adopted, that the time which elapsed had the effect of obliterating the marks of the surveys. The stakes were burned in some places and bushes had grown up over the mounds, so as to make it almost impossible to find the marks left by the surveyors.

Mr. DALY. We have not used wooden mounds for five or six years, and the stakes that are used are altogether iron. The mounds if properly built will last for years and years. When you consider that these surveys have extended over a period of twenty years, it speaks well for the work done by the surveyors that so few were found defective. The present system adopted some seven or eight years ago, provides that the work shall be inspected in the season in which it is done, so that it is impossible for mistakes to arise which previously occurred. The hon. gentleman is incorrect in saying that generally through the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, there has been defective surveys.

Mr. MARTIN. I cannot speak with respect to the North-west Territories, but I have no hesitation in saying so with regard to Manitoba.

Mr. MULOCK. How many acres of land will be surveyed for this $100,000.

Mr. DALY. That is a matter of calculation, but there are ten townships, 23,236,000 acres, west of the Calgary and Edmonton Railway which will be thrown open to settlement now.

Mr. MULOCK. Will this surveying be done by contract or day's work?

Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. DALY. The surveying will be done by the staff of the department. There are no contracts to be let this year.

Mr. MULOCK. Do you mean the permanent service?

Mr. DALY. They are not the permanent staff in the nature of being members of the civil service, but they have been on the permanent surveying staff for some years. There are about twelve surveyors with their parties.

Mr. MULOCK. What are these twelve surveyors doing during the period that the survey is not carried on?

Mr. DALY. They make out the examination and correction of the surveys, and make the plans and so on. They employ their time during winter in making up the work of the summer.

Mr. MULOCK. If there are twelve surveyors and their parties, has there been a reduction in the staff?

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. MULOCK. Then how was it that the survey cost $150,000 last year?

Mr. DALY. Because we let the rest of it out by contract over and above what these twelve people did. We did not use $34,000 of the $150,000 voted last year, and in addition to that $34,000 which lapsed I make a decrease of $50,000 on the vote of last year.

Building and maintenance of fish breeding establishments and lobster hatcheries.....	$50,000
--	----------

Mr. O'BRIEN. Is the Minister satisfied that the results of the operations of the Newcastle hatchery, in the distribution of salmon-trout, and whitefish fry in the upper lakes, are at all commensurate with the expense?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think so.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think that is a very doubtful question. I have watched the operations there for several years, and I have come to the conclusion that the fish sent out from the hatcheries are altogether too young and too immature to fight for their lives in the waters of the great lakes. The best means of ascertaining that fact would be by reference to Lake Simcoe, which has a limited area of water, in which no netting has been allowed for a number of years, and where the close season has been most carefully observed. Millions of salmon-trout fry have been put in that lake from the Newcastle hatchery, but yet there is no perceptible increase. If the distribution of fry were of any service at all it ought to show itself there, but so far it has not. The opinion I have come to is: that the fish from the Newcastle hatchery, having to be moved at a very early period of their lives, because the water at Newcastle becomes too hot for them to live in, they are placed in the waters of the great lakes before they are sufficiently matured to survive. I know Mr. Wilmot's enthusiastic pursuit in that particular branch of the service, and I am thoroughly satisfied he is doing a good work for the country, but I believe that that Newcastle hatchery, so far as regards the distribution of fry in the great lakes is concerned, gives very little return for the money spent.

Mr. MARA. This spring the Minister sent whitefish fry to some of the lakes in British Columbia. I would like to know if he intends to send fry also to the other large lakes, such as Lake Columbia, Lake Shushwap and the Kootenay lakes. I think myself it would be better if the Minister could erect a cheap hatchery some place at or near the line of railway, from which the fry could be more easily distributed than under the present system. There would be less loss, and I think it would be cheaper in the end than sending the fry from Winnipeg.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The sending of fry out to British Columbia this year was rather an experiment; but so far as the reports go the transmission was wonderfully successful, especially considering that it was the first time. The placing of fry in the waters the hon. gentleman has referred to, and the method of sending the fry there, are under consideration with a view of meeting his wishes if possible. Of course it depends upon the success in the gathering of the eggs and the number we have for distribution; but if we can manage it I would be very glad to follow up what we have done so as to meet his suggestion. I will also consider whether it would not be better to adopt the plan he mentions, and have temporary hatcheries out there for that purpose.

Mr. PRIOR. I would ask the hon. Minister whether he has made up his mind on the question of sending bass out to British Columbia?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We do not deal in bass at all. It is a very complicated business, and we have never been able to undertake the artificial hatching of bass.

Mr. PRIOR. I am told by Mr. Wilmot that it would be possible to send bass out there. There are a large number of suitable lakes for bass in British Columbia, in which there are no fish at the present time. A great number of people in British Columbia are anxious that this suggestion should be carried out by the Government, and I would ask the Minister to consider if he cannot do so.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would be very glad to further any scheme of that kind if it could be found possible, but I am absolutely certain that we have not the means to comply with the hon. gentleman's request. The subject has been brought before me several times, and on each occasion it involved considerable expenditure. I have failed to find anything in the reports which would lead me to believe that a sufficiently strong case had been made out to warrant me in asking Parliament for that expenditure.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Before this item is passed, I wish to say a word or two with regard to a very important fishery in the county which I represent, and some of the adjoining counties. I refer to the shad fishery in the Bay of Fundy. Some three or four years ago I called the attention of the Minister to the great decrease which had taken place in this fishery. Within the last few years I have also called his attention to the recommendation of the fishery inspectors: that a close season should be adopted which would apply principally to the River St. John, the harbour of St. John and the Shubenacadie River in Nova Scotia, where these fish are caught in great numbers during the spawning season. There has been a conference of the fishery inspectors held recently, and I find that among the recommendations which that conference has made, is the following:—

That a close time for shad be established for Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island from 1st March to 20th June with weekly close time as at present.

I believe, however, that this recommendation has never been acted upon, but I see by the report of the Minister that this matter is under the consideration of the department. I wish merely now, while this matter of fish hatcheries is under consideration, to ask the Minister if he has considered the advisability or practicability of hatching the spawn of the shad, and by this artificial means stocking the rivers at the head of the Bay of Fundy. It is very important that this fishery should be restored if there is any possibility of doing it. It was in former years a very important fishery, but it has declined, and threatens to disappear entirely unless some means are taken either to protect the fish during the spawning season or else to stock the rivers by artificial means.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am sorry the hon. gentleman was not here the other afternoon when I spoke briefly on this subject. A considerable number of people were opposed to this policy of artificial fish culture altogether; one hon. gentleman to-night said it did no good. On the other hand, I think the vast majority of those who have looked into the subject believe in artificial fish culture, though most of the critics find fault, and perhaps with justice, with the way in which the work is, in many cases, carried on. I am now carrying out a very rigid system of inspection such as has not hitherto prevailed, and am also going thoroughly into the manner in which the existing hatcheries are operated. I stated, in answer to an hon. gentleman who suggested that we should take up cod, that I preferred to feel the ground a little firmer under my feet before undertaking that work. So I would say as to shad, though I venture to think that they could be very successfully handled. Shad have increased in the New England States, where they are hatching out shad, and where they complain that the shad they are hatching out come into the Bay of Fundy and are caught and eaten there. In British Columbia, also, I think, there was a prevalent opinion that fish hatched in Southern California came up into our waters. So that in the meantime, while watching the operations of their hatcheries, we have some advantage from them. But, speaking more seriously, I do not propose at present to extend the operations of the fish hatcheries.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am glad to hear that the hon. gentleman does not propose to extend the operations of these fish hatcheries. I have myself watched the reports of them every year. It is a most interesting and important subject, and if we could be satisfied that the fry increased the quantity of fish in our rivers and estuaries, it would be a great blessing to Canada. But I do not think we can come to a conclusion one way or the other as yet. I have not been able to find from the department any data from which we can form a conclusion that the work has been successful, and I think it would be unfair for any one to jump to the conclusion that it has been unsuccessful. The experiment is in a tentative stage, and what the results may be the future alone can solve. I notice that the gentleman who has charge of the work relies every year very much upon the quantity of fry he distributes. He says:

The general progress of the work done, and the gross out-put of fry from the several fish hatcheries in the Dominion during the past season are of a very satisfactory character, as will be shown by the accompanying schedules, showing a grand total of 258,314,000 young fish, which were bred, and distributed in the waters of Canada, during 1893.

That is very good as far as it goes; we have that intimation every year; but what we are seeking to get at is, do these young fry come to maturity, and do they swell the quantity of fish we have in our rivers and estuaries? That point has not yet been solved. Although the Minister is quite justified in asking the House to continue the grant to carry on the fish-breeding establishments, I am glad he is not increasing the grant, because the experiment has not yet been solved satisfactorily.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I do not wish the Minister to suppose that I question the value of fish culture; but I do not think the hatchery at Newcastle can succeed, because it violates too many of the laws of nature. I think that if that hatchery were on the shores of Lake Huron, it might produce good results. I think the hatcheries in the United States are producing good results, because they are conducted under different principles.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to say for the Newcastle hatchery that it has been successful. To show that it has been, I may mention that there is a lake in the eastern townships which never had a whitefish in it until it was stocked with whitefish fry from the Newcastle hatchery; and now my department is worried by applications from resident farmers to be allowed to take these fish with the net, because they cannot take them by hook and line. There is real proof. Mr. Marler, of this city, who has himself fished in the lake, has informed me that before the fry were put in the lake from the Newcastle hatchery, those fish were totally unknown there, but he has since caught whitefish that had arrived at maturity.

Mr. COLTER. When this item was under discussion the other evening, some hon. gentlemen expressed themselves, as some have done to-night, as doubtful about the usefulness of these fish-ways. I can only speak for the one on the upper part of the River St. John, and I am very glad to say that so far as I am able to judge, it has been a decided success. Previous to the building of that hatchery, there were no salmon caught on the River St. John or its tributaries with the fly; but since that time, both on the St. John River and on its tributaries there is very fine fly fishing. For instance, I suppose there is no better stream for fishing in the province of New Brunswick than the Tobique. On the Maduxnaqueag, a branch of the River St. John, if the hon. gentleman comes down in the month of June, I will show him hundreds of salmon trying to get over a nine-foot dam, because there is no fish-way. I hope the Minister will soon see his way to putting a fish-way on that river. I am told that a few years ago the mills were burned and the dams destroyed, and in that year a very large number of fish went up the stream; and if we only had a fish-way on that river now I think it would equal if not excel the Tobique for fly-fishing. I had occasion some time ago to call the Minister's attention to the netting of fish in the River St. John, between Fredericton and Woodstock, and I do so again to-night. I believe the law is that you can set nets in tidal waters a certain number of days. Now, they claim on that river that the tidal waters extend some twelve or fourteen miles above Fredericton, but that is a disputed point, and fishermen are allowed to set nets there and catch large quantities of salmon. Above that point they are not. Now, below the point where they are allowed to set nets, there is a large number of islands, and the river is consequently divided into a number of channels. People set nets and catch enormous quantities of fish, and yet they are prevented from setting nets above that point. This has caused hard feeling among the people of York and Carleton, and I hope the hon. Minister will see his way clear to look into the matter, and, if possible, have one law for all. If it is necessary to stop netting altogether, do so, but do not stop it on one section of the river and allow it on the other.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for mentioning the difficulty to me, which he did a few days ago. The real difficulty is, that while we have the power, under the Act, to fix the tidal boundaries, that has not been done. I have asked, at any rate, for full particulars by official report, and will be very glad to deal with the matter. The other subject to which the hon. gentleman has referred is also being attended to.

Mr. FORBES. Can the hon. gentleman give information as to the success of the lobster hatchery at Pictou? I heartily approve of the breeding of various kinds of fish. Coming from the south shore of Nova Scotia, I know that every effort which can be made available to increase this great industry will meet with our hearty approval. This year, on the south shore of Nova Scotia, there will probably be a large shortage in the lobster catch, which is most regrettable, and I think this a fair opportunity to call the attention of the Minister to the necessity of having fish hatcheries on that coast. While I heartily approve of the establishment of these scientific hatcheries throughout the Dominion, I would like to see some tangible proof of the actual beneficial results. The hon. gentleman's own return shows that a number of eggs have been put in the various waters of Canada, but whether with any direct beneficial result is a matter of grave doubt. I believe the result is beneficial, but to a much more limited extent than the hon. Minister believes. In a lake like Brome, which is an inland water, the fish cannot escape, and that offers no criterion. But on our shores and coasts and estuaries, there is much less chance to prove the beneficial results of the hatchery; and if the hon. gentleman could furnish such proof, any vote to aid the development of this great industry would have the support of the Opposition. I also wish to draw attention to this fact, that under the modus vivendi, the fishermen of the United States have almost equal privileges with ours, in our fisheries. Practically, they have equal privileges, with the exception of seining mackerel. The lobster business to-day is carried on by our own men with the aid of American capital, and is practically an American industry. It is of great benefit to our fishermen, and I would like to see it kept up to the very best possible standing by the enforcement of proper regulations and the establishment of hatcheries on the south shore of Nova Scotia. On the north shore, or the Northumberland Straits coast, both of the island and the mainland, the prospects of the lobster catch is very good, indeed, while on the south shore it is very poor; and it would be wise for the hon. Minister to seriously consider the advisability of establishing other hatcheries on the south shore of Nova Scotia.

Legal and incidental expenses.... $5,000

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is an increase of $2,000 here. We have been vigorously enforcing the laws, and that involves great expenditure, though we have got, in fines, a very large revenue owing to these prosecutions. In round numbers we have obtained $100,000, of which $20,000 is for fines and penalties. The violations have been terrific. Wherever a fishery shows signs at all of exhaustion and capitalists go out, then in come the poachers to make a final raid. We have been always short in our vote for paying these costs, and have had to hold over claims where the amounts were justly due. Instead, therefore, of asking the smaller amount, I am asking for the amount my officers say will be required.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It would be interesting if the hon. gentleman would publish in his report the fines which are collected. I am in receipt of constant inquiries, asking if I cannot find out the names of the parties who have paid fines during the season. There is an idea, which seems generally to prevail, that partiality is shown by the fish wardens. I have a letter from an old school friend of mine, whom I know to be a thoroughly respectable and reliable man, in which he expresses the same idea as prevailing in the locality he comes from. I do not want to mention the locality, because I do not wish to throw reflections on the fish warden there without being certain they are well founded.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will think over that. I know of no case of the kind, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that any officer guilty of the like will be instantly dismissed. It is quite possible, as we have an enormous number of officers, that one or another might show favouritism, but he would do it at the peril of his position. I know of no case that has been left unpunished that has been brought to my notice.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A simple precaution, such as my hon. friend speaks of, would be a great safeguard against an abuse of power. What is the maximum and minimum rates of fines?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Twenty dollars is the maximum.

Mr. BOWERS. I desire to call attention to the fact that in Digby County, where there has been a little violation of the law, the Minister, through his agents or lawyers has seen fit to punish the party, and some of the cases—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. May I ask what cases the hon. gentleman refers to—the bounty cases?

Mr. BOWERS. Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Those prosecutions were undertaken on the information of the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. BOWERS. I am not trying to evade any responsibility in the matter, as I only placed the charges that were put in my hands before the Minister.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think it is only fair the fact should be mentioned. I am not going to take all the responsibility.

Mr. BOWERS. What I wanted to call attention to is that in his report for 1892 the Minister states that in the county of Gloucester there were 500 cases of parties who applied for bounties fraudulently. Why did not the hon. gentleman punish the infraction of the law by these parties as he did those in the county of Digby?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Every case of suspicion brought to the notice of the Department of Marine and Fisheries is instantly investigated, and, where there was any prospect of substantiating the charge, all the papers immediately transmitted to the right hon. the Minister of Justice for his consideration, with the request that if the case is a proper one for prosecution, it may be followed up. Not one single exception can be shown since this system was adopted a year or so ago. The hon. gentleman from Digby (Mr. Bowers) very properly drew attention to the cases in his own county. Instructions were given to go on with the cases, and certain parties were found guilty. In Gloucester the money was not paid over, but the record of all the facts we could obtain was transmitted to the Minister of Justice. And these parties still are prevented from sharing in the fishing bounty.

Mr. BOWERS. Again, in the county of Victoria, to which I called the Minister's attention. I understand that a man there collected a bounty for his dog, named Peter. Now, why was no punishment inflicted upon this man?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will answer the hon. gentleman. In the cases in Victoria the grand jury threw out the Bill. It is unnecessary to say what the evidence was. But evidence that we considered sufficient to found conviction upon was treated in that way by the grand jury.

Mr. BOWERS. I understand the hon. member for Victoria took a trip to Ottawa about that time.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman, so far as the department with which I am concerned—and it is the one which deals with these cases—is absolutely incorrect, if he thinks the hon. member for Victoria affected the statement of these cases.

Mr. BOWERS. I accept that statement. That is all right. I want to call the attention of the Minister to another matter. Last fall at Grand Manan, some of our vessels were there, and, for infraction of the fishery laws, the crews were fined $10 each by Captain Pratt. They called my attention to another vessel that belonged to Grand Manan, and was in the same predicament that they were in. But, in looking over the return, I find only the vessels from Westport were fined.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman hardly treats me fairly. I would be quite willing to follow up such a case, but he has never given me the particulars of it.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria, N.S.) The statement now made by the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Bowers) I have seen in the press in different parts of the country, to the effect that I came up here and tried to intercede with the Government for the parties charged with fraud. I rise to say that the hon. gentleman was quite mistaken. I did not come here on that business at all. I came here on Saturday, and the Ministers were nearly all away. I saw the Minister of Marine, but only spoke with him for a moment while he was getting into a cab. But I told him that I would be here again on Monday, and wanted to see him on business. But I did not see him, had no conversation with him, and never spoke to one of the Ministers with reference to the bounty frauds. On Monday I had a telegram from the county stating that warrants were issued. These people were my friends in the county and I was asked to come down and I was retained on their behalf. So far as the Department of Justice is concerned, everything they possibly could do in the matter was done. They had the assistance of very able counsel from Halifax, who remained five or six weeks in the county, and they had also the assistance of the fishery inspector, Mr. Bertram, who did everything not only in the way of prosecution, but, as I believe, in the way of persecution of these parties. The matter was in the courts at least two or three weeks, and all the cases were investigated. A large number came before the Supreme Court at Halifax, as the Government tried to get a mandamus to prevent the magistrate trying them in a summary manner. But the mandamus was dismissed, and all these cases went before the grand jury, of which at least one-half were Liberals, and the vote of the grand jury stood eighteen to five against finding the bill. And when no bill was reported, if I recollect aright, the judge declared that he thought the grand jury had done perfectly right. I never spoke to a Minister in reference to these matters during the time the prosecutions were going on; I did not write a letter to any of them on the subject, as I believed it was useless, they having taken a determined stand. Therefore, I state clearly and emphatically that the insinuations of the hon gentleman are not justified by the facts.

Mr. MARA. I would like to call the attention of the Minister to the case of the Okanagan lake and river. About twenty years ago these waters were well stocked with salmon. But some bands of American Indians just south of the boundary line have placed traps or wires across the river thus preventing the fish from ascending to the spawning grounds. I know that the department cannot exercise authority over the American Indians; but such representations might be made to the American authorities as would induce them to take steps to prevent the closing of the river to such a degree as to keep the salmon from reaching the spawning beds.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will be very much obliged if the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to write a formal communication to my department stating what he has ascertained, when I shall be happy to follow it up in the direction he suggests.

Mr. FAUVEL. Before this item is passed, I wish to call the attention of the Minister to the unfair distribution of these bounties. I find that in our gulf and ocean sea fisheries the following received bounty:—

In 1892, 13,774 boats manned by	23,812 men.
In 1891, 17,701 do do	33,507 do

Decrease, 3,927	9,695
-----------------	-------

In 1891, 705 vessels manned by	5,352 men.
In 1892, 668 do do	5,252 do

The amount paid to fishermen in 1892 fishing and boats was, say 23,812 fishermen, $85,202; fishing and vessels, say 5,252 fishermen, $74,550. Of this number, Nova Scotia was represented by 4,611 men, the balance being divided among Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Quebec. When the bounty system was first established in 1884, $2 per ton was paid to vessels. Boats were placed under three categories, viz.: 14 to 18 feet keel, $1; 18 to 25 feet keel, $1.50; 25 feet and upwards, $2. The average tonnage of a boat of 25 feet keel measures about 8 to 10 tons each. In 1892 the bounty paid to vessels was raised to $3 per ton, and the rate paid to boats irrespective of size was only $1. In 1892 the highest bounty paid by fishermen in vessels was $21; to boats, $4, which I consider a very unfair division of the bounty funds. The reduction in the number of boats receiving bounties from 1891 to 1892, is accounted for by an Order in Council prohibiting fishing with gill-nets on the shore. Now, the Minister is aware that these bounties were established for the purpose of recouping in some measure the fishermen of the gulf who had suffered loss through encroachments of fishermen from the United States during the treaty of reciprocity. In those days large mackerel fishing existed in the Bay de Chaleur, now there is none. The only fish these fishermen can take is herring, which is taken with gill-nets. Now the Minister is aware that where men take herring in gill-nets, they are deprived from participating in these vested rights, because these are certainly vested rights to those old fishermen in the counties of Bonaventure and Gaspé. The Order in Council states that those who fish only a few hours a day and attend to their farms the rest of the day, cannot participate in the bounties. Now, it is only in the night that men can fish herring; therefore, they are deprived of vested rights which they held in 1884. A number of bona fide fishermen of the county of Bonaventure leave their homes during the summer and pass over to the north shore and fish there three months or upwards, and return home to fish the remainder of the season in their own boats in Bonaventure County. When they leave their homes the boats they use on the north shore are owned by outfitters from the counties; when they return home they fish in their own boats. A number of these fishermen claimed bounties on their own boats when they returned. These outfitters have received the bounties for their boats, and the fishermen have been deprived of the bounty. For that reason they cannot participate to-day for any fishing bounty in that county. It is a clerical error on their part and nothing more. I have taken from the Department of Fisheries a certain number of claims of which I will give you a few instances:

Joseph Anglehart, pere, claims to have fished during the whole season at Magpie and Paspebiac, with Adolphe Loisel in his own boat, though he appears to have fished the greater part of the season at Magpie in Le Boutillier Bros. boat, with Michel Dennis. Joseph Fabien Duchesneau, fils, claims having fished the whole season to 1st November, at Paspebiac, in his boat. This claimant it appears fishes on the north shore with his father, to the 30th August in Robin & Co.'s boat. Charles Theriault claims he fished the whole season in his boat with his son John A. This man fished most of the season with John Darosville, in Robin & Co.'s boat.

Now, this Charles Theriault came to see me when I visited my county a few days ago, and he told me he had not received any bounty for the last three years. I asked him the reason, and he gave me the palpable reason, which I did not transmit to the Minister because I had already transmitted the same reason to him on several previous occasions. On those occasions the Minister had verbally promised me that he would cause an investigation to be made. I received since then three letters from him. The first letter stated that he would make an investigation, the second continued in the same strain, and the third said he did not see his way clear to open the question. Now, I have been to the department and ascertained that some of those cases are valid. Two men were debarred from the bounty on account of dual claims. These people go to the north shore and fish for an outfitter there. When they go home these men make claims as fishing for themselves on the south shore. Now, I have proved that there is a claim made by a man named Onesime Huard, who is debarred this year from his bounty for that reason. That man returned from the north shore on the 26th August, and the application that he is reported to have made before a fishery officer on the north shore, is dated on the 9th September. Now, I think it is only right that the Minister should make an investigation through his officers. He is aware that these fishery officers are not always trustworthy. He has been obliged to dismiss one of those officers who laid these claims before these uneducated fishermen. They do not know how to read or write, and very often these claims are not even read over to them before they are signed. I am certain that if an investigation was made into these claims the Minister would be surprised at the manner in which some of the fishery officers have been acting in those counties. I have spoken with Commander Wakeham, who has been in charge of the service for several years past, and he says that these men should be paid, because they are an uneducated set of fishermen, and they have vested rights. Certainly I would not plead for these men if they were not bona fide fishermen.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In my opinion the hon. gentleman has not put any of these cases as fairly as I would expect him to do. In the first place, he cannot expect me to deal with these individual claims out of a total of over 40,000 claims, without giving me some notice. As to this gill-net business, the hon. gentleman is the first person I have heard in the House or out of it, say that the action of the department was not in the interest of the fishermen. I am certain that he does not speak as the representative of bona fide fishermen, nor for the class for whom this bounty was intended. He has referred to Dr. Wakeham. Dr. Wakeham is a man of great experience in the gulf fisheries. It was he who, at the instance and in the interest of those fishermen, recommended to me that this regulation should become law, because it would debar only those who were not genuine fishermen from participating in the bounty, thus leaving more for the genuine fishermen. The effect of the law is that a man who is really attending to his farm and puts out a sedentary apparatus or a gill-net and goes away, shall not share with the men who pursue fishing as a regular avocation, who go out and risk their lives in open boats or sailing boats. These were the class for whom this bounty was meant, as an encouragement and assistance in that perilous business, men who fish in waters in which the United States fishermen had for a certain term been allowed great advantages to their detriment. That regulation has not been complained of. It was adopted in the interest of these fishermen, and it gives to the bulk of the fishermen who are engaged in the business, more bounty than they otherwise would get, and only rules out men who are in no fair sense fishermen, but are men for whom the bounty was never intended. In regard to the statement about claims, the hon. gentleman read enough to show that the men were guilty of falsehood. I cannot accept the statement that they were ignorant. Parliament supported me when I propounded the policy that in order to prevent fraud we should administer the fund in the strictest possible manner, and that every man in order to be entitled to the bounty must in every respect be honest and above suspicion, and where there was fraud or reason to suppose fraud the case would be followed up, and the man would be debarred from sharing in the bounty and having an opportunity of perpetrating further frauds on his fellow fishermen. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Bowers) spoke of frauds on the department. These will become a thing of the past. Upright, honest and intelligent fishermen will obtain far more bounty under the present than they could possibly obtain under the old system, or under the system which the hon. gentleman would like to obtain, where great indulgence would be given to those men, which will be a great mistake in my opinion. We make them take the responsibility, if they cannot read or write, of consulting proper parties in whom they have confidence to prepare claims for them, and by these claims they must either stand or fall. Where claims contain falsehood and misrepresentations we reject such applications, and I am satisfied that honest fishermen of every district will approve our administration of the system. It is only by so acting that we can administer a law that is exceedingly difficult to administer, because we have to take evidence within reasonable time, and are called upon to consider the evidence and deal with over 40,000 claims; but if our regulations were less severe, and we exercised fewer restrictions, delay would occur whereby the payment of the bounty would be delayed months or even a year, while under the present system it is paid to the fishermen quickly.

Mr. FAUVEL. Does the hon. gentleman think that the fishermen are infalible, and do not make errors?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If they make mistakes they suffer for them.

Mr. FAUVEL. With respect to gill-nets, the hon. Minister is already well aware that four or five petitions have been sent to the department regarding these nets. The hon. gentleman need not say that this is the first time he has heard any complaint.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. On the part of the bona fide fishermen.

Mr. FAUVEL. Most assuredly those people had vested interests with respect to fishing, which no one can deny. Regarding the claims of the fishermen, I certainly ask that an investigation may be made, because if the case goes to the Minister of Fisheries it is held that the officers are right and the fishermen wrong, and such a proceeding is very unfair.

Mr. BOWERS. With respect to the fishing bounty, I desire to ask the Minister whether any moneys are paid to the fishery overseers for distributing the bounty?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We obtain special authority from Parliament every year in the Supplementary Estimates to pay these officers.

Mr. BOWERS. I have received a letter from the fishery overseer at Westport, in which he asks whether he would receive any remuneration or not for distributing that bounty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The fishery overseers receive compensation in due course, after it has been voted in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. BOWERS. I desire to call the attention of the committee to one or two bounties which during the last two or three months I have endeavoured to get settled at Ottawa, but with respect to which I have received no satisfaction. One is the case of the 'Phoebe' and 'Emma Small,' of Digby County. Captain Melanson belongs to Port Gilbert in Digby County. He went to the custom's officer last spring and asked for a license. The custom-house officer not being able to find a license in the office, was unable to give the captain a fishing license. The vessel had to go on its fishing cruise, and it did not return until the fall. The law states that when a master of a vessel has no license, the master or owner cannot draw a bounty. But in this case the captain could not get a license when he applied for it. About the last of November Fishery Overseer Kinney came to Weymouth, where those who claimed the fishing bounty had to submit their licenses to the officer so that they might be forwarded to the department. That man having no fishing license forgot about the matter, and therefore he did not see Mr. Kinney when he came on the 25th of the month. On the 28th he wrote Mr. Kinney at Yarmouth, and he proceeded there about 1st December and laid the matter before him. It seems hard that in this case neither the captain nor the crew should obtain the fishing bounty, when the fault was really due to the custom officer at Port Gilbert. If the captain had received a license when he asked for it, there is no doubt he would have obtained the bounty. The Minister has informed me that his failure to receive the bounty was not on account of the failure to get a license, but because he did not make any application. The man having no license before him simply forgot the matter; but the law allows up to 30th November in which to make his claim. On 28th November he wrote to Mr. Kinney, and between the 1st and 5th December he proceeded to Yarmouth to lay the matter before the department. Mr. Kinney laid the matter before the department, and the case stands in that way at present. I insist that the Minister should grant the bounty to that man, for the omission to take out a license was not due to the captain's fault. There is another case, and that is the schooner 'Maudie,' of Digby, which cleared 29th March. The captain neglected to take out a fishing license until July 5th. Then the vessel took out a license and fished until 10th July, five days. Then the vessel was laid up until 2nd September, when she was got ready, but did not take out her clearance papers until 9th September, when she fished to the end of the year. These periods together make more than three months, which is the period required by law in order to receive the bounty. The Minister says that the vessel was not fishing three months. The overseer, Mr. Kinney, being in Digby November 18th, the owners were forced to make affidavit as to their claim on the 18th, but the law says that the year does not end until 30th November. His vessel was fitting out for the fishery from 2nd September, when the captain took charge, to 9th September, when she cleared from Customs, and it was exactly the same as when she was fishing, because all our vessels come into harbour and sometimes lay there a week or a fortnight in bad weather. In both of those cases I see no reason why the men should not have their bounty, and I ask the Minister to try and consider this matter in a different light from what he has considered it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I tried hard and I will try again.

Mr. PRIOR. Whilst on this subject I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the necessity which exists for the Government doing something on behalf of the deep-sea fisheries in British Columbia. We all know that the salmon fisheries of British Columbia have attained very large proportions, but up to the present time the deep-sea fisheries are only in their infancy. Several attempts have been made by different parties at great expense to themselves, to find out where the black cod and halibut banks are situated. As we all know it takes quite a large amount of money to prospect for these banks in the first place, and afterwards to find markets for the produce of the fishery. I feel certain that if the Government could see their way to assist these men in British Columbia—whether by giving a bounty by tonnage, or in any way they think fit—to develop this industry, that in a very short time they would find it would become a very lucrative business, and that a large revenue would accrue to the Dominion Government from it. From our experience of these fisheries on the Pacific coast there can be no doubt that if our deep-sea fishermen were assisted out there, in a very few years they would prove that the Pacific fisheries are as valuable, if not more valuable, than the fisheries on the Atlantic coast.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) refers to a very important subject, but all I can say at this time is: that the Government have followed with a great deal of interest the attempt that was made, and which was unfortunately not successful, to deal with that matter. The Government would be only too glad to assist in every reasonable way any efforts in the direction indicated; but these efforts to be successful must be, I think, the result of private enterprise as was the case on the Atlantic coast. I know that a great deal of information is being collected and tabulated with regard to Pacific fisheries. I do not think that there is any trouble there in finding fish in abundance, because I know that the California fishermen have found any amount of fish there. The trouble evidently was in connection with finding a market. One well-known fisherman, Captain Sol. Jacobs, navigated there and fished with great success, but he is back again on the New England coast and fishing on the banks. I think there are other difficulties and that the trouble is not connected with any ignorance as to the locality of the cod or halibut.

Mr. PRIOR. It is found to be very expensive to get proper refrigerators so as to get the fish to market.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is the difficulty.

Mr. FORBES. If the Government are to be asked to supply boats, and seines, and nets for the fishermen of British Columbia, I want to put in a similar claim for our eastern fishermen. Nova Scotia fishermen, in their enterprise and skill, are capable of competing with the fishermen of any country in the world, and we would only be too proud to send the captains from Nova Scotia to teach them in British Columbia how to fish and where to find fish. But I rose to draw the attention of the Minister to another matter. He has proposed new regulations shutting out from the bounty all catches of fish in trap-nets, pound-nets, weirs and gill-nets. Now, it might be quite reasonable for the Minister to do that under certain circumstances.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is only done under certain circumstances, and any way it is not as the hon. gentleman states.

Mr. FORBES. I will state a case in which the Minister refused the bounty, and in which the fish were caught long before his Order in Council or enactment was published. I do not want to be understood as at all approving of the principle of the regulations issued by the Minister, because I do not believe that he should shut out the fishermen who catch their fish by nets.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They are not shut out.

Mr. FORBES. They are shut out by your regulations.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not by any regulation of my department.

Mr. FORBES. The regulation says: "No bounty shall be paid on fish caught in trap-nets, pound-nets or weirs, or fish caught in gill-nets by parties pursuing other occupations than fishing." Does the Minister discriminate between a man fishing six hours with a gill-net and a man fishing six months with a gill-net, provided the proper quantity of fish to entitle the man to the bounty are caught? If I understand the Minister correctly, he would shut out from the bounty a man who catches 2,500 pounds of fish with a gill-net, and who has used that gill-net for three months, but not, perhaps, consecutively, in fishing. Although the man may catch that fish within thirty days, and occupy the rest of his time looking after his household duties, or attending to his farm, or curing these fish that have been caught. There are a dozen ways in which a man's time may be occupied, and yet he may be properly called a fisherman. It is putting too much power in the hands of the Minister to permit him to say, that fishermen who must brave the deep and earn a precarious living even under the best circumstances, can be shut out per force because they are a certain time on shore gilling and packing these fish.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. These people are not shut out.

Mr. FORBES. But it is possible to shut them out under the regulation proposed by the Minister. A few years ago two fishermen in the county of Halifax named George Fredericks and Judson Hubley put their claim for bounties before the department, and the Minister refused to pay them. He asked his officer, Mr. Hockin, of Pictou, to investigate, and Mr. Hockin suggested that the claimant should make a solemn declaration of the facts of the case. They did so, copying a draft declaration prepared by the said inspector of Fisheries, and in his own handwriting, and this was sworn to before the inspector. For doing that, the Minister ordered a charge of perjury to be laid against Mr. Hubley, and that he should be arrested and tried for the offence. The trial took place, and the Minister endeavoured to prove that the man had committed perjury in this clause of the affidavit, which read: "That he fished with George Fredericks from the 15th of July to the end of November." Counsel representing the department contended that a "fisherman" meant a man continuously engaged in the fishery for three months, and just such a man as is described by the Minister's own Order in Council. These two fishermen were out seining mackerel, and, after they had caught their mackerel, they landed them upon the wharf, and occupied some days in preparing the fish before putting them in barrels and salting them down. Subsequently, they went out in their boats and watched for the mackerel to school again. In this way their three months time was occupied, and much more than the required amount of fish was captured. They made a claim for their bounty, but the Minister refused it, and after requiring their declaration, he alleged perjury, and a criminal trial was had, before Mr. Justice Ritchie and a jury. After two days' trial, the jury came to the conclusion that the men were fishermen under the terms of the Minister's regulations, and in the common acceptance of the term.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How does the hon. gentleman know? All they said was, not guilty. The hon. gentleman cannot say what conclusion they came to.

Mr. FORBES. I beg the hon. Minister's pardon. I was there, and defended these men. The whole issue was, whether they did fish, in the common acceptance of the term, according to the hon. Minister's regulations; and the judge and the jury both agreed that the men were not guilty of the charge made by the hon. Minister.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Did the judge allow the case to go to the jury?

Mr. FORBES. Certainly, because it was a matter more of fact than law. The judge was not there to decide what was meant by fishing; that was to be gathered by the evidence submitted; and the jury decided, and the judge concurred in the verdict, that these men were not guilty of the charge of improperly claiming the bounty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Who was the judge?

Mr. FORBES. Judge Ritchie. In the face of all that, I think the Minister should pay these men their bounty, which they honestly earned, and to which they are entitled. I think the Minister should decide the case instanter, and let these men have their bounty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have decided instanter, against the men.

Mr. FORBES. But I contend that the hon. Minister is wrong; and if he has any heart or compassion for these men, who struggle in the deep, and brave all the storms to get their living, he should say, "I acknowledge that I was in error in coming to the conclusion that they were not fishermen, and I bow to the decision of the court," but the Minister persists in his decision against these men.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You do not think those men ought to get the bounty?

Mr. FORBES. I do really think they ought to get their bounty, and I want the Minister to reconsider his decision in regard to the men. I want him also to state why he will not publish the list of applicants for bounties. These bounties are intended for bona fide fishermen. Spurious ones should not receive them, and I thoroughly appreciate the effort made by the Minister to suppress this evil, so that honest fishermen may get their share. After exercising all due caution, the Minister should see that every man who has earned his bounty should get it, whether he is a Liberal or a Conservative. The two men in this case happen to be Liberals; but I do not want to be forced to say that, and I do not want the people of the community to say, although they are saying it to-day, that it was because of their political proclivities that they did not get the bounty. I say that the Minister could do away with that clash of feeling that exists between the two parties as to who should get the bounty, instead of setting up his own 'ipse dixit' against the decision of the court. In administering the bounty fairly, without respect to party, he will get the generous help of the fishermen of both parties. Let him publish a list of the applicants for bounties, and have it posted in the custom-houses or the post offices of the several districts, so that the fishermen may see whether such and such a claimant is entitled to his bounty or not. They know the name of each fisherman, the times he has been fishing, and the number of boats he has, and if they find among a dozen claimants that five or six are bogus, they will assist the Minister in stopping the evil, even though the bogus claimants might be good Liberals. But the Minister will not give any help to these men; he will do nothing; he confines the matter to his department. If the Minister would take this suggestion from the Opposition and publish the list, I think a great deal of good would be the result. The bounty would be distributed with less expense to the country, with less worry to the department, and with more satisfaction to the fishermen. I hope the Minister will tell me why he does not make this payment to those two fishermen, Hubley and Fredericks, most deserving men and fishermen, to whom I have referred.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman put everything on paper on this subject, and I went into it on paper—and I must say that he argued it on paper far better and made a much stronger case than he has done to-night; and I refused to pay these men.

Mr. FORBES. That was before the verdict of the court?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. After the verdict of the court. Those men were indicted for perjury, and were acquitted on that charge, but they were guilty of falsehood and of attempting to steal that bounty, and they will not have an opportunity of doing that while I am at the head of the department.

Mr. FAUVEL. Has Prof. Prince anything to do with the oyster culture of the country?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No; Mr. Kemp is the man.

International Fisheries Commission... $2,000

Mr. DAVIES (F.E.I.) What is that?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Commander Wakeham has been appointed by Her Majesty, and Mr. Rathbun by the United States Government as a commission to make a survey of the waters contiguous to the two countries, and to deal with the question of purse-seining mackerel. It will take them fully two years to complete the survey.

To provide for the payment of Mr. Fabre's salary and contingencies of his office..... $3,500

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is it not about time that item was dropped?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am glad to have the opportunity of expressing my own views with regard to Mr. Fabre's office in Paris. I am bound to say that his attention to his duties and the great efforts he makes to meet the wishes of all those who may be visiting Paris and who come from Canada, cannot be too highly commended. I had a very strong prejudice against this vote. I thought it one that ought not to be maintained; but I am bound to say that both Mr. and Mrs. Fabre do all they can, in a social and every possible point of view, even for those who have no special claims on their attention, to benefit Canadians who visit that country. I am not discussing the question whether this office is worth maintaining in the public interest, but I do feel bound to express my opinion personally of the very great services

Mr. FORBES.

Mr. Fabre, in his position, renders to Canadians visiting France.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Enabling any gentlemen or ladies who go to Paris to have a good time generally. I am bound to say that although there may be something to be said from my hon. friend's standpoint, it is a very curious argument for maintaining an immigration commissioner. I cannot see, for the life of me, that the country is benefited by the services Mr. Fabre may render to such ladies and gentlemen who ought to be perfectly well able to take care of themselves, who avail themselves of his services for making pleasant their visit to Paris. I want to know whether a report was sent in by Mr. Fabre, and also what number of immigrants he claims to have sent to this country?

Mr. DALY. I do not understand that his duties are confined to immigration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He was sent for that purpose or supposed to be.

Mr. DALY. I do not see that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That was explained a few years ago to be the nature of his position.

Mr. DALY. It is one of his duties, and he certainly attends to it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Finance Minister did not tell us he had any more.

Mr. DALY. He has other duties. Hon. members who have visited Paris can speak more by the book than I can. Mr. Fabre did make a report, I remember seeing it. It was made direct to the High Commissioner, as far as immigration is concerned, but has not been printed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have only a general idea of what his duties are in connection with immigration. Being in connection directly with the High Commissioner's office, he attends to any immigration matters that require to be attended to where he is,—to the distribution of literature, correspondence with agents, and matters of that kind. I happen to know, from my stay in Paris, that the whole time of Mr. Fabre is occupied in connection with Canadian affairs. He, and Madame Fabre too, as the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has said, give great attention to any visitors there who may desire their assistance. I am sure that is due to their kindness and courtesy; but, apart from that, Mr. Fabre's time is fully occupied attending to Canadian business, and the business of Canadians in Paris. There is a very considerable colony of Canadians living in Paris, some 40 or 50. I had the pleasure of meeting them there, and found that they look upon Mr. Fabre, not only as a representative of their country, but, in a certain sense, as their guardian, who looks after their interests in every way he possibly can. His connection with Canadians in that respect was highly satisfactory and creditable to him, and I had occasion to know besides that in his office he was constantly occupied in answering inquiries in connection with Canadian matters—giving information about Canadian trade and continually giving interviews to business men who desired to be informed on Canadian commercial affairs, and looking after the interests of distressed Canadians. In matters of that kind, he was continually referred to from the British embassy, as being the direct representative of Canada. I had had absolutely no knowledge, except such as I got from the debates in this House, of what his duties might be in Paris, and I was surprised to ascertain how fully his time was occupied in attending to Canadian affairs, and how creditable a representative he made in every sense. I am not speaking in that way on account merely of social kindness, because I was not in a position to need that during my stay, but it was very gratifying to see how devoted he was to Canadian business, especially to the interests of Canadians who live in Paris and follow pursuits there in connection with their professions. His mission in Paris is one very useful and creditable to this country.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have great pleasure in being able to confirm what my right hon. colleague and leader has said respecting Mr. Fabre. I was a very long time in Paris, and I can say that I felt exceedingly proud to find our country so well represented. I say without the slightest hesitation that he is a credit to us. I could appreciate his official standing because I had much intercourse with officials, both with Mr. Fabre and the various officers of the French Government. His standing there is greatly to our advantage. Those who know Mr. Fabre know of his intellectual ability and know that he would be likely to make a good impression, and Canada has that position in the world at large and before the French people that it would be greatly to our discredit if we had not a direct representative. Our agent is able to help us in a hundred and one ways. Charged as I was with very difficult duties, there were many ways outside entirely of hospitality or personal kindness in which he was of use to me, and I availed myself of his kindness, and I am very glad, indeed, to be able here to express my indebtedness to him. I was also a witness to the many inquiries made relating to a matter which is not yet before us, the French treaty. I observed many inquiries made of Mr. Fabre respecting the trade of Canada, and the fact that he was on the spot and able to put these people in a position to obtain accurate and definite and satisfactory information with respect to the prospect of any particular line of business to the extension of which they were looking—was satisfactory. There is, however, a very large colony of Canadians in Paris, particularly young men, and we in this country pay very little for the great advantage we are able to give these young men. They go there to study art or medicine, or other sciences, and it is a great thing to have so kind a friend and so good a counsel as Mr. Fabre, and his treatment of them was such as to reflect a great deal of credit upon him. I have reason lastly to say that I believe that every dollar that has been paid by this country to Mr. Fabre has been well earned, and that if he were taken away from Paris, and no competent man put in his place, we should gain nothing, and lose a great deal.

Survey, construction of roads, bridges and other necessary works in connection with the Hot Springs reservation, Banff station, North-west Territory. $7,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought we had provided sufficient roads there. How is this money to be expended?

Mr. DALY. This sum is to be spent in salaries, waterworks and roads, a bridge across the Bow River, bridle roads and contingencies. The revenue for last year was $198,233, and from the 1st July, 1893, to the 1st May, 1894, was $2,427. So we are getting in a return of within $2,000 of what we are spending.

Further amount required for plant for printing bureau. . . . $5,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it necessary that we should go on purchasing plant for this institution?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No doubt the hon. gentleman will accept the explanation sent me by the Queen's Printer. He tells me that this item is intended to cover renewals of type and other plant and material which may be required throughout the year. There is nothing so far in view, but the contingencies of the public service may, at any time, demand that a font of type should be strengthened or some machine bought, and this is intended to cover such cases, and may or may not be required. But it is requisite that it should be available.

Towards the expenses of determining the boundary line between Canada and the United States of America between the southernmost point of Prince of Wales Island and 141 meridian of west longitude, and in Passamoquoddy Bay. . . . $45,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This seems to be a very large amount to be required this year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What will the total expense be?

Mr. DALY. The item is $15,000 less than it was last year, and in this $45,000 we include the expense of determining the boundaries between Alaska and Canada, and also the Passamoquoddy Bay work. I think I stated last year that the amount that would probably be required for the work on the Alaska boundary would be $150,000. We are going to come within that considerably.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What business does the hon. gentleman propose to take up to-morrow?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If they are ready, the Bill to provide the Quebec subsidy, and the common school funds, and Supply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In that case, I would mention that my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) will probably have a motion in reference to certain transactions of the Postmaster General and the member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin).

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 12.05 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 27th June, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE FRENCH TREATY.

Mr. RIDER asked, 1. Are the following the only articles of Canadian production which are to be admitted into France, under and by virtue of the so-called "French Treaty Act of 1894," at minimum tariff rates, to wit: Canned meats; condensed milk, pure; fresh water fish, eels; fish preserved in their natural form; lobsters and crayfish, preserved in their natural form; apples and pears, fresh, dried or pressed; fruits, preserved, others; building timber, in rough, or sawn; wood pavements, staves, wood pulp; extract of chestnut and other tanning extracts; common paper, machine-made; prepared skins, others, whole; boots and shoes; furniture of common wood? 2. What will be the rate of import duty imposed by France upon each of the items dealt with by the terms of the said treaty? 3. What is to be the treaty definition of the term "preserved in their natural form," as applied to fish, lobsters and crayfish? Also, what will the item "furniture of common wood" comprise?

Mr. DALY.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have not compared the list, but if the hon. gentleman will glance at the Bill introduced for the purpose of ratifying the French Treaty (Bill No. 147) he will find in the schedule, a copy of the treaty itself, and the articles there enumerated are the only articles which will be admitted under that treaty.

Mr. RIDER. What about the latter two clauses of the question?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. All that we can say upon the subject is in that treaty. When I move the Bill, as I propose to do within the next few days, I will bring down any correspondence we have that may throw light upon that subject.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman bring down the correspondence before the treaty is taken up?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes; I will try and do so.

MR. GEORGE HICKEY.

Mr. FORBES (for Mr. McCarthy) asked, 1. Has Mr. George Hickey been recently appointed to any position in connection with the Williamsburg or any of the canals on the St. Lawrence? 2. If so, what was the position to which he was appointed? When was the appointment made, and at what salary? 3. What are the duties which Mr. Hickey has to discharge? By whom were the duties, up to the time of Mr. Hickey's appointment, performed, and what the salary of the person performing the same? 4. Is such last-mentioned person still in the employment of the Government, and what duties does he now perform? 5. Is the office to which Mr. Hickey is appointed a newly-created one?

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. George Hickey has recently been appointed to a position on the Rapide Plat Canal. He was appointed inspector on the Rapide Plat Canal works. The appointment was made on the 4th June, 1894, at a salary of $100 per month. His duties are to see to the putting in of the foundation, &c., of the lock at Morrisburg, a very heavy, difficult work requiring to be thoroughly well done. No person held the position before him as the work had not, until quite recently, reached that stage which required such an officer to constantly overlook it. It is a new office, created by circumstances in connection with the state of the work.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved:

That when the House adjourns this day, it do stand adjourned until Friday next at 3 p.m.

He said: Mr. Speaker, to-morrow is the anniversary of Her Majesty's coronation, and there might be good reason in the judgment of the House to refrain from the transaction of business on that day. But this will be more especially the case inasmuch as to-morrow will be the opening of our conference with delegates from the various colonies, principally of Australia, with reference to communication between the different colonies, and trade within the Empire. And inasmuch as it is desired on the part of the Government to extend a welcome to these delegates from the sister colonies, and to signify that by asking members of Parliament to attend the opening ceremonies, I propose that we shall not sit to-morrow for the transaction of business. I might also say, Sir, that it was the disposition of the Government that the House should abstain from sitting on Monday next, the 2nd of July, as being the day on which the foundation of Confederation will be commemorated. I omitted, in proper time, to put my motion on the paper to that effect, and therefore I am entirely at the will of the House as regards sitting or not sitting on Monday. I thought proper to mention this to-day in case there would be any disposition on the part of members of the House to express an opinion as to whether we should sit or not on Monday.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I very willingly agree to the proposition of the right hon. gentleman that the House should not sit to-morrow. The first reason that the right hon. gentleman gave, that to-morrow is the anniversary of Her Majesty's coronation, I do not believe is the main reason that should actuate us, because we have not been in the habit of observing that day. But the other reason which the right hon. gentleman gave, is one which, I believe, will commend itself to the favourable judgment of all the members of this House. We will be very willing that the Government shall extend every courtesy possible to the delegates of the sister colonies who are now visiting us, and anything that the Government can do in that respect I am sure will have the cordial approbation of every member on this side, as well as on the other side of the House. I willingly endorse also the suggestion of the hon. gentleman that we should sit on Monday, as we are not to sit to-morrow. I would suggest that we should celebrate Confederation Day to-morrow—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. LAURIER. I was going to suggest that we might combine the two, keeping to-morrow not only for Confederation Day, but for the wider confederation which may perhaps be the result of the conference which is to take place here. If we are to have the blessing of a prorogation—and I suppose it is a blessing which ought to be appreciated on the other side of the House—it is important that we should not lose a day other than those which we cannot avoid losing. Therefore, for my part, I willingly give my approval to the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman that we should not sit to-morrow, but that we should sit on Monday next to transact business.

Motion agreed to.

THE QUEBEC JUDICIARY.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that, on Friday next, the House resolve itself into committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide, with respect to the Court of Queen's Bench and the Superior Court in the province of Quebec, that if the Chief Justice resides at Quebec, the judge residing at Montreal who is appointed by the Governor General in Council to perform the duties of Chief Justice in the district of Montreal as it is comprised and defined for the Court of Review, or, if the Chief Justice resides at Montreal, the judge residing at Quebec who is appointed by the Governor General in Council to perform the duties of Chief Justice in the district of Quebec as it is comprised and defined for the Court of Review, shall receive in addition to his other salary, $1,000.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION DAY.

Mr. KENNY. Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I would beg to call the attention of the House to a matter which has just been referred to by the right hon. leader of the Government. I allude to the question whether it is desirable that the House should sit on Monday next. Now, it is my individual opinion, and I believe that opinion is shared by many hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, that in this young Dominion of ours we should endeavour to do all that in our power lies to cultivate a thoroughly loyal Canadian sentiment. It is eminently the duty of legislators to set an example in that respect. I remember that in the year 1891 under very exceptional circumstances the House sat on the first day of July. On the present occasion we have the honour and the pleasure of having in this community representatives of all the more important colonies of the Empire; and, occupying the position which we do as the leading, the oldest and the most important of those colonies, and bearing in mind, as the hon. leader of the Opposition has said, that possibly these deliberations may result in a still greater confederation, I think we would hardly be showing the representatives of the other colonies an example of a very loyal Canadian sentiment if we did not observe our national holiday. Under all the circumstances, I express the opinion—I am not sufficiently familiar with parliamentary forms to know exactly in what shape it should be put before the House—that we should not sit on Monday next.

Mr. HAZEN. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say that I fully concur in the remarks made by the hon. senior member for Halifax. I think that from a Canadian standpoint it will be a very great mistake for us to sit on the day appointed by statute as Dominion Day. It is the only holiday we have that may be regarded as a purely Canadian holiday. We have holidays of a religious character, and holidays of a wide national character, such as the Queen's Birthday; but I think it would be a very great mistake for this Parliament not to observe the day set apart by the laws of this country as a purely Canadian holiday. I remember in 1891, when, as the hon. member for Halifax says, under very exceptional circumstances this House sat on Dominion Day, there was not a newspaper in Canada, I think, which did not reflect unfavourably upon our action in so doing. I think the sentiment of this country desires that Dominion Day should be observed by the people of this country; and unless this Parliament sets an example in that respect, we can scarcely expect to arouse Canadian sentiment on the subject, and have the day observed as it ought to be observed throughout the Dominion. I agree entirely with the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax.

Mr. AMYOT. I am certainly of opinion that we must encourage a national sentiment, but there is another consideration also. We are arriving at a period when it will be impossible for any man, not independent by fortune, to serve his country in this House, the sessions are getting so protracted. If all the press of the country blamed Parliament for sitting on Dominion Day, in 1891, I must say that I did not see anything of the kind in the press of Quebec. We believe in working for the country; but we do not believe in that exaggerated idea that to work for the country it is necessary to remain idle for a whole day. There are in this country, due to many circumstances, a great many holidays, and we have been even making another new holiday for the workmen. I think the 1st of September. We have our religious holidays, we have the Queen's Birthday, and I do not know how many other sorts of holidays; but if we lead the people to suppose that to respect something we must remain idle before it, I think we are forming a wrong public opinion. For my part, though I will, of course, submit to the desire of the majority, I must call the attention of the House and the Government to the fact that the sessions are becoming so long that a man who is not independent by fortune will not be able to come here as a member. You will then have as members those who are very rich, which does not necessarily imply talent, or men very poor, for whom the sum of a thousand dollars will be a means of living.

ELECTRICAL MEASUREMENTS.

Bill (No. 117) respecting the units of electrical measure, was read the second time.

considered in committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

ELECTRIC LIGHT INSPECTION.

Bill (No. 118) respecting the inspection of electric light was read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Mr. MULOCK. This section says: "the expression 'contractors' means any company or person undertaking," and so on. Under the Interpretation Act the word "person" includes company, so I do not see the necessity for this expression in the Bill.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). There may not be. I move that the words "company or" be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 4,

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think that subsection 3 should come in here at all. This is not a Bill to indemnify persons supplying electrical power. This is a Bill to put in force some system of measuring the degree of electrical energy supplied. Why should you pass a clause which has no relation to the subject under discussion, indemnifying certain contractors in case, for some reason, they fail to carry out their contract?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The hon. gentleman seems to be confounding this Bill with the other. I stated that while this Bill might be subject to criticism, the other could not be. The hon. gentleman must see that in case that there is a tremendous storm which so affects the wires that the company cannot furnish the electrical energy contracted for, it would not be fair that they should be mulcted in damages for not supplying the light, when the obstacles in the way are wholly beyond their control. The other Bill is called "An Act respecting the Units of Electrical Measure," while this is "An Act respecting the Inspection of Electric Light."

Mr. MULOCK. Exactly. The Bill has nothing to do with the carrying out of contracts. It deals with the question whether contractors are delivering the quantity of electrical energy that is supposed to be delivered. It is to apply the Government standard to this system, establishing machinery for the application of the system to measurement. It is not a Bill to enable persons who are selling electric light to carry on their business in any particular way. But here you are putting in a clause indemnifying those who furnish electricity in case of failure to carry out their contract. Apart from the impropriety of introducing such a section into this Bill, the question arises whether you have jurisdiction. You are undertaking here to say that men who have entered into a contract to deliver certain goods shall not be liable for breach of contract in case they fail to do so under certain circumstances. What jurisdiction has Parliament to deal with such a subject?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The latter part of the hon. gentleman's objection had occurred to my mind before I introduced the Bill. But the Bill is one that was framed with very considerable care. The objection raised is, first, whether we have jurisdiction to deal with the matter referred to in this particular section, and, secondly, whether we ought not to leave it to the general law as to damages.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the second subsection stands, the third subsection ought to be allowed to stand. The second subsection provides:

The variation of pressure at any purchaser's terminals shall not, under any conditions of the supply which the purchaser is entitled to receive, nor at any time, exceed three per cent from the declared constant pressure.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). We propose to change that to 4 per cent.

Mr. SPEAKER. But, in any case, if you impose upon the company or person supplying the light this condition contained in the second subsection, surely it is not unreasonable to say that if the variation of the pressure is caused by unavoidable circumstances, the company supplying the light shall not be liable.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). We might add some words to subsection 2 to meet the difficulty.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Where do we get jurisdiction to deal with this subject at all? Even supposing we had jurisdiction to deal with the subject of electricity, where do we get jurisdiction to regulate contracts in relation to electricity?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I believe it to be a matter of trade and commerce. If I remember aright—I was not in the House at the time—when the Act regulating weights and measures was introduced the hon. gentleman took objections to the Bill on the ground of jurisdiction. He was opposed at that time by Sir Charles Tupper and others. It was decided that this House had power to deal with such questions. As to the other, I am not quite so clear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Even admitting what the hon. gentleman says, that we have jurisdiction over trade and commerce, I do not see how this comes within our jurisdiction any more than the establishment of a cotton factory. We have nothing to do with the regulation of factories or with the manner in which factories shall be carried on. If they are carried on fraudulently you have jurisdiction, because then they come within the law; but the mere industrial operation is a matter of property, and after the product of that industry is put upon the market it comes within your control to regulate it as an article of commerce. But here it is not a matter of regulating something that is an article of commerce, it is with regard to the production of the article, taking it from its elemental condition and bringing it into that condition which will enable you to put it upon the market. After it is produced the putting it upon the market might, under certain circumstances, be made a matter of trade and commerce, although I do not see how that could be so in this case, because here you are not sending it abroad, it is a domestic commerce, and comes within the rules laid down by the Privy Council in the Parson's case. The distinction pointed out there with regard to the meaning of trade and commerce in the Act of Union between England and Scotland seems to imply fraud, and that would exclude this subject from the general control of the Dominion, and place it under the control of the particular province. That is speaking of the subject generally. Then with regard to subsection 3, it seems to me that you are undertaking there to regulate a matter of purely civil rights.

Mr. DICKEY. I would ask the Controller if he has considered the effect of taking this jurisdiction? The very subsection under consideration may involve a great deal more than appears in it; the negating of liability in one case may involve a liability in another case over which we have no jurisdiction. I would direct the attention of the committee to section 5 immediately afterwards, by which it appears to me that the electrical companies are made insurers; an absolute liability is thrown upon them to maintain their wires in safe condition. This subsection raises very much the same question. I do not think there can be any doubt about the jurisdiction of this Parliament to establish a unit of measurement, and to appoint officers to see that that unit of measurement is properly applied in the various localities. I would have no objection to a Bill for that purpose, but I think that unless the department has some very strong reasons for interfering with the rights of private contract between the supplier and the supplied, the committee should hesitate before they enter upon this field, which may be a very wide one.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the Minister should take that clause out.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I will drop it for the present. It may be necessary; I would like to think it over for a while. Let this subsection stand.

On section 5,

Mr. DICKEY. I may say to the committee that I am a director of an electric company, and to that extent I am interested in this matter. But it is only fair I should lay my views before the committee. I would ask the Controller if he could not substitute some other word for "safe." Throwing responsibility on the electrical company for the lines being in a safe condition means in effect that they are responsible for all damages, and I scarcely think that can be the intention of the department. I would suggest that the word "proper" be substituted for the word "safe."

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I will accept the suggestion.

Mr. SPEAKER. It seems to me that would still involve liability on the part of the contractors that it might be dangerous to impose upon them.

On section 6,

Mr. SPEAKER. That is a very extraordinary clause, too, it seems to me; in fact, the whole Bill seems to me to be an extraordinary Bill. This clause would give the contractors power to go into anybody's house and tear up the floors to examine the wires, or do anything they chose in the premises to which they are supplying the light. I think both the 5th clause and this one are very bad.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I can hardly conceive that a case like that would arise. The hon. gentleman knows better than I do that the current passes through the earth, and I do not think the contractors will have to do anything more than go into a man's cellar to find out where the difficulty is.

Mr. MULOCK. There is a great objection to this clause. It makes it necessary to act rather promptly, but here the company is authorized to send an inspector or some workman into a man's house on an hour's notice, and rummage through the premises, without there being any provision in the Bill that evidence shall be furnished to a householder that the person visiting his house are duly authorized agents of the company. How is a householder on one hour's notice to know that the person demanding the right to inspect is an officer of the company? He comes and produces a letter, it may be an unauthorized document, and he says: Here is a notice; and the people are told that there is a law on the Statute-book that on one hour's notice they must allow any person who likes to go through their houses. What will that lead to? We know it is a very convenient thing for persons with bad intent to go on one excuse or another into a man's premises to ascertain the lay of the land for further operations of an illegal character. I think the committee ought to surround this power with safeguards. Persons whose premises are to be inspected should have some evidence of a proper character that the person pretending to be an officer of the company is a duly authorized officer, and there should be a further provision that the contractors should give security, so that if the premises are damaged by the inspector, they shall be restored to their former condition. The clause in itself is very objectionable. I would suggest to the Minister to provide for these two features, for indemnity to the householder for any injury done to his property, and for proper evidence being furnished in advance that the person claiming the right to inspect is the duly authorized agent.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The clause simply means that officers of the company can, if necessary, enter the premises for the purpose of ascertaining where the difficulty arises and what the difficulty is. The same privilege is now granted in the case of gas inspection. If we are to use it as an argument that a person may represent himself to be an agent of an electrical company, thereby enter the house and steal some property, that is a matter which Parliament cannot provide against. A like privilege has also been given in regard to water.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In what respect would this differ from the case of water-works under municipal control? Let me suppose that some one provides himself with motive power and appliances for electrical purposes, there being no connection with any electrical company, the individual merely availing himself of the existence of electricity to furnish himself with light. What right has Parliament to regulate his affairs, or interfere with the matter at all, other than as regards the criminal law, to guard against the individual trying foolhardy experiments which might endanger the life of his family and servants? Let me take another instance, and I mentioned it when the Weights and Measures Act was under discussion. Suppose this Parliament had jurisdiction over weights and measures, and it undertook to say that there should be no such measurement as an acre, and suppose it undertook to regulate the surveys of land, and to interfere with operations being carried on by any of the provinces. The hon. gentleman surely would not be disposed to carry his jurisdiction that far; and yet he is carrying his jurisdiction that far in the present Bill, because, admitting that this Parliament has a right to regulate the supply of electricity, a new element just under the same authority as weights and measures, in what way would Parliament obtain jurisdiction over private acts of an individual, which have nothing whatever to do with the subject of contracts?

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). From my experience of these companies, I think it very necessary that such a clause should exist in the law. I have known a case in Toronto when men had to go all round the city to find out where the trouble had occurred in regard to the electrical current. The whole city was thrown out of light and the use of the street car service, and all the factories depending on electrical power were thrown out until it was found out where the break had occurred. It is absolutely essential that electrical companies should be enabled to enter premises in order to ascertain where the trouble had arisen.

Mr. MULLOCK. No one objects to that.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). The companies should have power to enter a private house. Hon. members are aware that there is a switch-board inserted inside the wall, whereby the current enters the house, and the officer of the company should have the right to go to the switch, make the necessary test and, if required, cut off the current. The servants of a great many companies have the right to enter a dwelling or factory and see where the trouble is as regards their particular service. As regards the general principle of the Bill, my experience is that it is high time we had a law to regulate the supply of electricity and measure it.

Mr. FORBES. The remarks of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) are scarcely applicable to the present Bill, as will be seen by the several provincial Acts which have given power to the electrical companies. Nearly every one of the companies has a charter from a Provincial Legislature. Under it the company is given power to enter premises and make an inspection. Section 6 very closely approaches to a violation of the principle of private contract. A local company has a charter, under which it agrees to sell electricity, and powers are given to the company at any time to enter the premises and inspect the condition of the appliances. Under this Bill a similar power is to be given to the contracting company. Thus two powers are given by different Legislatures to such company, and these powers may contradict. There is no danger that the customer will use electricity as he sees fit, and if beyond the powers given him by the terms of his contract with the company supplying electricity, then it is a matter for the company, and this Parliament should not interfere. So long as the principle of the Bill is limited to the mere regulation and inspection of electricity and the condition of the appliances, I think that will be satisfactory. The controller of the electricity should have the right to inspect the electrical power and apparatus; but if it is proposed to go beyond that point and define what kind of wire shall be used and during what hours of the day and night the supply shall be granted, and in other ways interfere with the contract between the customer and the company, then I think such powers are in excess of those possessed by this Parliament.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I think the element of danger which accompanies the operation of electrical power is sufficient in itself to oblige us, in point of reason, to adopt measures to ensure the protection of the public.

On section 7,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the Controller submit the grounds on which he claims this House has jurisdiction to pass this Bill. Nearly every clause of the Bill contains provisions respecting matters which are clearly within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures. I do not know whether or not the hon. gentleman has given much attention to that phase of the case. If he has given thorough attention to it and is convinced that he has jurisdiction, there is no use of our continuing to discuss the Bill if he intends to press it. I think the hon. gentleman will find that every lawyer in the House is of opinion that the hon. gentleman is going largely beyond the jurisdiction of this Parliament. We cannot interfere in contracts of this kind. It does not come within the definition of trade and commerce as defined by the decision of the Privy Council. You might as well interfere as regards the sale of a piece of cloth and say that it shall be so many yards long and so many wide before it shall be sold. These electrical companies are very properly incorporated by Acts of the Local Legislatures, and they carry on operations the same as private persons. For as to interfere and assert jurisdiction in this way seems to be doing something that this House should not sanction, because the matter, in my opinion, is one entirely for the Local Legislatures. I would like to hear from the Controller whether he has given serious consideration to that feature, and whether he has determined absolutely that we have the power to pass this law.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I have given all proper consideration to that phase of the subject, and I have no doubt at all—I speak now from having read the Act about a year ago when considering this Bill—that when the British North America Act gave us absolute power as to inspection of weights and measures, it clearly brought this subject within our jurisdiction. It was on that interpretation of the British North America Act that we enacted a law here regulating the inspection of gas. If we have not jurisdiction to regulate the electric light system, then we have no jurisdiction whatever to regulate the inspection of gas, for the one operation is carried on by the same means and almost the same apparatus as the other.

Mr. FORBES. There is no doubt at all that Parliament has authority to send a Government inspector, but it is a different thing altogether when you use the word "contractor" in the Bill. If the word "contractor" meant an "inspector," I could understand it, but according to your definition it means a private manufacturer supplying electricity to private customers. I refer the Minister to cap. 102 of the Acts of the Nova Scotia Legislature, 1887, incorporating an electric company, where it provides: That any duly qualified officer may enter buildings at reasonable times to inspect the meters, fittings, &c., regulating the supply of gas and electricity and ascertain the quantity thereof. That clause is incorporated in every charter creating electrical companies in Nova Scotia. It would not be so difficult to understand the principle of the Bill if the word "contractor" meant a Government inspector.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Whilst not recognizing the constitutionality of the Act the hon. gentleman has referred me to, I am quite willing to give due weight to his suggestion that the words "any Government inspector" may be used in place of the word "contractor."

Mr. FORBES. Does the Controller accept that suggestion, then?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Yes.

On section 9,

Mr. SPEAKER. It seems to me that the Bill ought to be confined altogether within the limits of the Gas Inspection Act. I do not, of course, propose to discuss the question of constitutionality, because I am not a lawyer and I do not profess to know anything about it. But reading this Bill, as I have read it to-day for the first time, it seems to me that it goes a very great way beyond the Gas Inspection Act, and that whilst it would be perfectly proper, I think, for this House to pass a measure providing for the inspection of electric light in the same mode in which gas inspection is provided for; yet when the Bill undertakes to deal with contracts between the supplier and purchaser of electricity, it is going rather too far.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The section to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Speaker) has referred does not relate to contracts at all. The essential principle of this Bill is to insure the public safety against the use of improper materials, and at the same time to enable contractors every facility to see that they are not going to put in improper materials. That is doing justice on the one hand and not any injustice on the other.

Mr. FORBES. It would be better to leave it altogether to the inspectors of the insurance companies.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It will be too late to have inspectors after we are all blown up.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I may say to the hon. gentleman that all the older and larger companies are satisfied with this Bill.

Mr. FORBES.

Mr. SPEAKER. You refer to the electrical companies?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Yes. I refer to pretty nearly those in very small places, and as to them the Act may only be put in force from time to time at discretion.

Mr. MARTIN. This Bill makes it necessary that electric light companies should furnish electric light by meters, and that may be very well as regards the larger towns and cities. But I draw the attention of Parliament to the fact that in small places—for instance, in Manitoba, outside the city of Winnipeg—it is almost impossible that electric light companies can exist upon the basis of supplying by meters. In these towns it would not be possible to start a company to supply meters, unless a very high rate were charged, because there would not be enough electricity used, and before electricity is introduced the merchants of these small towns enter into an agreement to take so many lights at such a rate. It is going too far to compel all companies to supply by meters, when a contract to the contrary exists between the purchasers and themselves. There surely is no public interest for us to interfere with contracts of that kind. No public evil exists, and I would suggest that such companies in these small towns I have referred to should be exempted from the provisions of this Bill.

Mr. DALY. Read clause 13.

Mr. MARTIN. That does not meet the case, because clause 13 leaves it at the pleasure of the purchaser.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I think the objection which the hon. gentleman takes is not of much force. He refers to what is known as the Edison meter, which I may tell him is so rapidly going out of use that it is seldom now used. It is not the intention to put this Act in force where the Edison meter is in use, because it is only used by people who are unable to provide themselves with a better.

Mr. MARTIN. It is not a question of meter at all. I refer to cases where the light is supplied by contract on a flat rate of so much per light per diem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In almost all the small towns where the electric light is used there is no meter; but the Bill leaves it optional to any single purchaser to insist on meters being introduced, and that is precisely what my hon. friend objects to. You are dealing with a number of established companies who have gone into the electric light business on a small capital, on the understanding that their customers will use a certain number of lights, and if you compel the purchase of meters, you will disorganize these little companies to a great extent.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). There is no intention of compelling those who are under the contract system to use the meters. It is only intended to put the Act in force in those cases where there are inspectors and proper means of inspection. We do not intend to put the Act in force in small places where there is no competition, and no proper means of inspection. But the loud complaint which has come from every large town and city in the Dominion for the last two or three years, long before I had any connection with the Department of Inland Revenue, has been this: you cause a proper inspection to be made of gas, and there is not a single argument for the inspection of gas that does not make for the inspection of the electric light; you compel the users of the electric light to compete unfairly with the users of gas. These reasons were so strong to my mind, and to the minds of those who gave any consideration to the question, that we determined to introduce this Bill. Realizing the conditions that exist in some places where there is no competition, and where there are no proper inspectors, we do not intend to apply the Act to those places, and there is to be no appointment of new officers. These are the reasons why the Bill has been introduced. I may say to the hon. member for Winnipeg that I fancy the consumers of the electric light in that city will be quite satisfied that there should be a proper inspection of their lights, even though it be by the candle system.

Mr. MARTIN. My remarks were not intended to apply to Winnipeg, but to the small towns throughout the country, like Portage la Prairie and Calgary, where there is no gas, and where the electric light has been put in at the flat rate, independent of the amount of electricity used.

Mr. HAGGART. How does this Act interfere with that? Why should the customer ask for a meter to be put in when under the contract he pays the same price, whether he uses the light one minute or twenty-four hours?

Mr. MARTIN. For this reason. Take the case where it is necessary to have a certain amount of electricity contracted for before it would pay to invest the necessary capital in an electric light plant. The contracts are made for a year, and you provide means here by which one of the purchasers, who perhaps does not use enough at a meter rate to equal the flat rate, could say to the company: "I will not pay this rate any longer; I want you to put in a meter." The company would be bound to do it.

Mr. HAGGART. Oh, no.

Mr. MARTIN. Oh, yes. The thirteenth section says so. I quite accept the explanations of the hon. Controller, because he has made it clear that the Act is not intended to affect such companies; but I would suggest that in order to make that clear there should be a separate clause in the Act providing that it shall not apply to towns in which there are no gas companies competing.

Mr. HAGGART. I cannot understand yet the reasoning of the hon. gentleman. The electric light company enters into a contract with a number of individuals to supply the light, and they can use it either one minute or the twenty-four hours of each day. What possible object, then, has the purchaser to say to the electric light company: Put in a meter and measure the current for me?

Mr. MARTIN. I will show the hon. gentleman in a moment what the object is. Take a small town where there is not sufficient consumption at the ordinary meter rates to warrant the putting in of a plant. The consumers have agreed to put in a certain number of lights at certain fixed rates. The hon. gentleman forgets that the flat rate amounts to a great deal more than the meter rate would in those small towns; so that the effect of the Bill would be to place these small companies at the mercy of any of the purchasers who chose to insist upon a meter being put in. As there would not be enough purchasers at meter rates to pay the company, it would be forced into bankruptcy.

Mr. FORBES. The position described by the hon. member for Winnipeg applies to the city of Halifax, where the old gas company carry on an electric light business, and the meter system is not in force.

On section 10,

Mr. MARTIN. I would suggest that this clause should be in the Criminal Code instead of here for the same reasons as have been advanced before.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that clause ought not to be carried. It provides:

Any person who maliciously or fraudulently abstracts, causes to be wasted or diverted, consumes or uses any electricity shall be deemed guilty of theft and punishable accordingly.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We will let that clause stand.

On section 11,

Mr. MULOCK. The objection pointed out before is present here in an aggravated form. There is nothing to prevent any one entering, when he thinks proper, the premises of another and examining every corner from garret to cellar and taking out all the wires and fittings, and there is no safeguard against misrepresentation or abuse. He should be required to produce his authority.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). We can meet that objection by adding words requiring him to produce written authority from the inspector.

Mr. MULOCK. I think he should be required also to leave that written authority with the person whose premises are entered.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I do not think that is necessary. The criminal law provides for the punishment of persons who enter a house illegally.

On section 12,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What kind of training or instruction does the hon. gentleman propose to give these officers? A man may be able to inspect a gas meter, and be very unfit to inspect electric meters.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). According to the opinion of experts, any one capable of inspecting a gas meter, can, with very little instruction, learn to inspect an electric meter.

Mr. MARTIN. Section 7 provides that the inspector may be called upon to determine whether the company has rightly decided that there was a leak in the house.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken. I do not wish to affect knowledge, which I do not possess, about these matters, but I have taken pains to instruct myself by inquiring of those who have the knowledge and I speak on good authority.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you propose to have these officers subject to a regular examination before appointing them as electrical inspectors?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The weights and measures inspectors never were expected to pass a technical examination. That is required of those in the Excise Branch. But the others have all been instructed by properly qualified men. The efficiency of the inspection depends, as the hon. gentleman knows, upon the accuracy of the instrument used. I thought at one time that the inspection of petroleum was quite a difficult thing until I got hold of an instrument. I find it is a very simple process, and that a man of average intelligence can make the inspection. I am informed that the inspection of electrical meters is as simple as the inspection of gas meters.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I doubt that.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I speak on very good authority.

On section 13,

Mr. SPEAKER. This is the clause, I think, to which the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) was taking exception. It provides that meters must be supplied when demanded by the purchaser. As has been stated by the hon. member for Winnipeg, in many small towns the rates have been fixed—and this applies more particularly to commercial rates—at so much per lamp for the year; and, as a general rule, these rates have been satisfactory both to the contractors and to the purchasers. It seems to me that that mode of dealing with the supply of electricity ought not to be imperatively interfered with by a Bill passed by this House.

Mr. HAGGART. I cannot see how it interferes with it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It enables the purchaser to compel the company to provide a meter.

Mr. HAGGART. A meter for electrical purposes only measures the quantity. There would be no object whatever in a purchaser who pays so much per lamp per year insisting upon having a meter.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid the hon. gentleman does not allow enough for the "cussedness" of human nature. If the consumer happens to have a dispute with the company, or if he desires to make it unpleasant for them to collect what is due, this clause is a ready weapon against the company. What does the hon. Controller consider the cost of the electric meters he requires to be used? I believe they are rather costly instruments.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). From $15 to $20.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In the case of such small companies as Mr. Speaker is referring to, there may be a very considerable number of consumers, though they may not consume much individually. And this clause may put a tax on such a company of $2,000 or $3,000 to supply meters. This may be a matter of very small consequence in large towns, I grant; and I do not think that in the case of large towns great objection to this clause could be taken.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The case might be met by a small amendment in line 22, so as to make it read, "shall, in places where an inspector is appointed."

Mr. IVES. Referring to the remarks of the hon. the Speaker, I quite agree that it would be a hardship where the consumer had contracted to take lights at so much per year to put it in their power to avoid his contract under the terms of a statute passed now. But contracts of this character would be very much improved, if the purchasers of electric light had the power to insist upon the measurement of the electricity he received. In a small town, for instance, the company furnishes to Mr. A. so many lights at so much per light per year. The contract is for a sixteen candle-power light, as a rule. But the cheat in the business is that they do not furnish a sixteen-candle-power light. They put in a sixteen-candle-power lamp, but owing to the failure of pressure and voltage, the light is less than sixteen candle-power. I would not have the law read so as to place it in the power of the man who has contracted to pay for so many lights at so much per year to break up the contract and refuse to comply with its terms; but I would declare that he might buy a meter and place it within his power to compel the company to furnish the quantity of electrical energy contracted for.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If you put the cost of the meter upon the consumer, there would not be the same objection.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Practically it is furnished at the cost of the consumer in any case.

Mr. MARTIN. The meter does not show the quality of the light used, but only the total amount of electricity furnished within a given time. I think section 4 meets the point the hon. President of the Council has raised. It provides that the company must declare the supply of electrical energy they propose to furnish. The trouble is that the pressure of electrical energy is not kept up. That is provided for by section 4. This meter would simply show how much electricity each man had during that time, it would not show whether the sixteen-lamp power had been kept up. I think the amendment of the Controller does not go far enough. How would it affect this case? He would appoint the inspector of weights and measures at Winnipeg to be the inspector of light companies, and the inspector of weights and measures is the inspector all over Manitoba. Would he have jurisdiction over electric companies all over the province?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). We appoint an inspector at certain places where it is proposed to inspect companies from time to time. There are two systems in which the purchaser is interested; one is the contract system, the other is the meter system. The contract system is going out, and the meter system is being substituted. From all the information I can gather, it will be but a short time before the meter system is universal. Now, there is no means by which you can test the quality of the electric light that is supplied by the meter system. We can, however, under section 5, test the quantity that the purchaser gets, and we want to protect him as to the quality of his light when he has a meter.

Mr. SPEAKER. A very important question is the one of who will defray the cost of the meters. The cost ranges from $12 upwards, according to the number of lights they are required to register. In a house where there is a large number of lights, a larger meter is required than where there is a small number. Suppose the company was required to put in to every purchaser's establishment where he was asked to do it, a meter where there were only five lights. The average rental of those meters is only 20 or 25 cents a month; the contracts do not extend beyond a year in any case, and they may be terminated before that time. It seems to me it would be a great hardship to require the contractors to purchase meters and put them into every man's establishment who demanded that they should be put in, although his contract did not require it, and although he was paying a certain rate per annum for each lamp that he used in his establishment. So far as my experience goes—and I may say, as the hon. member for Cumberland stated, that I am a shareholder in one of these electrical companies, therefore, perhaps, I cannot speak with so little prejudice as I might otherwise do—but so far as my experience goes, the arrangements for supplying electricity to merchants by the year in small towns such as the one I live in, have been quite satisfactory, both to purchasers and to the contractors, as regards the quantity of light, and the pressure that is supplied to those lamps. If the pressure is not sufficient and the light is not what it ought to be, the consumer will very soon notify the company to take out the lamps.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I do not think we are quite so far apart, after all. If you allow the section to stand we will see if we cannot cover the case of lights supplied under the contract system as well as under the meter system.

On section 16,

Mr. SPEAKER. I suppose the department has some information with respect to this portion of the clause which reads "or to be capable of being made to register." What is the meaning of that?

Mr. IVES. To make that more perfect it should be stated that when working at its full capacity, or at any other pressure, it shall not vary more than 3 per cent.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). We have passed clause 5, and we have substituted the word "four" for "three."

Mr. IVES. That would apply to the case of a wire working at its full capacity, but not to any other case. If you have a voltage of less than sixteen candle-power, then your wire is working at less than its full capacity, and your provision does not apply at all.

On section 31,

Mr. SPEAKER. What provision will be made for the verification and stamping of the meter in places where no inspectors are appointed? I understand this clause is not to be applicable generally, but only in certain cases.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Only when the Act is in force.

Mr. SPEAKER. Would it not be in force although inspectors were not appointed?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). No.

On section 35,

Mr. SPEAKER. What is the nature of that certificate of registration? Many of these companies are organized under the Joint Stock Companies Act of the Local Legislature, and are required to register and furnish certain documents. Would this apply only to those companies which are subject to inspection under this Act, or would it apply generally?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). It would apply to all companies that would be subject to inspection under the operation of this Act.

Committee rose and reported progress.

IRRIGATION IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 134) respecting the utilization of the waters of the North-west Territories for irrigation and other purposes.

(In the Committee.)

On section 4,

Mr. DALY. In order to avoid any discussion such as arose the other night on this Bill, I propose to strike out all the provisions relating to subterranean water.

On section 5,

Mr. LAURIER. What is the legislation in California and the other western states in regard to subterranean waters? Are they included in the lands vested in the Crown?

Mr. DALY. They are. In California they are not; they neglected to provide for that there, and the neglect gave rise to a great deal of litigation. So far as riparian rights are concerned, they are still observed; but we have no immediate use for subterranean waters, and I am willing to leave them out.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Their decisions are different from ours. For some time our law was unsettled, but recently the courts have come to the conclusion that where the courses of subterranean waters are known, they are covered by the same rule as surface waters, but where they are mere soakage through the soil, the rule does not apply. I am inclined to think, looking at the decisions, that the subterranean waters would be included under the operation of this clause.

Mr. DALY. No; and we simply desire to include the waters mentioned, such as rivers, streams, watercourses, lakes, lagoons, and so on. We do not intend this to affect any subterranean waters. However, the hon. gentleman's statement of the law is, I believe, correct.

On section 7,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The first subsection provides that any person holding rights shall obtain a license or authorization under this Act. That phrase seems ambiguous as it stands. It might mean either a duty on the part of the authorities to grant a license or a duty on the party to take out such a license. I think it should be made clear what is intended.

Mr. DALY. It is intended to be the duty of the party to take out a license. I will look into the phraseology.

Mr. LAURIER. Is the license to cost any money?

Mr. DALY. No; there is no fee charged any person who has already commenced works and takes out a license.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Suppose a man were working upon his own land and projecting works, and there was a natural flow of water through his lands, there would be no difference between him and one who resides away from the stream.

Mr. MARA. It is intended to charge a fee of $5 if a small farmer attempts to take water from a stream to irrigate his own land only?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Committee rose and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

RELIEF OF JAMES ST. GEORGE DILLON.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved second reading of Bill (No. 148) for the relief of James St. George Dillon.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think it is the custom, in fact the rule, that the evidence taken before the other House shall be in the hands of members of this House before the Bill is considered. I have not received the evidence, and I think under these circumstances the Bill should be postponed to another sitting of the House. I am not in a position to consider the Bill at the present time.

Order allowed to stand.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Intercolonial Railway—Increased accommodation at Ferona. . . $2,000

Mr. McMULLEN. Some explanation is required of this item.

Mr. HAGGART. The expenditure is required for a branch to the iron and steel works at Ferona, on the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. McMULLEN. Do the proprietors of the works contribute anything towards this extension?

Mr. HAGGART. It is customary, when a railway has large customers adjoining the track, to construct a branch into the works.

Mr. McMULLEN. The same system should be adopted by the Minister of Railways as is followed by the ordinary railway companies. The only outlay made by either the Grand Trunk Railway or the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in constructing branch lines to mills, &c., is to provide the iron. It is not fair that when $50,000,000 have already been sunk in the Intercolonial Railway, for which no return has been received, and when the railway pays barely running expenses, that money should be expended in building branch lines to iron mills. It is further increasing the expenditure of the people on the Intercolonial Railway, and Parliament should only consent to branch lines being built according to methods adopted by other companies.

Mr. HAGGART. At Feron Junction large iron smelting works have been established. Large traffic results to the Intercolonial Railway, and since the station has been established there, it has been found that the accommodation provided by the siding is quite insufficient. It is to provide for an extra line: $500 being required for the land and $1,500 for the grading and siding.

Mr. McMULLEN. I know a place in western Ontario where the Grand Trunk Railway on an average obtains ten or twelve car loads of freight daily. The proprietor had, however, to build the branch line entirely, except furnishing the iron. The Grand Trunk Railway and Canadian Pacific Railway had lines there, and, therefore, he had the advantage of competition. In the case now under consideration there is no competition experienced by the Intercolonial Railway, and, therefore, the Government could dictate their own terms.

Mr. FRASER. This outlay is not for the company at all. The company has built twelve miles of railway, which is an important feeder to the Intercolonial Railway and is for the benefit of the Intercolonial Railway, which receives freight brought over the company's own line. This expenditure is required for the end of the line of twelve miles, and all the freight over that road is brought to the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will $2,000 cover the whole expense?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Bedford and Dartmouth Branch.. $198,000

Mr. McMULLEN. Will that sum complete the branch, and what amount has been already expended?

Mr. HAGGART. It is to complete the branch; there has been no expenditure made on it up to the present time.

Mr. McMULLEN. What will be its length?

Mr. HAGGART. About seven miles. They are abandoning the bridge from Halifax to Dartmouth, and it was found cheaper to make the connection by land. The cost of rebuilding the bridge would be $235,000, and the cost of building the branch line is only $198,000, and as the people of the town demanded the latter, and as it was found to be cheaper and better, it was decided to make connection by rail.

Mr. McMULLEN. What are the gross receipts from the freight over that line?

Mr. FRASER. While the Minister is getting that information I wish to say that the Government are to be commended for building this branch road in the way they propose. I do not know what engineers recommended the building of a bridge in the first instance, but it was a most stupid thing for the Government to do, and if there is to be connection by railway with Dartmouth that communication should be on the line the Government now propose. It was a very fortunate thing for the Government and the country that the bridge fell without a train being on it.

Mr. HAGGART. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) will find in the report of the department the freight traffic from station to station on the Intercolonial Railway. I have not the information at hand which he asks.

Mr. McMULLEN. When we are asked to consent to an expenditure of nearly $200,000 we ought to have all the particulars as to the traffic on that line which would justify us in making that expenditure.

Mr. HAGGART. Independent of the receipts altogether we are obliged to make railway communication with Dartmouth. The line is cheaper than the bridge, the people of the town want the branch line, and we, therefore, propose to build it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Government contracted with the town for the building of the branch railway into Dartmouth, and the town furnished the right of way extending something like six miles. The Government laid the rails and it is simply a question of whether it will be operated, either by a bridge across the harbour such as was carried away, or by a line of railway connected with the Intercolonial Railway. The bridge having been carried away, this appropriation is for the line of railway.

Mr. McMULLEN. How long is it since this preliminary arrangement was entered into?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is fully ten years; when Sir Charles Tupper was Minister of Railways.

Mr. McMULLEN. Has nothing been done since that time?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The bridge has been built, the town furnishing the right of way. The branch has been operated ever since, and there is an undertaking on the part of the town to pay $20,000 a year for a period of years towards the expenses of operating the railway. The town has been sued for its contribution and it claims the benefit of a provision of the contract: that the town shall have the receipts of the railway after the working expenses have been paid. It is claimed by the town that the receipts from the freight and passenger traffic more than equal the running expenses. However that may be, we lose our whole benefit of the contract with the town unless we operate the branch, and it is impossible to operate it unless we give connection with the Intercolonial Railway. This money is to supply that connection, since the bridge was carried away.

Customs—Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports, Nova Scotia..... $111,470

Mr. McMULLEN. There is a decrease in that amount. How does that occur?

Mr. WALLACE. Some officers died at the port of Halifax and their places were not filled.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Controller is speaking in a very low voice and we cannot hear. He does not usually address the committee in such a mild manner as that. Perhaps something has occurred in the province of Ontario to make him so mild. I hope the hon. gentleman is not ill.

Mr. WALLACE. He feels better on account of his own constituency than the hon. member for North Wellington does.

Customs, New Brunswick ... $92,035

Mr. McMULLEN. There is an increase here; how is that?

Mr. WALLACE. The city of St. John has one additional officer, and there are some slight increases in the salaries of the other officers.

Mr. McMULLEN. What were the gross receipts at the city of St. John last year and the year before?

Mr. WALLACE. The receipts last year were $839,000, and the year before I think about $800,000.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does the Controller consider it necessary to increase the expenditure by $1,775 for an increased revenue of $40,000?

Mr. WALLACE. That is the total increase for the whole province, not the city of St. John alone.

Mr. McMULLEN. What are the other increases?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. WALLACE. They are $50 increases at Dalhousie and Fredericton, and an increase at Woodstock, where we have had to put a man on the boundary for a stretch of country that was not protected before, at a cost of $500 or $600.

Customs, Prince Edward Island $19,225

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has the hon. gentleman made the appointment to the vacancy there yet?

Mr. WALLACE. It is not proposed to fill the vacancy; but Mr. Bremner, the chief clerk, is to be promoted to the position of surveyor. Mr. McLeod, the present cashier, will be made chief clerk, and one of the others will be promoted to the position of cashier.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman appears to have ignored Mr. White's claims. He was senior in appointment to Mr. McLeod.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. White is the junior of Mr. McLeod; that is the statement in the civil service list. Mr. McLeod was appointed in 1877, and Mr. White in 1878.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. White had been in the service some years before that. He had been employed in the office a number of years before Mr. McLeod was there at all, though he had not received his commission or been put on the permanent list. As a matter of fact, I believe Mr. McLeod received his actual commission before Mr. White got his; but I understand that it was only due to the negligence of a former collector that Mr. White had not received his commission before. The hon. gentleman will recollect that he received from the inspector of the custom-house, reports upon the qualifications of Mr. White which ought to be very satisfactory indeed, and I was in hopes, in consequence of these, and also of the fact that he had been in the office so many years before Mr. McLeod, and was practically the senior officer, that he would have got the promotion.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not recall that the statement was made that Mr. White was the senior officer. This is the first intimation I have had of that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will ask the hon. gentleman kindly to look over the papers and see if the facts are not as I have stated. I have nothing to say against Mr. McLeod at all; but I think the facts are such as to justify Mr. White in asking for the promotion.

Customs, Quebec..... $125,175

Mr. McMULLEN. There is an increase here.

Mr. WALLACE. That is very largely at the port of Montreal.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the staff at Montreal?

Mr. WALLACE. About 180 or 190 officers. A little more than one-third of the business of Canada is done at that port. The average cost of collection throughout the Dominion is about $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; in Montreal it is only 2 per cent.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman knows that the larger the amount collected at one port the less it can be done for.

Mr. WALLACE. The business of the port has increased enormously during the past year, the collections amounting to $431,000 more than in the previous year. The increase of expenditure is not in proportion to the increased business.

Mr. BRODEUR. What is the cause of this increase?

Mr. WALLACE. The expenditures all around have increased. The incidental and other expenses have increased. We have placed a number of those who were on the temporary staff—men who were occupying responsible positions, having large amounts of money passing through their hands—on the permanent staff. Some who were only employed during the summer months are now employed all the year round.

Mr. BRODEUR. Would the hon. gentleman give the names of those whose salaries are going to be increased?

Mr. WALLACE. There is Mr. D. Cuthbert, who is appointed assistant appraiser there. He came from Toronto to take the place of Mr. Davidson, who was sent to Toronto, and that involved an increase. Mr. Meagher is transferred from the temporary to the permanent staff.

Mr. BRODEUR. Is the salary of Mr. Lanthier, one of the assistant appraisers, increased?

Mr. WALLACE. No. Mr. Laurin, Mr. Corbell, Mr. Thomas Davis, Mr. Belair, Mr. L. D. Perham, Mr. Porteous, Mr. Chambers, Mr. Robertson, and some others have had their salaries increased.

Mr. BRODEUR. I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that I think he should have increased the salary of Mr. Lanthier, who is one of the assistant appraisers, and a most efficient officer. I know the work he has to do, and he is certainly doing much more than some of those whose salaries have been increased. I do not want to complain of the increases in the case of certain officials, but I think if the hon. gentleman's attention had been drawn to this, he would have increased Mr. Lanthier's salary.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Lanthier is assistant hardware appraiser, and he receives the highest salary paid to any assistant appraiser in any of the ports of the Dominion. He gets $1,300 a year.

Mr. BRODEUR. Is that the highest which may be paid?

Mr. WALLACE. No, I do not think we have fixed a limit.

Mr. BRODEUR. I presume there is much more work in Montreal and much more important work than in other cities, and there is no reason why the same salary should be paid.

Mr. WALLACE. There is more work, but we have more officers to do it. Take the appraisers at Halifax: the chief appraiser gets $1,200, whereas Mr. Lanthier, an assistant appraiser, gets $1,300. He gets the highest pay for any assistant appraiser in the service.

Mr. BRODEUR. I understand that in the amounts voted last year of $130,000 is included the salary of the collector of customs. No doubt when the hon. gentleman asked us to vote that salary last year, he was under the impression that the collector would be appointed during the year. The appointment, however, has not yet been made. The port of Montreal is certainly the most important in the Dominion. The late collector, Mr. Ryan, died in January, 1893, and yet his assistant has not yet been appointed. We know the reasons why, but the trade is complaining to a certain extent for not having some one there who is responsible for the position. I do not wish to complain of the assistant collector. I think he is very competent to do the work, and that if the Government want to do justice to the port of Montreal, they should appoint him as collector. He has been in the service many years, has always done his duty well, and there is no serious reason why he should not be appointed. At any rate there is no reason why we should not have a collector of Customs appointed. I understand we are on the eve of general elections. Probably the Government will be induced to bring on the elections as soon as possible after the great victory they have just gained, and should be prepared to fill the appointment. At all events, I feel it my duty to protest against the delay in appointing a collector of customs.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice that there are over a hundred tide-waiters in Montreal. What are the duties of these officials, and why is there such a number?

Mr. WALLACE. At present we have hardly enough tide-waiters. We have a request for the appointment of more, but instead of appointing more, I have taken men temporarily from the office to perform the duties. There are twenty or thirty ocean steamers coming in on one day as well as a number of other vessels constantly arriving. The whole water front of Montreal is lined with vessels. The tide-waiters must carefully see to the cargo and papers of each vessel, so that a large staff of capable men is required.

Mr. McMULLEN. The duty of a tide-waiter, then, is to see that each vessel is subject to the regulation custom dues, and that all these are paid.

Mr. WALLACE. Not only vessels, but railway trains as well. Those who attend upon the arrival of railway trains are also called tide-waiters or landing-waiters.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does the hon. Controller keep a hundred tide-waiters employed the year round?

Mr. WALLACE. We have not so much work for them in winter. A large number of these men are employed only by the day, and we have to dispense with the services of a portion of them during winter. The custom is to put them on half time, one man working one month, and another man the next. There is still a great deal of business to be done, but it is done at the railway station and fewer men are required.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many permanent tide-waiters are there in Montreal?

Mr. WALLACE. About 23 to 25 permanent.

Mr. McMULLEN. How does the hon. gentleman choose the men when it becomes necessary to increase the number? It seems to me that it must be very awkward having to engage men in that way. Of course it is not desirable to keep them the year round. But how are they taken on?

Mr. WALLACE. These men are employed from year to year. Since I assumed the control of the department I have not employed more than three or four new men. The men employed are all old members of the staff who have had experience in the duties to be performed. Those whose services have been dispensed with temporarily are taken on in the spring.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have been looking into the receipts for customs. It can easily be understood that when the receipts at any port increase an increase may be expected in the number of men employed, and, therefore, in the expenditure. I find that in 1887 the customs receipts were $22,378,800, and it cost to collect this sum, $817,131.62. Last year we collected $20,910,662 at a cost of $924,900, so that we paid $105,000 more than in 1887 to collect about $2,000,000 less than in that year.

Mr. WALLACE. In 1887 we collected three or four millions of dollars on sugar, which required very little work from the Customs Department, the money being paid in large sums, sometimes $50,000 or $60,000 at one time. It takes very few men to supervise a cargo of sugar. That has been cut off almost entirely by making sugar free up to 16 Dutch standard. So there is a great deal more work done to-day in the Customs Department than was then done seven years ago for an equal amount of money.

Mr. McMULLEN. But the hon. gentleman knows that sugar entering is subject to the same inspection, and very careful account must be kept of the importation.

Mr. WALLACE. Almost the same work has to be done as before, but the sugar comes in duty free, and we have three or four millions less money. In other departments, at the port of Montreal, the port at Toronto and others, business has increased very largely, and, of course, that makes more expense.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman surely does not mean—

Mr. LANGELIER. I see that in the customs in Quebec, there is a total decrease of $2,200, but there is an increase of $200 in the salaries of the permanent staff. Will the Controller of Customs please tell me what permanent officers are to have increases in their salary?

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Giroux gets $150, Mr. Belanger $50, Mr. F. W. Gray $200, Mr. Gouin $100, Mr. Doucet $100.

Mr. LANGELIER. Is there any increase for the appraiser of dry goods, Mr. Dion? He is one of the best officers of the whole custom-house. I have never heard any complaints against him among the merchants of Quebec.

Mr. WALLACE. There is no appropriation in the Estimates for any increase.

Mr. LANGELIER. The merchants of Quebec have recommended strongly an increase of his salary. He is in a very responsible position, there has never been any complaint, and he is a very efficient officer. He has been in that line of business as chief clerk for the largest dry goods firm in Quebec, that of Thibaudeau & Co. He gets, I think, some $1,200 a year, and the salary of his predecessor was $1,400. For several years his predecessor did not perform his duties on account of illness, and Mr. Dion had to perform them at a very small salary. He was then appointed to the position, and since that time his salary has been increased, but he does not yet receive the salary which has always been considered the regular salary of a dry goods appraiser, which is $1,400 a year. I call the particular attention of the Controller to that case.

Mr. WALLACE. I will examine into it.

Mr. DEVLIN. Have there been any dismissals or resignations from the staff in Montreal during the last year?

Mr. WALLACE. I cannot recollect any dismissals. I have no record of any resignation.

Mr. DEVLIN. Who is at the present moment assistant collector at the port of Montreal ?

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. O'Hara is the assistant collector and the acting collector. It is the only port in Canada that has an assistant collector.

Mr. DEVLIN. Is he a good officer ?

Mr. WALLACE. I think he is a pretty good officer.

Mr. BRODEUR. Have any complaints been made against him at Ottawa ?

Mr. WALLACE. We are none of us perfect.

Mr. DEVLIN. Is it the intention of the Government to continue Mr. O'Hara in the position of assistant collector, even after the appointment of a new collector ?

Mr. WALLACE. That is his office.

Mr. DEVLIN. Is it the intention to continue the office in existence after the office of collector shall have been filled ?

Mr. WALLACE. That office was created when Mr. Ryan was collector, by Mr. O'Hara being made assistant collector.

Mr. DEVLIN. I understand that the office of collector was last filled by Mr. Ryan, and that when Mr. Ryan was collector of customs, Mr. O'Hara was assistant collector. Now I am putting the question on account of a remark which the hon. gentleman made to the effect that it was the only port in Canada in which there was an assistant collector of customs. It appears that to-day the two positions are very well filled by the one gentleman. I was asking if, in case the office of collector should be filled by the appointment of somebody else, the office of assistant collector would continue in existence ?

Mr. WALLACE. I presume so. I do not see any reason why it should not. There is an assistant collector at the port of Montreal because the business is so very large at that port, justifying the appointment of an assistant to the collector.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is very remarkable, under these circumstances, that nearly eighteen months have elapsed without the appointment of a collector. It certainly does appear a very extraordinary thing that if a collector is necessary, the vacancy should have continued eighteen months.

Mr. BRODEUR. Could the Controller of Customs give us some reason why there has been so long a delay in the appointment of a collector ?

Mr. WALLACE. We expect to appoint a collector at a very early day.

Mr. BRODEUR. I want to know the reason why no appointment has been made for so long a time.

Mr. WALLACE. Perhaps there is a difficulty in getting a gentleman to accept the office.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is it the intention of the Controller to abolish the office if nobody will accept it ?

Mr. WALLACE. We expect it will be filled very soon.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) I feel surprised at the hon. Controller of Customs giving such a lame excuse to vindicate his delay in appointing a collector of customs at Montreal. The reason stated by him for not filling the vacancy, is that he could not get a person well qualified to discharge the duties of the office. Among the several names I have heard mentioned in this connection, are those of well qualified citizens of Montreal, who are disposed to accept the office. The claims of those persons to the office are supported by several members of this House. Let me mention, among others, the name of Mr. Guillaume Boivin, who is an influential merchant of Montreal, perfectly well qualified to fill the office. His candidature as above stated, is endorsed by twelve or fifteen members of this House, and by the Chamber of Commerce of Montreal. I have mentioned that gentleman's name to show that the Controller of Customs was quite mistaken when he stated that it would be difficult to get a gentleman to accept the office. The hon. Controller of Customs must be joking ; he cannot mean what he says. He must have taken that course on other grounds. The Government have promised the office to one of the hon. members of this House. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) has been promised the situation, at any rate, he is practically appointed. When the hon. member for North Simcoe challenged the Government to open the county of Cardwell, the challenge was declined, because the hon. Controller of Customs, in spite of his lofty eloquence and his influence over a certain class of Ontario electors, has not been influential enough to meet in front the hon. member for North Simcoe. I do not understand why the city of Montreal and the general trade of the country should be made to suffer, because the Controller of Customs is not influential enough to secure the election of one of his followers. The trade of Montreal repeatedly insisted on the appointment being filled. I am aware that several of my colleagues, who sit here, have urged the Government to fill the office ; the appointment has not yet been made, and the public suffer to a certain extent from it. The Government cannot give a single respectable reason—if I am allowed to use the term—to justify their course ; and meanwhile, we are kept here waiting and we are being told that there is nobody willing to accept the position. Well, I say again that the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), who sits and votes in this House, is practically appointed to fill the vacancy. I submit that this constitutes certainly a breach of the independence of Parliament. I say that public interests are interfered with and the House of Commons mocked at.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What reply does the Controller make to that?

Mr. TARTE. I think I shall have to repeat my speech in English.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The House is entitled to some information on the question put by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte).

Mr. WALLACE. I have given all the information asked for.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. member has made a very important statement.

Mr. McMULLEN. The item might be allowed to stand, so that the Controller will be able to see a translation of the hon. gentleman's speech to-morrow.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think it is very important that the position of Controller should be filled by a gentleman who understands the dual language.

Ontario..... $299,850

Mr. LANDERKIN. Has the attention of the Customs Department been called to a case of smuggling of bicycles that occurred at Port Hope last fall? If so, who smuggled? What was the result? Did an investigation take place, and what penalties attached to those adjudged guilty of the offence?

Mr. WALLACE. I have no recollection of any case of smuggling at Port Hope.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Has the attention of the department never been called to it?

Mr. WALLACE. It may have been, but it has not been brought before me. We have hundreds of cases occurring throughout the Dominion, but I cannot recollect any such case at Port Hope.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I understand Mr. Evans, harbour master at Port Hope, smuggled two bicycles; that the matter was brought to the attention of the department; that no deliverance has been made, and no revenue has been collected.

Mr. WALLACE. I will let the hon. gentleman know.

Mr. BRODEUR. Has the hon. gentleman any information that smuggling has occurred in connection with the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal last year?

Mr. WALLACE. Not that I recollect.

Mr. BRODEUR. I have read in the newspapers that smuggling had been carried on by some persons employed in the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal. I should like to know if the Government have any information on the subject.

Mr. TARTE.

Mr. WALLACE. We are making seizures almost every day in some part of the Dominion, but I cannot recollect any seizure made in regard to parties engaged on the construction of the canal.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Controller has met the statement I made in a trivial manner. I have been informed on good authority that this offence against the customs law was committed at Port Hope. I have been further informed that the gentleman is a personal friend of the Controller, and I have been further informed that owing to that fact no steps have been taken by the department in connection with the matter. It is due to the department, to the Controller and to the country that some explanation should be given in regard to the matter.

Mr. WALLACE. Many cases relating to seizures have not yet been disposed of, owing to my attention having been given to the revision of the tariff. But we give every man the same treatment in my department; if any one is guilty of wrong-doing, we do not shield him.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You have no knowledge of this case?

Mr. WALLACE. There may have been some correspondence with my department. If a seizure is made, it is usually done through the special branch. The report will be made to the department, and the case will come before me in due course. This case has not come before me, officially at any rate.

Mr. LANDERKIN. This case occurred last fall, nearly a year ago, and was afterwards reported on. It would be very singular if the circumlocution office could delay the progress of an investigation for almost a year.

Mr. WALLACE. It would be. If a seizure had been made last fall no doubt it would have come before me long before this time, and have been disposed of. But an article might have been smuggled a year or two ago and the seizure made only a week ago. I presume the case mentioned is a very recent one, so far as its seizure is concerned. I am quite sure there was no seizure made in the case referred to last fall, or it would have come before me for decision before now.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Then if the seizure was made a week ago the case would not have been disposed of. You were not here, but in other parts of the province.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman was not absent because he was afraid to go back to his constituency.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I understand the Controller was out at Omemee. At Owen Sound, I believe, there is a port of entry, and there was a gentleman there entered whom the Controller did not want. I believe he was in a good many other ports; that he was in three different places in Huron, and three gentlemen were entered there whom the Controller did not want entered. The Controller's travelling allowance should be increased.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). The hon. gentleman will please confine himself to the item.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think I have the right to discuss the Controller's department. It is a very proper subject to bring before the House, and should be brought up in a more formal way. If the Controller absents himself from the House when serious matters are going on in the country which require his supervision, I have a perfect right to complain, and especially when he is not prepared to answer questions in regard to the case of smuggling to which I called his attention, and in regard to which he knows nothing.

British Columbia... .. $62,195

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the cause of this increase?

Mr. WALLACE. Increased duties, principally in the Kootenay district, and also in Vancouver and Victoria. There have been some new customs ports established there during last year.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many?

Mr. WALLACE. One at Caslow, on Kootenay Lake.

Mr. DEVLIN. How many officers are employed?

Mr. WALLACE. One officer, at a salary of $1,000. We are making provision for an appraiser at Vancouver.

Mr. DEVLIN. Is he appointed yet?

Mr. WALLACE. No. In the Kootenay country there are two or three new offices that we propose to employ men at; not the whole of them at salaries, but we propose to utilize the services of postmasters or other officers who may be there, and whose services can be got for less than you could send competent men to perform the duties for.

Mr. McMULLEN. How have you managed up to this without an appraiser at the port of Vancouver?

Mr. WALLACE. A gentleman named Turner is acting as appraiser now. He is in the Customs Department, and has other duties to perform.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the duties have been fairly carried out, could not the hon. gentleman appoint the man who was discharging them? During five years we have increased the expenditure in connection with customs by $110,000, and now that the revenue is falling off we should endeavour to curtail the expenses in proportion to the decrease. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that as he has got along so well without an appraiser at Vancouver that he should appoint one of his staff there to the office, and not incur a further expenditure by appointing an officer at a high salary.

Mr. WALLACE. The office of appraiser is an important one, and we should have a thoroughly capable man to fill it. If we can find a man in the department there who is thoroughly competent we will appoint him from the staff. Although we have a large number of statutory increases this year, and increased business at many ports, we have cut down the expenditure to the same sum as last year.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is to be hoped that the hon. gentleman will find an efficient man for the position in the employment of the Government. After the statement he has made, it would be rather a reflection on the officers if he has to go outside the department.

Mr. WALLACE. We may have a whole staff of competent book-keepers and clerks, but not one of them might be so well versed in the quality and prices of goods as to be suitable for the position of appraiser.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the acting appraiser has been discharging his duties efficiently he certainly would be the proper man to appoint to the office.

Mr. WALLACE. We propose to increase the efficiency at that port by having a capable and competent appraiser. Captain C. A. Worsnop, the surveyor there, is a very capable man.

Provinces generally—To cover any unforeseen changes necessary to make in staff... .. $5,000

Mr. McMULLEN. What portion of this vote was used last year?

Mr. WALLACE. $3,500 was expended last year, and this year it is estimated that there will be very little of it used.

Mr. BOWERS. I wish to ask the Controller if the officer at Sandy Cove, N.S., is still holding his office? I called the hon. gentleman's attention to some smuggling there last year, and he told me he would inquire into the matter. Has the matter been inquired into, and with what result?

Mr. WALLACE. The officer is still continuing to perform his duties there, and I think he is more vigilant than he was before. We have sent our inspector to inquire into the matter.

Mr. BOWERS. It seems strange, after the Minister of Marine and Fisheries entered an action against him, and, I think, proved the accusation, that he should be allowed to hold a position under the Government, especially as I think the revenue amounts to only about $25 a year on an average, for which the officer is paid $150 to collect.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the name of the officer to whom the hon. gentleman refers?

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Bishop.

Mr. WALLACE. The report of the inspector in that case has not come to hand.

Sir CHARES HIBBERT TUPPER. Neither has the report of the trial.

Mr. BOWERS. Has the officer been suspended in the meantime?

Mr. WALLACE. No, we have not suspended him in the meantime. The inspector goes down and investigates, and if he finds cause for the suspension of the officer he suspends him. Pending the arrival of the inspector's report, we would not suspend the officer without some special evidence to justify his suspension; we would not surmise that he was guilty until the investigation proved him to be guilty.

Mr. BOWERS. Has the inspector been sent down?

Mr. WALLACE. He has been sent, and may have concluded the investigation, but his report has not arrived here yet.

Mr. BOWERS. I notice in the local papers that the charge against him in connection with the bounty matters has been proved.

Mr. FRASER. I would like to ask the Controller of Customs if he expects to make the appointment of a collector at Sherbrooke, N.S.?

Mr. WALLACE. We have an acting officer there now, and we expect to have a permanent one appointed within a few days. His name has been submitted to Council.

Mr. FRASER. For some time that office has been dangling, the work being done by an outside officer. The delay in filling the office is extraordinary.

Mr. WALLACE. We have an excellent officer there performing the duties, and so long as we have an officer to spare it would be well to let him remain.

Mr. FRASER. If the hon. gentleman has an officer to spare there is no need of his making an appointment. If we turned up all the officers to spare, we might save a lot of appointments. I think the reason, and it might as well be stated, is that the Controller finds some difficulty in making the appointment, and that is why the officer from outside is sent there.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. So many good men want it.

Mr. FRASER. I accept the explanation.

Mr. BOWERS.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is a singular thing that a man should be allowed to discharge the duties of a collector of customs who over a year ago was charged with a fraudulent transaction, prosecuted by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and proved guilty, at least so far that he has been committed for trial. The Controller of Customs admits, in the face of all these facts, that he is keeping the man in the full service of the country, not even suspending him. It appears to me to be an exceedingly imprudent and improper thing to allow a man of that kind to continue to act as a collector of customs.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the hon. member is hardly justified in making these remarks. My recollection is that the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Bowers) mentioned some rumours a year ago, and I asked him to make specific charges against the officer, if he had any; and those charges were not made until some weeks ago, during the present session. As soon as they were made I authorized our inspector to go down and make a thorough investigation. We are not to suppose that this man is guilty until the investigation proves that he is guilty. If it does, of course we will dismiss him at once; but we cannot do that until we have the report of our inspector, which will be here almost any day.

Mr. BOWERS. I think I brought the matter to the Controller's attention last year by writing a letter to him.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, by saying there were rumours of some kind. I asked the hon. gentleman to state what the charges of wrong-doing were; but he did not make those charges until a few weeks ago.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Does this item include the travelling expenses of the Controller when he went up west a few weeks ago to uphold Meredith, defend Protestantism and denounce ecclesiastics? We saw it reported that he seemed to be very lonesome because the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was not with him to denounce ecclesiasticism and defend Protestantism.

Mr. WALLACE. When I go out electioneering, I go at my own expense.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Then we had better drop this item; we do not need it.

Board of Customs and outside detective service, including $400, salary of Commissioner of Customs as chairman of the Board.....	$26,150
--	----------

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the salary of the Commissioner of Customs now?

Mr. WALLACE. Two thousand eight hundred dollars as Commissioner of Customs and $400 as chairman of the Board of Customs.

toms. He has not received anything yet as chairman of the Board of Customs. He was only appointed chairman since the session began.

Mr. LANGEЛИER. The hon. Controller must have read the correspondence of Mr. Lyman, in which he complains that there never was a Board of Customs in existence. It may have been provided for by law, but never met as a board, or rendered any decisions. After the reply made by the hon. gentleman to a question I put some time ago, Mr. Lyman wrote another letter, in which he states distinctly that though there may have been individual consultations among the members of the board, they never met as a board, except, perhaps, since the session opened.

Mr. WALLACE. When I became Controller, we had no chairman of the board until Mr. Watters was appointed in the early part of this year. The board did not meet as a board until we were pretty well through with the new tariff. The board was then called together on the 21st May, and continued in session until the 7th of June. We had the advantage of having some of the other appraisers before the board to interchange opinions as to the rating of articles under the new tariff. Every day we are writing to our Dominion appraisers at the ports of Halifax, St. John, Montreal, and Toronto, submitting samples of cases that come up for adjudication, and getting decisions from the different appraisers as to the classification for duty of different articles, concerning which there are points in dispute. During the year we have had thousands of cases submitted in that way to the Dominion appraisers.

Mr. LANGEЛИER. That would not remedy the complaint made, which is not that individual members of the board are not consulted, but that the board, as such, never met together until this session. The trade in Montreal and Quebec complain that there are no regular meetings of that board, before which they can lay complaints, and the Controller must be aware that one of their grievances is that different rates are charged at different ports. I was told by some importers at Quebec that at times they would have their goods passed through the Montreal customs-house so as to get the advantage of the ruling there, and on the other hand Montreal importers would, in some cases, have their goods entered at Quebec where a lower rate was charged. To remedy such complaints, it would be necessary for that board to have regular and frequent days of meeting.

Mr. WALLACE. We have improved on the system which prevailed when Mr. Parmelee was commissioner. Our system provides a ready answer to all inquiries. For instance, a merchant of Montreal or Quebec sends for a ruling. We do not wish to decide the question off-hand here, but we send to an appraiser at Montreal or some other port, get his opinion in a few days as to the classification or rate of duty, and come to a decision, so that the public are more promptly served, and get more accurate justice in this way than if we called the board together at long intervals as we would have to do, because they can only meet at long intervals. These appraisers have their own duties to perform at their own ports and can very easily give a decision from there. We have introduced a careful system of checking, so as to have the same rates of duty charged at all our ports. If an article is entered at one port at a different rate of duty than that charged at another, our checkers take note of it at once. We are getting an admirable staff of young men, competent and vigilant, and will secure a uniform appraisement at all the ports. If a different entry is made at Montreal than at Toronto, that is detected at once, an inquiry is made, and a decision given as to the rate of duty, which is made uniform.

Mr. DEVLIN. Is this $400 simply to provide for the commissioner's salary as chairman of the board?

Mr. WALLACE. There was $400 last year, and this is $400 additional.

Mr. DEVLIN. Was the position of chairman created last year only?

Mr. WALLACE. No, it has always existed. When Mr. Parmelee was Commissioner, he had $800 as chairman of the board. Then it was changed and divided into two parts—$400 as chairman of the board, and $400 as Chinese commissioner. It is now proposed to make the amount $800 for the chairman of the board.

Mr. LAURIER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the Board of Customs, which, as he said a moment ago, met for the first time in many years—

Mr. WALLACE. No. As I understand it before I came in, Mr. Parmelee, as Commissioner, Mr. Watters as assistant, and Mr. Jessop were here, making a quorum of a board among themselves. They usually got Mr. Blackwood, of Toronto; Mr. Ambrose, of Montreal, and one or two others to come down here to assist in deciding points arising. We have never before had a formal sitting of the Board of Customs such as we had this time, and the reason why we required it was that we had an entirely new tariff and many cases came up for consideration.

Mr. LAURIER. There never was such a meeting of the board as there was this time. Very well. Is it the intention of the Controller that the board should meet regularly at fixed times, or only at his call?

Mr. WALLACE. Not at fixed times, but as the necessity arises. If a number of difficult questions come up for decisions, we may call the board together at any time. The only expense entailed by the meeting of the board is the travelling and living expenses of those who come here. They receive no extra remuneration as members of the board.

Mr. LAURIER. The board, at the meeting just held, must have reached some decisions, or adopted regulations.

Mr. WALLACE. They have given opinions, which opinions do not become decisions until I endorse them. They have given a large number of opinions which I am now considering.

Mr. LAURIER. Is it the intention of the hon. gentleman, when he has gone through these opinions, to lay them on the Table of the House for the opinion of Parliament?

Mr. WALLACE. I had not intended to do so. We will send to the different ports those opinions that are approved. Of course I will lay them on the Table if necessary. But, even if they should not be ready for the House this session, any member of Parliament can get a copy by writing to the department.

Mr. LANGELIER. They should be made public for the information of the trade.

Mr. WALLACE. We send a copy to every board of trade, and every one who writes for them can obtain a copy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If it is the intention to send a copy to every board of trade, I think they should also be published in the 'Gazette,' where they will be generally accessible, and remain in a certain fashion, as of record.

Mr. WALLACE. We usually publish the decisions in the newspapers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The 'Gazette' is the proper and official medium, and there those who are concerned can get the decisions in due sequence.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not see any objection to that.

Mr. DEVLIN. It is quite possible the Board of Customs may not meet again during the year.

Mr. WALLACE. We believe that the new tariff is so perfect that it will not require any meetings of the board for some time.

Mr. DEVLIN. Will the salary of $800 continue, in that case?

Mr. WALLACE. The meetings of the board are a very small portion of the chairman's duties. He is performing these duties every day, sending out the decisions to the appraisers throughout the Dominion, and corresponding with them and with others.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. DEVLIN. As chairman of the Board of Customs, and not as Commissioner?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes. We have a Board of Customs composed of dry goods men, hardware men, grocery men and druggists. It would be more satisfactory, for instance, on a dry goods question, to have the opinion of three or four dry goods appraisers than to have the opinion of the board. Suppose a decision is asked for from Montreal, we ask the appraisers at Quebec, at Halifax, St. John, Toronto and Hamilton as to what have been their rates and classification of the goods, and in that way we come to a decision, having better advice on the subject than we could get from the Board of Customs.

Mr. DEVLIN. I suppose there are other expenditures in connection with the meeting of the board besides this $800?

Mr. WALLACE. There are the travelling and living expenses of those coming here. These are all the expenses in connection with the meeting. Of course, there are other expenses in connection with the Board of Customs.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. gentleman said there might not be another meeting of the board this year. I would like to ask the Controller of Customs what sum is spent on the Board of Customs, and how it is spent? That, of course, includes, as I understand it, the $800 for his salary as the chairman of the board.

Mr. WALLACE. There are a number of other services included in that vote. The salary of Mr. McMichael's staff and their travelling expenses are included. Then we had last year a special staff on the Lower St. Lawrence paid out of this amount.

Mr. DEVLIN. How much were they paid?

Mr. WALLACE. The total expenditure was $2,949, and Mr. McMichael's staff was paid a very large amount. That staff was employed all over the Dominion in detective service.

Mr. DEVLIN. Of course, I do not want to ask the hon. gentleman anything unreasonable, but this is a strange subject. Here is a Board of Customs which only meets now and then, and we are asked to vote a sum of $26,150 for this Board of Customs. I think it is due to the committee that we should know exactly how this money is expended.

Mr. WALLACE. I will give the hon. gentleman the expenditure for the ten months of the present year. Salaries, $4,964.32; Lower St. Lawrence, $2,949; Mr. McMichael's staff, special detective branch, $9,038; extra clerks, $1,022; Mr. Robitaille's salary, below Quebec, $300; telegrams, $129.25; ferry service, $367; freight, $51.13; travelling expenses, $257.45; sundries, $17.10. That makes a total of $19,313, and we expect the balance will be expended during the remainder of the year.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. gentleman gave in the first instance $4,000 to salaries. To whom were these salaries paid?

Mr. WALLACE. I have not a list of the salaries here, but I can tell the hon. gentleman from memory some of the names. Mr. Belton is his assistant in Toronto; Mr. O'Keefe is his officer in St. John, N.B., and there are two men, Mr. Shaughnessy and Mr. Bonness at St. Stephen. Mr. Robertson is a special officer in Montreal, and another one, whose name I have forgotten. We have had two men on the Detroit River between Windsor and Sarnia; one died a short time ago, and we have only one there now. Then we have several others who are employed from time to time. There is Mr. Trowbridge, of Toronto, whose salary is charged to the Toronto staff. He is taken away from there occasionally for service along the Niagara frontier. There are a large number altogether throughout the whole Dominion.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. gentleman stated a few moments ago that recently the Board of Customs met frequently, but previously had not met for a long time. The salary, no doubt, was voted for the chairman of the Board of Customs. Was that salary paid even when the board did not meet?

Mr. WALLACE. There has been no salary paid to him as chairman of the board, since I became Controller.

Mr. DEVLIN. Then the $800 voted last year was not expended?

Mr. WALLACE. I think not.

Mr. DEVLIN. Then in case there should be no meetings of the board of customs in the coming year the salary would not be paid?

Mr. WALLACE. The salary was not paid, because we had no chairman of the board until this winter, about the beginning of the session of Parliament. Although the duties were being performed, there was no chairman appointed by Order in Council, and therefore there was no one who could be paid the money that was voted by Parliament.

Mr. DEVLIN. It is quite possible, as the Controller has admitted, that there may be no meeting at all of the Board of Customs during the coming year. Of course, the chairman would not then be called upon to act. Will he still receive the salary of $800?

Mr. WALLACE. He will be performing the duties of chairman, because he may be sending out to the appraisers at the different ports and getting information, and seeing that uniformity is secured.

Mr. DEVLIN. Are these duties altogether distinct from those belonging to his office as Commissioner of Customs?

Mr. WALLACE. No; they are not.

Mr. DEVLIN. But he is paid a good salary, is he not, as Commissioner of Customs for attending to these very duties? The amount was not expended last year.

Mr. WALLACE. It had been expended until I became Controller. After Mr. Parmelee left, there was no chairman of the board for a year or more, and therefore nobody was paid.

Mr. DEVLIN. The Controller will understand that I am not criticising the office. It is a simple proposition that a special salary should be created for a purpose, which purpose may not exist, and that even should it exist, the duties may be performed by a gentleman who is supposed, at all events, to attend to the duties that belong to another office to which he has been appointed, and to which a good salary is attached. The committee is asked to vote a salary of $800 to this man. This is a new departure, it did not occur last year. The hon. gentleman has said himself that it was quite possible the board might not meet at all, and still he asks us to vote a salary of $800 to a gentleman who is already receiving a very large salary for the purpose of attending to the duties that belong to his office. I do not think it is a fair explanation.

Mr. BRODEUR. Is the Commissioner of Customs at the same time chairman of the board?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Mr. BRODEUR. According to law the Commissioner of Customs is also chairman of the board?

Mr. WALLACE. He is appointed by Order in Council.

Mr. BRODEUR. Is the chairman of the board always acting Commissioner of Customs? Is that provided by law?

Mr. WALLACE. The custom has been that the acting Commissioner of Customs has been chairman of the board, but he has to be appointed to that position by Order in Council.

Mr. BRODEUR. Is it provided by law that the chairman of the board shall be Commissioner of Customs?

Mr. WALLACE. No.

Mr. BRODEUR. If I understand rightly the complaint made against Mr. Watters, this officer should not be appointed chairman of the board. I observe in an article published in the 'Trade Review' in October last, the following:—

Is the Mr. Thomas J. Watters above referred to the same Mr. Watters who is known as Her Majesty's Commissioner of Customs for the Dominion? If so, our merchants may well view with alarm the augmentation of the private business interests of the Commissioner of Customs, since, as affairs stood before the consummation of this big mining deal, a number of our merchants had the greatest difficulty in getting important questions affecting their interests in connection with the Customs attended to. Letters and telegrams involving most weighty considerations remaining unanswered for an unwarranted length of time.

The charge made in the 'Trade Review' is a very serious one; it is that the Commissioner of Customs has not answered letters and is interested in private business which occupies the greater part of his time. Under these circumstances, I think the Government should not have appointed him to a new position. That was why I asked whether Mr. Watters was appointed by law or under Order in Council. If he was appointed by law, it would be different; but when such a serious charge is made against him, that he does not answer letters, that many important matters are delayed and that he has too much work to do, I do not think it is fair and just, on the part of the Government, to give him a new position. I suppose the Controller is aware of the charge that has been brought against Mr. Watters, and I suppose he has made an investigation; and if so, I presume the Controller will state the results to the committee.

Mr. WALLACE. Charges were made against Mr. Watters by a gentleman living in Ottawa. These were submitted to Mr. Watters, and I received his reply to the effect that he is not now connected with any business interest, that he had purchased property and become interested in mining property, but that he is not now interested in any such property directly—that he has disposed of his property by deed or otherwise. I may say that Mr. Watters is giving strict attention to the duties of his office, and the statements made that he was continually absent from his office were not correct. I was at the office every day and Mr. Watters was in attendance; I do not think he was away during the year any longer than would be covered by the holidays usually allowed to all officers of the Government.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the name of the party who brought the charge?

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Clemow.

Mr. McMULLEN. With respect to the proposed increase, I think that as Mr. Watters already receives $2,800 per annum salary, and $400 additional allowance, making $3,200, no addition is necessary. I do not think the Controller is justified in asking the committee to consent to an increase to

Mr. BRODEUR.

$3,600; $3,200 is a very respectable salary for a Commissioner of Customs, and I have no doubt that if the Controller was not in his present position, he would be very glad to have the opportunity of filling the position himself. The Controller should recast many of the rules and orders of the Council, and regulations connected with the collection of Customs. I have been looking over some of the port accounts, and I find that a great many do not collect the amounts paid for salaries. At Arichat, $2,600 is paid in salaries, and an increase of $100 is proposed, when the total receipts are $1,507. At Baddock, the receipts are $1,935, and the expenditure, $2,050. At Bridgetown, the receipts are $679; salaries, $860. At Margaretville, the salaries are $725; receipts, $650. Barrington, salaries, $1,410; receipts, $679. Port Hawkesbury, salaries, $1,320; receipts, $1,903. Port Hood, salaries, $975; receipts, $731. In the province of Quebec we find at Cookshire the salaries paid are $2,875, and an increase of $600 is proposed, while the receipts are $3,886. At Perce, the salaries are $1,200, and the receipts, $580. Here are a number of ports in which the entire salaries are double the collection. It is absurd to ask us for an increase of $600 at the port of Cookshire, where the entire receipts are only $3,800.

Mr. WALLACE. It is hardly fair to make a bald statement like that without an explanation. It is quite true that in some ports receipts are small, but these are preventive stations rather than collection stations. For instance, at Baddeck we have six different outports, and the whole expenditure is $1,500, divided between seven or eight men. Along the seashore and the frontier we have to have men watching so as to prevent smuggling, and the expenditure is in excess of the receipts. While that is the case, there are ports like Berlin, Ont., for instance, where the collection is $60,000 a year and only one officer is employed.

Mr. McMULLEN. A few evenings ago I drew attention to the fact that the North-west Mounted Police are utilized as preventive officers, and I dare say they do desirable service, but I think their expenses should be charged to the Customs account and not to the North-west Police expenditure.

Mr. WALLACE. They are all withdrawn from our custom service along the Manitoba frontier.

Mr. McMULLEN. The President of the Council stated the other night that their services are largely used as preventive officers.

Mr. WALLACE. That has been the case, but their services are now dispensed with in Manitoba. We pay a commission of 5 per cent on all collections made by these officers.

Mr. McMULLEN. Do they get that in addition to their salaries?

Mr. WALLACE. I presume so.

Mr. LANGELIER. This expenditure to prevent smuggling along the River St. Lawrence is money well employed. I would like to know from the Controller what steps he intends to take to put an end to that smuggling? A great deal of good was done some years ago, when the 'Constance' was put upon the track of the smugglers in the Gulf, but now again very great complaints are made of the smuggling of strong liquors and tobaccos. Complaints are made not only by those engaged in trade, but by the clergy and all the people at the head of the population below Quebec, that a large quantity of whisky is being smuggled into the country. I have been told by those who suffer from that smuggling that the only way to put a stop to it would be to station officers of the Customs Department at St. Pierre-Miquelon, who would frighten away these smugglers.

Mr. WALLACE. I am afraid they would frighten away the special officers first.

Mr. LANGELIER. Oh, no, they are quiet people on those islands, and the officers would be protected. It appears that the smugglers buy whisky in the United States, send it to St. Pierre Miquelon, which, being a free port, they pay no duty, and then they smuggle it into Canada, so that these islands have become the headquarters for that illicit trade. They get any manifesto they choose from the Customs authorities at St. Pierre. For instance, they will say they have a cargo of fish when they have really a cargo of whisky, and they will come on that manifesto into the St. Lawrence. After they leave St. Pierre-Miquelon it is almost impossible for the 'Constance' to catch them, as they have very fast schooners. Some time ago a great fuss was made about a seizure of smuggled whisky, but I was told in Quebec—whether correctly or not, I do not know—that the officers of the 'Constance' had been simply bamboozled. These clever smugglers buy an old rotten schooner in Quebec, and put six or seven barrels of water mixed with whiskey on her, and then some one goes to the Customs officers with the information, and they seize the rotten schooner; whereas, at the same time a very fast schooner with six or seven hundred barrels of strong liquor, lands her cargo and makes her escape. The officers go there on a fool's errand, and seize the whisky that is half water; the smugglers make a show of fight, and the customs officers come back to Quebec, speaking very highly of their exploit, and saying that their lives were in danger, when as a matter of fact there was no real attempt made to fight with them. While the officers are occupied with that rotten schooner, the large schooner with 500 barrels of whisky on board has time to land. I do not blame the officers, because smuggling has come to be an art, and is very thoroughly carried on. The only way to stop it is to station officers at St. Pierre et Miquelon, and to have them telegraph to any steamer that may be put on the track of the smugglers to arrest them. Even if there were no increased revenue, I think it would be worth all the money the Government are spending to stop that trade, which is demoralizing all the population along the banks of the lower St. Lawrence; yet I think the Government are receiving in revenue more than the $12,000 they are expending on this service. There was comparatively little smuggling last year, and of course if there is not so much smuggling there is so much more revenue derived from strong liquors. I do not blame the Government for spending this much. I think they should spend three times as much, if necessary, to put an end to that abominable trade, which is so demoralizing to the whole population in that part of the country.

Miscellaneous—Day books, ledgers, printing, stationery, etc., for various ports of entry and for legal expenses... $15,000

Mr. BRODEUR. What amount was expended last year for printing, and was any printing done outside of the Printing Bureau?

Mr. WALLACE. None whatever was done outside of the Printing Bureau. The expenditure for nine months of last year for printing was $8,455.

Mr. BRODEUR. On page D—261 of the Auditor-General's Report I see that $9,387 was expended for printing, and that $1,903 was expended on paper at the Printing Bureau. So I am led to believe that the first amount was not expended at the Printing Bureau. Am I right in that?

Mr. WALLACE. It was all expended through the Printing Bureau; no goods are ordered except through it. These goods are for all the ports of the Dominion. We supply stationery, printed forms and all the books of account required at all the customs ports of the Dominion.

Mr. BRODEUR. I see also on the same page that $300 was paid to Mr. J. S. Hall for legal services in the case of the Queen v. Denery et al. Could the hon. gentleman tell us when that case was instituted, and what kind of a case it was?

Mr. WALLACE. It was decided before I became Controller. All I had to do was to order the payment of the account. I have no personal knowledge of it; but I can find out.

Mr. BRODEUR. I find also an item of $49 paid to the same gentleman for ordinances. What are these ordinances?

Mr. WALLACE. That is the item of writs of assistance. These are the authority given to our officers through the Department of Justice to go into houses and search, and the Department of Justice charges us a fee for every one of these writs of assistance we require.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to ask the Controller of Customs whether there is any system of making known the treatment awarded to persons found guilty of smuggling? Is there any public report of how all such cases are dealt with?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think it would be advisable to publish a report. There are many cases in which a man unwittingly violates the law and incurs the penalty. To publish a report of such a case would be like branding him as a criminal.

Mr. MULOCK. That does not commend itself to my mind as a sufficient answer to the question. There are various ways of looking at the matter. One way, I think, is to see that the powers vested in the Government are exercised on general principles, and not in an arbitrary way. I am not making any charge, but there is a very great discretionary power in the department—the power of fining, of compromising fines, of confiscating property and so on. It appears to me that when an importer has violated the law, his case should be made public, so that public opinion will be directed at all times towards the manner in which the department exercises these extraordinary powers, and importers would be a great deal more careful. This would have the effect also of causing a uniform system of treatment to be adopted, and do away with the temptation to follow the arbitrary treatment in the old days when cases were decided by the rule of thumb, and the decision rendered depended more or less on the length of the chancellor's foot. This would have the effect of saving the department from importunities by political friends. How many such cases are adjudicated upon in a year on an average?

Mr. WALLACE. Two or three a day.

Mr. MULOCK. There is no reason why these two or three cases per day should not be given to the public, as are the numerous cases which go through the court? Let the press have access to the records, and I am satisfied that the public interests will be advanced by the publicity thus given to all these administrative acts.

Mr. WALLACE. Parliament can always have the fullest information of all the transactions as in the case of any other department. Only the other day information was given as to the penalties imposed on a Toronto merchant, quite a number of years ago; and had a similar question been asked with reference to other merchants at the same time, the information would have been equally given. There is no desire for secrecy beyond that which prevails in any department; and in no department of the Government are the books open to every newspaper correspondent who wishes to gain information as to any of the transactions.

Mr. LANGELIER. Are those men who are employed as special officers in various parts of the country restricted to certain districts? Is their jurisdiction local?

Mr. WALLACE. They are all under the charge of Mr. McMichael, who can send them wherever they are required.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. How are they paid?

Mr. WALLACE. Usually a salary of $50 a month and a share of the seizures.

Mr. LANGELIER. Some of them act in a very arbitrary manner, which they would not dare to do if restricted to a particular locality. I know of a case in which a Mr. Belton made a claim on a manufacturer in the city of Quebec. He went to that manufacturer and said: You have a machine there which has been undervalued in passing through the custom-house, and unless you pay me so much money I shall seize the machine. The party resisted saying: I do not know what is the price of the machine, I saw it mentioned in a catalogue sent to me by a firm in the United States. I did not go there and I do not know the value of the machine. It was passed at the custom-house at exactly the price I paid for it. But the other said: That is not the market price at the place of manufacture, and I am going to seize the machine. Of course the firm did not want to be blackmailed—for it was simply blackmail. This man came again to the manufacturer and said: You have another machine—the machine had been in use five or six years—and that also was undervalued. He could not get anything out of him for that machine, for it was worn out, and they told him he might seize it if he liked. In the end he accepted a half or a third of what he had demanded in the first place. There must surely be some rule in these matters. These officers cannot go about exacting just what they please. If he was right in the first place as to the fine that should have been imposed, he had no right to accept less. But when he saw it was a case of accepting less or going to law, he compromised. I do not speak from hearsay; these facts came within my personal knowledge; I was a witness to the occurrence.

Mr. WALLACE. I will be glad to investigate if the hon. gentleman will give me such particulars as he has of the case.

Mr. LANGELIER. This is an old affair—about three years ago.

Mr. WALLACE. It is not too old to be investigated.

Mr. LANGELIER. The hon. gentleman must admit that it is a most undesirable system, that an officer of that kind should be at liberty to exact what he can get. It is simply an abuse of power. We must not forget the position in which these people find themselves. For instance, a man threatens to seize a machine which is absolutely necessary to the running of a manufactory. Of course he could get almost any sum of money, for the parties would rather pay than to have their establishment shut down perhaps for weeks.

Mr. WALLACE. Suppose that in the judgment of the seizing officer a certain fine should be paid. It is not for him to carry out that decision. He must communicate the case to the department.

Mr. LANGELIER. But in this case it was not reported to the department. The officer acted as though he had absolute power.

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. gentleman will furnish me the names, so that the case may be identified, I will show him the evidence, the statement made by the seizing officer and all the facts in the possession of the department.

Mr. LANGELIER. I shall be glad to give the hon. Controller the facts, for this case came under my personal knowledge. The parties came to me and asked me if it was possible that citizens could legally be treated in that way. I suggested that he should allow the parties to deposit the money on condition that they should have time to deal with the Department of Customs. But he would not accept anything of that kind. He wanted the money and said if he did not get it he would seize the machine and stop the establishment.

Mr. WALLACE. I will investigate the matter if the hon. gentleman will give me the facts.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 29th June, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DOMINION DAY ADJOURNMENT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, since I drew the attention of the House to the subject of an adjournment over Monday next, I have ascertained that there is a very general feeling in the House in favour of the observance of that holiday ; and I sympathize very much indeed, as I have done on previous occasions, with our friends who feel the burden of a long session, and the inconvenience to business which results from their long absence while attending to their parliamentary duties. Nevertheless, considering the fact that the House has very seldom to adjourn in order to observe a holiday peculiar to Canada, as this one is, because our sessions are generally past when that holiday arrives, I think the observance of it will be satisfactory to the majority of the members of the House ; and I am sure it will be very satisfactory to the country, if members are willing to make the sacrifice on this occasion. For these reasons I move

That when the House adjourns this day, it shall stand adjourned until Tuesday, 3rd July, at 3 o'clock.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the evidently general desire that we should adjourn over Monday, I shall not, for my part, offer any opposition to this motion. But, perhaps, Sir, it would not be amiss if at this time I reminded the right hon. gentleman that in future years it would be a great public convenience if, instead of waiting till the 15th of March before calling Parliament together, he were to call it together much earlier, say in January.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, that seems to be the general desire at this time of the year.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. TARTE. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the House to an interview published in 'L'Événement,' of the 28th instant, between the Hon. Thomas McGreevy and one of the editors of the paper, as follows :

I never spoke to Mr. Tarte since April, 1890, when those papers were published in the Canadien, nor did I, either directly or indirectly, hold any intercourse with him, since that time. I cannot therefore have told him nor did I actually tell him that I had given Mr. Justice Bossé a cheque, in connection with the trial in question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I never said, either in the House or elsewhere, that Mr. McGreevy told me that he had given a cheque to Mr. Bossé. What I said, and what I repeat, is this, that a gentleman came to me, as he went to some other members of this House, and told us that Mr. McGreevy told him that he had given a cheque to Mr. Bossé. I said that in this House, and I never said anything else. Unfortunately for us, there is great inaccuracy in the French reports of the House. Every member of the House who speaks in French will bear me out in saying that we are not reported as we should be. I am not prepared to say which of the two reporters is not a stenographer ; but every member of the House who speaks in French will bear me out when I say that we are not reported verbally. I want to put myself right on this point, because I do not want to appear as having said things that I did not say. Every one knows what I said here: I did not say anything more.

CHIEF JUSTICE OF QUEBEC.

House resolved itself into committee on the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide, with respect to the Court of Queen's Bench and the Superior Court in the province of Quebec, that if the Chief Justice resides at Quebec, the judge residing at Montreal who is appointed by the Governor General in Council to perform the duties of Chief Justice in the district of Montreal as it is comprised and defined for the Court of Review, or, if the Chief Justice resides at Montreal, the judge residing at Quebec who is appointed by the Governor General in Council to perform the duties of Chief Justice in the district of Quebec as it is comprised and defined for the Court of Review, shall receive in addition to his other salary, $1,000.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have to ask the committee to make a verbal correction in the resolution by leaving out the reference to the Court of Queen's Bench, in the second line of the resolution. It should be only with respect to the Superior Court. The draughtsman was under the impression that that reference had to be made, inasmuch as the enactment in the Revised Statutes is especially made an enactment with reference to the Courts of Queen's Bench and Superior Court. Of course, this particular amendment relates only to the Superior Court. The two sections of the Quebec Statutes, 2316 and 2317, Revised Statutes, provide:

2316. Whenever the Chief Justice shall reside in the city of Quebec, the judge appointed by competent authority to perform the duties of the Chief Justice of the said Superior Court, shall perform such duties in the district of Montreal as it is comprised and defined for the Court of Review, and he shall reside in the city of Montreal.

2317. Whenever the Chief Justice shall reside in the city of Montreal, the judge appointed by competent authority to perform the duties of the Chief Justice of the said Superior Court, shall perform such duties in the district of Quebec, as it is comprised and defined for the Court of Review, and he shall reside in the city of Quebec.

The position is thus made of the person performing the duties of chief justice in one city or the other, whereas the provision of our own statute, which it is now proposed to alter, is that the remuneration of the acting chief justice is to fall to the senior puisne judge of the bench in the city where the chief justice is not residing. This is to put our statute in such a shape as to conform to the organization provided by the Quebec Legislature.

Mr. TARTE.

Mr. LAURIER. Who is the competent authority?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I presume by that is meant the authority having the appointment, which is, of course, the Governor in Council.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not exactly understand the words concerning the Court of Review. We only have one Superior Court, and the Court of Review is simply a branch of the Superior Court. This point has been put several times before the courts of Quebec, and it has always been decided that the Court of Review is not a distinct and separate court, but a branch of the Superior Court. It would be better to strike out the words concerning the Court of Review. I do not think that in the statute any mention is made of the Court of Review, and I do not think it is necessary to make any mention of it now.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I see the force of the hon. gentleman's suggestion, but I think it is not the Superior Court and the Court of Review which is referred to here, but the district of Montreal and the district of Quebec as defined by the Court of Review.

Resolution reported.

N.W.T. IRRIGATION.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 134) respecting the utilization of the waters of the North-west Territories for irrigation and other purposes.—(Mr. Daly.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 40.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This seems to be rather extraordinary power to confer.

Mr. DALY. The section is copied word for word from the Dominion Lands Act, and no grievance has arisen under its operation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister will see that the party might be subpoenaed from the most distant part of the North-west Territories.

Mr. DALY. It does not say that the Minister only may subpoena, but that "the Minister or any one specially authorized by him" may do so. So the party does not need to come down there. We have had occasion to enforce this clause as part of the Dominion Lands Act. It is done through the inspectors of Dominion Lands agencies.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am not saying that the power will necessarily be abused, but it seems to me that so long as the Minister proposes to deal with the party, he ought not to deal with him outside the territory in which he resides.

Mr. DALY. It is never done, and will not be done.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The law ought to provide that it shall not be done.

On section 44,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What are the means for ascertaining the quantity of water to which the party is entitled? You can ascertain the quantity he is using, but how is the amount he is entitled to to be ascertained?

Mr. DALY. By clause 36 the unit of measurement is fixed. That clause provides:

Under this Act the discharge of one cubic foot of water per second shall be the unit of measurement of flowing water, and the cubic foot or acre foot the unit of measurement of quantity. The acre foot is equivalent to 43,560 cubic feet.

By that process of measurement they can ascertain how much he is entitled to.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They can ascertain the quantity if they know how much he was entitled to; but the hon. gentleman will see that my question as to the determination of this particular provision, lies behind that. Supposing a man is using water, is there anything in the Bill—I remember nothing—by which you ascertained what quantity of water he is entitled to per acre, or per 100 acres?

Mr. DALY. No, that would be a matter of contract between himself and the company, as to how many acres he is entitled to have irrigated.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This seems to relate to the quantity to which the company is entitled—"Provided also, that no person who at such date is using the water of the said works, shall be deprived of the quantity of water he is entitled to." I do not know how that is to be ascertained.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman will see that in subsection 2 of section 49, the Governor in Council may "define the duty of water according to locality and soil." That gets over the difficulty.

Bill reported.

SUBSIDIES TO THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC.

Bill (No. 150) respecting subsidies granted to the Government of the province of Quebec by statute 8 of 1884, was read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When this matter was under discussion, I called the attention of the First Minister to the fact that, apparently, there was no item in our liabilities corresponding to this amount of $2,500,000, and the right hon. gentleman will remember he agreed to look into the matter and offer an explanation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I made the explanation in answer to the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) in the absence of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), on the following day. The answer is that the amount did not appear in the Public Accounts; it has been treated ever since the passage of the Act of 1884, as an annual charge.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In what shape does it come then?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is like a subsidy payment.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Under what head does it appear?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The public debt. Bill reported.

THE COMMON SCHOOL FUND.

Bill (No. 151) respecting the Common School Fund was read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

House proceeded to consider resolutions reported from Committee of Supply.

Royal Military College..... $70,000

Mr. MULOCK. Before this motion is concurred in, I desire to offer a few observations. Some sessions ago I called the attention of the Government to the manner in which this institution was being used, in the hope that attention having been directed to it, the Government would have seen fit to reorganize the institution and limit its sphere to the object Parliament had in view when determining to establish the college. I regret to say, however, that so far as my research has gone, the only effect of attention having been called to the school has been to intensify the evil of increasing the expense and ignoring the object of Parliament in establishing the school. What was the object of Parliament? It is set forth in the statute itself. In 1874 Parliament was asked to establish a military college, and without at this moment referring to the cost expected to be involved, let me call the attention of the House to the intention of Parliament on that occasion. I will read from the Act, chapter 36 of the Statutes of 1874, the Act establishing this military college. It reads as follows:—

Whereas it is expedient to make further provision for the education of officers of the militia in military knowledge and matters connected with military instruction, Her Majesty enacts as follows:—

Section 1. An institution shall be established for the purpose of imparting a complete education in all branches of military tactics, fortification, engineering, and general scientific knowledge on subjects connected with and necessary to a knowledge of the military profession, and for qualifying officers to command and for staff appointments, such institution to be known as the Military College, and to be located in some one of the garrison towns of Canada.

That statute declared the object Parliament had in view in establishing that school, and the purpose for which the school should be utilized, namely, imparting a military education, and no more. The institution was to be established in a garrison town, and on reference to the remarks made by the First Minister at that day, it appeared that the First Minister stated that the institution was to be established in a military town where it would be possible to utilize existing buildings and thus render it unnecessary to erect independent buildings for the purposes of a school; and further the Minister stated that the expenses would not exceed $8,000 a year, the staff of the school numbering two or three professors. That was the picture held up before the people in order to obtain their consent to the establishment of this school. How has the spirit of the Act been lived up to? The object was to provide properly qualified persons to take charge of the permanent corps, not to educate persons in a general way for the ordinary affairs of life, and the inducement was held out to the youths of the country to attend this school upon the representation that when qualified, that is to say when they graduated, the graduates of the school would get the first chance to be appointed in the military corps of Canada. So we had on paper a school established by Parliament for the purpose of training men in military knowledge to be subsequently appointed to positions in the permanent corps of Canada, and thereby extend the usefulness of the school to the militia service of Canada. But the spirit of the Act and the expressed policy of Parliament in relation to it has been disregarded from time to time, until now the school has come to be merely an educational institution, imparting an education it is true of a military character, but also of a general character, and the main object of the statute seems to have been lost sight of. For example, I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Militia to the regulations and orders of the militia of Canada, and particularly to regulation 990, which is as follows:—

The Royal Military College is established for the purpose of imparting a complete education in all branches of military tactics, fortification, engineering and general scientific knowledge on subjects connected with and necessary to a thorough knowledge of the military profession and for qualifying officers for commands and for staff appointments.

Then section 8 goes on to say:

In addition the course of instruction is such as to afford a thoroughly practical scientific and sound training in all departments which are essential to a high and general modern education.

Mr. MULOCK.

By what authority is that statement placed in the Militia Regulations of Canada? There is no Act of Parliament warranting it—it is in direct opposition to the Act of Parliament. It states that this school was to be established for the only purpose of imparting a military education. Here we have it stated: "In addition, the course of instruction is such as to afford a thoroughly practical, scientific and sound training in all departments which are essential to a high and general modern education." Well, Sir, if a military training had such a result as a mere incident of the training, one could not find fault if a military training were so beneficial. But the regulation expressly intimates: that a modern education, a general education, an education qualifying persons for various walks in life other than military, is now one of the principal purposes of the school. In that way there has been an absolute disregard of the intentions of Parliament, and consequently an unnecessary increase of the public expenditure. I need not for one moment press upon this House the impropriety of the Dominion of Canada embarking in the cause of general education. It is contrary to the Imperial Act of Confederation itself, which never contemplated such education as is here held out to be one of the functions of this college. Education of this kind, education according to the perverted use being made of the college, is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the various provinces. The people of the different provinces have established their school system and the college system, and for the Dominion Parliament to duplicate that system is a pure waste of public money. It is clear from these regulations which I have read, that the intention of this Parliament, to say nothing of the intention of our Confederation Act are wholly set at naught. I called attention to this matter a couple of sessions ago, and I was in hopes that that would have been sufficient to have induced a change of policy on the part of the Government and a corresponding advantage to the public. On that occasion the Minister of Militia (Sir Adolphe Caron) had just vacated office, and the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Bowell) had succeeded him. During the incumbency of the then Minister of Militia (Sir Adolphe Caron) the matter had also been slightly referred to, but it was pointedly brought to the attention of the House in the session of 1892. On that occasion many of the figures and arguments that I have to trouble the committee with now were presented, and the Minister (Mr. Bowell), fresh in office, gave this pledge to Parliament. I quote his words from 'Hansard': "Whether some attempt should be made to reduce the expenditure, is a matter which shall receive the attention of the Government." At that time the expenditure for the year was $63,949.31, and the Minister (Mr. Bowell) declared that the Government would give attention to the matter, with a view of reducing the expense. Now, what has been the result? A year has since elapsed, and instead of there being a reduction of expense, as the Minister pledged himself to, the expense for the fiscal year just past is $70,584.73, or an increase of nearly $7,000. One might very properly look into the internal management of this institution, in order to see the occasion for this expense. According to the return laid on the Table this session, there are fifty-eight students at that college, and to impart to this number of students a military training, and also as this prospectus says: a general education of military character, we find that the staff engaged to train these fifty-eight men consists of a commandant, six professors engaged in teaching the ordinary civil branches I presume, a number of military professors and instructors—I do not know how many—and various other officers, numbering in all fifteen. Then we have three staff-sergeants, three sergeant-majors, nine labourers, storemen, eleven servants, or a total number of thirty-six, according to the Auditor-General's Report, engaged in looking after an institution, which teaches fifty-eight students. Now, what has been the product of this institution since it was established? The Act of Parliament passed in 1874, and the school was established in 1876. The course of instruction contemplates men entering and attending four years, after which they are graduated, the result of the school being tested, and properly so, by the attainments of its graduates. Since the establishment of the school there have been 195 graduates. The expenditure, instead of having been limited to the modest sum of $8,000 a year for the staff, and a few thousand more for incidental expenses, has grown to be some $70,000 a year, and from a return laid upon the Table of the House during the present session, it appears that the public exchequer has been taxed to the extent of $1,140,763.76 for pay and maintenance alone. In addition to this cost, there is an item for repairs, of $69,058.72. There was also expended on the buildings—I suppose in the erection of buildings—$110,321.88. Now, for the purposes of the calculation I have made, I do not charge the whole of that capital account to the cost up to date, because these buildings are there yet, and will be useful for the carrying on of the school; but I think it is fair, in order to make the calculation that I propose to submit to the House, that I should charge as part of the annual maintenance a reasonable sum by way of interest upon the cost of the buildings. That rate of interest, which I venture to submit is a reasonable one, I have taken at 4 per cent. If, therefore, we add to the two items I have given for pay and maintenance and for repairs, interest at 4 per cent per annum upon the capital invested in buildings—not for the whole period, but for a portion of the repairs, say for 14 years instead of 18 years—we have to add to the items I have mentioned the sum of $61,779.76.

In other words, for whatever good the country has received from this school up to date, it has cost us, in money paid out, the total sum of $1,271,602.24. In connection with this, I may say that the students have paid, in fees since the establishment of the school, in all, $279,917.80; and this, I propose to take account of in order to show the exact cost of the school to the country in comparison with the results realized. Now, testing the work done by the total number of graduates, 195, we find that their education has cost the country and the graduates, together, the sum of $6,521 each. If we deduct from this amount the contribution of the graduates, which I make to be $1,436 per capita, we have a net cost to the country for every graduate of that college, from its establishment to this moment, of $5,085. Now, what has the country got in return for this? I am not going to dwell upon the lavish and luxurious style of education which prevails in the institution. It does seem an extraordinary thing for Canada that an education at the Royal Military College should have cost the students and the country combined no less a sum than $6,521 for a period of four years, or an average of over $1,500 a year, at least four times what it ought to cost, and what it does cost in the ordinary educational institutions of the country. But whether it is a rich man's school or a poor man's school, I ask what has the country got in return for the 195 graduates who have been the product of this institution at this expense? The return laid upon the Table of the House has given some information as to what has become of these 195 graduates; but there is an attempt made in this return to minimize the failure of the college by including here and there cadets, and showing what has become of them. I submit that the real test is to take the case of the graduates, and ascertain what they have been doing since they left the college. I cannot, at this moment, lay my hands upon the exact part of the return bearing on that point; but, speaking from memory, I think it shows that some seventy-seven have obtained appointments in the Imperial service, and that of the balance, nine graduates and two cadets have been appointed to positions in the permanent corps, and two graduates to the Royal Military College staff. In other words, of all the graduates and undergraduates of the Military College, from its commencement to this moment, but thirteen in all occupy positions in connection with the permanent corps. It is true, that of the graduates, some thirty in all have been appointed to positions in the departments; and on this point I would dwell for one moment. I question whether the country will sanction a system of education such as this, if its end and aim is to educate the youth of the country in order to qualify them to fill ordinary civil positions in the public service. I doubt if there is a single branch of the public service that requires the existence of the Royal Military College in order to train men properly to discharge the work of any of those departments. It is quite true, I have no doubt—it ought to be the case—that any graduate of the college who has received the education, military and civil, which they represent they are now giving, would make a most useful public servant, and be especially valuable in connection with our Public Works Department or our Department of Railways and Canals. But the question is, whether it is necessary to have such a college to promote that sort of education, inasmuch as there are in the country other institutions specially engaged in doing that work, and doing it well. So that I do not think it can be taken as an argument for the present management of the college that thirty of its graduates have been landed into comfortable positions for life in the civil service. I think it is going too far to pay $5,000 of public money to qualify a man to enter the civil service, there to be taken care of through life, and pensioned at the end of his life until he shuffles off this mortal coil. So I decline to test the utility of the college by any results which have been derived in connection with civil appointments. But, for the purpose of argument, I will give the House the full benefit of all such appointments, and see what the practical result of this mode of utilizing the graduates of the college has been. The Government return shows that of all the graduates and undergraduates from the commencement to this moment, but forty-three are engaged in the public service, military and civil. Eleven graduates are in the permanent corps; two cadets are in the permanent corps, and thirty graduates, are scattered through the departments at Ottawa and elsewhere—forty-three in all. It has cost to educate these forty-one graduates and two cadets, to the country and themselves, $29,577. If you deduct from that the contribution by the students themselves, it leaves a balance of $23,063 as the net cost for the education for each one of those men who are in the public service to-day. If we throw out of the calculation the two cadets—because I do not think we can fairly test the utility of a college by pointing out what has become of the men who, for one reason or another, have refused to receive the education necessary to give them a degree—if we test it by reference to the forty-one graduates in the public service, we find that of these forty-one graduates, nine have entered the permanent corps, and two are in the military college, the remaining thirty having lucrative positions in the civil service. It has cost in all to educate these forty-one the sum of $831,014. Deduct the sum of $6,827, which is the contribution of each cadet towards his education, and you have, as the net cost to the country for the education of each one of these forty-one persons, no less a sum than $24,187. I would like to know why we should, in ascertaining the good results flowing from this institution, credit it with the educating of thirty men for civil appointment here and elsewhere, inasmuch as that same education could have been perfectly well obtained in our various other educational institutions throughout the country, without the extra cost of one dollar. Does any one say that the thirty graduates of this college who are in the civil service, could not have been as well fitted for that service if they had studied at their own homes or attended other colleges in their own provinces, without any cost whatever to the country except that incurred in maintaining local institutions? Therefore, it is reasonable—especially having regard to the fact that the only object of the establishment of this institution was to prepare men for military appointments or to prepare men to educate our militia—to conclude that the only fair test is to ascertain what the country is obtaining in return for the expenditure in the direction Parliament moved, when it sanctioned the expenditure on this institution. Parliament agreed that the object of this scheme was to furnish men with a scientific military education for the benefit of the Canadian militia. And the question now is, how far has that object been attained by this vast expenditure of public money to which I have referred? I want to give full credit to the school, and assuming that the thirteen military men, eleven graduates and two cadets, now engaged in connection with the militia of Canada, are highly educated, possess all the military education and skill that the school could most successfully impart—giving credit to the institution for having educated these thirteen people to the highest degree, I find that the total cost of the education of these men amounts per head to $97,815, from which we must deduct the contribution of these students, as I have done in the other cases, amounting to $21,532. Or, in other words, these thirteen men, now in the public service, have cost the Dominion $76,283 each for the education given them. But I must eliminate also from the list two of these thirteen, who never acquired the education that the Act contemplated, who did attend the college, but left, either because they failed to pass the examination, or because, for other reasons, did not choose to pursue their studies. Therefore, the sum total of the whole transaction is this, that since the college was established for the purpose of imparting military education in connection with the Canadian militia, there have been appointed, according to the spirit of the Act, eleven men and no more. So that the actual result of the college has been that eleven graduates have been appointed to military positions in Canada at a cost per capita of $116,600, and deducting from that the amount realized by the college in fees, namely, the sum of $25,427, we have this net result, that it has cost $90,153 for every one of the eleven graduates now filling any position, as contemplated by the Act, in connection with the militia of Canada. And that is not due to the fact that there have not been vacancies in the Militia Department. There have been, during the period I have referred to, manifold the number of cadets appointed, and I am told that the department has systematically ignored the graduates, and made the appointments solely for political reasons. The Government has utilized largely the college in order to furnish them with extra political patronage, ignoring the interests of the militia and the object of Parliament. I will read a paragraph from a letter sent me, and the hon. Minister will know how far it is correct. I know nothing of the facts myself, but speaking of the policy of the Government, the writer says :

The practice is to appoint gentlemen with political influence, without any qualifications, and then allow them to take a course of only three months in their own schools and a further course of three months attending lectures at the Royal Military College at Kingston. If that is considered sufficient education for the officers of the permanent corps, it is difficult to see the utility of maintaining the Royal Military College and having cadets spending years acquiring that knowledge which the Government does not utilize after they have graduated. I need not point out to you that the amount of military knowledge obtained in this three months course at Kingston is necessarily very elementary. The previous course at their own schools consists but of drill, &c., and of course none of the higher branches of the profession. The regulations restricting commissions in the permanent corps, is apparently held out as an inducement to young men to go to the college, under the belief that the Government will give them the preference for commissions in the permanent corps, and it is unfair that they should be ignored. At the present moment—

I call the attention of the Minister of Militia to this statement, made in March last, the date of the letter, I do not know whether it is correct or not :

At the present moment there are two officers of the permanent cavalry at Winnipeg, one appointed in 1882, and the other in 1885, taking this elementary course at Kingston. These officers are away from their duty as instructors at the cavalry school at Winnipeg, and should be officers competent to give that instruction. Again, the graduates of the college do not attach themselves to military corps at camps of instruction, &c., because they would have over them permanent corps officers who know very little of their profession.

There was recently a vacancy in the Militia Department, of assistant to the militia architect, and it was naturally supposed that some graduate possessing scientific knowledge of military engineering would have been appointed, but, in place of this, a young man was appointed who does not possess any military education or training. Now, Sir, I happened to read a reference to the very policy of the Government in the report of the college laid upon the Table last session. But in connection with what I stated a moment ago as to the object of the Act having been disregarded, and a general education being now apparently one of the main objects of the college, I will again emphasize that statement by quoting from the report of the commandant of the school to the Government, which is found in the report of the Department of Militia for the year 1891-92. Speaking of education, it says :

But fortunately the status of Canada, as a part of the Empire, has made it fitting and wise to modify the system of instruction followed at the Royal Military College, so that while the military demands of the country upon it, may be duly supplied, its cadets are trained to take their place amongst their fellow-countrymen, as highly and technically trained gentlemen, in most practical professions, and in a large measure prepared to enter the learned professions.

It certainly shows the progress made in disregarding the intention of Parliament when the school itself, in a public report, can openly announce that it is, totally disregarding the main objects which justified its establishment, that it is practically a training school for the learned professions. The report goes on to say :

We sincerely hope that the time is not far distant when the Government may feel themselves justified in giving full effect to their Order in Council, of a date certainly prior to 1882, in which it is declared that so soon as there are a sufficient number of eligible graduates, appointment to permanent militia corps will be made solely from this list.

In 1878 that pledge was given, and upon that pledge the 195 men that I have referred to, entered that college and pursued an undergraduate career. It goes on to say :

And after sufficient length of service and rank has been obtained by graduates, permanent militia offices will be filled therefrom.

The pledge was given to the country in 1878, a pledge which has found its place in the public records, and yet it has never been lived up to. The report goes on to say :

If untrained gentlemen are better qualified than the technically trained military graduates of this college, to officer the Canadian permanent corps, then indeed, it must be admitted that—for military purposes—the school is at present superfluous.

I need not comment upon that statement, it is made by the commandant of the school. Now, what do I find as showing the effect of this departure from and disregard of the object of the Act? In the report of the college laid upon the Table this session, the commandant, reporting to the Minister of Militia in reference to the school, says :

Recently as the college has been established, and limited as is the accommodation it affords—turning out from ten to fifteen graduates a year—its students are to be found in the church, practising law, medicine, agriculture and civil engineering, engaged in commerce, railway management, and in private and public companies, employed in postal departments, in ordnance factories, in the Dominion Customs Department, the Geological Department, the Marine and Fisheries Department, and serving in the North-west Mounted Police force, in British Colonial employment, in the Canadian permanent militia, and in Her Majesty's regular forces.

And no doubt they will be found in the various walks of life so long as the system is maintained of conducting this school as an ordinary high school or university, instead of confining its operations to the purposes for which it was established; and so long as that takes place, so long will you have to maintain an enormous staff such as this, until the people in indignation decide to abolish the school altogether. I can understand how the hon. gentleman can, in a spirit of boasting, point to the glory reaped by Canada from having a military school where young Canadians can be trained and graduated into the Imperial army. But, Sir, don't you think that if that was the only object of the maintenance of the school, it would have been better to have allowed these seventy-seven men to take their military training in some of the old-established schools of England? Surely we are not, of this age, going to maintain a military college in Canada which, in fourteen years, sends seventy-seven officers to the Imperial army and eleven to the Canadian forces. I submit, therefore that the Government is censurable in the highest degree for their perversion of the object of this school, and unless they recede at an early moment from this false position, and comply with the spirit of the Act, by reducing the staff, and by altering the course of study so as to limit it strictly to the kind of study intended by the Act, the course of public opinion, I think, will demand a more radical treatment of the whole question. Was it part of the intent of Parliament at the time that this should be a school receiving young men with the merest rudiments of education, that they should be taken in hand, as in high schools and in colleges, and taught English history, French and German and the ordinary subjects to be found in the curriculum of every one of our provincial teachers' institutes? Sir, that was not the object of the establishment of this school; and I impress upon the Minister now that he ought at the earliest possible moment to thin out the staff and bring back the expenditure strictly to what is necessary in order to maintain that school, or else assume the responsibility of an indignant community demanding its early abolition.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

Mr. MULOCK.

After Recess.

RELIEF OF JAMES ST. GEORGE DILLON.

Mr. McMULLEN (for Mr. Sutherland) moved second reading of Bill (No. 148) for the relief of James St. George Dillon.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I saw the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), who has charge of the Bill, and it was understood between us that the Bill should be postponed until Wednesday, when the private Bills will come up and when we expect to dispose of it.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I must dispute the premises upon which my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) bases his argument with respect to the Royal Military College—viz.: that the intention, when this college was first established, was that it should be a purely military institution. I find that the Hon. Mr. Ross, who had charge of the Bill to establish the institution, stated as follows. I quote from the 'Debates' of 1874:—

The question might now perhaps be suggested as to what would become of these cadets after the completion of their education. He thought it might be safely asserted that if they failed to receive immediate military employment, the several industries of the Dominion would absorb their services in the advancement of civil pursuits. The scientific knowledge and the habits of discipline which would be acquired at such a school would naturally fit them for various branches of civil employment, while they would always be ready to place themselves at the service of the Dominion should occasion arise. It would be impossible to make every cadet a competent officer for the higher commands, as the temperament and natural abilities of some might not fit them for military life. But then in that event, the public would have the advantage of their industry in various civil pursuits and their education and training would tend to make them more generally useful even as civilians.

That was the key-note of the speech of the hon. Minister in charge of the Bill for the establishment of the Royal Military College. I think that the return which was brought down to the House this session shows, that as far as practicable, a very fair amount of employment in Canada has been given to the graduates and cadets of the Royal Military College. I find that in the Imperial cavalry service sixteen graduates of the college received commissions. Now, as regards some of the commissions given, I may say that there was a period when the Imperial service was short of officers, and when the Imperial authorities were glad to get cadets from Kingston without waiting for them to graduate and gave them commissions in the Imperial service. In the Royal Engineers twenty-six gentlemen from the college received commissions. Among the engineers also some received commissions who had not graduated, their services being required before they had time to complete their school work. In the infantry, seventeen officers who were graduates and ten cadets received commissions. Appointments have been made to the Canadian Mounted Infantry, to the Royal Regiment of Canadian Infantry, to the staff of the Royal Military College and to the Mounted Police. In the civil service of the Dominion appointments have been made in the Geological Survey, in the Fishery Department, the Hydrographic Survey, the Marine Department, the Post Office Department, and the Militia Department. And in connection with this department, I may say that the hon. gentleman made a charge that I had given employment to a gentleman who was not a graduate of the Royal Military College. I did, for a couple of months, during this session, give employment to a young gentleman who was a graduate of the school of technology in Toronto. He was employed to do some work which was absolutely necessary. He is not now in the department. I did not employ him as a political favour, because the gentleman and all his friends belong to the party of gentlemen opposite. He got the position because he was eminently well fitted for it, and he discharged his duties during the short time he was employed in a highly satisfactory manner, and now he has gone back to the ordinary work of his profession as a civil engineer in outside work. Other appointments have been made in the Department of the Interior, in the Government cartridge factory, the Cornwall Canal works, the Soulanges Canal works, and one graduate is employed in the work of the delimitation of the boundary between Alaska and Canada. One appointment has been made on the Toronto Harbour works, and one in the Dominion Lands Branch of the Department of the Interior. One graduate is employed in the Department of Agriculture, and one as collector of customs, and one in the office of the Provincial Secretary of Ontario. So that in military and civil employment we have altogether, between the Imperial and Canadian service, 138 who were graduates or cadets of the college. I really think that is a very good showing. It never was contended for a moment that Canada was a military country, or that it could by any possibility furnish military employment to all the graduates of the college. And I do not think that the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, when he decided upon establishing the college, ever thought for a moment of establishing it upon purely military basis or with a view to giving solely military instruction; and what I have read from the remarks of the Minister of Militia of that day in introducing the Bill convinces me that it was the intention, while fitting them to take military service if necessary, to employ the graduates, as far as possible, in civil engineering on the public works of the country. I received a report from General Herbert on this subject, and he said that, according to his calculation, there might be on an average possibly two vacancies annually in the Canadian permanent force. I may say that I am giving graduates of the college preference in the permanent force; but I think we should also consider the claims of the militia of the country as well, and even if we were to give all possible vacancies in the permanent force to graduates of the college, only two graduates each year could be employed, and therefore the vacancies would not in any degree absorb the number of graduates turned out, who number from thirteen to fifteen each year. It is my desire to give employment as far as possible to the graduates, and a number of them are being employed at the present time. The General in a memorandum states that an experiment in regard to providing temporary employment for the graduates is now being made, the Quartermaster-General employing eight of them in a topographical survey in the Eastern Townships, and as the work on which they are engaged progresses, a large number might be employed in future. I find that on an important occasion when the militia's services were called into requisition, the graduates of the college were found exceedingly useful. In a debate which occurred during the session of 1885, as reported in 'Hansard,' the following remarks were made:—

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). Would the hon. gentleman inform us how many military school graduates are now in active service in the Northwest?

Mr. CARON. As far as I can remember, there are twenty-six in the force at the front, and that is really a very large percentage.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is nearly all who have graduated and are in the country.

Mr. CARON. Yes, and that includes the men who are in the infantry schools and also the General's aide-de-camp, and three in the Mounted Police.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am very glad to hear that statement: it shows conclusively these young men have all done their duty.

In a debate which took place in the House in 1881 an hon. member who was a member of the Opposition at that time said:

I have had much pleasure in visiting the Royal Military College during several years, have seen the working of the institution and have one of my boys there. I must say with all due deference to several hon. members who have spoken on the subject that I know of no institution in this country as well deserving of the money spent on it, and if five times as much was spent a good return would be given to the Dominion.

The present Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, Mr. Kirkpatrick, who at that time resided in Kingston, offered some remarks which may be of interest to the House. He said:

I think it is right to say a few words with respect to the Military College vote in consequence of the remarks made by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), wherein he seemed to think the staff of the college has been unnecessarily increased in cost during the last two or three years. I am sure if he will reflect he will see that the cost of the staff a few years ago when the college was started could not be expected to be so great as that of the present day, when the college is in full working order. I think the college has not failed in any degree to give the country the value which it was thought it should render when it was originated. If the work done by the staff be compared with the Toronto University, and the total cost of the two staffs be compared the comparison will be in favour of the Military College. The salaries of the professors at Toronto University aggregate considerably over $35,000, whereas the salaries at the Kingston College amount to only $26,000. Then the staff of professors at Toronto University teach only five months in the year; and the Kingston professors teach ten months in the year, and the professors are not only professors, but do the duty of tutors, and are with the students from early morning until ten o'clock at night. I know from experience that the staff at Kingston is as hard-working and does its duty as faithfully as any staff could possibly do.

I might read a great many more remarks offered by hon. members on both sides of the House which were favourable to the continuance of the college, and it was quite a surprise to me to see the stand taken by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), who is supposed to be a friend of education, and who has distinguished himself by the way he has promoted the welfare and prosperity in a broader sense, of the Provincial University. I do not consider that a return of the cost of each student at Toronto University will show as low an expenditure per head as a return of the students of the Royal Military College. I have not the figures worked out, but I will have them worked out at a future date. No one proposes to curtail the usefulness of the Provincial University because a return in dollars and cents is not immediately shown. Take Upper Canada College: Every student there costs $3,500 annually. Still, on account of the usefulness of the college, in the wisdom of the majority it is retained and it is flourishing, and I believe it is a very useful institution.

Mr. MULOCK. The figures which the hon. gentleman is giving to the House are entirely erroneous.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I am perfectly certain I am correct, and the figures will astonish the hon. gentleman. I am saying at the present moment that every student in Upper Canada College costs over $3,000 annually.

Mr. MULOCK. That is a great cost; but I have nothing to do with Upper Canada College.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron).

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I am merely showing that we cannot measure the usefulness of an institution by taking an account of the capital expenditure, and considering the number of students, then calculating the cost per head, and saying they cost so much. I do not mean to say that the Royal Military College is perhaps all that the hon. gentleman who established it would desire it to be; but we are not a great military nation, and we are disposed to walk in the ways and cultivate the arts of peace. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) would not wish me to largely increase the permanent force in order to find military occupation for the graduates of the college. It is a fortunate thing for us that we do not require the services of many military men, and I may assure the House that so far as my policy is concerned I desire to give employment to the graduates who are trained at the college, and I desire to employ them either in the civil or military service of Canada, but in the course of my efforts to carry out that policy, I have found that in some instances graduates prefer not the civil or military service of Canada, but the profession of civil engineering. When a vacancy occurred in the artillery, I offered it to Mr. DeBoucherville, who passed last year with great distinction. So soon as a vacancy occurred I telegraphed that gentleman, offering him a position in the Military service. He declined the position, stating that he preferred a civil engineer's life to a position on the permanent force which is ill-paid and affords very little prospect of promotion in after life. I do not wonder at his choice; he is a man of distinguished ability, and will be able to win a high position in any walk of life he chooses to pursue. So far as the management of the college is concerned, I may say that before this matter was mooted by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock), I have given attention to the question as to whether it was possible to reduce the number of professors, and my attention to this subject will not be lessened in consequence of the remarks of the hon. gentleman. I intend to give it my special attention. I have been considering the wants of the college, and this year I have advertised the entrance examinations very extensively in all parts of the country, and I have hopes that there will be a larger attendance at this institution. I am with the hon. gentleman in the desire that a good education should be given there in the curriculum that is now taught. I am also with him in the desire that the money of the people should be expended usefully for the benefit of our young Canadians who choose to attend that college. But so far as I am concerned, I do not agree in the remarks of the hon. gentleman that the Kingston school is to be treated as a purely military institution, and that nothing should be taught there which would fit a man for the ordinary routine of life in other walks. I am carrying out as far as I can the idea of the gentleman who established the college, and I think it would be impossible for us to hold out more hopes to the graduates than the present inducements: that they shall get four commissions in the Imperial service, and that they shall get the preference as far as possible for positions in the permanent forces of Canada and the North-west Mounted Police. In many cases the graduates of the Kingston college have been appointed to these positions, and I think that is as far as I can reasonably go. I intend to give my personal attention to the matter and see if any policy can be devised by which the expenses of that institution, which have been gradually increasing, can be reduced. It is my anxiety that the college should be conducted in such a manner and at such a cost to the country as to increase its popularity, because I desire to make it, in the interest of the country, as useful an institution as it possibly can be.

Intercolonial Railway—Branch from or near Bedford to Dartmouth..... $198,000

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I move to alter the wording of this item, so that it may read, "from some point on the Intercolonial Railway between Windsor Junction and Bedford to Dartmouth." Windsor Junction is about four miles further, and it may be found more convenient to make the junction at a point beyond Bedford.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Would the alteration proposed, under any circumstances, increase the cost of the construction materially?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It probably will not. Bedford is a somewhat inconvenient place; there is a steep decline there. It is quite uncertain that the Railway Department will be asked to make the change, but they wish to consider the subject, and for that reason to have it left open.

Mr. McMULLEN. Have there been any preliminary surveys of the proposed route?

Mr. HAGGART. There was a survey made when the Intercolonial Railway was originally built. That is partially available, and the staff on the Intercolonial are surveying alternative lines to see which will be the cheapest and best.

Amendment agreed to, and resolution, as amended, concurred in.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Cornwall Canal..... $450,000

Mr. HAGGART. This sum is required to cover the following estimated expenditures during 1894-95:—

Sections 1 and 2.....	$100,000
Section 3.....	65,000
Section 4.....	75,000
Section 5.....	15,000
Sections 6 and 7.....	50,000
The dam at Sheik's Island.....	100,000
Section 8, Gilbert & Sons, blasting and dredging.....	25,000
Section 10.....	20,000

The estimated cost of the enlargement is $4,000,000. There has been expended to the 1st March, 1894, $2,922,192.

Mr. LAURIER. I notice that a few days ago the Exchequer Court gave judgment against this Government in favour of Gilbert & Sons, in connection with a contract which has been cancelled. Will the hon. gentleman explain?

Mr. HAGGART. That is on the Galops Rapids. It is the channel for which the Mackenzie Government, in 1876, let a contract for the purpose of building a channel outside the Galops for the passage of boats down.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That does not arise out of that transaction.

Mr. HAGGART. No. It is under that contract the judgment was obtained. The judgment, I believe, is for $200,000 with leave to move to lessen the amount. When I came into the department the work had been completed over three years. There was some dispute as to whether the parties were entitled to a certain amount. I contended they were not, but the court has given them judgment.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. Minister, in explaining the Sheik's Island dam, said he came to the conclusion, after examining the work himself, that the plans adopted by Mr. Page were entirely wrong, and that the changes made were made in the interest of the country. He said further that he was justified in letting the work to Davis & Sons without a tender, on the assumption that they had offered to do the work at $10,000 less than the engineer's estimate. I find, by the return brought down, upon examining prices and quantities according to the engineer's estimates, that the Government have over-estimated Davis & Sons to the amount of $67,295. It is rather singular that this firm should have known the exact amount of the engineer's estimate. According to this return, there is nothing, in my mind, to justify the action of the Government, upon the advice of the Minister, in awarding this contract to Davis & Sons. The hon. gentleman said in committee that on account of the nature of the work, it was advisable to give them the contract; and it seems to me, from the return brought down, that the change was initiated entirely by the hon. Minister himself, because I find a letter here, dated 6th May, 1893, addressed by the chief engineer to Mr. Haggart:

MY DEAR MR. HAGGART,—You having decided to build the Sheik Island dams in connection with the Cornwall Canal enlargement, it becomes necessary to provide for their construction. The superintending engineer, Mr. Rubidge, has prepared a detailed estimate of the cost, which amounts for the works of construction to $384,000 and for land and damage $30,000, making an aggregate of $414,000. It appears by the statements made by him that the requisite impervious material for the inside or upstream slope of the dams cannot be had near these sites, and that it will therefore have to be obtained from "abroad," the nearest and most available point being on contract 4, William Davis & Sons, contractors; and further, inasmuch as the interests of these two works—the dams and section four—are so closely interwoven with one another, owing to certain modifications in the works of construction at Lock 20, on Section 4, it would appear to be in the public interest to extend the Davis contract to cover the said dams as at their contract prices, allowing $30,000 for land and damages, the cost would amount to $404,485, or some $10,000 less than the superintending engineer's estimate. Under all the circumstances, if it can be done, I strongly recommend the Davis contract No. 4 be extended to cover this work, if the Messrs. Davis & Sons are willing. The superintending engineer shares my views in this matter.

Yours faithfully,

COLLINGWOOD SCHREIBER,
Chief Engineer.

On looking over the Auditor General's Report and the prices at which the work was awarded to Davis & Sons, I find that in item No. 5, general earth work, they were getting 30 cents a cubic yard, and item No. 7 for lock-pit excavations, 32 cents, and on the whole section generally 32 cents per cubic yard. Now, according to Mr. Rubidge's estimate, there are 36,000 cubic yards of earth excavation in the seats of the dams, and which Mr. Rubidge, instead of calculating the cost at 32 cents, allowed 50 cents a cubic yard, or over-estimated on that item alone $6,480. Then there were 83,000 cubic yards of embankment allowed at 50 cents a yard, $41,500, when the contract price was 32 cents, making an over-estimate of $14,940. Then there were 5,000 cubic yards of tow-path embankment, which is also allowed at 50 cents per yard, whereas the contract price was 32 cents, making an over-estimate of $900. Then, in the matter of puddling—and the Minister and chief engineer laid great stress upon the impervious material required to keep the water in the canal—Mr. Rubidge allowed $1 per cubic yard. I venture to say that any contractor in the Dominion would have been glad to do the work at 50 cents. However, I find that Davis & Sons' contract price was 75 cents per cubic yard, and there is in that item alone an over-estimate of $3,750. Then the next item of consequence is 43,000 cubic yards of stone crib-filling, which is allowed for at $1 per cubic yard, whereas Davis & Sons are doing the work on other sections at 50 cents per cubic yard, so that on that item the engineer was kind enough to allow the contractors $21,500 more than they should have got. Then on the rock excavations the engineer very liberally allows $1.50 per cubic yard on 3,000 cubic yards, amounting to $4,500. The contract prices of the other rock excavation then being done by Davis & Sons upon the other section was $1.10, or upon this item the engineer over-estimated $1,200. Then there were 19,000 cubic yards of riprap and quarry waste. Perhaps the Minister will undertake to explain the difference. But I want to tell him as a practical man, that there is practically no difference. The engineer allowed $1.50 instead of $1 a yard, which was the price on the other portions of the work, showing an over-estimate on this part of the work of $9,500. Then there was 6,500 cubic feet of pine timber, at 50 cents. The contract price of Davis & Sons on the other sections was 35 cents per cubic foot, so that there was an over-estimate on the timber of $975. Then there was an item of 6,300 cubic yards of masonry on the cut-off wall for which the engineer allowed $8 a yard, notwithstanding that work of a similar kind was being done by the same contractors on the other section at $7 a yard, making an over-estimate of $6,300. There was 1,750 cubic yards of random-course masonry for which the engineer allowed $8. The contract price for this also was $7, an over-estimate of $1,750. Now, summarize these items:

Earth excavation in seats.....	$ 6,480
do do embankments..	14,940
do do towpath.	900
Puddle.....	3,750
Stone filling in cribs.....	21,500
Rock excavation.....	1,200
Riprap and quarry waste	9,500
Pine timber.....	975
Masonry cut-off wall.....	6,300
do random course work.....	1,750
	$67,295

This is the amount estimated over and above the price at which Davis & Sons were doing the work, and the engineer comes down to the Minister and recommends him to accept the tender of Davis & Sons on the ground that they had agreed to accept it at $10,000 less than his estimate. I have only taken a few of the more prominent items, so I think it may fairly be assumed that the engineer had made an estimate of $75,000 more than the same quantity of work was being done for on the other section. On a previous occasion, speaking from the information then at hand, I said I could not see any possible excuse for this change being made in the work, or, at any rate, any good reason given by the Minister in his explanations to the committee for giving this work to Messrs. Davis & Sons. The section is an ordinary piece of work, as is known to every one who has had a practical experience in works of this kind. If any practical man will look over the engineer's estimate and by the reports he would see that there is nothing to justify the action of the Government. He cannot say that Davis & Sons had any special material upon their section, or that they had any special claim on account of the work being contiguous to their section, to justify the contract being given without public competition. I think it was unreasonable to give $404,000 of work without public competition. We might as well give up the idea of tendering for public works, if it is to be in the power of the Minister, or in the power of the Government upon the advice of the Minister, to let large works of this kind to a favourite contractor simply because he happens to be in the vicinity of the work to be done, particularly when that contract is given at a price higher than the work could be done for. It will be very interesting to watch the final estimate when it comes before the House. I venture to predict that it will be more than $404,000. I do not think the engineer was fair in making his estimate. If an engineer was making an estimate upon a work simply to arrive at a just conclusion of the value and to prepare the Government to provide money enough for the work, such an estimate would be all right. But when he comes to the Minister with a recommendation to give the work to a certain contractor on the ground that they were willing to do it for $10,000 less than the Government engineer's estimate, I think the engineer was misleading the Minister, considering that his estimate was $75,000 or $80,000 higher than similar work was being done for by the same contractors. It would seem that there must have been some collusion between the engineer and the contractors, or how could they say that they were willing to do it for $10,000 less than the engineer's estimate? It is wrong to mislead the members of the committee by the pretense that a better bargain was being made than would have been made had the work been put up to public competition, and as a member of the committee I protest against this method of giving contracts for public works.

Mr. BERGIN. I was sorry to hear the hon. gentleman who has just spoken asperse the character of the engineer and intimate to the House that there had been collusion between the engineer and the contractor, particularly, when, but a few moments before, he had stated to the House that the Minister had given this contract to favourite contractors upon his own mere motion. Now, I take issue with the hon. gentleman upon all these points, as I take issue with the hon. leader of the Opposition, who said, in discussing this question a little while ago, that he did not see anything to justify this change in the character of the work, seeing that Mr. Page had already condemned the work, and had stated that it could not be carried out. I do not think that any stronger evidence could be given that Mr. Page, the late chief engineer of canals, was in error when he said that the construction of the upper dam would certainly cause a rise of the water that perhaps would carry destruction to the American side and would involve us in international trouble, than the fact that a temporary dam was constructed last year to enable the permanent dam to be built, and the water did not rise sufficiently for the rise to be measured. It did not raise the thousandth part of an inch, and the water runs by it now as it did last year, round the head of Sheik's Island, between that island and Barnhart's Island and the American shore, without having caused the water to rise, as I said, the thousandth part of an inch in the main channel of the St. Lawrence. The hon. gentleman said that he could not discover any justification for any physical change in the character of the work. Now, Sir, I do not believe that the hon. gentleman knows anything at all about the character of the work.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I was speaking of the section that was required to be given to Davis & Sons, because they had suitable material on their section.

Mr. BERGIN. Just as I said—the hon. gentleman did not know what he was talking about.

Mr. GIBSON. We will see that later on.

Mr. BERGIN. I do not know if the hon. gentleman has been there, but if he has been, he certainly did not use his eyes to advantage. I think I shall be able to show before I get through that it was a matter of necessity to get the material for this dam, the earth to make the impervious banks, from Davis & Sons. Now, if the hon. gentleman had inspected the record, if he had consulted the debates in this House, he would have discovered reasons why it was necessary to build these dams, and he would have discovered reasons which justified the Minister, under the advice of his engineer, in giving this work to the Messrs. Davis. I showed in this House five years ago the character of the bank of the Cornwall Canal, particularly between Mille Roches and Brownell's Bay, as it was called in the original estimate. Some years ago Mr. Samuel Keefer, now dead, but then president of the Society of Civil Engineers, one of the ablest men of this country—and this country has produced a great many able men—in addressing that society at Montreal, said:

It has been suggested that some reference should be made to the first construction of the Cornwall Canal, the enlargement of which is now in progress, especially to that portion of it between Moulinette and Mille Roches, where the breaches have occurred, and it is my intention to do so, not in this address but in a paper specially prepared with illustrations, to be read at one of the regular meetings of the society. Having spent nearly six years of my younger days as assistant engineer, under I. B. Mills and Colonel Phillpotts, resident engineers in its construction, I may claim the privilege of contributing the facts in relation to the formation of the banks that have come under my observation.

This much, however, may be said here.

The canal and its banks were constructed of ample dimensions. The canal was 100 feet at bottom and 10 feet deep. The embankment was raised to 14 feet above canal bottom, and made 12 feet wide at top with slopes on either side of two to one.

That portion of the canal embankment on the upper reach, which for upwards of a mile in length, from Moulinette to Mille Roches, holds the water in the canal at a level of about 20 feet above the branch of the St. Lawrence, which runs alongside, is in fact founded upon the treacherous clay bottom in which were found springs of water, and in part in side-cutting permeated by streaks of sand. The embankment over this ground was formed with extra care, the earth being laid on in courses with carts, and where the outer slope ran out into the river, it was protected by boulder stones along its outer edge. Where springs were found under the seat of the embankment they were led out to the river's edge by French drains.

Now, I may say that in the construction of locks 19 and 20, which are now completed, it was found that the character of the bank was even worse than I represented it five years ago. It was found that the banks were not only built with broken boards and split planks, but it was found that trees were felled and allowed to lay upon the banks, and that the earth upon which this bank was built was neither mucked nor grubbed. The black muck was left there, and this heavy bank was built upon it, and built on the edge of the river. Under that muck was a treacherous clay, so that the water, on reaching it, undermines everything above it. Photographs were taken of these banks when they were building the locks, for they were obliged to do then what ought to have been done nearly half a century before—to muck and to grub the soil before building the banks upon it. I am sorry I have not here the photographs which were taken of the condition of the banks at locks 19 and 20.

Mr. LAURIER. What year?

Mr. BERGIN. I think it was three years ago that they made that excavation. But I may say that although locks 19 and 20 are built where the banks were least treacherous, it has been found necessary to puddle them, and to put in almost a mile of crib-work to keep the banks from slipping away into the river. The same mistake that was made in the first construction of the canal was made in the last construction, and the locks are built in the river instead of being built inland. I go further, and say that these locks ought not to have been built at all, that they were not required, and that lock 19 ought not to have been built in any event, although there is excuse for lock 20. Lock 20 ought really to be the foot of the canal, and vessels going down ought to drop into the river at that point, and going by the river they would be at Valleyfield, 33 miles away, as soon as they reach now the mouth of the Cornwall Canal, under the present system of lockages. But the contract had been given, and it was impossible for the Minister to alter that. Now, I come back to that section of the work which this gentleman says, in the absence of all evidence, it was not necessary to construct.

Mr. GIBSON. I did not say that.

Mr. BERGIN. You said there was no reason to alter the physical character of the work.

Mr. GIBSON. I said there was no physical feature in connection with the work that I could see from examining this document, that justified the Government in giving it to Davis & Sons, without a tender.

Mr. BERGIN. That is an entirely different thing. The hon. gentleman made two statements that I have separated, and I intend to deal with them separately. One is the physical character of the work, and the other the justification for giving the contract to Davis & Sons. If the hon. gentlemen who were in the House in 1885 will read the statement I made then to the House, they will find that I pointed out that all the serious breaches that occurred in the canal occurred in that section between Mille Roches and Sand Creek, and that they all occurred from the same causes. I pointed out that that portion between Mille Roches and Brownell's Bay was built upon a treacherous foundation, that was neither grubbed nor mucked, as has since been shown, and that it was not built in a way to secure the safety of the bank; that on the contrary, it was built upon the same plan as the engineers, who constructed the Cornwall Canal had constructed the Erie Canal. It is miraculous that the banks have not suffered more breaches, and that there has not been more injury done to the trade and commerce of this country in consequence of the faulty construction of the banks in that portion of the canal, than they have already been subjected to.

Mr. LAURIER. Miraculous.

Mr. BERGIN. Almost. God watched over us, just as He is giving us good crops now. There are engineers and there are engineers. The engineers who were employed at that time, were employed because Canadians had not the same confidence in the ability and the skill of our engineers that we have to-day. They went abroad for engineers, thinking that the Americans knew more about engineering than we did, and the engineers that they employed fully sympathized with that feeling. And to show that they could do what Canadian engineers said ought not to be done, and was not proper to be done, they built a canal in the river, and they said that they would save £30,000 sterling by doing so. The whole character of the work of the Cornwall Canal was put in peril, because of that estimated saving, and we have paid five times that amount since in repairing damage to the canal that was caused by adhering to that plan, which everybody else said ought not to be employed. Those three and a half miles of bank are perfectly rotten. The eight feet of good bank that they placed on the north side so as to protect the bank and prevent the water from going through, after half a century's exposure to rain, wind, storm, ice and flood has been all worn away, and you can scarcely travel twenty yards on the south side of that bank in the hottest weather without seeing clear water trickling through it. The hon. gentleman, whose practical knowledge has not very much impressed me during the course of his speech, will tell the House that where clear water runs through such a bank there is mischief brewing not very far away. It has been through the constant care of a large staff, headed by a skilful superintendent, Mr. D. A. McDonald, that the bank has been kept from slipping away by constant additions being made of good material, and on account of stone being placed outside. That is one of the reasons why the Minister, upon the report not only of his own engineers, but of an engineer of the highest character not belonging to his department, and who was asked to make a careful examination of that work, ordered these dams to be constructed. By constructing these two short dams the Minister got rid of three miles and a half of rotten bank, which was a serious menace to the trade of the country. At any moment that bank is liable to break away and run into the river, when the trade of the country will be stopped; and for that reason the Minister was perfectly justified in building these dams. The other night, on a different subject, the attention of the House was called to the fact that the Act regarding railways and canals, or rather the two amending Acts, one amending the Railway Act and the other the Canal Act, contained two sections which are identical, and in those sections it is provided that the Department of Canals shall not give out any contracts except under tender, unless there is some danger threatening, that compels action. This is the case in regard to giving out this contract. The Minister saw that there was in that bank a menace to the trade of the country, that it was liable at any moment to give way, and that it would cost a very large sum, as shown by the report of the engineers, which I will read, in order to strengthen the canal, and that to enable vessels to pass through it would be necessary to cut into the north bank of the river—not of the canal, but of the river—so as to widen and strengthen it, and it would cost $900,000 more to do that than would be required to build the dam, as I shall show by the reports of the engineers. With respect to the north part of the bank: in Mr. Page's first report he called attention to the fact that it would be necessary, because of the increased weight of the water which would be in the canal when it was deepened to sixteen feet, so affording fourteen feet of navigation, to make the bottom of the canal ninety feet instead of 100 feet. When I argued that it was not safe to leave the bank in that condition, or to use it at all, but that dams should be built. Mr. Page said he would not take anything from the north wall of the canal, but would take all the excavation from the bottom and throw it over the south wall. He gave an estimate of the cost, and in the concluding paragraph of his report he said he would retain that material, which was not of good character, by placing stone over it. An estimate of the cost of the stone to support that wet material taken from the river was more than the whole of the works which he had recommended to be put under contract. He showed also that in the last contract he would be obliged in a great many places to go into a bank of hard-pan, forty feet high, and the estimate of that work was nearly $1,000,000 more than the dams cost, and more than these dams would have cost if there had been no contract for sections, part N. 5, 6 and 7 with Messrs. Gilbert. That firm has been allowed $125,000 for the work already performed, and since June, 1891, they have done little or no work; in fact, those sections, part of No. 5, 6 and 7 have been abandoned since that time and that much money at all events, more than $300,000 has been saved by the abandonment of the work, and should be included in the saving which the construction of these dams will cause to the country. I think I have shown that in view of the condition of that bank there is perfect justification for the Minister acting on the report of the engineers, giving out this contract without tender. Dealing with the question as to whether the Minister had done that upon his own motion, as the hon. gentleman said, I beg to read a report made to Mr. Trudeau, the late chief engineer of canals, dated 23rd April, 1891.

Mr. LAURIER. Who made that report?

Mr. BERGIN. Mr. Rubidge, engineer of the canal. It is as follows:—

I beg to inclose herewith a statement showing the cost of completing the Gilbert contracts, and of further improving the channel way when affected by the proposed dams, also the comparative cost between completing the contracts, including the widening and so forth on the north side of the canal as provided for in the specification and the construction of the proposed dams.

Appended to the statement sheets 2 and 3 containing abstracts from the estimates of cost of (a) Widening and deepening the canal from Cornwall to Mille Roches, (b) Widening the canal on the north side, deepening and so forth, and flattening the curves from Mille Roches to near the head of Sheik's Island without interfering with the old embankment.

(c) Widening and generally perfecting the alignment of the canal either north or south of the old embankment from Mille Roches to near the head of Sheik's Island, and (d) the construction of the proposed dam.

Now, Sir, let me call your attention to the fact that the construction of these dams is not a new thing, nor a matter of yesterday. At the time of the construction of the canal the commissioners, having grave doubts—because there had been already very many slides and great portions of the work had slipped into the river almost as soon as completed—called upon the administrator of that day, to send Captain Cole, of the Royal Engineers, who was serving with Sir John Colborne and Mr. Fleming, an engineer of repute, and Mr. Thompson, and asked them to report upon the plan of Mr. Mills. Now, what did Captain Cole say?

In altering their plan to meet the wishes of the country, Judge Wright and Mr. Mills stated that they were aware of the greater cost of No. 1 (the inland route), but preferred the latter as a more perfect work. The latter gentleman thought the saving might be £60,000. I imagine that this will be found under the mark, but nothing certain can be given until a survey of the points to be improved has been made. The first and principal feature of the natural course about to be adopted, is the damming below Brownell's Bay. Having given the subject such consideration as imperfect accounts of the localities, and Mr. Ridout's map of Canada, enabled me to give, before I visited the spot, I concluded that we might construct these works advantageously, and I found the reality greatly surpassing my expectations. If an embankment be thrown across the passage above Brownell's Bay to Sheik's Island, the water lot may be finished without pumping, and the dams below constructed without the usual expense of an artificial waste weir, or the shifting of a temporary one in the dam itself as the work progressed. The water being thrown around the outer channel by this embankment, no difficulties remained to contend with. This bank, I advise, should be permanent, with a masonry waste weir of sufficient dimensions to feed the locks and mills, with a spur or jetty thrown forward (as at present from the wooden lock) to catch the upper level of rapid as it passes at right angles across the mouth of the passage. This difference of level is about two feet. The extra expense of making this work permanent would scarcely exceed that of a temporary coffer-dam, independent of the masonry cheeks of the sluice-way—and a guard of three or four feet against the spring floods would be much less costly than the same guard placed on the dam and lock at Moulinette. The advantage would be acquired of relieving the works below at any time, in case of leak in the dam or locks, which may be required in spite of all previous care of the engineers, from the carelessness of the contractor, or from some defect in the lock itself which would require remedy; much, it is true, may be done by previous care in the foundation of dams, and the examination of the rock under them and the locks—all apparent fissures being filled with cement and covered with a little masonry. The advantage, also, will be given by the bank above, of letting in water by degrees and watching the effect produced.

Mr. BERGIN.

so that all defects may be remedied before the navigation opens. The backing might also be allowed some time to consolidate before the water is let in. This work I call embankment because it does not raise the level of the water, but merely retains it at the level required. All these details, and many more, will better be known to the resident engineer. I will merely state, that the masonry of dams should be arched key work, well wedged up; this saves extra masonry, and if well performed, there is no use in mortar or cement being added, but broken stones and shingle should in either case be placed about 4 feet thick on the back of the masonry to prevent the passage of the gravel and clay of the slope above. The water should not run over, for several reasons, and a guard of 2 feet will be ample against the wash of the surface water. All these arrangements were concurred in by the engineer, and from hence downwards, no discrepancy of opinion appeared; all details being left to the judgment of the resident engineer, including the formation of sluices at each dam.

Commenting on this, I then remarked:

Now, one would suppose, as Capt. Cole evidently supposed, that this proposition of his would have been carried out; but it was not. Mr. Geddes, who was also consulted by the engineers, speaks of this plan, too. He says:

"The lower level leaves the upper, by locking down 17 feet to the surface of Brownell's Bay: said bay being raised $5\frac{1}{2}$ feet by a dam at Mille Roches, holding up the water 13 feet above its present surface of that place, thus producing a depth of 10 feet of water through the bay.

"The artificial lake thus produced, would afford a fine piece of navigation for three miles, but destroy the valuable water power of Moulinette, and what is more serious, produce, in the canal line to be carried from Mille Roches onward in much of the distance for the first three-quarters of a mile, cutting 17 feet deeper than by pursuing the upper level, beyond which there is 9 feet between the two levels.

"Few localities equal this in the facility of making said dam, or founding a water lock, at the head of Brownell's Bay: a low embankment shuts all the water from the north aside at Sheik's Island, leaving dry land to build the water lock on at the head of Brownell's Bay, and the dam at Mille Roches. This embankment at the head of Sheik's Island, Mr. Mills values at but $450; a canal from the head of Brownell's Bay to Mille Roches he estimates at $103,980.

"The value of three miles of an artificial lake, instead of a canal, would be the set-off against some excess of expense which probably will be incurred by following the lower level."

Mr. Fleming reported in the same way. Then Mr. Mills made a second report, in which he practically admitted what these gentlemen had said, but stuck to his first plan, because of the £30,000 sterling difference in the cost, and Mr. Mills, before leaving the country, made a final report, in which he said:

But before you pronounce it the economical, the judicious, and altogether the best plan to be pursued, you must consider what it accomplishes and what you have got for your money. In the first place, you have got an imperfect improvement, and one which does not secure the ends contemplated; secondly, the works and construction of the improvement, the business, the commercial operations of the whole country are jeopardized upon an expected and oft-occurring casualty, which may be avoided for the sum of £25,000 or £30,000; thirdly, in case of repairs being necessary they must be done at greater expense, and the same advantage cannot be taken of the season for repairs. These are matters which are perfectly within the comprehension of your board, and I hope they will receive the consideration which they deserve.

At that time what Mr. Page said to me at the head of the canal was said by the commissioners to Mr. Mills upon the receipt of that report. It was this: We have expended so much money now, that we must go on and finish it. I think, Sir, I have said sufficient to show that this three and a half miles of bank, which is a menace to the trade of this country at the present moment, and has been a menace to trade for several years; is a bank which ought never to have been constructed. I say that the dams recommended by all these great engineers should have been constructed in the first place. I omitted to mention two of the engineers, and very great men they were in their day. I refer to Mr. Clewes and Mr. Barrett, than whom no more scientific men ever came to this country. They both recommended the construction of a canal inland, which would be perfectly free from the danger of ice shoves and from the overflow of the St. Lawrence River. They too left on record plans which, although they are not brought down to the House, are in the department and should have been brought down, to show that these dams should have been constructed, and that in the event of improvement in vessels and larger vessels being used in the canal, that should it be widened and deepened, and should go out into the river at lock No. 20, at what was then called French's Rift. That, I think, the Minister will yet do. I think in the interest of the transport trade of this country it would save about four hours in the passage of vessels from the head of the canal to Valleyfield to have this drop-lock constructed at Lock 20. And now let me call your attention to another report made a few days afterwards by Mr. Rubidge, to show that the Minister, who could only act upon the recommendations of his officers, was guided, not by them entirely, but by the best scientific skill that this country affords—by a man whose honour is unimpeached, a man who under no circumstances would recommend the Minister to construct a work of this kind unless it was necessary to be done in the interest of the country; I mean Mr. Walter Shanly. I have here a statement made by the late Mr. Killaly, containing an approximate estimate of the value of work required to be done to complete the Gilbert contracts when affected by the proposed dams, viz.: the one-sixth of section V, the whole of VI and VII, and one-fourth of VIII:

Mr. Killaly's statement	$328,652
Robertson's balance, "stone toe"....	875
Total, less land required....	$329,527
Deduct Robertson's estimate of work done.....	120,216
Total to complete contracts.	$209,311

This is the sum to be paid to Mr. Gilbert to complete the work. The approximate estimate of the value of the work required to be done to render the channel way on the above-named Gilbert contracts practicable for the passage of large vessels by deepening and widening it, and by flattening the curves on the north side of the canal as represented on plan No. 2 would be $477,836. That is, for a bank 40 feet high, composed of hard-pan, instead of two short dams on the river. Here is a comparison made by Mr. Rubidge as between the estimated cost of the proposed dams and the completion of the contracts affected thereby, namely: the one-sixth of section B, the whole of VI and VII, and one-fourth of VIII, including also the deepening and widening of the channel way, and flattening of the curves not now under contract:

Cost of completing the contracts....	$209,311
Cost of deepening and widening, &c.	477,836
Total to complete contracts.	$687,147
Estimated cost of proposed dams....	351,269
Excess of cost of enlargement over that of dams	$335,878

Mr. Rubidge estimated the cost of widening the canal on the north side and deepening the channel, including flattening the curves to improve its alignment from Mille Roches Bridge to the site of the proposed upper dam near the head of Sheik's Island, as shown on plan No. 2, at $477,836. The estimated cost of widening, deepening and generally straightening the present location, to perfect the alignment from Mille Roches Bridge to the site of the proposed upper dam, near the head of Sheik's Island as shown on plan No. 1, was $709,336; namely: excavation, 784,395 cubic yards at 40 cents, $313,758; embankment, 709,448 cubic yards at 50 cents, $359,745; riprap, 23,888 cubic yards at $1.50, $35,833; total, $709,336. We have the testimony of Mr. Page that this embankment is hard-pan and cemented material; and I maintain that the contractor who takes that work at 50 cents a yard will not make a cent out of it. Now, the Minister had before him a report of the late Chief Engineer of Canals, Mr. Trudeau, who went down there and spent some time over the work, and saw it for himself; yet he could not understand how it was that any one could think for a moment of building a bank in such a place as where the canal bank is built, when a few short dams would give a magnificent lake three and a half miles long and 300 feet wide, with 26 feet of water at the upper dam and 42 feet at the lower dam. I said to him that I believed the late Chief Engineer of Canals had obtained his appointment through the late Mr. Mills, upon his recommendation, and I believed also that the kindness which Mr. Mills had shown to him as a young man, helping him in every possible way, until he placed him in charge of that work, caused him, not to throw any reflection on Mr. Mills, but on the contrary, to endeavour to carry out the plans which Mr. Mills proposed; and whilst I condemned him for doing that work, I could not in my heart help respecting the loyalty of the man to his benefactor. That is the only way in which I can explain his doing the work in the way he did on the Cornwall Canal. Not satisfied, however, with the testimony of the late Chief Engineer, Mr. Trudeau, not satisfied with the recommendation of Mr. Rubidge, not satisfied with the recommendation of Mr. Killaly, the Minister visited the work and saw what a great mistake had been made; he saw that our canal, instead of being a straight and perfect work, was so crooked and so imperfect that even though the banks were safe, it could hardly be made fit for the navigation of such vessels as will navigate that canal when it is completed to 16 feet. What is the opinion of Mr. Shanly, the greatest engineer this country has produced, who is consulted more by American engineers upon all great works than any other engineer in America, who is called upon, wherever there is difficult work to be performed, to give his opinion by the companies engaged in it before they set their own engineers at work? This gentleman was consulted by the acting Minister at that time, the Hon. McKenzie Bowell, and this is Mr. Shanly's report to him:

MONTREAL, 25th August, 1891.

SIR,—In compliance with your request I will now state my views touching the improvement of that part of the Cornwall Canal, about 3 miles in length, fronting what is known as Sheik's Island in the St. Lawrence.

The existing canal here closely skirts the river, but at a high level (from 20 to 35 feet) above it, and is very crooked presenting in its alignment a succession of reversing curves extremely inconvenient in the movement of large vessels. It was on this section that the breach in the embankment occurred in the late autumn of 1888, the cost of repairing which, some $50,000, represents but a small portion of the loss to the country taking into account the loss to trade through the interruption of navigation.

I may say that the Board of Trade of Montreal estimated the loss in demurrage alone to be over $5,000,000 to the country.

Sheik's Island belongs to Canada and is separated from the adjacent (Canadian) mainland by a channel narrow and shallow as compared with the vastness of the river; from the immense volume of water in which the quantity stolen by the Sheik

Mr. BERGIN.

Canal is, again by comparison, infinitesimally small. The channel is not navigable.

The enlarging of the 3 miles of old Canal is under contract and a considerable amount of work, to the value of not much short of $125,000 already done upon it.

The plan of enlargement increases the original depth of 10 feet to 16-2 feet and surface width from 140 feet to 156 feet; but whereas the bottom of the old Canal is 100 feet wide the "improved" work is to be only 90 feet on bottom. A diagram hereto attached makes it simple to understand how these figures "fit in." Indeed to make properly clear the general description here attempted of the relative positions of the Canal, as it exists, of Sheik's Island and Sheik channel, the map of the locality, prepared by the Engineer in charge of the Canal works, should be in view.

The new locks of the Cornwall Canal, corresponding to these of the whole St. Lawrence system, are of a size to admit vessels 225 feet long and 44 feet wide "over all." Propellers fully up to these dimensions have already been built for the Welland Canal trade and, doubtless, only await the completion of the system to pass downward to Montreal and Quebec. Ogdensburg is now their eastern port.

On the three mile section of the Cornwall Canal now in discussion there are places where two such vessels could not pass one another, the dimensions of the canal being as above given; and more than half the distance would be awkward navigation for one such vessel with the track all to herself.

With such a condition of things, is it to be wondered at if the hon. Minister, having seen for himself, should consult his engineers and the most able man in the profession in the country, and should be guided by their advice.

The enlargement work under contract is estimated to amount when completed to $325,000; of which there have been already expended some $125,000; cost of work still to do on a single track channel, $200,000; to go outside the present contract and improve further to the extent of flattening the obstructive curves so as to make these crooked three miles even fairly practicable for convenient navigation would involve work enough to cost in addition to the $200,000 contract, work still to do not far short of $500,000, bringing up the total outlay for unavoidable improvement to $700,000; and even then with all the large quantity of work done that that large sum of money would be needed to pay for these three miles of the Cornwall would still probably be the worst three miles on the whole length of the St. Lawrence system of canals, the Welland included, and would fail to satisfy the claims of navigation. Before many years, supposing the above sum of money expended and the limited improvement, it would in effect be done, further straightening and widening would be clamoured for and again, a further outlay of $200,000 found necessary to fully complete the improvements of which that particular section of the canal is susceptible and which the exigencies of traffic will insist on being made. The final improvement of three miles will thus have reached $900,000.

And yet the Minister is to be condemned, because he chose to avoid an expenditure of $900,000, and preferred to pay $31,000 to the Gilbert Bros. for giving up their contract. Mr. Shanly goes on to say :

In the early days of Cornwall Canal construction, more than half a century ago, the mode of treating this particular part of the undertaking was a "vexed question" with the engineers of the time. Two plans were proposed : one as seen in the "old" canal to-day ; the other the converting of the Sheik's Island channel into a still water basin by means of dams—one at the head, the other a little above the foot of the island—so as to raise the natural surface to the artificial level of the canal. The record tells that (what would now be considered) a trifling difference of cost in favour of the plan adopted formed the chief reason why it was finally adopted. The curvature so embarrassing to the free handling of the large propellers of this, our time, was of comparatively light account in the movement of the largest vessels of fifty years since. Comparing the cost of properly enlarging the original canal, now with that of carrying out the Sheik's Island scheme of improvement the scale turns in favour of the latter, and by no uncertain balance. To enlarge and improve, generally, the existing canal so as to be no more than fairly convenient for the largest class of vessels would cost, as has been stated above, about $700,000 ; the alternative plan (all contingencies provided for) $400,000 ; apparent saving on the Sheik's Canal plan, $300,000. But a considerable portion of the expenditure already made under the contract now in force—about $125,000—would be lost should the "dam" idea take shape, thus reducing the actual present saving in cost of construction to $175,000. Improved even to the full extent that an expenditure of $900,000 could bring about, the three miles of canal so improved, would not then as a piece of convenient navigation compare in excellence with the three mile basin into which the Sheik's Island channel can be converted at not very much to exceed one half that amount of cost.

Before undertaking to write on this subject, I had been upon the ground and made such an examination of what had been done in the past and what is now being done, as to leave it not doubtful in my mind that in order to perfect and make permanent what is now and on the present plan of improvement always will be an unsafe section of the Cornwall Canal, a radical change of plan is expedient. Enlarge and improve as you may on present lines, the embankment, the giving away of which has already caused serious injury to trade, will ever remain a "standing menace" to the surety of navigation. Very high and closely fringing the river it rests on a risky foundation and with the depth of water in the canal much increased over what it was in 1888, a re-enacting of the fifty thousand dollar break of that year would prove greatly more serious both as to the cost of repair and consequences to trade. I do not hesitate to express my belief that the wisest plan of improvement to adopt, wisest alike from the financier's and the engineer's point of view, will be to build the dams.

The appropriating of the Sheik's Island channel to canal purposes would of course be to divert it from its natural course as a 'side issue' of the main river, causing that share of the 'great waters' now flowing Sheik channel way must thereafter stay with the parent body, and I have heard it suggested that such an addition to the volume of water passing down by the southerly (United States) channels, might possibly form the basis of an international question by so raising the water level along the New York shore as to cause damage to property. If you were to stand for a moment, facing westward, on the high point at the head of the island, and view (which you would do with a feeling akin to awe) the mighty river hurling its waters directly towards you over the great rapids of the Long Sault, and then, wheeling to the right, note the insignificance of the discharge to the north of the island, waded across by cattle any summer day, you would very quickly come to the conclusion that, if it be advisable in Canadian interests to proceed to the construction of the dams, you may with safety do so without fear of protest from our neighbours.

It has often happened, no doubt, that an untenable pretense founded on the most shallow pretext has caused hinderance and annoyance in the prosecution of important work, and, therefore, I would meet the suggestion of possible international complications in this case with the counter proposition that, in the event of the erection of the dams being decided on, two or more, United States Hydraulic Engineers of repute be engaged to examine the several channels and report the possible effect on the main body of the river or the closing of the northerly one. They would of a surety report that there would be no appreciable effect at all and that any pretense set up to the contrary would be frivolous and vexatious. Should it be deemed expedient to act on this suggestion, I would further suggest that one at all events of the referees should be an officer of the United States Corps of Topographical Engineers.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

W. SHANLY.

To the Honourable

MACKENZIE BOWELL,
Acting Minister of Railways and Canals.

No person who knows the high character of Mr. Shanly and his great attainments in the profession of which he is the head in this country will for a moment believe that he made this report for the purpose merely of changing the character of the work, because, forsooth, some one had said that it ought to be so changed. Mr. Shanly made this report knowing that his character as an engineer would give force to it. And, to show that he knew how impregnable his position was, he suggested to the Minister that he should get the highest military engineering authority in the United States, associated with some other great civil engineer in that country to report upon this question as to whether this work could cause any international difficulty. Not satisfied with all this, the present Minister, when he came into office, visited the place. He saw the relation of the work, the river, and the island, and he asked himself, as every man did, but the man who built that bank, how it was possible that anybody would build three and a half miles of bank when there ought only to be about 1,200 feet, and had built that long bank in a great river like the St. Lawrence, instead of building it inland where it would be out of all danger from the rise and fall of the mighty river, and had built it at such a height that the weight of the water in it, even if it had been properly constructed would be almost sufficient to carry it into the river below. And not only that, but the chief engineer had actually expended $125,000 in deepening the canal where this treacherous bank existed, forgetting that when he had reached a depth of ten feet there was a bank below, resting upon what? Upon rock. No, Sir, but resting upon black muck, which had never been removed, and underneath it shifting sand and clay, through which the water was all the time running. Mr. Shanly was certainly in possession of all these facts, because the engineers who were constructing locks 18, 19, and 20, placed before him the photographs taken when the reef had slipped away, showing not only the trees lying where they were felled, but the boards and planks and the barrow tracks and rails all traversing the banks and forming sluiceways to allow the water to pass under the bank and carry it away. Not only was the canal improperly constructed so far as this bank was concerned, but even now in its final construction, under this improvement, as it was called, the entrance to the canal is very difficult. It is a shame to this country to have the entrance to a canal, such as this is to-day. One would suppose, Sir, that the canal, being built to facilitate navigation, would, at all events, be made straight, so that vessels would not run the risk of running upon the toe of a bank on one side or the other. But the entrance, instead of being straight—why, the Minister thought there was something wrong with his eye when he first saw the guard lock from the deck of a steamer—it is thrown across the canal, not quite at right angles, but at a very large angle, making an entrance as bad as any canal entrance that exists, unless it be the entrance to the mouth of this canal itself, which has already caused so much damage to vessels. Now, Sir, there is not a professional man in this country, unbiased and without some little fad of his own to foster, but believes that these dams should have been built. No man in Canada who knows the condition of the banks; there is no man who has worked on the canal for a month; there is no lockmaster on the canal who has ever been above the lock below Mille Roches; no man who has worked on the repaired scows on the canal has been able to see how anybody could be induced to build such a canal high above the river with a muck bottom and with clay and sand for an under-structure. It is objected that the Minister had no right under the law as it stands to give this contract without tender to Davis & Sons, Mr. Shanly, who is an honest man, and who had no object to serve except the interests of his country, points out what was the state of the canal at this time. The present system is the worst system of letting contracts for public works ever introduced into this country, a system for which hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible. Not only was the Minister justified in giving out the contract as he did, but he would have been criminally negligent of his duty had he put it up to tender in the face of the great danger to this country of leaving that three and a half miles of bank unprotected. And why did he give it to these men? Testing pits were sunk everywhere in the neighbourhood to find good material that could be made impervious to water for the construction of these dams. It could not be found. But these gentlemen had excavated close by material that could be used for that purpose, and, therefore, they were in the best position to perform the work. I heard the hon. member for Lincoln say that any contractor would sell the stone that would be necessary for these banks. There was plenty of stone there, or near by; it was not stone that was wanted, it was earth of the character necessary to construct these dams. Would you expect the Messrs. Davis, having an advantage of that kind, to hand it over to some other contractor? Not at all, it is not in human nature to do that sort of thing. But the Messrs. Davis said they would do it for $10,000 less than the estimate made by the engineer. The estimate made in 1891 was $404,000, and they agreed to do it for $386,000, or $18,000 less than the estimate of the engineer. I am not going to follow the hon. gentleman through the weary waste of figures which he quoted, and which are not applicable, and which cannot be justified as he put them, because he did not show the character of the earth, and of the cribwork, and of the riprap which were to be used in the work. I say that the Minister is to be commended for giving it to these men, because the delay and the danger to the bank forced him to get the work promptly done. He felt the peril which Mr. Shanly pointed out the canal was in and would be in. Even if it had been enlarged on the north side, and straightened and the curves flattened, it would never be a safe canal, it would always be exposed to the same danger; and for these reasons the Minister, seeing how great the danger was, and that he could not afford to delay a single hour, called upon the Messrs. Davis and asked them for what they would do this work? He said: You have the plant, and you have the material, and you must do it in two years or two years and a half. The Messrs. Davis took it at the price I have named, more than $10,000 under the sum which the engineer had estimated the work would cost. After that contract was entered into, the Minister visited the works again, and I went with him to the head of the canal on a steamer. After he came back he sent for the Messrs. Davis and said to them: You must construct this work and make these dams safe for this coming summer. And, Mr. Chairman, the Messrs. Davis had to expend $45,000 or $46,000 in buying extra material, so that they might put a stronger force upon the work to complete it within the stipulated time, and I believe the two dams will be finished this fall, the delay and the danger will have been averted, and these men will have expended $45,000 or $46,000 in extra material in order to complete the work within the time that the Minister required it to be done. They have not made any extra charge for the extra material and plant they have furnished. Therefore, I think, when you take the petty $75,000 which was all that the member for Lincoln could rake and scrape together, even without showing us the character of the material or the character of the work that was to be done, without a shadow of foundation for his arguments—I say when you consider all that, I think every man who looks at the matter dispassionately and who does not wish to make political capital out of it, will believe with me that the Minister was not only justified, but he would have been criminal if he had neglected to do this work in this way. I think the contractors, who have agreed to do the work at so much less than the late engineer of canals said it could be done for, deserves great credit for executing so great a work in so short a time.

Mr. HAGGART. For the better understanding of this question I may be allowed to make a full explanation in regard to this work. I am sorry the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) has left the House while I am discussing this item, because he seems to have a practical knowledge of details, and I am sure, from his fairness, that when he had heard the explanation he would accept it if he found it to be correct. I am confident that any person who visits the work will see at once, that from an engineering point of view, the plan that is at present adopted is the best one that possibly could be adopted; and I think every one, whether he be an engineer or otherwise, who visits the work will wonder why this plan was not adopted from the first. Not only is it the safest plan, but it would have been by far the cheapest plan at first, and it would have rendered the canal navigable in a far shorter time than it is now. In order to give a full explanation of the subject, I have prepared a memorandum giving the whole progress of this work from its inception, and the reports of the different engineers on the subject. Before proceeding with this explanation I may state in reply to the hon. member for Lincoln, that he very lightly dealt with the question whether the plan at present adopted is not preferable to the other. His principle argument seemed to be that this work which is at present given to Davis & Sons, is intimately connected with their contract, and was given to them at a price in excess of what it could be done for by tender; that the duty of the Government was to have asked for tenders for the completion of this portion of the work instead of giving it to Davis & Sons. This is the memorandum I have prepared:

At the time the enlargement of the Cornwall Canal was under consideration, Mr. Samuel Keefer, on the 17th February, 1885, addressed a memorandum to the Honourable John Henry Pope, the then Minister of Railways and Canals, pointing out the difficulties and dangers attending the enlarging of the upper end of the old canal, and suggesting that in his opinion the proper scheme would be to dam the channel which runs between Sheik's Island and the mainland on the Canadian shore at the upper end of the island, and at Mille Roches, thus forming a basin about three miles in length, and from 600 to 1,500 feet in width, which would be much easier to navigate than the old winding canal. The scheme did not commend itself to Chief Engineer Page, and preparations for the enlargement of the Cornwall Canal were continued, tenders were invited and received, the contracts for the section of the canal west of Mille Roches and opposite Sheik's Island being awarded to the Gilbert Dredging and Blasting Company. On the 11th October, 1888, a serious break occurred on this dangerous and troublesome section of the canal, to repair which cost no less a sum than $47,658.89. On the 2nd November, 1888, Messrs. Gilbert Dredging and Blasting Company entered into contracts for the enlargement of this section of the old canal. Mr. Samuel Keefer, towards the close of 1888, addressed the department, referring to the break which occurred in the canal, and drew attention to his memo. of 17th February, 1885, proposing the construction of the Sheik's Island dam, and the hon. member for Cornwall, Dr. Bergin, strongly advocated the abandonment of the old canal line between Mille Roches and the upper end of Sheik's Island, and the adoption of the Sheik's Island dam scheme, by the adoption of which navigation would be very much improved, and the risk of interruption to navigation by breaks occurring in the treacherous banks of the old canal would be avoided. The matter was again brought to Chief Engineer Page's attention, and on the 27th February, 1889, he reported, referring to the break in the canal bank, which occurred on the 11th October, the year previous, and also to Mr. Samuel Keefer's memorandum in favour of the Sheik's Island dams, and winding up his report condemning the scheme of the Sheik's Island dams, and presuming the work of enlargement and deepening would be proceeded with and carried out as provided for in the respective contracts entered into with the Government. The work of the contracts with Messrs. Gilbert Dredging and Blasting Company was proceeded with. On the 13th and 18th of March, 1889, the hon. member for Cornwall addressed Parliament upon the subject of the Sheik's Island dam scheme, strongly advocating its adoption in preference to enlarging the old tortuous canal.

In 1890 the department again had the matter of the Sheik's Island dam scheme under consideration, and Superintending Engineer Rubidge furnished plans of the proposed site of the dams. Early in January, 1891, the Cornwall Board of Trade sent a copy of a resolution, strongly urging the adoption of the Sheik's Island dam scheme in the interest of the trade of the country, which was referred to Chief Engineer Trudeau, who suggested that his proposal to give the enlargement of this section of the old canal a breadth at bottom of 100 feet would in some measure meet the views of the petitioners. On 24th January, 1891, the Montreal Board of Trade addressed the department, suggesting that a commission of independent engineers be appointed to inquire into the question of location and improvements of the canal, and on 17th February, 1891, an Order in Council was passed giving authority to appoint a commission of three engineers to inquire into the question of the location and improvement of the canal, with a view to ascertaining the best means of securing permanency and safety for this canal in its enlarged form, having due regard to the effect that might result from any action taken in damming up a channel of the river. By Order in Council of 24th April, 1891, Messrs. Shanly, Turner & Kennedy were appointed. Upon being notified of his appointment, Mr. Shanly declined to act, and the commission did not issue, but Mr. Shanly at the request of Hon. Mackenzie Bowell, acting Minister of Canals, made an examination into the question of the enlargement of the canal fronting Sheik's Island, and on 25th August, 1891, submitted his report, recommending the formation of a basin by damming Sheik's Island channel, in preference to enlarging the old canal, and he expressed the opinion that to make this section of the old canal fairly satisfactory for navigation it would cost, at least for unavoidable improvements, no less a sum than $700,000, and even with this large expenditure it would be in his opinion the worst and most dangerous of any part of the St. Lawrence or Welland canals, and if improved to the full extent would entail an expenditure of $900,000, and as a piece of convenient navigation would not even then compare in excellence to the basin formed by the carrying out of the Sheik's Island scheme, which he estimated to cost about $450,000. In August, 1891, the Messrs. Gilbert Dredging and Blasting Company were ordered to cease work on the section of their contract, which would be affected by the adoption of the Sheik's Island dam scheme, which they did accordingly. The matter of constructing dams was taken into consideration by the Government, and upon my taking charge of the department early in 1892, I gave the matter careful consideration, visiting the locality during the summer season, to familiarize myself with its general features. I was so struck with the advantages of the scheme of damming the Sheik's Island channel in preference to continuing the enlargement of the crooked and dangerous route of the old canal, that I concluded the proper course in the interests of trade and navigation to adopt it. I was also struck with the mismanagement shown in the building of the canal. The lock of the Cornwall canal is not placed in the direction of navigation; the lock, instead of being placed inside for its protection and for lessening the liability of the banks giving way, were placed outside, and the weirs were inside. I cannot conceive how an engineer with his senses about him could never build such a canal in the place where it is constructed.

Mr. LAURIER. Who is the engineer?

Mr. HAGGART. I believe it was Mr. Page. I consulted with Mr. Trudeau, and he rather favoured the construction of the work under the old contract. I requested Mr. Shanly to again take up the question. On 5th September, 1892, he reported that no amount of expenditure, in his opinion, could make the old canal otherwise than a most inconvenient, unsafe and in every respect objectionable piece of canal navigation, and he added, the adoption of the dam plan as opposed to the proper enlarging of the old canal would produce: first, large economy on first outlay; second, direction and depth at once secured by the erection of the dams only; third, complete safety from breaks and slips, and he reported much what he has otherwise said in his report of 5th August, 1891, favouring the dam scheme. In December, 1892, Mr. Trudeau was superannuated after long service, and was succeeded by Mr. Schrieber, whom I requested to look carefully into the matter, and he, in consultation with Mr. Rubidge, went carefully into the question. Mr. Rubidge prepared an estimate of the cost, amounting to $414,000, which Mr. Schrieber considered a fair price for the work, and he strongly supported the dam scheme as being greatly in the public interest. As to the question about the separation of the contract of Messrs. Davis for the building of the dam scheme, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) did not apparently understand that these works were intimately connected. In order to carry on this scheme for the building of dams and to give the navigation required, it was necessary that the lock for which Messrs. Davis had contracted should be increased in height, that seven hundred yards of masonry extra were required and also additional nearly 20,000 of earth excavation, and the taking of 40,000 cubic yards of earth from the very works which Messrs. Davis were completing. Under these circumstances, and in consultation with the engineer, I found that in order to complete the work it was necessary to enter into arrangement with Davis & Sons, or abandon the work until the time had expired for the completion of the contract. I asked Davis & Sons at what price they would undertake the completion of the work. They offered to complete it at the schedule prices of their contract—and the schedule prices of their contract, should be extended to and made to apply to the new work. I was very careful about extending the work to Messrs. Davis, and I ordered the Chief Engineer not only to report whether the prices for the work were fair and reasonable, but also to inquire into all similar works at different points in the canals in that section of the country, and find whether the prices which Messrs. Davis were receiving were in excess of the prices paid for the work in other sections. Mr. Schreiber reported that the extension of the contract price then being paid to Davis & Sons for the completion of the Sheik's dam and the enlargement of the works, the use of the material out of the dam and the construction of the enlargement of the bank of the canal was as low as the work could be done at contract prices, and were as low as prices received by contractors on different sections along the canal. Under these circumstances, and on the recommendation of Mr. Rubidge and Mr. Schreiber, I recommended that the contract of Messrs. Davis be extended for completion of these works. I knew that these works were so intimately connected with Davis & Son's contract that it was impossible to separate them, and that even if the works were separated, the probability was that no contractor would be able to send in a tender at a less price than that which Messrs. Davis were receiving. That was my opinion anyway at the time. That was the information I got on comparing their contracts with the other contracts. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) must remember that it is not a lump sum contract that the Messrs. Davis got but that it is simply an extension of their old contract at the contract schedule prices that they had for No. 4, and in which a great part of the work was comprised and embodied in that contract of No. 4, and which they were entitled to anyway. The hon. gentlemen opposite know perfectly well that Messrs. Davis, and all the other contractors, who contracted for work in that section of the country, did so by tender, and it was awarded to them as they were the lowest tenderers. Under these circumstances, I felt perfectly justified in recommending to Council the awarding of that contract to Messrs. Davis & Sons.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Chairman, from my perusal of the papers brought down by the Minister with regard to this question, I would not—although I am not at all an engineer—be prepared to say that when the canal was located, there must have been good reasons why a portion of it should not have been located along Sheik's Island. As was stated by the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), the question was fully inquired into at the time the canal was built. Nearly fifty years ago the very question which is at issue now in the House was fully considered. The engineers had to determine whether they would locate the canal along Sheik's Island, and after having given a good deal of consideration to that view, they came to the conclusion, for good reasons to themselves, at all events, that the canal should not be located along Sheik's Island, but that it should be located where it is to-day, and where it has been ever since that time.

Mr. BERGIN. I beg to correct my hon. friend. All the engineers, with the exception of the two Americans: Mr. Mills and Mr. Wright, supported the dams. Beginning with Sir John Colborne, no very inefficient engineer, Captain Cole, Mr. Geddes, Mr. Fleming, Mr. Barret, Mr. Clewes, and others, all condemned the building of that bank and recommended the dam.

Mr. LAURIER. However that may be, the work was not done according to the opinion of these eminent men. The Government of the day followed the opinion, not of these men, but of other men quite as eminent in their profession. Some fifty years have now elapsed, and the question arises as to the arrangement of the canal, and again does the very question come up as to whether the canal should be enlarged at the place where it had been located, or whether it should be improved along Sheik's Island. As doctors disagree, so engineers also disagree. Men of very eminent ability, I admit, recommended the other course—and no greater authority, I believe, could be adduced, in favour of the plan, which has been finally adopted by the Government than Mr. Shanly. Mr. Shanly, amongst others, decided, that it would be preferable to place the canal along Sheik's Island, and even to abandon the old canal, and all the money that has been spent upon it, cast it into the river, as it were, and build the canal anew. This was the plan suggested by Mr. Shanly, supported by Mr. Keefer and other men of ability. But, as I said a moment ago, engineers will disagree, and against this view was the view of a man whom we all respected, a man who had been in office for a great many years, and against whose reputation either as a man of honour or as a man competent in his profession, never a doubt was raised. Mr. Page, after having given the matter due consideration, concluded that it was better, for reasons which at the time he gave to the Minister, to locate the works where they were, and to continue the canal at the place it had existed for fifty years. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergin) gave the reasons of Mr. Shanly for coming to a different conclusion from Mr. Page. Now, let me give to the House the reasons then given by Mr. Page to the Minister, who asked for a special report upon this. Mr. Page reports:

Of the feasibility, efficiency and safety of enlarging the present canal in the manner described in the specification on which the work is let, the slightest doubt is not entertained by me; but as regards forming the 'Sny,' or north branch of the river, into a navigable channel, by means of dams at both ends of Sheik's Island, it must be confessed, that my perception is quite as obtuse as was that of 'the late John B. Mill,' who, it appears 'failed to see the importance of it.' It is quite true that the volume of water that passes down the 'Sny' is very small, compared with the main body of the River St. Lawrence; at the narrowest place immediately below the rapids the sectional area of the water way at the lowest stage of the river is about 600 square feet, all of which passes through the dam at Moulinette, and the openings made in it.

When the river is at its high stages the volume that passes down the 'Sny' is of course proportionately greater. In January, 1888, during an ice-jam, large quantities of ice passed down the north branch and destroyed in a great measure the mills and dam at Moulinette. If there had been a dam at that time at the north-west point of the island it is fully believed that no one can say, with any degree of certainty, what would have been the result, nor indeed what would be the effect at any time, of closing the north branch of the river.

The St. Lawrence is on too grand a scale to admit of the probable result of interference with it to be even approximated by the use of formulæ fairly applicable to ordinary streams.

It is a well known fact that the river has been seriously affected by causes either little understood or altogether ignored by those desirous of accomplishing certain objects—apparently irrespective of ulterior results.

The effect of cutting loose a sheet of ice in a bay, then swinging it across the channel, has been known to lead to the drowning out for a time of a considerable tract of land along the margin of the river, and the closing of a branch of the river at the head of the Beauharnois Canal is well known to have led to a vast deal of trouble and an outlay for land damages of nearly $400,000.

It is true that the branch of the river above mentioned was much larger than the "Sny" which Mr. Keefer now recommends to be closed; still, the latter is in the same direction as the former. Besides, no matter what the effect might be, a case would be opened that might lead to complications with a foreign country.

As full information has now been obtained relative to how the banks were made and the class of material in them, no doubt need be entertained of their being made secure without resorting to the formation of a large pond, that could not by any possibility benefit the navigation especially as it would be nearly two miles from the upper end of the canal and at least six miles from its lowest end, where the water-way in both cases is throughout of the usual sectional area.

Now, Sir, these reasons of Mr. Page have their force. I do not contend, nor will I pretend for a moment, that the contrary view has not also its weight and its force; but between these conflicting opinions of Mr. Page on the one side, and the other engineers on the other side, the Minister of Railways and Canals at the time, who was a competent man of business, as every one knows; the Hon. John Henry Pope—I believe as good an administrator as we ever had in this Government—came to the conclusion that he would follow the advice of Mr. Page against all the other engineers, and he decided to give the contracts as recommended by Mr. Page. Now, the successor of the Hon. Mr. Pope, the present Minister of Railways and Canals, says: that looking at the case, it was inconceivable that such a gross mistake as that was ever perpetrated. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) goes so far as to say: that there was not a man, even a labourer who ever handled a shovel upon that canal, who did not feel convinced that it was a grievous blunder to place the canal where it was. That might have been the opinion of the man who handled a shovel on the works. It was not the opinion of Mr. Page, quite a competent man, nor the opinion of Mr. Pope, another able and competent man. Now, Sir, between these conflicting authorities, the Minister at that time decided in favour of one authority, and adopted a certain course, and three or four years afterwards another Minister discards everything, says the thing was absurd, that it was a blunder, which was observed even by the most ignorant man who handled a shovel on the work, and takes it upon himself to stop the works, to cancel the contract that had been entered into by his predecessors, and thereby to throw away $125,000 which had been paid upon that contract. The conclusion is that if the present administration of the Department of Railways and Canals is justifiable, the previous administration of that department was blundering, to an extent which has been characterized by a supporter of that Administration, the hon. member for Cornwall and Stormont.

Mr. BERGIN. I did it on the floor of this House during the existence of that Administration.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not deny it. I do not deny that at the time the hon. gentleman characterized the action of the Minister as absurd and stupid; but the Minister took no notice of the hon. gentleman's statement. I remember it very well: I think the hon. member spoke for three days on the subject at one time.

Mr. BERGIN. Only two.

Mr. LAURIER. Let us say two; I am surprised at the hon. gentleman's moderation. Still, for two days he attacked the conduct of the Minister, impugned his judgment, and spoke in as strong language as he has done to-day to show that the action of the department was absurd and stupid; I think he used those words, and even stronger. But if these words fell on the Minister's ears, he did not heed them, for he continued the contract. The hon. gentleman, however, was more successful with the successor of Mr. Pope; he prevailed on him to grant what he could not obtain from Mr. Pope, that is to say, the cancelling of the contract which had cost the country $125,000. It would have been just as well for the country if the whole of that money had been thrown in the St. Lawrence.

Mr. BERGIN. Quite.

Mr. LAURIER. The money was absolutely lost. That is a very severe reflection on the Government, which the hon. gentleman has always supported. I am sure that I would not be guilty of such a reflection as that, and I am bound to accept the hon. gentleman's judgment, and say that the department acted very stupidly. That is a point for him to settle with the Department of Railways and Canals. I will not be so severe as the hon. gentleman; I will not say that the department acted stupidly, nor will I say that it acted wisely in this matter. I will go further. Looking at the papers which have been brought down, I would not say, with my limited knowledge and my poor administrative ability, that at the time the canal was built, had I been at the head of the department, the reason given by Mr. Shanly would have prevailed upon me to locate the canal at Sheik's Island rather than at the bank of the river. There are very good reasons for that course, I admit. But in matters of that kind it may be difficult to decide in favour of one course or the other course; there may be reasons for one view, and reasons for the other view. Everything considered, the department came to the decision that it was better to adopt that course. I will not say it was the wisest course. The reasons appear strong to me for the other course. Mr. Mills appears to have been a competent engineer; Mr. Page was a man of undoubted ability, and Mr. Trudeau was a man of undoubted ability, and they seem to have come to the conclusion that it was better to maintain the canal where it had been first established. Under these circumstances, the Minister assumed a heavy task, when at the solicitation of the hon. member for Cornwall and Stormont he cast all these decisions aside, and cast the contract aside, and wasted $125,000 of the public money. That is not all. The contracting firm have made a claim against the country for damages, and a very valid one it is. They had the faith of the country pledged to them; a contract was awarded to them on the faith of the Minister, after tenders had been asked and received, and therefore their contract could not be cancelled by the Government without the Government rendering itself liable for damages. Those damages, if I remember rightly, amount to about $130,000, so that the result of this is that we have sunk deliberately more than $250,000 of public money, against the advice of engineers, quite as competent as the engineers now followed. I say the opinion of Mr. Page in this matter is quite as respectable as the opinion of Mr. Shanly, great as his opinion is, and there is as much to be said for one side as for the other side. Under these circumstances, I maintain that the conduct of the Government cannot be defended or justified, because whatever the reasons may be in favour of the one course, when the Government have deliberately taken the other course, not in haste at all, but after due consideration, it is impossible to conceive that there was anything for them to do but to execute the contract which had been granted with their eyes open, and after full consideration. Now, the hon. member for Cornwall and Stormont, in his zeal says, first of all, that it was the duty of the Government to cancel the contract, and then, without waiting a day or an hour, or a minute, or a second, to give the contract at once to Davis & Sons, who were the contractors on the neighbouring section. And why? Because, says the hon. gentleman, of the danger to navigation; the canal is at present in such a shape that it is a constant menace to navigation.

Mr. BERGIN. Mr. Shanly says so.

Mr. LAURIER. He does not say that the work should be given without competition.

Mr. BERGIN. He says the condition of the canal is a constant menace to navigation.

Mr. LAURIER. That was not the opinion of Mr. Page, and Mr. Shanly, when he said that, never implied or wanted any one to understand, that the canal was liable to break at any moment. The canal had been in existence for forty years. There was one break in 1878.

Mr. BERGIN. There were several breaks before that.

Mr. LAURIER. There might have been. But, as stated by Mr. Page in his report, the nature of the soil was now better understood, and only two years previously the canal had been repaired at a cost of $50,000. Under these circumstances, shall we be told that the Government could not have waited for two months or six weeks in order to obtain tenders? There can be no justification whatever for their having granted this contract against the letter of the law. I wait for the department or the hon. member to give some reason for that. The only reason given by the hon. gentleman for the department not having obeyed the law is that the canal was a menace to navigation. That is only metaphorical language. The canal was there, open to navigation, and there was no reason to believe that in three months more it would not be there. Therefore, the fact of the Government having granted the contract without any competition, against the letter of the law, is a fact for which the Government must be held responsible.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There was another branch which I did not notice that the hon. Minister dealt with, and that was the statement of my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) that, in a great variety of cases, the arrangement, which I understood the hon. Minister to say had been made with Messrs. Davis & Sons, to do the work at the same rates in the new contract as in the old, had been departed from. The statement of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) was to the effect that in certain classes of work, which were done under the old contract at 50 cents, the engineer allowed $1; that in other classes, which, under the old contract, were done at 75 cents, he allowed $1.10, and so on, making up a total difference of some $67,000, besides a variety of minor items, swelling the whole up to $75,000 or $80,000.

Mr. HAGGART. I stated before that the hon. gentleman was entirely mistaken. The contract is the extended contract of Davis & Sons, on the schedule price that they were charging before, and these prices apply to the whole work.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then there is a flat contradiction between the hon. Minister and the hon. member for Lincoln on a matter of fact.

Mr. HAGGART. The memo. on which the contract was made is on the Table of the House. I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Lincoln, and when I heard him make these charges, I immediately sent for the memo. of contract, and inquired of the chief engineer if these statements could possibly have any foundation. I found out that I was perfectly correct, and that it was a simple extension of the schedule prices of Davis & Sons.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman is at variance with my hon. friend on a question of fact, and I will leave the matter in my hon. friend's hands.

Intercolonial Railway..... $3,200,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In dealing with a huge vote like this, involving any quantity of details, it is always desirable that the Minister who is responsible should give some kind of a general statement of the position of the work.

Mr. HAGGART. When I made my statement to the House last year, only seven months of the then fiscal year had elapsed, but from the results of those seven months, I estimated that at the end of the year, on the 30th June, 1893, the earnings and expenses of the Intercolonial Railway would about balance, and that the loss on the operations of the Prince Edward Island Railway would be in the neighbourhood of $60,000. This estimate proved to be very close to the actual figures. The Intercolonial Railway not only paid operating expenses, but made a profit of $20,161.69. The loss on the operating of the Prince Edward Island Railway was $63,731.75, or less than one-half the loss of the previous year; and the profit on the Windsor branch was $17,426.60. So that taking the whole of the Government railways into consideration, the loss on the year's operations was only $26,124. In 1891-

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

92, the gross earnings of all these railways amounted to $3,136,393.51, and the working expenses to $3,748,597.75, showing a loss on the year's operations of $612,204.24. In the year 1892-93 the gross earnings were $3,262,505.62, and the working expenses $3,288,629.62, the loss for the year being $26,154. The saving to the country that has been effected has therefore been $586,080.24. This improved state of affairs was brought about partly by an increase in the earnings and partly by a decrease in the expenditure. The earnings on the Intercolonial Railway increased $120,057.12; the earnings on the Prince Edward Island Railway increased $5,247.73; and on the Windsor branch, $807.26, making a total increase over the previous year of $126,112.11.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not want unnecessarily to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he might state whether that increase was caused by a larger amount of freight or passenger traffic or by any alteration in the rates.

Mr. HAGGART. I will give the details afterwards. The expenditure was reduced to the amount of $459,968.13. Of this $394,059.50 was in connection with the Intercolonial Railway; $63,284.21 in connection with the Prince Edward Island Railway; and $2,624.42 in connection with the Windsor branch. The greatest reduction was on the Intercolonial Railway, that being much the largest road. In the mechanical department, which has the running of locomotives and cars, there was a reduction of $110,778.40, and in the traffic department, which has to do with the stations and trains, the reduction amounted to $30,244.65, being a total in the two departments of $141,023.05. This reduction is mainly due, either directly or indirectly, to a reduction in the train service. When I looked into the railway management, I came to the conclusion that the train service was greater than the actual requirements of the traffic warranted, and I had it remodelled so as to reduce the expenditure and at the same time provide every necessary accommodation. In the reduction of the train service, the wear and tear of locomotives and cars was reduced, and it was possible to make considerable reduction in the number of the men employed running the cars and repairing them, and also in the quantity of material of all kinds used for these purposes. For instance, in respect to locomotives, there were fewer enginemem, firemen and cleaners needed, and the saving by this was $18,390.38; less fuel was used, making a saving of $26,102.00, less oil, tallow, waste, and small stores were used, a saving of $9,054.30; fewer repairs were necessary, a saving of $39,636.25; the water service cost $1,786.32 less. Then in regard to cars, fewer repairs were necessary, and on passenger cars there was a saving of $7,127.64; on postal, express and baggage cars, $3,021.04; on freight cars and vans, $1,420.14; less oil and waste was required to lubricate the axles, a saving of $3,450.15. Fewer conductors, train baggage masters and brakemen were required, causing a reduction of $14,628.02; the reduction in the number of employees at stations made a saving of $19,000.00. In the maintenance of way department there was a reduction of $244,787.44. This department of the railway service bears the cost not only of the repairs and renewals of the track, the bridges, the buildings and all other works of the railway, but it also bears the cost of any new works or improvements of existing works, for which the money is not supplied by a separate vote of Parliament. These new works and improvements had hitherto been made with a pretty free hand. I found when I went over the railway that it was well provided with good stations, sidings, &c., in thorough repair, making it the best road I ever travelled over, and I gave orders that all the existing works were to be maintained in a thorough state of efficiency, but that new works and improvements were to be done sparingly, and only in cases of necessity, and that then they were to be executed in the most economical manner. The number of extra men required was, therefore, much less, and there was also a large saving in materials. The saving in wages was $72,563.17, in rails and fastenings, $75,142.30, in ties, $28,476.31, in timber and lumber, &c., for bridges, cattle-guards, fences, &c., $45,965.71, wharfs, $1,568.27, buildings and platforms, &c., $20,646.70. The railway in all its departments has been well kept up, and is in as efficient a condition as ever before. The various officers in charge give me this assurance, and the fact that it has passed successfully through a very cold and stormy winter, said to have been the most severe in the lower provinces for twenty years, should be good evidence that its efficiency has not been impaired. With respect to the Prince Edward Island Railway, many of the remarks made about the Intercolonial Railway will apply. It has been efficiently maintained. The savings have been made by remodelling and reducing the train service, and by making fewer improvements. On account of the large mileage of railway and the small amount of business, it has been very difficult to reduce the train service and at the same time make it quite satisfactory to all parts of the island. The savings in the mechanical department was $6,319.79; in the maintenance of way and works, $50,376.25; traffic department, $4,444.41; general charges, $2,143.76, a total of $63,284.21. The Windsor Branch is 32 miles long, extending from Windsor Junction to Windsor. It is operated by the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company under a lease which gives them running powers into Halifax. The Government maintains the railway and works, for consideration of which the company pays the Government one-third of the gross earnings. The earnings accruing to the Government were $34,316.11, an increase of $807.26 over the previous year. The expenditure for maintenance of way and works was $16,889.95, a decrease of $2,624.42 from the previous year. The net earnings were $17,426.16 in 1892-93, an increase over that of the year previous of $3,431.68. A deficit in the years 1891-92 in the working of these roads, amounting to $612,204.24 has been reduced in the year 1892-93 to $26,124.00, such results having been attained in the manner in which I have related. I hope to congratulate the country year after year with the same tale as regards the working of these roads as I am enabled to do to-day. I find that even with a falling revenue I am enabled to show as goods results on the operation of these roads for the first ten months of the year ended 30th April. I will give you the figures:

The aggregate of which shows a net loss for the first ten months in 1893-94 of $76,270.63, and in 1892-93 of $88,293.66, which figures indicate somewhat similar net results at the close of the year on the 30th June, 1894, as for the year which ended on 30th June, 1893, and such may be looked for as each successive year passes by, so long as the present vigorous policy is enforced. Upon the Intercolonial in 1879 with 714 miles of road in operation the staff of employees consisted of 2,928, being a fraction over 4 men to the mile, whereas to-day with 1,142 miles being worked there are 3,623 men only employed, equal to a fraction over 3 men to the mile of railway, whilst it is well understood that as the mileage of road in operation increases, the number of employees do not necessarily increase at the same ratio, nevertheless one man per mile of railway is a very marked reduction. I would like to give the committee details as to the gross earnings and the working expenses, and where savings were effected.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The point I had reference to was as to how the additional profit had been made.

Mr. HAGGART. I am ready to give all the details, but it is a very long statement.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Has the Minister any statement showing the relative charges per mile of carrying freight per ton as compared with other railways?

Mr. HAGGART. That is all given in the report of the Railway Department. I brought down a return in answer to a motion of some hon. gentleman, giving the cost per mile on the Intercolonial Railway as compared with the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway and some other roads.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I was asking as to the charges for carrying freight and passengers.

Mr. HAGGART. I gave the rates per mile for carrying freight and passengers. I will now read a statement of the gross earnings and working expenses on the Government railways for the last year, as compared with the previous year:

I have full details of the mechanical department if the hon. gentleman would like to have them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The only point I specially wished to know about was whether the profits of $120,000 obtained in 1893, had arisen from more passengers and freight being carried, or from increased rates being charged.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not think there was any change, except a small increase in freight. We did away with one species of railway passenger ticket.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then the rates and the traffic remain the same?

Mr. HAGGART. The rates remain nearly the same, but in some places there was a slight increase in the freight rate on through traffic; and there was a doing away with a class of passenger tickets which made a considerable difference in the passenger rates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose a saving was made by practically doing away with some gratuitous passengers, dead heads?

Mr. HAGGART. The main saving was effected by doing away with a lot of trains which were considered unnecessary. I have full details of the earnings, traffic department, wages, fuel, light, conductors, and everything else, but at this late hour of the night I do not think I will trouble the House to read them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will just say this, that it is very evident from the statement of the Minister of Railways that the criticisms made in former years from this side of the House on the extravagant management of the Intercolonial Railway, were most amply justified. I am not in the least degree disposed to detract from the energy and exertions which have been used by the Minister and his officers in producing a more wholesome state of affairs, and I do not care at this time of night to say much as to the manner in which his predecessors managed the road. His own statement of itself, and some remarks that he made as to the extremely lavish character of the expenditure, show very clearly that for a number of years many hundreds of thousands of dollars of the public money were uselessly expended in the management of the Intercolonial Railway. There is one point, however, to which I wish to call attention, namely, that, practically speaking, this road represents a capital of about $50,000,000, the annual interest on which amounts to $2,000,000. Although, of course, we have to wait and see how far the present measures may operate without detriment to the maintenance of the road, we have to remember that, although this present showing is a very great reduction as compared with the expenditures by the hon. gentleman's predecessors, we are in this position: Here is a road on which the annual interest paid on capital is equal to $2,000,000, and the Minister tells the House that the revenue is cent per cent as compared with the expenditure. I am sorry to see, however, there is, even under the hon. gentleman's management, a sum placed to capital account no less than $300,000 or $400,000 last year, and as much this year. It appears to me the time has come when the country should expect to obtain a moderate revenue from the railway. On all other great railways, the maximum expenditure does not exceed seventy or seventy-five per cent, and, as the Minister is aware, it is in a great many cases very much below those figures. I am willing to make very considerable allowance for the circumstances that this road was not, in all respects a commercial undertaking, but still I think that, even under those conditions, we should be able to operate the Intercolonial Railway at an expenditure of something less than cent per cent of the total receipts. I trust the Minister will be able to assure the House that he will be able to reduce the percentage of expenses to something less than cent per cent of the receipts. I grant that, as should like to know if the hon. gentleman has made a considerable reduction; but some small revenue should be obtained on an outlay of $50,000,000 of the public money, on which the country is paying interest. I should like to know if the hon. gentleman is able to hold out any hope that he will be able to reduce the expenses still further, to say 80 or 85 per cent of the total receipts, so that, at all events, the country may be able to obtain some return, even one per cent would be a great desideratum on the capital stock of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. HAGGART. I am afraid that, in view of the rates charged for freight and passengers, and which have been in force ten or fifteen years, it will be impossible to promise the hon. gentleman any such return.

Mr. McMULLEN. How do the rates compare with those on the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Railways?

Mr. HAGGART. The passenger rates are about the same, but the freight rates are considerably lower than the roads mentioned.

Mr. McMULLEN. On coal, no doubt.

Mr. HAZEN. On flour, no doubt.

Mr. McMULLEN. It cannot be on flour; the Intercolonial Railway is not able to carry flour to the lower provinces as cheap as the American lines from Boston. What percentage of trackmen has the Intercolonial Railway?

Mr. HAGGART. Half a man per mile.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is the Minister aware that the Canadian Pacific Railway has considerably reduced the percentage of trackmen?

Mr. HAGGART. I do not think it has yet got as low as the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does the hon. gentleman know that, on the Canadian Pacific Railway, the rate at the present time is one-quarter of a man per mile?

Mr. HAGGART. I do not think it is.

Mr. McMULLEN. I know it is.

Mr. HAGGART. From the best information I am possessed of, it is not.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have the information from the roadmasters on the Canadian Pacific Railway, from their own lips, that it is a quarter of a man per mile.

Mr. HAGGART. You have wrong information.

Mr. McMULLEN. My information is correct.

Mr. HAGGART. I have given the information I have, and I try to keep myself posted on this subject. I gave the hon. gentleman my opinion, and I have asked my Deputy, and he says I am correct.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Deputy is misinformed. I have it from the roadmasters of the Canadian Pacific Railway that on the road between Montreal and Toronto the percentage is a quarter of a man per mile.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman is taking one section, whereas he should take the average of the whole line. There is a great difference between Montreal and Toronto and other sections.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman is late in interjecting information which is already in the possession of the committee. I am aware that now there are two men for every eight miles; the number was formerly three, and it was reduced to two. We are at the present time losing two million dollars a year on the Intercolonial Railway, or four per cent on the capital invested. There is yet room for large reductions. The hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has directed attention year after year to the great extravagance on the Intercolonial Railway, and men by the hundreds have been employed who have not been required, and the best evidence of this is the number of men discharged within the last few years. Several years elapsed since we took up this question, and since then we have forced from the Government a reduction in the number of men employed, and yet I am satisfied there is room for considerable saving to be effected if the road were operated with the same economy, care, and ability that characterize the management of the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Prince Edward Railway..... $250,000

Mr. BORDEN. I observe that a saving on the permanent way on the Prince Edward Island Railway seems to be very much smaller than the saving on permanent way upon the Intercolonial Railway. The saving appears to be about 11 per cent on the Prince Edward Island Railway, and it would seem that something like 33 per cent of the total saving on the Intercolonial Railway was on permanent way. I would ask the Minister whether he has maintained the efficiency of the Intercolonial Railway as it was prior to the reductions in cost of maintenance and permanent way?

Mr. HAGGART. My instructions to the officials are, that every part of the road-bed, the bridges, the fencing and everything else shall be maintained in as complete and efficient a manner at the end of the year as it was at the beginning, and my information from them is that it is so.

Mr. BORDEN. The saving strikes one as being enormous—something like a quarter of a million of dollars—on the Intercolonial permanent way. It is very clear, as pointed out by the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) that there must have been outrageously extravagant expenditure prior to the beginning of these economies. I would like to know how it comes that the difference is so marked between the saving on the Prince Edward Island road and the saving in this respect on the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. HAGGART. There is not only the saving in the maintenance of the way on the Intercolonial Railway, but there was a large expenditure, which I think was useless, for sidings and other works, which at present we do not consider necessary.

Geological Survey $60,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think we might let this item pass, it being the usual vote, but I would make the reservation that as the House is very thin we will take in concurrence any conversational discussion on the item which may be needed.

Mr. BORDEN. I understand that it is the practice of the department to give cabinets containing geological specimens to the different schools and colleges throughout the country. I was told by the Professor of Natural Science in Acadia College, in my county, that he had made an application a year or two ago for a cabinet of mineralogical specimens, and had not received it. I call the attention of the Minister to the fact, and I hope if the cabinet has not been already sent to Acadia College, that it will be soon forwarded.

Mr. DALY. We do furnish these specimens to the different colleges. If the hon. gentleman will write me a letter stating the college to which he alludes, I will see that the matter is attended to. If there has been delay, it is probably because there are so many orders to fill.

Mr. BORDEN. I will be glad to write the letter to the hon. Minister. Professor Coldwell of the Acadia College, told me in conversation within the year, that he had forwarded an application, but that he had received nothing except a mere formal acknowledgment of the letter.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 3rd July, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 154) further to amend the Acts respecting the Civil Service.—(Mr. Costigan.)

FAST LINE AND FRENCH TREATY.

Mr. LAURIER. I would ask the right hon. the First Minister if he would have the tenders with regard to the fast line, which were asked for, put upon the Table? And does the right hon. gentleman intend to bring down more papers with regard to the French Treaty?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will make inquiries about the tenders, and I beg to lay upon the Table informally a file of other papers in connection with the French Treaty.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 134) respecting the utilization of the waters of the North-west Territories for irrigation and other purposes.—(Mr. Daly.)

Bill (No. 151) respecting the Common School Fund.—(Mr. Foster.)

PROVINCE OF QUEBEC SUBSIDIES.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved third reading of Bill (No. 150) respecting certain subsidies granted to the Government of the province of Quebec by chapter 8 of the Statutes of 1884.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me that this Bill is objectionable in some particulars. I do not intend to offer any objection to its provisions in so far as the payment to the province of Quebec of the capital of the moneys voted in 1884 is concerned, but the Bill, as it is now, is in some respects objectionable. It seems to provide for the payment of the capital sum to the Treasurer of the province without making any provision as to the manner in which the money is to be applied. The hon. gentleman no doubt proceeds under the statute which was passed by the Quebec Legislature at its last session, the principal provisions of which are as follows:—

1. In order further to carry out the provisions of the Acts 45 Vic., chapter 21, and 49-50 Vic., chapter 2, which appropriated the price of the sale of the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, and the railway grant by the Dominion of Canada, under the Act of Canada, 47 Vic., chapter 8, to the sinking funds created by the Acts of this province, 37 Vic., chapter 2; 39 Vic., chapter 4, and 41 Vic., chapter 1, for the loans of this province, made in the years 1874, 1876 and 1878, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may name or appoint one or more trustees or agents, either in Canada, England or France or elsewhere, and may, on such conditions as may be deemed advisable, provide for the payment over to such trustees or agents of the sums received or to be received from the proceeds of the sale of the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, or from the interest to be received thereon, and from the railway grant of $2,394,000 made by the Dominion of Canada, under the Acts of Canada, 47 Vic., chapter 8, or the interest to be received thereon.

2. Should the said sums so to be received and the amount already received on account of the sale of the said railway or on account of the said grant, be more than sufficient to provide for the sinking funds, up to the time of such payment to the said trustees or agents, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may, on such conditions as he may deem best, appropriate or authorize the use of the balance of such moneys for the redemption or conversion of the public debt generally, provided satisfactory dispositions are made by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, for the payment into the sinking fund or to the said trustees or agents, in each year thereafter, of a sufficient amount to meet the requirements of the said fund.

The provisions of this last statute amount simply to this, that the moneys which are to be paid to the province, under the present Bill, are to be applied to the discharge of the public debt generally. This Act of the province of Quebec seems to me objectionable, in so far as it did away with provisions which had already been made for the application of this grant. In 1886, the Legislature of Quebec appropriated the money in the grant which had been made in this Parliament in 1884. The Act 49-50 Victoria provides as follows:—

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

The sum of $2,394,000 granted by the Government of the Dominion of Canada to the Government of the province of Quebec, in consideration of its having constructed a railway from Quebec to Ottawa, known as the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, shall be appropriated to the payment of the consolidated debt of the province, whenever the Dominion Parliament shall authorize the capitalized sum to be paid.

Those terms are general.

Such sums shall be paid into the funds created for the redemption of the loan effected under the provisions of the Act 37 Victoria, chapter 2, and shall be applied to the payment of so much of the loan made in virtue of that Act, and shall form part of the sinking fund created for the redemption of that loan.

Here it is provided that the grant of two million odd dollars made by the Parliament of Canada shall not be applied to the discharge of the debt of the province generally, but to the discharge of a special debt, that is the debt made in 1874, which, as we know, was the debt created for the construction of the North Shore Railway—not the whole of it, but a part of it. It seems to me it was, perhaps, an imprudent measure on the part of the Legislature of the province of Quebec, when it did provide for accepting this capital sum, not to carry out the disposition of the Act, but to make another and different application of the money which they had appropriated in 1886. We shall be told that this matter concerns only the province of Quebec and is altogether within the purview of their powers, and that it is not for us to look into the manner in which they apply their money. Generally there may be some truth in that statement, but I think we have the right on this occasion to look after the disposition of the money voted by the Parliament of Canada to the province of Quebec, because from the first, when the moneys were voted from the Parliament of Canada to the province of Quebec, the Parliament of Canada vested in the Government of Canada powers to look after the disposition of that money. I would refer the hon. gentleman to our own statute, 47 Victoria, chapter 8, section 2, in which is to be found the following:—

The subsidies to the province of Quebec shall be capitalized and the interest shall be payable at such time and in such manner as the Government of Canada shall agree upon with the Government of the said province.

Now, we have seen how this was agreed upon. It was agreed upon that the interest should be payable, but that whenever the capital and not the interest was paid, the capital should be applied as provided by the legislation of 1886, in reduction of the debt of 1874. So rigid was this provision that the money should be applied to this and no other, that section 4 of the Quebec statute of 1886 included the following:—

The Provincial Treasurer is prohibited from employing, even temporarily, any part of the said sum, or of the interest to be derived therefrom for any other purpose than that above enacted.

Under these circumstances, I will move the following amendment:—

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the whole House with instructions to amend the same so as to provide that the said sums shall be paid according to the provisions of 49-50 Vic., chap. 2, into the funds created for the reduction of the loan effected under the provisions of the Act 37 Vic., chap. 2, and shall be applied to the payment of so much of the loan made by virtue of that Act, and shall form part of the sinking fund for the redemption of the loan.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The amendment introduces a new principle into the legislation of this House, which, I think, the House will find it very inconvenient to follow. This Parliament, in the year 1884, set aside a capital sum for the benefit of the province of Quebec, and determined that the interest of that sum only should be paid to the province as an additional subsidy for the benefit of the province, and that the capital sum should not be paid. But the two Governments have agreed in thinking that, under present circumstances, it would be better for both parties that the capital sum should be paid over. The Dominion of Canada is paying the province of Quebec 5 per cent upon that capital sum, and the condition of the money market is such that the money can be replaced, so far as our treasury is concerned, with money borrowed at a rate less than 4 per cent, probably $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, including all charges and commissions. As regards the province of Quebec, in consequence of its state of indebtedness, while the province is receiving only 5 per cent from the Dominion treasury, it is paying more for its money now than it is receiving. Therefore, the arrangement by which the province shall receive the capital sum, and we pay it, is distinctly for the benefit of both parties. The province has made, or is about to make, an arrangement with its creditors by which this money is to be applied to the reduction of the public debt of the province, and, that being well ascertained and secured by the Act of the province under which we propose to pay the money to the province, we think that all the interests that this Parliament is in any way called upon to look after and safeguard are well looked after and safeguarded. The particular application of the money for the benefit of the province, that is the particular portion of the public debt to which it shall be applied we think is a matter in the care of the province itself, and we believe that it will be well cared for by the Legislature. The proposition of the hon. leader of the Opposition is that, inasmuch as the province of Quebec, after the passage of the appropriation for the benefit of the province in the way of a capital sum secured, with interest at 5 per cent, the Provincial Legislature resolved that the interest should be appropriated toward the sinking fund of a particular debt, we should see to it that the capital sum shall be applied to reduce that part of the provincial debt of Quebec. Now, I submit that this Parliament ought not to be charged with the duty of carrying out any provincial arrangement of that kind. Under the understanding with the creditors of the province, it may be that the original arrangement is to be carried out, or it may be that the sums to be diverted. The same power that pledged it to the payment of a particular liability may pledge it to the payment of another, and though the provincial statute has been passed more than six months, no allegation has been made on the part of anybody that good faith is being broken or the province has, in any way, misappropriated any portion of this money or that it contemplates any misappropriation. For this Parliament to step in and declare that the province of Quebec, though entitled to the capital sum, shall not have power to use it in a certain way, and that we shall see that the province does not disregard the right of its creditors, would be most offensive to the province of Quebec, and would burden this Parliament with the duty of looking after all the moneys appropriated for the different provinces.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

House proceeded to consider resolutions reported from Committee of Supply.

Cornwall Canal..... $450,000

Mr. LAURIER. I beg to move in amendment that this resolution be not now concurred in, but that it be resolved:

That in 1888 the Department of Railways, then presided over by the Honourable John Henry Pope Minister of Railways, decided to enlarge the Cornwall Canal;

That representations were then made to the said Minister of Railways by different persons urging that the portion of the said canal between Mille Roches and Moulinette should be abandoned and a new channel substituted thereto by the erection of two dams, one at the foot and the other at the head of Sheik's Island;

That it was represented to the said Minister that the new channel would offer material advantages over the section of canal between Mille Roches and Moulinette;

That after having had the whole matter investigated by competent engineers, the said Minister of Railways decided that in the public interest there should be no change in the location of said canal and that it should be enlarged where it had been originally placed;

That Parliament voted appropriations for the enlargement of the said canal between Mille Roches and Moulinette, and that a contract for the construction of the necessary works was entered into on the 2nd November, 1888, between the Department of Railways and the Gilbert Blasting and Dredging Company who were the lowest tenderers for the same ;

That after the said works had been partly completed and after a sum of $125,000 had been paid to the said Gilbert Blasting and Dredging Company under their contract, the department about the year 1891 cancelled the said contract with the said company in order to have the said canal located along Sheik's Island according to the suggestions made to the said Department of Railways in 1888, and then declined by the said department, the said department thereby entailing upon the tax-payers of Canada a loss of $125,000 paid to the said company as aforesaid and a further loss of over $30,000 claimed by the said company as damages caused to them by the breach of contract on the part of the department ;

That later on a new contract for the construction of two dams, one at the foot and the other at the head of Sheik's Island, was entered into by the Government with the firm of William Davis & Sons for the price of $384,000, and that the said contract was so awarded without any tender being asked for the construction of said works ;

That the action of the Department of Railways in cancelling a contract for works approved by Parliament and substituting other works without the authority or sanction of Parliament was unconstitutional and dangerous to the public interest ;

That the action of the Department of Railways in cancelling the contract with the Gilbert Blasting and Dredging Company, when a sum of $125,000 had been paid to the said company for works which thereby became perfectly useless, and when a further sum of over $30,000 was claimed by the said company as damages for refusal of the department to carry on their part of the contract, has inflicted upon the ratepayers of this country a loss of over $150,000.

That the action of the Department of Railways in letting the construction of the dams at Sheik's Island without tenders has openly and deliberately violated the law of the land, and that the whole course of the Government in these matters deserves the severest censure of this House.

At the last meeting of the House we had this matter debated at length, therefore I will offer no remarks on the subject, but content myself with merely placing this amendment in your hands.

COUNTY COURT JUDGES, B. C.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved concurrence in the following resolution reported from committee :—

That it is expedient to provide that the salaries of the judges in the county courts of Cariboo, New Westminster, Yale, Nanaimo and Kootenay, in the province of British Columbia, shall be $2,400 each per annum.

Resolution concurred in.

SUPERIOR COURT—PROVINCE OF QUEBEC.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved concurrence in the following resolution :—

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide, with respect to the Superior Court in the province of Quebec, that if the chief justice resides at Quebec, the judge residing at Montreal who is appointed by the Governor General in Council to perform the duties of chief justice in the district of Montreal as it is comprised and defined for the Court of Review, or, if the chief justice resides at Montreal, the judge residing at Quebec who is appointed by the Governor General in Council to perform the duties of chief justice in the district of Quebec as it is comprised and defined for the Court of Review, shall receive in addition to his other salary, $1,000.

Mr. BRODEUR. Mr. Speaker, before this motion is concurred in, I think it is my duty to offer a few remarks to the House in order to oppose, if possible, its adoption. I would like to know if the right hon. the Premier has been informed that the provincial law on which he bases this resolution, is in force? Judging from the remarks made by the Premier the other day, he appeared to be under the impression that the law in the province of Quebec on which he relies, has been proclaimed. I am under the impression that that law is not yet in force.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to explain in what sense he thinks it is not in force.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes. That law would have to be put in force by proclamation, and I have not yet been able to discover after diligent search that it has been proclaimed. Perhaps the Government has been informed that the proclamation has been issued.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, I have been so informed by the Attorney General of the province of Quebec.

Mr. BAKER. It was proclaimed on the 12th of May, 1884. It is to be found in the official 'Gazette.'

Mr. BRODEUR. But the law in question was passed by the Quebec Legislature in 1887, and the proclamation of 1884 would not apply to it.

Mr. BAKER. It was proclaimed in the month following its passage by the Quebec Legislature. It will be found in the official 'Gazette.'

Mr. EDGAR. Which year?

Mr. BAKER. I thought it was in 1884; but at all events the law was passed in one month and the proclamation was issued in the month following.

Mr. BRODEUR. I think the hon. gentleman is misinformed. There was a statute passed by the Quebec Legislature in 1884, providing that when the chief justice resides in Quebec, the senior judge residing in the district of Montreal discharges the duties of chief justice in that district. I understand that the law of 1884 is still in force, but what I contend is, that the new law of 1887, providing that the acting chief justice for the district of Montreal should not be the senior judge, but should be a judge appointed by competent authority, has not yet been proclaimed. Section 3 of that statute of 1887, provides that it shall only come into force by proclamation, so that if there has been a proclamation issued in 1884 as the hon. member (Mr. Baker) says, it would have no relation to this Act. In the Act of 1887 it was specially provided by section 3, chapter 12, that the law should not come into force until it was proclaimed, and I understand that that proclamation has not yet been made. Now in 1888, we had the Revised Statutes of the province of Quebec by which some previous statutes were revised and some of those were not revised. The statute of 1884 is one of those which have not been revised and abrogated. The best proof that I can give the Prime Minister that the proclamation has never been issued is: that in the Revised Statutes of 1888, it was specially provided that the law should be put in force by the proclamation, and though I have searched since 1888 in the official 'Gazette' for the proclamation, I have not found it. Appendix "A" of the Revised Statutes of Quebec contained the following :—

Appendix comprising the schedules of Acts and parts of Acts to be repealed from the day on which the Revised Statutes of the province of Quebec take effect, in so far as the said Acts relate to the province of Quebec, and are within the powers of the legislature thereof.

We see in that appendix the statutes which have been repealed, but we do not see chapter 7; so we must infer that the statute of 1884 has not been repealed. We see besides, in the same appendix, that chapter 12 respecting the constitution of the Superior Court had been revived, except the last clause of section 1 respecting the present officers, and section 3 concerning putting the law in force. So it is clear to my mind that if the proclamation had not been issued—and I do not know if it has been issued, but although I have searched elsewhere, I have not found that the proclamation has been issued—the law of 1888 had not been put into effect, and the law of 1884 was still in force. Moreover, we see section 3 of the statute of 1887 has not been repealed. But if we consult the articles referred to by the Prime Minister, articles 2316 and 2317 of the Revised Statutes of the Province of Quebec, we find an asterisk placed after each of those sections, and it is stated in the foot note at the bottom of the page that those two sections shall come into force on proclamation being made or something to that effect. Consequently, taking that note which refers to articles 2316 and 2317, and taking the appendix, which forms part of the statute, we can come to no other conclusion than that the law of 1884 is still in force, and therefore the law of 1887 is not in force. Of course I do not know if the proclamation has been issued; of course, it would materially change the position if the proclamation were issued, but my impression is that the proclamation was never made. And I must add that the resolution submitted by the Government is a very dangerous one under the present circumstances. 'La Minerve' during the last month published special articles on this question, and in one of the articles, published on 11th June, 1894, it distinctly asserted that if the Government wanted to appoint some other judge in Montreal as acting chief justice than Mr. Justice Jetté, they should pass a special Act. That article contained a proposed change in the law which was practically identical in its wording and expression with the terms used in the resolution now before the House. Must we infer from that fact that the Government has submitted this resolution in order to prevent Mr. Justice Jetté becoming acting chief justice of the district of Montreal? At all events 'La Minerve' in these articles, written or inspired by Senator Tassé, one of the leaders of the Conservative party, declared that if the Government want any other acting chief justice in Montreal than Mr. Justice Jetté they should pass a special Act in order to prevent that judge becoming acting chief justice. It is not necessary for me to say many words concerning Mr. Justice Jetté; but I assert, and I challenge any member of the Bar of the district of Montreal to contradict my assertion, and the Minister of Public Works, who is well acquainted with Mr. Justice Jetté, will say with me that there is not a judge more just and more highly respected in the district of Montreal than is Mr. Justice Jetté. I understand by 'La Minerve' that the Government should appoint some other judge, and in order to do so pass a law so as to enable them to appoint an acting chief justice. It would be a great mistake on the part of the Government to pass such a law under the circumstances. If the Government should make such a move, we would be under the impression that the Government desired to prevent Mr. Justice Jetté becoming acting chief justice. I repeat, that nothing can be said against that judge—that he is a most respected judge, that he is a most able and talented man among the judges in the district of Montreal. He has been professor of civil law in the University of Laval for many years. He is senior professor of Laval University, and I believe he is respected by every one, not only in the district of Montreal, but throughout the province of Quebec. Then why should the Government endeavour to pass a special Act in order to prevent that judge becoming acting chief justice? If the Government desire the judiciary to be respected, if they desire justice to be as pure as possible, and the judges to be respected not only in the province but throughout the Dominion at large, the Government should not endeavour to adopt the action proposed and to pass a law which has a special meaning as in this case. I may say to the hon. Prime Minister that I observe that Conservative newspapers of Montreal, like 'Le Monde,' admits that there is no man better qualified than is Mr. Justice Jetté for the position of acting chief justice for the district of Montreal. It is true that Mr. Justice Jetté was, twenty years ago, a member of this House, and was a Liberal. But I do not think that fact is sufficient to prevent that judge, who is so able and respected, administering justice so efficiently as to prevent him from becoming acting chief justice. There is, in fact, no reason why the Government should press the resolution submitted. What would be the condition of affairs if such a law were passed? According to the British North America Act the constitution of the courts is in the hands of the Local Legislature. It has been decreed by the Local Legislature that the senior judge in the district of Montreal shall be acting chief justice at Montreal, when the chief justice resides in Quebec. On the chief justice being appointed, and I understand Sir Napoleon Casault will be the man appointed, Mr. Justice Jetté will be the senior on the Bench in the district of Montreal, and he will be, ipso facto, acting chief justice. We would be in a very curious position if the Government appointed some other one than the senior judge. Suppose it should appoint Judge Loranger, Judge Gill or Judge Davidson as acting chief justice. The judge thus appointed would receive the additional salary of $1,000, but he would not possess the authority of the acting chief justice. We would have an acting chief justice, but at the same time he would not have the power to draw the additional allowance of $1,000 provided by this resolution. Under these circumstances the Government should not pass the resolution submitted, or continue to press it. It would be better to make no change in the law in order that the senior judge should be acting chief justice, and should receive the salary. The change the Government propose is this: to change the words "senior judge" to the words "the judge appointed by a competent authority." That is to say, that the Government wishes to secure the appointment of the acting chief justice. Is there any reason to change the law? Why not allow the senior judge to perform the duties of acting chief justice? I see no reason why this resolution should be passed, and I hope the Government will not press it.

Mr. BAKER. I do not deem it necessary in considering this question to discuss the relative merits or demerits of the judges of the province of Quebec. They are all honourable men, and are all able, upright and impartial judges. But my learned confrère, the member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur), has fallen into an error in the discussion of this question. It is true that the law as originally passed by the Legislature of Quebec provided that the functions of acting chief justice should be exercised by the senior judge who resided in the city of Montreal when the chief justice resided in Quebec, and vice versa. In the course of time the hon gentleman's leader came into power in the province of Quebec, and it did not suit him to travel on the highway that had been travelled by the previous Legislature, and it was Mr. Mercier, whom the hon. gentleman followed with such devotion while he reigned in the province of Quebec, who introduced the new law. It was he who, animated by the hope of having patronage to be dispensed to his friends, thought it was not best that the senior judge should exercise the functions of acting chief justice, and it was he who introduced and carried through the Legislature the law which provided that one of the judges of the Superior Court might be appointed by competent authority to exercise the functions of acting chief justice. This law was enacted under the regime of Mr. Mercier, and it was duly proclaimed. The proclamation will be found on pages 1146 and 1147 of the official 'Gazette' for the year 1887. I repeat that it was Mr. Mercier who passed that law, and the Dominion statute providing that an extra amount of $1,000 annually should be paid the senior judge was necessary in order to make it square with the law as it existed at the time the provision was made for the extra salary. It now becomes necessary, in order to harmonize the Provincial and Dominion Statutes and make the salary go with the appointment, to amend the Consolidated Statutes, and to provide that the extra salary of $1,000 shall be given to that one of the judges of the Superior Court who may be appointed by competent authority to exercise the functions of a chief justice. If this law were not passed, and an acting chief justice were appointed by competent authority, as he is bound to be appointed now, the senior judge would get the extra salary, while one of the judges who might be appointed by competent authority would exercise the functions. The hon. gentleman is entirely under a misapprehension in supposing that the law was not proclaimed. It was proclaimed in due course, and is in force; and this Bill is necessary to make the salary go with the appointment. If any blame attaches to any one for changing the law, it must be laid at the door of the late leader of my hon. friend.

Mr. LAURIER. What is the date of the proclamation?

Mr. BAKER. The 11th of June, 1887.

Resolution concurred in.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 155) further to amend the Act respecting the judges of Provincial Courts.

Motion agreed to; and Bill read the first time.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Bill (No. 149) further to amend the Acts respecting the North-west Territories was read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 5,

Mr. CHARLTON. Is it proposed to allow sheriffs' fees in addition to a salary of $500?

Mr. DALY. Yes. The only change in the law is to give the Legislative Assembly power to legislate with respect to the remuneration, by fees or otherwise, of sheriffs and clerks. As the law now stands, they have not that power.

On section 6,

Mr. CHARLTON. What is the effect of this?

Mr. DALY. This repeals sections 60 and 61 of the Act. Section 60 provides that each clerk shall be paid such fees as the Lieutenant-Governor in Council prescribes, and section 61 provides that any sheriff or clerk may, with the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor, appoint a deputy. In 1891 these sections were amended, but we are repealing them now, as there is no further necessity for them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You now allow the sheriff to arrange that by contract with his deputy?

Mr. DALY. Yes. The Act of 1891 provides:

Each sheriff and clerk shall appoint a deputy or deputies at such places within the district and with such powers as are from time to time determined by an ordinance of the Legislative Assembly.

In case of a vacancy happening in the office of sheriff or clerk by reason or death, incapacity or otherwise, his deputy may perform his duties until a successor is appointed; and where there is no such deputy the judge usually exercising jurisdiction within the judicial district may appoint a person to fill the vacancy in the meantime.

The Legislative Assembly may, subject to the provisions of this Act, define by ordinance the powers, duties and obligations of sheriffs and clerks, and their respective duties.

Mr. FRASER. Was that law repealed by a subsequent law now being repealed?

Mr. DALY. The clause now being repealed was amended in the way I have read, and that should have been repealed in toto at the time.

Mr. FRASER. The effect will be that that will be the law?

Mr. DALY. The law will be as provided by the statutes of 1891.

Mr. FRASER. Which were not repealed by the other Act?

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Would it not be more consonant with the general principles of government if the Lieutenant-Governor, on the advice of his Council, had the power of making the temporary appointment instead of the judge?

Mr. DALY. This seems to satisfy the views of the people there.

On section 7,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me that restriction of three years' residence in the Territories is unnecessary. If a man is a British subject and has the other qualifications, there ought to be no restrictions as to period of residence.

Mr. DALY. This is framed exactly in accord with the desire of the North-west Government. Apparently the consensus of opinion there with reference to the appointment of police magistrates, is that they should have the qualifications given here. Any person after three years' residence would have a better idea of the administration of criminal and municipal laws in the Territories than one who had just arrived.

Mr. DALY.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The duties of magistrates relate mostly to the administration of laws of Canada and not simply to those of the Territories, and in every part of Canada the magistrates will possess that knowledge.

On section 10,

Mr. DALY. At the time of the passing of that North-west Territories Act the prohibitory liquor law was in force, and there was no recourse in the case of a debt due for intoxicating liquor. Since then a license law has been passed, and this is to permit the authorizing of wholesale dealers and others to recover debts due for the sale of liquor, which they cannot do now.

Mr. DALY. Section 5 in the Act of 1888 related to proceedings at elections, and subsection 4 to the payment of members. We are providing that they may provide for their compensation themselves, and also have the right to enact laws respecting proceedings at elections.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is still deferring the day when responsible government will be introduced into the Territories. When you confer upon them the power of electing a Legislature, I do not see why the principle of responsible government, to the extent of their authority, however little that may be, should not be introduced. By section 17 the Legislative Assembly may from time to time appoint a committee of four persons from among its members to advise the Lieutenant-Governor in relation to the expenditure of territorial funds and of any moneys appropriated by Parliament for the Territories. To what extent is the Lieutenant-Governor bound by the advice of these four persons? Is he at liberty to disregard it? There is no reservation, no indication of any responsibility resting upon the parties. I do not see any ground of responsibility here or any theory or principle upon which the work of government is to proceed. I have looked over some of the expenditure of the Territories, and it seemed to me they were very extraordinary; but there has been no opportunity of bringing them under the attention of Parliament. I think we ought to adopt some intelligible rule or principle and establish real responsibility.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Does not this enactment really cover the whole ground when we read it in connection with the other enactment in force? We have authority to send instructions to the Lieutenant-Governor; so have the Executive in the mother country power to send instructions when a Governor General is sent here. So far the provisions are parallel. Then there is an enactment that the committee shall advise the Government on all matters of expenditure. These are the matters in relation to which this Parliament deals with the Territories. Parliament passes the appropriation necessary to carry on government in the Territories. It then enacts that the Governor shall be advised by the Executive Committee as to these expenditures. There is no enactment that the Governor shall take their advice, nor is there any enactment that the Governor General shall take ours. But the constitution proceeds on the assumption that when it is the will of Parliament that the Government is to be advised, it is the will of Parliament that he shall follow the advice. As to the other matters governed by ordinances, such as appointments, it is enacted that they shall be made and other things done by the Governor in Council, which is defined by the interpretation ordinance to mean the Lieutenant-Governor and the Executive Committee.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman knows that under our constitutional system the law distinguishes—or, at all events, the conventions of the constitution distinguish—between the royal will and the personal will of the sovereign. But I do not see any provision by which that rule or principle would be applied in this case. Under our constitutional system the Governor chooses his officers. The royal will is that they shall be chosen from the party having the majority in power. I apprehend that here the majority would make the choice. You do not leave the Governor any discretion at all as to who his advisers shall be. You put the whole discretion in the Legislature, which, it seems to me, is not the most convenient or most satisfactory system, because there may be personal and active canvass amongst members of the Legislature as to the appointments, which could not exist if the will of the Lieutenant-Governor or his discretion were allowed some play. But, if their will or advice is not followed, under a constitutional system, they would tender their resignation. What would be the effect here? The Legislature is chosen by the people, not by the Governor, and the Legislature might insist that they should continue to be his advisers. I do not see, myself, how this system could be practically worked out. If it has not produced friction, it must be because there has been either a great deal of indifference or a great deal of forbearance.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think that any friction has been caused. This is the system they have been working under. If a difference of opinion occurred between the Governor and his advisers, the Legislature might insist that he should have the same set of advisers, and in that case we would give them greater latitude.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You do not give them the power of dissolution.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; the power of dissolution remains here. But they would apply to the Federal authorities to ask the Lieutenant-Governor to act on their advice.

Under our present system, and especially under the system as it would be under this Bill, the expenditures are practically under the control of the Legislature. It only extends so far as the Legislature may please to give them the discretion in matters of expenditure. In all other matters, as I said, their ordinances provide practically that he shall take their advice, because he has to act upon the advice of the Executive Committee.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me that what we ought to do with regard to the public moneys expended in the Territories under the supervision of the Territorial Government is to give them a lump sum and let them decide how these moneys shall be distributed and for what purposes they shall be employed. I am quite sure that any member of the House who will take the trouble to look over the appropriation for schools will see that it is out of all proportion to similar expenditures in any other province in the Dominion. There cannot be the same interest in the use of the money that there would be if a larger sum were appropriated by direct taxation or in some other way by the people themselves. As long as we say for what purpose the money shall be employed, we are practically keeping the Legislature in leading strings and preventing responsible government from developing.

Mr. DALY. It seems to me the feeling on the part of the present Council, as well as of the Legislature, is that the present system is preferable, that they do not want responsible government. So far as the lump sum appropriation is concerned, they practically have it now, because in the Supply Bill it was enacted that no vote for the fiscal year 1893-94 should lapse, consequently they can expend whatever is left of any vote this year without any other authority than the Supply Bill. I may say for the information of the hon. gentleman that this clause is adopted word for word from Ordinance No. 1 of 1892. Subsection 2 must not be overlooked. It provides:

The said committee shall be styled "The Executive Committee of the Territories," and the members thereof shall severally hold office until their successors are appointed.

That is to get over the difficulty that will probably occur this year. The House there will be called together in August and then an election will be held, as the Legislature will expire by the effluxion of time. This provides for the Executive Committee being in power in the meantime until the Legislature is elected and the successors of the present Council are appointed.

On section 21,

Mr. CHARLTON. What is the reason of that?

Mr. DALY. This transfers from the Dominion Lands Act the clause that existed there since 1893. The clause reads :

The Lieutenant-Governor and Assembly of the North-west Territories may, with the consent of the Governor in Council, close up any road.

And so on. Action has always been taken by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council ; but in order to comply with the provisions of the Act of 1892, it would be necessary to await the action of the Assembly before any road could be closed up, and this new clause overcomes that difficulty. It was a mistake at the time it was passed, but it was overlooked. All the Orders in Council so far have been passed with the consent and advice of the Lieutenant-Governor and his Council, and it is to overcome that difficulty that subclause 2 provides that they are declared to have been and to be valid.

Bill reported.

FRAUDULENT SALE OR MARKING.

Bill (No. 123) in restraint of fraudulent sale or marking, was read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Mr. CHARLTON. Would this section prohibit the sale of adulterated articles that are professedly so, for instance, of coffee that is adulterated with chicory ?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). No, it does not interfere with a compound article of food. The only change this section makes to the law as it now stands, is in adding the words, "exposed for sale."

On section 3,

Mr. CHARLTON. Might not a penalty of $100 in some cases be excessive ?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). This is the law at present. We are merely re-enacting the law here.

Mr. CHARLTON. Even if we are, if anything in the old law was liable to criticism, it may be criticised now. It strikes me that a retail dealer selling an inconsiderable quantity of some article that may be impure or have been adulterated, if made to pay a fine of $100, would be treated rather harshly.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). If the hon. gentleman had been in his seat the other day he would have heard the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) contend that we were not going far enough in this direction.

Mr. CHARLTON. That would not bind me to think that we were not going too far.

Mr. DALY.

On section 5,

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I want to add a new clause, in accordance with the suggestion of the hon. member for South Oxford :

The penalties prescribed by this Act shall, as respects the third item mentioned in Schedule B, not become operative until the first day of October, 1894.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is that with regard to Paris green ?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). No, in regard to vinegar.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 118) respecting the Inspection of Electric Light.—(Mr. Wood, Brockville.)

THE INSURANCE ACT.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 111) to amend the Insurance Act.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have given notice of some amendments. I do not, however, propose to take them up to-day, but simply to consider the Bill as submitted by the committee.

Committee rose and reported progress.

INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT—DRAWBACKS.

House resolved itself into committee on resolution (page 4889) respecting drawbacks on certain goods.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAURIER. Is there any departure proposed from the existing law ?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). No. What we have to do now is to go to the Treasury Board to grant drawbacks in certain cases, such as when there is a batch of sour beer made. The hon. gentleman who was Minister of the department of which I am Controller, will know what that means.

Mr. LAURIER. What do you propose to do ?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). To give it by departmental order instead of going to the Treasury Board. Where alcohol is purchased and used as part of the raw material in the manufacture of patent medicines, we propose to allow a drawback to the extent on the medicine that is exported. Where there is malt used and the beer turns sour it is destroyed under the supervision of one of our officers, and we propose to allow a drawback on that.

Mr. McMULLEN. Would it not be better to allow these drawbacks by statutory provisions rather than to give power to grant them by Order in Council? Under this resolution the House practically parts with its power of supervision over these matters.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). We ask that the department shall have power to give these drawbacks and not the Governor in Council. The practice has been that the department shall make a recommendation to the Treasury Board for a drawback, when the inspector reports that there has been a sour batch of ale made, and never in a single case has the Treasury Board gone back on the recommendation of our inspector. However, it causes considerable delay to get the sanction of the Treasury Board, and I think the hon. gentleman would have sufficient confidence in the department that it would do at least, that, which is merely a matter of detail.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not for a moment challenge the accuracy of the transactions of the Department of Inland Revenue. But is it wise to give the head of each department power to regulate the terms upon which these drawbacks shall be made? If this power is given, the representatives of the people will have no control over it, nor will they know anything about it.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). This simply refers to malt purchased for use in the manufacture of beer. That malt is made under the supervision of one of our officers, and is put into the process of manufacturing beer. The beer turns out to be sour; our officer is on hand, and sees that it is destroyed. For twenty years the practice has been, acting on his report, to recommend the Treasury Board to refund the amount of duty paid upon that. The Treasury Board does not meet every week, or every month, sometimes not for two months; and for this reason there is a good deal of delay. I am not very particular about it, however.

Mr. LAURIER. If the hon. gentleman is not particular about it, I think he had better give it up altogether, because the principle is not a sound one—the principle of vesting authority in an officer of the department to remit duties without being subject to any supervision. There may, perhaps, be occasions where it would be an injustice to exact the duty, as in the case just mentioned by the hon. gentleman. We ought not to subject the manufacturer to the payment of duty on an article which is not saleable; but to confer upon a departmental officer the power to remit the duty, may be the occasion of introducing abuses which the law has thus far guarded against, by putting a supervisory authority over the departmental officer. The reason the hon. gentleman gives for the change is that delay is caused, nothing more. This may cause inconvenience to the manufacturer, but I fancy not very much; and, since the hon. gentleman is not very particular, I think he had better leave the law as it is. He says the Treasury Board does not meet once a month, or once in two months; but there could be no harm in its meeting oftener if necessary.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I will ask that the resolution be adopted now, and, as I have to ask for some other powers in the Bill to be founded on the resolution, we can have full time on the Bill for discussion, whether this provision should be retained or not. I have not the slightest desire to insist on the passage of this portion of the resolution if it is objectionable to the committee.

Mr. LAURIER. I am not objecting to the resolution being adopted, but I would advise the hon. gentleman to consider the proposition again, when I think he must come to the conclusion to leave the law as it is. He is proposing to vest in an officer of the department, that is to say, in the head of the department, powers now vested in the Treasury Board.

Resolution reported.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 126) further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, was read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Most of these changes are mere corrections of errors in printing.

Section 207, by adding at the end thereof the following subsection:—

2. The 'public place' in this section includes any open place to which the public have or are permitted to have access and any place of public resort.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is a provision about vagrancy and loitering in any street, road, highway, or public place, so as to include lanes, passage-ways and alleys, to which the public have resort, but which are not public places in the sense of ownership by the public.

Section 208, by striking out the following words in the second and third lines: 'before two justices of the peace.'

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This relates to the offence of vagrancy. Hitherto it has been in the jurisdiction of one justice of the peace. The Act requires two justices of the peace to sit.

Section 540, by striking out the words 'Part XI, Escapes and Rescues; any of the sections in this part.'

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Section 539 refers to the court of general or quarter sessions of the peace, and section 540 says that no such court as mentioned in the next preceding section has any power to try offences under any of the following sections, and we wish to add escapes and rescues to the jurisdiction of that court.

Mr. LAURIER. That is, you make them indictable offences?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes. I wish to move for leave to add the following paragraph immediately after section 549, to be called 549a:—

Any person who is charged before two justices of the peace with any offence, under sections 523 and 525, may, on appearing before the justices, declare that he objects to being tried by them, and thereupon such justices shall not proceed to the trial but shall deal with the case in all respects as they would on a charge made before them for an indictable offence, and the case may be prosecuted on indictment accordingly.

This is in relation to what are called trade union offences. An assault committed during a strike, for instance, or anything of that kind. They are rather serious offences, and it has been held by one judge in Ontario that the effect of a revision of the law in the code has been to put these entirely in the jurisdiction of the magistrate, and this is to restore the right of the prisoner to a trial by jury if he wishes one.

On section 5.

5. Whenever, in the province of Quebec, it has been decided by competent authority that no term of the Court of Queen's Bench, holding criminal pleas, is to be held, at the appointed time, in any district in the said province within which a term of the said court should be then held, any person charged with an indictable offence whose trial should by law be held in the said district, may in the manner hereinbefore provided obtain an order that his trial be proceeded with in some other district within the said province, named by the court or judge; and all the provisions contained in this section shall apply to the case of a person so applying for and obtaining a change of venue as aforesaid.

Mr. LAURIER. I think this is very objectionable. At present in the province of Quebec, the Attorney General may order that the regular term shall not take place. This is often done when there are only minor cases; but if there were a capital offence and if the Attorney General were to give such an order, it would be in the power of the prisoner to ask for a change of venue. I would not find fault with the practice of the Attorney General ordering that there shall be no term, when there are no offences of any great consequence to be tried; but I think that whenever there is a man charged with a grave offence, it should be the duty of the Attorney General to order his trial to proceed. By this provision, you furnish a temptation to dispense with the regular terms, and force the prisoner either to remain in jail or stand his trial somewhere else.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. OUMET. The province has full jurisdiction in the administration of justice, and the Attorney General has now the power to dispense with a useless term. In the case of a grave offence, we must take it for granted that the Attorney General would not use this power. When a man is in jail under a charge of murder, it would be quite unreasonable for the Attorney General to postpone the term for six months. At all events we have nothing to do with that. What we are doing now is to give the prisoner the option of getting his trial elsewhere, when the Attorney General does dispense with the term.

Mr. LAURIER. The Attorney General might not dispense with the term in the case of murder, but might do so in a case of felony. A man might be in jail for larceny or for arson, and the Attorney General might say that as there was only one case, there would be no term, and the accused would have to remain in jail or stand his trial in the neighbouring district where he might not have the same facilities for defence.

Mr. OUMET. We must presume that the Attorney General will duly weigh all the reasons; and if he dispenses with a term of the criminal court, when he should have held one, he is responsible to the Legislative Assembly for his conduct.

Mr. CURRAN. I think my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, has perhaps misconceived the bearing of this particular section. We give no additional powers whatsoever to the Attorney General, and we make no attempt whatever to change the law as it stands with regard to the holding or withholding of a term. That remains as it is, and the Attorney General will exercise his authority in the future exactly as he has done in the past. The only change that is made here is for the benefit of the prisoner himself. The prisoner being incarcerated, if the Attorney General exercises the power of dispensing with the term then the prisoner may exercise the privilege given here of having his trial in an adjoining district.

Mr. OUMET. There is another remedy given to the accused. He may take out a writ of 'habeas corpus' and the judge under the powers vested in him would allow him out on bail if the circumstances were shown to warrant it.

Mr. LAURIER. That is quite enough. What I object to is the extension of the power. If the Attorney General does not hold the court, then the prisoner would have to make application as suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. Oumet). But, under this law the prisoner would be more likely to be led to take his trial at some other place, perhaps Quebec or Montreal. The section applies only to the province of Quebec. Why not to the other provinces as well? Because it is not considered possible that in these provinces such a contingency should arise as there being no court at the proper time for the prisoner to have his trial. I do not object to economy being observed as far as possible, but there are limits beyond which it should not go. If the prisoner is in jail, he has the right to a trial by a jury of his countrymen. The law provides that that trial shall take place where he resides, and that rule is not departed from except when good cause is shown. But now you want to deprive the prisoner of the benefit of that rule.

Mr. CURRAN. It is a privilege given the prisoner.

Mr. LAURIER. You force the man to remain in jail for six months unless he is willing to take the option of being tried in a district where he is not known, where he has no friends and to which he may have no means of bringing his witnesses. Every man knows the advantage to a prisoner, who is supposed to be innocent until he is proven guilty, being tried where he is known. The common law of the land gives him that privilege. You say you want to do him a favour. I call it the reverse of a favour. Let the law stand as it is, and the Attorney General will be more likely to have sittings of the court even when there are but few prisoners to be tried. Take the case of Chicoutimi, for instance. This is about a hundred miles from Quebec and a hundred miles from Charlevoix. Say there is one man incarcerated, charged with arson or larceny. The Attorney General would be tempted to issue a proclamation dispensing with the term, in which case the prisoner would be given the option, which the hon. gentleman calls a privilege, of remaining in jail six months longer, or being carried to the city of Quebec for his trial, at great additional expense to himself. I do not want that he should be placed in such a position.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) I fully concur in the remarks fallen from the hon. leader of the Opposition. The amendment now before the House, if adopted, would result in bringing about the objectionable change contemplated by the hon. Attorney General of the province of Quebec, when he introduced in the Legislature, a few years ago, his Bill respecting the reorganization of the courts of the province. The very substance of the amendment now under debate had been embodied by the Attorney General in his first Bill, when he contemplated transferring all criminal cases to the courts in the larger cities; thereby depriving the counties of Charlevoix and Chicoutimi of their criminal jurisdiction. The hon. Attorney General, however, soon understood the objectionable nature of such a change; he felt that it would be most unfair, on the grounds stated by the hon. leader of the Opposition, to compel the prisoners to take their trial in some other districts where they are not known; and he, therefore, gave up the idea of embodying the objectionable clause in his Bill for the reorganization of the courts, which came before the Legislature last year. Should we now adopt the proposed amendment, the very objection which the Attorney General tried to obviate would recur. Suppose the Attorney General, on what he may think good grounds, were to dispense with the regular term of the court to be held in January, 1895, at Chicoutimi; prisoners who had been waiting in jail for their trial, for over six months, could, undoubtedly, avail themselves of the privilege of appealing to the provisions of this amendment. But would you force them to remain in jail for six, twelve, fifteen months, until the Attorney General should deem fit to grant them a term. The amendment now under consideration, Mr. Chairman, embodies the same objectionable feature, and would, I think, result in bringing about the very same state of things which the Attorney General tried to obviate by striking off this clause from the Bill introduced by him in the Legislature last session.

Mr. LAURIER moved that the clause be struck out.

Amendment negatived: yeas, 20; nays, 26.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 126) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.

(In the Committee.)

On section 806, of schedule.

Mr. EDGAR. At this point I would suggest an amendment to come in just after section 662. A few weeks ago the House voted the second reading of a Bill affecting the law of grand juries, but owing to the state of public business the third reading will not be reached. With the consent of the leader of the House, I would suggest that the clause which was carried by the House in that Bill should be adopted in this place as part of the general criminal law. Therefore, I would move an amendment that this be added as an amendment to section 662:

Notwithstanding any law, usage or custom to the contrary, seven grand jurors instead of twelve, as heretofore, may find a true bill in any province where the panel of grand jurors shall not be more than thirteen, provided that this subsection shall not come into force until a date to be named by the governor by proclamation.

Mr. OUMET. Would the hon. gentleman tell us what he means by the words "when the panel is not more than thirteen?" Is it the actual panel, or is it the summons panel?

Mr. EDGAR. The panels which are called to do business, the necessary number to do business. This provides that there shall always be a majority, that there shall never be less than seven.

Mr. OUMET. In our province the number of jurors summoned is always twenty-four, twelve English-speaking and twelve French-speaking. As a rule, twenty-three is the number who act.

Mr. EDGAR. In the first place, this does not come into force until proclamation by the Governor; in the next place, it only applies to provinces where the panel has been reduced to thirteen.

Mr. TISDALE. Do the provinces regulate the panel?

Mr. EDGAR. Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Committee rose and reported progress.

SUPPLY—EXPENDITURE ON ELECTIONS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I desire to address some observations to the House. On the 22nd November last, a trial was brought to a close in this city which, in some ways, partook of the nature and importance of a state trial. The defendants in that trial were Thomas McGreevy and N. K. Connolly, and the charge for which they were tried was that of conspiring to defraud the Quebec Harbour Commissioners and the Governor in Council in connection with procuring contracts and with improper dealings in connection with those contracts, the contracts being for very large and important public works between the Quebec Harbour Commissioners and the Government, on the one hand, and Larkin, Connolly & Co., a well-known firm of contractors, on the other hand. The expenditure connected with these works was very large, and their construction extended over some years. The result of the trial was the conviction of the defendants, Messrs. Connolly and McGreevy, and they were sentenced by Mr. Justice Rose, who conducted the trial, to one year's imprisonment in the common jail of the country. Great and unusual public interest attached to that trial, and it was quite to be expected that it should be so, for a good many reasons. One was the prominence of the defendants. The Hon. Thomas McGreevy had been in public life for many years. He was a prominent figure in this House from Confederation to 1891. He was not exactly in the Cabinet, but he was next to the Cabinet in supporting the Conservative party while they were in power, and also while they were in Opposition. N. K. Connolly, the other defendant, was a wealthy man, and a very large and well-known contractor in the country. This trial attracted public interest for another reason. We know quite well, from the comments of the press at the time, the trial aroused public interest in the events of 1891, when remarkable disclosures were made before a committee of this House respecting Messrs. McGreevy & Connolly, and others, which were, to a large extent, the cause of the downfall of one of the Conservative leaders. That trial also suggested to the public, and brought to the minds of the people something that happened in 1892. The 'Globe' newspaper published throughout the country, with great enterprise, lithographic facsimiles of certain documents, and those documents were also brought to the attention of the House. Then it must be admitted that the interest the public took in that trial was not lessened by the remarkable circumstance that instead of serving out their term of one year, the prisoners were allowed out at the end of three months of their sentence. Another matter which still further excited public interest about the trial was the fact that, arising out of those investigations of 1891, where it was disclosed that the Government had been robbed to an enormous extent by the contractors and by Mr. McGreevy, a civil suit had been brought by the Government to recover large sums from those contractors, and that civil suit is still pending in the courts. I cannot help feeling that another, and a still greater reason for public interest attaching to that conspiracy trial was the fact that it was well known that a leader of the Conservative party was still remaining within the Cabinet, although he was largely interested in the distribution at least of the funds that were found to have been criminally received by Mr. Thomas McGreevy from those contractors. I certainly think that the country expects to hear something from Parliament this session, the first session after that trial, on the subject at least of the political aspect of that trial, and the duty devolves on me to-night to bring before the attention of this House what I think is the fair and reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the evidence and records that are before this House in respect to the political action of two of my fellow members who are in this House to-night. What was the consideration, the purpose and object of that conspiracy of which those men were found guilty? It was the obtaining of money by Thomas McGreevy from contractors in exchange for improper influence and secret information supplied by him to them. That was its object. What was its result, in a pecuniary sense? The result of that conspiracy was that large sums of money were actually paid over by the contractors to Thomas McGreevy, and were received by him, and that out of those moneys a large sum was paid to Thomas McGreevy by the contractors for a specific and clearly-defined object and purpose, that was for the election expenses of the Conservative party. Now, Sir, the amount of these moneys was estimated by one of the counsel for the Crown, Mr. Osler, in his address to the jury at the opening, at something over $119,000, and the judge, in his charge, said that $117,000 may be considered upon the evidence to have gone for election expenses, while other sums were shown before the parliamentary committee, to have gone for political purposes in addition to those I have mentioned, and for other general pecuniary purposes. This might be very interesting, indeed, to investigate further, but I will confine myself now to the political purpose to which those funds were devoted. What I contend is this: That the conspiracy was, to the extent of its providing those funds for the elections, a political conspiracy. The plea may be made that the political object lessened the crime and in anticipation of a plea or defence of that general nature, that the political object of this conspiracy ought to lessen the crime, one of the counsel for the Crown, in opening the case for the jury, made some remarks which I will take the liberty to quote. Mr. Osler said to the jury:

Mr. EDGAR.

Those items of larger expenditure with altered entries amount altogether to $119,438. Now, what is to be said about these? It is said, and will probably appear in evidence before you, that these items were paid out by this firm of contractors to Mr. Thos. McGreevy and others for the purpose of being expended in election expenses connected with various elections that went on from time to time. Well, gentlemen, it will be for you to consider whether that circumstance does not aggravate instead of lessen the offence. If these moneys were paid out for the purpose of corrupting electors it is worse, not better, for the defendants. It is a very serious crime for you to consider if a man by irregular practices obtains public money for his own pocket that is one thing, but if he obtains it for the purpose of influencing the minds of men in exercising their franchise, and that money comes from public contractors, one of the most serious offences against good government and the community that is possible is committed.

Again, after the evidence had been put in, and after the appeals had been made by counsel for the defendants to the jury for acquittal on the ground of the political character of this expenditure, Mr. Osler said:

It is suggested by my learned friends, on the other side, that we should have invited those whom my learned friend Mr. Blake, chose to call the Noblemen of the country, whoever he may mean. I apprehend he means those higher in authority. By that suggestion he means that something was done with this money which was wrong further on beyond the hands of Thomas McGreevy, and that these are the men we ought to get at. But Thomas McGreevy's counsel says:—"I decline to give those away. I stand dumb. I won't say what I did with the money. I won't say who received it." And he chooses to take the consequences of that, he chooses to plead to you that this was honourable on his part.

What is it that he conceals? What sort of honour is it that calls forth that concealment? And the great poet has described that sort of honour in describing Launcelot's dealings with the Queen:

"His honour rooted in dishonour stood,
And faith unfaithful kept him falsely true."

Now, did the judge, when he charged the jury, tolerate, for a moment, such a plea as that? He dealt with it as an able and upright judge might be expected to do, and I quote from his charge to the jury, as follows:—

It is no defence to say that this contract was let, or this influence was given or the service was rendered in consideration of a money subscription being given by contractors to assist any Government, any Minister, any member of Parliament in either corrupt or legitimate expenses. The whole confidence of the public in the administration of public affairs would be gone, the whole watchfulness over contractors would be taken away, and the contractor who would sink his conscience sufficiently to give the largest sum would be the man who would have the ear of the departmental officer, and be able to pull the largest amount of money out of the public exchequer. * * * *

It has been suggested in the course of this trial that such things are not uncommon, and that if it did occur it was in pursuance of a system. If so, it was a system as vicious as can be suggested, and as improper as can be perpetrated.

In passing sentence the judge pointed out in language that could not be misunderstood that there were other offenders on whom the vengeance of the community should be visited. He said:

The offence is one which affects many, which is against public policy, which is against the good government of the people and cannot be lightly treated, and yet I have no desire, and shall not yield to any cry for severe punishment which might visit upon single offenders the vengeance of the community, or the justice which ought to be administered towards many.

Is it a secret any longer as to who were the beneficiaries of those election funds? It was a mystery before the jury, who had no evidence before them to show who were the "noblemen" of the country, those high in authority referred to by Mr. Osler. Is it, to-day, a mystery who these were? Even the judge had no direct proof by which to identify the Government, the Ministers, the members of Parliament he referred to, who were assisted by these subscriptions, under a system which he characterized as "as vicious as could be suggested and as improper as could be perpetrated." That evidence does exist to-day. It is written in the records and papers before this House. It discloses the names of those who received the proceeds of the conspiracy from the minor culprits who were found guilty, and it throws upon this House the responsibility of acquitting or condemning the beneficiaries under that conspiracy. The evidence to which I will direct the attention of hon.

gentleman is mainly to be found in two appendices of the Journals of this House. Appendix No. 1 of the Journals of 1891, contains the evidence taken by the committee on Privileges and Elections on charges made by Mr. Tarte, then the member for Montmorency, against Mr. Thomas McGreevy and Sir Hector Langevin. The appendix to the Journals of 1893, in this other blue-book, is a report of a Royal Commission on charges against Sir Adolphe Caron and is accessible to all the members of this House. It will be remembered that the inquiry of 1891 was somewhat restricted by the refusal of Mr. McGreevy to answer questions that were asked him as to the disposal of the election funds that came to his hands; and it will also be remembered that the inquiry of 1893 was also considerably restricted by the Government on that occasion voting down a motion for a full inquiry. Yet, fortunately, an important portion of this very conspiracy fund is traceable with absolute certainty from its criminal source to its disgraceful and corrupt destiny, the debauching of the electorate by two Ministers of the Crown. In order to trace a considerable portion of this conspiracy money, I would quote from page 909 of the blue-book of 1891. Mr. Thomas McGreevy was examined, and he admitted that he had received $55,000 for political purposes. He was asked by the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), who is still the chairman of that committee, the followinig questions:—

Q. You say you got $55,000 for political purposes?—A. Yes.

Q. You did not say on behalf of which party; I think the committee would like to know that?—A. The Conservative party.

Q. Exclusively?—A. Exclusively.

Q. Nothing went to any other party?—A. No.

The amount was proved to be much larger than this; but we will confine ourselves to the amounts that are admitted. Now, coming right down to a particular occasion, to the general elections of 1887, and taking Mr. McGreevy's admissions in that old inquiry, he says at page 908:

Q. As a matter of fact, you actually received in connection with the election of 1887 $20,000?—A. Yes, $20,000.

There is other evidence, given by Robert McGreevy and by Murphy on that occasion, showing other and larger sums; but I will not waste the time of the House in discussing whether that evidence should be received or not. We come down to this clear and distinct admission which cannot be denied. Now, what was the position of Mr. Thomas McGreevy in 1887? He said very frankly to the chairman that this money was expended exclusively for the benefit of the Conservative party in the elections of 1887;

Mr. EDGAR.

but then we find that he occupied a special position of trust and confidence in the ranks of the Conservative party in the district of Quebec: he was the political treasurer for his party in that district. This is proved by himself in the Tarte inquiry at page 997; it is proved by himself in the Caron inquiry at pages 161 and 162; it is proved also by Sir Hector Langevin in the Tarte inquiry at page 1,136; and Sir Adolphe Caron himself, in the inquiry of 1892, at page 224, says:

McGreevy received all election funds for the district of Quebec.

Now, in following up this $20,000 item, it is important to know if it was set apart and applied to any special purpose, or if it was thrown into a general reptile fund and distributed among and for the benefit of Ministers, members and candidates. It is clear, from what I will show to this House, that it came under the control of the managers of the general fund, and that they were the beneficiaries of the sum. Take Thomas McGreevy's evidence on that point. In the Tarte inquiry, at page 997, his evidence is as follows:—

Q. Did you take receipts from the parties to whom you paid the money?—A. Well, I had other moneys besides that.

Q. Would you make any exceptions in the political moneys received from Larkin, Connolly & Co.?—A. Well, I will tell you. This money was spent in the general election of 1887. I had other moneys besides that, and they were all mixed together.

Then he says:

They were all mixed up together. They were mixed up with others—the other moneys I had. I got them in confidence. I have a large number of receipts, covering a much larger amount than that, but there is no distinguishing between them. The money is all mixed up together; I cannot distinguish between the two.

Now, Mr. Speaker, so far we have it made perfectly clear that the funds McGreevy received were large election funds, in part the proceeds of the conspiracy. We have it made clear that he was the treasurer for the Conservative party for the district of Quebec in the general elections of 1887, that a large portion of the conspiracy funds went into the elections, and that they formed part of a mixed reptile fund for the district of Quebec. Now, this one branch of the case is complete, and compromises the Conservative party, first, of the district of Quebec, and, secondly, of all Canada, so long as they do not repudiate and denounce the transaction. But now, what do we know of any and the amount of other contributions to this mixed reptile fund? We know perfectly well from the blue-book that Sir Adolphe Caron himself collected for this fund $25,000, which he handed over to this same Mr. Thomas McGreevy. He collected it from Senator Ross, who was president and practical owner of the Lake St. John Railway Construction Company, who had got Dominion subsidies for that railway passed and afterwards assigned to him to secure his advances to the contractor; and, if anything was left over, he got it from the Construction Company. We see all that on pages 223 and 224 of this blue-book of 1893; and the strange part of it is that it appears from the evidence in that blue-book that after this gift of $25,000 in February, 1887, by the late Mr. Ross to Sir Adolphe Caron, for this fund, there were $262,000 of subsidies granted by the Dominion Government to this very Lake St. John Railway Company, every dollar of which subsidies were to go to Mr. Ross. And that $25,000 was not paid openly; it was not entered openly in Mr. Ross's books. You will see by his book-keeper's evidence in the report of the Royal Commission, at page 177, that it was not charged to election funds at all. It was charged to Mr. Beemer, the contractor; but it was paid by Mr. Ross's hands into Sir Adolphe Caron's hands, and carried by him in dirty bank notes and bills and put into Mr. Thomas McGreevy's hands for the political purposes of the campaign. Why, Sir, in this 1887 election fund, we find that Mr. Beemer, the contractor for this railway, is shown by his books to have contributed $25,000 towards this election fund, which he marked with the letters "G.E.F." these, he explained, not being the initials of the Finance Minister, but General Election Fund. But the other initials, which also appear in his books, "A.P.C." he had to admit were the initials of the Postmaster General. The evidence is so very curious and contradictory as to these items contributed by Mr. Ross and Mr. Beemer, that, when this report was discussed before the House, a gentleman so much accustomed to analyse and sift evidence as the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), was forced to the conclusion that there was not one sum of $25,000, but two separate sums. And the photograph of a letter which I have in my possession, and may refer to later, shows that the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) did not think that Mr. Ross was even doing his duty when he gave the $25,000, but referred Mr. Valin to him to get more money, should he require more, and not be able to get it from Mr. McGreevy. So far as we have evidence or can find out, there was not one dollar of disinterested contribution to this general election fund of 1887. It was all from contractors or subsidized patriots—every cent of it. It was much worse than Judge Rose could ever have imagined it was, when he made the comments I have read. Now, another branch of this case is to find out who controlled and who distributed this mixed fund for 1887. In the evidence given before the Royal Commission, Mr. McGreevy threw some light upon that. He said that two things were arranged apparently. He said:

It was arranged that there was a certain amount of money, and it was to be paid according to orders.

Q. I want to know who it was that directed and controlled these arrangements?—A. At what time?

Q. We will say during the elections of 1887?—

A. I think it was Sir Hector Langevin and Sir Adolphe Caron. They consulted about it:

Q. You say Sir Hector Langevin and Sir Adolphe Caron. Were there any others?—A. I am not aware of any others. I have paid without written orders some, but the bulk of it was paid out in written orders.

Sir Adolphe Caron is very explicit on that point, because in his own evidence, at page 224, he explains the whole thing in this way:

Mr. McGreevy was one of a committee composed of three, the Hon. Sir Hector Langevin and myself being two of the three, and Mr. McGreevy being the third and the treasurer for the purpose of that campaign. These amounts were distributed after discussion between the three members of that committee, Sir Hector Langevin, myself, and Mr. McGreevy. They were distributed in what we considered to be the legitimate and indispensable expenses of the various counties which we were looking after in the district of Quebec.

We may have to see what these gentlemen's ideas of legitimate and indispensable expenses were on that occasion; but at any rate that is what Sir Adolphe Caron said about them. It is just to observe that Sir Adolphe Caron includes Mr. McGreevy in the committee, whereas Mr. McGreevy modestly disclaimed control himself, and said he simply handled the money for the other two. That, however, does not make very much difference, for if he were not on the committee, no doubt he knew a good deal about it. Then Sir Adolphe Caron further gives us light on that point. He says at page 228 of the report:

The three members of the committee discussed together, and we decided that such and such a county would receive so much. No amount, to my knowledge, was ever given out until we three agreed that that amount should be given.

It is therefore clear, beyond a shadow of doubt, that both Sir Hector Langevin and Sir Adolphe Caron were active agents in controlling and distributing the whole of this immense fund, including at least $20,000 which came out of this conspiracy money in connection with which McGreevy and Connolly were sent to jail. It is also clear that if any sums were paid out of the funds for their own constituencies, both were parties to the payments, because Sir Adolphe Caron says: "No amount was ever given out until we three agreed that amount should be given." I think, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that in the motion which I shall place in your hands shortly, I am absolutely bound to include both of those gentlemen who controlled and distributed every cent of that fund. I propose to include them both, and under the circumstances I do not see how I can avoid doing so. They both shared the benefits of that fund and should share the responsibilities. In the months of April, May and June, 1893, the Toronto 'Globe' displayed its remarkable newspaper enterprise by publishing a series of documents purporting to be lithographic fac similies of orders, letters and receipts of Sir Hector Langevin and Sir Adolphe Caron, passing between these gentlemen and the Hon. Thomas McGreevy as treasurer in 1887. I have procured copies of the papers of these dates, and will lay them on the Table for the information of any members who may desire to inspect these beautiful photographic engravures. A large part of these documents are also on record in the proceedings of this House and in the 'Hansard' of the 15th June, 1892, so that any member may refer to them. Now, the genuineness of these has never been denied. In the Royal Commission Sir Adolphe Caron does not dispute the documents relating to himself, which were produced by Mr. McGreevy. But, in view of any dispute as to these relating to Sir Hector Langevin, I obtained from the 'Globe' people original photographs—which I have here and which I submit for inspection by members of the House—of orders and receipts, &c., something over thirty in number, which connect Sir Hector Langevin with the distribution of these funds in a most striking manner. Now, it will be found that there were written orders on this fund given by Sir Adolphe Caron for twelve counties, and by Sir Hector Langevin for fifteen counties. A number were for the same county, but, in all, they covered twenty separate counties. This does not include Quebec West, but the treasurer himself provided carefully for that—his own constituency—out of the fund under his own control, but, apparently without anybody's order. No orders have been produced for Quebec West. But I do not suppose that Mr. McGreevy would go through the formality of making an order upon himself to pay for himself. Now, Sir Adolphe Caron ordered at least $5,100 to be paid for his own county out of the fund. Admitting that he subscribed nothing more, we have an idea of what he considered legitimate and indispensable election expenses. Sir Hector Langevin's election cost the fund $13,150, as shown by vouchers which I have here. The list of vouchers which I hold in my hand connected with the election at Three Rivers covers the period between the 31st of January and the 3rd of March, and includes these items: $500, $1,000, $1,500, $1,000, $4,000, $2,000, $3,150, total $13,150. Now, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) said, in 1891, in the course of his evidence, which I may have to refer to a little later on, that he took care not to know anything about any expenditure for his own county. He was very particular about that. He did not know anything about any of these matters anyway, but about his own county he was particularly careful to know nothing. But he had forgotten what he had said to Mr. McGreevy in a foot note to an interesting letter I have here. Because, after all these sums, excepting the last $3,150 had been paid to various gentlemen under orders from Mr. Panneton, the manager of the Bank in Three Rivers, La Banque du Peuple, and Sir Hector Langevin's chief election pusher—not agent, but promoter—we find the following letter dated the 26th of February, 1887,—the election was held on 22nd February—addressed to Mr. McGreevy. The letter is in French, but perhaps hon. gentlemen will excuse me from reading it in French. I will translate it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. In French.

Mr. EDGAR. I am afraid that a good many English people would not be able to understand my French, but perhaps that would not be so bad if I was able to believe that the French members could understand it.

MY DEAR MR. MCGREEVY,—The battle is finished and we remain victorious. I felicitate you upon your success. We are indebted yet in the sum of $2,689. Sir Hector last evening gave me this word—which you will find herein. I have done for the best. He ordered me not to lose this election. Pelletier has spent on his side at least $6,000. The fight has been terrible. As this sum has been borrowed from a friend, and as it will be due on Tuesday, will you have the amount deposited on Monday and telegraph it to me. If you prefer to see me, telegraph Monday morning early and I will go down at half past eleven A.M. Sir Hector wishes that nothing shall be neglected. Bien à vous.

P. E. PANNETON.

Then there is this:

I have learned that $7,000 has been spent by the committee of Pelletier. In the last two days he has made enormous efforts. Destroy this.

P. E. P.

And here is a little memorandum at the bottom of the page, and in a handwriting which I think we all know—

MY DEAR MR. MCGREEVY,—Please hear the bearer.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

That prayer was heard. You will remember that in this letter Mr. Panneton asked for $2,689. Apparently, on the 3rd March Mr. McGreevy had not yet paid the amount, for Mr. Panneton addresses Mr. McGreevy again—

MY DEAR SIR,—The draft in question has been drawn. It is by A. G. Gouin. I have added $281 to settle some accounts of which I did not know before. It will be presented to you to-morrow morning by the Banque du Peuple. Our friend wishes that all should be arranged in order to avoid all disagreement. We are going to take means not to have any protest.

Yours truly,

P. E. PANNETON.

And here is the draft drawn by Mr. Gouin for $3,150 on Hon. Thomas McGreevy, Quebec, dated at Three Rivers, March 3rd, drawn at sight, and marked paid. That shows also what Sir Hector Langevin's ideas were of legal and reasonable expenses. Now, you will remember that he cautiously refrained from connecting his name with any order, but, if you will remember, Sir Adolphe Caron has told us that no amount was ever given out until "we three" agreed what the amount should be. Therefore, all three knew what was given to Three Rivers. I can tell you, as a fact of interest, that there were only 640 votes polled for the hon. gentleman at that election. Although there is evidence of a great deal more money provided for this Three Rivers election that I will not refer to, here alone we had $13,150 paid for these 640 votes, or over $20 apiece out of this blessed fund. Those are moderate and reasonable election expenses, of course. Now, what does the law say about things of that kind at elections? Section 118, chapter 8, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, says:

The payment, advance, loan or deposit by or on behalf of any candidate, before, during or after an election, otherwise than through the regular agents, is illegal, and the person making the same is guilty of a misdemeanour.

Section 120 says:

The statement of election expenses shall include payments made by the candidate, and any agent or candidate who wilfully furnishes to the returning officer any untrue statement, is guilty of a misdemeanour.

Now, Sir, we have the published election expenses of Sir A. P. Caron for the county of Quebec, in 1887, as follows:—Personal expenses, $58; expenses of agents, $846.46; in all, $904.46, Mr. H. A. Turcotte being the agent who vouched for that being accurate. Now, deducting that from the $5,100, for which we find his own orders for his own county, it leaves to be classed as illegal, a balance of $4,193.54, the payment of which looks very much as if it might possibly be considered by a court and jury to be a misdemeanour if it were brought before them. I am, however, only dealing with political iniquities to-night, not misdemeanours. Now, we have also the published election expenses of Sir Hector Langevin for Three Rivers, in 1887. They are also in their way very curious, and exceedingly moderate: personal expenses, $30; agent's expenses, $887.09. They are very particular about cents; it is well to be so when one is honest and above-board. That leaves to be classed as illegal expense, a balance of $12,232.91. Did the Minister of Justice direct the prosecution of his colleagues? Or will he do so? I do not ask any verdict of misdemeanour against them; I only ask a political verdict from this House. Now, there is another feature in this case. At the Tarte inquiry in 1891, Mr. McGreevy was examined, but persisted in refusing to give particulars as to how he spent the election funds of 1887, received from Larkin, Connolly & Company. Afterwards, in 1892, when he was examined before the Royal Commission, he changed his mind. I cannot tell you all he was asked, but on that occasion in 1891, when he repeatedly refused to answer, he said:

I decline to answer, it is a matter of confidence.

I decline because I cannot separate them from the other moneys.

I decline because it was given to me in confidence.

I decline because I could not properly separate it.

I decline because it has nothing to do with this.

I decline to give the names because I was a trustee of these funds, and it was to be kept in confidence. I am not going to make a breach of confidence.

Now, Mr. McGreevy had declined to compromise Sir Hector Langevin at that time; that is clear, and the opportunity existed for Sir Hector Langevin, if he chose to do so, to make a denial of his knowledge. Sir Hector Langevin was also examined after Mr. McGreevy had refused positively to answer, and decided to go to jail, decided to be expelled from the House, before he would open his mouth. Sir Hector Langevin was called before that committee and examined, and he did not refuse to answer. I think myself it would have been better for him if he had. Being examined under oath by Mr. Davies, these are some of his answers, as found at page 1.136 of the evidence:

Q. For your own election was there never any money distributed from the party funds?—A. I am not aware of any.

Q. To whom would it be paid if for your benefit?—A. I do not know. I take care when an election comes on to know nothing of the kind.

Q. It seems to me, that as political leader of the party, you must have been aware of large sums of money paid to others for political purposes?—A. Mr. McGreevy never told me those things and I never asked him.

Q. Are you aware that Mr. McGreevy paid, as Treasurer of the political fund, large sums of money for political purposes in Quebec?—A. I do not know. He may have done so, but I do not know.

Q. Your answer is that you do not know that he paid any personally. You may have your presumption but you do not know?—A. I say that I do not know personally that he has done so. I believe that he contributed to these elections, but I have no knowledge about my own elections.

Q. Or other elections?—A. If I were asked how much Mr. McGreevy has contributed to this election or that, I do not know.

Q. It is not the contributions of Mr. McGreevy, but the contributions from the fund that he was Treasurer of?—A. That is what I mean.

Q. You never applied to him for money for political purposes during these elections?—A. I do not know that. I might tell him that there were wants in a certain county or another county. I may have told him that.

Q. Did you specify approximately the amounts that would be required?—A. I do not think so.

Q. You would leave it entirely to Mr. McGreevy to say what amount would be given to each district?—A. Yes.

Q. I do not want names. I want generally the amount?—A. I can not give you that information.

Q. You swear you cannot give any information on that point?—A. I never knew what amount he might have for election purposes in his hands as treasurer or organizer.

Q. Did you apply to him for political purposes to be paid in any part of Quebec?—A. No.

Q. And you are not aware that he paid any?—A. No. I believe he has, but I do not know.

Q. Did you direct any body to do that?—A. Do what?

Q. To go to Mr. McGreevy and see that moneys were paid for political purposes?—A. I might have referred parties who came to me: "You must go and see Mr. McGreevy; I have nothing to do with that." If you ask me to name any person, I could not do it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you have seen what happened about his own election. You have seen his own directions to Mr. McGreevy: that he was to hear the bearer Panneton, and you have also heard from the bearer Panneton what it was for and what he got, and you have heard that Sir A. P. Caron swore that no amount was ever given out "until we three agreed what amount should be given," and that $13,500 is covered by those amounts distinctly and clearly. Then as to the other cases apart from Three Rivers, we have seen that he arranged for the fund, that he and Sir A. P. Caron sat down and apportioned the whole of it, and he distributed part of it. I have here, as I say, thirty-two different orders of his own, signed by himself, containing directions in detail, many of them. Some of them I might trouble the House with reading. For instance, here is the first one to Mr. McGreevy about Mr. Valin:

MY DEAR MCGREEVY,—Mr. Valin has come. He says that he wants some help for his legal expenses.

Oh, yes; legal expenses; always legal expenses.

Do what you think proper and necessary and send him for any more to Senator Ross. This county is very hard.

Then there is at the foot of the letter a receipt for $500. These letters are all signed by Sir Hector Langevin in his own handwriting. This $500 was received by Mr. Valin. Again, in regard to the county of Portneuf. There is a final amount on 21st February of $200. The papers show that the treasury had been previously drawn on for $3,000. Here is a letter to Mr. McGreevy:

MY DEAR MR. MCGREEVY,—Please let Mr. Dionne have $200 for legal expenses, on account of Portneuf. That is the last.

Mr. EDGAR.

This shows the scrupulous care exercised in intrusting the funds to proper parties, so that they might not go wrong. I will now read a letter from Sir Hector Langevin to Mr. McGreevy, dated 17th February, 1887. It relates to St. Maurice, and is as follows:—

MY DEAR MR. MCGREEVY,—Mr. F. L. Desaulniers has sent the bearer, Mr. F. M. Gelinas, a trustworthy man, to receive the balance of what comes to him for his legal expenses in St. Maurice. Please do so.

H. L. LANGEVIN.

P.S.—You should obtain a receipt of course.

"Received $500, F. M. Gelinas."

That shows the businesslike care and accuracy with which the whole matter was carried out. It is extraordinary that Sir Hector Langevin's memory was so utterly blank as regards the whole of this subject in 1891. I hope these papers will refresh his memory to-night. Here is another document showing the care that Sir Hector took—it relates to the county of Rimouski. It is a letter to Mr. McGreevy:

DEAR MR. MCGREEVY,—Mr. Charles Taché, brother of our candidate in Rimouski, leaves tomorrow morning for Rimouski. I think you might on the balance allotted for legal expenses of that county let him have $800. He is a safe man.

Received, $800, J. C. Taché.

He is a safe man—they were all very careful about the kind of men to whom they intrusted the balance. There were orders signed by Sir Hector Langevin for all of these. Here is another document which shows the trouble Sir Adolphe Caron sometimes gave Sir Hector, and I think it was hardly fair. This letter is in regard to the Bellechasse election, and is as follows:—

MY DEAR MR. MCGREEVY,—Mr. Bealleau (Narcisse), brother of Isidore Bealleau, our candidate in Bellechasse, has come down with Mr. Labrecque, for balance of what may come to the election for legal expenses. It is urgent it appears. Please do what can be done. They have been running after Sir Adolphe all day. They cannot find him. Perhaps you might tell them where he is.

I do not know whether the hon. member for Bellechasse will take any interest or not in this communication. Possibly the party was told where Sir Adolphe Caron was; but at all events these matters were kept quiet and he took a receipt for $500. I dare say I have presented enough facts to refresh the hon. gentleman's memory; but I could run over the whole business. In Beauce he wants to intrust $200 to a faithful friend. It will be observed that they are all faithful friends apparently, because the amounts were rather in excess of the amounts required for legal expenses. An hon. friend says legal appropriations. They were not in excess of the appropriations, but they were in excess of the statements of legal expenses published by the candidates. For what reason was Mr. McGreevy expelled from this House? He was expelled for refusing to answer inquiries of this kind. Sir Hector Langevin did not. I will not characterize the nature of his answers; I will leave that to the House to do so. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is reasonable to ask, what have Sir Hector Langevin and Sir Adolphe Caron to do with this particular sum of $20,000 received from Larkin, Connolly & Co. for the 1887 elections? I say they have everything to do with it. Mr. McGreevy has explained it in the evidence I have read. There were certain moneys placed in his hands—the evidence is to be found at page 162—and orders were given to pay them out. It was arranged, he said, that there should be a certain amount of money, and it was to be paid out according to orders. The evidence was as follows:—

Q. I want to know who it was that directed and controlled these arrangements?—A. At what time?

Q. We will say during the election of 1887?—

A. I think it was Sir Hector Langevin and Sir A. P. Caron; they consulted about them.

Q. You say Sir Hector Langevin and Sir A. P. Caron; were there any others?—A. I am not aware of any others.

Those gentlemen, Sir Adolphe Caron and Sir Hector Langevin, had intimation of the exact extent of the funds, because Sir Adolphe Caron, in his evidence, at page 228, said:

The three members of the committee discussed together, and we decided that such and such a county would receive so much.

Therefore, they had the whole funds before them when they arrived at that decision. There is direct evidence that both knew of this large contribution by Larkin, Connolly & Co. But no direct evidence was required. They accepted the money, they gave no possible or pretended consideration for it, to Mr. McGreevy at least, and they dealt with it and distributed it as if it was their own. Did they suppose it dropped from the clouds? Did they shut their eyes to other sources of supply, besides the McGreevy source? No. Sir Adolphe Caron had his eyes open, and kept them open, and received in bank notes $25,000 with his own hands. He did not shut his eyes to the source of supply. So far it appears that not a cent of the reptile fund came from disinterested political supporters. Can any sane man believe that either of those gentlemen was ignorant of every one of the foul sources of supply? Was the nature of the fund so irreproachable, was its object so pure, was its distribution so legitimate, that the distributors could wrap themselves in a mantle of virtue and sternly demand from Thomas McGreevy to know that this golden stream only flowed from pure and unpolluted sources? No. It was never pretended that they asked such a question of Thomas McGreevy, or ever received or could have received such an assurance, a false assurance from him. They knew all about the Larkin-Connolly fund. They knew as much as we knew, and a great deal more. What were the relations of Sir Hector Langevin and Mr. McGreevy? They were of a prolonged and intimate character. For ten years Mr. McGreevy had lived with him in his house, and they had shared the same office. In public and private life they were bound up together. The evidence shows—I can give all the pages—that Mr. McGreevy during this time indorsed, financed and floated a $10,000 note for Sir Hector Langevin, and paid the interest on it out of his own pocket for years and years for Sir Hector Langevin. The evidence also shows that Mr. McGreevy contributed $35,000 to support Sir Hector Langevin's personal organ 'Le Monde.' Mr. McGreevy in a moment of weakness disclosed to his brother his relation to Sir Hector Langevin. Here is a letter dated 1st of March, 1886, which was quoted by the judge at the conspiracy trial, submitted to the jury, and also to be found in this report of the proceedings of 1891, as exhibit J-2 at page 20. Mr. Thomas McGreevy writes to his brother:

I have had a long interview with Perley on harbour works and graving docks at British Columbia. Fleming was to have signed his report to-day on harbour works. It will be shown to me as soon as signed. I will see it to-morrow and Sir Hector and myself will decide what is to be done for future. He will adopt my views. I will see you and Murphy about it before doing anything. It is a big thing for the future.

Can there be any possible question about Sir Hector Langevin's relation to Thomas McGreevy. What was Thomas McGreevy, convicted for? He was convicted of conspiring, and using his influence with Ministers in order to wring a reptile fund out of contractors. Is it not infinitely more discreditable for these very Ministers to have conspired, as they did with Mr. McGreevy, to use that very fund to debauch and corrupt the people at the general election? Is it not more disgraceful to have conspired as they did, with Mr. McGreevy, to flood their own constituencies with enormous illegal sums out of these very funds collected by a crime? Mr. Speaker, before the Carleton jury were brought, only Thomas McGreevy and N. K. Connolly, and again to quote the judges charge to the jury:

Those who stand high or low may be equally guilty, and it might be right to have them brought before the Bar of Justice and their punishment awarded them, but with that, neither you nor I have anything to do.

And the judge was right. But with that this House and every member of it has everything to do. I bring before this House for their judgment two of the offenders, and

I ask, not that a criminal but that a political sentence be passed upon them. I charge that common political decency demands a verdict and a sentence at our hands. When these glaring facts of political corruption are laid before you, as I formally lay them before you now, you cannot, you dare not, ignore them. Are we to advertise ourselves as a pack of arrant hypocrites and pass here laws against electoral corruption; and place severe laws upon the Statute-books against trifling offences, and yet allow these crimes to go without condemnation. Shall the illegal expenditure of a dollar, unseat, or perhaps disqualify a member of this House before a judge, and shall illegal expenditure of $4,000 by one Minister in his constituency, and $12,000 by another Minister in his constituency, not meet with the censure of this House? Mr. Speaker, after the disgraceful exposure of 1891, the First Minister was a party to the celebrated profession of lofty virtue expressed by the promise that the Government would bring to justice all offenders, be they high or low, rich or poor. What has he done? The inquiry of 1891 at the instance of Mr. Tarte, and the investigation, pressed on by members of that committee who are not on the Government side of the House, disclosed facts for many weeks, in spite of the strenuous attempts to suppress these facts by counsel, hired and paid by the Government for that purpose. At any rate the facts of this conspiracy were disclosed, which was partially tried last November, and the Minister of Justice was forced by the parliamentary inquiry to institute that trial. The Ontario Government took part in it also, and after many adjournments it was pressed to a trial and the judge and the counsel for the Crown commented on the absence of the greater culprits. Why did the Minister of Justice not prosecute them? The Minister of Justice knew every damning fact which I have laid before the House, as well as we know them to-day. Why did he stay his hand? Why, Sir, it was to save a colleague and to save his party. I wonder if I might not venture to quote to the Minister of Justice these words which were applied by Mr. Osler to Thomas McGreevy: the words of Tennyson, as to Launcelot's position. Is it not a fact that the Minister of Justice, too, was in the position that:

His honour rooted in dishonour stood,
And faith unfaithful kept him falsely true.

Then there was a civil suit which is in progress to-day. How could the Minister of Justice avoid bringing the civil suit, when this big volume of 1891, is full of the clearest proofs that the country was robbed and defrauded by these contractors. It is a long time since 1891, and the civil suit has not been finished yet. I do not know whether it will be or not, but I want to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that he knew then, as well as we know now, that at least $20,000 of that money that he is suing these contractors for, was traced directly into the very hands of his colleagues, and was spent by them for his and their benefit for illegal and corrupt purposes. A public crime was added to the private one of Thomas McGreevy. Why is not the law put in motion to recover at least that $20,000 as to which the evidence is conclusive? Why did he stay his hand? I would answer again: to save a colleague and to save his party. Is any colleague worth saving at such a price, Mr. Speaker? Can any party be saved from the acts of its leaders unless it repudiates those leaders? And, Sir, is it necessary for me to say anything as to the necessity of bringing these matters before the House at this session of Parliament? Why, Sir, the charges arise from that trial and that verdict and that sentence, and from the judge's language, which constitutes an invitation to Parliament to take action on these matters, if any words that ever fell from the lips of a judge could be so construed. Moreover, I want this House to understand clearly, that this House heretofore has not judged in this matter—not at all; nothing like it. In 1891, how did Sir Hector Langevin clear himself from the charges brought in connection with this conspiracy fund? Why, Sir, he denied receiving or expending or distributing any of these moneys. That was the evidence that was before the House when the House considered the report of the Privileges and Elections Committee in 1891. Was that a true state of affairs? Do we not know now, from the evidence that we have here in unlimited quantities? The evidence of Mr. McGreevy contradicts that; the evidence of Sir Adolphe Caron contradicts that; and the orders by the dozen given by the hon. gentleman under his own hand and signature also contradict that evidence. Therefore, I say that was not an adjudication so far as Sir Hector Langevin is concerned. Then, Sir, as to the hon. Postmaster General. In 1893, the evidence taken under the Royal Commission was considered by this House; but there was no reference in that Royal Commission anywhere to the Larkin, Connolly case—no reference whatever to it in the inquiry as it was sent by this House to the Royal Commission. I had made a charge, and asked for a committee of this House to inquire into it, which included and covered this conspiracy of Larkin, Connolly & Co., for the appropriation of election moneys; but, Sir, that charge was struck out by the House at the instance of this Government. And, Sir, you will remember that the inquiry of that Royal Commission was limited to two railways, to the subsidies granted to those railways, and to matters connected with those subsidies; and upon those matters alone did the House pass judgment. Yes, Mr. Speaker, an inquiry was asked by me involving these very election funds, and refused by the Government, on the excuse that the time for petitioning against members implicated in corruption had elapsed. But, Sir, that excuse cannot avail to-night. I ask to unseat no member. I ask for no committee of inquiry. I simply have brought evidence before you, clear and conclusive evidence, and ask you to deal with it. Even to those who cynically affect to believe that politics is only a game, and that votes are the stakes we play for, I say, let us at least have an honest and fair game, and let us unite in punishing those who are caught cheating and playing with loaded dice. Neither would I appeal to others on any very lofty ground of political morality. I only say that in common justice, influenced by a proper regard for public opinion and for the opinion of our own constituents, we ought to visit with our censure the transactions which I have submitted to this House. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I move :

“That all the words after the word ‘That’ be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof :—‘from the public trial and conviction of Thomas McGreevy and N. K. Connolly for conspiracy to defraud, and from evidence and papers already before this House, it appears that large portions of the moneys which were found, upon said trial, to have been criminally received by the said Thomas McGreevy from Government contractors were so received by him for the purpose of being expended in elections in the interest of the Conservative party, and for distribution by Sir Hector Langevin, M.P., and Sir Adolphe Caron, M.P., for the election of themselves and of other supporters of the Government at the general elections held in February, 1887.

“That it further appears that large portions of the said moneys, together with other large sums collected by Sir Adolphe Caron from those interested in Governmental railway subsidies, were expended and distributed by Sir Hector Langevin and Sir Adolphe Caron, and in lavish and illegal amounts, to assist in the election of themselves and of other supporters of the Government, in the district of Québec, at the general elections of 1887.

“That the said Sir Hector Langevin and Sir Adolphe Caron were then, and are now, members of this House, and on the roll of Her Majesty’s Privy Councillors for Canada, and the said Sir Adolphe Caron is a Cabinet Minister and Postmaster General.

“That, in the opinion of this House, the said Sir Hector Langevin and Sir Adolphe Caron are deserving of the severest censure for their connection with the said transactions, and that it is a public scandal and an injury to the reputation of Canada that Sir Adolphe Caron should continue to hold the position of a Minister of the Crown.”

SIR HECTOR LANGEVIN. When I was tried in 1891 before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I appeared before that committee of my free accord, believing by the evidence that had been brought out to that moment that, though the charges were not specific against me, nevertheless I should not leave the statements made before that committee to go to this House and the country unchallenged. That is the reason why I went there. I was sworn in, I gave my evidence, I was cross-questioned by the lawyers, and by the members of the committee, and finally the report came before this House. The report was put to the vote, and the report was in my favour. The majority of this House declared that I was not guilty of the charges brought against me. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken and who is endeavouring to try me the second time—that is not British justice—trying to bring up again everything that was before that committee and that was weighed by this House and set aside, in so far as I was concerned ; trying to bring all that up again here, and try me the second time. It will be for this House and the country to decide whether I am to be singled out and tried in that way. It is the first time in this or any British country that any man in my position, or in the most humble position, has been thus tried the second time. I may say this, that when I give my evidence, whether it is without the oath or with the oath, I give my evidence, as far as I recollect things at the moment. And therefore if I am mistaken, it is not wittingly, but because my memory fails me. I was brought up once before a court of justice in Quebec as a witness in a case that had been tried years before, and finally, after going from court to court, was sent back to the first court to be tried the second time. When I was there before the judge, I said to him : “Your honour, I will give you my evidence as I recollect it now. It may be different from what I gave ten years ago. When I gave it then, I gave it according to my recollection at that time, and to-day I will do the same, though the two evidences may be different.” And I was told that my statement was a proper one, and that I had only to give the evidence as I recollected it then. Now, I am not under oath here, but it is the same as if I were. I state on my honour what I now will say to the House. I never knew that any money had been paid out or was being paid out by the department over which I was presiding or by the Government to which I belonged—I never knew that money was improperly being paid or had been paid improperly. By the rules of the department, by the evidence of the engineers, by the reports that were there, the moneys that were paid were properly paid. If anything were paid beyond that, I knew nothing about it, and I do not know it now. Now, about contributions by the contractors, as mentioned by the hon. member who has brought this charge. I must say that I never knew that these contractors had paid any money to that fund. I do not know it now ; I never knew it. Mr. McGreevy, if he had any money put in that fund, never told me from what source it came, and I did not know it. That was not the first time Mr. McGreevy had been the treasurer of the party for election purposes. He had been before, and the moneys that may have been paid then were paid for what I thought, and what I believe still, was legal.

There are certain sums of money that are expended in every election, and I have no doubt there is not a gentleman in this House, there has not been a single member in the House of Commons for the last ten or fifteen years, or more, who would say otherwise. There are necessary expenses that are paid, and you may try to hide it, but it is the fact. It is known all through the country; it is known on both sides of the House, and both sides have done the same thing. Now, it is stated by the hon. gentleman that $20,000 had been put in the election fund of 1887. That I do not know; that I did not know. All I knew was that when Mr. McGreevy had been the treasurer of the party, money came to his hands from contributions from the party; and I had no doubt that the contributions and the moneys he would have in his hands in 1887 would come from the same sources—that is to say from the different men of the party who could afford it, and would not be ashamed to admit it. The hon. gentleman has brought two or three special charges against me. In order to bring a charge against my late colleague, the present Postmaster General, about Mr. J. G. Ross, he says: the House must see that it was understood that Mr. Ross was giving money, and Mr. Ross was president of the company in which Sir Adolphe Caron was interested, either one way or the other. And to show that it was known, he said: look at what Sir Hector Langevin says: Mr. Valin comes to him for some help for his election, and Sir Hector Langevin writes to Mr. McGreevy, saying: Here is Mr. Valin who requires some money for his election; give him what you can, and refer him to Mr. Ross. What were the relations of Mr. Ross to Mr. Valin? He was his partner in business. They were joint proprietors of many vessels. It was quite natural that I should say to Mr. McGreevy, the treasurer of the party: Send him to his own partner; let him go to Mr. Ross. If he requires help he should get it there. The hon. gentleman tries to show that when I made my statement after the election of 1887, and gave the amount that had been expended for my legal expenses in my election I was keeping aside the largest portion of the money expended, and I was, therefore, violating the law, which says that the statement of that kind made in the official gazette, if not correct, is held to be a misdemeanour. Well, Mr. Speaker, I gave my statement as it was. I stated that my personal expenses had been $30, and that the money paid beyond that by my agents for the hire of halls for the holding of public meetings and other expenses amounted to $887.09, and the vouchers were there for the total amount, $917.09. That was the amount of the legal expenses, and if I was again to make that statement I would say that that was the amount I paid, and I paid that out of my own pocket. Now, the hon. gentleman says: Look at these statements. Here you have $13,150 of expenses beyond that, and that came from that fund and it came from the money that Mr. McGreevy obtained from Mr. Connolly, or that Mr. Connolly paid to the election fund. It may have come from that or any other source, but not by my order or at my request. I do not know anything of these expenses. The way to learn about that is to call in the gentlemen whose names are in the list and ask them whether I knew anything about the expenditure or whether they ever consulted me about it. They know perfectly well it is not so. The hon. member who brought these charges says there is a draft for something over $3,000 by Mr. Panneton, and that that draft was paid by Mr. McGreevy. He says also that Sir Hector Langevin sent Mr. Panneton down to Mr. McGreevy. Well, the hon. gentleman who knows French so well should have understood what was meant by those words in French, give him a hearing—veuillez l'écouter.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

Mr. EDGAR. It happens to be in English.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; but not written by the hon. gentleman, but by me, a Frenchman. If the hon. gentleman had written it in French, it would probably not have been in the form which would have conveyed to the ears of Frenchmen just what he intended. At all events, I did not order that to be paid, and it was paid without my knowledge. Now, about the $20,000 mentioned by the hon. gentleman, I did not know that it had been paid into the fund. I knew that a fund was being formed, and that my hon. friend, the Postmaster General, had deposited money for the fund in the hands of Mr. McGreevy. He had a right to put the money in the hands of the treasurer the same as I had that right. And when I drew upon that fund by an order upon Mr. McGreevy, I was only drawing money that I had deposited in his hands and for which I have his receipts. I have those receipts in my pocket here. I remember that Hon. Mr. Sheyn, who represented the same division as the leader of the Opposition, had his election protested and it was proved there that he had expended $7,000, and the court decided that that was not an illegal expenditure, that it was one that could be defended, and he defended it, and he was maintained in his seat. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has said that in my evidence I declared that I never obtained money from Mr. McGreevy. What I received was from the fund to which I had contributed. It was left entirely to him to pay it or refuse it. Then the hon. gentleman speaks of notes that had been discounted by Mr. McGreevy for a number of years. Well, that is an old story; that took place previous to all these matters; that was brought before the committee of 1891, and it has been shown that there was nothing in that charge for which I could be reproached. Besides, I may say that these notes, to the tune of $10,200 have been paid entirely by myself. I will not go any further into details. I think I have answered the charges made against me, and I leave the case in the hands of the House. This is the same House, with the exception of a few changes that have taken place during the last three years, which fully investigated the charges when they were first made, and by the majority of whose members I was acquitted. To-day these charges are brought up again. For what object? What the hon. gentleman expects to gain by a renewal of these charges to-night, I do not know; but I believe that the House and the country will say that it is not just to try a man the second time, and I have no doubt that the verdict you will give in this matter will be sanctioned by the country.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, the case which the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) has just submitted to the House, has not the merit of novelty. It is a re-hash of old charges which have been already brought by that hon. gentleman before this House and before the country, and which have been judged by this House and by the country, and if the success the hon. gentleman will meet with to-night is not greater than it has been in the past, I think he had better transfer to some other member the care of public and political morality, and wash his hands once and for all of that mission. When I heard the solemn tones of the hon. gentleman, and heard his deep voice when talking about this terrible corruption which was scandalizing him, I thought he could hardly be the same gentleman who for so many years had been the manager and the manipulator of the most corrupt election fund that has ever been organized in Canada to debauch the electorate. Sir, those who were in public life for a number of years will remember the Northern Railway and the scandals which have since attached to the name of the hon. gentleman in connection with it. Sir, I have been in active political life since 1872. I have never refused to fight when occasion arose: I have carried more than one battle into the camp of the enemy, and I leave to those who are acquainted with the facts to say whether I was worsted in those engagements. Sir, I like to fight an open fight, but the hon. gentleman is not conducting an open fight when he stands up and makes charges that are not substantiated by the evidence, when he insinuates charges, and brings them up year after year, session after session. At the opening of this session the Opposition papers proclaimed all over the country that they were going to bring charges against the Government and against the Conservative party that would not permit the Government to remain upon the Treasury benches for three weeks after the opening of Parliament. Sir, they little know, although their experience would warrant a better knowledge of the Conservative Government and the Conservative party—

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, the hon. gentleman has tried it also, and to-day he is leading a forlorn hope, condemned by the people of Canada at every general election. I say that the hon. gentleman from West Ontario must know very little of the Conservative party and of the Conservative Government if he imagines that such threats, such charges, such small attacks as these would lead the Government to resign in three weeks. Sir, we have met more formidable enemies, we have fought bigger fights, and we have remained in our places by the aid of public opinion. We have remained on the Treasury benches supported by the people of Canada, ever since the Opposition, in a moment of forgetfulness on the part of the people, sat here during one Parliament and proved that they were utterly incapable of governing this country. What has the hon. gentleman said? Has he brought any charge? Has he specified his accusation? No, Sir, but in solemn tones he has tried to impose on this House, as he tried to do on a former occasion, and I expect that the result to-night will be what it was on former occasions. What was my course when the charges were brought against me? One morning I read in the 'Globe' charges made against me that I had received money in a corrupt way, and for a corrupt purpose. Did I attempt to conceal what I had done? I did not. What I did then I would do again. I take the responsibility for everything I did on that occasion, and I say to this House to-night that those gentlemen who took my advice in conducting their elections were not responsible for a single thing which was done on that occasion. Before this House of Commons to-night I assume the responsibility of everything which I did on that occasion. Well, as I say, these charges were brought against me in the 'Globe,' and the next morning my answer was in the papers, and published broadcast over the Dominion of Canada. Did I wait for an investigation to say what I had done? I did not; I admitted what I had done. I was called upon to appear before a commission, and was put to considerable personal expense, and before that commission what I had published in the papers, was proved, but nothing was proved beyond what I admitted. The hon. gentleman speaks of my connection with Larkin, Connolly & Company, and attempts to show that I received money, or had a knowledge of the money which these gentlemen contributed towards the fund. To-day I state here, and I would state it under oath as I state it on my honour to-night, that I did not know of my personal knowledge that Larkin and Connolly contributed a cent to the fund in the hands of Mr. McGreevy. They may have contributed hundreds of thousands of dollars; they may have obtained funds from other people. I know not. I know what I did. I did only that which I would do again. Is it a crime—am I to be told it by a gentleman who was connected with the most corrupt election fund ever known in this country, the Northern Railway contribution, to help in elections those who, while possessing the necessary talents and qualifications which would make them valuable additions to the House of Commons, unfortunately are not possessors of sufficient wealth to permit them to go and fight a political campaign? Take up the list of those receipts, which I published on my responsibility in the newspapers of the country, and if any man can show me that in the several counties which I looked after, the amounts we contributed were likely to be of any possible use for corrupt purposes, I say such a man does not believe what he affirms. We have not in the province of Quebec unfortunately, as in the other provinces, notably Ontario, a network of railways which permit the candidates and their friends to travel at small cost through the large counties, and no one knows this fact better than many of the hon. gentlemen who are sitting on your left, Mr. Speaker, for they well know that the vast extent of the counties has been brought up time and again as a matter that should be remedied by this House by legislation and by a redistribution of seats, which not only is a necessity but would also put an end to the expense.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh, for it is all they can do on this occasion. I say to-day that if we had a redistribution of seats in Quebec, a fair redistribution, whereby no injustice would be done to any party, but a redistribution geographically which would place the province in a position so that parliamentary candidates could compass constituencies without being put to enormous expense, it would put an end to the necessity of raising political funds, as we did at those elections. But when I tell this House that under the regime of that pure man, the friend of the leader of the Opposition, Mr. Mercier, I fought the fight in the county of the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay, and at the same time I was attacking one of the fortresses of the Liberal party, Rimouski, which had for thirty years been in the hands of my opponents—when I tell the House that in Chicoutimi I had to travel nearly 300 miles in a cariole over the mountains of the Saguenay to meet opponents and fight the political battle, they will understand the position. Fortunately I had means to meet such an expenditure. But I ask, would it be fair and right that men otherwise qualified to be returned as members of Parliament and who would be an ornament and an honour to this House, and who were candidates whom the people wished to return, should not be assisted in meeting the legitimate expenses they are obliged to incur? Does it come well from the Liberal party, especially in view of the democratic views they advocate, that because a man has no means, he should be prohibited from seeking political honours? As I have already stated, I took the responsibility for what I did. I did it myself, my friends are not responsible for it. I took the whole responsibility on my shoulders, and I disclosed the source from which I got the money expended. What did I do? The moment I got the money contributed by a man who on more than one occasion had assisted me before, and who had been a friend in my youth, a man, moreover, whose views coincided with my own on political matters, a man who took deep interest in the policy which was being advocated by the party to which I belong—when that man, a millionaire, who at his death left ten or twelve millions, gave me funds, not dirty notes, as the hon. gentleman designated them—and I may say that by passing through my hands and being used to help the party to which I belong in the most legitimate manner possible, they did not become in any degree more dirty than when they were placed in my hands—I placed that money in the hands of a committee appointed for the purpose of looking into these matters and deciding who should be helped and who should not be helped. On more than one occasion candidates came to us who did not require equal help with others, and, of course, it is obvious to hon. members that some candidates had more means than others, and the amounts which appear in the statement I made before the Royal Commission, before which I asked to be examined, although not called as a witness, represent exactly what took place. But I made a similar statement months before in the newspapers, and it was published broadcast through Canada. I have nothing to be ashamed of, and I have nothing to be ashamed of on that occasion, or before or since. The hon. member (Mr. Edgar) in the course of his argument did not base any charge preferred against me on any evidence which he produced. I will give an example. The hon. gentleman said that a gentleman still remaining in the Government was connected with the distribution of the funds received from Thomas McGreevy. Mr. McGreevy himself when examined as a witness stated that I deposited in his hands a certain fund and drew against that fund. It will be seen by examining the receipts and statements published that not only did I not draw on any other fund, but I did not draw an equal amount to that which I deposited. Every amount contributed during that election appeared, and the receipts have been published. I take the full responsibility for that action, and for assisting my friends, because it was necessary to assist them under the peculiar conditions existing in the districts of Quebec which I was looking after.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In view of the fact that expenses connected with elections in that province were very considerable, and the fact that large sums had to be paid to carters for conveying candidates and their friends to meet opposing candidates in the different parishes, to rent houses and to make speeches. Hon. gentlemen opposite did that, but they have not the manliness to admit it. Hon. gentlemen opposite do it, and the day may come when it will be possible to show to what extent they have done it. Now, Mr. McGreevy was examined before the Royal Commission, but Mr. McGreevy did not attempt to say that I had any possible knowledge that he contributed even a 5-cent piece to the general election fund. I was organizing and campaigning for my friends in eight or ten counties, attending meetings both day and night, and my time was fully occupied. I had no knowledge outside of what I did myself. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) is not able to put his finger on a single piece of evidence in the depositions of Mr. McGreevy or any other witness to show anything in reference to me, except that I contributed $25,000 for the purpose of helping my friends legitimately. There is no evidence to show that I was personally aware of any amount being contributed except that Mr. McGreevy had been for years the treasurer of the party, and at that period Mr. McGreevy personally was not very friendly to me, and there was no possible reason why I should have investigated anything more than what I knew to be my personal contribution to the fund. The hon. gentleman from Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) has, to my mind, explained in a satisfactory manner, the charges brought against him, personally. I do not know whether he contributed, nor do I know to-day if any one else contributed in addition to myself. Not only did I not go outside of my contribution, but I remained a long way inside of the amount I contributed to help my friends. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) repeats his charges, as a member of Parliament, sitting here behind his desk. But when he was asked to come to Quebec before the Royal Commission and do as I did—stand up under the solemnity of an oath—the hon. gentleman's dignity, if you please, would not permit him to appear before the commission. He had not the manliness to come before that commission but he reserved himself for these brilliant attacks which he makes against me in this House. He had not the courage to be examined under oath, and to swear before the judges what he was prepared to stand by. He remained in Toronto, and, I presume, he said to himself: I will allow this commission to take its course, and I can always fall back on my old method, of standing up on a motion to go into Supply and, repeating the old story, which I have learned and can say by heart, but you do not get me to go before a Royal Commission and swear to my statements. The most extraordinary statement made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) was that because Mr. McGreevy's counsel sat perfectly dumb, it must be that it was Sir Adolphe Caron and Sir Hector Langevin who contributed the money towards that fund. He says that Mr. McGreevy preferred going to jail rather than to disclose anything connected with it, and he concludes that I must have known all about the contribution of Larkin, Connolly & Co. He says that the beneficiaries of the contributions are perfectly well known now. Mr. Beemer was examined before that commission, and other contractors were examined, and I ask any impartial mind to read that evidence and to see if there is one word in it which discloses any names. I ask them to read the evidence before the Royal Commission or before the trial that took place in Ottawa, and to see if there is a word in that evidence pointing to me as knowing a single thing about the contributions by contractors, if any were made. It is altogether disingenuous of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) to say that the beneficiaries are perfectly well known now. The hon. member (Mr. Edgar) feels very sore because the House of Commons by a very large majority submitted the investigation of this matter to a Royal Commission. Surely, at the end of this long session, we are not going to discuss again, matters which have been decided upon by Parliament after long and serious discussions and prolonged sittings of the House. The House of Commons decided that the matter should be submitted to a commission, and it was submitted to a commission, and it comes in very bad part from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) to now criticise what the House of Commons did on that occasion. The judges who investigated that matter showed no partiality—they were perfectly right in showing no partiality—and they discharged their duties in such a way that when their report came before this House, a very large majority of the members declared that the matter should rest where it did then. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) says that Mr. Ross very secretly handed over $25,000 to Sir Adolphe Caron. Well, there was no secrecy about the matter, because, within twenty minutes after I received it, it was known to all those who took an interest in the election. There was no reason why there should be any secrecy about it. I take the responsibility of my acts, and I want no secrecy about what I do. The hon. gentleman has referred to Mr. McGreevy's statement, which I know very little about except from what the hon. gentleman has said, as to his not belonging to the committee. Well, I am not aware of Mr. McGreevy ever having made such a statement, because he did belong to that committee, and belonged to it for years before I had anything to do with the management of political matters. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have met the arguments which have been advanced by the hon. gentleman on this occasion. So far as my part in the transaction is concerned, I have stated openly and frankly on more than one occasion what I did do. The matter came before the House. The hon. gentleman has not elicited a single new fact to-night. His speech consists of a repetition of the charges which were brought by him on more than one occasion before this House. I see nothing in what the hon. gentleman has stated to-night which changes the case as it first came before the House of Commons, and as it came on a second occasion more recently, when it was again brought before the House by the hon. gentleman. So far as I am personally concerned, I am perfectly willing to leave my case, and the part which I had in the transaction, in the hands of the members of the House of Commons. It was submitted to a Royal Commission, as I have stated, before which I went uncalled and volunteered my own statement under oath. The hon. gentleman did not condescend to come to Quebec to be examined. I stated there what I have stated to-night. Nobody can make anything more of it than I made on that occasion. I disclosed everything I knew. I am prepared to stand or fall by what I have done, and, considering that I have helped my friends to the extent that I have considered legitimate, I say that under the same circumstances what I did on that occasion I would do again to-morrow in order to help my friends.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, in following the case under the consideration of the House to-night, one is struck with the statement made by the hon. Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron) and the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), that they are being tried twice for the same offence. Now, Sir, no member of this House should be ignorant of the fact that the charges preferred by my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) never were tried by this House, and that those charges, when preferred before by my hon. friend, were changed by the hon. members and their colleagues, who were permitted by the majority of this House to quash the indictment preferred against them and frame a fresh indictment against themselves and select their own judges. This House has not passed on this case; and therefore the protestations of innocence by the two hon. members concerned should strike the House as being aside from the question and far-fetched. The hon. Postmaster General tells us that the party in power have been kept in power, notwithstanding all the charges made against them for the last fifteen or sixteen years, by the convictions of the people, and that the fact that they have been successful at the polls on several occasions is a sufficient answer to the charges preferred against them to-night, and to the charges which have at various times been preferred against them in connection with the management of public affairs. Now, Sir, no individual in this House is, I presume, ignorant of the fact that influences have been used in the elections in this country different from mere appeals to the convictions of the people. I presume that no member of this House is ignorant of the fact that as long ago as 1872 a general election of this country was largely influenced by the expenditure of a very large sum of money obtained by the sale of a public charter on that occasion, and that the Government, in the election following that election, were defeated in consequence of the indignation of the people at the sale of that charter, and the realization for it of nearly $300,000, which was expended in that election. And, Mr. Speaker, if the truth were told—if all the secrets connected with the prosecution of elections and the administration of affairs in this country were laid bare, I venture to say that it would be found that in every general election since the general election of 1878, the Government have been sustained, not by the convictions of the people as to the good character of their policy, but by the use of means of a similar character to the means used in 1872, and I venture to say that when the time comes, as probably the time will come, when the secret history of the electioneering devices of this Government are laid bare, the country will stand appalled at the extent of the improper influences that have been used in these various elections. We have inklings of these things. We know enough of them to know definitely and positively that the assertion made by the hon. Postmaster General that the sustaining of the Government is due to the convictions of the people is an assertion that does not rest upon any sufficient foundation.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

The hon. gentleman says that the other side had five short years of incompetent discharge of duties as the administrators of the affairs of this country. Well, Sir, the other side were in one sense incompetent. They were incompetent in the use of those influences and means which have been used by their successors; they were incompetent in the protestations of innocence when innocence did not exist; but they were not incompetent in giving to this country a pure and honest and economical administration. The one period in the history of the Dominion of Canada that reflects credit upon the country and upon the Administration is that period extending from the year 1873 to the year 1878—the period when the Government reduced the controllable expenditure, when its operations were characterized by the strictest economy, and when the affairs of this country were managed with prudence and regard to the interests of the people.

The hon. Postmaster General says, with reference to these charges: I met these charges, they were referred to a Royal Commission, and that commission has tried these charges and has found me to be innocent. Sir, these charges were never referred to a commission. The charges preferred by my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) on the floor of the House of Commons have never been tried. The hon. member and his colleagues put those charges aside, and trumped up charges to suit themselves, and upon the indictment they themselves had drawn in place of the indictment drawn by my hon. friend from West Ontario, the Royal Commission passed its judgment. The hon. Postmaster General says that my hon. friend from West Ontario refused to visit Quebec and attend the sittings of that Royal Commission—that he refused to go there and substantiate his charges. Sir, my hon. friend from West Ontario refused to be guilty of the mockery of going to Quebec to give evidence and conduct a case, not on charges which he had preferred, but on charges which he had not preferred, and to sanction by his presence the swindle—if I may use the expression—the legal swindle of substituting one set of charges for another, and leading the country to suppose that the Royal Commission was passing upon the charges my hon. friend had preferred, when they were in reality not passing upon those charges at all, but upon charges specially chosen and constructed for the purpose of deceiving the public and assuring the acquittal of the Postmaster General and those connected with him in this matter.

My hon. friend says that he himself deposited a fund with Mr. McGreevy, and that he drew upon the money he himself had placed in the hands of that gentleman. He does not take us into his confidence so far as to tell us from what source this money came. I should like if he would have taken the House into his confidence to the extent of informing us from what source he realized the large sum of money which, according to his own account, he placed in the hands of Mr. McGreevy. He tells us that if we could have a fair redistribution in the province of Quebec, it would not be necessary to get up political funds such as he got up; and he thus inadvertently makes an allusion which amounts to the confession that he himself and those associated with him got up a fund that was used in the election of 1887, the treasurer of that fund being Mr. McGreevy. Now, Mr. Speaker, two or three prominent facts stand out in this connection. There had been a trial in connection with these charges, and two individuals were sentenced for conspiracy in securing funds for election purposes in an improper manner. These two individuals were convicted and sent to prison. Their names are Thomas McGreevy and N. K. Connolly. These men were sent to prison, but released after serving a very small portion of their time, and they were released under circumstances which leads certainly to the inference that there was something hidden, something under the surface. These men, sentenced to a penal term, were released after two or three months, on a mere pretext; and the inference the country will draw is that they had the Government in their power to a certain extent, that they could have made a revelation which would have been embarrassing to the Government, and that owing to the hold they had on the Government in this respect, and the fear in which the Government stood with regard to possible revelations, they were released. For what were these men sentenced? For raising money in an improper way for certain purposes. For what purposes? For the purpose of being expended, as it was, by the Postmaster General, by the hon. member for Three Rivers, and by other members of the Conservative party. There was, therefore, no doubt a sense of injustice on the part of those who had benefited by the acts for which these men were condemned. There was a sense of injustice in these men serving out a sentence for doing what they were only mere agents in doing and what was done for the purpose of maintaining in power certain members of the Government and the Conservative party.

The history of this transaction, if it were known from the beginning, would show, I have no doubt, that Mr. McGreevy had been ruined by his devotion to the interests of his party. It would show that he served the party faithfully in his capacity since 1878, that he was the trusted agent of the party and knew the secrets of the party, and that the leaders of the party knew exactly how he got the money, what amount he got, and for what purposes it was expended. The whole course of these transactions proves that Mr. McGreevy was the confidential agent of his party, that its leaders must have been cognizant of what he was doing, and have known perfectly well where he obtained the money. If the history of the transaction were exposed fully, there could be no question but that McGreevy and Connolly would not be the only parties who would be held responsible. Mr. McGreevy was ruined by his services to his party, and the same is true in a great measure of Mr. Connolly. Mr. Connolly, I have no doubt, found that the contracts which he secured, under the circumstances and under the conditions he was obliged to agree to, placed him in a worse position, squeezed him worse, and made him suffer greater loss than if he had taken the contracts in an honest manner at the lowest possible figure at which the work could be done. The whole operation was not satisfactory in a pecuniary sense to Connolly or McGreevy or any of the parties having connection with it. And when my hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Edgar) preferred his charges in 1892, those charges were taken in hand by the Government and were set aside and others substituted, and when those substituted charges were referred to a Royal Commission, the whole of the proceedings became a perfect farce. And when any member of the Government stands up to-day and assumes that those charges have been passed upon, they are assuming what has not occurred. They avoided a trial of these charges by exercising the power which resides in their hands. The Conservative majority, under their control and at their bidding, took the course of evading justice by preventing an investigation of the charges preferred by a member of this House on the Opposition benches. The whole of this transaction reminds me of the story told by Abraham Lincoln of a man accused of stealing hams, and whom he was retained to defend. The proof was conclusive that the man had stolen the hams. Four witnesses swore that on a moonlight night they had seen him going into the smoke house and carrying away load after load of hams. When Mr. Lincoln heard the evidence he abandoned the case and refused to address the jury. But the jury retired and shortly afterwards brought in a verdict of not guilty. Mr. Lincoln asked the accused if he could explain the verdict, and the man said in reply: "The way that occurred was simply this, every one of them jurymen had one of them hams." That is the case with these charges to-night. These gentlemen stand by each other; they defend each other. The majority of the House changed the charges, and referred the substituted charges to a commission, and the whole course in relation to the transaction shows that all these gentlemen are interested; it shows that they all got one of these particular hams, and are bound to clear the persons charged. But the country understands perfectly well that this Government, from various sources, derives large sums of money for election purposes. Hon. gentlemen who have spoken do not deny that they have used large sums in elections, and they retort: you resort to the same methods. But, Mr. Speaker, if we use money, we necessarily derive that money from different sources and use our own funds. We have not the manufacturers' trust to appeal to; we have not the railway subsidies to toll; we have not the contracts to let out in such a way as to sweat them by taking a portion of the money; we have not all these sources of party revenue to use for election purposes. We charge that the Government is guilty of doing these things; we charge that this is carried so far that the political morality of the country has been debauched. And my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) deserves the thanks of this country, Mr. Speaker, after having been thwarted in 1892 by the substitution of another set of charges for those he preferred, allowing the criminal to prefer his own indictment, and choose his own judge, and, though knowing that he is foredoomed to defeat by the votes of an adverse majority, for attempting to secure a verdict upon the naked charges he has made in such a way as to prevent the substitution of another set of charges for those he has presented.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not propose to go into the details of this charge, but I rise to express my surprise, my amazement at the action of the Government, the action of those involved in this charge to attempt to have the matter passed over without a word being offered. The two gentlemen accused have offered their explanations, but, Sir, is there not something due to this House and to the country on behalf of those who are not involved directly in these charges, but who choose to make themselves responsible by standing by the accused? Has the Minister of Justice, who, above all others, is sworn to direct the administration of justice, not to favour the House and the country with his views? Why, Sir, the Minister of Justice owes it to Canada, as I have already pointed out on the floor of this House, to explain how he dared to open the door of Carleton jail three months ago and discharge the criminals who had been sentenced after enormous expense for a crime which more or less extends beyond themselves. Do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, that if these had been ordinary criminals, the administration of justice would have been thwarted in their favour, and that by those to whom it has been especially entrusted. No wonder that, under these circumstances, the Minister of Justice and his colleagues are dumb. No wonder they would like to see this discussion brought to an end at the earliest possible moment. Why, Sir, many a poor wretch condemned for some minor crime, perhaps for stealing bread to save the famishing child from death, has received a far more severe punishment than was meted out to these men. Has there ever been a case where such an unfortunate has been set at liberty under such circumstances? But when a political crime has been committed and thousands and hundreds of thousands taken from the public Treasury, and, worse, when the fair name of the country has been smirched, and Canada made a scandal in the eyes of the world, and when, after years of trial and investigation, at last, two of the guilty persons are brought to the Bar of justice and condemned, is not something more due to the country than the wretched doctor's certificates when these men are set free again. I believe that the country will witness with amazement this scene of the whole Government party receiving with round after round of applause two of the accused who stand here and glory in what has been done, who say they are not ashamed of it, but would gladly repeat the disgraceful transactions should opportunity arise. And, Sir, what explanation have they to make to the statement made by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) who just now objected to being singled out for accusation here? Singled out! Whom did he refer to? He could not refer to the others in this charge, for he has not been singled out from them. He and the Postmaster General were accused together. How comes it that the hon. member for Three Rivers has fallen from his high position if he were not guilty? Mr. Speaker, for many years I have heard accused persons declare in this House that there was nothing in the charges against them, and then, in almost every case, I have seen these charges established. Therefore, it is not sufficient to convince me of their innocence to hear a bold declaration of innocence made here where no cross-examination is possible. Again, I ask, can the Minister of Justice offer any explanation why, in this state of affairs, public opinion has been outraged and defied, and he, instead of administering justice has actively interfered to prevent justice being done, notwithstanding the pledge he made when he assumed office that not one guilty man should be allowed to escape. Why, Sir, the scandals of 1891 from top to bottom have culminated in nothing but the prostitution of justice. Dozens of public servants were suspended for following the bad example of the times, who had become, as it were, lowered as to their morality in the discharge of their public duty because of the atmosphere in which they were moving, suspended for the time being, and afterwards restored to office, some of them not only restored to office, but paid, I believe, full pay for the time during which they were suspended, and a Deputy Minister of the Crown suspended, reduced to the ranks, and re-instated. I saw in today's paper that another Deputy Minister who had been expelled from the service, has been restored in order to enable him to retire on a superannuation. And to-night we have the final act of this disgraceful episode in our country's history, all the Government supporters, or nearly all of them, with violent rounds of applause, applauding those who glory in their shame. Add to this the culmination of the whole affair in its endorsement by the silent action of the Government, and I venture to say that this disgraceful page of Canadian history is complete.

Expenses in connection with the superintendence of insurance. $8,000

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The increase of a thousand dollars is due to the fact that this is a quinquennial year for the insurance companies, and additional investigations have to be made as to the profits of the companies.

Department of Queen's Privy Council of Canada—to pay, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, the following clerks their salaries from 1st January to 30th June, 1894, viz. :—

W. C. Debrisay	$415.00
F. Chadwick.....	452.50
J. R. Fraser.....	362.00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are the circumstances under which these extra charges are demanded ?

Mr. IVES. These three clerks have been temporary, and they are being made permanent from the 1st of July. They are in the Main Estimates as permanent clerks, and this amount is to pay them their salaries up to the 1st July, from which period they become permanent clerks.

To provide for the payment from 1st January to 30th June, 1894, to H. P. Buck, the amount allowed for passing in two optional subjects...$50

Mr. McMULLEN. Why is this ?

Mr. IVES. Mr. Buck is my private secretary. When he came into the service, he came in as a third-class clerk at $400. Having passed in optional subjects, this is to put him as he is entitled to be under the law.

To recoup the vote for unforeseen expenses for amount appropriated to the contingencies of this department.....$2,200

Mr. IVES. The only explanation of this is that the contingencies of the department were insufficient last year. The contingencies of the department provide for the transmission of messages between the Government and the Governor General, wherever he may be throughout the Dominion. It is impossible to know beforehand exactly what will be required. The vote last year was short, and proved to be inadequate to meet the service.

Mr. McMULLEN. Where was this incurred ? It is due to the committee that some explanation should be given why we are asked to vote $2,200 in excess of the amount anticipated last year. The hon. gentleman presented an estimate last year covering what he conceived to be the necessary sum ; why are we asked for $2,200 more ?

Mr. MULOCK.

Mr. IVES. I am not prepared with the exact details, but I may tell the hon. gentleman that the amount of contingencies in the department of the Privy Council is expected and is required to cover the expenses of messengers travelling between the seat of Government and the Governor General, wherever he may be in the Dominion. It is also intended to cover the clerical work which is required to be done. The clerical work last year in the office of the Privy Council has been fully 25 per cent more than it ever has been in any previous year ; the number of folios copied in the copying room of the Department of the Privy Council has exceeded by 25 per cent that of any other year. The money voted for this purpose last year was rather less, if I mistake not, than the usual amount, and proved inadequate.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the hon. gentleman say what kind of copying was done ?

Mr. IVES. The copying that I refer to is the copying of Minutes of Council for the Auditor General's, and other departments, and for the public. This last year a very large amount of extra work has been entailed by the voluminous correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Colonial Secretary with regard to Behring Sea, and other matters. This matter is all type written, in the Department of the Privy Council, never less than two copies are made, and where we cannot get hold of the appendices which are attached to Minutes of Council, they have to be copied. I have given one instance of the extra work that has been required, but there are others. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the whole thing is connected with the extra amount of work which has been entailed upon the department by the increase in the number of folios of Minutes of Council and Orders in Council that have been copied during the last year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman, I think, stated before, or some of his colleagues did, that the practice had grown up of undertaking to discharge, in the Council Chamber, a great deal of work that had before been done departmentally. I think that is a practice to be deprecated, and the line under our constitutional system is well drawn between work, which has to be undertaken by the Government at large, and which requires an Order in Council in order that it may be properly done, and work that a Minister may undertake, departmentally. There may be works which belong to a Minister alone, and on which he may deem it expedient to take the opinions of his colleagues before they are made the subject of an Order in Council, and the statement made by the hon. gentleman shows that the practice tends to diminish the responsibility of the Minister.

Department of Justice—To pay Mr. J. W. Hughes for his services from the 1st to 31st January, 1894, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act. $77 50
 To pay R. F. Harris for two optional subjects from 1st July, 1893, 1st July, 1894. 100
 Further amount required for contingencies. 2,000

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Hughes is a temporary clerk, and has been employed in the department for a number of years. He has not passed the examination, and, therefore, is not permanently employed, and every year it is necessary to drop the payment of his salary for one month and ask for its payment by a special vote. Mr. Harris is a third-class clerk, and is entitled to be paid for two optional subjects since the date of his appointment, July, 1893. The amount for contingencies is required under these circumstances. The department has been for some years calling on Parliament for a larger vote than was asked last year. The amount was reduced last year by $5,000, and it was hoped that the contingencies would be brought within that amount. The department failed to do so by $2,000.

To cover expenses incurred in prosecuting persons guilty of personating at Civil Service examinations at Montreal. $150

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not rise to object to this item; but in this connection I desire to say that in reading over the report presented by the Civil Service Commissioners it appears to me they were guilty of slurring over the offence committed in a way that was not creditable to that board. They should have made a full statement to Parliament of what had occurred, and if the statements made in the House are approximately correct, the commissioners can see that a very large number of facts should have been stated by them in their report. I forget the names of the commissioners, and I do not know who was specially responsible for the report of the commissioners, but I distinctly recollect that the language used by the commissioners with respect to those offences left a very considerable portion of the facts subsequently disclosed in Parliament entirely in the dark, and the board greatly diminished the real gravity of the offence.

Department of Public Works—Contingencies. $500

Mr. McMULLEN. Why is this amount required?

Mr. OUIMET. The amount voted for printing was $1,500, and for stationery, $1,400. The first vote was short by $300, and the second $200.

Kingston Penitentiary—To provide for the salary of Rev. J. V. Neville, chaplain, at $1,200 per annum, from 1st December, 1893, to 30th June, 1894, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Penitentiary Act. $116 67

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the hon. Minister will explain this vote?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is to provide for the payment of a chaplain at the maximum instead of the minimum salary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is a chaplain appointed for a certain fixed period?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He is appointed permanently, but they occasionally move.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If he does wrong, I suppose you keep him there?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; the chaplains are an exception to the rule, for if they do right we try to keep them.

Binder twine machinery--Kingston Penitentiary. $29,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where was this procured?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was procured under contract with Mr. Connors, who purchased it in the United States. I think I can say that my binder twine mill is the best in Canada as regards equipment and modern improvements. I can recommend my twine to any one who wants it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the hon. gentleman made arrangements with the other proprietors, and particularly with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) so as to prevent undue competition and secure a reasonable profit to the penitentiary?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We are manufacturing for the last two months, and I think the prices are 7 and 8 cents per pound; the 8 cents being for pure manila of the very best quality.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). What is the capacity of the factory?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I expect there will be an output of five or six hundred tons a year, but for this season, as we only began in the spring, we shall have about 150 tons ready before harvest.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). Could the Minister state where the motive power was obtained that runs this machinery?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was procured from the same contractor, but I am not sure whether it was purchased in the United States or not. In the Supplementary Estimates for next year I have a vote for this, and I will get the information before they come down.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many hands do you propose to employ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. About sixty hands most of the time.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is that 8 cents per pound at the penitentiary, or delivered at the stations from which it is ordered? If that is not so, those who live in the neighbourhood of the penitentiary will get it cheaper, but I think the Government should give the farmers all over the country a chance, and deliver it at the railway stations at the same price.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We pay the freight to a certain point westward; I think as far as Owen Sound, but beyond that freight is charged.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is it intended that this twine shall be sold directly to the small merchants throughout the country? I suppose it will be sold to any person who wishes to purchase it at the price?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes. The prices I mention are for less than a car-load, and we will make a reduction on car-load lots.

Mr. SPEAKER. Will more than one car-load be sold to any one purchaser?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not during the present season at any rate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The question Mr. Speaker has raised is one of some consequence. I take it that the Government of the country going into this business, it is desirable that they should in a general way distribute this as evenly as possible, and not allow the whole output to be purchased by one or two merchants. That might modify to a considerable extent the value of this enterprise.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We will take care of that.

Mr. McMILLAN. Can a single farmer send in his order and get it sent to his address?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, he can.

Mr. McMULLEN. After taking all the expenses into consideration, about what percentage will remain for the work of the convicts at these prices of 7 and 8 cents?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have stated the prices from memory, and as my memory for figures is not very good, it may be that I have made a mistake.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). These are the prices of the Ontario Government that you give?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am inclined to think that I am a cent or a half a cent below those prices. We have taken into consideration all the expenses which the ordinary manufacturers would estimate on: a fair interest on the capital, the working expenses, salaries of foremen, fuel, salaries of engineer and clerk of industries, who will attend to the orders, and all the miscellaneous expenses which will be included in the operation of such a factory. We have computed the prison labour at 50 cents a day, and we think that the prices will leave a very liberal profit.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it to be a cash business?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is to be cash except for car-load lots.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the Government keeps the price of this twine down to the lowest possible point, I have no doubt that this factory will be an advantage to the farmers of the country, because it will bring down the prices of other manufacturers. The price of twine has been higher than it should be, and it has been a considerable drain on the resources of the farmers, considering the very low price at which grain is now sold. I would prefer that the Government should report a small loss at the end of the year, rather than that they should make a profit by keeping up the prices. I should like to see the price below 7 or 8 cents, and I hope that the Government will be able to sell it for less than that.

Manitoba Penitentiary—Increase of salary ($1,000) to mason and quarry instructor $400

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should imagine that for $700 or $800 you ought to obtain the services of such a person, unless he has some special qualifications. Prima facie, a salary of $1,000 for a permanent officer is rather more than is required.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I only took a vote for $600, but I am informed that a good mason and quarry instructor cannot be got for less than $1,000. We are preparing for the building of a stone wall around the prison and intend to do a good deal of work of this kind.

Mr. McMULLEN. In Manitoba, where they have such a long holiday in winter time, this man has virtually nothing to do at all. They do not do stonework in winter time.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They do. In the summer time we get the stone out of the quarries, and in the winter time it is cut and dressed.

Legislation—House of Commons. $7,296

Mr. DEVLIN. I would like to ask who does the work of French translation for the House?

Mr. SPEAKER. The work of French translation for the House of Commons is done by a staff called Sessional French Translators. These men do as much work as they possibly can during the session, and during the recess as much work as they can perform is given them, and if they are not able to do the whole of the work during the recess, some of it is given to other people.

Mr. DEVLIN. Can the hon. the Speaker tell me who are the members of this staff?

Mr. SPEAKER. I speak from memory : Mr. Prieur, Mr. Gelinas, Mr. Moffet and Mr. McMahan.

Mr. DEVLIN. Is Mr. Bouchard on this staff ?

Mr. SPEAKER. No.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. He is on the staff of the Debates.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Debates, as the hon. gentleman understands, are directly under the control of the Debates Committee, who report directly to the House, and the Speaker has really nothing to do with the appointment of either the 'Hansard' reporters or the amanuenses. Their salaries are fixed by the House itself, and they are under the direct control of the House. Their duties practically cease at the end of the session, although some work is required to be done afterwards. Whatever work is left undone at the end of the session by the French translators is required to be done by them during the recess for the amount provided, $1,000 per annum.

Mr. DEVLIN. My reason for bringing this matter up to this. I understand that Mr. Bouchard is one of the translators of the Debates, employed at a regular salary, a very good salary ; and I lay special stress on this, because the Speaker said a moment ago that the translators were constantly occupied during the session, and sometimes between sessions. This may be the case also with the translators of the Debates, who are supposed to be officers of the House. The reason I mention Mr. Bouchard is that I am informed, that in addition to his position in this House he fills the position of editor of a newspaper in the city of Hull, 'Le Spectateur.' He is the recognized editor of that paper ; there is no secret about it ; and he is able to give his attention to that at the same time he is supposed to be here as a translator. My objection is this, and I think it is a good one, that if Mr. Bouchard wishes to attend to the duties of editor of this paper, he is welcome to do so ; but I do not think the country should be called upon to give a special salary to editors, who give all their time and attention to their papers.

Mr. SPEAKER. As I said before, the translators are under the control of the Debates Committee, and I assume that they are satisfied with the amount of work done by the translators. At all events, the translators are paid for the work of the session, and if they do not complete their work during the session they are required to complete it during the recess, and a sufficient amount of their salary is kept back to ensure the work being done.

Mr. DEVLIN. Are they allowed to give their attention to other occupations during the session ?

Mr. SPEAKER. I could not say.

Mr. OUMET. An ordinary day's work is ten hours, and if one of these gentlemen choose after that to work at something else. I should think there is nothing in the regulations of the House to prevent him.

Mr. BRODEUR. There is one thing very sure, that the translation of the Debates is in a very backward state. We are now at the 3rd of July, and I think we have not received the translation up to the end of May. Such a state of things is quite intolerable. If we want to send away the Debates in French, we have to wait a very long time to get them. There is no reason why these Debates should not be delivered eight or ten days after the speeches have been made. I suppose the gentlemen composing the staff are working, but perhaps the staff is not sufficient, and I think the Government should see that it is increased in order that we should have the Debates as soon as possible.

Mr. OUMET. If I am not mistaken there are two reasons for the delay in placing the French edition before this House. The first is that the French translators have to wait for the revised edition, and it often happens that some of the speeches are kept back by the hon. members to correct them, for five or six days, sometimes longer. The edition we have before the House is the unrevised edition. Another reason for the delay in the distribution of the French edition is the delay in the printing. I have not to account for that. I was told the other night by Mr. Beaulieu, the chief French translator, that they were as much as 300 pages ahead of the printers, so that the delay is not the fault of the translators.

Mr. AMYOT. Let me say in support of this, that on Thursday, the 14th June, 1894, 3,400 columns of the English version had been translated and delivered to the printers, while all that the printers had printed was only 2,236 columns, leaving 1,000 columns in their hands not yet printed. That is not the fault of the translators. On the 18th June, 3,584 columns translated of the English version, comprising nearly the whole of the sitting of the 1st June, had been delivered to the printers, and they had only printed 2,368 columns, leaving over 1,100 columns not yet in type. It is evident that the delay cannot be charged to the translators, who do their work properly. I would like any hon. member to specify what speech he required corrected and translated into French and distributed, which was not translated and distributed. Those young men have very poor salaries ; they are able men, who do good work, and should not be found fault with for something for which they are not at all responsible.

Mr. LAURIER. Then the fault is with the printers. Who is responsible for them ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I have not charged the translators with neglecting their work, but I was only inquiring where the fault lies. If the fault is with the printers, the printers should be made to correct it, and do better justice to the French members. The French version of the debates is only up to the 1st June. Whether that be the fault of the printers or the translators, the Government should interfere so that justice may be done. We are in need of those speeches, and want to distribute them, and I do not see why the work should be so far behind. I am not complaining, as the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) insinuated, against the translators, but I am only trying to find out where the fault lies.

Mr. MARTIN. I must take exception to the remarks of the hon. Minister of Public Works when he says that when a translator puts in a certain number of hours for his money he is quite at liberty to engage in any other line of business. That cannot be entertained for a moment. It will be seen at once that if a man is engaged in some other business he comes here with his faculties dulled and is not in a position to do the work for which he is paid. It has been said that these men receive a small salary: $1,000 for the session cannot be called a small salary for this work. The proposition of the Minister of Public Works is perfectly absurd: that because a newspaper editor, who is engaged in bolstering up his cause and that of other members of the Government—a kind of work which requires, under the circumstances, a great deal of ability—cannot obtain much remuneration for his labours, that kind of wares not meeting with a ready sale in the country, and there being no profit in the business, except in so far as being supported by the Government, he is justified in placing him here and paying him $1,000 per session for working so many hours per day, when the work he is doing for the House is only his nominal work, and the real work he is engaged in is that of editing a newspaper in hon. gentlemen's interests. Surely a statement of that kind cannot be made in seriousness. A few nights ago I drew the attention of one of the Ministers to a similar state of affairs in another part of the country, where an official, supposed to be devoting his whole time to the service of the Government, and receiving adequate remuneration, was really editing a paper. I am glad to say that on that occasion I heard no such statement as that expressed by the Minister of Public Works. On the contrary, the hon. Minister expressed great surprise, and said he had no knowledge of the circumstance, and I am glad to say that since then the name of this gentleman complained of has been removed from the newspaper as editor in chief. No doubt the cases are quite similar. It is not the case of a man doing occasional work for the Government, but of a man being supposed to devote his whole energy and ability for the time being to the service of the Government. But it is quite impossible to earn $1,000 as a translator for the Government and at the same time edit a newspaper. I could not allow the occasion to pass without expressing my entire disapproval of the principle laid down by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. AMYOT. I am glad to see the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) take the French translators under his charge and protection. But I do not like general charges. Would he kindly say what part of the 'Hansard' has been badly translated? We French-Canadian members believe that we understand something of the French tongue, and yet we find that the 'Hansard' is well translated. The hon. gentleman says it is impossible that Mr. Bouchard could be up at his work, because he edits a newspaper. I would, therefore, ask the hon. gentleman to specify what speech or what particular portion of 'Hansard' has been badly translated.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Winnipeg makes the charge that this French translator, Mr. Bouchard, is working for the Government. Such is not the fact. He is working for the House. There is a committee appointed to superintend the debates, of which I am a member. It is composed of hon. gentlemen on both sides, and it employs these translators. This gentleman is one of the most efficient on the staff. Each member is allotted a certain amount of work to do per day by the chief translator. Some may take the work and do it at home, and others may do it here. And if this Mr. Bouchard does his stated number of columns it is none of our business that he writes a letter or two for his newspaper—that is nothing to the members of the committee, so long as he does his work faithfully and efficiently. He is not doing that work for the Government, but for the members of this House, and hon. gentlemen on that side of the House are just as much responsible as those on this.

Mr. LAURIER. This is a new departure from the rules which were well understood when the French translators were appointed. Some years ago, in 1882 or 1883, when the late Minister of the Interior—the late Hon. Thomas White—was chairman of the committee, a report was adopted by this House, and at that time it was understood that the shorthand writers should receive $2,000 a year, and that their services might be taken advantage of by the Government at any time during the recess, and the translators were to receive $1,000, and were to be free to take up any occupation they liked during recess, but during the session they were to give their whole time to the House. It is nothing extraordinary and nothing unfair that they should be expected to give their whole time to the business for which they are paid. After the session they are free to go into journalism or anything else they like. Those translators who were dismissed some time ago had written about politics in a manner offensive to members of the Cabinet. But that case does not affect the principle I speak of. The hon. gentleman would bear me out that the members of the staff are supposed to give their whole time during session to their work.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) did not exactly understand the statement I made a few moments ago. I did not wish to reflect on the manner in which these gentlemen do their work as translators. No doubt the translation is done in a manner agreeable to both sides. That may or may not be the case. But that was not the point I was making. It appears that I was wrong in bringing it up, according to the hon. member for Bellechasse. This gentleman is in receipt of a salary of $1,000 from the public chest for work which he is supposed to do during the session. But besides doing this work during the session he is at the same time occupied in writing a political paper which is supposed to be under the immediate control of the Minister of Public Works. Consequently, I pointed it out as a little strange that the Minister of Public Works should have been able to secure the services of an employee of this House to direct this newspaper, which is his special organ. I entered my protest, and notwithstanding what has been said by the hon. member for Bellechasse, I still protest. The Postmaster General, speaking to-night, said that he liked a fair fight. So do we all. But I would ask any hon. gentleman if it is fair that one side should be able to secure as political writers for their papers those who are drawing large salaries as employees of this House? We are not asking this House to censure these gentlemen who are writing on political subjects and misrepresenting the words and actions of members of this House. We simply lay down the proposition that if these gentlemen are paid $1,000 for their services to this House they should give their time to their work, and not be occupied at the same time in the business of misrepresenting and calumniating members of this House.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) seems to think it is quite impossible for us to criticise this item because these gentlemen happen to be in the employ of a committee of this House. The hon. gentleman apparently did not observe my remarks were directed to the principle laid down by the Minister of Public Works, which would apply in all cases as well as this. But the hon. gentleman has taken occasion to point out that this particular gentleman is employed by a committee of this House, composed of members on both sides, and to infer that we on this side are as much responsible as gentleman opposite for the fact that he is allowed to do newspaper work. The hon. gentleman says he "writes a letter or two." That is not the charge; the charge is that he is the editor of a newspaper published in Hull, I think. I would be very much surprised, indeed, if the Liberal members of that committee were aware that such was the state of affairs. I am satisfied if they had been aware of it they would not have tolerated it or the position laid down by the hon. member that because this gentleman had done a certain amount of work he is at liberty to go into any other business, and be paid at the same time $1,000 for his work for this House. If he is able to do that it simply means that there are too many translators, and that the work allotted to them is not sufficient to take up their whole time. I appeal to the House and the country if the salary paid them is not sufficient to engage their whole time. Being paid such a salary, there can be no circumstances under which it is justifiable that they should be engaged in other work. I do not mean writing an occasional letter, but I mean substantially engaged in other work as this gentleman is, and the gentleman to whom I referred the other day, Dr. Barrett, of Winnipeg. I was surprised to hear the proposition laid down by the hon. gentleman. It is not one that will stand criticism. This is not a matter merely for this House or a committee of the House or the Government. This amount of $1,000 a year is taken from the people by means of taxation, and it is the people whose interests are to be protected. They are entitled to the man's whole time under these circumstances, and it is a gross abuse to use the people's money not for the purpose of having the business of the people done, but to enable those on one side of politics to be furnished with writers for their political press.

Mr. OUIMET. I wish to correct a statement made by the last speaker. I say that the gentleman who edits the 'Spectateur' of Hull is not doing that work for the money he receives from this House. Whatever he earns in writing a few articles in the 'Spectateur,' is paid by somebody else.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is news to me that this translator is an editor of a newspaper. If that is any crime, as the hon. member for Winnipeg seems to think, I ask him now to have his Liberal friends bring the matter up at the next meeting of our committee on Friday next, and we will investigate it.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman is not putting the case fairly. My hon. friend from Winnipeg did not say that editing newspapers was a crime, he said it was a crime to use public money to promote a private enterprise under cover of discharging public duties.

Mr. OUIMET. The statement is not correct. I have just denied that he does any work outside of this House which is paid for by money voted by this House.

Mr. LAURIER. Who is editor of the 'Spectateur'?

Mr. OUIMET. Mr. Bouchard is one of them, and he is paid a thousand dollars a year for it.

Mr. LAURIER. The rule has always been that during the session they are to devote their whole time to the work for which they are paid by this House; outside the session they can do what they please.

Mr. OUMET. He does his work here.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Public Works has admitted the whole case; he admits that this translator has a regular calling, that of editor of a newspaper.

Mr. OUMET. Every one of them is editor of a newspaper.

Mr. MULOCK. I will confine my remarks to this one case. The hon. gentleman admits that his regular calling is that of editor of a newspaper, and while he is carrying on that calling, his entire services are engaged by this House. Now, it is clear that you have more French translators than you require if one of them can carry on a regular calling and at the same time discharge his duties to this House which he is paid to discharge. You may as well try and strip the transaction of any bias and look at it fairly. I am tired of these protests against mispending public money. We ought to be able to approach a transaction like this and say honestly whether this service is being used in order to promote a private enterprise. We ought in all cases to avoid the very appearance of wrong-doing, and we should not employ men and allow them to think that they can land in the public service and then carry on other engagements to the prejudice of the public exchequer. The fact is there ought to be some guard for the public funds, and to allow men to be nominally hired by the country, but to discharge other duties, is a grave breach of trust on the part of Parliament; it is a breach of trust in the highest sense of the word, because there is no appeal to any other tribunal except the people. The admission of the Minister is proof positive that you have more translators than you require.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the committee has overlooked the fact I pointed out when this discussion commenced, that if the work is not completed during the session these men are required to complete it during recess. Although some objection may be made by the French members to the non-completion of the work at the earliest moment possible, yet, as there has been no increase in the number of translators on the 'Hansard' staff for a great number of years, as the work is increasing every year, and as this work has to be performed during the recess, which is not performed during the session, the committee will see that the country is not losing anything.

Mr. DEVLIN. Who are the two extra clerks?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member will have to ask the leader of the Opposition and the leader of the Government to give explanations upon that point.

Mr. OUMET.

Library of Parliament—To provide for a bonus of 15 days' extra pay at $2.50 per diem in compensation for the shortness of the session of 1893, to the following sessional messengers, viz.: Joseph Lafontaine and T. W. Hodgins, $37.50 each. $75

Mr. McMULLEN. That is a very strange item. When the sessions are short then we vote an additional allowance, and when the sessions are long, we vote an additional allowance.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I quite agree that we pay in both cases.

Public works and buildings--
Kingston Graving Dock, balance due on construction of iron caisson. $782.97

Mr. OUMET. This is a re-vote. In 1890 a contract was made with the Dominion Bridge Company for the construction of a caisson for the sum of $17,782.97. The contract was given for a bulk sum, and when the work was completed the contractors contended that a larger number of pounds of iron had gone into the building of the caisson than they expected, and they filed a claim for extras. The Chief Engineer made a report that the contract having been made on specifications, and for a bulk sum, no extra amount should be granted. Seventeen thousand dollars were paid at the time, and the $782 now asked for remained in abeyance. I understand the contractors are willing to take their money, but as it has lapsed since, we have to re-vote it.

Public Buildings, Nova Scotia—
Halifax Quarantine Station on Lawlor's Island, revote of lapsed balance. $8,417

Mr. OUMET. This amount is to provide for a Governor General's warrant issued at the end of 1893. A certain sum, $65,000, was voted for the equipment of Grosse Isle Quarantine Station in the Estimates of 1892-93. On 1st July, as the work was not completed, the amount lapsed, and, in order to meet the emergency, a Governor General's warrant was necessary.

Mr. MULOCK. Was the work let by contract?

Mr. OUMET. There were several contracts.

Mr. MULOCK. Were tenders invited by public advertisement?

Mr. OUMET. All except a contract for an outhouse and baggage-room, amounting to $487.

St. John Custom-house. $36,000

Mr. OUMET. Part of this work has been done by day labour, and part by contract.

The St. John custom-house was burnt, and nothing but the outside walls remained. At the time the estimate was given by the chief architect, it was stated that the cost of rebuilding would be $150,000. For divers reasons, this sum has been exceeded. I will read the report of the chief architect :

The original approximate estimate of the cost of reconstructing this building with the same materials, exclusive of the supply of furniture, was $150,000.

The original building, the cost of which was $330,500, was not fire-proof. It was constructed with wooden joists, wooden stairs and the external walls were furred with wood and lathing, and the roof was covered with slate and felt.

Owing to the condition of the burnt building an accurate estimate could not be made until the work was started. It was found when the work had begun that the damage done to the stone and brick work exceeded the original calculations, and a much larger portion of it had to be taken down and rebuilt with new materials, and additional piers had to be built in the towers to strengthen them. The restoration of the towers and attic story was both difficult and dangerous and required extra strong scaffolding, and the greatest precaution had to be taken to prevent the towers and chimneys from falling.

While the work of the restoration of the stone work was going on, the question was discussed as to whether it would not be in the interest of the department to expend an additional sum to that of the first estimate in order to make the building fire proof and the chief architect was instructed to make a statement of the additional cost which that change in the mode of construction would involve. This estimate, a detail of which is given in the schedule A hereto annexed, amounted to $38,000, and it was decided to alter the mode of reconstruction so as to have a fire proof building.

As now constructed, the joists are of iron with brick arches and concrete. The stairs are of iron, and the external walls are lined with terra cotta plaster on the terra cotta, the entire roof is covered with copper and concrete floors are made in the basements. The dados and bases of the interior plastered walls are of cement and one additional vault and five sets of fire proof doors have been provided.

In addition to making the building fire-proof, this mode of construction will render it much less expensive to heat, and it is thought that the improvement in the building is well worth the additional expenditure made.

The work is being carried on partly by days' labour and partly by contract, the materials being procured in every instance by tender and those materials being worked by mechanics and labourers under the direct supervision of a superintendent detached from the department.

Mr. MULOCK. Who was superintendent ?

Mr. OUMET. Mr. Adams, one of the permanent clerks in the department.

Mr. BOWERS. Was the lumber supplied by contract ?

Mr. OUMET. Yes. Tenders were asked for lumber.

Mr. BOWERS. I called attention to the fact that excessive prices were paid for spruce.

Mr. OUMET. Tenders were invited from every firm in St. John that could supply the lumber required. Of course, first-class material was required.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then tenders were not advertised for ?

Mr. OUMET. They could not ; but tenders were asked as the work progressed. The work was being done by day labour, and as the walls were half burnt, we could not ascertain at once what would require to be taken down. As a matter of fact, we could not enter into a contract ; every stone had to be tested. The plumbing and heating and many other kinds of work were done by contract.

Mr. MULOCK. Can the hon. gentleman state the names of the firms that were invited to tender ? If the hon. gentleman could state the names we would know exactly the position, and we would be aware that the work was not simply placed in the hands of the hon. gentleman's political friends.

Mr. OUMET. I may assure the hon. gentleman that every firm interested in each trade was invited to tender, without any distinction of party.

Mr. MULOCK. Who was the chief architect in charge of the work ?

Mr. OUMET. Mr. Fuller.

Mr. MULOCK. That is the same gentleman who superintended the Langevin block. He makes a great many extras in all public works.

Mr. BORDEN. I understood the Minister to say that the original buildings had been discovered not to have been fire-proof. That is news to me, because I understood that it was built in sections, separated by iron doors, with all necessary precautions against fire extending from one part of the building to another. It is stated that when the fire broke out there was nobody to look after the building, that the separating iron doors had been left open, and that not one of these fire-proof advantages had been availed of. When I asked some information about this a couple of years ago no investigation had been then made, and I would now like to know if there has been an inquiry into the cause of the fire.

Mr. OUMET. An investigation was made, but the cause of the fire could not be discovered. When the fire was first noticed it was in the roof ; it had taken in one of the lower stories and was carried up between the wall and the plaster. The building was not fire-proof, although it was thought to be. As to whether the iron doors were closed or not, it had nothing to do with the fact that the fire went up from the lower to the higher story.

Mr. MULLOCK. Does this item finish the transaction ?

Mr. OUIMET. Yes.

Mr. MULLOCK. There will be no more money asked for ?

Mr. OUIMET. No more for the building.

Mr. MULLOCK. What rate of wages was paid for the various trades ?

Mr. OUIMET. The regular wages of the place.

Mr. MULLOCK. Who was clerk of works on behalf of the Government ?

Mr. OUIMET. Mr. Adams was sent down from here and remained there until the work was completed. He is in the architect's department, and is a carpenter and builder.

Heating Public Buildings, &c.,
Ottawa $9,000

Mr. OUIMET. The lighting of the Printing Bureau and the staff was under the charge of the Secretary of State, and it was transferred to our department.

Mr. MULLOCK. This is only a transfer, and there is no increase really ?

Mr. OUIMET. There is a small increase resulting from the shortening of the hours. The men were employed for twelve hours consecutively, and it was represented that these hours were too long, and instead of two relays, I provided for three, but we slightly decreased the number of employees.

Mr. MULLOCK. My question has reference solely to whether there has been an increase in the heating and lighting.

Mr. OUIMET. There has been an increase in the lighting on account of the electric light being substituted for gas or gasolene.

Mr. MULLOCK. This item refers to Ottawa, and we do not use gasolene here. Are you putting in any more telephones ?

Mr. OUIMET. No. There was a payment of $400 for telephones ; this amount has been added to the main estimate as voted, as it was not provided for last year.

Mr. MULLOCK. I observe that you are putting telephones into the private houses of officials and charging them to the public. Will the hon. gentleman say what telephones there are in private houses that are charged to the public ?

Mr. OUIMET. The Ministers have telephones in their own houses, also their secretaries, and the Deputy Ministers, as a rule, and in my department the chief engineer has one. I think on the whole it is a saving.

Mr. MULLOCK. I would not object to these.

Mr. OUIMET.

Experimental Farms—improvements, renewals, repairs, &c..... $1,200

Mr. McMILLAN. I would like to know which of the farms this sum is to be spent upon.

Mr. OUIMET. At Indian Head, $619.41 ; at the Central Farm, $385.41 ; at Agassiz, B.C., $165.

Mr. McMILLAN. I would just say that I think the time has come when there should be a separate appropriation for each farm, and the accounts of each should be kept by themselves, so that we could easily tell what is spent on each farm, and what it is spent for.

Port Maitland—Repairs to break-water—to make good to A. McKimmon, contractor, the extra expense he had to bear, considering that the timber required for the works let had to be procured in summer instead of winter, as calculated on by him..... $273.75

Mr. MULLOCK. What is the reason for this ?

Mr. OUIMET. The work was advertised for early in the fall, but the contract was not entered into until late in the spring, and some damage was caused to the contractor, who had not sufficient time to buy his timber in the right season ; and this vote is recommended by the chief engineer to indemnify the contractor.

Mr. MULLOCK. But a contract is a contract. The contractor agreed to supply this timber at a certain price. Surely he could have purchased $273 worth of timber in winter. Was this the fall preceding the performance of the work ?

Mr. OUIMET. It was on account of no fault of the contractor. The contract was entered into and signed long after the tenders were received, and this gives the contractor a claim in equity, which the chief engineer thinks is reasonable.

Mr. MULLOCK. I cannot take this explanation at all, and I think the item should stand until the Minister furnishes me information of the details that warrant us in departing from the contract.

Mr. OUIMET. I will give the hon. gentleman the report of the chief engineer in which this is recommended.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. At the wish of the hon. gentleman, we will let the item stand.

Public Works, Prince Edward Island—Nine Mile Creek $84

Mr. YEO. Is it the intention to bring down any further votes for public works in Prince Edward Island ?

Mr. OUMET. Yes, in the Supplementary Estimates for this year. These estimates are for the year expiring 30th June last.

Mr. YEO. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman make this statement. There are several works in Prince County, P.E.I., which require attention. One in particular, I brought to his notice at Brae. It was begun by the people, and the work done by them is in danger of being carried away unless the Government pay attention to it soon. The hon. gentleman promised two years ago that this work would be completed. He has not completed the work at Brae, and has not undertaken any work at West Point as he said he would. I hope the two works I have referred to, and those referred to by my colleague some time ago, especially Summerside Harbour, will receive the hon. gentleman's attention.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and the House adjourned at 1.30 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 4th July, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SOULANGES CANAL.

Mr. HARWOOD asked, Why certain proprietors of lands expropriated by the Government, for the construction of the Soulanges Canal, whose deeds were signed and executed nearly a year ago, have not yet been paid? Is it the intention of the Government to pay them interest on the amounts involved?

Mr. HAGGART. There is no record in the Department of Railways and Canals of a deed of property on the Soulanges Canal having been signed and executed and payment therefor not made.

PURSE-SEINING, SEINING AND TRAWLING.

Mr. GILLIES asked, Have the Government entered into any negotiations with the United States, by correspondence or otherwise, with the view of entering into a joint agreement by which the system of purse-seining, seining and trawling, now pursued beyond the three-mile limit, with such damage and injury to the fishing grounds upon the Atlantic coast, may be rendered unlawful and prohibited in future by the joint action of the two Governments?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Government have entered into a convention with the United States, which, though not dealing specifically with the subject of purse-seining, seining and trawling, contemplates a general investigation, which is now proceeding, which will deal with the subject to which the hon. gentleman refers in his question. Of course, no action will be taken until the commissioners have reported.

SUPPLY—LAKE ERIE FISHERIES.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. TISDALE. Before the House goes into Committee of Supply, I wish to bring a matter to the attention of the House and of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. While this is largely a local matter, I would ask the forbearance of the House for bringing it up at this late period of the session, as I had not the opportunity, as I thought, without interfering even more than now with the proceedings of the House, of bringing it up before. But, while this is largely a local matter, it still affects the whole question of fishing in Lake Erie. In bringing the subject before the House I do not purpose making any attack upon the Minister or the department. I act as a matter of duty and in response to a very large petition which has been forwarded to me by my constituents asking me to bring the matter to the attention of the Minister, and also to bring it up for discussion in the House. I propose, therefore, to read some correspondence which has passed between us, and, after doing that, to show wherein the Minister and myself, and my constituents to a certain extent, disagree. The fishermen in my district consider that they have some grievances. The questions that have arisen are four in number: First, the question of prohibiting fishing altogether in the month of November, and the question of further limiting the number of nets that are allowed to be used in that district. Secondly, the abolition of the use of seines in what is called the Inner Bay of Long Point, a largely land-locked bay within my constituency. There are some other matters of minor importance that the petition deals with, which will be named when I come to read the petition. I may say that a somewhat active state of friction and discussion has existed on some of these subjects since 1892. I propose to read the correspondence that has passed, and then I propose to point out the wishes of the fishermen, and also to express my own views. I will be as brief as possible, but it is necessary to read the correspondence in order to get the matter properly before the House.

The first letter is dated 29th October, 1892, and is from the Deputy Minister of Fisheries. He says :

I am to inform you that as an additional protection to whitefish and salmon-trout, the Minister has directed that no fishing whatever shall be carried on during the month of November.

That was directed to the overseer of my district. On the 7th November, 1892, having learned of it, I wrote to the Minister as follows :—

SIMCOE, 7th November 1892.

HON. C. H. TUPPER, Minister Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa.

DEAR SIR,—I learned with much surprise and regret the instructions you had issued prohibiting all fishing during this month. I could not believe it was true and so telegraphed, in your absence, to your deputy to learn if it was intended to be applied to places where whitefish and salmon-trout were not caught, as I learned that Overseer Sharp was notifying all fishermen. I received a reply that it was general and applied to all. Now, as representing a constituency upon Lake Erie where there are a number of poor fishermen who use only the seine and who fish where salmon-trout and whitefish are never caught and to whom this prohibition means distress and suffering to their families, as this is their best month, and who were not allowed heretofore to fish from April 15th to September 1st, being practically only four months in the year and by this order reduced to three months, I most strongly protest against both the order and its sudden infliction. I protest against it also in behalf of gill-net herring fishermen. Some I have who have been all summer getting their nets ready and waiting for the cool weather when the herring are most valuable and can be handled without danger of loss and at less expense, and these men had been only fishing 10 days when came this sudden and to them and me, this seeming arbitrary and totally unexpected order.

I further protest in behalf of all fishermen on this coast against any order which closes fishing where the fish for the protection of which it is made, do not run or propagate, as being unjust in principle, unnecessary in practice, and tending to promote dissatisfaction for cause. More I could properly say upon this subject, but I content myself here for the present, with this brief protest.

Yours faithfully,

D. TISDALE.

I may say that the order was suspended for that cause. In September, 1893, another circular was issued to the same effect in regard to November. Upon that I wrote to the Minister in October, 1893 :

DEAR SIR,—The fishermen in my riding have been to me in reference to the circular recently issued (September 13th, 1893) to the overseers to stop fishing, entirely, during November.

The fishermen of this county (and I can say the same to a great extent, for Elgin, Haldimand and Monck) catch almost entirely herring and coarse fish, and have always done so. There has, therefore, never been any close season in November, except for whitefish which they can easily and always have restored to the water with no damage to speak of. They all feel very much aggrieved at the issue of such a circular. As matters stand at the present time I feel they have good reason. If you have issued the same circular to the divisions covering the other counties I have mentioned, I know the fishermen and members there feel the same, as we all have from time to time consulted together in reference to the fisheries and the same circumstances apply to all. In fact I may say from all the information I can get, the same circumstances apply to the whole of Lake Erie, except at the extreme western end they catch more whitefish.

Mr. TISDALE,

Before entering into the fuller details of the matter which I propose to do at considerable length, let me call your attention to a couple of matters that in my judgment should have great weight in the prevention of the enforcement of what the circular contains.

Firstly : You will remember that during the session of 1892 (last year) I told you I had (with other members) arranged to bring a delegation from nearly the whole length of the Canadian shore of Lake Erie to meet you upon the then talked of close season for herring in November.

This was finally abandoned upon your announcing that you would make no alterations in the close season regulations that year, but would appoint a commission to inquire into and take evidence and report upon that and other matters connected with the fisheries in the great lakes. You appointed the commission and they took a lot of evidence covering Lake Erie amongst other lakes, but they did not conclude their labours nor have they reported, or if they have, neither the report nor the evidence has been printed and distributed so that the Lake Erie fishermen or the members representing them have been able to see them. I am informed that no report has been agreed upon and issued by the commissioners even as far as they have gone. The fishermen will, I think, have good cause for complaint under these circumstances, if November is closed against catching any kind of fish, as it will be doing so without giving them a chance to be heard or without letting them see either the evidence or report of the commission appointed to take evidence, examine into and report upon the matter they wished to be heard upon, action in reference to which, and their hearing upon which, was deferred to enable this commission to be appointed, take evidence, examine into, and report so as to decide upon whether any, and if so, what action should be taken. If I am correctly informed the commission have never yet discussed and made, or decided upon, an actual report.

Secondly : The statement in the first three lines of the circular that the gill and pound-net licenses of the division of Overseers Sharp and Price (covering my riding) are made to expire on the 31st October must have been made by you under a misapprehension of the facts, at all events so far as pound-nets are concerned. I have personally seen all of the pound-net licenses in Overseer Price's division and they are all for "the season of 1893," and I have been informed by Overseer Sharp upon inquiry made by me of him that all of the pound-net licenses in his division read the same. The same reading as in former years.

As to what may have been the term of the pound-net licenses issued east of Overseer Sharp's division, I have no information, but I have seen the licenses for four (4) of the pound-nets in Elgin, next west of Sharp's division and they all read as follows: "To fish as follows during the season of 1893, with four pound-nets," &c. I presume all others in the county of Elgin, or Haldimand, or Monck are not different—it would be manifestly unfair not to treat all alike. So that the reason given in the circular that the licenses were made to expire on the 31st October, for the purpose of ensuring a strict observance of the close season and compelling parties to have their nets out of the water by the 1st of November, falls to the ground, as in fact at all events quite a number of the nets do not so expire, and I take it the unfairness of treating part differently from others similarly situated and affected is so apparent it needs no discussion. But in addition to these reasons, either of which I submit are very strong against the enforcement of the circular this fall, I have much more to say.

Matter striking deep at the root of the very existence of Canadians fishing in Lake Erie if hampered at present by such regulations.

If a cruiser is to be put on this lake this autumn I think it bad policy and unwise to irritate the fishermen in this way. For the protection of the Erie fisheries it would have been sufficient to confiscate the nets and refuse to renew the licenses of any fishermen bringing proscribed fish to the shore. Regulations relating to marketing and waste of immature fish and fish caught out of season should now be made stringent and invariably enforced.

The American catch of fish in Erie in 1880, 1885 and 1891, three years, amounted to 154,669,541 lbs. to our 18,766,367 lbs. They fish every inch of this lake on their own side with pound and trap-nets and have for some years swept the entire lake from start to finish with their gill-nets regardless of the national boundary line.

As to gill-nets: in 1885 they had $79,507 in value of gill-nets to our $2,028. The increase in American nets since that date has been enormous and ours trifling.

All this season the Americans have fished this lake to within sight of our shore. This outrage has been going on for years. Is it not sufficient, and will it not be good policy to wait and see the result of driving four-fifths of the American Lake Erie fishermen into their own depleted waters?

In the meantime why worry a few poor men holding on the whole lake but $5,000 worth of gill-nets, some of them sturgeon gill-nets fished only in June and July and a few others whitefish gill-nets which cannot be used in November. It would be right to destroy whitefish gill-nets, but it is even doubtful whether any are in use except at the west end of the lake. I have yet to learn that there is one steam tug in use fishing gill-nets on the Canada side of Erie. In 1885 the Americans had steam fishing tugs and vessels on Lake Erie to the value of $178,000, while we had none. In the same year they had other boats in value of $126,557 to our $50,296. The Americans have largely increased their nets and steam tugs since the above dates, but the increase on this side has been in comparison trifling. The coast line of Erie is 375 miles, and all the gill-nets we fish on this lake would not be as great in extent as the seven American tugs I saw fishing off the entrance to Long Point Bay, had in our water at that time. By referring to "Georgian Bay and Lake Huron" in supplement No. 4, Fishery Reports 1892, page 177, you will see how small a thing this gill-net fishing is on our side of Erie. The gill-nets of Georgian Bay and Huron are also almost wholly for trout and whitefish while those of Erie are for herring chiefly. The Huron and Georgian Bay nets amount to 416,330 fathoms (about 470 miles), valued at $211,330.

The few gill-net men who fish in Lake Erie will be an effective water patrol, but they do not fish except for sturgeon from 15th May till 20th September. The fine twine of gill-nets cannot be tarred. Without tarring it would rot in a few days in the warm water of this lake in the summer months. The Americans fish their gill-nets all season round for reasons afterwards explained. They fish at greater profit and less expense than our fishermen.

It will be from our gill-net fishermen and the crews of our pound-net tugs that the captain of any cruiser will from time to time get his information of American depredations and trespassing. There are telegraph offices at the landing places and villages about every 5 miles on our immense length of coast. The captain of a cruiser would be about as effective as a blind man unless our pound and gill-net men kept him informed in these matters.

The only craft we now have left on our coast of Erie are fishing craft. Force our Canadian tug boats and nets out of Erie on the 31st of October and half a dozen cruisers would not protect this lake. If it is done it is not improbable that many of our fishermen, discontented and irritated at being thrown out of work, would join and fish with these American trespassers. If occasionally the Americans lost a little of their fishing twine, what would they care? On the contrary if the waters are protected by a cruiser, and our fishermen continuing to carry on the business co-operate with the cruiser, valuable American tugs as well as nets would be seized, and traps well planned laid for them. This outrage can only be broken up with the friendly and active co-operation of our fishermen.

The ease with which the Americans can fish almost the entire waters of Erie can scarcely be believed unless seen. From Buffalo, Sandusky and Detroit, their coast is one long line of large towns and cities, no other lake is like it, not even Ontario. All these American towns and cities have their fishing outfits, steam tugs and boats and having fished when and where they please they return with their fish direct to the consumer. They return to large cities. Our fishermen land their fish in sparsely-settled localities and small villages on this side and then freight or express them at large expense by rail to those same American cities or to the interior of Ontario.

The American fishermen have a quadruple advantage as to profits. We pay 60 cts. per ton on our coal for fishing tugs and $1 per ton freight. They pay nothing, nor freight, nor express charges on their fish, nor license fees for fishing their own or our waters, and they have no close season.

November is the harvest month for American fishermen. Our cruiser will require to be active and well informed to stop this profitable plan of fishing our waters, and the advantage of the friendly co-operation of our fishermen should not be overlooked. This co-operation cannot be given if they are driven to the forests in November.

If our fishermen left their nets on the 31st October, the men will leave for other work or to endeavour to get it, and that ends the fishing for the year.

The permission given to begin fishing again on the 1st December is wholly delusive and shows a want of practical knowledge of the fishing business as well as the climate of this part of Canada. An exceptional season permits a little December seine and gill-net fishing, but not sufficient to warrant a return after lifting in October.

There are four States fronting on Lake Erie. Each has its own regulations. They are as suspicious of and antagonistic to each other as they are to us. Had we had one State to deal with, or better still, the Federal Government, it is just possible an example of proper fishing might have some effect, but with four grasping and selfish States it will not be so. They have not even yet put a close season upon whitefish. We will bring them to their senses and secure uniform regulations more quickly by continuing to catch, at all events, the herring, pike, suckers, mullet, catfish, perch, coarse fish and those destructive vermin peculiar to Lake Erie, called blue pickerel.

I am satisfied that more than one-half the American Lake Erie fishermen will be bankrupted if our cruiser does her work properly.

As to pound-nets:

The wording of the circular upon which this letter is based in its relations to pound-nets practically closes pound-net fishing on the 15th of October. Any fisherman with five or more pound-nets to attend to must devote his whole time and service for a fortnight to taking up nets. Fishermen begin to take up their nets about the 10th of November, taking the most exposed nets out first.

Why not let the pound-net men continue to catch the herring, pike, blue pickerel, and all except whitefish? There are no trout in this lake.

The catch of whitefish in Georgian Bay and Lake Huron aggregates 6,074,756 lbs. and the catch of salmon-trout 4,975,259 lbs., preponderating largely in excess of all other fish. In Lake Erie it is the reverse; our catch of whitefish (no trout) amounted to 311,950 lbs. in 1892, while the catch of ravenous predatory and coarse fish, including herrings, amounted to 9,023,175 lbs. Why stop the catch of these coarse and other fish which disturb nature's balance in Lake Erie? They prey upon the young of all the finer kinds of fish. These coarse and ravenous fish all spawn in the spring months and are in the best condition for food in November. The public want these fish, and they are better out of the lake or considerably reduced in number if hatcheries are to show satisfactory results in these waters.

There is now a close season for maskinonge, bass and pickerel in the spring and summer months when they spawn and are unfit for food. To forbid catching these fish in November with nets, practically puts two close seasons upon these fish, in the spring and summer when unfit for food and in the fall when in their prime. But the whole array of coarse fish caught in this lake are spring and summer spawners and in the very best condition for food in November.

Climatic conditions and a preponderance of whitefish and salmon-trout over other fish has made it proper to make variations in fishing regulations, and more particularly in the size of mesh, in several of the upper lakes. Lake Erie is a coarse fish lake, the water is in summer twenty degrees warmer than in the other lakes (except St. Clair). Any commissioners, called upon to suggest regulations to grapple with these questions and fail to make regulations which will enable the public to get the best of food fish when in prime condition, can hardly be called a success.

Our catch of coarse fish in Erie in 1892, amounted to 1,142,100 lbs., and the pickerel, chiefly blue pickerel, which may be classified as vermin, amounted to 1,494,115 and pike 129,800 lbs. In addition to these fish, tons of sheepheads, eelpouts and dogfish, all most destructive to the young of the finer sorts of fish, are caught in pound-nets, not enumerated, but thrown away.

Any evidence I have seen indicates that the young of the whitefish do not come to the shores or within reach of pound-net leads in the autumn months. They come to the shores in certain localities in July and August—to the warm water. Nearly all the pound-nets used in Lake Erie are taken out of the water in August and part of July. The fishery reports, however, show that the catch of whitefish in Erie is almost confined to that portion of the Lake west of Long Point Island.

I could give you many more reasons why the regulations in the circular referred to should be suspended for the present, but I feel that this letter has reached a proper limit.

You can refer to Report of Fisheries, 1891, pages liii, liv, lv for many of the figures I have given you.

Yours faithfully,

D. TISDALE.

In reply the Minister wrote:

MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES,
OTTAWA, 12th October, 1893.

MY DEAR MR. TISDALE,—Referring to your recent conference with me, and your communication of the 4th October, respecting the fisheries of Lake Erie, I have concluded to send out, for this year only, instructions relating to pound-nets, gill-nets and seines, covering the close season for whitefish, as per inclosed copies of same.

I may say at the same time that I have abundant evidence to satisfy me that the fisheries of Lake Erie will rapidly decrease, and ultimately be destroyed if I am not permitted to strictly enforce the regulations respecting the breeding seasons, and to that end, during such time prohibit absolutely the use of pound-nets, gill-nets and seines.

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

DAVID TISDALE, Q.C., M.P.
Simcoe, Ont.

The following are the circulars :

12th October, 1893.

SIR,—I am directed by the Minister to inform you that, as Inner Bay is not frequented by whitefish or salmon-trout, seine fishing may be carried on there as usual, during the month of November, under license.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

WM. SMITH,
Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. DAVID SHARP,
Fishery Overseer,
Port Ryerse, Ont.

(Circular.)

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE AND FISHERIES,
OTTAWA, 3rd October, 1893.

SIR,—Adverting to a circular from this department dated 29th October, 1892, directing that as an additional protection to the whitefish and salmon-trout in Lake Erie, it had been decided that no fishing whatever would be allowed during the month of November, such being the close time for the above named fish, I am to inform you that with the view of meeting as far as possible, the wishes of many fishermen, the Minister now directs that herring gill-nets may be fished during the month of November, in such portions of Lake Erie where the local fishery officer is satisfied and reports definitely, upon his own responsibility that no whitefish or salmon-trout frequent the grounds for spawning purposes.

The fee, which is invariably payable in advance, is fixed at $5 per boat, with a maximum limit of 2,000 yards of gill-nets to each boat.

I am, Sir, &c.,

WM. SMITH,
Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

(Circular.)

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE AND FISHERIES,
OTTAWA, 12th October, 1893.

SIR,—The Minister directs me to inform you that after examining the forms of licenses issued this year for pound-nets, and that no notice was given to pound-net herring fishermen that they were to take their nets out at the end of October, and considering the fact that the Commissioners appointed to investigate into the subject of a close season and regulations in Ontario, have not yet reported, he has directed those instructions which required that all fishing for herring be prohibited in November be withdrawn.

You are therefore to permit fishing for herring under existing pound-net licenses, so long only as no whitefish or salmon-trout are caught. When there is evidence that fish other than herring, which the Fishery Regulations forbid being taken during November, are caught in any of these pound-nets such nets shall be immediately seized and secured, the license therefor cancelled, and prosecution immediately directed for the full penalty. You are to warn all fishermen that they run this risk in fishing for herring in November.

You are to forthwith report what assistance you require, and what expenditure is necessary to enable you to keep a strict supervision of all nets in your division during November.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WM. SMITH,
Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

The next correspondence took place in the spring of this year :

MY DEAR SIR CHARLES,—Your favour of the 23rd inst. duly received and I have delayed answering. In October last I went to considerable labour in compiling statistics as to the amount of fishing on the American side of Lake Erie from Buffalo up to and opposite the west end of my county as compared to the amount allowed on our side for the same distance. I also incidentally compiled a lot of other statistics, etc., in the same line about Lake Erie. All of these and considerable other information I sent you in a letter in the early part of October.

I learn that James Johnson having sold his nets to Thomas Cope whose mother owns the land in rear of the station heretofore occupied by Johnson, the department now refuse to license Cope for this station.

Considering the relative contrast as to the fishing on the American shore and their catch in Erie as compared to ours, the fact they have no close season, nor fees, nor regulations, and that you are going to impose an additional close season this year, that in spite of the fact that the Americans have fished our waters, which you purpose stopping this year, the amount of fish in my district have not decreased as shown by the catch, don't you think you can at all events permit my fishermen to have the quantity of nets heretofore employed? If I add to this the fact that these seines catch very largely coarse fish, surely you should not demur, and I can further add that you have given notice that after this year seines must go in the Inner Bay. I therefore recommend that in view of my statements you reconsider your instructions or decision and grant Thomas Cope the ground of James Johnson, for a seine license. All of the new names I have mentioned are good fishermen and have never had a black mark. I have never asked you to increase the number of seines, but I do ask you to let me keep the limited number heretofore granted at work.

I am satisfied that it will not only be just and fair and in the interests of the fisheries in the long run but will better enable me to make acceptable the regulations of the department. If it is to be all regulation and restriction by and by the fishermen will have to stop or a rebellion against the whole thing will occur. Please oblige me with an early reply as the fishermen must now get ready for spring when the ice will go.

Yours faithfully,

D. TISDALE.

The Minister replied as follows :—

MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES,
OTTAWA, 1st March, 1894.

MY DEAR TISDALE,—I have your letter of the 28th February, touching my decision in the cases of Jackson, Snooks and Cope.

There is only one point that it seems necessary for me to add to my former letters on this subject, and that is, that considering the decision not to grant seine licenses next year, and permitting them in certain cases this year, simply on account of previous use and want of notice, and the decision to inquire further, I have no grounds to abstain from enforcing a most justifiable rule.

You and I, of course, differ as to overfishing in the Canadian waters of Lake Erie.

All my information goes to show that overfishing has taken place.

In the estuaries of the salmon rivers in the lower provinces, the same condition of affairs has existed, and we have rigidly adhered to the rule which is being applied to Lake Erie. Moreover, we do not recognize the transfer of licenses there, and when a licensee dies, we take advantage of that state of affairs to abolish the stand.

I may be wrong, but I believe that were I to meet your views in these three cases, it would be necessary for me to give up any attempt to restrict the fishing of the great lakes, or to enforce necessary regulations.

I have striven to meet your views, and have shown, I think, a desire not to act without information, and a readiness to reverse any action of mine which might seem to be contrary to the object we have in view, or without proper foundation in fact, or without cause. Yours faithfully,

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

These are the letters on one branch of the subject. I will now proceed to read the correspondence on the other branch, and it is necessary to do so as I propose to base my argument on the information contained therein. The Inner Bay of Long Point is largely a land-locked bay, and some years ago, before the present Minister took office, important questions arose in regard to it. Questions arose then as to the question of allowing fishing in the Inner Bay, and I propose to read some of the letters on this subject. The first letter sent to the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries in August, 1886, reads as follows:—

SIMCOE, ONT., 2nd August, 1886.

The Honourable

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Ottawa.

DEAR SIR,—I beg to urge the desirability of stopping all fishing by seine, pound or other nets on what is known as the Inner Bay of Long Point. These waters are very shallow, and are the great breeding ground for the fish on our shore (north shore of Lake Erie), and the fish are destroyed by thousands, and spawn by bushels by drawing the seine in this bay during the spawning season. The nets on the Inner Bay this season, are practically under the control of one man who has berths in the Outer Bay.

This matter has been brought before me frequently, and only last week by a resident fish merchant, and I can refer you to Dr. J. M. Salmon Normandale, who has given the matter years of study and investigation, and who are anxious that the above should be acceded to.

Yours respectfully,

H. H. GROFF.

Mr. TISDALE.

SIMCOE, ONT., 14th April, 1888.

The Honourable

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

DEAR SIR,—In justice to your department we are bound to suppose that the laws regulating the fisheries are intended to advance those interests. Seeing a notice a few days since that you intend placing whitefish and salmon-trout fry in the Inner and Outer Bays of Long Point in this county, the only natural breeding grounds I know of (of any extent), on this shore, I take the liberty of pointing out the effect of the present law and leave you to judge how wise it is. Being the secretary of a shooting preserve, I might be supposed to have an axe to grind, in trying to stop fishing on these shores; this is not the case, the question stands on its own merits and I leave it to Mr. Kerr for decision.

The waters of the Inner Bay of Long Point are warm and shallow, and are the natural spawning beds of the different varieties of fish that frequent the waters of Lake Erie. The law says that we shall not angle in these waters for bass, until after the 15th July, why? because the bass is coming in to spawn up to that time, but on the other hand you allow the seine to be drawn for pickerel, up to the 15th April, and tons upon tons of these fish are taken in these waters, when they are coming for the same purpose as the bass. Such legislation is child's play; you prohibit the natives angling for a few hundred bass while you allow tons of a more valuable fish to be destroyed—and further, hundreds of bushels of spawn are drawn up on the beach and destroyed every year.

I may say by way of explanation that the fish come into the bay and work along the shores within easy reach of the same.

Yours respectfully,

H. H. GROFF.

P.S.—Only yesterday I saw pickerel in our market full of spawn (destroyed in the act of breeding.)

H. H. G.

I may say that Mr. Groff was not conversant with the facts in regard to that, and those letters were not acted upon. That, however, was the commencement of this agitation. So far as the Minister and myself are concerned, our correspondence dates from March, 1893. The Minister then sent a letter to his overseer, of which this is a copy:

353/93

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE AND FISHERIES,
OTTAWA, 8th March, 1893.

Mr. D. SHARP,

Fishery Overseer,
Port Ryerse, Ont.

SIR,—The department having decided, on the recommendation of the Fishery Commission, to issue no seine licenses for the public waters of Lake Erie, owing to their destructive nature, the license applied for by you on behalf of Frank Jackson will not be granted. The money ($8) remitted on his behalf is herewith returned.

I am, sir,

Your obedient servant,

WM. SMITH,
Deputy Minister.

That letter was written, as I understand, under a misstatement of the facts and without the authority of the Minister, but, at all events, it started the agitation again about taking away the seine licenses. I then wrote to the Hon. Mr. Costigan, acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as follows:—

March 9th, 1893.

Hon. JOHN COSTIGAN,
Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries
Ottawa.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have just learned that the department is holding a number of seine licenses in my riding on some question. I wish to state that if for any reason the department may wish to withhold seine licenses as a rule there is no reason, in my opinion, why these should be withheld. These licenses have been issued for years in a locality totally unfitted for any other sort of fishing and to men who make this their means of livelihood. To take them away takes their means of subsistence and maintenance of their families. The fishing is of a nature that no other thing can be substituted in its place. The fish are of a coarse kind and for years have not decreased in quantity. There can be no question as to this locality being allowed this means of fishing, and the withdrawing such licenses would be practically closing the fisheries for no good to the public or protecting the growth of fisheries of this sort. I can only further say that I am very strong in the opinion that it will be a great injustice to these fishermen and the locality without any resulting good to the public.

I feel it my duty to strongly protest against any refusal to renew their licenses and I shall have to combat any such decision in all legitimate ways in my power.

I shall be obliged if you will give this matter consideration and if possible try and see your way of continuing to these men the licenses which they have enjoyed for years.

I shall be glad to have your decision at as early a date as is consistent with your other engagements.

Yours faithfully,

D. TISDALE.

The Minister replied as follows:—

MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES,
OTTAWA, 15th March, 1893.

DEAR SIR,—Having reference to your letter of 9th instant, respecting the issue of licenses for seine fishing at Inner Bay; I beg to inform you that these licenses have been issued and have been sent to Overseer Sharp for countersignature and delivery.

Yours faithfully,

JOHN COSTIGAN,
Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Lieut.-Col. TISDALE, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

The following correspondence then took place:—

OTTAWA, 23rd March, 1893.

Hon. JOHN COSTIGAN,
Acting Minister, Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa.

SIR,—I inclose for the information of the department a letter from Mr. Frank Brock, one of the most intelligent, best informed and influential men in my riding, about the seine fishery question in my riding.

I am, sir, &c.,

D. TISDALE.

ST. WILLIAMS, 21st March, 1893.

DEAR SIR,—As our representative in the House of Commons, I address you respecting the regulations recently issued by the Fishery Department, as received by Mr. Sharp, Fishery Overseer, to the effect that the department had decided, on the recommendation of the Fishery Commission, not to issue seine licenses for the public waters of Lake Erie, owing to their destructive nature.

In the interests of the people in this vicinity, I would respectfully request you, as our representative to use your influence which we know is considerable and justly so, with the department in having the said regulations withdrawn. It has had an alarming effect on the whole people here, and has created a great deal of dissatisfaction. There cannot be found a man in this whole section who will attempt to defend the enforcement of such a regulation. It is looked upon by all classes in the community as an injustice, to the owners of seines, to the young men and labouring class, who are given employment in the fishing industry during the fishing season, and who in the event of its being enforced, would be compelled to go elsewhere to gain a livelihood; to the merchants, mechanics and others who have to a certain extent assisted in maintaining said labouring class and their families during the winter, expecting to be repaid out of the proceeds of their labour in the seine fishing industry.

In regard to the destructive nature of seine fishing the evidence of all parties here, who have any knowledge of it, is to the effect that it is not as destructive a method of fishing as pound-net fishing. And I contend that it is more in the interest of the section in which it is carried on than any other method of fishing, owing to the fact that the money derived from the industry is distributed among so many people and amongst a class who must put it into circulation to obtain the necessaries of life for themselves and their families.

Again, the aforementioned regulation is not in conformity with the avowed policy of the Conservative party, as enunciated by the Hon. Mr. Foster in his speech on the budget, particularly in his remarks regarding the duty on coal oil and binder twine. He contended, and rightly too, that it would be unjust to the men engaged in the oil industry and who had their capital invested in it, to remove the whole duty, and thus sacrifice their capital and render their plant valueless, but this regulation of the Fishery Department goes even further than that, it not only sacrifices the capital of the fishermen and renders their plant valueless, but it takes from them the crude material the fish, while the oil men would still have the crude oil left to them to pump and refine if they saw fit. It is also against the principles of the protective policy in this respect. The Government do not protect cotton for instance, the duty on imported cotton is for the protection of the men engaged in the manufacture of cotton, the cotton manufacturers and the mechanic employed by them, then why protect the fish and not the fishermen?

My own opinion, and I believe it is the opinion held by a large majority of the people in this section, irrespective of party, is that our fishery regulations are sufficiently stringent for the protection of the fish until such time as some international agreement can be arrived at between the United States and Canada, by which both countries adopt and enforce the same close seasons and the same methods of fishing in the public waters contiguous to both countries. Judging by the dissatisfaction created by the new fishery regulations, it looks to me like a combine in favour of the pound-net, to force the gill-net and seine fishermen out of the business and give them (the pound-net men) a monopoly of the fishing industry.

In conclusion, I am and always have been a strong supporter of, and firm believer in, the Conservative policy, and since my residence in the county of Norfolk I have used what ability and influence I have in your favour, and have never had any reason to regret doing so, and I would again respectfully ask you, on behalf of a large portion of your constituents, and in the interests of the Conservative party in this county, to use your influence with the Fishery Department in favour of the withdrawal of the aforesaid regulations. Trusting I have not trespassed too much on your valuable time by writing at such length,

I am, sir, &c.,

FRANK BROCK.

To Col. TISDALE, M.P.,
Ottawa.

P.S.—A largely signed petition will be forwarded to you by Thursday's mail for presentation to the Fishery Department.

F. B.

MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES,
OTTAWA, 11th April, 1893.

DEAR SIR,—Referring to your letter of the 23rd ultimo, inclosing a communication from Mr. Frank Brock, of St. Williams, respecting the seine fishery question, I beg to state that it is the opinion, not only of the department, but of all persons thoroughly acquainted with the different kinds of nets used in fishing, that the seine is the most injurious of all and has brought, about the present depletion of fish in the waters of Canada to a greater extent than any other mode of fishing.

Whilst seine fishing may be permitted during this year, the question of its total prohibition in 1894, or its restriction for use in such waters as to limit its destructive effects in the taking of certain of the better kinds of fish, and of the young and immature of all kinds, will receive careful consideration.

Yours truly,

JOHN COSTIGAN,
Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Lieut.-Col. TISDALE, M.P.,
Simcoe, Ont.

Then, on the 25th March, 1893, I inclosed the department a petition signed by a number of persons:

OTTAWA, 25th March, 1893.

Hon. JOHN COSTIGAN,
Acting Minister Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa.

DEAR SIR,—I inclose a petition herewith against abolishing seine fishing in my riding.

This was got up before they learned you had considered the matter upon my showing and kindly ordered the issue of such licenses as usual. I, however, forward you the petition for the information of the department and as some index of the feelings up there and of the reasons given for them.

It is signed by 598 people, all men of substance too.

I have no doubt it would have been even much more numerous signed, if I had not advised them of your action.

Yours, &c.,

D. TISDALE.

To the Honourable the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Canada:

The petition of the undersigned electors of the county of Norfolk hereby request that your department grant seine licenses for fishing in the public waters of Lake Erie.

Your petitioners having been informed that your department have decided on the recommendation of the Fishery Commission not to issue seine licenses for fishing in the public waters of Lake Erie, owing to their destructive nature, pray that you reconsider that decision and issue licenses as in former years. Not knowing the nature of the commissioners' report, your petitioners do not know what showing they make in regard to the destructive nature of seine fishing, but are firmly of the opinion that seines are not as destructive of fish-life as pound-nets that are recognized by the department and allowed to fish.

The fishermen of this county have about $6,000 invested in seines, boats and other appliances necessary to their occupation, and the seine fishing industry gives employment to about 150 men, who would be thrown out of employment if the above regulations were enforced and many of them compelled to go elsewhere, perhaps outside the country, to obtain a livelihood. The fishermen have also gone to considerable expense making preparations for the opening of the fishing season of 1893, buying new seines and repairing the old ones, and their whole outfit would be a total loss if the above regulation is enforced. Many of them have their total capital invested in their fishing outfit, and it would be a very serious pecuniary loss to them, besides taking from them their means of gaining a livelihood. The seines would be good for from three to five years' use, and admitting that the regulation is one that is necessary for the protection of fish-life (which we do not), your petitioners say that it is an injustice to those engaged in the industry to enforce it without giving at least two seasons' notice.

Your petitioners in conclusion respectfully request that the above regulations be not enforced, but be withdrawn until such time as an independent commission of persons not connected with the fishing industry be appointed to examine into and report thereon.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

County of Norfolk, March 22nd, 1893.

I have to add that they were misinformed about the Fishery Commissioners having made a report, but for that the Minister was not responsible. In January, 1894, I again addressed this letter to the Minister :

January 8th, 1894.

Sir CHARLES H. TUPPER,
Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Ottawa,

MY DEAR SIR CHARLES,—Some of the gill and seine fishermen of Sharp's division have given him the money some days since for their licenses and owing to the open weather could now be fishing. I wish you would have Sharp instructed that as far as the gill and seine men are concerned that he may on receipt of the fees of those who had licenses for the past year and whom he has nothing to report against, allow them to fish as soon as he gets the money, reporting such permission to you as given. It always takes several weeks to get the licenses back as they have to go through several hands, and be entered in several books in the department. When these small fishermen pay it is desirable they get leave to fish, as soon as the weather is fit.

Yours faithfully,

D. TISDALE.

I received this letter in reply :

MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES,
OTTAWA, 10th January, 1894.

MY DEAR TISDALE,—I have your letter of the 8th instant, respecting the wishes of some of the gill and seine fishermen of Sharp's division.

I should like very much to meet your wishes, and give the instruction which you desire, viz., to permit those men who fished last season to continue fishing on payment of the fees for their licenses to Sharp, but in view of the condition of the fisheries of Lake Erie, I hope you will not think me unreasonable if I prefer to adhere to the system that obtains elsewhere, namely, to allow no fishing until the license is delivered into the hands of the fisherman.

On the other hand, I shall see that every effort to expedite the consideration of the applications for licenses, and I think no unreasonable delay will take place.

I do not wish to conceal either that the respite during the consideration of the licenses is in itself of some benefit to the fisheries, and will not be an unusual experience to the fishermen.

The applications for seine licenses are being looked into.

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

D. TISDALE, Esq., M.P.,
Simcoe, Ont.

Then, on the 12th January, the Minister addressed me as follows :—

MY DEAR TISDALE,—Having further reference to my letter of 10th instant, I beg to state that, after due consideration and taking the advice of officers in my department competent to give an opinion on such matters; I have come to the conclusion that, owing to its injurious nature, especially in shallow creeks and marshy bays opening directly on Lake Erie, seine fishing should not be allowed in the Inner Bay of Long Point.

The local fishery officer has accordingly been advised, and the money sent by him on behalf of Mrs. Ferris and D. and F. Jackson returned.

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Col. D. TISDALE, M.P.
Simcoe, Ont.

The following circular was sent to the overseers. It was sent to me with a suggestion that I should offer any remarks I thought fit.

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE AND FISHERIES,
OTTAWA, 8th January, 1894.

SIR,—It has been suggested to this department that the use of seines, hoop-nets, fyke-nets and trap-nets might be allowed in the inner bays of Long Point and Turkey Point for the taking of coarse fish generally, without injury to the higher grades of fish frequenting these waters, provided always that such fishing be not allowed during the hot months, say, June, July and August.

In connection therewith I beg to ask you to please state your views on this subject, and to request you to answer separately each of the following questions :—

1. Do schools of very small lake herring, white-fish, &c., from two inches in length and upwards abound in the marshy shallows between Long Point and Turkey Point?
2. During what months are catfish, perch, pike and other coarse fish most abundant there?
3. Are pickerel plentiful there? During what months?
4. What fish would hoop-nets or fyke-nets, set in these waters, chiefly take?

I am, &c.,

Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Memo. on suggested use of seines, hoop- or fyke-nets, &c., in Inner Bay of Long Point—

Different points in Lake Erie vary so much that fishing privileges allowed in one place would be harmful in another.

The Inner Bay of Long Point and Secord's Bay within Turkey Point open widely to the lake, while there is also direct communication with the open water by a narrow channel, on the south side of the bay.

Such a bay is a natural resort for the fry of lake herring, whitefish, &c. (locally called minnows and confused with small worthless fish) and seining should be very limited, or wholly prohibited.

Open creeks of this kind are quite unlike canals or slow running rivers, such as the Grand River, which are not so accessible to fry.

I am averse to the use of seines in such places, in order to protect immature fish.

There is less danger in the use of hoop- or fyke-nets set near the bottom for the capture of catfish, mudpouts, suckers and inferior fish. The shoals of better fish, from my observations at Rondeau, frequent the surface as a rule and are less likely to enter fixed hoop-nets near the bottom. I had also evidence from Lake Erie fishermen that in June, July and August great shoals of herring fry come in shore and during those months fishing in shallow waters should be prohibited.

Perhaps the local officer of the department might furnish replies to the following questions:—

1. Do shoals of very small lake herring, whitefish, &c., from 2 inches in length and upwards, abound in the marshy shallows between Long Point and Turkey Point?

2. In what months are catfish, suckers, perch and other coarse fish most abundant there?

3. Are pickerel plentiful there? What months?

4. What fish would hoop- or fyke-nets, set in these waters, chiefly take?

E. PRINCE.

Jan. 2nd, 1894.

I replied as follows:—

SIMCOE, 16th January, 1894.

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER,
Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Ottawa.

MY DEAR SIR CHARLES,—I have yours of the 11th instant, inclosing your queries to Mr. Prince, his memo. and the circulars you sent to Kerr, Harris and Sharp and asking me for any points I might have to offer. I am obliged for the opportunity, as the Inner Bay is a locality I know well of my own knowledge and from frequent observation ever since I can remember. I may note that the actual license to the seines in the Inner Bay of Long Point cease April 15th, commencement of close season for pickerel, and do not again permit fishing until September. Mr. Prince has either not had information about the Inner Bay or has been misinformed. I rather infer from his memo. he has gathered his information from its appearance on the map, where it appears as he describes it. My actual knowledge of the place will make it appear quite different from a fishing standpoint. Many years ago the narrow channel he speaks of as a direct communication with the open waters on the south side of the bay, was in a different place and was much larger and was a channel through which, no doubt, fish passed, the bay was much deeper and the communication with the Outer Bay at the east end of the Inner Bay was altogether different from now. The Inner Bay at that time was, as I said, much deeper, and moreover the water was kept comparatively clear by the channel before mentioned and the communication as it then stood between the Inner and Outer Bay. Many years ago, over 32, probably 40 years ago, what was called the "cut" (the channel between the south side of the Inner Bay and the lake) filled up with sand and a new one opened where the present cut is. The present one was always insignificant compared to the old one and sand swept down through it at all times but especially in times of storms and winds which are frequent, not only gradually filling the "cut" but the bay also until now and for many years past the "cut" is merely a little passage that a skiff (except in times of storms) can hardly pass through and the bay has become so filled up and grown up on the bottom with weeds over a great part of its bottom, that it is a shoal place with muddy and rily water at all seasons. When storms come and raise this water through the cut it is so dirty, and the water off the shores in the lake is also both rily and rough, so that no fish can come through, nor do they use it from the smallness and nature of the water and its approaches when the elements are quiet. Since I have been in the House (1887) I had occasion to inquire into the matter carefully in connection with the fisheries. I got some spawn from the department one year and found as a result of my inquiries it would not do to deposit them in the Inner Bay. No herring or whitefish are caught there. Herring frequent the Outer Bay. However plentiful herring and whitefish ever become in the Outer Bay they would never frequent the waters of the Inner Bay, small or large, as the water is not of their sort. No shoals of herring or whitefish of any length for years and years have been seen in the Inner Bay. The coarse fish are there all the time. As for years fishing only has been allowed, say about 15 days in the spring, as it is about the 1st April before the seines can get in on account of the ice and they are stopped by their licenses until September, it is hard to say whether in the months other than the fall months these coarse fish would be more plentiful. The fishermen catch most during the time they are allowed to fish, between October 15th and November 20th, of coarse fish.

Pickerel are in the Inner Bay more or less the whole season. They spawn up in the marshes where neither seine, hoop- nor trap-net can disturb their spawn. In fact the only catch of pickerel which amounts to anything is made during the fifteen days in April before the close season when they are on the way to spawn.

On the north side of the Inner Bay, where there are nearly all the seine licenses, I don't think hoop- or fyke-nets could be set in more than two or three places as there are no creeks or currents to speak of. Trap nets might be used, but how far they would be successful as compared to seines I am not able to say.

On the Long Point side of the Inner Bay hoop-nets could be easily used, as also trap-nets—good places for both. In the Inner Bay, on the north side, there are no places for hoop-nets, nor none for trap either, except it might be at Turkey Point, which is practically part of the Inner Bay fishery. On the Long Point side in the Outer Bay all the way down to the Bluff there are some excellent places for hoop- and trap-nets both, these being outlets from marshes. In none of these places do, I think, herring ever run up, but I have not had opportunity either of a personal observation or to get it from the actual experience of others like I have with the Inner Bay.

So far as the Inner Bay is concerned I am very positive that, at all events for the season allowed by the present license system there that neither herring nor whitefish are or will be disturbed or in any manner injured or taken, and that as to pickerel their spawning grounds nor small fry are in no way nor will be in any way disturbed or injured by allowing hoop- or fyke- or trap-nets, and also seines to be used there. The great body of fish caught will be of a coarse nature and, in my opinion, better out of the water so far as the more valuable fish are concerned.

Yours faithfully,

D. TISDALE.

January 22nd, 1894.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER,
Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Ottawa.

Re Seines, Inner Bay, Long Point.

MY DEAR SIR CHARLES,—I wish to supplement my letter of the 16th inst. by some further statements in reference to the suggested abolishing of seine fishing in this bay. My letter was written before I was aware of the suggestion of abolishing seine fishing therein, and addressed more to the general question in the memo. of Mr. Prince, which you sent me in yours of 10th inst. I gave reasons pretty fully in my said letter of 16th inst., why I think seine fishing ought not to be prohibited in this bay. However, as that was not the question I was then considering, I did not call your attention to the fact that of the seines allowed in that locality, not all are in the Inner Bay. The total number of seines including those Mr. Harris, are as follows: 7 at Long Point by Mr. Harris, 7 above the "cut" outside of the Inner Bay, in Lake Erie, where there is no marshy shore or inlets, and 4 in the Outer Bay, near Turkey Point, or at Turkey Point, and 15 or 16 in the Inner Bay, on its north side.

In all these cases, the fishermen, except Harris, are small fishermen, who have by great efforts and economy got together their little outfit. They have in each case, cleared the ground where they drag or draw their nets at a cost of at least $200 each. Their outlay in boat, seines, &c., will gross in all $5,000 to $8,000. About 100 to 130 men are required to work these seines, all local and all needing this employment. If any good reasons can be given to show, notwithstanding what I say in my letter (which I cannot conceive) why seines should be abolished even in the Inner Bay, then, certainly, trap-nets as well as hoop- or fyke-nets should be allowed as the small fish or minnows would not be injured by the trap-net—the trap-net can also be used where the hoop or fyke would not work. Again, in consideration of the long existence of the seine fishing, the seine men in such a district as this should be allowed a certain time to change so as to get the benefit of wearing out their present appliances, say, one or two years, as investigation should show would be fair. Turning these poor men adrift in poverty suddenly would be cruel and is not necessitated to prevent any such destruction of fish, if any, as they may cause.

I have still to reiterate my previous opinion and statement that in the Inner Bay with fishing allowed only to April 15th, in spring, and after 1st September no valuable fish will suffer, and that even if herring are amongst the minnows in the bay, they will not suffer as they certainly will not appear in this bay before April 15th and will depart before the fishermen fish to any extent in the fall, which is generally not until after 1st October. Herring large enough to be distinguished as such certainly do not appear in the Inner Bay at all, and I do not believe, from the nature of the water there, that they ever appear amongst the minnows where the seines are drawn and they certainly do not spawn there.

In no case or event can I see that where seine fishing is allowed outside of the Inner Bay can it do any harm, as they are neither spawning grounds or places frequented by immature fish.

Yours faithfully,

D. TISDALE.

SIMCOE, Jan. 25th, 1894.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER,
Minister Marine and Fisheries, Ottawa.

MY DEAR SIR CHARLES,—I duly received yours of the 23rd with copy of mine of the 22nd, for which I am obliged.

Thanks for your promise to consider the seine matter and to let me have a reply as early as possible. I hope you will be able to let me have decision without delay as it is now getting to be about as late as fishermen can wait to put up ice, etc.

I would suggest that I show a case at all events where but little, if any, damage (in any case or in any view) can be done by leaving the seines for this year. Then while at the session I can have full opportunity to go into details with Mr. Prince and arrange for him to come up in the summer and go over the ground personally and come to a definite conclusion as to whether the seine must go, and if so, what shall succeed them and to what extent. I would like him also to meet the fishermen if he has time. At all events I will see he is taken all over the ground in such a way as to give him fullest opportunity of personal observation. The fishermen could then be informed in the early autumn as to what would be allowed next year. The report of the commission would be out and things take on a definite shape.

I had a very interesting and instructive interview with Mr. Prince, the opportunity for which I have to thank you.

Yours faithfully,

D. TISDALE.

MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES,
OTTAWA, January 30th, 1894.

D. TISDALE, Esq., M.P.,
Simcoe, Ont.

MY DEAR MR. TISDALE,—Recent correspondence on the subject of seine licenses in Long Point Bay has indicated to you that there are grave reasons for prohibiting the use of seines in shallow waters opening into the great lakes.

The seine is peculiarly destructive, and to its use must be largely attributed the existing depletion.

Further, the disturbance and injury to the shoals of immature fish and newly hatched fry in shallows where the seine is used, has had the most disastrous effects. It would appear useless to hatch and plant fry to supplement the natural supply of young if in resorting to shallow water in spring they are thus destroyed.

There is every reason to look upon Long Point Bay as such a resort, though I am aware that the main spawning grounds of the whitefish and lake herring are further west.

Taking into consideration the special circumstances of Long Point Bay, I have decided that this prohibition of seining which I shall feel bound to enforce next season, shall not come into force during the present season.

The commissioners' reports on the lake fisheries will shortly be issued, and will contain further evidence upon this matter, and the postponement of the prohibition will afford ample warning to the seine fishermen that I shall not feel justified in causing seine licenses to be issued next season.

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Now, I propose discussing some of the points raised by this correspondence, and quoting very shortly some statistics for the information of the Minister and the House. So far as I am concerned—and I wish the hon. Minister to understand that—I propose to discuss now the part of Lake Erie which I know something about, and in reference to which I am able to obtain statistics. I will make use of the hon. Minister's statistics and the statistics of the United States; and I propose to refer to the east half of Lake Erie, that is, from the line of the county of Elgin to Fort Erie. Since I have had the honour of representing a district, I have not asked the Minister to extend the number of nets, but I have insisted on his allowing the existing number to remain; and the only extension I have asked has been that he should, as he kindly did, open the fishery on Long Point Island, which opened forty or fifty miles of new coast. I wish further to say to him, in reference to my fishermen, and the fishermen generally on the east half of Lake Erie, that they are reasonable and honest fishermen; and I think he will agree with that, because he will remember that in 1892, as mentioned in one of these letters, I spoke of a delegation from the whole length of the lake, whom I had the pleasure of meeting. Delegates from the western end of the lake proposed to co-operate with those from the eastern half; but we separated for this reason. Neither my fishermen nor myself were willing to ask the Minister to abolish all regulations whatever, while the fishermen of the west end wanted that done; and whatever representations they made to the Minister they made as a separate body, and we from the eastern end, to that extent, have acted separately since. What we wish and what we are willing to take is not an unreasonable amount of fishing; but we claim that the number of the nets in our district ought not to be reduced; and I propose to quote some statistics which I think, from my standpoint, it will be difficult to show do not make out a case, to that extent, at all events. Now, as to the whole of Lake Erie:

The total number of men in 1889 employed in the fishing industry in Lake Erie was, on the Canadian side, 465; on the American side, 2,181. The value of appliances on the Canadian side was $116,000; and on the American side, $851,000. In 1893, the value of the Canadian appliances had only increased to $166,000. I have not the increase of the Americans, but I am sure they more than doubled. The quantity of fish caught in 1889 on the American side was 63,000,000 pounds as compared with 9,000,000 on the Canadian side; the value, according to the report, was $487,000 on the Canadian side, and $1,000,000 on the American side. Now, that is obviously not correct, because the fish was just as valuable on the American side, and if the Americans caught seven times as much fish as we did, they must have caught about $3,500,000 worth. There is another reason why I think we should not stop the herring fishing in November. In 1885 there was caught, on the Canadian side, 7,600,000 pounds; in 1889, 9,600,000 pounds; and in 1893, 9,700,000 pounds. So that if you take the whole of the lake, there is only a difference of 2,000,000 pounds from 1885 to 1893. To summarize these statistics shortly, because that is the only way to get a brief view, I will read the following statement:—

Now, if you take the opposite shore, because that is the object of these statistics, what do you find? Take from Buffalo to Unionville, which is opposite the west end of the district I have taken on our side of the lake, and includes fourteen cities and large towns, the American official statistics—the last I have—for 1885. We had 244 men fishing, as against their 2,004. We had eight tugs and they had twenty-six. We had ninety-one boats, and they had 324. We had thirty-one pound-nets, and they had forty-five. We had 18,126 fathoms of gill-nets, and they had about 2,000,000 fathoms, or 2,000 miles. We caught 1,264,702 pounds of fish, as against 19,000,000 pounds of fish caught by them. Or a value of fish caught by us of $61,322, as against $599,830 value caught by them. This was in 1885, and I am comparing their catch in 1885 with what we caught in 1893. Under those circumstances, taking that district, there is no case made out at all for a reduction of the nets. I am speaking for my own district, and each district ought to stand or fall upon its own position. In 1893, all the statistics I could get on the other side were those of the city of Erie. What do we find? The city of Erie had in 1893 $300,000 capital invested, or more than double our whole lake, while the east half of Lake Erie on our side had only $38,500 of capital invested. The city of Erie caught 12,000,000 pounds of fish, or 3,000,000 more than we did in the whole lake, and on the east half of the lake we caught only 1,400,000 pounds. The city of Erie had thirty-four tugs, 100 pound and trap-nets, over 200,000 fathoms of gill-nets. While, on the whole of our east half of the lake, we had only ten tugs, thirty-five pound and trap-nets, and 19,000 fathoms of gill-nets. Let me also call attention to another thing which still exists there, though I am glad to say the hon. Minister has largely reduced it. The Americans fish there with scores of tugs and miles of nets, with which they follow the fish. I have caught them in Lake Erie, when I first started the agitation; and the fishermen of Lake Erie, whatever other fault they may have to find with the hon. Minister, I give him credit for what he has done in the way of putting cruisers in those lakes. Those American tugs take their nets on board, put them down one day, and the next day take them up and put down others. I have caught several tugs myself at this work. I went out because there was a question raised by the fishery officers, and took the trouble, with some of our fishermen, to keep watch, and satisfied myself that the Americans were fishing inside our waters. They follow the fish from one end of the lake to the other.

Mr. DICKEY. What date was that?

Mr. TISDALE. Last year, about August. I made a special trip to Ottawa about it. In spite of the American fishing in the district I represent—or, say the east half of Lake Erie—we are catching as many fish as in 1888. But since 1888 there has been no extension of fishing privileges. Since 1888 we have not asked or urged the Minister to make any extension. But we want permission to keep up the nets we have. And if the statistics, as I claim they do, show that, in spite of the American fishing the quantity caught has not decreased on our side, then, if he will, as he has kindly done, stop this fishing by the Americans, I hope the day will come when there will be a marked increase of the fish, for the Americans have been taking fish persistently in large quantities in our waters with their miles and miles of nets. I am not discussing the general policy of fish preservation. I am speaking only of the state of affairs in my own district. While it may be true—and the Minister should know the facts better than I—that the fisheries in Lake Erie as a whole are being depleted, in my district, I am confident, it is not so. I feel very strongly that he ought to allow us to continue to carry on fishing to the extent we have heretofore done. I have never asked for an extension, except in one new fishery, which gave a new and additional coast of forty or fifty miles. Now, with regard to the cruisers, I want to read one letter I have received from a fisherman, and, in connection with this, to say that as soon as the Minister was satisfied that these Americans were committing the depredations that have been claimed, he took prompt and energetic action to stop the practice by sending a cruiser last fall, and, this year, two cruisers. And this letter shows the result:

Those Erie fishermen to my own knowledge have for years fished Lake Erie from 20 miles east of the east end of Long Point, to 30 miles westward of the west end of Long Point Island, regardless of the national boundary line. They were, and are, the smartest of gill-netters and wherever fish swam they would follow. The gunboat scare has frightened them this season up to date, and I am informed that fully half of the gill-net fleet at Erie is laid up: The 'Petrel' is off somewhere now; I did not ask Captain Dunn where he was bound for. The 'Dolphin' is here smartened up with a very efficient police boat, ample, I think, to protect this coast. The captain is a good one and knows his business and these waters, without asking questions of any one.

I think that we ought not to be so closely restricted, because so much has been gained by keeping out the Americans, whose work was formerly so detrimental to our fishing. With regard to the pound-net fishing, in November, I think it makes very little matter, for this is a different class of fishing and a different capacity of fishing from the gill-nets and seine-nets. Still, I think seine and gill-nets should not be prohibited in November. With us the ice never goes out until the first of April. In July and August, and a large part of June as well, it is too hot for gill-nets. What is the consequence? The gill-net fishermen have a short period of say a month in the spring. They recommence in September. As the water cools in September and October the fishing improves, but the season is cut short by the prohibition of this class of fishing in November. I am not speaking of gill-netting in the sense ordinarily understood—with tugs—but in the limited way in which we carry it on there. And there is no salmon-trout or whitefish where the gill-nets and seines are fished in my district, while there is nothing to show that there is any lessening of the quantity of herring caught in my district, even with the immense operations heretofore carried on by the Americans. The season for seines ends about the 20th of November, and for gill-nets, about the 1st of December. The coarse fish do not spawn in the fall, and, as the whitefish and salmon-trout do not run on the same fishing grounds, there is no reason why we should not be allowed to use seines, but, on the contrary, many reasons in favour of it. I have here a petition which I desire to read, as well as the letter accompanying it. This is the letter :

ST. WILLIAMS, ONT., 28th May, 1894.

Col. D. TISDALE,
Ottawa, Ont.

DEAR SIR,—I send you to-day by mail the petition for presentation to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The general feeling is against sending a deputation to present it, and in favour of your presenting it to the Minister and bringing on a discussion on the question on the floor of the House. Therefore in accordance with the wishes of the people, I send you the petition and request that you give it your best attention on the lines indicated. There are 368 names on the petition, including a large proportion of the best men in our party in the riding, also many prominent men in the opposite party.

It seems to me that the idea should be impressed strongly on the Minister's mind, that it is not a question that affects only the fisherman, but that the whole community is affected and some of us to a larger extent perhaps than any one fisherman. The same argument and the same policy applies here that was held by Mr. McNeill in his speech a short time ago on the duties on cottons, viz., that it was not alone the men who found employment within the walls of the cotton mills who were benefited by it, but the whole people in the locality where the cotton mills are in operation. The Minister will no doubt admit that Mr. McNeill's argument on that point was sound, and the same argument should apply to this matter, and would be equally sound.

Trusting you to do the best you can for us in this matter.

I am, yours respectfully,

FRANK BROCK.

The petition reads as follows:—

To the Honourable the Minister of Marine and Fisheries:—

The undersigned petitioners, electors of the county of Norfolk, understand it is the intention of your department not to issue seine licenses for fishing in the public waters of Long Point Inner Bay, after the present season. We believe seine fishing in the Inner Bay is not a destructive method of fishing. It can be carried on by men with small capital. It employs more men for the quantity of fish caught, than any other method of fishing. Practically, the whole money earned by the seine fishermen, is put into immediate circulation in the neighbourhood, thus stimulating all other occupations; while with the larger operations of pound-net and gill-net fishing, comparatively few men are engaged to catch the same quantity of fish, and the bulk of the proceeds is deposited in the banks to the credit of the net owners. The fish caught in the summer are of the rough class, such as the catfish, sheepheads, &c. There are no whitefish or salmon-trout or herring caught in the bay.

We also believe that men should be appointed as overseers, in whose judgment and business capacity the public, as well as the department, has confidence; and that printed or written notice of all changes in the regulations, should be sent to each license holder. An instance of the unsuitableness of the present method may be found in the recent cases against Clark and Secord for fishing before their licenses arrived. These men declared on oath they had no intention of violating the regulations, and were not aware of having done so, until their nets were seized. In the face of these facts their licenses were cancelled and their nets destroyed. And we believe, all circumstances considered, that the punishment inflicted was unnecessarily severe, and that they have been unjustly dealt with by the Fishery Department. This seemingly wanton destruction of valuable property has given the public just grounds for the dissatisfaction which exists. Therefore the petition of your petitioners humbly prayeth :

1st. That your department continue to issue licenses for seine fishing in the public waters of Long Point Inner Bay.

2nd. That seine fishing be allowed at all times, except during the present close season for pickerel.

3rd. That the local overseer be empowered, on receipt of payment for licenses, to grant applicants permits to fish until their licenses are received from the department.

4. That the law which provides that nets, &c., be burned for violations of the regulations, be so amended, as to make first and second offences punishable by fines, third offence punishable by cancellation of license.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

County of Norfolk, April 24, 1894.

Now, with regard to the petition, I have only one or two remarks to make. I agree entirely with the first clause as to seine fishing in the Inner Bay, as expressed in the petition, which gives many reasons on the subject. But there are other reasons which I should like to state. In the first place, the seines have been there from time immemorial and the catch has not decreased. Further, no herring or whitefish can be caught there. The water is not suitable for them, and they could not live there. I believe that the more coarse fish caught the better for the increase of the finer fish, for these coarse fish are of a predatory nature, and I believe that one of the reasons why, in some parts, the finer fish are becoming scarce is that too many of the coarse fish are allowed to go uncaught. There is no destruction of valuable fish there or of spawn in any shape, and the industry by seines employs more men and is more beneficial to the locality. I believe there are places where seine fishing ought to be prohibited, I am not saying where they are; but I do say that this locality, this particular bay, is not one of them, the facts, when the Minister investigates them, will, I believe, compel him to arrive at the same conclusion. I trust, therefore, that this summer he will, as he has partly consented to do already, send one of his officers there to examine into the matter, and that he will remove this restriction. There is no other way that this bay can properly be fished. Neither hoop-nets, pound-nets, nor trap-nets can be used there, and the coarse fish breed in thousands, and are destructive to the finer fish passing out into the clear waters where the better class of fish exist, and they destroy them by thousands. In regard to the period of fishing which the petition mentions, I urge upon the Minister that he should allow the season to be extended in the bay, as requested in the petition. The reasons that formerly existed when restriction was enforced as to summer fishing, no longer exist, because the advent of a railway enables the fish to be marketed daily when packed in ice, which could not be done at the time the regulation prohibiting summer fishing was made. Of course in regard to the other matters mentioned in the petition, they are largely departmental, but I hope the Minister will consider them carefully, and, I trust, favourably. At all events, give the overseers greater power to issue permits to fishermen upon receiving payment for licenses. I suppose the House will be glad to know that with these brief remarks, and with these short letters, I am through. I thank the House for its kind attention. I have made my remarks briefer than I would have done under other circumstances, but I consider this matter one of the first importance to my district, and I think one of the first duties of a member of Parliament is to his constituents, and while not unduly taking up the time of the House, not to neglect the opportunity of advocating their interests in this House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I dare say that while the House may have felt some impatience in that the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) has thought it necessary to occupy so much time, there may be a little fear that, as this is a question upon which I have already spoken briefly for three or four hours this session, I may find it necessary to follow the hon. gentleman through all his interesting remarks. I hope, however, that without any offence to him, I may be able to cut short what I desire to say respecting the points he has mentioned, because many of them, if he will allow me to say so, have been anticipated and dealt with by me on the occasion to which I have referred. The hon. gentleman is not one of those who are opposed to the fishery regulations, and I am glad to be able to say that in many respects he has assisted me in performing the difficult duty that I have been called upon to discharge, because it is a difficult duty to administer regulations none of which are popular in any part of the country, and the enforcement of which causes strained relations between the department and the fishermen. Nevertheless, I have never shirked the responsibility that has been for the time being put upon my shoulders, and it is very gratifying to find any hon. gentlemen who are able, owing to the condition of public opinion in their constituencies, to come to the rescue of the department, as we have in this respect but few friends. I do not think the position the hon. gentleman takes is altogether consistent. A great part of the argument he has used tends to destroy and upset these very regulations and restrictions which he favours. For instance, he has compared the United States waters and the Canadian waters in the same lake, with the express purpose of showing that in the United States waters where no restrictions obtain, an enormous and ever-increasing catch of fish is made, while in the neighbouring Canadian waters the catch remains stationary, or at any rate, out of all proportion to that of the neighbouring district. Now, I carefully observed the years that he took for comparison, and if I took down his remarks correctly, the hon. gentleman compared the year 1885 of the United States catch with the year 1893 of the Canadian catch. I think that I can show that the very fact that the hon. gentleman was not able to make a comparison of the same waters for the year 1893, destroys entirely that part of his case.

Mr. TISDALE. I could not get the figures.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is just as well he could not get them, because he could not have used them in support of his argument, because in another part of his speech he was forced to state that this year a condition of absolute ruin stares the United States fishermen of Lake Erie in the face. He knows that the men who are making money in the fisheries of Lake Erie to-day are Canadian fishermen.

Mr. TISDALE. I think the hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that the United States fisheries are being depleted; but I was showing that, notwithstanding what they were doing on the other side of the lake and the enormous fishing in our waters, so far as my district is concerned, we still hold our own with no more appliances. My argument was that you should not unduly restrict me in my district when I can show that we are catching as many fish.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I understood the hon. gentleman's argument, but it was based upon a proposition that, if correct, would carry him to any length in his attack upon the fishery regulations. He did not bring out the fact as strongly as I propose to bring it out, that a comparison of the statistics for 1893 on both sides of the lake, would show that the United States, by not enforcing restrictions and not regulating their fisheries, find themselves face to face with the disappearance and ruin of those fisheries: while on the Canadian side we have the hon. gentleman as a witness that the fisheries are in a splendid condition, a condition that enables the fishermen in his opinion to prosecute them at a time when the fish are breeding, which is an extraordinary thing. The hon. gentleman cannot bring any scientific authority, or any fishery authority in this country or in any other country, that will support his position. The hon. gentleman refers to the prolific herring fisheries which he uses as the semblance of an argument. But we know from the experience of the fishermen in those very waters, that while at one time whitefish was the staple fishery, this fishery is now almost a thing of the past; the whitefish has gone down, and at present herring is the staple fishery. If the fishermen heretofore had been allowed to follow herring as they followed whitefish, all the information I can get convinces me that the same result would have followed the herring fishery, and that we would witness the same results on the Canadian side of the lake as we now witness on the United States side. Therefore, I must say that so far as I am advised, after carefully looking into the subject, it is absolutely necessary to protect this fish during the month of November. I hope the hon. gentleman will consider that in taking that course we will not work much ruin to the fishermen. I have evidence before me, supplied by my officers, to show that it is the most hazardous fishing that the gill-net men can go into during the month of November. I have evidence from our own officers and from the fishermen themselves of the enormous loss they incurred in that month. It is a month that is terrific on the lakes, the weather is boisterous, nets are carried away, and often the loss is far greater than the gain which the fishermen hope to obtain. So that to some extent I hope this will make the regulation more easy to bear; but that regulation I very much desire to see enforced and maintained. The hon. gentleman referred to the interesting subject of the Inner Bay fisheries, and there is no doubt he has raised in that regard a very important question. The peculiar position of the bay, the exceptional condition of the water, its depth, the connection with the lake, and so on, combined to make such a case as in the opinion of the Commissioner of Fisheries would render it unwise and unjustifiable to interfere, an opinion in which I concurred, until there had been made a complete examination, and for that examination arrangements are now being made, and we shall have the very valuable aid and assistance of the hon. gentleman who has taken so much interest in the question. On the one and great point as to the result of what is going on, I cannot do better than refer to a subject on which the hon. gentleman has touched, the enormous depredations on the part of the United States fishermen in the Canadian waters of Lake Erie. It was not possible for us to know the extent of those depredations at the time when the subject came up. We had some overseers, who were not, however, watching the fisheries any great distance from the shore, and consequently were without information. We had no information from the Customs authorities; they were not equipped on those waters with launches or tugs, and, therefore, did not know the number of vessels that were in the habit of either coming into our waters and fishing contrary to law or occasionally putting out nets and fishing in Canadian waters contrary to law. The irregular service which was conducted last year has proved a great success. The officers detected parties in the act of fishing, and they made a seizure of a fishing sloop; and again I point out to the hon. gentleman that when these men run the risk of seizure of their nets and appliances, and even their vessel, it is good testimony as to the condition of the fishing on the other side of the line. I can furnish the hon. gentleman with further information that so desperate has the position of the fishermen become, that this year, instead of poaching in our waters contrary to law, they are coming over in boats and stealing the fish out of our nets, laying off during the day on the American side and at night visiting our waters for this unlawful purpose. I have received a despatch from an officer on our side respecting the patrol boats. He reports that fishing this year on our side is good, and that our fishermen are obtaining better prices than last year, a result which they attribute to the protection which is being afforded the fisheries by keeping out the fishermen of the United States. The officer gives facts to sustain his opinion. I hold in my hand an interesting article which appeared in the 'American Field' respecting the very important point to which reference has been made. It is as follows:—

The Sandusky Fish Company which consists of all the firms in Sandusky, Ohio and vicinity, has decided to remove its entire stock, and business to the Lake of the Woods, on the boundary between the United States and Canada. (In Manitoba and Ontario.) Nine carloads of nets, a tug, etc., etc., were shipped to Duluth, April 13th, en route to the point stated. On this lake it is stated that whitefish and sturgeon exist in great quantities. This company expects to catch sufficient to meet the demands of trade and when the vigorous northern winter sets in, the company will come back to Lake Erie, and go to work. It is stated that numerous companies along the north coast of Lake Erie will soon follow. Lake Erie supplies nearly all the Northern United States with fresh water fishes, but excessive netting for several years back, has almost ruined the business. Comment is unnecessary. But we doubt whether the authorities in Manitoba, Ontario and Minnesota will allow the methods that have exhausted the formerly prolific waters of Lake Erie, to be employed now to deplete the Lake of the Woods of its most delicious whitefish.

Again, I have a letter from a fisherman as follows:—

The gun boat activity on this Lake and elsewhere has already created a fishery panic on the other side. Four States front on Lake Erie and are directly affected. Half of the fleet at Erie City, I am told is laid up. Detroit has sent begging letters to this—my—fishery for Lake Erie herrings, the first time in history. They can no longer follow the herring into our waters.

This shows not only that the warning which the hon. gentleman gave us was necessary, but that it has been heeded, and this communication shows also the condition to which unlimited fishing and a weak Legislature in that respect has brought the fishermen on the United States side. If hon. members of this House were to make the department over which I now preside the subject and object of continuous attack, it might, I am free to admit, be quite fair for a Government to interfere with that department and the policy that it was carrying out on these grounds—high grounds, too, on scientific grounds—if the people, through their representatives, did not desire such measures to be taken, but were prepared to do as had been done in other countries to which I have referred—bow to the public will and let fishing go. Until that time is reached, and I hope it never will be reached in this Legislature, I do not propose to abandon the present fishery regulations, or to obstinately maintain my views on this matter, but I propose to support the officers in the measures adopted as the result of their experience, and I propose to carry out the suggestions which they make and which commend themselves to one who, like myself, endeavours to judge fairly between the fishermen and my advisers. I think that will be in the interests of the country; I think that will be in the interests of the fishermen themselves, and I am glad to know that in some districts that opinion is gaining strength and taking root. Take the fisheries of Lake Erie. Some hon. members from Essex and elsewhere have advocated the abolition of all regulations; they have brought this subject up, and I may say that I sounded the opinions of the fishermen of Lake Erie last fall, and I found that there voice was strongly against that position; they wanted some regulations, and the department only differed with the majority of the fishermen on the Canadian side of the lake as to what those regulations should be, and as to how far they should go, but that there should be regulations the general opinion seemed to establish. In regard to this subject it is pleasant to obtain the advice of hon. gentlemen, whether on this side of the House or the other side, and all I shall endeavour to do is to decide as impartially as possible as to what is for the benefit of the fishermen and the fisheries, and having reached a conclusion stand by it and take the responsibility of standing by it. As to the petition of the fishermen, it is, of course,

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

entitled to the most attentive and respectful consideration that can be given to it; but on looking into the subject of it I have no hesitation in saying that while we can in some parts meet the views of the fishermen, it will be impossible to meet them in the whole. In respect to the Inner Bay, the inquiry to which I have referred will meet their reasonable wishes in that regard. Take the case of Messrs. Secord and Clarke, which the petition refer as one of undue severity. We could not look at that case, as those interested parties did. They made the excuse that is always made by those who violate fishery regulations, and that is—ignorance. They said they were not aware of the regulations requiring them to obtain a license before fishing. That regulation has been a matter of such notoriety among fishermen, and there have been so many prosecutions and such inspection by our officers, that if we were to accept an excuse of that kind there is no case in which, in my opinion, we could make a healthy example or exact any penalties under the Fisheries Act. Unfortunately sometimes we may err, but on the whole, I think, it is better that we should follow the rule I am following, and that is: that in a district in which the fisheries are in a precarious condition and require great care, we should enforce the regulations with the greatest severity, and in any case of violation err, rather on the side of severity, so that men may fear to violate the law. I think that where the law comes down with a heavy hand in a case of that kind, it will become known and respected. With reference to the construction of these nets there is this to be said. They were not only nets seized for being used contrary to law, but they were nets that we would not license in any event so that the loss of them was not so great as at first blush might appear. There is another thing of importance which the fishermen bring up; it is in reference to the delay that follows between the application for the licenses, and the actual granting of them. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale) put the case with great force to-day: that the rule is hard, that the licenses must be in the hands of the fishermen before they can fish, and that they are obliged to wait and see the fishing season opened and abstain from fishing until they receive the license. I have dealt with that subject, and instructions have been issued which I think will meet the case. For instance, in future where there is no charge against the licensee in the previous season the local overseer may have authority to renew that license where there are no special instructions to the contrary. They are only to forward the application for new licenses, and they are to be forwarded as quickly as possible after receipt and with a full statement of the facts so that immediate action can follow. They are also instructed not to collect the fee until the license is delivered. In that way I think the object of these fishermen whose petition is now in my hands will be largely met. I need not take up the time of the House just now in dealing with the other questions, but I beg to inform the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale) that his statements will have the very best consideration that can be given them.

PAYMENT OF CAÑAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. BERGERON. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals to a matter which I think he will regret the occurrence of when he hears about it. The employees on the canals have been complaining that last year—and I believe the matter is getting worse—they were paid their wages about a month later than they used to be formerly. They are all poor people and every one of us can understand what an inconvenience that is to them. I have already spoken to some of the officers of the department about the matter, but I think that the Minister is not fully aware of the causes of this delay. It seems that since some new regulations have been put in practice, the accounts and vouchers which have been sent by the different engineers to the department are examined, and if any item is not found correct according to the idea of the Auditor General, the whole account is sent back to the engineers, and this, of course, entails delay. I wish to call the special attention of the Minister to this, because I know it is not his intention to put the canal employees to loss and inconvenience. At all events it is the same thing for the Government to pay these men in proper time as to defer payment later on. I do not see any reason why the men should not be paid when their wages are due them. I presume that these other accounts which may be sent back for the Auditor General are accounts for merchants, and although they may want their money in due time, yet they are in a better position to wait for it than the employees are. Coming from my county the other day, I met the paymaster on the 3rd of July, and he was then paying the men for the month of May. That is entirely too long to defer payment, and I am sure that the Minister will endeavour to have the regulations changed so that these employees will be paid in proper time.

Mr. GIBSON. I also received a complaint of a similar nature, but not so grave as the one mentioned by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron). Instead of the pay day being as heretofore on the 15th of each month, it was delayed in some cases to the 20th and 26th of the month. Any one engaged in public works knows that if you have not a regular pay day on which the men are paid, that the creditors come down on the men and cause them considerable trouble. The result of this delay is that sometimes these men, in order to meet their indebtedness, are obliged to sell their time at a sacrifice. I always paid my men on the 15th of the month, and speaking from fifteen years experience, I can say that in all that time, I was only once obliged to pay on the 16th, and that was when the 15th of the month happened to be on Sunday. This is a matter of great moment to the working classes. The Government should have a regular pay day for employees on canals and railways, just the same as private individuals have. I am quite sure, when the attention of the Minister is called to the fact that men are sometimes obliged to sell their pay at a large sacrifice, he will see that the employees are regularly paid on a fixed date and thus avoid the trouble.

Mr. HAGGART. The matter has been brought to my attention before this, and from inquiry in my department I find that the pay rolls come up about the 5th of each month. They are never kept in my department longer than two days, and on the 7th they are generally sent to the Auditor General's Department. In that department there is an inquiry into the whole of the accounts, and if there is an objection to a single one of them, the whole of the pay rolls are returned to the department with a request that they be separated, and that those to which there is no objection may be requisitioned, and the others sent down to be corrected. That sometimes takes five or six days. There is no delay in my department, because the accounts are at once paid when we get authority to do so from the Auditor General. As to paying the men on the canals in cash, we tried that for a number of years, but it was liable to abuse and had to be stopped. Sometimes they never got their pay at all, sometimes the names of persons appeared on the rolls that should not have appeared on them, and we decided that all payments should be made by cheques, which is just as good and efficient as paying by money. We send the cheques to the individuals, and they can be cashed anywhere at their face value. That is the system that has been adopted. There has been no delay in the department. The delay arises, if anywhere, from the system of auditing.

Mr. GIBSON. I am glad to know that the fault does not lie in the department, because the hon. Minister knows the necessity of having the men paid promptly. But it seems to me that some change should be made, so that the men may receive their cheques or the money owing them on the 15th day of the month, if that is the Government pay-day. As there are fifteen days' pay in the hands of the Government, any errors made could be adjusted before the next pay-day. Then the men would be enabled to pay their accounts in turn, and not be left at the begging call of those to whom they owe money; because I know from past experience that on pay-day, on the line of a canal or a railway or other public work, every merchant who serves the men with goods is at the pay office ready to get what is owing to him, which is of course very proper. But when a pay-day is supposed to be at a certain time, and it is departed from for five or ten days, it is unfair to the men. The parties to whom they owe money become uneasy after pay-day is passed, and oblige the men to give them security in some other way; so that in the long run the men suffer. For the credit of the Dominion, I think the men should receive their pay on pay-day.

Mr. BERGERON. The Minister is perfectly correct, and I hope he will put into practice what he has said. The lists are sent to Ottawa, on the second or third day of the month, and they are sent to the Auditor General's office; but where do they go in the meantime, since the money is only sent a month after? That is the missing link to be found, and I call on the Minister to find it. The Minister says the men are paid in cheques. I am afraid he is not correct in that, because the paymaster pays them in money placed in envelopes. Far from being opposed to that, I think the department should be congratulated upon it, because there are not banks everywhere, and it is much handier for the men to get their pay in money than in cheques. Since the time of the last paymaster there has been no complaint. If the men are paid by cheque they have to send some one perhaps fifteen miles to get their money. But the principal point is that the men should be paid promptly on the 15th of the month.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman is right in reference to the Beauharnois Canal; the men there at present are paid in money by the paymaster. But on nearly all the other works the men are paid by cheques.

CATTLE TRANSIT THROUGH CANADA.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, before the motion that you leave the Chair is submitted to the House, I desire to bring to its attention a matter of very great public importance, but for which I would not at this late period of the session intrude upon the time of the House. The question to which I wish to invite the attention of the House is the position of the Canadian cattle trade with England by reason of the Imperial Government having scheduled Canada, as it did in the month of November, 1892. I propose to trace as briefly as the circumstances will allow the history of that scheduling, and to see whether it is reasonable to place the responsibility upon any persons, and, if so, upon whom. Now, Sir, allow me to say, for the information of any hon. gentleman who may not be familiar with the facts, that in the year 1878, I think it was, Great Britain scheduled the United States. Of course, all hon. gentlemen understand the details of the Act of the Imperial Parliament under which this scheduling takes place. It is commonly known as the Contagious Diseases Act, and it provides that the Imperial Government, if satisfied that cattle are sought to be imported into England which are either themselves suffering from disease, or which come from a country that is suspected or has actually disease in it, may schedule such country, which means that the cattle must either be slaughtered before embarkation or at the point of landing. The scheduling of cattle is, therefore, a most serious thing for the cattle trade, inasmuch as it prevents the cattle being kept alive until they are required for consumption, and their value is depreciated, from 1 to 2 cents a pound, or an average of about a penny a pound. The scheduling of United States cattle in 1878 took place because of the prevalence of pleuro-pneumonia in the United States. In the following year the Canadian Government desired that the Canadian railways might be permitted to carry American cattle from an American point through Canada to an American point again, without prejudice to Canada's position in England. It was manifest to the Government here, I presume, that, with the United States scheduled, it would be perilous to our position to permit the transit of American cattle through our country without that traffic being under regulations entirely satisfactory to the Imperial Government. In that view, and a wise one it was, the Canadian Government put themselves in communication with the Imperial authorities to see if it would be possible to arrive at a basis whereby the railways of Canada would be allowed to carry American cattle through Canada, and leave Canada still free from scheduling under the Act in question. At this time the present hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) was in England. I am not aware, nor is it material to determine, whether he went to England for the purpose of dealing with this question, or was there fortunately at the time. At any rate, he happened to be in Great Britain, and he put himself in communication with the Imperial authorities. He first presented a memorandum to them, setting forth such regulations as might be adopted, and as he hoped would be regarded as entirely satisfactory, to prevent the introduction of pleuro-pneumonia from the United States into Canada. Those regulations were submitted to the Imperial authorities, and after much consideration the Imperial authorities decided adversely to them. They decided that the regulations were not sufficient to meet the requirements, and it looked at the time as if Canada would be immediately scheduled if American cattle were permitted to pass through. When the Imperial Government refused to give permission, the then Minister, Sir Hector Langevin, renewed overtures, and proposed more stringent regulations. Those met with favour from the Imperial Government, and this trade of carrying American cattle through Canada to eastern points was not interfered with. Under those regulations the trade went on for some years, and about eleven years later

Canada was scheduled. I propose to show the arrangement that was made which satisfied the Imperial Government, and I also propose to show wherein that arrangement was departed from in a substantial, serious respect. In other words, I propose to show that the representations made to the Imperial Government, on which the consent of that Government was given to the traffic, were not lived up to but allowed to fall into neglect. They were practically abandoned. I propose to show that the Government deliberately neglected to carry out one of the crucial precautions, without which the Imperial Government would not have given its consent. And, Sir, I propose to show systematic neglect on the part of the Administration, or those charged with this serious public duty, and it will be for the House and the country to say whether the scheduling of our cattle which followed was the result of this neglect or whether it would have occurred under any circumstances. In order to induce the Imperial Government to give the consent in question, the Canadian representative wrote to the Imperial authorities that the cattle would all be inspected before they entered Canada. For the purposes of convenience, I may say that this traffic from the States entered Canada by the Detroit River at Sarnia and Windsor. In order to induce the Imperial Government to give this permission, the Minister then representing Canada in England, the present member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), represented, first of all, that there would be a satisfactory inspection at the point of entry from the United States into Canada—not that these cattle were to be taken to Canada and there inspected, but were to be inspected on the American side before entering. That representation was contained in the document which secured the consent in question, and that undertaking was deliberately departed from by this Government a short time after, and departed from by the authority of the Minister of Agriculture himself. Another most material precaution in securing this consent was this. In the first memo. as to regulations submitted by the Minister to the Imperial authorities, precautions were suggested, but not represented as being finally determined upon by the regulations, because any one knows that regulations, however stringent, are absolutely valueless unless effective measures are adopted to see that the spirit of the law is enforced at every point; and in this case the whole success of this movement lay in attention to detail and having those regulations lived up to at every point from the time the cattle entered Canada until they left it. It was necessary, one can easily see, to make many provisions and to watch many details in the management of the traffic, which could hardly be the subject of Orders in Council or even printed regulations. Any one who notices at all the traffic in cars containing cattle, knows the danger that would be occasioned were any of these details ignored; and accordingly it was represented by the document which secured the consent that the inspection would be made by competent veterinarians at the points of export into Canada, and that each train containing cattle would be placed under the control of a Dominion Government officer who was to watch that train from the time it entered Canada until it left. He was to see that it was not delayed on the way. He was to watch the conductor and the trainmen, to see they did not allow the train to stand on sidings adjoining other trains containing cattle, and to see that there was no communication between the cars and the outside world, because pleuro-pneumonia can be carried by human beings as well as communicated from cattle to cattle. He was to see that those cattle trains, the vans and cars, were so constructed, that the excrement from the cattle would be carefully prevented from dropping by the wayside. He was to watch that train until it entered the United States and then to see that the cattle train cars were cleaned and disinfected before they were returned to Canada. The Imperial Government knew well the difference between paper regulations and their enforcement, and therefore, while in their first dealing in the matter, they declined to grant this permission because there was no provision for the enforcement of the regulations, yet, when the subsequent overture was made by the Minister and the undertaking was given that every train should be manned in this way by a Government officer, an independent Government officer, one who was to watch and see that the trainmen did their duty, they gave the consent under which this traffic was carried on for some years. And, Mr. Speaker, I propose to show that that one great provision, without which this consent would not have been given, in the absence of which it was refused—I propose to show that never once did the Government enforce that regulation, but adopted a colourable and collusive system and deceived the Imperial Government for many years. I charge this, and I will prove it, Sir, by documents from the Department of Agriculture; I will prove that they grossly violated their pledge to the Imperial Government by having failed to appoint independent Government officers to see that the trainmen carried out the duty cast upon them under these circumstances. I propose to prove from documents in the custody of the Government—and all that I am going to prove I shall prove from records in the custody of the Government—that the precaution required of having the cars thoroughly cleansed and disinfected was neglected. I propose to prove that the system of inspection was, by the sanction of this Government, at least a colourable one, that such inspection took place with the sanction of the Government, under conditions that rendered it absolutely ineffective.

I propose to prove, Sir, that the Government sanctioned the inspection of whole train loads of cattle by night, and that for a long time, as they said, as high authority said, while they did not actually and affirmatively give sanction to that system of so-called inspection, they were officially blind to its existence. I propose to prove, Sir, that the documents which secured from the Imperial Government the consent in question represented to the Imperial authorities that no cattle should be allowed to come into Canada from the United States except those that were to be passed through in bond in the manner to which I have referred and cattle for breeding purposes. And I propose to prove from Government records that this provision was violated, and that thousands and thousands of cattle were imported into Canada from pleuro-pneumonia-affected districts in the Western States in express contradiction of the pledge which had been given to the Imperial Government and in consequence of which they assented to the railways having this trade. I propose to prove, Sir, that officers charged with the carrying out of regulations openly disregarded their duties and neglected to enforce these regulations, that one was suspended for a while and then re-instated, and that another officer who openly violated these instructions to the extent of giving blank certificates of inspection was continued in the service of this country for eight or ten years after he had acted in that manner. I propose to prove, Sir, that permission was obtained from the Imperial authorities that the cattle coming down through old Ontario and Quebec on the way to the Eastern States might be allowed to pass out of the car at a point called Lyn, provided proper regulations were lived up to at Lyn. What were those regulations? A couple of acres of land was to be enclosed in a fence; within a short distance outside of that fence was to be another fence. These fences were to be effectual barriers to exclude contact with outside cattle. The trains were to be allowed to enter this enclosure and to be locked in and the cattle might then be allowed out of the train for water and fresh air. But the manure from the cattle was to be effectually and safely disposed of. I propose to prove, Sir, that the fencing was allowed to fall into a state of dilapidation and that instead of the manure being disposed of safely by destruction or other means, it was given to the farmers of that district to fertilize their land, and that anthrax and perhaps other diseases were the result of it in the district in question. Mr. Speaker, I may, in the course of the evidence I give, prove a great many more things, but these, at all events, are points which, I think, will be worthy of attention on the part of those who may feel charged with the duty of trying to argue them away or disprove them. Now, Sir, to cite such evidence as I have. I speak of this because I am obliged to apologize in advance for the length of the documents I shall have to read. They will be uninteresting in themselves, but still not the less effective I trust. I stated in advance that the first overture made to the British Government for permission were not acquiesced in in advance by the Imperial authorities. Let me prove that statement. I read now the memorandum that was submitted by the Canadian Minister in question to the Imperial authorities, on the 25th day of April, 1879. This is from Sir Hector Langevin :

(Memorandum)

25th April, 1879.

The undersigned as representing the Government of Canada has learned with concern the improbability of the consent of the Imperial Government being obtained to the reception upon the same terms of Canadian cattle, of cattle shipped from the United States through Canada via a Canadian port. But while regarding this result, the Canadian Government will highly appreciate the interest displayed by the Right Hon. the Privy Council in considering the question and endeavouring to reach such a solution of it as would relieve the cattle trade of Canada from the heavy loss entailed upon it by the present order of things.

Assuming therefore that the proposal heretofore under discussion cannot be further pressed on the consideration of the Imperial Government with a reasonable expectation of its acceptance, the undersigned venture to submit a suggestion which if acted upon will effect an important and most desirable improvement in the condition of the carrying trade in Canada without infringing the Imperial Statute and without incurring any risk of transmitting the disease either to Canada or to this country.

The cattle carried by the Canadian railways may be divided into three classes : those which are imported; those which are intended to be shipped from Canadian ports, and those which only pass through a part of Canada in their transit from some point in the United States to some other point in that country.

The proclamation of the Canadian Government prohibits the entrance of cattle from the United States for any of these purposes, but it is obvious that there is a wide distinction between a mere transit across Canada from one point in a foreign territory to another, and shipments of foreign cattle from Canadian ports.

It is to the latter class of transaction that the proposal of the Canadian Government was more directly applicable. But with regard to the transit of cattle, the undersigned venture to submit that it would not be necessary to schedule Canadian cattle merely because of such transit, provided effectual precautions be taken to prevent the possibility of contagion from the animals when in transit.

The Railways by which this transit takes place are :—

- The Grand Trunk Railway of Canada.
- The Great Western Railway of Canada.
- The Canada Southern Railway.

The cattle trains of the Grand Trunk cross the Detroit River by a steam ferry, and passing through by a port in Canada reaches the Eastern ports in the United States by way of the Victoria Bridge, near Montreal, crossing the frontier at a point about 40 miles from that bridge, and about 500 miles from the Detroit River.

The Great Western and Canada Southern Railway trains cross the Detroit River in a similar way, but only traverse the frontier of Canada lying between that point and the Niagara River, a distance of about 150 miles. These journeys are all performed continuously. The cattle are landed in the United States in closed vans called cattle cars prepared for the purpose. They enter Canada in these vans, and they remain in them until they reach their destination, being fed and watered in them, and not being removed from them on the way for any purpose whatever, and it seems plain that if their transit could be so regulated as to prevent the possibility of contact, directly or indirectly with Canadian cattle, there would be no ground for placing Canada among the countries scheduled merely because of such transit.

The undersigned is unable at the moment to lay before the Right Honourable the Privy Council any complete plan for such regulation of transit, but it appears to him that it might be effected by adopting some such precautions as the following :—

1st. That steps be taken to ensure the retention of the animals in transit in the cattle cars from the time they enter Canada till after they have left it.

2nd. That a plan be adopted for separating the cars used for the transport of foreign cattle, from those to be used for the movement of cattle from one point in Canada to another, and for preventing those used for the former purpose from being applied to the latter.

3rd. That means be adopted for preventing the manure of the cattle in transit from remaining in the country, or for destroying it in some effectual manner.

But the undersigned does not suggest these precautions as constituting the precise system of prevention which the Canadian Government would adopt to guard against any evil effect from the proposed transit. That subject would require and receive the careful consideration of the Canadian Government, and a system would be devised for the complete isolation of cattle in transit, which would comprise any addition the Imperial Government might deem necessary to impose, and which would be made efficient and satisfactory in every respect.

And the undersigned would remark the anxiety of the Government of Canada to prevent Canadian cattle from the possibility of infection is as great as that felt for the protection of British cattle by the Imperial Government; that it would insure the most careful attention to every precaution against the possibility of such infection, and the interest of the Railway Companies would also obviously lie in the same direction, as stoppage of the trade would be the penalty of any neglect of its conditions.

The undersigned therefore trusts that the Imperial Government may be satisfied that the passage of foreign cattle through a part of Canada subject to a proper and efficient system of isolation will not render it necessary to place the Dominion under the operation of the Statute, and in that case a new proclamation prohibiting the importation of foreign cattle into Canada, and their entrance into Canada for transit, except upon the conditions to be established, and making any requisite modifications of the terms of the existing proclamation which terminates on the 1st May next, would at once be issued and steps would be immediately taken to arrange the conditions and mode of the transit in a manner satisfactory to the Imperial Government, and to enforce with exactness every precautionary measure that may be decided upon.

ALEXANDRIA HOTEL, HYDE PARK,
LONDON, W., 5th April, 1879,

Now, Mr. Speaker, those proposals were not presented in the form of an obligation. The Imperial authorities considered them, and having considered them, they gave their answer, which I will now read. It is a letter from Mr. C. L. Peel, Secretary of the Privy Council, to Sir Hector Langevin :

VETERINARY DEPARTMENT, PRIVY COUNCIL
OFFICE, 44 PARLIAMENT ST.,
WESTMINSTER, S.W., 2nd May, 1879.

SIR,—I am directed by the Lords of the Council to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 25th ult., enclosing memorandum on the subject of the transit of cattle from one part of the United States to another through Canada, in which arrangements are proposed for isolating cattle in transit in such a manner as to insure a complete security against, any chance of cattle within the Dominion becoming infected with disease. The adoption of those arrangements is proposed on the grounds that Her Majesty's Government would thus be enabled to continue the present system under which Canadian cattle are allowed to be landed without being subject to slaughter or quarantine under part 4 of the 5th Schedule to the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, and that at the same time an important improvement in the condition of the carrying trade in Canada would be effected.

This proposal has received the most careful consideration of the Lords of the Council, who have also had before them a suggestion submitted by Mr. Pope, through Sir John Rose, on April 21st, to the effect that under certain conditions the present restrictions on the introduction of cattle from the United States into Canada might be relieved.

Their Lordships observe that both these proposals proceed on the view that no contagious disease of cattle exists in the western parts of the United States, and that there is no movement of cattle from east to west (except in the case of expensive animals for breeding), and that therefore if the proposed transit were allowed there would be little or no danger of diseased cattle being brought into or moved through Canada.

I am, however, to point out to you that the action which the Lords of the Council can take, with reference to the importation of animals into the United Kingdom is strictly limited by the terms of the Act of Parliament.

The general rule which applies to all foreign animals (which term by section 5 of the Act includes animals brought from any country out of the United Kingdom) is laid down in the 5th schedule to the Act. Special animals can only be landed at a foreign wharf defined for that purpose by an Order in Council and are not to be moved alive out of the wharf.

The provisions under which Canadian cattle are at present exempted from slaughter or quarantine are contained in part four of the same schedule, which provides that if, and so long as the Privy Council are satisfied with regard to any foreign country (that is, any country out of the United Kingdom) that the laws thereof relating to the importation and exportation of animals and to the prevention of the introduction or spreading of the disease, and the general sanitary conditions of the animals therein, are such as to afford reasonable security against the importation therefrom of diseased animals, then from time to time the Privy Council by general or special order shall allow animals or any special kind of animals brought from that country to be landed without being subject to slaughter or quarantine.

By the Foreign Animals Order as originally issued, animals from the United States and from the Dominion of Canada were admitted under the exceptional provision, but in consequence after the discovery of pleuro-pneumonia in cattle from the United States, the Lords of the Council were reluctantly compelled to withdraw the exemption accorded to cattle from that country, and the same course would have been adopted with regard to Canadian cattle but for the prohibitory order passed by the Dominion Government, February 1st of this year.

Application has been made to Her Majesty's Government by the United States Government for the restoration to the United States of the privilege to land their cattle under part 4, but under existing circumstances it has been found impossible to accede to this request, and the Lords of the Council have been unable to draw any distinction between different parts of the United States territory.

With reference therefore to the proposals now made on behalf of the Canadian Government, the Lords of the Council regret to have to inform you that if cattle from the United States are allowed to pass through Canada, they would not be justified under the Act of Parliament in continuing the exemption from slaughter at the port of landing, which has been hitherto extended to the Canadian cattle.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) G. L. PEEL.

HECTOR L. LANGEVIN.

True copy,

(Sgd.) HECTOR L. LANGEVIN.

That is directed to Sir Hector Langevin. Here you will observe that the regulations did not meet the requirements of the Imperial Government. I will now read a communication from Sir Hector Langevin, which was more successful, as a result of which consent was given, and it will be then for the House to say whether the representations and the undertakings involved in this document, have been made good by the Government of Canada. This is the letter from Sir Hector Langevin to Mr. Peel, secretary of the Privy Council:

Mr MULOCK.

ALEXANDRIA HOTEL, HYDE PARK,
LONDON, 5th May, 1879.

SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 2nd inst., (No. 61702) with regard to the proposals laid before the Lords of the Privy Council, one respecting the importation of United States cattle via Canadian Ports, the other respecting the transit of United States cattle through a portion of Canada. I have to express my gratification at the careful consideration which they have received from their Lordships, and I am emboldened by the desire which it is apparent is entertained by their Lordships to meet the wishes of Canada if they can do so under the terms of the Contagious Diseases (Animal's) Act, 1878, to lay before their Lordships some further representations, which I venture to hope may induce their Lordships to reconsider their views upon one of these proposals. When I had submitted my memorandum of the 25th ult., I had become aware of their Lordships views against the importation of United States cattle via Canadian Ports, and I was prepared for the decision upon that point, conveyed in your letter, and I propose to confine my present remarks to the suggestion that subject, to proper precautions, Canadian Railway trains might be permitted to traverse a part of Canada loaded with United States cattle. I observe by your letter, and by part 4 of Schedule 5 of the Contagious Diseases (Animal's) Act, that the continuance of the privilege allowed to Canadian cattle depends upon the question whether in the language of the Schedule: "The laws thereof relating to the importation and exportation of animals, and of the suppression of disease and the general condition of animals therein, are such as to afford reasonable security against the importation therefrom of diseased animals."

I am aware that unless I can show that the laws of Canada with regard to the transit of cattle are satisfied, I cannot hope to obtain any relaxation of the existing system, and I now venture to trouble their Lordships in the hope that a more full knowledge of the circumstances connected with the trade, and of the freedom from danger with which it could be carried on, may induce their Lordships to reconsider the subject, and may enable them to reach the conclusion that the suggested modifications will not deprive our Canadian laws of the character they are admitted to possess.

As I had the honour to observe in the memorandum submitted—a carefully considered system of isolation could be adopted with regard to the United States cattle in transit, among the details of such a system might be included the inspection of the animals by competent officers of the Canadian Government, before the cars containing them were allowed to cross the frontier. If such inspection proved satisfactory, the Government officers might take charge of the train and proceed with it during its entire transit through Canada, in order to ensure the observance of all the prescribed rules. Each cattle car could be kept locked by the officer in charge, and as foreign cattle are dutiable, they would pass through in bond, and all the precautions provided by the Customs Department for the safe custody of goods through the country in bond would be adopted. The transit would only occupy a length of time varying from ten to forty hours. The trains are never stopped except for a few minutes at stations to ascertain if the line is clear. The cattle are always fed and watered in the cars, and arrangements for these precautions could be easily made, if they do not already exist, by which such feeding and watering could be effected without opening the doors.

There would be no necessity for cleaning out the cattle cars during the period of their transit, and such cleaning would be prevented.

Such precautions as these, under the circumstances as explained, would be considered by the Canadian Government sufficient to prevent the transmission of the disease to Canadian cattle, and I beg their Lordships to believe that the Canadian Government are desirous of protecting their animals from infection much more because of the intrinsic importance of the subject within the country, than on account of any privileges as to their importation to which freedom from disease would entitle them. But it is precisely because the Canadian Government are satisfied that cattle may be carried in transit as proposed in my memorandum, without danger of contagion, that they have determined to prevent such transit if they can do so without interfering with the privileges their cattle already enjoys in English ports.

I would therefore respectfully ask their Lordships to consider whether the prohibition of the importation of foreign cattle into Canada, with the sole exception of such importation for the purpose of transit under proper provisions against infection does not constitute such a law in that respect as in the end of the schedule already referred to—"would afford a reasonable security against the importation from Canada of diseased animals."

If their Lordships should become satisfied that such a law would be sufficient, the existing prohibition would be continued after a further provision creating the only exception to its universality, namely, that cattle might pass from one point on the frontier to another subject to such conditions as might be imposed upon such transit from time to time by Orders in Council, and an Order in Council would be immediately prepared describing the nature and the details of the process of isolation, and containing in addition to the precautionary measures which the experience and knowledge of the facts would enable the Canadian Government to devise such further conditions as their Lordships might impose, and such order would be submitted to their Lordships and would be modified or amended in any respect according to their desire.

Under these circumstances I fail to see how any danger of infection to Canadian cattle could arise from permitting the mere transit of cattle, and it is only the infection of Canadian cattle which this country would have to fear, and no part of the cattle so passing through Canada could by any possibility be shipped from Canadian Ports. And I would respectfully ask on these grounds a reconsideration by their Lordships of the decision conveyed to me in your letter.

I also observe in that letter reference to an application by the Government of the United States for the withdrawal of the Order made in respect of their cattle, as well as to the first proposal of the Canadian Government, and I observe that these two proposals and their rejection rest upon similar grounds, but it seems to me that neither of them has any bearing on the suggestion now made. It is true that all the applications rest in some measure upon the belief that contagious disease does not exist to any great extent in any part of the west, and not at all in many of the Western States, but although the existence of cattle disease in any part of the United States might render it necessary under the Act, to place all the cattle from that country in the same category here. I submit that it has a very different bearing upon the question whether or no, cattle from some parts of that country might be allowed to pass for a few hours through Canadian Territory.

It is understood that the disease may not be perceptible at the time of inspection, and may not develop itself for some time afterwards. But this fact cannot have much weight in respect of mere transit of cattle, as the periods during which they are upon Canadian Territory is so short, and as during that period it would be impossible for them to come into contact with Canadian cattle directly, or indirectly.

I trust therefore that their Lordships upon reconsideration may not find it inconsistent with the protection of the cattle in England, to concur in the suggestion contained in my memorandum, and I would venture to remark that no order of any kind would in that case be required to be made by their Lordships, as to the modified proclamation and the Order in Council would be part of the law of Canada in respect of the importation and exportation of animals, and their Lordships' present order would not require alteration, if their Lordships were satisfied in the terms of the Statute that such laws so modified "would afford reasonable security against the importation of diseased animals from Canada." I hope their Lordships will pardon me for recurring to the suggestion submitted in my memorandum, which I should not have done but for the earnest desire of the Canadian Government to relieve a trade so important as the carrying trade, in so far as may be done without danger to the agricultural interests of the country, nor without the conviction that their Lordships would gladly meet the wishes of the Government of Canada, if they were satisfied they could do so consistently with the law, and with due protection of English cattle.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

HECTOR L. LANGEVIN.

The answer of the Privy Council is as follows:—

VETERINARY DEPARTMENT, PRIVY COUNCIL
OFFICE, 44 PARLIAMENT ST.,
WESTMINSTER, S.W., 9th May, 1879.

SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, containing the conditions upon which the Canadian Government would be prepared to insist in the event of their allowing the transit of animals by railway through Canada from the western to the eastern States of America, and requesting to be informed whether if such transit were permitted on these terms the Imperial Government would deem it necessary to make any change in the conditions under which the Canadian cattle are now admitted into the United Kingdom, and in reply, I am to inform you that the Lords of the Council considered this fresh proposal and the details of the stringent precautions which it has proposed to adopt for the isolation of the cattle during transit under the personal supervision of a Government Officer, and they have arrived at the conclusion that so long as no diseases exist in the Dominion, and provided that the measures indicated in your letter are found sufficient to prevent the introduction of cattle from the United States into Canada, their Lordships would not think it necessary to make any change in the existing regulations.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Signed,) C. L. PEEL.

I presume when he used the words "introduction of cattle from the United States," he must have meant "diseased" cattle. To that letter Sir Hector Langevin replied :

Letter, Langevin to Pope.

LONDON, 13th May, 1879.

SIR,—The following is a copy of the letter which I addressed to the Lords of the Council on the 10th May, as mentioned in my last letter to you, viz. :—

SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter (No. 61767) of the 9th inst., informing me of the decision of the Lords of the Privy Council that so long as no disease exists in the Dominion, and provided that the measures indicated in my letter of the 5th inst., are found sufficient to prevent the introduction of cattle (diseased) from the United States into Canada, their Lordships would not think it necessary to make any change in the existing regulations, &c.

Privy Council Office.

These letters indicated the basis on which this traffic was to be carried on, subject to the modification arrived at in the month of April, 1880. It appears that it was deemed necessary that the cattle should be allowed out when they were shipped via Montreal, and accordingly application was made to the Imperial authorities to consent to their being "untrucked," as the term is in the correspondence, at Lyn station, and that consent was given on the terms mentioned in his memorandum. The Canadian Government represented that they would adopt the following precaution at Lyn, if the Imperial Government would consent to the "untrucking there." This is the proposition of the Canadian Government to the Imperial Government :

The yard at the Lyn station in which it was proposed to feed and rest the cattle, comprised an area of over two acres, and was surrounded by a close board fence, 8 feet high. The trains would be taken directly into the yard through a gate by a special track, and the gate immediately closed and locked after their entry. After the feeding and resting the train would pass out to the main track going through another gate on the opposite side, which would also be immediately closed and locked behind them.

It is proposed to declare the yard used an "infected district" in the terms of the Act relating to contagious diseases of animals so as to prohibit under the penalties of that Act all intercourse with it.

The trains employed in carrying cattle in transit would be in charge of a Government Officer and the cars would not be allowed to be opened from the point of entry and that of exit, except under the special conditions at Lyn. Each car, moreover, used in this traffic would be registered and not allowed to be used for the carrying of Canadian cattle. The cattle would be subject to a very careful inspection before being allowed to be taken from the country.

The Imperial Government dealt with this in the following manner :—

SIR,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 15th inst., transmitting a paraphrase of a telegraphic message from the Governor General of Canada, on the subject of the transit of cattle from the United States through Canada.

Referring to my letter of the 25th October last, forwarding copy of correspondence which had taken place on this subject showing that the Lords of the Council agreed to the transit through Canada of cattle from the western to the eastern States of the Union, upon conditions laid down in Mr. Langevin's letter of the 5th May, 1878, but could not agree to the untrucking of cattle during transit. I am directed by the Lords of the Council to state for the information of Sir Michael Hicks Beach, that the Canadian authorities having proposed certain precautionary measures which appear to their Lordships to afford sufficient security against the introduction of disease into Canada, their Lordships have been pleased to sanction the untrucking of cattle during their transit from the United States through Canada at Lyn Station on the Grand Trunk Railway.

The conditions referred to are fully set forth in the enclosed extract from a memorandum on the subject.

I have, &c.,

MONTREAL PARK AND ISLAND RAILWAY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 68) respecting the Montreal Park and Island Railroad Company.

(In the Committee.)

On section 3,

Mr. GILLIES. When this Bill was reported from the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines on the 29th ult., I gave notice that I would, when the House resolved itself into committee on the Bill, move an amendment to this section. I now purpose doing so, and I suppose the committee will expect from me my reasons for adopting this course. I will briefly give those reasons, and if they will strike the committee as forcibly as they do me, I think they will have very little trouble in coming to the same conclusion as I have done. This company, called the Montreal Park and Island Railway Company, was incorporated in the year 1885 by the Quebec Legislature, with a capital stock of $500,000; and the Act of incorporation provided that this capital stock could be increased to $1,000,000 upon a majority vote of the shareholders. It was urged very strongly before the committee, of which I myself am a member, that this application should never have come to this Parliament at all, that the provisions, powers and franchises conferred on that company by the local Act were sufficient, and that any change sought for should have been applied for to the Local Legislature. However, that is neither here nor there; I mention it simply incidentally. This Act was passed, as I have said, in 1885, and was allowed to slumber for some length of time. In 1892 the Act was revived, and it was to begin to run from that date for five years. At that time the opponent of this Bill, a man of the name of Williams, of New York, came to the province of Quebec, and, in company with a man of the name of Albert J. Corriveau, obtained several franchises from the municipalities on the island of Montreal—Notre-Dame de Grace, St. Louis de Mile End, St. Geneviève, St. Laurent, Pointe aux Trembles, and some others, the names of which I do not now recollect. From these municipalities they acquired some very valuable franchises, such as the exclusive privilege of lighting them and total exemption from taxation for a period of thirty years. The incorporators under this charter came together and arranged that Williams and Corriveau should take their charter and build the road mentioned therein, and should receive therefor $250,000 of paid-up stock in the company. There was an agreement entered into between Williams and Corriveau and the Montreal Park and Island Railway Company, a copy of which I hold in my hand, and which I will read to the committee, as it will throw considerable light on the transaction that took place between them. As I have said, Williams and Corriveau were to get $250,000 of paid-up and non-assessable stock in the company for carrying on the work; and for the use of the charter they were to return $25,000 of this stock to the company. In other words, Williams and Corriveau were to have $225,000 net of paid-up stock in the company. A sale and transfer of these franchises from Williams and Corriveau to the Montreal Park and Island Railway Company took place, and the terms of that sale I will now read to the House:

BEFORE Mtre. William de N. Marler, the undersigned Public Notary for the province of Quebec, residing at the city of Montreal.

APPEARED:—

ALBERT J. CORRIVEAU, electrician, residing at Montreal, and WILLIAM S. WILLIAMS, residing at Montreal, of the first part, and THE MONTREAL PARK & ISLAND RAILWAY COMPANY, a body politic and corporate, duly incorporated by various acts of the legislature of the province of Quebec; having its principal place of business at the city of Montreal, herein acting by Michael S. Lonergan, advocate, the vice-president, and Maurice Perreault, architect, the secretary of the said company, both of the city of Montreal, and hereunto duly authorized by a resolution of the directors of the said company, passed at a meeting held at the city of Montreal, on the _____ day of May instant, whereof a copy, certified true by the said secretary, is hereunto annexed after being identified ne varietur by the signatures of the parties in the presence of the said notary, hereinafter called the "The Company," of the second part, who declared unto the said notary:—

THAT whereas the said Albert J. Corriveau has obtained for himself, his associates, successors and assigns, the franchises, rights and privileges hereinafter more particularly referred to.

And whereas the said William S. Williams is, as the said Albert J. Corriveau now declares, is sole associate in the said several franchises, rights and privileges; no other person being associated with him or owning any part, share or interest therein. And whereas in consequence the said several franchises, rights and privileges hereinafter referred to belong solely to them, the said Albert J. Corriveau and William S. Williams. And whereas they have agreed to sell, and the company have agreed to purchase, all said franchises, rights and privileges.

Now these presents and I, the said notary, witness:

That they, the said Albert J. Corriveau and William S. Williams have sold, assigned and transferred and do, by these presents, sell, assign and transfer unto the company, thereof accepting, the rights, privileges and franchises granted to the said Albert J. Corriveau, for himself, his associates successors and grantees, with reference to the construction and operation within the limits of the several municipalities hereinafter mentioned, of a system of tramways, and electric light, etc.:

1. By a by-law of the village of St. Louis du Mile-End, passed at a meeting of the municipal council of said village, held on the twenty-seventh day of March last, 1893.

2. By a by-law of the municipality of Sault-au-Récollet, passed at a meeting of the municipal council of the parish of Sault-au-Récollet, on the third of October last, 1892.

3. By a by-law of the municipality of the village Notre-Dame de Grâce West, in the county of Hochelaga, passed at a meeting of the municipal council of the said village, on the sixth of March last, 1893.

4. By a by-law of the municipality of the parish of St. Leonard de Port-Maurice, in the county of Hochelaga, passed at a meeting of the municipal council of the said parish, on the twenty-fourth of April last, 1893.

5. By a resolution of the municipal council of the parish of Ste-Geneviève, in the county of Jacques-Cartier, passed at a meeting held on the twenty-second day of February last, 1893.

6. By a resolution of the municipal council of Pointe-aux-Trembles, in the county of passed at a meeting held on the thirteenth day of April last, 1893.

7. By a resolution of the municipal council of the parish of St. Laurent, county of Jacques-Cartier, passed at a general meeting held on the first of May, 1893.

Then there are three other municipalities which also published by-laws investing the same rights, privileges, and franchises in Messrs. Corriveau and Williams. The transfer goes on to state :

To have and to hold the same unto the company, its successors and assigns, and their absolute property from this date ; the said Albert J. Corriveau and William S. Williams hereby subrogating and substituting the company in all the rights and privileges, including exemption from taxation, conferred by the several by-laws.

The said Albert J. Corriveau and William S. Williams warrant that they are the sole owners of the rights, privileges and franchises granted by the several by-laws and resolutions, and that no other person or persons whomsoever have any interest, share or title therein, and that they have not done or omitted to do any act which could in any way diminish the effect of the sale and transfer hereby made.

I want the committee to pay particular attention to this.

This sale and transfer is thus made in consideration of two thousand five hundred shares fully paid up and unassessable shares of the company of the par value of one hundred dollars each, which the company have issued in accordance with the annexed resolution of their directors, and have delivered to the said Albert J. Corriveau and William S. Williams, as they acknowledge, and to their satisfaction, whereof quit.

The company are to pay the cost of this deed and of its signification whenever necessary ; for which purpose the bearer of an authentic copy is constituted the attorney of the parties.

That was a transfer of all those privileges and franchises conferred by the several municipalities of Montreal upon Messrs. Williams and Corriveau, and assigned by them to the Park Island Railway Company, in consideration of 2,500 shares, fully paid up, and unassessable stock of the company. The company passed, unanimously, at one of their meetings, a resolution, and this resolution is endorsed upon their minute book, as has been stated before the committee, and not contradicted. The resolution is as follows :—

Whereas the company has thus far not taken advantage of the privileges of its charter for railway construction, and it is now expedient that these privileges be exercised and availed of, and it is the intention of the company to lay out, construct and operate a system of railway to be worked by electric motor power or otherwise throughout the Island of Montreal ; and whereas of the capital stock authorized by the company's charter to the extent of five hundred thousand dollars ($500,000) only the amount of eighty thousand dollars ($80,000) has been issued or subscribed for, and the balance of four hundred and twenty thousand dollars ($420,000) of the capital stock remains unsubscribed for, and it is expedient to sell and allot and issue the said unsubscribed shares by private sale as provided for in the Quebec Railway Act, incorporated in this charter, in order to obtain such concessions, privileges, advantages or promotion of enterprise and other capital as will enable the company to proceed with its construction contemplated as aforesaid. And whereas, Messrs. W. S. Williams and A. J. Corriveau have obtained certain franchises, rights and privileges from certain municipalities in the Island of Montreal for the construction of electric railways, etc., together with exemptions from taxes and other immunities as specified by them in a certain schedule submitted to this board, and the said parties are willing and propose to sell these rights, privileges and immunities to this company and receive in payment therefor unallotted stock in this concern, and it is expedient in the interest of the company to accept such offer in order to enable them to proceed with their work and fulfil the purposes of their charter.

Be it therefore resolved : That from and out of the said number and amount of shares of the capital stock of this company as authorized by its Act of Incorporation now remaining in the books unsubscribed for and unissued the number and amount of two thousand five hundred shares (2500) of the said stock be sold, allotted and issued to W. S. Williams, of the city of New York, in payment for and in consideration of the conveyance and transfer by the said A. J. Corriveau and him to this company of the rights, franchises and privileges enumerated in the schedule annexed and that the said two thousand five hundred (2500) shares thus sold, disposed of and transferred to said Williams by this company in payment of said franchises be and the same are hereby declared to be and issued as fully paid up and unassessable shares of the capital stock of this Company.

That resolution is coeval with the transfer from Messrs. Corriveau and Williams to the company, and it shows that these parties fully appreciated the value of the franchises conferred upon Williams and Corriveau by the different municipalities, when they were willing to give, in exchange, 2,500 shares of fully paid-up unassessable stock in the company. At the same date that this resolution was passed and this transfer made, this agreement was entered into :

Memorandum of agreement made and executed this ninth day of May, 1893 at the city of Montreal, between Honourable Louis Beaubien, Honourable J. R. Thibaudeau, Henry Hogan, Dugald Graham, M. Perrault, hereinafter called the parties of the first part, and W. S. Williams, of New York, and Albert I. Corriveau, of Montreal, hereinafter called the party of the second part.

Whereas the parties of the first part are and have been incorporators, promoters and directors of the Montreal Park and Island Railway Company, and in that behalf have devoted time and attention to the said enterprise and made and expended certain disbursements on account thereof, and are now the holders in the books of said company of one hundred (100) shares each of the capital stock thereof which shares of capital have not been fully paid up.

And whereas the said parties of the first part are desirous of disposing of their interests in and claims against the said Montreal Park and Island Railway Company to the said party of the second part, in consideration for the transfer to them and registration in their names in the books of the company a certain number of shares of fully paid up and unassessable stock and the said party of the second part willing to accept the said proposal and conditions.

Now therefore these presents witness:—

That the said parties of the first part have and do hereby transfer, convey and make over and dispose of all their rights, claims and interests to, in and upon the said Montreal Park and Island Railway Company to the said party of the second part for the consideration and price of fifty (50) shares each of the capital stock of the said company, which shares shall be fully paid up and unassessable and that upon receipt and transfer of the same from the party of the second part the parties of the first part shall transfer to the party of the second part or his nominee in trust or in such manner as may be necessary the hundred shares (100) of unpaid stock or only partially paid stock now standing in their names respectively for the purpose of being treated and disposed of as the board of directors may order.

And the said parties of the first part further place their resignations, as directors of the said company in the hands of the said party of the second part, to take effect and be accepted by the board at such time and place as the said party of the second part may direct; and they agree pending the acceptance of their said resignations to vote at such meetings of the board as may meanwhile be held in the manner and according to the wishes indicated to them of the party of the second part.

In presence of:

M. S. LONEGAN,	LOUIS BEAUBIEN,
W. S. WILLIAMS,	W. HOGAN,
ALBERT J. CORRIVEAU,	M. PERRAULT,
J. THIBAudeau,	D. GRAHAM.

Under that agreement, Mr. Chairman, these people commenced operations and built seven miles of the road, that is they built from Montreal to Sault Aux Recollets, and they made arrangements to have the whole system continued this year. And at that stage it was found that the venture was no longer in doubt—it was a paying concern. Then it was that the company made a demand on Williams telling him that he held too much of their stock, that he had too much control, and that he would have to assign some of it, alleging that he had paid no money for the stock. He held $125,000 of stock, and it was contended that he paid no money for it. The answer of Williams to that, as given before the committee was that this stock represented the franchises, and that the franchises represented so much money, and, no matter whether any money was paid or not, the franchises which were shown to be valuable by the fact that the company had every desire to get them, was sufficient consideration for the stock which was given to him and his associate, Mr. Corriveau—$250,000. I think that is a complete answer to the allegation. Well, matters got so hot between them that Williams retired from the company, and the company is now being managed by themselves. Now the company comes before this Legislature and asks for this charter. Williams and his associates oppose it on the ground that their interest will be practically submerged if the capital stock is increased from $500,000 to $1,000,000. The parties opposed to this charter represent $138,000 of paid-up stock, out of a total of $287,000, or very nearly one-half. I submit the proposition to any legal gentleman in the House, and I think he will agree with me that if this charter in the first instance had been passed by the Federal Legislature with a capital of $500,000 and if the corporators came back and asked for an increase in that capital stock to a million dollars, we would refuse to grant that privilege. We would immediately say: Consult the General Railway Act and you will see that the 37th section of it provides that the capital stock of any railway company may be increased at any time on the application of two-thirds of the shareholders to the Governor in Council. This company is precisely in the same position now as if the charter had been granted by this Parliament. The only argument alleged by the promoters before the committee—and it was really no argument at all—was that they want to have the capital in order to carry on the work, as they contemplated branching out in various directions. The answer of the opponents of the measure was: If you desire to have your capital increased, you have the power to increase it under the General Railway Act. By increasing this capital from $500,000 to $1,000,000 we shall be interfering with the vested rights of Williams and his associates, who, as I say, represent $138,000 out of a total of $287,000 of paid-up stock. The principle of doing justice to every man should guide us, no matter from what clime he comes. I think the committee will agree with me that it would be unfair that we should at one stroke of the pen, without any tangible reasons being given, make such changes that instead of representing one-half the stock they will only represent one-quarter. These are the reasons, Mr. Chairman, which induce me to move the following, seconded by Mr. Dickey:—

That clause 3 of Bill No 68, intituled "An Act respecting the Montreal Park and Island Railway Co." be amended by striking out the words "one million" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "five hundred thousand".

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). This is the first time I have had the opportunity of reading the papers which the hon. gentleman has read to this committee. There is no signature at the end of the supposed agreement. But, leaving that aside, I desire to call attention to the statement made in that agreement that the sale of these franchises to which the hon. member has referred or the acceptance of them by the company was authorized by resolution of the directors of the said company. It is very well known that the directors have no power to transfer $250,000 of stock in favour of any one, unless the transfer has been sanctioned by the shareholders. If the hon. gentleman had quoted a resolution of the shareholders in favour of transferring to these two gentlemen, Messrs Corriveau and Williams, $250,000 of stock, I could understand there would be some claim to that stock on their part. But as this resolution of the board has not been sanctioned by the shareholders—at least I do not find it sanctioned—the paper read to the committee has no value whatever so far as the assignment of the shares is concerned. Now, suppose that this resolution had been sanctioned by the shareholders, is Mr. Williams in a worse position to-day? By a local charter the stock is to be increased, not by two-thirds of the shareholders, but by the simple majority of the shareholders. You must notice, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Williams is the only one of all the shareholders who is opposing this Bill; Mr. Corriveau, his partner, is in favour of it along with the other shareholders. About $375,000 of stock is subscribed, $125,000 is being held by Williams, and some $12,000 or $14,000 is held by some friends of his in New York. These facts were shown before the Committee of Railways and Canals. Consequently, even taking the stock subscribed to-day, Williams is entirely at the mercy of the majority of the shareholders. They may increase that stock, not by going to the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec, under a provision of the local law, by which the stock of railway companies cannot be increased, except by resolution of two-thirds of the shareholders, sanctioned by the Lieutenant-Governor. By this local charter the capital stock of the company is to be $500,000, divided into 5,000 shares of $100 each, with the right to increase such capital to $1,000,000 when the majority of the shareholders shall so decide. Who are the petitioners before this House? They are the majority, and the large majority of the shareholders. If a two-thirds majority were required, it might have been a different thing, but the local charter requires only a majority, and when we ask that this stock be increased from $500,000 to $1,000,000, we are continuing the power which was granted to them by the local charter, and I would like to know upon what ground Mr. Williams can complain? He is in no worse position now than before. I may say a word or two about this proposed agreement of Williams and Corriveau with the company. The facts were investigated fully during two sittings of the committee. It appears that Mr. Williams was a New Yorker, and supposed to have a great deal of capital, at least at his command, if not in his own possession. Williams entered into an arrangement with Corriveau to secure the franchises of nine different municipalities, all located in the county of Hochelaga and the county of Jacques Cartier, which latter county I have the honour to represent. Do you suppose that Williams, a stranger, having no personal knowledge of the people, is the man who obtained those franchises? Those franchises were obtained by Mr. Corriveau. But where does the influence of Williams come in? Williams was supposed to supply capital to build the road, and consequently this supposed agreement was entered into giving $125,000 to Corriveau as a reward for his services in obtaining those franchises, and $125,000 to Williams because he supplied the necessary cash to build the road. But it will be said that there is no clause of that kind in the agreement. True, there is none; it was omitted by the shareholders. They supposed the necessary money would be found by Williams, and no one thought it was necessary to mention that in the agreement. But as soon as they found out that Williams did not have the money, the difficulty commenced. Williams was the general manager, and there was no trouble at all about the charter. I hold in my hand the minute signed by the secretary of the company, not a paper signed by a public officer, but a minute of a meeting of the board of directors, held on the 2nd February, 1894, at which were present R. C. Gault, D. Morrice, Henry Hogan, Hon. J. R. Thibaudau and others. Williams was present at that meeting as general manager. I find his name appearing here. He was asked to arrange with the trustees, and he reports. I find the fact that he was present at that meeting of the directors, on the very face of the minute of the proceedings. And what do I find at the end?

At the suggestion of Hon. Thibaudau, the directors considered the advisability of applying to the Federal Government, at its next session, for an act subjecting this company to the jurisdiction thereof, and to confirm and increase its powers, to extend its boundaries, to authorize the making of agreements with other companies for the use of their lines and bridges, and vice-versa, to define its bonding powers, to authorize—

I call special attention of hon. members to this clause——to authorize the issue of preferential shares, and for other purposes.

Mr. Williams says that he had no knowledge of this Bill before Parliament until it was introduced; but here is a resolution passed by a meeting which was held on the 6th February, 1894, more than one month before the meeting of Parliament took place, at which meeting Mr. Williams was present, and at which it was agreed that the powers of the company should be increased to extend the boundary of the line through the county of Laval. Now, is it possible to extend a line of railway 70 or 75 miles in length and to make it 150 miles, without increasing the capital? Moreover, you find in that resolution that Mr. Williams had no objection even that preferential stock should be permitted. If you look at the Bill you will find a clause demanding that preferential stock should be issued. I myself asked the promoters to drop that clause, because I did not suppose it was fair to Mr. Williams. I have nothing to do personally with the company; I am acting in the interest of the public, and of my constituents who have an interest in this Bill. Williams was willing to have preferential stock, but he had a great objection to increasing the capital. Now, to be brief—because I know that the time for the discussion of Private Bills is limited—I will conclude with these remarks. We did come before this Parliament to get further powers, in the first place, because the company wished to extend their line beyond the Island of Montreal through the county of Laval, and to cross navigable rivers which are under the control of the Parliament of Canada. In the second place, we came to this Parliament to obtain a Federal charter because it is well known that in the money markets of the world it is considered better to be armed with a Federal charter than a local one, and as this company intended to issue bonds to the extent of $15,000 per mile, they thought they were promoting their interests in asking for a Federal charter. In the third place, this company crosses the Canadian Pacific Railway at one or two points, and by the Railway Act of this Dominion it is declared that the moment a railway incorporated by a Local Legislature, or by this Parliament, crosses the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway, and some other railways mentioned in the Railway Act, that company becomes ipso facto subject to the general Railway Act of the Dominion. In the fourth place, this company is asking also for power to make certain arrangements with the Montreal Bridge Company over the bridge which it is proposed to build between the city of Montreal and the south shore of the St. Lawrence, and for this reason it was thought better that the charter should be a Federal one instead of a local one. But my learned friend says: If you want to increase the capital stock, why not increase it as provided for by the General Railway Act? Now, we are asking that it should be increased as provided by the local Act, and why should we wait to get an Order in Council when Parliament is sitting? It is said we could go before the Governor in Council and that such was the intention of Parliament. No doubt when certain powers are needed application should be made to the Governor in Council, but when Parliament is sitting it is the first authority to which to apply for the necessary powers. For these reasons I ask that the clause which was passed by the Committee of Railways and Canals, after full discussion, be adopted, and I hope this House will not disturb the conclusion arrived at by that committee without very good reason, and that the clause as passed will be allowed to stand.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken puts his claim to have this Bill carried by this House, or the amendment the hon. gentleman rejected, on this ground, among others, that the Bill is one of very great importance to his constituents. I have no doubt that the Bill is of some importance to his constituents; but no matter how great that importance may be, I respectfully submit that ought not to carry any weight if thereby any possible injustice will be done to any individual in this country. The hon. gentleman said he had no interest in the Bill. I do not intend to controvert his statement in that respect, but I would remind him that before the committee he acted as the promoter of the Bill and actively advocated it.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). I beg your pardon. There were two lawyers representing the Bill. I have no interest as a lawyer in it or as a shareholder in the company, and I appeared simply as a member of the House.

Mr. LISTER. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). I never made any other statement.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman did more talking before the committee than did the two lawyers.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). That may be. I talk a great deal more when I am not paid than when I am paid.

Mr. LISTER. There is one remarkable circumstance connected with this company. It was incorporated by the Local Legislature of Quebec. Whatever the rights the company have obtained they have obtained from that Legislature, and for some reason, which the hon. gentleman has not made perfectly clear, the company now appear before this Parliament for the purpose of obtaining power to increase the capital stock of the company. I would also state to the House that this Bill was before the Railway Committee one day; it was fully discussed before that committee, and the very section we are now considering was rejected by the committee. What was asked by the promoter of the Bill was refused by that committee; but the Bill not being passed on that day, the hon. gentleman and his friends appeared before the committee on the following day, and obtained a reconsideration of what the committee had decided, and by a majority of five members the action of the committee was revoked, and the capital stock of the company was retained at one million dollars, as appears in the Bill. What are the facts connected with this Bill? Mr. Williams, through his own efforts, succeeded in securing what he considered valuable franchises from different municipalities in and around the city of Montreal. The other gentleman who took up the scheme considered the rights he acquired to be equally desirable, and it was agreed that on consideration of his surrendering those rights he should receive $125,000 of paid-up stock in the company. That was the position he held. Hon. gentlemen will remember that it was never intended, it is not now intended, that the road should be constructed out of money paid by the people who subscribed the stock; out of the $300,000 odd of stock subscribed, not one dollar had been paid in cash, but $300,000 of stock were issued by the company.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken. Facts to the contrary were given before the committee. It is true that $250,000 of stock obtained by Corriveau and Williams were not paid.

Mr. LISTER. Nor any of the other.

Mr. McLEOD. I think the hon. gentleman is right; the other was in bonds.

Mr. LISTER. Those acquiring the stock have never paid one dollar of consideration for it. They are taking it from this man who worked through long years for comparatively nothing for the purpose of securing those franchises. They are depreciating the value of this stock at least 50 per cent by the provision now sought to be put through this House. I said a short time ago that it was never intended that this road should be constructed out of capital stock. Roads are not usually constructed in that way now-a-days. The intention was, and the record shows it, that the road should be built altogether by a bond issue. The company have issued bonds for the construction of the road, and according to the report of their own engineer, the bonds which they had issued are more than sufficient to cover the entire cost. Let hon. members also bear this in mind, that it was not the intention of the company, and that it is not their intention now, to operate the road. They have leased the road to the Montreal Street Railway Company for a term of twenty-five years. That company is to operate the road; I may be mistaken in the name of the company to which the road has been leased, but they have leased it, and that company is to operate the road mentioned in this Bill. The leasing company is to pay a rental to this company seeking incorporation, and the rental which they are to receive is to constitute the profits of the stockholders of this company. So that the matter stands in this position: that the rental is a fixed sum; upon $500,000 it will be so much, say $50,000 if you like, upon $1,000,000 it will be only $25,000. So that the effect of the legislation is to reduce the profits that the present stockholders will receive upon $500,000 exactly one-half. The result of that must necessarily be to depreciate the security held by Mr. Williams to the extent of just 50 per cent. My hon. friend has read a resolution passed, he said, by the board when Mr. Williams was present. I remind the hon. gentleman that there is nothing in that resolution authorizing the increase of the capital stock of the company to $1,000,000. If the men who are promoting the Bill are honest, why do they not subscribe this difference between what has been subscribed and half a million dollars, and then they would be in the position of holders of two-thirds of the stock of the company, and then they would be in a position under the law as it is to pass a resolution increasing the capital stock? But that is not the intention, that is not the wish, that is not the object. As the matter stands to-day, Mr. Williams holds more than one-half of the subscribed stock of the company, and those people could not go before the Governor in Council, because they could not represent that they are holders of two-thirds of the stock; therefore, they could not get, under the statutes of the country, an order approved by the Governor in Council to increase the capital stock of the company. And in order to get over that difficulty, they come before Parliament and ask Parliament to do what they have no right to do under the laws as they exist to-day. I do not know Mr. Williams; I do not know any of these parties. I came into the committee-room on the second day of the discussion of this matter, and was amazed to find hon. gentlemen going there—perhaps they were not invited to go or urged to go—in sufficient force to revoke a solemn decision given the day before, in the interests of a clique whose object is to get over the law as it is now; whose object is to evade subscribing and becoming responsible for the stock they might subscribe for, and who come before Parliament and ask Parliament to do something they dare not ask the Governor to do, because there would be no authority for it. Mr. Chairman, I feel that, notwithstanding the interests of Montreal, notwithstanding the interests of the other gentlemen who are interested in this road, I feel that this House would be stultifying itself, and that the committee would be stultifying itself, if it allowed this matter to pass without a protest on the part of hon. members. If the effect of this legislation is to depreciate if not entirely destroy the security or the property of this man Williams, I care not who may be interested, I, at all events, shall protest against it by my voice and by my vote. It seems to me, Sir, that there cannot be two sides to this question. It seems to me that this is a device on the part of certain individuals to get for themselves what they are not entitled to, and the consequence of which will be the injury of some other person whose rights we are bound to protect. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I say again that I do think that the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Gillies) should be adopted, the facts being that those who are promoting this Bill do not want this capital for construction, because, if they honestly wanted capital for construction, instead of a million dollars it would be two or three million dollars. The object is apparent to anybody, who gives it any attention, that it is to get rid of the law as we have it at present, and to enable them to do what the statutes of this country do not permit, namely, to increase that capital stock to such an extent as to submerge a man who probably holds all that he is worth in the world in it, and thus ruin him. I cannot believe that this House will approve of the action of the committee in revoking their decision of the day before in this matter. I do not believe that this House will approve of it. At all events, I feel that I shall have discharged my duty by opposing it, and giving the House what information I have upon the subject.

Amendment agreed to : yeas, 69 ; nays, 59.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). Mr. Chairman, before you proceed any further with the Bill I will take a little off the work of the committee. I ask permission to drop the Bill, and I ask also that a report be made for a remittance of the deposit. We have a local charter which enables us to increase the capital from $500,000 to $1,000,000 by a simple resolution of the board, and I think we can get along with that.

Mr. LISTER. I doubt whether the hon. gentleman has a right to withdraw the Bill.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). Do you want to force it on us if we do not want it ?

An hon. MEMBER. The time for private Bills has expired.

Committee rose.

CANADIAN CATTLE TRADE.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock I had concluded that branch of the case which I am endeavouring to present to the House by trying to make perfectly clear the terms upon which the Imperial Government granted its consent to the transit of American cattle through Canadian territory. Now, I propose to proceed to give some evidence to the House to show that the representations made to the Privy Council in England have not been lived up to by the Canadian Government. The first document I read is a letter from the Deputy Minister of Agriculture to Dr. Wright, veterinary surgeon at Detroit, declaring the terms upon which he was appointed, and setting forth his duties. This letter is dated the 27th of April, 1880. After saying that Dr. Wright has been recommended for the position by Mr. Patterson, M.P., the Deputy Minister goes on :

Your duties will be to inspect such cattle—

That is, cattle arriving at the port of Windsor for transit in bond through Canada to Fort Erie and Suspension Bridge—when unloaded in the yard of the Great Western Railway Company at Detroit.

You will observe there the original instructions setting forth the department's understanding of the duties of the officer in question, wherein it is made clear that the inspection must take place, the cattle being unloaded. Well, Sir, the inspection took place at first in daylight, and I propose to prove that sanction was given by the Government to the alleged inspection taking place at night, and it will be for the House and the country to determine whether any such inspection could be of any practical utility. I therefore now read a letter, dated the 2nd of May, 1882, from the Deputy Minister of Agriculture to Professor Smith, the head veterinary surgeon employed by the Government :

I enclose you herewith confidentially a letter of Mr. J. C. Patterson, M. P., together with enclosure of a letter from Mr. Kingsmill to him, which you will please read confidentially and afterwards return to me as soon as convenient. It is desired to get a confidential report from you on the request, and the point to ascertain is whether the night inspection requested could with safety be performed. I may tell you further that such night inspection is made by Westell at Sarnia.

Westell being, I may say, a Government inspector in connection with this trans-Canadian trade at the port of Sarnia—

As Westell told me with his own lips, he did, and that he found it satisfactory, especially in the present state of things. No action has yet been taken either to stop Westell or to give instructions at Windsor to do the same thing. It is the strong desire of Minister not to take any step which would prove to be a hindrance to trade, but he does not desire to run the risk of any unnecessary danger.

I am now simply proving the departmental responsibility for the night inspection, which every person must know must have been a perfect farce. On the 10th of May, 1882, Mr. Lowe, the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, writes to Mr. Stiff, of the Great Western Railway Company, Hamilton, as follows :—

In reference to that subject of allowing the inspection of cattle after dark, I write to you one line confidentially to say that Professor A. Smith, whom we have appointed our General Superintendent for Ontario, thinks that in the present circumstances this may be safely done. Professor Smith has therefore been written to request that the necessary steps may be taken to allow such inspection to take place.

Again, Mr. Lowe writes to Mr. Smith on the 10th of May, 1882, after some immaterial remarks, as follows :—

I submitted your letter of the 5th instant for the consideration of the Minister and he concurs in your views.

It is better, therefore, at once to take the necessary steps to let the G. W. R. Co. have their cattle inspected at night in the same way as at Point Edward so long as you consider this safe. Of course you will give necessary directions to ensure safety.

Then Mr. Lowe writes to Mr. Hickson, of the Grand Trunk Railway, on the 8th of January, 1883, as follows :—

The agreement as you are aware, was that the Department of Agriculture should appoint and be responsible for the sufficiency of these inspectors for the duties assigned to them. But you and Mr. Broughton, of the Great Western, agreed with the Minister of Agriculture that you should pay the salaries of these officers if the department appointed them, in order to have put into immediate effect a reluctantly granted permission by the imperial authorities to sanction the transit referred to. It happened that under the working of this arrangement some of your officers agreed with and induced Mr. Westell, V.S., the inspector at Point Edward, to work on Sundays and at nights by giving him an increase of salary in order to facilitate the despatch of trains. We, in the circumstance, certified the monthly accounts at the rate agreed, saying we have no objection to his working on Sunday, and holidays if he desired, but we gave no official sanction to the night work. We did, however, resolve not to take any notice of it as long as we knew there was no disease, retaining the position of being able to prevent it if any disease should come, for the reason that we were not satisfied of the efficiency of any possible inspection in the night.

The department were sanctioning a system of inspection, although not satisfied at the time with the efficacy of any system of inspection in the night. He goes on to say :

Mr. Broughton, however, instead of putting into practice the somewhat adroit action of your people kept writing to the department to ask us to give him permission to have inspections done at night. The only course open to us was to uniformly tell him it was impossible, nor could we especially in view of the representations which I had personally made to Mr. Peel and Prof. Brown at the office of the Privy Council in Whitehall, afford him any indication as to how he might get out of his difficulty. Eventually, however, and very recently he discovered the mode, and again, not with a view of avoiding departmental responsibility, but keeping ourselves free to act if required to do so, we referred the matter to Dr. Smith, of Toronto, our General Veterinary Inspector in Ontario, and he gave the required permission. With this explanation, which I could not make shorter to make it clear, I leave you to act as you think it well in relation to Mr. Wright's demand to be paid the same as Mr. Westell for the same kind of service. I will certify the larger amount if you desire it under the arrangement, but I cannot ask you to give it as a payment for night service, nor do anything more than to be simply officially blind to the fact of such service.

In that letter the department itself was satisfied that grave risks were being incurred ; and so it winked at the inspection, saying that instead of giving it sanction, the parties in the employ of the Government shall be officially blind. And as an illustration of the amount of work that had to be done, I just invite the attention of the committee to the absolute impossibility of any system of inspection such as this being in compliance with the understanding given to the Privy Council. At the commencement of this work, the Government ordered the inspection to take place after the cars were unloaded, in order, of course, that each animal might be overhauled and examined ; but now we find the inspection taking place at night. It appears from the figures I have read that the Grand Trunk and Great Western Railway carried 5,095 cars of stock, and that the Canada Southern carried 6,699 carloads. Of these 5,095 cars of stock carried by the Grand Trunk Railway and Great Western, I suppose if half of them came by Detroit, the veterinary surgeon there would have to inspect 2,500 carloads, representing probably 20 head to a car, or 45,000 or 50,000 head. And that inspection was to be done effectively in the dark, or at any rate at night. Well, the veterinary surgeon in charge saw the impropriety of this inspection going on without proper light, and he wrote this letter, dated 11th October, 1883, to the Minister himself :

When Professor Smith was here, last spring, he pointed out to the Grand Trunk Railway authorities the necessity of having proper lights provided for the inspection of stock at night. I have frequently spoken to the proper authorities to have his directions carried out in regard to the lights, but they intimate that they did not intend to put up the lights as he directed. Under the circumstances, I thought it my duty to say that unless the electric lights are provided, it will be impossible for me to satisfactorily carry out the regulations for the inspection of United States cattle intended for transport through Canada.

That letter was not acted upon, and Mr. H. B. Small, secretary of the Agriculture Department, wrote to Professor Smith, on the 15th October, as follows :—

I am to enclose you herewith a copy of a letter of the 11th instant from Mr. J. B. Wright, cattle inspector, Windsor, asking that lights be provided at night for cattle inspection purposes. I am to request that you will report to this department your views on the subject, and state if you deem it advisable that his request be carried out.

On the 14th of November, the inspector wrote to the Minister as follows :—

I respectfully beg leave to again call your attention to the necessity of directing that proper lights be provided for the inspection of United States cattle intended for transit through Canada. It is utterly impossible to make so satisfactory inspection as to ensure the interest against the danger the regulations are intended to protect. At best, inspection by artificial lights would afford but a minimum safety, and I question whether, under the circumstances, the night inspection should be continued.

Then, Sir, the Department of Agriculture wrote to Mr. Wainwright, and after referring to certain demands made by the inspector, Dr. Wright, the Deputy Minister goes on to say :

The case itself is not free from certain difficulties on the ground that inspection by night is open to question, and particularly in view of the fact that it is not practised in England. There is nothing in our agreement with the English authorities on this point, beyond the undertaking to make an effective inspection, and the probability of their understanding that this should not be done by artificial light. Against this view, we have the opinion of Professor Smith that the night inspection, as practised, may take place without danger, and it was on this ground and on Professor Smith's opinion that the original restriction made by the department was relaxed.

There is confirmatory proof that the department sanctioned night inspection.

There is the further point that the sanction of the Imperial authorities to this transit arrangement was given with great reluctance, and I do not think it is yet regarded with any favour.

Again the department write to Mr. Smith, in March, 1884, as follows :—

In addition to the official letter which I wrote you to-day, I may tell you privately that I heard from an M.P. that the inspection at Windsor and Amherstburg is quite pro forma. In fact my informant told me that the inspectors had given signed blanks to the railway company to send their cattle along.

I call your attention, Sir, to this statement, that on the 24th March, 1884, the department informed their veterinary surgeon that the inspectors were using blank certificates of inspection. Now, in view of that notice, what should the Government have done? They should have taken action to inquire or suspend, or dismiss, from the service all those found guilty. The very mildest treatment that could have been extended to any one guilty of furnishing blank certificates, after he had assumed the responsible position of inspector, would have been to have had an immediate inquiry into the charge, and if any one were found guilty to dismiss him as unworthy of trust. Not only did the Government not do that, but they actually kept in the service of the Government for seven years afterwards one of the inspectors of whom they had that notice. Mr. Lowe wrote on the 29th March to Mr. Smith as follows :—

I wrote to you some time ago to ask your opinion respecting the continued importation of cattle, in transit from the western states, in view of the reported existence of foot and mouth disease in the west, and I also asked whether you considered it advisable or safe to continue night inspection.

Surely this is accumulative evidence to show that the department sanctioned night inspection. On the 31st March, 1884, Mr. Lowe wrote again to Mr. Smith, as follows :—

I have another letter from an M. P., who, however, does not wish me to give his name, to say that he is aware that the inspection at Detroit of the cattle passing in transit is of the most perfunctory and ineffective kind. His statement is of such a nature that it should be seen to.

No doubt it was a friend of the Government, then a member of this House, who gave that notice, and still no action was taken. On the 2nd of April the Department of Agriculture wrote to Mr. Smith again :

You do not write to me with reference to the question of night inspection. Of course if there is foot and mouth disease in the western states, this could not be thought of, and I may say to you that Dr. McEachran's opinion is against it. There is certainly the question of detaining a train at night, which would mean so much longer confinement of the animals. When Mr. Pope left, he told me to write you at once with reference to the night inspection, with the view of discontinuing it, but this was on the understanding that foot and mouth disease actually existed in the United States. Please write your views :—

Thus there were two experts opposed to night inspection, and yet the department chose to take all chances. There was foot and mouth disease in the western states, and Dr. McEachran was sent to investigate. On the 12th April, 1884, Mr. Lowe wrote to Mr. Smith as follows :—

Mr. McEachran is back and he informs me that it is undoubtedly true that foot and mouth disease prevails in Kansas, Missouri, Iowa and Illinois in an aggravated form. He has reason for not wishing this fact to be made public immediately, he having an understanding with some of the authorities of the United States, to let them make their own announcement. But I think it better to at once inform you in order that you may take such action as you think best with respect to the inspection. McEachran thinks the night inspection should be stopped at once. Mr. Pope also held this view when he went away on the reports that reached him in the newspapers of the existence of foot and mouth disease in the west. You will, of course, take such immediate steps as are necessary for safety. Write me your views.

On the 12th of April :

I was indeed sorry to read your letter of yesterday re foot and mouth disease. I considered it important to communicate the fact to Mr. Hickson in view of his large interest and to A. Smith, of Toronto, with a caution as to the inspection. But to both confidentially as you requested.

We must not fool with this matter and I shall wait with interest your report.

Then Mr. Lowe writes to Mr. Smith as follows :—

You will receive with this an official letter containing a departmental order not to allow the night inspection of cattle. And this, of course, will remain until you are further advised or until the existence of foot and mouth disease in the western states is absolutely cleared. There is also a paragraph in the official letter referring to the strictness of the inspection and this is put in in view of the information which reached the department during this season of the fact that Dr. Wright was performing his duty in a perfunctory manner and actually, in some cases, giving signed blanks to be filled up. I do not report this to you officially as my informant for personal reasons did not desire me to use his name, but merely for the purpose of calling your attention to the allegations. Believe me, &c.,

Yours truly,

(Signed) JOHN LOWE.

On the 23rd April, 1884, the Department of Agriculture have notice that their official at Detroit is issuing blank certificates of inspection, and, instead of inquiry and, if found guilty, dismissing, there is simply a sort of comment made upon the fact in a letter to Mr. Smith at Toronto expressing the hope that he will see that Dr. Wright in Detroit discharges his duty. On the 25rd of April, 1884, Mr. Lowe writes officially to Mr. Smith as follows :—

I have an instruction from the Minister of Agriculture to inform you that in view of the reports that have been received from the western states relating to the presence of foot and mouth disease, it is considered advisable to suspend the night inspection.

And he gives the necessary orders to that effect. Then on the 23rd April, Mr. Lowe writes to the manager of the Grand Trunk Railway to somewhat the same effect :

MY DEAR SIR,—In view of the fact of the existence of foot and mouth disease in the western states, it has been considered necessary to give orders not to continue the inspection at night of stock.

In the absence of taking the more extreme step of cancelling the regulations which permit the transit, it will occur to you that it is necessary for us to cause a strict carrying out of the rules of inspection.

The step that is now found necessary to take will probably prove less inconvenient than it would have been during the shorter days of winter.

Mr. MULOCK.

If therefore you could give such directions as would ensure the arrival of trains within the hours of daylight it would be an advantage.

Then on the 6th of September, Mr. Lowe writes Mr. Hickson. Now, here I call attention to another branch of the case. As early as the 6th of September, 1884, the Government learn of the existence of pleuro-pneumonia in the United States :

The undoubted existence of pleuro-pneumonia now in Illinois, has imported a new fact into our relations with the Imperial Privy Council. It is desired not to injure this traffic any more than possible, but I am sure that a very strict observance of the regulations agreed upon will be the single condition of the continuance of the traffic ; if, indeed, the Imperial Privy Council will now agree to this.

Now, Sir, I will just say in passing that the knowledge that pleuro-pneumonia was prevalent in the United States was in the possession of the Government as early as 1884. Yet, with this knowledge in their possession, they allowed, year after year, thousands of cattle to be imported from the North-western States in Manitoba and the North-west and took no steps apparently to deal with that trade until warnings were sent to them by the Imperial Government as I will show you later on. Mr. Lowe writes to Mr. Hickson an official letter on the same date, 6th September, 1884, as follows :—

I am to inform you that authentic information has reached this department to the effect that the disease of pleuro-pneumonia prevails in the State of Illinois. This serious fact has, of course, an important bearing upon the arrangement respecting the transit of neat cattle by your railroad system from western to eastern points in the United States.

As a present and immediate step it is desired that the regulations which were agreed upon in 1880 should be with the greatest strictness carried out, and special instructions given to all those of your conductors who are also named officers of this department for the purpose of acting as guardians, to intensify as much as possible their observance of the duties under the printed regulations referred to.

Perhaps you will have the goodness to furnish to the department a list of the names of those of your conductors who are placed in charge of cattle trains.

Now, there, Mr. Speaker, you have the first intimation from the department—although I may say the fact is beyond controversy—that the guardians appointed by the Government to take charge of these trains were to be the conductors themselves, and on this point, if I could lay my hands on it, I could read the regulation of 1880 to that effect. I stated, Mr. Speaker, that at least one officer has been suspended for dereliction of duty and afterwards reinstated. I prove that by the following letter of the 21st of August, 1885, from J. Lowe to J. Hickson :—

I have to inform you that Mr. Westall, V.S., Inspector at Point Edward of cattle in transit through Canada from west to east by your trains, who was suspended for inattention to duty will be reinstated on the 1st prox.

That is the way an unfaithful servant was treated. Well, Sir, in the year 1885, the inspection by night was resumed, under the authority of a letter from Mr. Smith to Mr. Lowe. He says in this letter which is dated the 28th August, 1885 :

I telegraphed you this A.M. that inspection may go on as formerly until further notice.

Then Mr. Wainwright telegraphed Mr. Lowe on the 3rd September, 1885 :

Understood from your message that Dr. Wright had received proper instructions. We had a serious detention during last night. Is this to continue? If so it will simply ruin the business through Canada.

On the 4th September, 1885, Mr. Lowe telegraphs Mr. Smith :

Wainwright, Grand Trunk Railway Co. telegraphed Dr. Wright again caused serious detention last night to extent of ruining this traffic in Canada if continued. Minister thinks you should give prompt order.

(Signed) J. LOWE.

On the 4th September he telegraphed to Mr. Wainwright :

Have telegraphed Prof. Smith sense of your notice this morning. He will see to the matter.

Just here I come to one of the departmental regulations, paragraph 12 of which I may read. It is one of the official regulations concerning the transportation of American cattle through Canada :

The company to furnish the Department of Agriculture with the names of the requisite number of persons, for the approval of the Minister of Agriculture, who shall act under his instructions as guardians of the cattle trains in transit from frontier to frontier, the company to pay the salary of the said guardians.

That is the way it led off, that the company is to send in the names of its guardians. Then as to the treatment of cattle in transit through Canada, the regulation provides :

The litter and droppings from the cattle in transit to Buffalo, to be carried across the frontier, and sufficient straw, saw-dust or other material to absorb the droppings, shall be carried with each car in all cases.

The object of this was, as I said some time ago, that no possible contagion might arise from anything that was left in the cars after the cattle had been unloaded in the States, and these cars were to be inspected and disinfected before returning to Canada. I will now read a letter from Mr. Slater, the Government inspector stationed at St. Thomas, to the Department of Agriculture, dated December 8, 1894 :

I beg leave to report that the G.T.R. Co. are hauling back empty live stock cars before the said cars have been cleaned or disinfected, contrary to the restrictions in force by the Order in Council, cited as the Health of Animals Act, part 3, Transit of Animals in Bond.

That may appear an immaterial departure from the regulations, but any person will see that one of the main grounds on which the Government obtained the permit of the Imperial Government, was that this feature in connection with the trade, would be effectively guarded. On the 10th January, 1887, Mr. Hickson writes to Mr. Lowe explaining why the cleansing of the cars did not take place, and it is certainly a very mild explanation :

With further reference to your letter of 16th December, I beg to say that I have made full inquiry into the subject of your communication, and I learn that there have hitherto been grounds for complaint in respect of the cleaning of cattle cars returning east, but our people say that this was owing principally to the severity of the weather, it being almost impossible to clean these cars thoroughly at a low degree of temperature.

On the 8th December, Mr. Slater reports this neglect, when the temperature was scarcely low enough to warrant that explanation. But nevertheless that neglect of duty was a fair outcome of the action of the Government in failing to have an independent guardian in charge. In the meantime the Imperial Government, with more regard for our own interests than our own Government, had written through Mr. Stanhope as follows to Lord Lansdowne :—

I have the honour to transmit to Your Lordship herewith a copy of a letter from the Council Office enclosing an extract from the 'Mark Lane Express' of the 29th ult., respecting the importation into the North-west Territories of cattle from the United States. I have to request that you will communicate these papers to your Government, and request them to supply the information desired by the Lords of the Council, as to the precautions taken in Canada, to guard against the introduction into the Dominion of pleuro-pneumonia, which is alleged to exist in some of the western states.

I have, etc.,

(Sgd). EDWARD STANHOPE.

The enclosure was a letter from Mr. C. L. Peel, secretary of the Privy Council, as follows :—

I am directed by the Lords of the Council to transmit the accompanying extract from the 'Mark Lane Express' of the 29th November last, and to request that you will have the goodness to move Mr. Stanhope to cause it to be forwarded to Government of the Dominion of Canada, and that that Government may be asked whether the statement therein contained is correct, and if so, that their Lordships may be informed as early as convenient that precautions are being taken to guard against the introduction into the Dominion of pleuro-pneumonia, which is alleged to exist in some of the western states.

The enclosure is an extract from the 'Mark Lane Express,' referring to the importation of United States cattle into the North-west. Again, on the 13th January, 1887, Mr. Stanhope, on behalf of the Imperial Government, directs another communication to Lord Lansdowne :

With reference to previous correspondence respecting the transit of United States cattle through Canada, I have the honour to transmit to you a copy of a further letter on the subject from the Council Office, and to request that the matter may receive the early attention of your Lordship's Government.

The copy of the further letter is as follows :—

In reference to previous correspondence on the subject of the transit of the United States cattle through Canada en route to United States ports, and to the untrucking of cattle in Canada for the purpose of feeding and watering, and also to the importation of cattle from the Western States of America, into Canada after a certain period of quarantine, I am directed to request that you will call the attention of the Canadian Government to the serious and important change in the present sanitary condition of stock in the United States as compared with that which was believed to exist at the time when the Privy Council sanctioned the importation and transit above referred to.

The recent outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia in Chicago and uncertainty as to the extent to which the disease may have spread in the western states, are circumstances which induce their Lordships to urge upon the Canadian Government the immediate importance of re-considering the whole of the present regulations relating to the importation and transit of cattle from the United States, on the strength of which animals from Canada are now admitted into the United Kingdom without being subject to slaughter or quarantine.

I am to add that their Lordships are advised that pleuro-pneumonia is the most insidious of all cattle diseases, and that it is impossible by any precautionary measures of quarantine or inspection to entirely obviate the risk of introducing it when cattle are imported from a country in which it exists.

Now, that letter asks the immediate attention of the Canadian Government to this question, for the reason that they had learned of the importation of considerable quantities of United States cattle that had passed through the pleuro-pneumonia-affected districts in the North-west. And, Sir, what do you think was the answer of the Canadian Government to that most considerate and polite request, which ought to have been taken at first as a most effective warning? Why, Sir, instead of it being dealt with immediately, it was not dealt with until the following September. It was referred to the Minister of Agriculture, the then Hon. Mr. Carling, and instead of inviting the Imperial Government to make suggestions wherein he might satisfy them, Mr. Carling, with the full knowledge of what was going on, allowed the importation of cattle to continue during that year. During the different years which I shall name there were imported the following numbers of cattle into the North-west Territories and Manitoba :

1881	Manitoba.....	2,310
1882	"	5,130
1883	"	1,480
1884	For ranching purposes...	10,847
1885	" "	2,810
1886	" "	10,510
1887	" "	13,521

Mr. IVES. Do you mean that those cattle imported into the North-west Territories and Manitoba were imported from the state of Illinois ?

Mr. MULOCK. There was no quarantine between one state and another. I say that pleuro-pneumonia existed in the western states, and Illinois is one of them. It is a disease that spreads by communication. The cattle came from a country where pleuro-pneumonia existed, and I doubt if there were any quarantine regulations confining cattle to their respective states, and I say that during the years following the numbers of cattle stated were imported from the United States—from what parts I do not intend to say—at all events from the western states, for no doubt they were driven over the boundary from those states. No doubt the hon. gentleman will know whether pleuro-pneumonia existed in Texas or not.

Mr. IVES. I admit that I know as much of the subject as you do.

Mr. MULOCK. Then that will enable the hon. gentleman to deal with it. The following cattle were imported duty free into the North-west Territories and Manitoba :—

		Total, Man. & N.W.T.
1881	North-west Ter	653 2,963
1882	"	2,588 7,718
1884	As settlers effects..	593 11,466
1885	" ..	609 3,419
1886	" ..	216 10,726
1887	" ..	37 13,558

In other words, during the periods when pleuro-pneumonia was known by this Government and by the Imperial Government to prevail in the western states, about 40,000 head of cattle were imported into our country, and during part of that time there were not the first details of quarantine adopted to guard against the introduction of the disease. I cannot prove that point more effectively than by reading from a document issued by the Department of Agriculture. It is entitled "Precis: Order in Council Regarding Quarantine Cattle Regulations." On page 3, I find the following :—

The Order in Council of September 1884, established cattle quarantine in Manitoba and the North-west Territories.

In parenthesis is the following memorandum :—

This order contained the first restriction of the free importation of cattle from the United States into Manitoba and the North-west Territories. Before its date there was as regards quarantine untrammelled importation.

I cite that admission as showing one of the gross violations of the compact entered into with the Imperial Government by the Canadian Government in order to obtain its consent. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that at the commencement of my remarks I stated one of the conditions on which permission to carry on this trade was granted, namely : that except in regard to cattle admitted to be carried under the regulations approved of by the Imperial Government, there was to be no importation of cattle from the United States. But not only was that express stipulation disregarded, but for nearly four years there was not the first attempt made to inspect cattle or quarantine them, or interfere in the slightest degree with free importation. I departed for a moment from the correspondence to say that although the correspondence of the Imperial authorities warning Canada reached Ottawa in December, 1886, instead of the Government having at once taken effective measures to satisfy the Imperial authorities, they allowed the traffic to continue, and during 1886-87 the importation of cattle into the North-west Territories, contrary to the arrangement, exceeded in volume the trade of any previous year. But the Government themselves knew that they were approaching a very critical condition, for on 30th April, 1887, the Deputy Minister of Agriculture wrote to Mr. Hickson as follows :—

(Private and confidential.)

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, 30th April, 1887.

MY DEAR SIR,—I think it well to tell you as a piece of information which I think you should know, we have received two despatches from the Imperial Government pointing out to us the fact of the existence of pleuro-pneumonia in the Western States, and calling our attention to the imprudence of allowing transit of American cattle through Canada. We cannot, of course, be blind to the meaning of those notifications, but they have not gone so far as to say that they will place us on the schedule list if we do not discontinue our present arrangements. I may say to you further, that we are quite aware of the kind of risks incurred in relation to the danger of introducing the disease I have named, among the herds of Canada, which, if it should happen, would mean a disaster implying the loss of many millions and also the schedule list for a sequel, which also means a difference of 1d. sterling or 2cts. a lb. live weight on all the cattle we ship. We are still of opinion, after the most careful consideration, that the regulations as respects such transit now in force are sufficient protection, the only weakness being a possible negligence of some railway official in not observing his rules, and thus opening the door to the admission of the most insidious of all diseases. I have told Mr. Pope and Mr. Carling, Ministers, who take a special interest in this question, that we have the most absolute assurances from you of the rigorous observance of the regulations by officers and employees of your company ; and I feel sure that a communication of the facts in this letter to you will be of a nature to move you to increase, if possible, the rigour of the surveillance.

Believe me, etc.,

Yours truly,

J. LOWE.

J. HICKSON, Esq.,

G. T. R. Co., Montreal, Que.

Where was the Government guardian at this time ? How could negligence have occurred if the Government guardian, the officer whom the Canadian Government agreed to appoint and who was to be an independent officer, was discharging his duty ? Where was he ? He was but on paper. He was the paid servant of the railway company, he was the railway conductor, he was a man who depended upon the railway company. The people were unrepresented. I stated, Mr. Speaker, that this Government did not deal with the warnings given to them in December, 1886, until the September following, and let us see how did they then deal with them. The report of the Minister of Agriculture answers that question. The despatches of the Privy Council having been referred to him by the Canadian Government, Mr. Carling reports :

(Extracts from Report of the Minister of Agriculture.)

The undersigned has the honour to re-report on the accompanying references to him :

Despatch No. 514 G. Privy Council Papers.

“ 571 “ “

As respects a question in the letter of Mr. C. L. Peel covering an extract from a newspaper, The Mark Lane Express, dated the 29th November last, it is true that a considerable number of cattle from ranches in the United States Territories were admitted to the Canadian ranches during last year, under a special arrangement which has, however, been discontinued as has also the importation referred to.

As respects the remarks in the letter of Mr. Peel of 15th January last, inclosed in the despatch of Mr. Stanhope, herewith on the subject of transit of United States cattle, above referred and imported into Canada from the United States, the undersigned is of opinion upon careful consideration of all the facts and circumstances, that the Canadian Quarantine Regulations, as well as those having relation to transit, as those relating to importation are sufficient for protection of Canadian cattle from the danger of the admission of the disease of pleuro-pneumonia.

The undersigned respectfully recommends that His Excellency the Governor General be moved to convey the substance of the information in this report, to Mr. Stanhope ; in answer to his despatches referred.

The whole respectfully submitted,

(Sgd.) JOHN CARLING,

Minister of Agriculture.

Dept. of Agriculture,

Ottawa, Ont., 1st September, 1887.

That is the way they proceeded to satisfy the Imperial Government, who had a right to be consulted. I would venture to suggest that instead of terminating such a friendly communication by telling the Imperial Government that they were in error, that the wise way for the Canadian Government to do would be to continue negotiations and to promise that they would carry out the suggestions of the Imperial Government, if they had any to offer. Well, Sir, on the 7th December, 1887, Mr. Lowe writes Mr. Wainwright, of the Grand Trunk Railway, as follows :—

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
7th December, 1887.

DEAR SIR,—As requested in the correspondence forwarded by you to the Minister of Agriculture relative to the inspection of cattle arriving during the night on the western frontier, I have to inform you that an order has been sent to Prof. Andrew Smith, the chief veterinary inspector of this department for Ontario, instructing him to direct all the veterinary inspectors at the Ports of Windsor, Amherstburg and Sarnia not to make any detention of cattle at whatever hour arriving, but on the contrary at once to inspect them as was the case previous to the suspension of the practice by the departmental letter dated April, 1884.

Believe me, etc.,
Yours truly,
J. LOWE.

W. WAINWRIGHT, Esq.,
Grand Trunk Railway Co.,
Montreal.

After these warnings, after the Imperial Government had pointed out the prevalence of this disease, the Canadian Government with almost crass madness goes out of its way almost, in order to comply with the request of a railway company to resume this farce of inspecting cattle at night. On 9th December, Mr. Wainwright writes to Mr. Lowe :

MONTREAL, Dec. 9th, 1887.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 7th inst., in regard to inspection of cattle at frontier points, and I am very much obliged for the action that has been taken in the matter.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) W. WAINWRIGHT,
Asst. Manager.

JNO. LOWE, Esq.,
Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa, Ont.

This inspection goes on all the time at night or day whenever the cattle arrive, and on 7th of February, 1890, Mr. Lowe writes to Mr. Wainwright as follows :—

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OTTAWA, 7th February, 1890.

DEAR MR. WAINWRIGHT,—I think it well to say to you that we have received an intimation from our Veterinary Officers that the regulations governing the transport of cattle in relation to the cleaning and disinfection of return cars, are not enforced. It is alleged that cars are usually returned unclean and without disinfection, and further, the cars employed in carrying United States cattle are often to be found at way stations in Ontario, although they are marked with a large "V."

Mr. MULOCK.

There is reason at the present time for increased stringency rather than any relaxation. It may become necessary, in order to prevent Canada from being placed on the schedule list in the United Kingdom, to prohibit altogether for a time, the importation of cattle into Canada. The Department is however of the opinion that the transit traffic may be allowed, if the regulations in relation to it are strictly enforced, but if they are not, and this privilege should be objected to by the Imperial authorities the railway companies would have themselves to blame if they lost the transit privilege.

Believe me, etc.,
Yours truly,
J. LOWE.

W. WAINWRIGHT, Esq.,
Assistant Manager G.T.R. Co.,
Montreal, P.Q.

There, Sir, the department admits that the regulation about cleansing the cars, so far as they are advised, is not being lived up to ; that these cars were being distributed throughout the country. We all know what railway companies will do if they require a car for a particular purpose, and there is one standing near by ; no matter who owns it, or what the regulations are connected with it, the station agent will immediately press it into service. If any of those cars that should have been set apart exclusively for this trade were left about the country, you may be perfectly sure that Canadian cattle were loaded upon them, and probably shipped to England. That could not have been the case if the regulation to which the Privy Council attached so much importance had been carried out. If the Government had appointed a competent officer he would have seen that these cars had come straight back from Buffalo, cleansed and disinfected, and incapable of harm, even if they should happen to be used for Canadian cattle. Well, Sir, on 17th February, 1890, Mr. Andrew Smith, the veterinary professor, visited Detroit. You remember that in 1884 the department had knowledge that Dr. Wright was issuing blank certificates of inspection, and Mr. Smith, happening to be in Detroit, makes a discovery, and he writes to the department as follows :—

SIR,—At the offices of the Detroit and Milwaukee road I got several blank forms signed by Mr. Wright, who made no secret of it, and stated that it was done to facilitate traffic, and whilst admitting that it was wrong to sign any blank forms he affirms that inspection was performed. His explanation is, that whilst inspecting at the Wabash yard there were also cars at the Detroit and Milwaukee road ; the forms were filled in ; the cattle sent over to Windsor, and he went direct from the Wabash yard to Windsor and made his inspection there.

I called upon Mr. McQueen, the agent of the Detroit and Milwaukee road, and asked him how he came to allow blank forms to be signed. I requested Mr. McQueen to give me a written explanation, which he has promised to do, and so soon as I receive it I will forward to you.

As to the removal of animals from the cars and inspecting in that manner, it would almost put a stop to traffic, and as Mr. Lowe is aware, some years ago it was decided to inspect cattle in the cars, and so far this method has been successful.

I have requested Dr. Wright to send me what explanation he has to make. I have written Mr. Lowe inclosing a letter of Dec. 31, 1883.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

ANDREW SMITH.

To the Hon. JOHN CARLING,
Minister of Agriculture,
Ottawa, Ont.

There, Sir, the department sanctioned the inspection of cattle, as they called it, by wholesale in the cars. Instead of the animals being unloaded before entering Canada, and inspected individually, the department sanctioned the inspection of them by the carload. And this, too, after the knowledge of the prevalence of pleuropneumonia. On February 18, 1890, Mr. Wright, the veterinary surgeon, writes to Mr. Smith, as follows:—

Frequently stock trains which do not stop at the yards, arrive, and are ready to be ferried over from each point at the same time, as it takes about half an hour to go from one point to another one boat will have to wait that time.

He goes on to explain in his own way why he issued these blank certificates, and he appears to justify it. He says he was obliged to wait on trains that landed cattle at two different points, as he was instructed by the department to facilitate traffic, he deemed it his duty to allow cars to cross the lines without inspection, and he tried to overtake them, and I presume he contends that he did overtake them before they went into the interior. On the 1st of March, 1890, Mr. Lowe writes to Mr. Wainwright in regard to the appointment of conductors as guardians, and I will read a passage of his letter to the House:

I send to you as requested by your letter of the 30th ult., one dozen of forms appointing your conductors in charge of trains carrying United States cattle in transit from west to east, from one United States port to another—quasi officers of this department. I also return you the copy of the form you inclosed as requested. Kindly send to the department the names of those conductors to whom you addressed this form constituting a special appointment for the purpose stated.

There you have the culmination of this negligence, the Government having in the first place gone through the form of inquiring the names of the persons to be appointed, and ultimately sending out the blanks to the railway company to be filled up with the names of the persons the company chose, the Government exercising no supervision as to the fitness of those persons. In fact, the whole protectorate over this trade was abandoned by the Government in every respect, except in form. I will now read a letter of the 17th of April, 1890, from Mr. Lowe to Mr. Wainwright:

Adverting to a conversation I had recently with you in the department on the subject of the regulations for the transit of cattle by your trains, from west to east, I think it well to say to you that information continues to reach the department to the effect that the regulations which you established are not by any means being carried out, and this is in the face of the fact of the increasing stringency of the Imperial regulations and the distrust with which the transit arrangement has always been regarded.

How came it to be possible that there was continued laxity in the carrying out of these regulations, and at a critical time, when the regulations in England were becoming more stringent? The explanation is that the Government failed to require their representatives to see that they were being carried out. This letter goes on:

If you cause an examination to be made at Lyn you will find that that station is not by any means kept up to the agreement; on the contrary, the second outer fence, which was built on the stipulation to take a cordon of vacant ground around the inner board fence of the resting station for cattle is entirely dilapidated and in many places broken down, the object of this essential division being thus entirely defeated.

It was a part of the regulations to which you agreed that the manure and offal made within the inclosure should be removed and burned or otherwise destroyed on the spot. The department is informed that such manure is now used for fertilizing the neighbouring fields and it appears to be a fact that anthrax is especially and particularly prevalent in the locality.

And remember, Sir, that the Imperial authorities sanctioned this arrangement on the distinct representation made at the time that the fencing would be maintained so as to exclude all intercourse with the outside world, and that the offal would be effectually destroyed. On this point the county council of York happened to carry and to communicate to the department a resolution. Even they were more vigilant than the department. Mr. Lowe goes on to say:

The department was furnished a little while ago with a printed newspaper report, from Toronto, of the York county council in which a resolution was passed in the following terms:—

That, in the opinion of this council, it would be very injurious to the farmers of Canada for the Dominion Government to allow American cattle to pass over our Canadian lines for exportation to the old country; and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Dominion Government.

The mover of the resolution is said to have said in support of it, that, American cattle are being sent to the old country in the same cars and ships that Canadian cattle are sent in, it being a well known fact that there are many contagious diseases existing among American cattle.

There may have been inaccuracy in this statement, but it appeared to have been received by the Council as correct, and the resolution was passed by a large majority.

He concludes his letter by saying :

I am sure that if it be of any interest to your railway to continue these transit arrangements, very different attention will have to be bestowed on the strict carrying out of the agreed on regulations.

On the day that Mr. Lowe wrote that letter the Minister had knowledge that these regulations were not being lived up to. Then we come down to January, 1890, and on the 24th of that month Mr. Lowe writes, pointing out one weak spot. It appears that payments were being made by the railway company directly to the inspectors—of course, to their own officers, the conductors. Even the form of the inspectors being paid by the Government was departed from, they receiving their money from the railway company, and no doubt largely feeling that they were the officers of the railway company and not of the Government, and thereby, perhaps, often winking at the violations of the Government regulations. Not until the 24th of January, 1891, is that arrangement altered ; and then the railways are called upon to make their contributions for inspection directly to the department, and then the Government would remit the salaries to the inspectors themselves. On the 13th of April, 1891, Mr. Wainwright, of the Grand Trunk, writes to Mr. Lowe, as follows :—

With reference to the subject that we had so many conversations about, of cleaning through live stock cars, the Michigan Central Company and ours have now devised a plan, which I think will meet with favour at your hands, and enable us to perform the service more to your satisfaction. One of the regulations in connection with this business was, that the empty cars were to be cleaned out before being returned to Canada, which has compelled us to have the work done on the American side of the river. It has not, according to your reports, been altogether satisfactorily done, and I have been at work for some time to see what remedy could be applied to meet your wishes.

For eleven years this traffic had been going on, and they had not been able to devise a plan for its necessary protection. I now intend to conclude by reading a letter from Mr. Wright himself. I may say that this Mr. Wright was appointed in 1880 as veterinary inspector for the Government at Windsor ; but within two or three years after his appointment he got into collision with the Government ; and, reading the correspondence, I am free to admit that in one respect Mr. Wright seems to a very large extent to have mistaken his proper position. He was appointed, first of all, to inspect in the day time. When he learned that another inspector was being paid for night inspection, he made a claim for night inspection also. That claim led to friction and to some unreasonable requests on the part of Mr. Wright, and Mr. Wright is charged with attempting to blackmail by threatening to publish an account of the insufficiency of the inspection. I would not controvert that charge if made ; but he was continued in office after the transactions in question. In 1883 there was filed with this department an account by Mr. Wright, showing the perfunctory manner in which the work was being done, and this is the letter which he threatened to give to the press unless his demand for additional pay was complied with. That, of course, was a very improper attitude for him to assume, and I am not, for one moment, defending him in that particular. It does, to a certain extent, take away from the weight of his evidence ; but I must say this, that, if it amounts to anything, this letter, said to have been a blackmailing letter, was submitted to the Government. It had gone through the hands of the railway and had been threshed out before the Minister of Agriculture and his deputy, and all the authorities, yet instead of dismissing him, the Government continued him in their service. When they did finally dismiss him, it was not for cause, but only because they had come to the conclusion that the inspector should reside in Windsor and not in Detroit. It appears that Mr. Wright had followed the profession of medical practitioner in Detroit while acting as inspector for the Dominion Government. During many of these years, he was practising his profession as a physician in Detroit while filling the office of veterinarian to this Government ; and at last he was given the option of residing in Windsor and giving his whole time to this work, or else allowing the department to take his resignation for granted. It does not appear that he was dismissed. The Government wrote to him telling him that his attitude in regard to these demands for money rendered it impossible to continue him in the public service, and they asked him to tender his resignation. He, however, did not do so. This was in February, 1890, and he continued in office until August, 1891. He continued in office all the time from his original appointment in 1880, until August, 1891. Although there had been several collisions between him and the Government, although the Government were made aware that he was issuing blank certificates of inspection, they did not dismiss him for dereliction or neglect of duty or for having violated instructions. Not at all. This information came to the Government in February, 1890, and yet it was not until August, 1891, that they terminated his connection with the public service, and that was done by the following letter from the secretary of the department :

The Minister of Agriculture directs me to acknowledge your letter of 25th ultimo, in reply to the departmental letter to you of June 20th last, on the subject of the reorganization of the cattle inspection service at Windsor, and to say to you that the statement in your letter is not a sufficient answer to the specifications contained in the departmental letter referred to, the receipt of which you have acknowledged. The Minister assumes that the answer in your letter constitutes in fact a non-compliance on your part with the specifications of duties required of you, as contained in the departmental letter referred to.

Therefore, he desires me to state, as a consequence, that your non-compliance with the specifications in such letter is a sufficient reason for not continuing your services as cattle inspector of the department, under the departmental letter to you of 27th April, 1890. The Minister directs me to notify you that your services as cattle inspector of this department will not be continued after the close of the present month.

That month was August. The letter of June 20th, 1891, which contained the specification, on compliance with which he could continue in office, is as follows:—

I am directed by the Minister of Agriculture to inform you that after a careful consideration of the circumstances connected with the inspection service at Windsor of animals passing through Canada from one United States port to another, the following decisions have been arrived at: It is not found to be advisable that a Canadian inspector of American cattle passing through Canada should reside in the city of Detroit and there carry on the practice of the profession of medicine in addition to his duties as veterinary inspector of animals. It is, therefore, decided to make a reorganization of the inspection service, under which all the officers will be required to reside at Windsor and attend daily at an office there to be opened, connected by telephone with the several railway offices.

No salary in the future will be paid by the railway companies, but by this department. It is further decided that a larger amount than $1,200 per year will not be paid for this service.

You will be kind enough to inform the department, on receipt of this letter, whether you are prepared to comply with the conditions stated.

That was of course a clear intimation to him that if he were prepared to comply with these conditions, he would still continue in office. He did not comply, and left the service; and I will now read the letter which he had prepared some years before for the purpose of giving it to the public press, and it is fair to say, in connection with this letter, that after his demands were satisfied, or perhaps before they were satisfied, he wrote a recantation of this letter to Mr. Smith. I presume that Mr. Smith wrote to him that so long as the strained relations existed between him and the Government by reason of his threat to publish his letter, it would be impossible for him to receive the addition to his salary, and accordingly he wrote an unqualified withdrawal of the letter, and expressed his regret for the attitude he had taken. However, that does not get over the fact that the letter might contain the truth, and I now propose to give it to the House for what it may be worth. I have taken all these papers from the Government record, and this letter is sworn to by Mr. Wright before a notary:

For some time previous to the 23rd April, 1890, United States cattle were not allowed to enter Canada. This prohibition was enacted in order to protect Canadian cattle, among which no contagious disease ever existed, from becoming infected by being brought in contact with United States cattle, among which contagious disease always exists to a greater or less extent in the different States of the Union, more especially among the cattle of the western states. And thereby to secure for Canadian cattle the English market free from quarantine regulations, to which the United States cattle and the cattle of nearly all other countries are subject, in consequence of the existence of contagious disease in the countries from which they are exported. This advantage to the Canadian stock raiser and shipper over those of other countries, can scarcely be estimated, considering the great yearly increase in the number of cattle exported from the Dominion, and the Government of Canada are fully aware that this advantage for the benefit of the Canadian farmer and shipper can only be retained just so long as Canada can show a clean bill of health as regards contagious cattle disease. By the prohibition of the transit of United States cattle through Canada, the Grand Trunk and the Canada Southern Railways interested in the export of western cattle to eastern markets, lost a large item of their trade, amounting in 1882, the second year after the transit was permitted, as shown by the report of the Department of Agriculture, to 11,238 cars, they (the railroad companies) represented this loss, which would be gradually growing greater as the trade increased, to the Canadian Government and succeeded getting the Government to enter into negotiations with the Imperial Government for the purpose of making arrangements to allow American shippers to send their cattle through Canada over the through lines of railway for the benefit of the said railways. Regulations were agreed upon, and an Order in Council was passed on the 23rd April, 1890, to permit the transit of the United States cattle through Canada, subject to such regulations, which are as follows:—

The cattle intended for transit through Canada should on arrival at point of export, and when unloaded, be examined during the hours of daylight by properly qualified veterinary surgeons to see if they were infected with contagious disease; if not, a certificate is given to that effect, signed by the veterinary surgeon, on which they are allowed to pass through Canada.

Second. That all cars used for the transit of the United States cattle through Canada should be thoroughly cleaned and disinfected before being used for the transit of Canada cattle, or before being put to any other use, and that the droppings from the animals found in the cars should be removed from all possibility of Canadian cattle coming in contact with them. These are the chief points insisted upon in the regulations.

Now keeping in view the present accepted germ theory of contagious disease in cattle, and the way in which they are spread and the great difficulty, even under favourable circumstances of detecting an animal infected with contagious disease, it is perfectly plain to be seen by any person, that these regulations, and the best manner in which they can be carried out as a means to prevent the introduction of contagious disease into Canada, is perfectly absurd. Cattle intended for transit through Canada arrive at Detroit and Port Huron, the points of export, at all hours of the day and night. The inspector is notified when the train arrives; he goes out; walks along one side of the train; looks in through the door of the cars, and at the best times in the daylight, he is not able to see more than the feet of about half the cattle in the cars, and at night he makes the inspection this way by starlight, moonlight, or if neither chanced to be shining and is Egyptian darkness, he makes the inspection just the same and gives the inspection.

I think it is not too much to say that it would be just as reasonable to expect the clerk in the office where the weather probabilities are made out, to tell the colour of the eyes of the man in the moon with his telescope, as to expect a veterinary surgeon to detect one animal that might be infected with contagious disease among a lot of from one to five hundred all inspected in this way in about ten minutes. And the Government have not always employed properly qualified veterinary surgeons as the regulations required.

Previous to Mr. Mathew's appointment at Amherstburg, they employed a butcher, and during his (Mr. Mathew's) recent illness of two or three months, they employed a shoemaker to do the inspecting, when properly qualified veterinary surgeons offered their services.

As to the disinfecting of cars that have been used for the transport of United States cattle before using them for the transport of Canada cattle, or before putting them to any other use, is equally absurd. The cars are scraped out with a shovel, then washed with a few pails of water, or with a hose at some tank if convenient, and then a little whitewash in which a table spoonful of chloride of lime to the barrel of whitewash is mixed, daubed on the floors of the cars, after which they are considered safe for the transport of Canadian cattle intended for the English market. Since 1882, the Great Western Division of the Grand Trunk Railroad have never asked permission to take any of the cars used for through stock for local traffic, but I think they have used them indiscriminately for all purposes. I am informed that the agreement of the Canadian with the Imperial Government was that the inspection should be made only during hours of daylight and the regulations distinctly say that the inspection shall be made when the animals are unloaded, which is never done.

After the inspection of the stock was ordered at night by the Government, through Dr. Smith verbally, I wrote (October, 1883) the Government to say that as the animals could not be seen at night, that it was therefore, utterly impossible to make any inspection whatever. To this letter, I never received any reply. Recently, (5th March, 1890) speaking with Mr. Wainwright, assistant general manager of the Grand Trunk Railroad, he said that when he asked Mr. Lowe, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, if the stock could be inspected at night, he (Mr. Lowe) replied that it was against the regulations, but to go ahead and do it, and the Government would wink at it, which no doubt was the reason my letter was never answered.

Mr. MULOCK.

As to the disinfecting, such a method to destroy the germ of the disease is either absurd, or the experience and teaching of scientific investigators as to the origin and nature of contagious cattle disease is not correct. The droppings of the animals in which the germs of the disease is always to be found, are more or less of them kicked out of the cars all along the lines of railroad from Detroit and Port Huron to Buffalo, a distance of over two hundred miles by either route, and from Port Huron to Montreal, a distance of over five hundred and fifty miles by the Grand Trunk Railroad, and Canadian cattle running at large along the lines of railway are in the distance every day exposed to the droppings scattered in this way, and liable to become infected.

Recently an outburst of Texan fever occurred in Detroit near the stock yards from Texan cattle being driven a short distance through the street contrary to the State law, the animals in the neighbourhood contracting the disease by afterwards going on the same street and coming in contact with the droppings of the Texan cattle, which proves beyond a doubt that the germs of the disease are to be looked for in the droppings from the animals. I challenge Prof. Smith, or any of the officers of the Veterinary Department of the Government, or any of the officers of the Railroad Company immediately connected with the transport of United States cattle, under oath, to contradict any statement I have made in reference to the inspection of United States cattle in transit through Canada, and to say that an animal infected with contagious disease could be detected in the way in which the examination is made, and that the transit of United States cattle through Canada, considering the nature of contagious disease, and the way in which it is spread, is not attended with great danger to Canadian stock. The inspectors are only appointed as a blind to Canadian and English farmers and English Government to enable the railway to carry on the transportation of western cattle to eastern markets through Canadian territory.

Then, after a reference to Prof. Smith, he goes on :

Recent reports show how suspicious the English Veterinary Department are of all foreign cattle (Canadian cattle not in the least excepted) and two cargoes which arrived in 1882, at Liverpool, from Canada, were suspected of being infected with Texan fever, and in consequence of this suspicion Canada narrowly escaped being scheduled. Sir Charles Tupper, the Canadian High Commissioner to England, and a member of the medical profession, only succeeded in satisfying the Veterinary Department in the Imperial Government that the suspected animals were not infected with Texan fever, by demanding that a post-mortem examination be made, and assisted in doing it himself. Even then the Veterinary Officers of the English Government were not altogether satisfied that the suspected animals were not infected with contagious disease. However, they most generously gave Canada the benefit of the doubt. I have not the least doubt in my own mind but that the suspected animals were infected with contagious disease and had contracted it by being put into cars which had previously been used for the transport of United States cattle, and disinfected in the way I have described above. The press and the people of Canada were loud in their praise and sincere in their expressions of gratitude to Sir Charles Tupper for the energy he displayed in the matter, and thus saving Canada cattle from being scheduled. I have not the least doubt if he had not been a member of the medical profession, that he would not have been able to save this most important trade to Canada, and our farmers would have suffered a direct loss.

Now, I ask Sir Charles Tupper as a medical man, if in this instance it was so difficult to decide whether the suspected animals were affected with contagious disease or not, if he will stand up in his place in Parliament, and say that in his opinion as a medical man, it is possible for a veterinary surgeon, much less a butcher or a shoemaker, to detect one animal that might be affected with contagious disease among a lot of several hundred inspected in the manner I have above described.

It is to protect the stock of the English farmer from the possibility of becoming infected that the English Government prohibit the transit of all foreign cattle from the seaport to the interior of the country, and have wisely enacted that all cattle from countries where contagious diseases exist, to be slaughtered at the seaports. I ask are Canadian farmers not entitled to the same measures of protection? At present Canadian cattle are free from suspicion of disease, and the Canadian stock raisers and shippers have the advantage in the English market, and can only retain it so long as the country is free from suspicion of contagious cattle disease.

Under these circumstances is it not already the duty of the Government to protect Canadian cattle from any suspicion, and from all possibility of becoming infected by prohibiting the transport of United States cattle through Canada, and by doing so encourage stock raising, which now promises while the Canadian farmer enjoys this advantage to be one of the most profitable of the farming interests of Canada?

The question is, shall the stock raising interests of Canada be jeopardized for the benefit of the railways? What say the farmers of Canada?

I do hereby swear that every statement herein made in reference to the manner of the inspection of United States cattle intended for transit through Canada, is in every particular true, and that the statements made to me by Prof. Smith and Mr. Wainwright herein mentioned is, to the best of my recollections, verbatim.

COUNTY OF WAYNE. } S.S.

I, J. Hawkins, graduate of the Ontario Veterinary College, do hereby declare that I have practised in the city of Detroit for the past twelve years, and I have several times acted for Dr. Wright in his absence as inspector of U.S. cattle intended for transit through Canada, and do hereby declare that an animal infected with contagious disease could not be detected in the way the regulations require the inspection to be made, and that I consider the whole system to be an absurd farce, and that Prof. Smith, of Toronto, recently (February, 1890) admitted to me in a conversation I had with him in the Russell House, Detroit, about these regulations and systems of inspection, that they were of no value, as an animal infected with contagious disease could not be detected.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I shall not trespass further upon the time of the House in dealing with this branch of the case. What followed? These regulations being ignored and not lived up to, certain results followed, and in November, 1892, the Imperial authorities issued an order scheduling Canada. They did so because two cattle that had gone over to England on board of different steamers, one being the steamer 'Huron' and the other the 'Monkseaton,' had been said to be affected with pleuro-pneumonia. Now, the scheduling may take place for one of two reasons, either that the cattle imported from Canada into England are themselves diseased, or that Canada is not adopting regulations, to the Imperial authorities for the prevention of the introduction of disease from the United States. It is not necessary for Canada to be scheduled that a single animal in Canada should have pleuro-pneumonia; it is sufficient under the English law for the Imperial authorities to consider that any country is not adopting proper regulations. They do not wait until the disease has broken out in that country and has been transferred to England, but the moment they are satisfied that the regulations are not sufficient in their judgment to prevent the disease being transferred to such country, then it is their duty to put the law in force. In this case the law seems to have been put in force because of Professor Brown, the head of the veterinary department of the Imperial Government, having found that the two cattle in question that had been exported to England, one by the 'Monkseaton' and the other by the 'Huron,' were affected with pleuro-pneumonia. Thereupon the High Commissioner for Canada endeavoured to join the issue with them as to whether these cattle were so diseased. acting, I presume, upon the assumption that if he could satisfy the Imperial authorities that they were not so diseased, then the scheduling would be done away with. But what was the answer of the Imperial authorities? The Imperial authorities had evidently come to the conclusion that the regulations in question in force in Canada were insufficient. I will read now from the answer of the Board of Agriculture in England, to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in answer to our request to have the scheduling done away with on the contention that pleuro-pneumonia did not exist in Canada. The answer of the Board is as follows:—

The question of the existence of the disease in Canada is not, however, the only factor which the Board are required by law to take into account in this matter. They are also bound to be satisfied with the Canadian laws relating 'alter alia' to the importation of animals as such as to afford reasonable security against the importation into this country of diseased animals brought therefrom, and even if it were established beyond all question that the diseased animals imported in the 'Monkseaton' and 'Huron' were not affected in Canadian territory, the Board could only include that the law and regulations regarding the admission of cattle across the Canadian frontier were either in themselves defective or that they were not enforced with complete efficiency.

There we have the attitude of the English Government on this question, an attitude that is on record, and from which there is no possible escape, that our regulations are either in themselves insufficient or that their enforcement is insufficient. Thus we have Canadian scheduling maintained against us, no matter whether these Canadian cattle were really affected with disease or not. I am not going to enter into the question as to whether these cattle were afflicted with pleuro-pneumonia; doctors may differ, I presume, in this case, as in others. I understand Professor Brown stands at the head of his profession, and for twenty-eight years he has discharged this important service for the public of Great Britain, and I understand Professor Brown declares that the type of pleuro-pneumonia in the States and in Canada is identical, he recognizes the pneumonia found in Canadian cattle as identical with the pneumonia found in the United States cattle. If so, how comes that coincidence if there has not been some inter-communication beyond what is sanctioned by their regulations of 1880? However, I am not going to enter into that branch of the case, it is sufficient to know that the Imperial Government have declared that our regulations themselves are either insufficient or their enforcement is insufficient. Now, under these circumstances, I think the Government has made itself solely responsible for the present condition of affairs, and I have made good the propositions that I undertook to prove at the commencement, which I will not review now, but hon. gentlemen will remember them. I have proved the statements I made that the regulations which formed the compact on which this trans-Canadian trade was authorized, were only on paper, largely; that they were violated over and over again in material respects; that the Imperial Government at last remonstrated with our Government, and the Government of Canada turned a deaf ear to their remonstrance, told them their remonstrance was without foundation. At last we had the scheduling, and we have the Imperial authorities saying that the scheduling will not be done away with, even if our cattle are free from disease, until you can satisfy them that the regulations which you undertook to enforce are strengthened, and that their enforcement is effectively carried out. Under these circumstances I feel I would be doing less than my duty if I did not offer to the House an opportunity to express its opinion on this question. Therefore I beg to move:

That all the words after the word "That" be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—"the Imperial Government having scheduled the United States by reason of the existence of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious cattle diseases in that country; that the Canadian Government were desirous of allowing American cattle to be carried by rail from the west to the east through Canada; that the carrying of such cattle would also have caused Canada to be scheduled by Great Britain unless measures were adopted by the Canadian Government of a character sufficient to prevent the introduction of diseased cattle from the United States into Canada; that it was necessary, in order to prevent such scheduling, that the Imperial authorities should be satisfied as to the sufficiency of all such proposed measures; that on the condition that Canada was not scheduled—the Government of Canada undertook with the Imperial Government, to carry out certain named and other regulations in so effective a manner as to satisfy the Imperial authorities that the transit of American cattle through Canada would be so conducted as to afford reasonable security against the importation into Canada of diseased cattle; that relying upon the Canadian Government enforcing all necessary regulations and observing said undertaking, the Imperial Government granted permission for the carriage of American cattle through Canada upon the distinct understanding that such traffic was to be conducted in every respect so as not to bring Canada within the provisions of the Imperial Act respecting scheduling; that the Canadian Government disregarded such undertaking and neglected to enforce proper regulations sufficient to satisfy the Imperial Government upon the subject; that during the continuance of the permission granted by the Imperial authorities for the maintenance of such traffic, representations were made by the British Government to the Canadian Government that pleuro-pneumonia existed in the western states, that it was the duty of the Canadian Government to enforce stringent regulations for the prevention of its extension into Canada; that notwithstanding such warning, the Canadian Government allowed the said traffic to be continued in a lax manner, and also permitted very large numbers of American cattle to be imported into the Northwest Territories from the United States whilst pleuro-pneumonia was there existing; that after such repeated warning, and owing to the negligence and bad faith of the Canadian Government in the premises, the Imperial authorities did in the month of November, 1892, schedule Canada to the great injury, not only of the farming community, but of the trade of the whole country, and that such scheduling is fairly attributable to the negligence of the Government. That in view of the foregoing facts of such negligence and bad faith, this House is of opinion that the Government is deserving of the censure of Parliament.

Mr. IVES. Mr. Speaker, I can now quite easily understand why the hon. member even thought it necessary to preface his remarks with an apology for occupying so much of the time of the House at this period of the session in introducing this resolution. I think he did owe the House an apology for treating us to the bulk of the correspondence which has taken place during the last fourteen years between the Department of Agriculture and the officers inspecting cattle coming in under the transit arrangement, and after that treating us to a defence of the so-called Dr. Wright, who evidently is less fit for the duties he was performing than the blacksmith to whom he referred, because he mixed up Texas fever and pleuro-pneumonia as if they were one and the same disease and communicated by similar means; and I must say that the hon. gentleman himself, approving of those statements by Dr. Wright, showed that he did not at least in his university course, pay a great deal of attention to cattle diseases. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to occupy the time of the House at any very great length, because the hon. gentleman completely answered his charge a few moments before he resumed his seat, when he stated, I must say very gingerly, because he did not read the document in extenso as he had done in the case of Dr. Wright's document, the reasons assigned by the Board of Agriculture of Great Britain, when Canada was scheduled. The hon. gentleman started out and spent nearly two whole sittings of the House in endeavouring to show that the Government had not enforced the transit regulations which they agreed to enforce when the Imperial Government consented to permit American cattle to cross Canadian territory from one port to another. That occupied nineteen-twentieths of the time to-day, and it would naturally be supposed that when the hon. gentleman came, in conclusion, to a statement of the effect of the failure to enforce the regulations, he would have been able to establish some connection between the failure to enforce those regulations and the reasons which induced the Board of Agriculture to place Canada among the scheduled countries. But I heard him, as I knew I would hear him, give the reasons from the blue-book, namely, that two diseased cattle from Pilot Mound, Manitoba, said by Professor Brown to have been affected by pleuro-pneumonia, were taken over in the vessels 'Huronla' and 'Monkseaton.' These animals were the cause, the sole and only case of the scheduling of Canada. What must the hon. gentleman have established in order to convict the Government in this matter, and to lead hon. members to support the resolution submitted to the House? The hon. gentleman must make out, in the first place, that the Imperial Government has found fault with the way with which the transit regulations have been carried out. He has not shown that, he has not attempted to show it. He must, in the second place, show that as a result of failure on the part of the Canadian Department of Agriculture to carry out those regulations, disease has been communicated to Canadian herds, and we have been scheduled as regards sending our cattle to England. He has not shown anything of the kind. On the contrary, he has shown that the reason why Canadian cattle were scheduled was because two animals purchased at Pilot Mound, Manitoba, and sent to England in 1892, were declared by the Imperial veterinary to be diseased with pleuro-pneumonia. The whole battle ground since that time has been—were those cattle so diseased? and were other Canadian cattle which have been slaughtered in the presence of special commissioners at several different times since, which had been exported from Canada, suffering from pleuro-pneumonia. That has been the whole question; it was the whole question in 1892, and it has been the whole question since. Never have the Imperial authorities found the slightest fault, nor have they made the slightest criticism, nor has a single communication been sent to the Government of Canada complaining of the failure of the Department of Agriculture here to carry out the regulations with respect to the transit of American cattle across our territory. When the hon. gentleman, just before resuming his speech, read the remarks of Professor Brown, urging that even though those cattle were not afflicted with pleuro-pneumonia, those cattle taken to England from Pilot Mound, Manitoba, yet if they permitted the importation of foreign cattle as against an insufficient quarantine, or a quarantine not long enough or not sufficiently enforced, we would be liable even though it could not be shown that we had pleuro-pneumonia in the country, to be scheduled. But there was not one word of complaint with regard to the regulations or the way they were carried out in the transit of American cattle across the continent. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) is a lawyer. The hon. gentleman must possess some sense of logic, and the hon. gentleman must himself know, as many of his friends do, that it is a perfect non-sequitur to argue the whole day: that these regulations have been insufficiently enforced, and at the end of his argument, to submit a proposition altogether different from the point he has been trying to make. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is difficult for me to conceive what object the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has in introducing this long resolution. He must know that this House will not support it, and he must know that this country will not support it.

Mr. McMULLEN. You do not know that.

Mr. IVES. Well, I have more faith in the good sense of the country than the hon. member (Mr. McMullen) has. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has recently had a severe shock, and I am prepared to make some allowance for his fear and for his timidity with regard to the people of the country. But the hon. gentleman must not think, that because he and his friends have occasion to be afraid of the farmers of this country, that we on this side of the House, who have been legislating for years with the greatest care and painstaking in the interest of the agriculturists of Canada, are by any means afraid of them. The points that the farmers of this country are interested in are these: Have we pleuro-pneumonia in Canada; are the flocks and herds of this country suffering from pleuro-pneumonia? The answer must be No, and the best evidence in the world that there is no pleuro-pneumonia here, is, that it cannot be discovered. The British officers will not undertake to come here and look for it. They have received in England invitation after invitation from the Department of Agriculture here to send their officers and to search for pleuro-pneumonia, and if I mistake not, the Government of Canada have even gone so far as to undertake to pay the expenses of these officers if they would come and make inquiries. Our own officers—not only Dr. McEachran, but other officers—have made a search and have been unable to discover that disease. After the scheduling of Canada on account of these two animals that went from Pilot Mound, the most painstaking search was made in the whole of that locality to discover if any other cattle were affected, but the search proved utterly futile. I am not going into the question of the difference between what is now called "transit" pneumonia and pleuro-pneumonia, for that is a matter for veterinary surgeons. But one thing is certain: that if any of our cattle on arriving after the sea voyages are affected with pneumonia, they certainly do not show signs of the disease in Canada, and they do not communicate the disease from one to the other, and the people of this country have suffered no loss by reason of pleuro-pneumonia. The only case of pleuro-pneumonia that has ever existed in Canada, so far as any one knows, was imported from Great Britain, and was discovered in the Lévis quarantine in 1886. Those cases of blooded stock that were imported in 1886 and quarantined at Lévis, are the only cases of pleuro-pneumonia that have ever been established to have existed in Canada. Therefore, I say: that the people of this country will not sympathize or be affected by the hon. gentleman's long speech of to-day, and his almost as long resolution of this evening.

An hon. MEMBER. Nobody will ever read it.

Mr. IVES. But this much may happen: the Government of Canada have been endeavouring since 1892 to induce the English Board of Agriculture to remove the embargo, and at the present moment, after an investigation at Liverpool of a large number of Canadian cattle that have been slaughtered, the lungs of two or three animals that are suspected have been subjected to the examination and analysis of distinguished veterinary surgeons in Great Britain—and especially one veterinarian, who has been named by Sir Charles Tupper to act for Canada. A commission is just now sitting which is likely to settle for a long time to come the question as to whether the scheduling will be continued or whether it will be removed, and I think that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) in bringing this subject up at the present time, and endeavouring to furnish ammunition to those in Great Britain who are opposed to the removal of the scheduling, is likely to do more injury to the people of Canada and to the farmers of Canada than anything he has complained of to-day has ever occasioned. The hon. gentleman knows that a very strong party exists in England, who, for one reason or another, are opposed to the importation of live Canadian cattle into Great Britain. We would call that feeling in this country a "protection sentiment," but they call it there a fear of pleuro-pneumonia. It does very well for a pretext and for an excuse, but there is no question at all, but that Irish farmers and the farmers of England, almost unitedly, are opposed to the competition of Canadian live cattle. It is that competition, and it is that feeling working upon politicians in England that, in my opinion, has had more to do with the long continuation of this embargo than any real or legitimate fear of pleuro-pneumonia being carried into Great Britain by Canadian cattle. Now, that political party is strong, and they have so far induced Mr. Gardner not to take off this embargo. What could be more useful to these men in England who are fighting against the interests of the Canadian farmers, than the documents which to-day the hon. gentleman has exhibited to the country and to the world, if they ever get as far as Great Britain. Now, Sir, we have very different ideas of pleuro-pneumonia to-day from those which existed when these regulations were framed some fourteen years ago. At that time it was supposed generally both in Great Britain and in Canada, that pleuro-pneumonia could be communicated in a variety of ways from one animal to another. It was supposed that there was danger from the droppings of cattle, or of contagion from putting healthy cattle into cars where cattle diseased with pleuro-pneumonia had recently been carried. It was supposed that there was a large variety of ways in which pleuro-pneumonia could be communicated. Those ideas are all exploded. The necessity for or the usefulness of inspection is entirely exploded; and when the hon. gentleman gets up here and spends three or four hours discussing the question whether a day inspection or a night inspection should be had, I want to tell him that, so far as public knowledge of pleuro-pneumonia now goes, no inspection is of the slightest use unless the animal is so far diseased as to be seen to be sick. An animal may have had pleuro-pneumonia for months and yet be in a fat, sleek, healthy condition to outside appearance—in such a condition that no inspection, in fact, nothing but its slaughter and the analysis of its lungs, would show whether it had any disease or not. You might as well say that you could tell that a man had toothache by looking at him, as that a bullock that was fat and sleek in outward appearance had pleuro-pneumonia; it would be just as easy to tell the one as the other from outward appearances. Here is the latest announcement made by the British Board of Agriculture itself on the subject of pleuro-pneumonia, and the possibility of a diseased animal communicating the disease to a healthy animal. It is the latest blue-book, and it appears conclusive with reference to the way in which pleuro-pneumonia may be communicated by a diseased to a healthy animal. This is what the British Board of Agriculture reports to Lord Ripon on the subject:

The disease spreads but very slowly, especially in open and sparsely populated country, as distinguished from urban localities; the susceptibility of animals to infection is nothing like so great as in many other diseases of a contagious character; it exists in a latent form for a lengthened period; it cannot easily be detected or distinguished in the living animal from other forms of lung disorder; and it is communicable only by contact between living animals and through the medium of the respiratory organs alone.

The British Board of Agriculture, after fourteen years of research and experiment, declare that the disease is communicated only by the healthy animal breathing the breath of the diseased animal. If that be the fact, what is the use of the hon. gentleman spending all his time over inspection, the destroying of manure, and the disinfection of cars? What does it all amount to? The hon. gentleman has referred to Texas fever as if it were one and the same thing with pleuro-pneumonia. But, unlike pleuro-pneumonia, Texas fever is communicated to the healthy animal simply by its walking along the road where another animal, itself in a state of health, but in a state to communicate the fever, has gone. A whole herd of healthy cattle will be infected by Texas fever simply by crossing a trail where a herd of diseased cattle have passed. There is no analogy whatever between Texas fever and pleuro-pneumonia. The one is communicated by contact with infected ground over which diseased animals have gone, while the other can only be communicated by a healthy animal breathing the air emitted from the lungs of the diseased animal, and that, of course, within a short time after the air has been emitted from diseased lungs. But I do not, and the British Board of Agriculture do not, attach any importance to these regulations at the present day. They were supposed to be important fourteen years ago; but, as knowledge has increased, they are discovered to be practically of no importance whatever. If you were permitting American cattle to go along the high roads of the province of Ontario, and they were by chance to become mixed with the farmers' cattle along the roadside, there would be danger; but if what I have read to the House with regard to the disease and the way in which it is communicated is correct, then I say there is no danger from carrying American cattle across our territory on railway trains moving rapidly through the country, and fenced off from the farms and from all possible contact with the surrounding cattle. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman is quite wrong in saying that the regulations have not been enforced. The hon. gentleman reads the letters of Mr. Lowe to Professor Smith, and the inspectors, and he comments upon the fact that Mr. Lowe does not always express himself as satisfied with what the inspectors and Professor Smith are doing; and he comes to the conclusion on that account that the regulations were inefficiently enforced. What would he expect? Would he expect Mr. Lowe to write to Professor Smith: Professor Smith, you are doing your duty admirably; I do not think it is necessary for you to trouble yourself much about these regulations; the officers, I have no doubt, are carrying them out strictly? Is that the kind of letter the hon. gentleman would expect to find in the file of correspondence between the Department of Agriculture and these officers? Not by any means. This correspondence covers a period of fourteen years. The hon. gentleman moved for the whole of it, and got the whole of it, and I presume he has given the whole of it in his speech to-day. I do not think it is wonderful that Mr. Lowe's letters asked for increased watchfulness and increased care. They were such letters as he naturally would write, and did write. But let us come to the regulations themselves; and on that point I must say that I could not see the object of the hon. gentleman in bringing in and reading to the House this afternoon all the "pourparlers" which led up to these regulations. He even read the recommendations of Sir Hector Langevin which were never accepted, and afterwards read the recommendations of Sir Hector Langevin which were made the basis of the agreement. Why did the hon. gentleman not read the agreement itself? It would have taken less time, and would have given a better idea of what the regulations really are. They are in the Consolidated Orders in Council, of which they form chapter 7; they are very short and simple, and I propose to refer to them very briefly. The first, marked "a," referring to the subject of inspection, says:

An inspection of the said cattle and swine shall be made before they are admitted in transit, permission for which transit shall only be given on certificate or clean bill of health from the inspector, he being a veterinary surgeon appointed by the said minister.

Now, I would ask the hon. gentleman where he gets the foundation for his statement that these cattle must be unloaded? Where that they must be inspected in the daytime? Where that they must be inspected on the American side of the boundary? There is no foundation at all in the regulations in force for these pretensions.

Mr. MULOCK. But there is in the proposition.

Mr. IVES. The Government are bound to appoint a competent veterinary officer, and when that officer gets information enough to justify him in giving these cattle a clean bill of health, whether at night or in the daytime, whether by electric light or by tallow candle, then the regulations are carried out. If the officer sees nothing suspicious—and, from what we know of pleuropneumonia, we know he could not see anything of the disease unless the animal were in the last stage of it—if he sees that all the cattle in the cars are apparently equally healthy, that there is no weak animal among them, no animal down in the car or apparently sick or disabled, if he finds the whole train load of cattle apparently well and strong and healthy, I ask the hon. gentleman whether he would justify the officer in giving those cattle a clean bill of health. The inspection and the regulations have been carried on thoroughly for years, but so as to interfere as little as possible with the course of trade. Does the hon. gentleman want trade to be interfered with? Does he want to stop the business of the railway companies who are transporting these cattle through Canada? Does he want to take away the labour of the men handling these trains and send these people away to the United States? That cannot be the object he has in view; surely he does not want to put unnecessary restrictions on the transaction of business. What then does he want? No harm has come, not one case has he given or can he give where any trouble has resulted from the way these regulations have been enforced. He cannot give a case where Texas fever, or anthrax, or any other disease has been communicated to Canadian herds through the manner in which these regulations have been carried out. Not being able to show a single case of injury to a Canadian herd or that the British Government have complained of the way in which these regulations have been enforced, or that they have in the slightest degree based their action on these regulations, what ground has he for asking the condemnation of this Government? The next complaint he makes is with reference to appointing a guardian to attend each train carrying American cattle or swine. The regulation provides as follows:—

Mr. IVES.

That each train carrying American cattle or swine, or both, from frontier to frontier in bond, shall be accompanied by one of the staff of guardians also to be appointed by the said minister.

Allow me to explain that the carrying of these cattle in bond is of itself the very best precaution that could be devised. The House knows, and you know, Mr. Speaker, what that means. You know that the car is sealed and that the railway company have to give a bond, in a heavy penalty, that they will deliver that car into the United States territory with that seal intact. That seal is placed on both doors of the car, so that it is utterly impossible for any cattle to be removed or for any other animals to go near them without those seals being broken, in which case the railway company is responsible in a very heavy penalty indeed. This method of carrying the cattle through in cars sealed in bond, is the best possible precaution, and is worth fifty guardians. What would a guardian amount to in the caboose of a cattle train? He might amount to something if he were a train despatcher and had the control of the train—if he could stop or start the train, or make it move quicker, or have any control whatever. Let the hon. gentleman say what possible use this so-called guardian could render in the caboose of the cattle train, when he has no control of the train. What could he do more than the conductor? Could not the conductor do more? The conductor is more or less in charge, his control only being less than that of the superintendent who is represented by the train despatcher, so that the Government, in selecting the conductor to be the guardian to carry out these regulations and holding the company responsible if he does not, has taken the very best course possible to carry out the spirit of the regulations. But the fact that the car is sealed in bond is the best possible guarantee that nothing will be allowed into or out of the train. The next provision in the regulations is that the cars and trucks employed for such traffic shall be specially and exclusively devoted to such purposes. That, I believe, has been done. Then the regulations provide:

That no Canadian animals shall be carried at any time in the same train, in company with or in close proximity to American cattle or swine, and that no car or truck employed in the transit of American cattle and swine shall be used to carry, at any time, Canadian animals.

That provision has been complied with. Then the next provision is:

That no unnecessary delay occur with any train engaged in the said transit passing through Canadian territory.

That has been complied with. Then the Act provides :

That due precautions be taken to retain in the cars or trucks, and disinfect, if need be, the droppings of cattle and swine thus carried in transit.

The hon. gentleman complained that that has not always been done, and I presume possibly it has not, as many of the letters which Mr. Lowe wrote were directed to the managers of railways complaining that they were not careful enough in that regard. But this, as I have said, I consider a matter of very little consequence. There is no possible chance, as Professor Brown would tell the hon. gentleman, of the droppings of cattle communicating pleuro-pneumonia to live animals. That the department have been attending to the matter is shown by the large number of letters which the hon. gentleman has read, and I have no doubt, from the correspondence the hon. gentleman himself read, that those regulations were carried out very effectively. With regard to the unloading at Lyn, I say again the best protection is the bond. The Department of Agriculture appointed a special officer, whose business it is to break those seals at Lyn, and to affix others when the cattle are reloaded. The Government did not trust the matter to a conductor, but appointed a special officer, whom they made a customs officer, and to whom they gave charge of that important work. Now, have hon. gentlemen ever heard of any pleuro-pneumonia arising from this feeding ground at Lyn? The hon. gentleman says that it was reported that anthrax was very common in that neighbourhood. I never heard of it. The department never heard of it.

Mr. MULOCK. The department wrote the letter.

Mr. IVES. That I have not seen, and I have to verify it, because the department have no recollection of writing the letter.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that they have given a false return? It is in the return.

Mr. IVES. Be that as it may, the thing is simply absurd, and the hon. gentleman would know it if he had studied cattle diseases more when he was at the university. Anthrax is a blood disease, and the idea that anthrax or black leg can be caught from manure ploughed into the ground is the most absurd thing I ever heard of. I say that these regulations have been carried out fairly. They have never been complained of. No harm has ever resulted; and if we are scheduled to-day, it is not because of these regulations, but because of the supposed existence of pleuro-pneumonia in two of the cattle that were taken from Pilot Mound in 1892. Now, the hon. gentleman finds fault with the quarantine, and that is the only point where the Imperial Board of Agriculture have found fault. Professor Brown believes that pleuro-pneumonia may exist in an animal for not only ninety days, but practically a year, without its showing any outward sign of its existence. Being of that opinion, he thinks our ninety days quarantine is insufficient. That may be, but in establishing that quarantine we went further than the United States had gone up to that time, and as far as Great Britain herself had ever gone. If medical men discover that ninety days is not long enough, it will be for Parliament and the Government to consider whether that period should be lengthened; but certainly up to the present, there is no ground for censuring the Government for not having fixed a longer period than any other civilized nation in the world has fixed. The hon. gentleman talked in a general way about pleuro-pneumonia existing in the western states. Well, western states is rather an indefinite term. It may mean Illinois, Iowa, Dakota, or Washington Territory. But I can tell the hon. gentleman that there never has been a case of pleuro-pneumonia reported or discovered either in Minnesota, Dakota, or west of the Mississippi river; and, as he can see from the returns he has read, the bulk of the cattle allowed to go into Manitoba and the North-west, were ranche animals taken from Oregon and Montana to Alberta. The thousands and tens of thousands were these ranche cattle, and the scores or hundreds were settlers' cattle which went in from Minnesota and Dakota into Manitoba. But that has all been stopped, stopped long before the hon. gentleman's motion was made, and the British Government have made no reference to this subject. They have not based their action in scheduling Canada upon ranche cattle having been permitted to go into Alberta; they have not based their action upon the fact that we have allowed settlers from Minnesota and Dakota to take their cattle in without quarantine. These cattle were always inspected, and they were not permitted to come in unless they had the appearance of being clean and free from disease. But we last year adopted a stringent quarantine against all cattle going to the North-west. We adopted that of our own motion in order to induce the British Government to reconsider their hostile action with reference to Canada, and if the hon. gentleman had had patience, if he had abstained from putting weapons into the hands of our opponents on the other side, we might perhaps in a few days have succeeded. And, as the Minister of the Interior corrects me, we have always had a quarantine against cattle east of the Mississippi River. There has been a quarantine at Emerson against these cattle ever since Manitoba was settled. So far as cattle west of the Mississippi are concerned there has never been the slightest case of disease. I do not propose to occupy the time of the House at greater length. I will admit the Government were wrong in not dismissing Dr. Wright sooner, and if the motion were one to censure the Government for not having dismissed this blackmailer and unsuitable person before, I should have been inclined to do, as I have seen hon. gentlemen do, go behind the Chair before the vote was called.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I hoped when the President of the Council rose to address the House that he would make some attempt to meet the serious charge made against the Government by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). But the hon. gentleman has entirely evaded the true issue. The question is not whether pleuro-pneumonia exists in this country. The question is whether the Government have during a series of years deliberately, flagrantly, violated the solemn compact they entered into with the Imperial Government. And it is no answer to that charge to say that no evil results have followed that evasion. The hon. gentleman charges the hon. member for North York with having made a speech which will put weapons into the hands of those who are opposed to the admission of Canadian cattle. I venture to say that when the speech of the President of the Council is read in England, if weight is given to it at all, it will have the result of effectually preventing our cattle being admitted. Why, Sir, that speech—not to use language too strong—is an insult not only to the common sense but to the integrity of the House; it is an insult to the honesty and good faith of the people of this country, and it is a confession of dishonour on the part of the Government. Why, Sir, what does the hon. gentleman say? He says that because a series of regulations were adopted fourteen years ago, he is justified in having evaded these regulations because now it is discovered that they had not the efficacy they were supposed to have.

Mr. IVES. I made no such statement. I said it was discovered they were not needed now.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I certainly understood the hon. gentleman's language to mean that he was justified in evading these regulations because it was now known they were not efficacious. But if that was not his meaning, where then is his justification? If he has not that justification, what justification has he? I should like to know what the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) thought of the speech of the hon. President of the Council. The hon. member for Three Rivers in 1880 made a solemn compact with the Imperial Government, which is not to be learned from the words we find in the Order in Council, but is to be read in the declaration and propositions made and accepted by these parties, by the Imperial Government on one side, and by the Government on this side, represented by the hon. member for Three Rivers on the other. It does not matter what this Government put into an Order in Council. The English Government will pay no attention to that. They will say: We entered into a compact with you and you undertook to carry out the terms of that compact, and now, by your own confession, you have systematically evaded it from beginning to end. What does the hon. member for Three Rivers think of this way of carrying out a contract to which his personal honour was pledged, when he sees a member of the Government—now that he himself is no longer a member of the Government—deliberately flaunt in the eyes of this House the evasions which its own correspondence shows it to have committed. And, Sir, speaking of the manner in which these regulations were systematically evaded, flagrantly evaded, with a degree of duplicity which I think is most discreditable to the Government, can we hold entirely blameless the gentleman who is deputy head of the department? He is the executive officer of the department, and it was his duty to see that the regulations were carried out unless he had specific orders for the head of his department to relax them. Such does not appear to have been the case. The executive head appears to have connived at the systematic breach of every one of these regulations. This House has heard what was read of the correspondence with reference to the inspection of cattle at night. The idea of inspecting cattle at night! It is no wonder the deputy head of the department would not give his official sanction to it. It is no wonder that he was compelled to write and say that while he would allow it to go on, it was contrary to the agreement. Still he permitted it to go on and actually paid the officers a higher price for their work in consequence of their evading the law. It was his duty to carry out the regulations in every particular, and if he found his officers were violating them, he should have dismissed them. The hon. President of the Council speaks of the inspection as having been sufficient. Sir, it does not matter in the slightest degree, as affects the question before the House, what the terms of the inspection were. It does not matter whether the inspection was wise or unwise, necessary or unnecessary. It was established by the correspondence of the department itself that Canadian cattle were admitted into England on the express understanding that particular precautions were to be taken, not that an Order in Council was to be based upon the agreement, but that the bargain was to be carried out as found in the correspondence entered into between the two parties, the Department of Agriculture and the Government as represented by the hon. member for Three Rivers on the one side and the Board of Agriculture in England on the other. And every regulation, whether with regard to the inspection of cattle, the cleaning of cars, the appointment of officers to conduct the cars, was systematically evaded with the consent and connivance of the department. Every Minister who filled that department from 1880 down to the present time, must be held responsible for that violation. The hon. gentleman seems to think that it is all right to have departed from a solemn agreement because no harm has come of it, and he attacks the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) for want of a sense of logic. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he has a sense of honour. If he had, he would not attempt to condone a violation of an agreement simply on the ground that it had not been productive of the evil results that might have attended it. The question which the hon. gentleman has attempted to evade is one which the people of this country will thoroughly realize. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have made very light of this discussion; they seem to think it is quite sufficient to say that there is no pleuro-pneumonia in this country, they cheer that statement as a sufficient answer to all that has been said. I think if the farmers of this country knew how their interests have been systematically set aside in order to suit the convenience of railway companies ever since 1880, the results of the last election would have been very different from what they have been, and I think when these facts come to be known—because hitherto they have not been known—the farmers of this country will tell a different tale, and will call those hon. gentlemen to account for attempting to defend that which was done entirely in opposition to their interests. It may be true, recent researches may have shown, that this particular form of cattle disease is not contagious in the way it was supposed to be; but when these regulations were framed they were framed according to the idea then prevalent, and the fact now appears that the Government, having accepted these regulations as necessary in order to the protection of the cattle interests of this country, allowed them to be violated and gave away the interests of the farmers simply to suit the convenience of railway corporations. We have seen the subservience of the Government to railway corporations. in a variety of ways, but this is one of the most glaring, and I think when the people come to understand that for such a paltry consideration as that of the mere convenience of a railway train for a few hours, the most essential feature of these regulations, the inspection, was systematically violated and allowed to fall into neglect in the way it was, they will hold to a strict account those who are really responsible for the scheduling of our cattle. The hon. gentleman also entirely evaded the other branch of the subject; he entirely evaded the view which the Imperial authorities have always maintained, the view, not that pleuro-pneumonia may exist in the country itself, but the view that a country from which cattle are exported to England must itself carry out certain regulations with regard to other countries. Sir, if the Imperial Government had some faith in the honour of this country, it appears that faith was entirely undeserved. They thought that when our Government entered into a solemn compact to carry out plain regulations, they had sufficient honesty and honour to carry them out, especially when they were deriving great advantages in doing so. But it seems that confidence was undeserved, and if hon. gentlemen think that the people of this country are going to condone an offence of that kind simply because they are now told in a flippant style that there is no pleuro-pneumonia in this country, they are entirely mistaken. The hon. gentleman cannot escape from the dilemma in which he has placed himself, he cannot escape by attempting to criticise the conduct of one of his own officers, an officer whom he kept in office for eight years, although, as he says himself, he knew that he attempted to levy blackmail, although he knew he was giving blank certificates, and frequently violating the duties of his office. Although these facts were brought home to the knowledge of the department, still the Government continued to ignore them, and still continued this man in office. They need not now attempt to say that he did not know much about the duties of his office, when they permitted him to continue to discharge them for such a long period of years, knowing how grossly he had violated them. The evidence does not require any repetition at my hand, the evidence will go before the country, and it will show beyond all possibility of contradiction—in fact, the hon. gentleman who spoke on behalf of the Government has not attempted to contradict it—it will show clearly that the Government entered into a solemn compact with the Imperial authorities by which we were permitted to have our cattle sent into England on the most favourable terms; and when the people know that from the very day that compact was made, it was systematically, knowingly, and wilfully violated, they will hold the Government responsible for all the evils that have followed. I venture to say that when these facts come to be known throughout the length and breadth of the land, the consequences will be serious to any one who attempts to defend the action of the Government with regard to them. With regard to the importation of cattle into the North-west, and also with regard to these regulations, every one supposed that regulations satisfactory to the Imperial Government having been entered into, the administration of the trade was carried out in accordance with those regulations. Nobody knew that they were systematically evaded. I think it was the common understanding that every head of cattle going into the North-west was subject to a quarantine of forty days, every one supposed, having faith in their own Government, that that regulation was being carried out, and now, for the first time, they know that it was violated from the beginning, and now, for the first time, they know that a Minister of the Crown can stand up in his place in this House and flippantly pass it over with a few such remarks as have been made by the President of the Council. I say that a more damaging statement to the Government of this country, one more seriously affecting its honour and integrity, was never made on the floor of this House, and I venture to say that when the people come to realize it, they will show their resentment in a very decisive manner.

Mr. Ives.

Mr. McMULLEN. I cannot allow this subject to pass without saying a few words in support of the motion of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). Since Parliament met, to the present moment, in my humble opinion, there has not been so important a question discussed as that which the hon. gentleman has brought before the House. The hon. President of the Council rather ridiculed the lengthy utterances of the hon. member for North York, and the statement he has made of all the facts connected with the scheduling of our cattle in England. In my opinion, the case deserves all the time that has been devoted to it, and I am glad the hon. member for North York has brought all the circumstances and evidence before us. Now, the President of the Council has attempted to belittle the efforts of the member for North York. He says that the farmers of the country will take but little interest in all that he has said on this very grave question. Well, I rather think he will find that the farmers have their eyes and ears open to the unfortunate position of the cattle trade, and any additional evidence that will throw light upon the causes of the unfortunate position in which that trade is at the present time, will be read with great care by the farming community of the province of Ontario, at least. The farmers of Ontario have incurred great expense in extending the cattle trade within the last few years, in fact, it is about the only trade from which they have been receiving anything like a paying return; and, in view of this growing and important trade, the Government, as has been proved, by the hon. member for North York to-night, have flagrantly neglected to discharge the duties devolving upon them for the purpose of maintaining the privileges that we enjoyed in the British market. When the Government of Canada learned that American cattle were scheduled in the English market, they should have taken prompt and decisive steps to secure to Canada the continuation of the advantages she enjoyed. They did immediately pass such regulations as were for the time being satisfactory to the British Government. But after the passage of the regulations, when the railway companies realized how they were going to suffer in the reduction of freight, they applied to the Dominion Government to relax in some degree the provisions that had been agreed to by the British Government and the Canadian Government, in order to keep for Canada a clean bill of health, that they might retain their trade. They even secured specified conditions on which American cattle might be carried from American ports to American ports. These terms were clear, distinct and well defined, and should have been very carefully and very sacredly observed by the Dominion Government in the interest of this privilege obtained from England. I contend that the Dominion Government did not observe those regulations with that care and sacredness with which they should have been regarded, and to the extent to which they should have been valued. The statement made by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) clearly proved that fact. In the first place, it was provided that all the cattle were to be inspected by properly authenticated veterinaries, men who were capable by education of inspecting cattle, and discovering the least outward evidence of disease present. How was that provision carried out? It has been proved by documents read to the House to-night that in one case no more efficient person than a butcher was employed to discharge the duties of a veterinary surgeon. In another case, it has been proved that a shoemaker was employed to discharge the duties of inspector of cattle in place of a veterinary surgeon. Was that keeping faith with Great Britain as regards the arrangement entered into? Was that trying to observe faithfully the terms on which Great Britain agreed that Canada should be allowed to enjoy a special privilege? It was not. There was another provision to which I desire to call attention. The President of the Council talked lightly of this particular provision. What was it? It was that there should be a Government guardian accompanying each cattle train entering Canada from western points, and remain with it until it went out of the country to the east. The hon. gentleman asked what better man could be employed than the conductors. If other men had been employed, perhaps a different state of affairs would have resulted. What was the provision? It was that cattle passing over the Grand Trunk or Canadian Pacific, for instance, should be given food and drink at certain points. Arrangements were made that there should be two fences, at considerable distances apart and that the cattle should be taken into the space between the two inner fences, and that there should be sufficient division to make it impossible for cattle outside to get in. We find, however, by the evidence read to-night, that Mr. Lowe drew attention to the fact that the outer fence was broken and was absolutely useless, and that this regulation was not observed. Will the President of the Privy Council now say that a conductor was the best man to be guardian? Would he report to the managing director of the company that the rules were not properly carried out, that he found the fences of the company of which he was a hired servant broken and not in accordance with the regulations? All the evidence goes to show that the Government, instead of endeavouring to preserve this special privilege to Canada treated the matter lightly and indifferently, and this has led up to the condition of affairs to-day. The President of the Council stated that it was not owing to the laxity on the part of the Dominion Government that Canada has been scheduled. How does the hon. gentleman know it? There are farmers from England, Scotland and Ireland here every month of the year, almost every week of the year. They are taking notice of what is occurring. They remember well the losses from which they have suffered from disease in animals. They must observe that the cattle trade between the United States and Canada is carried on in a very loose manner, that cattle trains are inspected by a man passing them at night with a lantern, and on that inspection they are allowed to go through to their destination. Again, it is stated that the scheduling was not the result of disease among Canadian cattle. What is the fact? The letter of the traitor, Dr. Wright, for he was a traitor, and he should never have been retained for one day in the public service, after he had made unscrupulous demands for extra pay on the railway companies; but he was retained in the employment of the Government, and continued for several months to blackmail the railway companies, alleged that he rendered special services in passing trains during the night, when, of course, it was impossible to perform an inspection that should have been carried out by a veterinary. The Government, however, kept the man there, condoned his offence, reinstated him, and eventually when he went to Detroit, they did not dismiss him because he had acted unfaithfully, untruthfully, and unscrupulously and as a blackmailer, but because he had removed from Canada, and had become a resident of Detroit. That man published a letter in the Canadian and English newspapers. How long after the publication of that letter did the scheduling arrangement come into force? A few months, a short time. Do not all these evidences lead up to the fact that the Government, through the publication of letters, and owing to the inefficient manner in which they were carrying out the law, failed to take efficient action to prevent Canadian cattle being scheduled? Take another point. The President of the Council has said that there never was such a disease in Canada, but that the two animals were obtained from Pilot Mound in Manitoba. I am very glad to hear that Canada is free from such disease. But I am willing to take one case and stake my argument before any intelligent farmer. The herds from the western States got into Manitoba and, no doubt, infected animals by the disease, and it is undoubtedly true that an animal from those herds was sent to England and resulted in Canadian cattle being scheduled. Had those American cattle not been permitted to come in without proper quarantine regulations, the probabilities are that the diseased animals would never have been sent to Great Britain, but the looseness with which the Government discharged their duty and carried out the regulations they made with England resulted in a large number of cattle being brought into the country in utter disregard of the regulations provided, and the consequence was that animals taken from one section were sent to England and found to be diseased, and we have the result that is apparent to-day. I contend that it is beyond dispute that the looseness with which the Government have discharged their duty in this whole arrangement with England has resulted in the condition of things we have in Canada to-day. Although the President of the Council may try to belittle the unfortunate condition of things given to the House, he will find and his followers will find, and his associates in the Cabinet will find, that they may have very great difficulty in satisfying the farmers of this country, who are suffering under the heel of the unfortunate conditions that now exist, and for which the Government are clearly responsible. When the farmers read over the quotations that have been presented to the House from returns that have been brought down from the Agricultural Department, they will have evidence enough to see for themselves that the Government have been exceedingly lax, and that as a result of that laxity our cattle are scheduled in England. I admit that it was in the interest of the railways a very important trade. I neither blame the Grand Trunk Railway nor the Canadian Pacific Railway, nor the Canada Southern Railway. It was the duty of the Government to see that the arrangement was literally and faithfully fulfilled, but the Government did not do it. It was natural on the part of the railways that they should seek a relaxation of the arrangements, but the Government should have stood firm to the covenant which they entered into with the mother country, and under which the transportation of cattle through Canada was to take place. The Government should have said: We will respect and reverence that covenant with England, and no railway company will be allowed to get privileges to violate it, which will endanger the agricultural interests of this country. When the railway companies asked for inspection at night, and to have their own conductors put in charge of the cars, the Government should have told them that it was a violation of the sacred covenant with England, and that in the interest of the farmers of Canada they must refuse it. They permitted conductors to become guardians, and they permitted butchers and shoemakers to become inspectors of trains as veterinary surgeons. They violated the condition of the arrangement with England, and it went from one step to another, until the whole business culminated in our cattle being scheduled. Any person will easily understand that it was an exceedingly loose practice to permit these certificates of inspection to be signed in blank. This man Wright and another veterinary employed by practice to permit these certificates of inspection of ten or a dozen at a time, and when the cattle train came along the name of the conductor was filled in as the guardian of the train to pass through Canada. If that is not a loose way of doing business I do not know what is. I have heard it stated, and I have no doubt it will be repeated, that because there is a Reform Government in England they have an unfriendly feeling towards the Dominion of Canada, owing to the fact that the Tories are in power here. That has been given as a reason for the scheduling of our cattle, but it is a very childish and weak argument. I earnestly hope that England does not treat her colonies differently because they are represented by one political party or another. I do not believe that any intelligent man would take any stock in such an argument as that. We have been told here to-night that our cattle are scheduled in order to protect the English farmer; but that, in my opinion, is another foolish statement. We know that the animals have been carefully inspected in England, and that their lungs have been examined. We are glad to be able to say that no disease has been found amongst them, but the Government of England are very suspicious that disease does exist here. If we have not pleuro-pneumonia in Canada we may have other diseases that are contagious, and which might be serious if imported into England. I do not wish to continue this discussion further. I have pointed out briefly the feature of the case which show that this Government are responsible for the condition of things that now exist. The evidence that has been presented to the House, and the documents read by the hon. member (Mr. Mulock), clearly and unmistakably cast upon the Government all the responsibility for the unfortunate condition in which we find ourselves. We did enjoy very great advantages before our cattle were scheduled in England, and had the Government realized how important these advantages were from an Ontario standpoint, I dare say that they would have given the matter more consideration. In my humble opinion we have never had a Minister of Agriculture in this House, in my experience, who has been willing to bestow the time and attention and perseverance, so as to make it as a personal matter to himself, the interest of the farming community of this Dominion. Our Ministers of Agriculture under the present Government have never been able to show that they have been so posted in the interests of the farming community as to be able to secure to them those advantages which they should enjoy. We have now a Minister of Agriculture who is a lawyer. I do not find fault with lawyers, because they are necessary as well as other men. They are respectable members of society; but at the same time it is wrong that lawyers should be made Ministers of Agriculture, because from the fact of their profession they cannot know as much about agriculture as they do about law. It is necessary in order that the Minister of Agriculture be an efficient Minister of Agriculture, he should understand the business of agriculture, as well as a lawyer does the business of law to be an efficient lawyer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) who has just taken his seat, began his speech this evening by saying that the farmers were aware, and too painfully aware, of the present unfortunate condition of the cattle trade. I would ask that hon. gentleman, and I would ask all who have listened to this discussion, whether they are of opinion that this debate—a debate, in my mind, most unfortunate, sprung upon the House and the country on a most unfortunate occasion—will do much to alleviate the condition of the farmer or assist him in connection with the difficult questions that surround the cattle trade at the present moment. I myself have listened very carefully to this discussion, and be the merits on the one side of the debate or on the other, be they with the hon. gentleman who has moved the resolution now in your hands or against his position, the only result of the statements he has made, which I consider most extravagant and unfair statements, will be to prejudice, and very seriously prejudice, those people whom that hon. gentleman and those siding with him pretend to represent to-day. How unfairly this question has been broached is best understood when we remember that the hon. member for North Wellington, as well as the hon. member for North York, confined their observations chiefly to an ancient period in the history of this question, and avoided the documents that are now contained in an English blue-book, and that are among the papers which have been brought down—the papers that touch the question in its present aspect, a perusal of which will show in a moment that all the difficulties these hon. gentlemen have brought to the front are difficulties that have never entered into the minds of the English authorities, have never disturbed the situation in the slightest degree, but are calculated only, if they have any effect, to cause further delay and further investigation. Let us remember, Mr. Speaker, how the present unfortunate condition of affairs was brought about. There are two ways of doing it. The English Contagious Diseases of Animals Act, which is automatic in a sense, contemplates all conditions in connection with cattle before that Act comes into operation. There are two separate and distinct cases. One is evidence of unsatisfactory security in connection with the export of cattle to England, and the other is the existence of actual disease itself; that is unsatisfactory security for the prevention of disease in one case, or the actual occurrence of it in the other. Now, an understanding was spoken of as having been reached between this Government and that of the United Kingdom in 1879, and of legislation and regulations since. Well, all the materials have been in the hands of the British Government; all the Orders in Council have been in their hands; all the statements which have been made by the hon. gentlemen or by others of any importance on this subject not only have been in the hands of the British Board of Agriculture, but the whole question has been discussed in every phase of it, and all that has transpired in these years, instead of enabling the British Board of Agriculture or the British Government to insinuate a charge of bad faith, such as has been hurled across this House to-day, has caused the British Government to treat as satisfactory all the facts, all the correspondence, all the conduct of this Government, all being considered as above-board, and the one question that the Board of Agriculture and the Canadian Government have been discussing since 1892 is as to the second condition, the condition that affects simply the question of the existence of disease in this country. That question, and that question only, is before the British Government, and just now the President of the Board of Agriculture and Dr. Burton Saunderson, the Wayne Professor of Physiology at Oxford University, are acting as a committee to ascertain the precise character of the disease, and I call attention to the language of Mr. Gardner, in explaining the object of that committee, to show how embarrassing is this discussion, which is now suddenly started, and which must necessarily reach the British Parliament. Mr. Gardner says:

"With a view, if possible, to clearing up any doubt which have been expressed as to the precise character of the disease with which the infected animals landed from Canada during the past two years have been affected, I am proposing to hold a special inquiry.

If the conclusion is in favour of the contention of the Canadian Government that the disease is not contagious pleuro-pneumonia, then the directions requiring the slaughter of the animals will not be maintained. Now, we have cleared away, as I say happily, all issues but that one. We have obtained the best advice we could obtain in the United Kingdom. We have the gratifying knowledge that not one single instance of that disease can be pointed to as having occurred in Canada, except in the case of the beast brought from England in 1886. We have the fact that of the animals slaughtered there were only a few cases suspected of this disease, and these are cases in which the scientific men differ, the Canadian Government having on its side men of high character and position in England, and so strong a case have they made that the British Government have taken the extraordinary step of setting aside the opinions of their own experts, and asking a committee to settle that one only question. This was the position of the matter up to this afternoon; but now it is impossible to hide from our eyes the fact that extraordinary charges have been made—charges of bad faith, or trickery, of most scandalous conduct on the part of the Canadian Government, and word is sent across the sea that no matter how these cases may turn out, other conditions must be taken up, and the hands of the President of the British Board of Agriculture must be tied up further. There is evidence, whether correct or not, there is suspicion, whether properly founded or not, that there is not proper security existing in Canada for the prevention of that disease, and I say that a most embarrassing view has been put forward to-day, and how unfairly has that been done? How many members in the House to-day knew when the House opened the nature of this discussion, the line it would take, the documents that would be examined, the importance of those documents, the seriousness of the charges that would be made? And how many members have been able to follow all these intelligently? How many members have been able really to grasp the actual facts of the case from the presentation made from the voluminous documents which the hon. member for North York handled, without having given the slightest intimation to any one that he proposed to prefer charges of so serious and grave a character? The hon. gentleman based his speech upon only such documents as he believed gave rise to the supposed irregularity, omitting the answers and the letters which exposed the character of some of the gentlemen who had written the communications upon which he based his argument, omitting entirely the retraction of Dr. Wright, and presenting only one side of the correspondence that extended over all this period from 1879. It is not right to impute motives, but what motive could the hon. gentleman have had? The danger of his course I have pointed out. I hope I have exaggerated the danger. I hope that I exaggerate the consequences, but the one consequence I fear is an annoying and unnecessary delay in removing that embargo. But what was the hon. gentleman's object in pressing charges of that character in such a manner, without giving the department concerned the slightest opportunity of presenting in the strongest manner their side of the case. Our side of the case should be presented, not merely for this House and country, but for the English Parliament and people. Whatever may be the reasons which induced the Board of Agriculture to prohibit our sending live cattle into England—whether protectionist doctrines prevail, or whether there was a real fear on the part of English agriculturists of the introduction of disease—the position of any Government in England must be embarrassed by the presentation of the facts brought forward to-day and by the hon. gentleman's statement of the case, no matter whether his case be well founded or not; and on that account I deplore his statement. I am not in the slightest degree alarmed, so far as the farmers of this country are concerned, and so far as the men who are in the business of shipping cattle are concerned. There is not a man who raises cattle for Great Britain, there is not a man who has handled cattle at the port of Montreal—and I know many of them—who will attach the slightest importance to the utterances of the hon. member for North York. They have handled the cattle and know the precautions that have been taken, and the technical violation of the regulations or the omissions to carry out those regulations in their entirety, in several respects, where the regulations were absolutely immaterial. They thoroughly well know that this has not been attended with any serious result to this country. They know how free from disease the cattle of this country are; and when the hon. gentleman presses the statement that in the bordering states this pleuro-pneumonia almost runs rampant, he gives away the whole case. He admits that the regulations have been substantially enforced in this country when he says that not a single animal has got into these borders infected with the disease. What more does the hon. gentleman want? What does he expect to gain by bringing up little points in the way he did? I can show the hon. gentleman—and I say this of my personal knowledge—that in England itself they have never enforced to the letter their regulations with regard to the cattle trade. The Board of Trade itself has not enforced to the letter most important regulations. Are we to assume for that reason that they were actuated by bad faith? Are we to assume that there was dishonesty and fraud on the part of the Government officials? Why, no department of any Government could stand such infinitesimal, technical criticism as was advanced to-day with regard to these regulations, which have been shown, and conclusively shown, by the President of the Council, who has much experience on the subject, to be absolutely immaterial. The hon. gentleman suggested that it was assumed on this side of the House that a Reform Government was responsible for this unfriendly action to Canada. No such suggestion could possibly be made by any one familiar with the history of the matter. The best friend of Canada has been Lord Ripon. He has read the whole of Canada's case, and argued it with singular ability in his discussions with the Board of Trade; and the last documents laid on the Table of the

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

House of Commons contained the expression of Lord Ripon's deep regret that the Board of Trade had not been able to act as the Canadian Government desired. So that we can have no complaint on that score. The difficulties that surround the Board of Agriculture have come from without the Government, as I very well know, and not from within it. But the case of the 'Monkseaton,' and that is why I was driven to the record, was referred to by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). In reply I can only tell the hon. gentleman that he cannot possibly have read the correspondence since 1892. I referred this evening to the fact that most of the references of the hon. gentleman opposite are anterior to the papers that are really in point. Had he read the correspondence, he would have seen that he was only arguing about a part of the English case that has long since been knocked to atoms, and that was the case of an animal traced back to Pilot Mound, a region where there never had been any sign of disease; and the report of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Angers), lawyer though he be, is absolutely conclusive on the case of the 'Monkseaton,' and that case has gone to the wall, so far as it was a case which could be urged against Canada. The discussion and the inquiry has gone down to this very year, and any one following Mr. Gardner's utterances in the House of Commons this year would have found that that embargo would have been removed at the opening of the season, had it not been that this year, when every regulation was strictly enforced, another case of suspicion occurred. I trust that the unwise course proposed by the hon. gentleman will not cause further delay. It cannot have any effect ultimately. I am not afraid of that. I know that the examination in the future will show, as it did in the past, that the Canadian Government have an unanswerable case in this question of such important interest to the whole country. I regret exceedingly that any hon. member, any Canadian, would suggest to those, whose whole desire is to break down the Canadian case, an argument that would even now have the effect of delaying a satisfactory settlement of the question.

Mr. SPROULE. Before you call in the members, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this subject, because I think it has not been fairly dealt with by hon. gentlemen opposite. If I correctly understood the members for North York (Mr. Mulock) and Wellington (Mr. McMullen), their argument was to the effect that the regulations entered into between the Department of Agriculture and the British authorities had not been carried out and that those regulations had been deliberately violated by the department, and that they had been illegally violated by the department. Now, I do not know upon what ground this allegation is made. Hon.

gentlemen have not given us the correspondence which will bear out that contention, nor have they read the regulations that were entered into for the purpose of carrying out the requirements of the British Board of Agriculture. I have a copy of those regulations before me, and I do not think there is a word in those regulations that will bear out the contention that is made. The contention is first that the inspection should have been made by daylight. There is nothing in the regulations which says that the inspection shall be made in daytime or at any other time. The next contention is that the inspection was not made properly at night, because it was made in the dark. There is nothing to bear out that contention either. The regulations are in the following words :—

14. American cattle and swine, the importation and introduction of which are prohibited as ordered by Part I, paragraph 3, may nevertheless be permitted to enter Canada in bond, at the ports of Sarnia, Windsor and Amherstburg, to be conveyed, under surveillance and strict rules of isolation, through Canada and territory to the American frontier at Rouse's Point, St. Armand Station, Island Pond, the Suspension Bridge (Niagara) and the International Bridge (Fort Erie); but no such transit shall be allowed, unless an agreement between the Minister of Agriculture and the railway company interested in and conducting such transit has been communicated to the Collector of Customs of each of the said ports or stations.

15. The transit of cattle and swine between the points mentioned in the next preceding paragraph, shall be subject to such rules and regulations as the Minister of Agriculture shall prescribe and in accordance with the arrangements which may be made between the said Minister and the Grand Trunk, the Great Western and the Canada Southern railway companies, for the proper carrying out of the present order, and the necessary measures to save the live stock of Canada from the dangers of contagion and infection.

16. Amongst other things, these arrangements of the Minister of Agriculture shall provide :—

The following are the provisions :—

(a.) That an inspection of the said cattle and swine shall be made before they are admitted in transit, permission for which transit shall only be given on a certificate or clean bill of health from the inspector, he being a veterinary surgeon appointed by the said minister ;

This does not say whether the inspection shall take place at night or in the daytime. It seems passing strange to a medical man to hear it said that an inspection cannot be made at night. It might as well be said that a medical man cannot examine a patient at night and do it properly, as to say that a veterinary surgeon cannot examine an animal if the necessary appliances and conveniences are furnished. And if it can be shown, as I believe it can be shown, that these appliances and conveniences were furnished, there is no reason why the inspection should not be made as well at night as in the daytime. The next regulation is as follows :—

(b.) That each train carrying American cattle or swine or both, from frontier to frontier in bond, shall be accompanied by one of the staff or guardians, also to be appointed by the said minister.

This is the only part of the regulations that, so far as I know, was not literally complied with—that the officer appointed by the Government should go on the train through the country. But when you remember that these cattle were carried through in bond, that the cars were locked and the doors could not be opened during the time they were passing through Canada, except it might be when they were taken out to be fed and watered at Lyn station, and that then the cars were kept in an enclosure, so that there could be no communication between animals taken from the car and those in the vicinity, it can readily be understood that there could be no great danger from these cattle passing through, even if they were not accompanied by an inspector of the Government. But I am told that another device was adopted so as to make sure that the regulations were carried out, and that was to have the inspector visit the trains as they passed, sometimes at one station, sometimes at another, to see that the regulations were strictly carried out, and in no instance was it found that they were not being carried out. If the cattle were being carried through in locked cars there could hardly be the possibility the hon. gentleman suggests of their being shunted off on some siding and left there for a length of time. The hon. gentleman seems to forget that these trains were carrying the cattle through as rapidly as possible, so that the cars could not be shunted at way-stations, where the cattle could not be fed and watered. Not only is it not probable that such a thing was done, but we have no knowledge of any instance of that kind. Such a thing would have been not only a violation of the regulations, but a gross cruelty to the animals and an injury to them by leaving them without food and water. The next regulation provides :

(c.) That the cars and trucks employed for such traffic be specially and exclusively devoted to such purpose.

I am not aware that there was any violation of this regulation. It is true that it was alleged by some party as a rumour that these cars were used or might have been used to carry Canadian cattle. But there is no authenticated case given of the cars having been used for any other purpose than that for which they were intended by the railway companies in this trade—the carrying of these cattle through from one point in the United States to another point in that country. The next clause of the regulations is as follows :—

(d.) That no Canadian animals shall be carried at any time in the same train in company with, nor in close proximity to, American cattle or swine, and that no car or truck employed in the American cattle and swine transport, shall be used to carry, at any time, Canadian animals.

It is not charged that there was any violation of this regulation and the correspondence discloses no such violation. Section E of the regulation is as follows:—

(e.) That no unnecessary delay occur with any train engaged in the said transit passing through Canadian territory.

As I have already said, it is not likely that the cars were shunted at way-stations or left on sidings as alleged by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). The whole object was to get these trains through as rapidly as possible. The next section of the regulation is as follows:—

(f.) That due precautions be taken to retain in the cars or trucks and disinfect if need be the droppings of cattle and swine thus carried in transit;

“If need be,” that is if, in the judgment of the veterinary expert whose duty it was to look after the cattle it was necessary that disinfecting should take place, it was to take place.

(g.) That no such cattle or swine, nor their carcasses in case of death occurring (unless immediately buried under directions of the proper guardian) nor parts thereof, nor articles having been employed about them, be permitted to remain in Canada nor to come in contact with any person or persons, other than those engaged on the train, or thing whilst thus undergoing the said transit.

17. Inasmuch as it is of absolute necessity, owing to the length of the trip, on the Grand Trunk railway, to provide for a place where American cattle and swine can be fed, watered and rested, it is ordered that the said resting place shall be established at the station of Lyn, in the province of Ontario, where a double, isolated enclosure shall be provided by the railway company, selected, established and fitted to the satisfaction of the Minister of Agriculture, before the said company is permitted to transport American cattle or swine over their line. The said enclosure, besides other requisites, shall be provided with a high board fence and a vacant space around the said board fence, the said outside spaces to be also fenced, in order to prevent any approach to the inner enclosure; the said inner inclosure shall be provided with a special siding, with two locked doors, for the admission and isolation, under key, of the cars or trucks carrying American cattle or swine in transit.

18. The two fenced enclosures mentioned in the next foregoing section, situated at the Grand Trunk Railway station at Lyn, in the province of Ontario, with all appurtenances therein, or things belonging thereto, is hereby declared to be an infected place, in the meaning and for all purposes of the ‘Act to provide against infectious or contagious diseases affecting animals.’

19. The enclosures through which American cattle and swine enter Canada, in transit at Sarnia, on the Grand Trunk line, must be arranged, fitted and isolated in like manner, to the satisfaction of the Minister of Agriculture, and the said enlosures situated on the Grand Trunk Railway grounds, on the frontier, with everything thereto appertaining, are also declared hereby to be an infected place.

The enclosures through which American cattle and swine enter Canada in transit at Sarnia, on the Grand Trunk line, must be arranged, fitted and isolated in like manner, to the satisfaction of the Minister of Agriculture, and the said enclosures situated on the Grand Trunk Railway grounds, on the frontier, with everything thereto appertaining, are also declared hereby to be an infected place.

Now, those are the regulations upon which the transport of American cattle was to be allowed through Canada, and in not a single instance have they been violated, so far as the department could ascertain from authentic information, except that in one case where a party was to accompany each train through the country, another device was adopted of sending parties from station to station to visit these trains and ascertain that the regulations were strictly enforced, and it was found that they were strictly enforced. Then, because the cars were locked when they were passing through Canada, and were taken through as rapidly as possible, it was not thought necessary that this portion of the regulations should be carried out. Then the next question is, Who made these regulations and who carried them out? Dr. Smith, professor in the Veterinary College at Toronto, was appointed in 1882 for the purpose of seeing these regulations effectually carried out, and for the purpose of taking such other means as would prevent any importation of disease. Dr. Smith was informed that an Order in Council had been passed appointing him to do that duty. He was the party upon whose advice Dr. Wright was appointed to look after this duty at Windsor and at Sarnia, and he (Dr. Wright) had associated with him three other veterinary surgeons, every one of whom were graduates, I believe, of the Veterinary College of Toronto, and were believed to be competent men, and were reported to the department as men competent to do their duty. After a while application was made by the Grand Trunk Railway Company that the inspection should take place at night; before that time it was done in the daytime. But the Deputy Minister, before authorizing that it might be done at night, consulted Dr. McEachran, who was the veterinary surgeon that gave advice to the department regarding that branch of business, and Dr. Smith, of Toronto, and they both agreed that the inspection might be carried on at night with sufficient accuracy to ascertain if any sick animals were on the train. I believe that is about all that could be accomplished by this inspection, for it must be understood that the inspection was not of a nature that would enable any one to detect pleuro-pneumonia in its incipient stage. These regulations were made in 1880, and up to that time there was no means known to the profession by which pleuro-pneumonia could be effectually diagnosed, it could only be done by post-mortem examination. But in its incipient stage, it was impossible to tell whether it existed or not. The inspection might be made in the daytime or at night, and a competent surgeon would not be able to detect its existence until after it had become well established. Now, to show that the inspection which was made at night was sufficiently ample, I will read the reply of Dr. Smith, with whom the department communicated to ascertain if it was effectually carried out, because it was rumoured that the inspection was of a pro forma character. The letter is dated May 5, 1882, and is addressed to J. Lowe, Esq., Secretary of the Department of Agriculture:

In reply to yours of the 2nd, just received, I have to state that night inspection at Point Edward appears to work well. The company have the yards fitted with large lamps, and inspection can be safely and easily made. I think the same ought to be done at Windsor and Amherstburg. If arrangements were made similar to those at Point Edward, it would not be advisable to appoint any one as assistant inspector except a regularly qualified veterinary surgeon. If an assistant is really necessary a qualified man can be got to act.

And afterwards qualified men were appointed to assist Dr. Wright in this duty, and I am told that the necessary requirements were provided for carrying on this inspection at night.

Mr. Burton of the G.T.R. called the other day in regard to inspection at Windsor, thinking that Mr. Wright occasionally caused a little unnecessary delay. I promised to attend to the matter and will go to Windsor, and may possibly stimulate Mr. Wright if there is unnecessary delay. I believe shippers complain when cattle are detained over a whole night.

That complaint was made, that cattle were detained the whole night for the purpose of inspection in daylight, and that during the cold weather of winter, it was cruelty to the animals, and it was an interference with the carrying trade of the Grand Trunk Railway. To avoid that difficulty an arrangement was made that the inspection should take place at night, the same as in the daytime.

If Mr. Wright and Mr. Matthews are not already notified of my appointment as general inspector, it would be well for you to notify them immediately. There are over 30 head of cattle in quarantine now.

Cattle that were found to be suffering from disease were put in quarantine and kept there. I give this as an evidence that the inspection was not of a profunctorary character, but it was made for the purpose of ascertaining that no diseased cattle were brought into the country. If they were diseased, they were taken out of the trains and kept there, and when they were diseased to such an extent as to be incurable, they were slaughtered according to the regulations

I have read, and in no instance were they allowed to pass through the country.

I have given instructions to Mr. Westell to enclose a couple of paddocks at quarantine building. The whole ground should be fenced immediately.

And it was fenced in immediately after that. This was in 1882, and that inspection has been carried out to the present time. You will notice by this letter that Dr. Smith is anxious that Dr. Wright, who was the inspector there, should be informed that the department had by Order in Council authorized him to oversee this work. Dr. Smith, who was at the head of the Toronto Veterinary College, was believed to be one of the most able experts of Ontario, and for that reason he was appointed to carry out these regulations and to suggest such changes as might more effectually prevent the importation of the cattle diseased from the United States to Canada. Associated with him was Dr. McEachran, who was consulted in cases where it was thought advisable to secure further advice. Now, the hon. member for North York read several letters, in which the Deputy Minister of Agriculture had called the attention of the Grand Trunk Railway from time to time to the importance of strictly carrying out these regulations. That was what he was appointed to do, and he did it, I think, wisely, and in harmony with the regulations entered into with the British Board of Agriculture. Whenever a report came to him of any relaxation of the enforcement of the regulations, the notice of the Grand Trunk Railway authorities was called to it in order that there should be no neglect in the strict enforcement of the regulations. It seems that at one time some certificates were issued giving a clean bill of health to cattle passing through Canada without the inspection having first been made. As soon as that was brought to the attention of Dr. Smith and Dr. McEachran, the practice was stopped at once, and no more such certificates were given, and no such certificates were at any time given with the knowledge and consent of the Minister of Agriculture or of the veterinary surgeons. That was one of the things done by Dr. Wright for which there was no authority, and for which there was really no palliation. It is contended that Dr. Wright should have been dismissed long before he was dismissed. Now, when his neglect of duty was brought to the notice of the department, the department instructed Dr. Smith to dismiss this man, saying that his conduct was such that it could not be tolerated. He was one of Dr. Smith's pupils, and as he pleaded to be retained, and admitted that he had done wrong, and as Dr. Smith believed him to be a competent man and believed that he would be more strict in carrying out the regulations in future, he allowed him to remain after a reprimand. After that we have no information or no evidence that he did not do his duty faithfully, until it was found at last that he was following his profession as a medical man in Detroit. He was requested to give his whole time to this work and to reside in Windsor, and when he refused to do so, he was dismissed by the department. In all these letters there is nothing to show that the regulations were not carried out. It seems most unfortunate that the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) should have brought this subject to the attention of the House at the present time. Only to-day we have been notified from the old country that the Board of Agriculture is considering, perhaps for the last time, the question as to whether or not the embargo should be raised on Canadian cattle.

Mr. MULOCK. And has decided that it should not be for the present.

Mr. SPROULE. I have not seen any notice that the Board decided it should not.

Mr. MULOCK. That is what the press says.

Mr. SPROULE. We have had no notice up to the present time as to what the decision of the Board is; but it is most unfortunate that when the Board is about to give a decision, and it may be a decision in our favour, that the hon. gentleman has brought this subject to the attention of the House, not, I venture to say, for the purpose of securing a more thorough or strict surveillance over this very important matter, but for the purpose of giving the world the information as regards any weak features in our system, and giving this information not only to the Canadian people, but also to the British people, and thus possibly preventing them determining this question in our favour. I do not think this question could have been brought to the attention of the House at a more unfortunate time. I do not think that any man is a friend of the farmers of Canada who has brought to the House this subject in the way it has been submitted to-night. I regret that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has been so extravagant in his language, and that what he said has been so unreliable, because there is not a particle of evidence to justify the allegations made before this House and the country. There has been no violation of the regulations, and the very fact that they have been faithfully carried out for fourteen years, and during all that time no case of pleuro-pneumonia or any other infectious or contagious disease has been imported into the country, should afford the strongest argument that the examinations were effectual for the purpose for which they were intended, and were not carried out in the perfunctory manner alleged by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock).

Mr. SPROULE.

The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) asked: Where did the animal come from that was said to be affected with pleuro-pneumonia? It came from Pilot Mound, in Manitoba. The hon. gentleman then said that it had been brought in from the western states. If the hon. gentleman had taken the trouble to obtain the necessary information, he would have found on inquiry that the animal came from Ontario, and not from the western states; that it was taken from Ontario to Pilot Mound, where it remained some time. That was one of the animals affected. The hon. gentleman mentioned another animal, and he asked where that came from. I may inform him that it came from Wolf Island, near Kingston, where it had been isolated, except as regards a few head, for months, before it was sold, and subsequently exported. These were the two animals, in regard to which the examination was made in Great Britain, one being carried by the 'Monkseaton,' and the other by the 'Huronian.' Both these animals belong to Ontario, where no similar disease had prevailed. The herd had been inspected, but no cases of disease had been discovered, and not only so, but herds in the neighbourhood were inspected, and no disease found. When this information could be obtained from the returns published it is unfair for an hon. gentleman to come to the House and endeavour for the purpose of making a point, either against the Minister of Agriculture or the Government, to endeavour to lead the Canadian farmer to the conclusion that there was a relaxation of the regulations, and that disease had been imported into the country through laxity in carrying out the quarantine regulations as regards the United States, when in reality nothing of the kind had occurred. Every precaution that the Department of Agriculture could exercise that would tend to satisfy the British Board of Agriculture that pleuro pneumonia did not exist in Canada had been strictly carried out. Offers were made to the British Board to send out their own experts, and the Government here would pay the expenses. That offer was refused. Every effort was made that could be made, either by the Department of Agriculture or by the veterinary surgeons, to satisfy the people of England that pleuro-pneumonia did not exist in Canada, and when those regulations were carried out strictly and in harmony with the agreement, there is no justification for an attack being made on the Government to-night by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) and the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), not for the purpose of showing the world that the regulations were not carried out, but I believe, if possible, for the purpose of creating a feeling among the farmers that in some manner their interests had not been faithfully looked after by the present Government, or by the Minister of Agriculture, who for the time being was in charge of the department.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have been astonished that the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Sproule) should have found so much fault with the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) for bringing this subject to the attention of the House. The hon. gentleman has forgotten that on the 18th of last month he brought the same question before the House. He has also forgotten that in the evidence adduced there were some violations of the regulations. In the 'Hansard' of the 18th June, I find the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Sproule) read the following:—

On 12th November Mr. Stiff writes to Mr. Hickson a narrative of the facts, adding, I presume, if he carries out his threat to publish his views on the transportation of stock through Canada, he would do some injury, and that the touchiness which the English people have about this cattle disease, it might lead to the shipments being again stopped, but, in my opinion, it is a question whether we should submit to what must be considered as blackmail, or whether the Government will not be prepared to risk his threats and put some other man in his place. I should think that he had by signing Mr. Reynold's letter, dated 8th November, committed himself to such an extent that the Government would have no hesitation in dispensing with his services.

What effect would the publication of such a statement have on the trade of Canada when it appeared that the regulations and conditions had not been faithfully carried out? I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should have endeavoured to make it appear that we on this side of the House had no right to criticise the actions of the Government. That is the object and purpose of the Opposition, and we have been found fault with because we have not on certain occasions criticised the Government's action. I was also surprised that both the President of the Council and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should have stated that the question was not as regards the regulations, but whether there had been any disease brought into the country. I have a short statement here from Great Britain on this point. It is to this effect:

The question of the existence of the disease in Canada is not the only fact to which the Board are required by law to take into account in this matter. They are further bound to be satisfied that the Canadian laws relating inter alia to the importation of animals are such as to afford reasonable security against the importation into this country of diseased animals brought therefrom, and even if it were established beyond all question that the diseased animals imported in the 'Monkseaton' and 'Huronian' were not infected in Canadian territory the Board could only conclude that the law and regulations regarding the admission of American cattle across the Canadian border were either in themselves defective or that they were not enforced with complete efficiency,

Such is the opinion of the British people.

Have they any cause for holding that opinion? Let us see what was the condition of affairs from 1878 down to February, 1893, and the best way in which I can explain the matter is by referring to 'Hansard.' After the cattle had been scheduled, being deeply interested in that trade, I watched all the papers I could get. I had certain papers sent out from Great Britain to me, which were marked. One was marked with reference to cattle coming from the United States into the North-west Territories on inspection only, and the regulations not being strictly enforced. On that point I put a question in this House on the 20th of February, 1893, as to whether the Government had taken means to enforce a strict quarantine. Our cattle were scheduled in the month of October, 1892, and cattle from the United States were allowed to enter the North-west Territories only on inspection until the date of my question. The question I put was as follows:—

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron) asked, Whether settlers' cattle are admitted into the Canadian North-west from the United States without quarantine: on inspection only? If so is it the intention of the Government to enforce quarantine regulations against all American cattle entering Canada? Have representations been made to the Government at any time, either written or verbal, of the danger of the British Government scheduling Canadian cattle if settlers' cattle were admitted into Manitoba and the North-west Territories from the United States without quarantine?

The answer I got was:

Mr. FOSTER. Settlers' cattle are not admitted into the Canadian North-west from the United States without quarantine, and they are admitted on inspection only.

There is an admission that the cattle were admitted on inspection only. Had that any effect on the people in the old country with respect to our cattle in Canada? I say most certainly it had, and here is the proof of that on page 48 of that same document which was issued in Great Britain with respect to the disease in Canada:

It appears by the correspondence inclosed by Sir Charles Tupper that the Dominion Government has now extended the regulation requiring 90 days quarantine to settlers' cattle coming into Manitoba and the North-west Territories, so that this 90 days quarantine is now enforced along the whole length of the boundary line.

How long was that after the Order in Council was passed? Only seven days after my question was put. Showing conclusively that the Government of Great Britain knew full well that the quarantine regulations were not enforced. Now, we have been told that the people of Canada will not be in sympathy with what the hon. member for North York and the hon. member for North Wellington have done. I hold in my hand a paper which shows a little of the feeling among the farmers of Ontario at least with respect to this subject. It says:

One regulation was that all cattle should be unloaded and inspected on the American side by a competent veterinary surgeon before passing into Canada.

I was astonished at the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Sproule) saying that by taking a lamp to the side of a car you could inspect cattle at night as well as in the daytime. Any one who knows anything about the inspection of cattle knows that that is impossible. This article goes on :

All inspection was to be made in the daytime. Since about 1884 no cattle have been taken from the cars. The Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Lowe, said he would "wink" at such violation of the regulations. This was a concession to the roads. Then the road complained that they could not time their cattle trains so as to reach the frontier in the daytime, and night inspection (in the cars) was permitted, which was a roaring farce. Dr. Wright, who is a veterinary surgeon as well as a practising physician and a life-long Tory, was the inspector at Detroit. He made up his mind that as the inspection he was permitted to make was a farce, he might as well make none at all, and he did not. Ostensibly because he would not move to Windsor the Government dismissed him a few years ago, and he at once forwarded the facts to the Imperial Government. In six weeks the Canadian cattle were embargoed. Thus the interest of the railroads were regarded as paramount by the Government to the interest of the farmers. Rather than enforce the regulations of the Imperial Government, which would have been a serious blow, of course, at the transit trade of the railways, the Government winked at their violation, and in fact ordered their violation, with the result that while the railways have profited by the American cattle trade, the Canadian farmers have lost their only market for cattle.

This is the opinion of the organ of the Patrons of Industry of western Ontario. But it goes further than that; it comes down to the inspection in the month of May of the present year, and I will read what it says :

Grand Vice-President Currie, Grand Trustee Kennedy and the editor of the 'Sun' visited the western frontier last week for the purpose of witnessing an actual inspection of cattle. All that had previously been charged regarding inspection was verified and more. At Sarnia the cattle trains, usually numbering from two to five, are brought into Canada before the inspection is made. This is another violation of the regulations agreed to by the Imperial Government, for which the Dominion authorities are reprehensible. The inspection of an entire train load of cattle is completed in a few minutes, the inspector's remarks being that it is "only a matter of form." Usually the trains arrive at the tunnel during the afternoon and are crossed, inspected and forwarded before nightfall, so that night inspection is not so frequent there as at Windsor. The rule in both places to unload the cattle from the cars is seldom observed.

What are the authorities going to do about this open contempt for the rights of the farmers of Canada?

There is the sympathy that the farmers of Canada are extending to my hon. friend from

Mr. McMILLAN.

North York, and also to my hon. friend from North Wellington their sympathy. I am perfectly aware that they are alive to this question—nay further, that it is creating considerable excitement among them. About a week ago, at a large gathering of farmers, the question was brought up and discussed thoroughly, and this paper was placed in my hand and I was asked to read the last article. So that the farmers are in reality alive to this question. I believe myself that the scheduling was caused to a considerable extent by cattle being allowed to come into the North-west from 1878 up to the time the change was made, as stated to me by the Finance Minister, on the 20th of February, 1893; and when it was found that those cattle had been traced to the North-west Territories, although it could not be said that it was really pleuro-pneumonia that affected them, a feeling arose among the people of Great Britain that the cattle had been in contact with cattle affected by that disease which had come from the United States. They then asked that the Government of Canada should take such measures as would prevent all cattle coming into Canada, except for breeding and exhibition purposes, showing conclusively that they believed the country was in a dangerous condition. The scheduling of our cattle has been a considerable injury to the trade, there is not the slightest doubt of that, and in my opinion it will not be easily removed. I think that if the conditions under which cattle are taken across Canadian territory had been strictly insisted upon and the quarantine regulations in the North-west properly enforced, it would not have taken so deep a hold. That was the time the Government should have looked after the matter and taken proper steps to give no cause whatever for suspicion of the disease coming to this country.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. As a farmer, and a man interested in cattle, I feel bound to say a few words before this debate closes. One thing I am pleased to see has been brought out by this discussion, and that is the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that there is no pleuro-pneumonia in Canada. That is where the whole interest centres. I wish to point out to the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) who brought this question up, and has wasted the whole day on it, that, according to the opinion of his right hand man, there is no pleuro-pneumonia in Canada. I hold the hon. member for North York accountable for this whole turmoil over this question. When the hon. gentleman was reading all those letters and extracts, he reminded me very much of the old lady who went to church on Sunday and came home very much displeased with the sermon. A few days afterwards, she explained to one of the deacons who called on her why she felt so angry. I do not believe, she said, in a read sermon, in the first place, and, in the next place, I want it to be well read. And then she went on to say that the sermon she heard was neither well read, or worth the reading after it was done, which I think fairly applies to the hon. member for North York. Now, I wish to say that, as a farmer, I do not believe in raising this turmoil at all. I think it is an injury to Canada; I think that if ever there was a time when hon. gentlemen opposite should hold their peace, that time is just now. If we ever had a chance to have this embargo removed, the time, I believe, has come, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite come forward and almost throw out the challenge that it will not be removed. We should be straightforward and candid and, above all, true Canadians, and hon. gentlemen opposite are not true to their country when they seek to raise all this turmoil which cannot but tend to delay the time when the embargo will be removed. If hon. gentlemen opposite should ever keep their peace, it is now, when we should be careful not to excite any feeling of suspicion so as to afford an excuse for the continuing of the embargo. As a member of the Agricultural Committee, and as a farmer, I have looked very carefully into this matter, and I do not believe that the Government have been remiss in their duty. I believe they have done everything in their power to have the embargo removed. The English Government to-day is just in the position in which the American Government were in under the McKinley Bill, when the farmers of the United States forced their Government to put a high duty on our Canadian barley and other products of the Canadian farmer. I believe that the pressure of the farmers has been brought to bear on the English Government, but when we find men like the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) admit that there is no disease in Canada—a statement which I can cordially endorse—one can find no excuse, save the desire to gain, perhaps, some little party advantage, for the conduct of the hon. member for North York in exaggerating trifles and seeking to prejudice our case by a laboured and pica-yune criticism based on little technical points. I hope the Government will do as they have done in the past—do everything they can for the farmer. When I was running my by-election in South Victoria, I tried to educate the farmers of that county into the belief that we had an advantage over the Americans in shipping of cattle to Europe, but my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) came there on two occasions and said we had not. To-day, however, he tries to show that we did have an advantage but lost it through some little deficiency in some of the departments. I believe that our Government have done everything they could and am not afraid to assume the responsibility of telling hon. gentlemen opposite that they art not in the race. We farmers are just as keen observers as some of those hon. gentlemen who study law and know where our own interests lie, and we know that speeches such as those made by the hon. member for North York and those who supported him, are calculated to do us great injury at a very critical time.

Amendment negatived. and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

To pay further amount to Mr. Thomas Skinner for services in connection with the transfer of the financial agency in London..... $1,000

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This vote is required as a further payment to Mr. Skinner for his services respecting the transfer of the financial agency in London. In the session of 1893, $2,000 was voted, of which Mr. Skinner received $860.09 for services, the balance being for disbursements made by him. This $1,000 is thought no more than equivalent (in addition to the $860.09 already paid him) for the valuable assistance given by him.

Mr. LAURIER. I did not quite catch the explanation. Is this a balance due or a gratuity?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is really a balance due for Mr. Skinner's services.

Mr. LAURIER. Due under contract, or is it simply the estimated value of his services?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The estimated value of his services.

To pay the Crown agents for the Colonies one-half of one per cent commission and one-fourth of one per cent brokerage on amount of B.C. loan redeemed $3,500

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is to meet the brokerage required to be paid the Crown agent on account of the redemption on 1st

Mr. FAIRBAIRN.

April of $93,200 British Columbia 5 per cent bonds. The brokerage is paid under the agreement with the Crown agents when the loan was floated, and the amount was overlooked when preparing the Estimates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does that close the account with them, or will you require to make payments from time to time of a similar nature?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understood that this was the final redemption of the British Columbia loan.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to ask the Government when the Year-book will be laid before Parliament.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is very nearly ready, I believe.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 2.10 a.m. (Thursday.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 5th July, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery the certificate of the election and return of Henry Corby, Esquire, for the electoral district of West Hastings.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Henry Corby, Esquire, member for the electoral district of West Hastings, introduced by Sir John Thompson and Mr. Northrup.

AGENCY OFFICE AT CHICAGO.

Mr. GIROUARD (Two Mountains) asked, 1. Whether the Government have received a petition, signed by most of the Canadians, British-American citizens of the state of Illinois, asking for the establishment of an agency office at Chicago, with a view to protect the interests of Canada in the American North-west? 2. If so, did the said petition recommend the appointment of any person, as agent, for the management of the said office? 3. Have the Government considered the said petition? 4. Is it the intention of the Government to establish an agency office at Chicago, as requested in the said petition?

Mr. DALY. 1. Yes. 2. The petition recommended the appointment of Mr. Daniel Bergevin, of Chicago, for the management of the office. 3. Yes. 4. The Government intimated to the petitioners through the Secretary of State that it was not the intention to establish such an agency at Chicago.

DRAWBACK ON IRON AND STEEL BRIDGES.

Mr. HAGGART moved that, to-morrow, the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that the words "original construction," in section 1 of chapter 7 of the Statutes of 1882, respecting the allowance of drawback on certain articles manufactured in Canada, for use in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, shall be construed to extend to and include the first iron or steel bridge erected in a locality, but not to any renewal or repair thereof.

Motion agreed to.

DAIRY REPORTS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct the attention of the House to the fact that the dairy reports that were ordered to be printed some time in March, 1893, have not yet been printed. In addition to that, the report of the committee submitted some time ago this session, ordering the printing of certain dairy reports, and reports concerning the agricultural farm, has not yet, so far as I can see, been adopted by the House. I think it is important to the dairying section of the community, and to farmers generally, under present circumstances, that this information should be given to them. In view of the large expense to which the country is put for the maintenance of the Experimental Farm and in paying the salaries of experts to instruct the people on dairying and other subjects affecting the farmers of this country, it is only right that these reports should be printed and circulated. After a few copies have been printed for circulation among the members, and while the type is set up, I cannot understand why the order of the House has not been complied with, and why these reports have not been printed in larger numbers and placed in general circulation. Representing a section largely interested in this industry, which is one of the largest in Canada, I may say that the people engaged in dairying take great interest in these reports, and I should like to know why this matter has not been attended to. If the report should be much longer delayed, it will be so old as to be useless.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand that as regards last year's proceedings, the report of Professor Robertson did not come in until this session, and the decision of the committee in regard to its publication does not now prevail, and the matter will again have to be considered by the committee. As regards the proposed issue of 75,000 copies of the report this year, that has not yet been moved, and I ask the House not to adopt it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the hon. gentleman is referring to the report of this year. The report adopted last year authorized the printing of a certain number of copies.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am referring to the report of Professor Robertson last year, which was not completed until after the expiration of the session. I hope the House will not adopt the practice of making an enormous distribution of these reports relating to the experimental farms. It is proposed to print 75,000 of the reports of the last two years, and the cost will almost equal that of the vote for the experimental farm itself.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. MARTIN. With respect to the return ordered some months ago as to the Columbian Exhibition, I desire to say that it has not yet been brought down. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) moved for a return on this subject, and I moved for a similar return. Some correspondence took place with the officials with regard to combining them, a proposal to which I was agreeable so long as all the information was obtained. It is high time that report was brought down.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Inquiries will at once be made in regard to it.

Mr. McMULLEN. A return ordered by the House on 30th March last as to the cost of constructing buildings in the North-west Territories has not yet been brought down.

Mr. OUIMET. I inquired in the department, and the answer given was that the work was being proceeded with. I will make further inquiry.

SUPPLY—FREIGHT RATES IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). I desire to ask what action has been taken in regard to a largely signed petition from the North-west Territories protesting against the exceptionally high freight rates charged on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and also asking for immediate aid towards the building of the Hudson's Bay Railway. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Boyd) and myself lately had an interview with the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway on the subject of a reduction of the rates in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. That gentleman claimed it was impossible for the company to reduce the rates. He also claimed that the company was not charging excessive rates, and that this could be proved by a letter dated 14th June, which he had sent to the Government. I would ask the Government what that letter contains, and what action they propose to take in regard to it, as it is quite plain to me that the Canadian Pacific Railway do not intend to reduce present freight rates. It is utterly impossible for the farmers of the North-west to pay the present rates, owing to the extremely low price of their products. I therefore ask the Government to appoint a commission to go fully into this question of freight rates.

Mr. DAVIN. In regard to the matter which has been brought before the House by my hon. friend from Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald), I desire to say a few words. There cannot be the least doubt that the question of the cost of the transport of the produce of the west to the seaboard is a vital question to us; nor can it be doubted for one moment that there is diffused through the North-west Territories and Manitoba at this moment an impression, whether ill or well grounded, that the freight rates are excessive. The farmers of the North-west have very little prospect of a rise in prices, because, instead of a diminished quantity being produced in the future, the prospects are that a very much larger quantity will be produced. Last year the Argentine Republic of South America, which is one of the greatest competitors the North-west has to fear, had a yield of sixty-six million bushels of wheat. The prospects this year are that the produce will be about two hundred and sixty million bushels. There is no prospect that the yield around the Black Sea or the yield in India will decrease, but on the contrary, that it will increase. And, therefore, there being no prospect of a great European war, and I doubt if an European war would so balance matters as to enable us to obtain such a price for our wheat as would be satisfactory to the farmers, and enable them to live comfortably and become prosperous—it is doubtful if the farmers would even under those circumstances be able to pay the rates they now pay. On the other hand, when we go to the railway company, the reply is that the railway companies cannot carry wheat at a lower rate than that at present prevailing, and the reason they cannot carry it is this: They say there is no comparison between their position and the lines with which the comparison is made. Such comparison is made between certain lines of railway which carry one hundred pounds for every five pounds carried by the Canadian Pacific Railway. If the time should come when that company should get to carry one hundred pounds in place of five pounds carried now, or even a greater relative disparity, the company might be able to carry produce at a lower rate than is the case to-day. Not only is there no prospect that the managers of the Canadian Pacific Railway will be willing to lower their rates, but they themselves say there is no prospect of their being able to lower the rates, that they are at the present time carrying produce to the seaboard at rates if anything too low. The hon. gentleman has suggested the appointment of a Royal Commission. If the object is merely to inquire into the relative rates, that is to say, the rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway as compared with eastern-going railways, I do not think a Royal Commission will be necessary. A Royal Commission would be cumbersome; it would take a long time to establish an end that is very easily obtained. Nothing could be easier than for a departmental officer to go into the question of the traffic and rates of the various lines—to make a comparison, and to show the result. This is no recondite affair; this is no hidden mystery. It is not a thing that only a railway man can decide on. The Minister of Railways or his deputy, or the secretary or other efficient officer of his department, has only to make a departmental inquiry into this matter; and the result of an honest inquiry—and such an inquiry would be honest—and of an efficient inquiry—and we cannot doubt that if a proper man were chosen the inquiry would be efficient—would be just as certain, just as authoritative, as the result that would be arrived at by means of a commission; and it would be got at rapidly. On the other hand, I think a commission with broader scope might be useful. We might appoint a commission to inquire into the possibility of lowering the cost of carrying produce to the seaboard—the possibility, for instance, of making use of the waterways that are not now made use of. For instance, I was told two or three years ago that in one of the departments there is an accumulation of evidence, an accumulation of engineering knowledge in regard to the utilization of the Ottawa River, and the route that would be projected westward from that river. If that is there it would be of great advantage to have it brought before the public, with the view of determining whether or not we could use the Ottawa system of waterways for the purpose of carrying our produce at a cheaper rate to the seaboard. But, Sir, my hon. friend has referred to a petition that was laid on the Table here—I presented such a petition myself—in regard to the building of the Hudson Bay Railway. Now, that is a very large undertaking and various schemes are proposed in connection with it. One scheme is well known; it is for the building of that railway by a private company, exactly as the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, and this House has voted large subsidies for that purpose. On the other hand, a scheme has lately been put forward, and has been referred to in the Senate; but I must not speak of what has been done there. I may say, however, that the idea did not originate there, but with the farmers in the west who feel keenly the great necessity there is for cheapening the cost of carrying their produce to the Liverpool market. The idea is that the Government of Canada should itself build the Hudson's Bay Railway, that it should retain possession of the railway, manage it, and so control the freight rates upon it for all time. There was a time, Sir, when the proposal of the Government building such a railway would at once meet with disfavour in this House; and it probably is not one that will, at the present moment, commend itself to the great majority of hon. members. Some twelve years ago we had a commission to inquire into all the facts connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and one of the conclusions of that commission was that the building of a railway by a Government is an expensive method of building a railway—that the best and cheapest method—overwhelmingly the cheapest and the best—is by a private company. Because, what was proved before that commission? It was proved that when a Government builds a railway, people with political influence force their sons and their relatives into superfluous employment. It was proved that a Government running a railway have also to accept, whether they like it or not, the services of people whom they do not actually require, or, if they require additional service, the service is less efficient than would be accepted by a private company. Since that time we have seen, under the management of the present Minister of Railways, that a Government can manage a railway efficiently—that the extravagant cost of running a railway that was presented at one time by our Government railway was not a necessary incident of Government control. In Australia and in Belgium the respective Governments have, on the whole, successfully built and run Government railways. Therefore, on the face of it, the desire of those farmers in the west, who entrusted me and my hon. friend with petitions to this House on the subject of building the Hudson's Bay Railway by the Government, the Government controlling it, and therefore controlling the rates, and therefore being amenable to the necessities of its citizens, is not a desire for a chimerical or impracticable project. Now, Sir, we know something about the Hudson's Bay Railway. I suppose there is hardly a man listening to me who has not, at some time or other, taken an interest in that line. We know that such a railway would be capable of giving us for four or five months every year, cheap and short communication between the centre of the North-west and Liverpool. Therefore, although I would not favour a Royal Commission to inquire over so narrow a range as my hon. friend from East Assiniboia has suggested, I would suggest to my hon. friend who is at the head of the Department of Railways that before we go into committee he should assure my hon. friend that he would have the inquiry made which my hon. friend wants; and I would suggest to the Government that a commission be appointed to inquire into the whole subject of cheapening the cost of transport of produce from the west to its Liverpool market. When I suggest the appointment of such a commission, I mean that the commission should be a small one. The inquiry is one that would not involve, strictly speaking, judicial action of any kind, and therefore those safeguards that are exacted when you employ a commission to make an inquiry involving in any way the conduct of individuals, are not necessary here. It is very useful, in ordinary circumstances, where you are making an inquiry which may affect the position or standing before the public of individuals, that you should have three or four or five—anyway, two or more commissioners, generally three; but in this case there would be no such necessity. I would suggest that one first-class man should be employed as commissioner, with a first-class secretary, and they would do all the work. I know something of commissions, and, generally speaking, the work is mainly done by two persons—one commissioner and the secretary. But the secretary does a great deal of work, as a rule, that is virtually the work of a commissioner as well.

Mr. LAURIER. For instance, the Chinese Commission.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes; in that commission I knew the secretary very well, and he did the work of a commissioner as well as that of secretary.

Mr. EDGAR. Perhaps familiarity would breed contempt.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Edgar) suggests that familiarity might breed contempt, but I will say to him that the rule that no man is a hero to his valet has certain exceptions, and although I was very familiar with that person, the more I knew of him the higher he was raised in my esteem. It is not my wish to delay the House one second more than is necessary, and in the fewest words possible I have made the suggestion. The hon. Minister of Railways could carry out all that my hon. friend desires by a departmental inquiry. That would give us results very rapidly, and to appoint a commission to inquire into the rates charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway and other railways, would be to employ a Nasmith hammer to crush a nut. But for the purpose that I suggest, which is a large matter, a commission properly conducted would give us information that would be of the greatest possible value, if it resulted in such a competition of routes or such a discovery of a route, either of swiftness, shortness and cheapness, as would relieve the farmer from the pressure he now complains of, when, owing to the cost of transit and the low price of wheat, the return he gets does not pay him for the labour and capital he has expended in producing his crop. I may say in this connection that we cannot be too strongly convinced that we have made a miscalculation in thinking that we could develop the North-west by making it the granary of Europe. That is an idea that the people in the North-west must get rid of. They must, of necessity, instead of confining themselves to the growing of wheat, go into the raising of cattle. As the Minister of Agriculture advises, we should go into mixed farming. But whether we go into mixed farming or exclusively into grain raising, we shall still have to meet the fact that we are at a great distance from the seaboard, and that the solution of the problem of the cost of transfer is vital to our prosperity. Therefore, I make no motion, but simply suggest to the Government that they should appoint an efficient commission to inquire into the whole subject of cheapening the cost of carrying our produce to the seaboard, and especially as to whether we shall not be able, in consonance with the suggestion that has come from the farmers themselves, to build such a Hudson's Bay railway as will bring us many thousands of miles nearer our market, and thus by shortening the route and by giving our people a route over which they will have control, we may be able to solve the question of cheapening the carriage of our products to the Liverpool market.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I suppose all the members of the House understand thoroughly the nature of the complaint to which the hon. members for Assiniboia have just referred, because we have seen the subject discussed in the press very fully, and it has been discussed at public meetings, and mentioned, I dare say, in this House. The petitions, however, that have been presented from the people of the North-west and Manitoba in connection with this subject are very numerous, signed indeed, and to give the House an idea of their character, I will read briefly the substance of one of them. There is a recital that the freight rates charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway, especially those on grain, the raising of which is the principal industry of the Territories, are exorbitant and unreasonable; that application has been frequently made to the company for redress and for reconsideration of the rates, and that the company has not acceded to those requests, notwithstanding the aid which the public treasury gave to the construction of the railway, and notwithstanding the grants of land this Parliament made to the company. There is a recital that the levying of excessive rates and tolls by the company is a very great burden, depressing the whole of the North-west and hindering its proper development, and causing emigration from the Territories, as settlers, after years of patient waiting, are giving up in despair of seeing a better state of affairs. The petitioners then conclude with the prayer that the Government will exercise the power given by law or bring such other pressure to bear on the railway company as may be necessary, in the interests of the whole people of the Territories, to reduce their rates in such a manner as to relieve the settlers of their unjust burden. And they likewise ask aid from this Parliament by money and guarantees for the purpose of building other railways, which are of absolute and immediate necessity in the very important and outlying settlements which were formed under promise of such railway facilities by the Government, both to prevent the present settlers giving up their present homesteads and leaving the country, as many are now prepared to do, through being unable to live there under existing circumstances, and to induce the much needed taking up of land by newcomers. They ask for immediate aid for the construction of the Hudson's Bay Railway which would insure, the petitioners state, the speedy development of the Territories, the building of branch lines and the opening up of millions of acres of Government land to settlement. That is the general form of petition, and it has been signed so numerously as to make up a volume. The petition has been considered by the Minister of Railways and other members of the Government and a communication of the complaints upon which the petition had been made was made to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, who have stated their defence in a letter dated 14th June, 1884, and directed to the Minister of Railways and Canals. This letter is signed by the secretary of the company. After acknowledging the petition of the residents of the North-west Territories with regard to freight rates, the secretary presents the following facts in reply:

Fleming is the easternmost point on our line in the North-west Territories and Edmonton is the most distant point from which grain is shipped. The grain rates and distances from these extreme points and from the principal intermediate points to Fort William are as follows:—

From Fleming, distance 637 miles, the rate is 21 cents per 100 pounds, or 12 6-10 cents per bushel, or 56-100 of a cent per ton per mile. From Broadview, distance 690 miles, the rate is 21 cents per 100 pounds, or 21 6-10 cents per bushel, or 61-100 of a cent per ton per mile. From Qu'Appelle, distance 750 miles, the rate is 22 cents per 100 pounds, or 12 2-10 cents per bushel, or 59-100 of a cent per ton per mile. From Moose Jaw, distance 824 miles, the rate is 23 cents per 100 pounds, or 13 8-10 cents per bushel, or 56-100 of a cent per ton per mile. From Swift Current, distance 937 miles, the rate is 25 cents per 100 pounds, or 15 cents per bushel, or 53-100 of a cent per ton per mile. From Medicine Hat, distance 1,086 miles, the rate is 27 cents per 100 pounds, or 26 1-10 cents per bushel, or 50-100 of a cent per ton per mile. From Calgary, distance 1,266 miles, the rate is 29 cents per 100 pounds, or 17 4-10 cents per bushel, or 46-100 of a cent per ton per mile. From Edmonton, distance 1,458 miles, the rate is 33 cents per 100 pounds, or 19 8-10 cents per bushel, or 45-100 of a cent per ton per mile.

I am directed to say that the directors believe these rates to be lower than the rates for grain transportation by railway anywhere else in the world, under anything approaching similar conditions, and, considering the fact that four-fifths of all the cars engaged in grain transportation have to be hauled back empty, and considering the high price of fuel and so forth, the directors do not believe that these rates afford the actual cost of transportation and they are unable to see how they can be reduced. I am further to point out that practically no grain is moved eastward from Fort William by rail except during the winter months, when lake navigation is closed. The rates from Fort William eastward by rail to Montreal average about one-half cent per ton per mile; and because of this transportation having to be performed during the winter months when it is most expensive because of the very small number of cars that can be loaded at that season, all of this winter transportation of grain eastward from Fort William is performed at a loss to the company. A very small proportion of the entire crop of the North-west is carried all the way by rail. As a rule, only special shipments for eastern mills or to fill special export orders are so carried. The great bulk of the crop must always be handled by the Lake route; for it can seldom bear any through rail rate that be afforded. I inclose a comparison for grain rates from our principal stations in the North-west with the grain rates of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railways, according to their tariffs in force on the 1st July last year, the latest of which we have any knowledge. These railways are operated under conditions similar to ours, but they have the advantage of being nearer their coal supply and having no duties to pay on it.

The directors feel that the interest of the country as well as of the company have been made to suffer by the unjust and unreasoning clamour that has been made in some quarters about these grain rates and they will be very glad if the Government will undertake an independent investigation of the question and carefully compare the situation of the farmers in the Canadian North-west with that of the farmers of the Western United States, of Russia, of India, of the Argentine Republic, of Australia and of the other principal wheat-producing regions of the world in regard to the cost of reaching the world's markets with their grain, taking into account terminal and transfer charges and everything of the kind; for if it is the fact, as the directors believe, that the wheat producers of the Canadian North-west are in a better position in this regard than are those of most of the other wheat-producing districts of the world, it will be a great advantage to have it authoritatively made known.

Then follows a comparison of the freight rates between points on the Canadian Pacific Railway and points of similar relative situation on the Great Northern and Northern Pacific, justifying, apparently, the statement contained in this letter—that the rates charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway are lower than those between corresponding points on the other transcontinental lines of railway. A portion of the petitioners, some months ago made application to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council to have a reconsideration of the schedule of rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The Railway Committee of the Privy Council met for the purpose of hearing their application, but the application was not pressed, although on two or three occasions the opportunity was given to bring it forward. It is quite easy to understand, of course, that the petitioners would be at very considerable disadvantage in pressing a case like that which they desired to present before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council sitting at a place so distant from their residence as Ottawa. They have probably no organization possessed of sufficient funds to defray the expense of pressing their case fully at such a distance, and, inasmuch as the letter of the secretary which I have just read agrees in stating that a full investigation and authoritative definition of what the real position of the company is as regards their rates, would be an advantage to the company as well as to the settler, the Government have arrived at the conclusion that a thorough investigation of the subject of these complaints, and investigation into all the questions which affect transportation in these regions, ought to be made as soon after the session of Parliament as it can be set on foot. I am not prepared to say at this moment whether that should take the form of a Royal Commission; the inclination of the Government is that it need not take that form, but that it can be more expeditiously made and with less cost, perhaps, by taking the form of a departmental inquiry by the Department of Railways and Canals; nor am I able to state at this moment the range which the investigation might take further than I have already done, that it will be a thorough investigation into the complaints made by these petitioners, and will be co-extensive with the nature of the requests contained in their petition. That will give them an opportunity of presenting their case much more fully than they could do in a remote part of the country, as this is to them, and will at the same time meet the wish of the railway company itself that there should be an authoritative statement as to the position of the company with regard to the complaints that have been made. I am therefore able to assure hon. members that an inquiry of that character will take place as soon as it reasonably can, and the House will then be in a better position to understand the merits of the case, as they now understand the nature of the complaints which have been made by the petitioners.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish to make a few remarks on this matter. I wish to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that the petition which the First Minister has read substantiates what I have already said with regard to this question. I also draw the attention of the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant), who read me a lecture a few days ago upon my attitude towards the North-west, to this expression of opinion from the settlers themselves, not given for political effect, but asking for redress, and substantiating the stand I have taken here with regard to the condition of the settlers in that country. I have attempted to show here that the large sums spent for immigration purposes in the North-west, result in no practical addition to the population there, and the reasons I have attempted to give are partially set forth in that petition. What do the settlers say there? They say: We must have relief, or else we shall leave the country. Now, Sir, is not that an important fact for this House to consider? We are spending $200,000 yearly to induce immigrants to come into the North-west Territories and into Manitoba, and we want to know why it is that in spite of this large expenditure that portion of Canada is not settled up. The answer given by these petitioners is that the settlers already there are seriously considering, many of them, whether they will not leave and abandon the country, not because it is not a good country, but because of the artificial restrictions imposed by this Parliament, which makes their lot such a one as that they cannot look forward to any assured degree of comfort. Now, it is proposed to satisfy the people there by means of what I may call the political dodge of a Royal Commission, or something of that kind, a commission to satisfy the people that they are not in the position which they know themselves to be in, that they are not being treated harshly, but that they are happy, prosperous and contented. I wish to characterize this proposition from the beginning, as a farce. It is utterly useless to attempt to satisfy the people up there by any such means as that of a Royal Commission for the purpose of substantiating the letter of the Canadian Pacific Railway people as to the impossibility of affording any relief upon this question. Now, what is their position, legally? Suppose the commission should find that the rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway are excessive, as the settlers claim them to be, is there any redress? Suppose this inquiry leads the Government to that conclusion, is there any remedy by which the company can be compelled to reduce these rates? No, Sir. This Parliament, and the party which has in charge at present the destinies of Canada, have forever bound themselves upon that question. There is no relief. The contract between the company and Canada provides that no control can be exercised by the Government of Canada over the rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway, until at least 10 per cent profit has been paid on the capital of the road. I may say that that capital was issued, a large part of it, at 25 cents on the dollar, so that only one-fourth of the capital of the company actually went into the railway so far as that issue is concerned; therefore, the company must make 40 per cent upon their capital before this Government can interfere. But it is not necessary to go into that matter. The limitation as to 10 per cent on their capital is quite effective for all practical purposes, because we may be sure that the company will at all times be able to show that their profits, allowing for repairs and keeping the road in shape, do not at any time amount to 10 per cent on the capital, or anything like that. Now, Mr. Speaker, when that contract was before this House, the Liberal party dealt with this particular subject, they anticipated the very circumstances which have arisen, and which we find before us to-day. The present Lord High Commissioner, then a member of this House, indulged in the most absurd and ridiculous prophecies as to the condition that country would be in ten years after the ratification of that contract. Six hundred and forty millions of bushels of wheat were to be sent out from there annually, the receipts from lands were to have amounted, before the end of 1890, to a sum large enough to reimburse Canada for its total expenditure in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. But hon. gentlemen on this side of the House took a calm and business-like view of the situation, and they pointed out what was likely to occur in this particular matter. They went further, and they put a motion upon the records of this House, which, if it had been carried, would have rendered a Royal Commission to inquire into the freight rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway, of some utility, because there would have been a power in the hands of the Government effectually to control the rates, and if they were not reasonable, to compel the company to make them reasonable. On January 26th, 1891, Mr. Béchard moved, in amendment, the following resolution. I read it in part only, as it covered several subjects:—

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

That the Governor in Council shall have the unrestricted right from time to time to regulate the tolls to be taken and to prescribe the accommodation to be given, and that Parliament shall be free to charter such other railways as the public interest required.

That resolution was voted down in this House by the aid of every member from Manitoba, and the Territories, supporting the Government, with the assistance of every member supporting the Government, and it was supported by the Liberal members of the House. If that proposition had been adopted, and was in force to-day, and if the statement of the settlers, embodied in their petition was correct, that the freight rates were so excessive that they were seriously considering the question as to whether they would abandon the country on that account, then it would have been in the power of the Government to ameliorate the condition of the settlers and compel the railway company to give them reasonable rates.

Mr. SPROULE. Why did you not put such a provision in the arrangement with the Northern Pacific Railway, when you gave them their charter?

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman said that once before; there was such a provision.

Mr. SPROULE. What became of it?

Mr. MARTIN. It is there yet; it is in force and is carried out.

Mr. SPROULE. What good does it do?

Mr. MARTIN. It has done a great deal of good.

Mr. IVES. Is the hon. gentleman aware that the Northern Pacific and the Canadian Pacific agreed to charge the same rates?

Mr. MARTIN. As this question has been brought up, I ask a few moments to explain this matter, as it is one of great importance. The aid given by the province of Manitoba to the Northern Pacific was $1,750 per mile. In the face of that aid, the hon. gentleman suggests we should ask that company to give us absolute control over their freight rates. But in the province of Ontario, the lowest sum given for a colonization road such as this was, running through a new country not well settled, was $3,200 per mile, and there was no proposition made for any restriction or any consideration to be given by the company except the mere building of the road. In the province of Quebec, the general rule has been to give colonization railways $6,000 per mile. That was done in regard to the railway from Hull to Aylmer and northward, and I believe that was a general rule. Therefore, it was perfectly absurd to expect any very great concession from the Northern Pacific Railway as regards freight arrangements. But the concession we asked was granted and carried out. At that time, 24 cents per one hundred pounds was charged from Winnipeg to Port Arthur. We insisted on a reduction of 3 cents per one hundred pounds, and the moment the Northern Pacific Railway entered upon construction, the rate having been made by the Canadian Pacific Railway that year, and circulars issued for 24 cents per one hundred pounds, a reduction to 21 cents a hundred was made. That was the concession we asked. It was granted and was carried out. If we had been able to give such a bonus or half, or a quarter of such a bonus as was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway, we would have obtained from the Northern Pacific Railway excellent arrangements as to freight rates. Hon. gentlemen will remember that any agreement with the Northern Pacific Railway as regards freight rates in Manitoba would be of very little avail. The reduction was on a line of railway already built, namely, from Pembina to Duluth, 400 miles.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). For how much per mile is the road now mortgaged?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). It cost $8,000 per mile, and is now mortgaged for $20,000 per mile.

Mr. MARTIN. What has that to do with the question at issue? We gave $1,750 per mile to the Northern Pacific Railway, in return for which they built 300 miles of road. I challenge hon. gentlemen to find, in the whole of this country, 300 miles of railway through a new country which has obtained less aid from the Government than the Northern Pacific line in Manitoba.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). Does the hon. gentleman call it a colonization railway from Winnipeg to the boundary?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes. It is through a new country, and one very thinly settled to-day. Moreover, it is only sixty-five miles in length. I did not consider that question had much to do with the question before the House, but, as it had been mentioned by the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule), I thought I would explain to the House the circumstances connected with it, and if the Government could show such a record as regards railways built by the public funds on small grants, it would be a different record from that which the Dominion Government are able to present to-day. It will be noticed that the petitions asked for the construction of the Hudson's Bay Railway; that is to say, that after this Government has spent an amount figured at $100,000,000 in bonusing the Canadian Pacific Railway for the purpose of building railways throughout Manitoba and the North-west, the people of Canada are again asked to expend millions of dollars in order to build a railway in competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway, which was practically built by the people of Canada. These people ask for the construction of this competing road in order to secure for them competition and cheap transit, and render it unnecessary for them to abandon the country, which has been opened up by Canada at such an enormous expense. Is not that a commentary on the action of the House in voting down the resolution submitted by Mr. Béchard, which I have read. I should like to point out to the settlers in the North-west, that no word of encouragement with respect to the prosecution of the building of the Hudson's Bay Railway has fallen from the First Minister to-day. I hope the hon. members for Assiniboia, when they go back and tell their constituents about the acceptance of this petition, will remember that they are unable to express one word, or give any real hope that the Government would spend one dollar on the construction of the Hudson's Bay Railway. There is no hope for them. The right hon. gentleman did not think it worth while to say that he could not do anything. It was too absurd, and too much out of the question to consider it, and he did not even refer to it. The hon. gentleman read the clause of the petition which calls for the construction of the railway, but there is not a single word of explanation in his remarks. That is the position in which the settlers find themselves to-day. He has no expectation and no hope, and can have none, after the declaration of the Minister, of any aid to the Hudson's Bay Railway. He finds it impossible to raise wheat and pay the freight rates at present charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Government propose to have an inquiry; but if their inquiry results in showing that the railway company's charges are excessive, the Government are absolutely helpless to do anything for the settler—helpless by their own act. After deliberation and debate in this House, the question having been brought fairly forward, they have condemned for all time to come the settlers of the Canadian North-west to railway rates which shall yield to the investors in that company at least 10 per cent on the money they have paid in.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up the time of the House at any great length; but I think some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) require a reply from me. In the first place, the hon. gentleman said that the petitions which were read by the First Minister to the House exhibited the fact that the people were in such a position that they would have to leave the country unless a remedy were afforded them. The hon. gentleman would give the House to understand that these petitions set out that it was not the freight rates that the people complained of, but the burdens imposed upon them by the policy of this Government. But the fact is that the petitions say nothing whatever of the policy of the Government; they simply refer, as any one reading them will see, to the subject of freight rates. Now, Mr. Speaker, I cannot conceive of any person going back so completely on his own record as the hon. member for Winnipeg has had to do in reference to this question of freight rates. There was a time in the history of Manitoba, known to the people there, when the hon. gentleman went on platform after platform in that province telling the people how they were burdened by the freight rates imposed by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that the only means by which they could get a remedy for that state of affairs was to put himself and Mr. Greenway and other members of the Reform party into power—that just as soon as they got into power they would make this Government come down on their knees and do away with disallowance, and would proceed with the building of lines of railway in the country that would relieve the settlers of the burdens under which they were suffering.

Mr. MARTIN. I never said that.

Mr. DALY. As a matter of fact, what did those gentlemen do? They succeeded so well in hoodwinking the people of Manitoba into believing that they would obtain relief by putting them in power and displacing Mr. Norquay, that the people of Manitoba gave them a trial. The issue between the two parties in that election was whether or not they could get the people relief from those freight rates. Time went on, and those gentlemen went into power. At that time negotiations were entered into between the Manitoba Government and a railway company, which was chartered to build a line from Winnipeg to the boundary, and from Winnipeg to Portage la Prairie. The men engaged in the building of that line of railway were engaged with the Northern Pacific people. In pursuance of those negotiations, Messrs. McNaught and Kendricks, of the Northern Pacific, came to Winnipeg, where they were met in a clandestine manner by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman is stating what is absolutely untrue.

Mr. DALY. On the arrival of Messrs. McNaught and Kendricks in Winnipeg, the hon. gentleman went to their car at an hour of the morning when there was no necessity of doing so; but he went for what reason? The facts that subsequently came out under oath showed why the hon. gentleman went there. At all events, those gentlemen who came there to negotiate with the Winnipeg and Manitoba Central Railway Company people went to the House on the afternoon of the same day to meet Mr. Greenway and Mr. Martin, and while they were engaged in conversation in the office of Mr. Greenway, the hon. gentleman went into the office, and when he saw them there he was about to retire, when Mr. Greenway said to him: "Don't go away, Mr. Martin; allow me to introduce you to Mr. McNaught and Mr. Kendricks," and Mr. Greenway and the hon. gentleman went through the farce—

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. I would like to say that that is absolutely untrue.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must not say that a member of the House is making a statement that is untrue.

Mr. MARTIN. I say the statement is absolutely false.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I ask if it is in order, Mr. Speaker, for the hon. gentleman to make such an insulting remark? I submit that the hon. gentleman must retract it.

Mr. LAURIER. I dissent altogether. The hon. gentleman may know what is an unparliamentary expression, but if the hon. Minister of the Interior makes a statement that is not true, the matter can be brought before the House. •

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is not the question. The question is whether the hon. gentleman is out of order, and should retract the remark he made, that the statement of the hon. Minister of the Interior was false.

Mr. LAURIER. I beg pardon. What my hon. friend said was that it was an untruth.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He went further.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the rule is that when a statement is made that is incorrect, it is open to an hon. member to say that the statement is false, but he cannot impute personal falsehood to the individual.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He distinctly did that. He stated that what my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior was saying was absolutely false, which I submit he cannot do.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the rule is well settled that an hon. member can characterize a statement as false, but he cannot characterize the hon. member who makes the statement as an hon. member who is lying.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I would call your attention to this. Every hon. member of this House, when his own conduct is specially referred to, as the conduct of the hon. member for Winnipeg was referred to by the hon. Minister of the Interior, has always been allowed, if he has considered the statement unfair or incorrect, to call the Speaker's attention to the fact that that particular statement was incorrect or absolutely without foundation; in fact, which is, I suppose, the parliamentary mode of doing what, outside of this House, would be done in much shorter terms.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not wish to violate any of the rules of the House. If saying that the statement is false is unparliamentary, I will say that the statement made by the hon. Minister is not correct. I do not wish to impute anything to the hon. Minister, but I know what occurred, because I was there, and I know that no such thing occurred.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Will you allow me to say one word in regard to the practice which the hon. member for South Oxford says has prevailed. It is true that an hon. member addressing the House very often allows another hon. member to intervene to make an explanation. That is surely out of order, and an hon. member can only interrupt by the indulgence of the hon. member who has the floor. But it cannot be claimed that an hon. member has a right to make interruptions which are insulting. If he desired to make an explanation, he would be in order to do so at a later time.

Mr. SPEAKER. If I may state my opinion to the House on this matter, I think every member of the House will agree with me that the remark made by the hon. member for Winnipeg, which was that the statement made by the hon. Minister of the Interior was false, is hardly in order, and I think the hon. member ought to retract it.

Mr. MARTIN. I certainly will retract the remark, put it in that way; but I wish to say that what the hon. gentleman has said is not correct. I do not wish to say that he is stating, intentionally, what is wrong, but that statement was sworn to—

Mr. DALY. It was sworn to, and it is true, every word of it.

Mr. LAURIER. Order.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. What is the point of order?

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman repudiates the statement that his statement is untrue, and I wish to know if it is in order for him to reiterate a statement after the hon. member for Winnipeg declares it to be untrue?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Certainly it is in order. The statement made by the hon. Minister of the Interior was not in relation to anything that transpired in this House or to any language used in this House. It is in relation to some events which occurred in Manitoba.

Mr. LAURIER. Is that a difference?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Most decidedly. Are we to acquiesce in every statement of history made by hon. gentlemen on the other side? Why, we would have to write the history of this country over again.

Mr. LAURIER. If it be in order when any hon. member of this House is charged with having done something outside of this House, to again repeat the accusation, notwithstanding his repudiation of the statement, then this House would soon become a bear garden. If it be in the power of any gentleman on the other side to insult any hon. member for anything which may have taken place in this House or outside, after the hon. gentleman has declared the falsity of the statement, then we must give up all idea of maintaining decorum in our proceedings. Where is the logic of the rule? An hon. gentleman on this side is charged with something said to have occurred outside this House. He says the charge is not true. He has repudiated it as far as it could be repudiated, and after that repudiation the hon. gentleman who made the charge still adheres to it. If that is in accord with the rules of order, I should like to know it, because then we shall be in a position to regulate our conduct accordingly.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Half of the transactions and investigations and discussions which take place in this House are for the purpose of seeing whether statements made on the floor are accurate, but, forsooth, the doctrine of order laid down now is that we are not at liberty to prove that at a certain hour in the morning an hon. member was at a certain place, but if he chooses to deny the assertion his word must be taken. The proceedings of this House, the order of the House would be set at naught and rendered ridiculous if we had to adopt such a rule. Not only must a member's version of what he said in another place outside this Parliament be accepted as right, but what he did elsewhere, the people he met, the negotiations he entered into are not to be called in question here, but he shall be allowed to make his own statement, and that statement must be assumed to be true and not controvertible.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would call the attention of the House to a practice which has grown up to a very great extent this session, and which is entirely out of order. I refer to the practice of interrupting the speaker who has the floor. That is contrary to a fundamental rule of parliamentary practice. I have ruled that the statement which the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) made regarding what the hon. Minister of the Interior said, namely, that what the hon. Minister of the Interior said was false, was unparliamentary, and the expression ought to be withdrawn. But the assertion of the hon. member for Winnipeg that the statement of the Minister of the Interior was incorrect, is an assertion with regard to a fact which, I think, ought to be more, perhaps, within the knowledge of the hon. member for Winnipeg than that of the hon. Minister of the Interior, and although I do not see that I am called upon to rule with regard to something which transpired outside of the House, I think it would be desirable that the Minister of the Interior accept the statement.

Mr. DALY. I will certainly accept the statement of the hon. gentleman, and I will read the evidence given under oath, in my presence, and that of the hon. gentleman, which evidence is not contradicted. I will read the evidence that was given under oath in the celebrated trial of the Queen against Luxton, the trial arising out of numerous newspaper articles which appeared from time to time in the Winnipeg 'Free Press,' condemning that hon. gentleman and his Government for the action they took and the agreement they made with the Northern Pacific Railway Company. So as not to take up too much time of the House, I will at once quote Mr. Roblin's evidence, which is as follows. Speaking of Messrs. Kendricks and McNaught, the gentlemen whom I mentioned as having come to Winnipeg to represent the Northern Pacific Railway, Mr. Roblin swore as follows:—

Q. You saw those gentlemen (Kendricks and McNaught) the morning they arrived at the office of the company?—A. Yes, I went with them to Mr. Greenway's office, with Col. Scoble and Mr. Dexter; Mr. Dexter, I think, made the appointment with Mr. Greenway. We discussed the railway situation with Mr. Greenway; he appeared satisfied that it was all right, that we would be allowed to go on at once. Messrs. McNaught and Hendricks seemed perfectly satisfied. They asked him about one hundred thousand dollars. He said, "that's all right, that is what the Government propose to do." During the interview Mr. Martin came in, apparently on ordinary business. He appeared to be surprised when he saw several strangers; and appeared to me about to withdraw, but Mr. Greenway called him back and he came in. Mr. Greenway introduced him to Messrs. Kendricks and McNaught. This was about noon—along in the middle of the day. He introduced him as Attorney General and Railway Commissioner of the province. They shook hands, and Mr. Martin said he had heard they were in town, and he was glad to meet them. They shook hands as if they had never met before. The conversation was broken in upon by his entrance, and was not taken up immediately after. He saw the company appeared to be a little embarrassed, and he withdrew after stating that a little difference had arisen between his department and their company (the Northern Pacific) about the transportation of steel rails from Duluth to St. Vincent and he would be glad if they could have a private interview, as they might straighten it out much easier than by correspondence. He told them his room was in the next flat.

Q. Did Mr. Greenway appear as sincere as Messrs. McNaught, Kendricks and Martin?—A. Yes.

Q. At the time, the proceedings did not surprise you?—A. It did not. I did not suppose Mr. Martin had seen them before. In reply they said they would call before they left the building. Mr. Martin withdrew, and we talked a little while, then Messrs. Kendricks and McNaught went up to his room. Mr. Greenway stopped with us. Col. Scoble said to him, "You had better go up too, I am afraid Martin is plotting mischief." Mr. Greenway went out, and I saw him go upstairs.

Q. Yourself, Mr. Dexter and Col. Scoble took the two gentlemen up to the Government buildings in a cab, and the cab waited at the door?—A. I waited between 1½ and 2 hours after they went to Mr. Martin's office, and they came. I got a little indignant to think I should be kept walking around the hall two or three hours, so I told Mr. Dexter and Col. Scoble I would not wait, and I footed down. I saw Messrs. McNaught and Kendricks the next morning at the company's office. The first man I saw was Mr. Kendricks, he was looking over what he said were some profiles of the Manitoba Central. I shook hands with him and apologized for having left so abruptly the day before.

Mr. Howell objected to giving of conversations, but Mr. Hagel claimed that similar conversations had been allowed in Mr. Martin's examination.

Mr. Roblin being allowed to continue said :

He (Kendricks) told me to sit down, he wanted to talk to me. He told me the Government were proposing to deal directly with them, they wanted them to throw over the Manitoba Central people altogether. I said that was hardly fair. His exact words in reply were : "The Government is our meat." I asked him what he meant. Well, he said, "we can do better with the Government than you can, we can get more out of them." I said that was not possible, because the statutes provided the guarantee should only be $5,000 a mile. He said, "You are not as old a railroader as I am, or you would know how these things are done." He said, "Yesterday was not the first time I met Mr. Martin, Mr. Martin was at our car bright and early yesterday morning." I said it is not possible, he said he was there. He said, "Your railway commissioner is the proverbial politician, I guess."

Now, I have taken up the time of the House to substantiate the statement I made in my previous remarks, when I was interrupted by the hon. gentleman who went to the cars that morning to meet the representatives of the railway, with whom he afterwards had the interview described here. And this is the gentleman who stands up here to advocate the grievances of the people of Manitoba, and to urge that they are downtrodden and suffering because they have been charged too heavy railway rates. The object of building this Manitoba and Northern Pacific Railway, before known as the Red River Valley Railway, was to give the people of Manitoba an outlet to the United States, independent of the Canadian Pacific Railway. At that time there was even a greater agitation in Manitoba and the North-west over freight rates than there is at present. Well, Sir, one of the conditions on which the Government undertook the construction of this line of railway was that they should control the freight rates. So guarded were they, so careful were they to have the control of those freight rates, that they made a condition in the contract with the Northern Pacific Railway that that company should not enter into any arrangement whatever whereby running power should be given to the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other line of railway over their line, but that they should control the Red River Valley Railway themselves, so that the people of Manitoba would have the control of their own freight rates. In pursuance of that agreement they built a branch line of railway to Brandon, and a branch from Winnipeg to Portage la Prairie. But what was the outcome of these promises made by Reform politicians from one end of the country to the other? Why, the fact is that the freight rates have not been reduced a single iota by the building of the Northern Pacific Railway, but the people of Manitoba have sunk $650,000 in that line. Since the Reform Government came into power they have increased the indebtedness of that country by two and a half millions, and of that $850,000 or $900,000 represents amounts given to assist railway construction for the benefit of the people of Manitoba. And this is the effect—and it cannot be contradicted, it is shown by the petition that has been presented here—the people have not been relieved a single iota by the building of that line of railway. Yet these hon. gentlemen would give the House and the people to understand that this Government alone is to blame for the state of affairs, this Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I say the blame rests with the hon. gentleman and his party, because the one opportunity that was given them to secure competition and get an independent outlet and get rid of monopoly has been lost. They had the opportunity; they did not grasp it. For some reason, which has never yet been explained, such an arrangement was come to between the Government and the Northern Pacific as to deprive the people of the benefit that they expected to receive. The hon. gentleman would have us understand that $1,750 per mile was all that was paid for this line. But they had the right to bond the railway to the extent of $20,000 per mile. And they bonded the line from Winnipeg to the boundary, and the branch lines as well, for $20,000 a mile, and the mortgage deed for that can be found in the office of the Secretary of State. And it was shown in the examination of the people connected with the Northern Pacific in the United States that the people who built this road, the Northern Pacific and Manitoba—or the Red River Valley, at any rate the road of which the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg was vice-president—was sold, and that the proprietors made two millions out of the transaction. The Government of Manitoba have no control over their rates. They can charge what they like, and they are doing it to-day, and the people who paid $650,000 toward the road are worse off than they were before. And this is the hon. gentleman, and the party to which he belongs is the party, that ask this House to believe that this Government alone is to blame for not giving the people relief in connection with freight rates. Now, Sir, in connection with the question of freight rates, as I said before, it was a distinct bargain with these people that the Government should control their rates. It was a matter of inquiry in the House from time to time while the railway was under construction as to what arrangement had been made with the Northern Pacific as to these rates. I have here a letter from Mr. T. F. Oakes, vice-president and general manager of the road, with whom the Government of Manitoba dealt. It is dated July 27th, 1888, at which time negotiations were going on between these people and the present member for Winnipeg. And what does this letter show as to relief in relation to freight rates? This is the letter:

(Confidential.)

NEW YORK, July 27th, 1888.

HON. THOS. GREENWAY,
Premier of the province of Manitoba.

SIR,—The rates made by our company shall not be higher to and from Portage la Prairie, Winnipeg and the intermediate points from and to Duluth and other eastern points, than the rates made by the Canadian Pacific Company between Emerson, Morris and other points near the International boundary and Port Arthur and other eastern points. Local and through rates shall be fair and reasonable. This will make the rates of wheat from Portage la Prairie, Winnipeg and intermediate points to Duluth, 21 cents per 100 lbs.

The division of the rates thus made between the several lines shall be upon the basis of a pro rata per mile actual distance. An agreement to this effect in detail will be drawn up by Commissioner Martin and our counsel, Mr. McNaught, for execution by the province of Manitoba and the Northern Pacific and Duluth and Manitoba Company. The latter companies will authorize its execution at a meeting to be held on the third Thursday in August.

Yours very respectfully,

T. F. OAKES,
Vice-president and G. M.

Now, Sir, I call the attention of the House to the fact that the only undertaking there given is that their rates shall not be higher than those of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that this letter shows that the people were not going to get any benefit or any relief by the spending of this $650,000 of their money, or by making this arrangement with these people. At the time this letter was written, the promise was held out by the present hon. member for Winnipeg, Mr. Greenway, and other members of the Government that we were going to get relief in the matter of freight rates. Time after time, Mr. Greenway was challenged to produce the letter on the floor of the House, but he always refused to do so, although he said he then had the letter in his desk. But when the letter did come to light, the people of Manitoba found that the only arrangement made was, as I have said, that the rates were not to be higher than those of the Canadian Pacific Railway. And this is the hon. gentleman who poses as the champion of the people of Manitoba. More than that, the hon. gentleman has referred to the Hudson's Bay Railway. His connection with that is on a par with his connection with the Northern Pacific and Manitoba road. When he was a humble member of that House, before he became a servant of the people and Attorney General, he was one of the most enthusiastic advocates of that scheme, speaking in its favour on every platform, and so was Mr. Greenway, his leader, and now the Premier. They took such an interest in this road that they induced Mr. Norquay to come down with a resolution, and subsequently an Act of Parliament, under which the province undertook to guarantee the bonds of the road to the extent of four and a half millions of dollars. And, Sir, Mr. Norquay, unfortunately for himself—for it brought a lot of trouble upon him—made himself responsible for this scheme. In the first place, during the session of 1886, Mr. Greenway moved, seconded by the present hon. member for Winnipeg, as follows:—

That whereas the Hon. John Norquay, Premier of Manitoba, stated in a speech made at Emerson, "that the the time had not yet arrived when the construction of a railway to the Hudson's Bay is a necessity." Be it resolved, that in the opinion of this House the very first opportunity should be taken to repudiate such an assertion, and to declare that the construction of the said railway, at the very earliest possible date, is a matter of the most vital importance to the people of Manitoba and the North-west.

That was the feeling of Mr. Greenway and Mr. Martin at that time. But what do subsequent events show? In 1888, after Mr. Greenway had become Premier, and the hon. member for Winnipeg, Attorney General, an arrangement was made with Hugh Sutherland and with Messrs. Ross and Onderdonk, large railway contractors, for the construction of the railway on the basis of the guarantee by the province of the bonds of the road to the extent of four and a half million dollars. We have heard it stated in this House that the hon. gentleman has an opinion of Mr. Hugh Sutherland, that he does not think the railway is in proper hands, or that it will ever be built so long as Hugh Sutherland is to build it. But what the opinion of the hon. member for Winnipeg and Mr. Greenway was at this time is shown by a letter of 29th March, 1888, which was as follows. Here is an open letter given by Thomas Greenway, Premier of Manitoba, to Mr. Hugh Sutherland, whom our friend from Winnipeg does not like to honour. This is what was said by Mr. Greenway of Mr. Sutherland:

WINNIPEG, March 29th, 1888.

To whom it may concern:—

The bearer, Mr. Hugh Sutherland, President of the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company, visits New York on business connected with his company. I feel warranted in stating that the building of a railway to the Hudson Bay is of paramount importance to the people of North-west Canada, and as an expression of their confidence in the soundness of the undertaking, the Legislature of Manitoba unanimously passed an Act guaranteeing interest for 25 years on $4,500,000 of the bonds of the company, to aid in the construction of the railway.

Now, I want hon. gentlemen to listen to what follows :

Mr. Sutherland is well known here in connection with the great enterprise, as a gentleman of integrity and ability.

That is signed by Thomas Greenway, Premier of Manitoba. Then, Sir, we find a letter written on 12th September, 1888, and addressed to Mr. Greenway by Messrs. Ross and Onderdonk, after they had gone to England to make their financial arrangements :

Relying on these assurances, our Mr. Ross proceeded this summer to England, and when there made arrangements with capitalists and bankers of the highest standing, to supply the capital necessary for the construction of the line to Hudson Bay. The foundation of these arrangements was the guarantee to the extent of $4,500,000, sanctioned by the Legislature and approved of by yourself. Mr. Ross requested the banks to make their own inquiries as to the position of the Manitoba guarantee, and was informed in England that a satisfactory reply had been received from your Government.

What occurred next will be best told in the same letter :

Mr. Ross completed his arrangements in England and hastened to Winnipeg to meet the Government, when he was met with the statement made to us for the first time that the Government was contemplating a recommendation to the Legislature to reduce the guarantee from $4,500,000 to $2,500,000, and further, that your Government desired to give the $35,000 voted for the completion of the 40 miles.

Now, it may seem singular to hon. gentlemen that while there was upon the statute-book of Manitoba an Act that the Legislature would guarantee the bonds of this railway for twenty-five years to the extent of $4,500,000, and in face of this letter from the Premier of Manitoba to enable Ross and Onderdonk to go home to make financial arrangements, that subsequently, notwithstanding that this Act had the seal of the province stamped upon it by hon. gentlemen opposite, Mr. Greenway repudiated the undertaking of the province, that is, his Government declined to carry out the arrangement that was made for guaranteeing the $4,500,000 and wanted to reduce it to $2,500,000. What was the reason for it? We have not been able to understand, but between the time that letter was given by Mr. Greenway, and the time when Ross and Onderdonk went home to the old country to make their arrangements, that visit was made by the hon. gentleman to that car in the yard of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Winnipeg. That hon. gentleman had this interview with Mr. McNaught in Mr. Greenway's room, as sworn to by Mr. Roblin, and from that moment the hon. gentleman has had no use for the Hudson Bay Railway. Now, Sir, so far as this case is concerned, I think this Government has done pretty well by the Hudson Bay Railway, and I hope this Government will do more for the Hudson Bay Railway. But what has this Government done? It has given a land grant of 6,400 acres per mile to that railway within the boundaries of Manitoba, and 12,800 acres per mile to that railway without the boundaries of Manitoba. In addition to that, a few years ago an Act was passed by this House guaranteeing to that company $80,000 per annum for twenty years upon its original line of railway from Winnipeg to Saskatchewan. I think, taking this into consideration, hon. gentlemen will come to the conclusion that this House and this Government, particularly, have shown that they have faith in that undertaking; and I hope and trust that if that aid does not prove sufficient to guarantee the building of that line of railway, the Government will grant further aid to it. Sir, although the commission may sit, although an investigation may take place in reference to the rates being charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and those rates may be reduced by the Canadian Pacific Railway, in my humble opinion, as an individual, as a resident of that country, and as a representative of the people of that country, I have come to the conclusion that the only relief open to these people is the building of the Hudson Bay Railway and giving them an independent outlet. Now, the hon. gentleman spoke of a motion that was introduced by the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard), when the contract was before the House. It is well in the minds of hon. members that the people of the North-west Territories particularly, and the people of Canada in general, were willing to do anything and to give anything to have that line of railway built. It is in the minds of hon. gentlemen present that the hon. gentlemen opposite were for four long years endeavouring to find people who would undertake the building of that line of railway, but they could not succeed; with all the aid they offered, with fifty million dollars subsidy and twenty thousand acres of land per mile for the whole length of the railway, they could not get anybody to come forward and build that railway. Now, I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that so far as the 10 per cent provision in the Railway Act is concerned, as was stated here by the Minister of Railways a few weeks ago in debating a subject similar to this, the Canadian Pacific Railway was placed in a different position from any other line of railway in this country, because while the Railway Act provides for 15 per cent of their earnings in the case of other lines of railway, in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway guaranteeing that they would not charge too much, that percentage was reduced to 10 per cent. Now, I think I have shown conclusively that it does no lie in the mouth of the hon. member for Winnipeg, nor in the mouth of the party to which he belongs, to say that if the people of Manitoba, and the North-west are burdened by these freight rates to-day, this Government is to blame for it, and that the hon. gentlemen opposite are desirous of relieving them. On the contrary, I have established conclusively that the opportunity laid at the hon. gentleman's door at one time, or at the door of the Government of which he was a member, to relieve our people from the rates charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway. He failed to do it, the opportunity has gone by, and if the people of Manitoba to-day are suffering by paying too great freight rates, the hon. gentleman and his party are alone to blame for it, and no one else.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is exceedingly to be regretted that when a question of such moment as that which was introduced by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald) is brought before this House, the Minister of the Interior cannot discuss even a matter of that gravity without introducing violent personal attacks upon the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). We know perfectly well why the member for Winnipeg is singled out by these gentlemen as a subject for attack, because, in defiance of all they could do, the hon. member for Winnipeg was triumphantly returned by the chief city of the province to which the hon. Minister of the Interior belongs, as a direct rebuke of the strongest sort to the policy that has been pursued towards the North-west and Manitoba for a number of years.

Mr. DALY. You forget that I beat the hon. gentleman by 465 votes in 1891. He had an opportunity then of asking the people of Manitoba in the largest constituency of the province, as to what they thought of him, and he was left at home.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the second thought and wiser thought of the people of Winnipeg a year ago, will weigh far more in the minds of the people of the North-west than an election which was secured by the aid, if I am not mistaken, of several hundred non-resident voters, who were imported, regardless of expense, to vote for the hon. Minister of the Interior.

Mr. DALY. Not at all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. However, my purpose in rising now was not to deal with the relative merits of the election of the hon. member for Selkirk and the hon. member for Winnipeg. Every one of us know to our cost that the policy which the Government has pursued for these many years in the North-west, has been crowned with disaster of the gravest kind to the people of Canada. Every one of us knows that the promises which were made by the late Premier and by the High Commissioner have been not merely failures, but will be quoted for ever more as exhibitions of the most lamentable short-sightedness on the part of those two hon. gentlemen. Every one knows the grave difficulties which undoubtedly encompass the settlers of that region. However, I do not want to pursue this discussion at the present moment, but I think that every man in this House who has the least vestige of fair-play in his composition, will agree with me in thinking that the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg ought to be allowed a fair opportunity of replying to the attacks which have been made upon him, and I, therefore, move that this House do now adjourn.

Mr. DALY.

Mr. MARTIN. I fancy that in his heart every member of this House feels that he is wasting time in listening to matters so purely local as those which have been brought before the House to-day by the hon. Minister of the Interior. But since they have been brought here for discussion, I cannot allow the statements made to pass without giving to the House my side of the question, and stating exactly what did occur with respect to the matter as to which there is dispute between the Minister and myself. I do not know, in the first place, what the hon. Minister desires to accomplish by making the statement that I made a clandestine visit to the Northern Pacific people. Did he wish to infer that I went there for the purpose of making an improper arrangement with them? If so, he was guilty of gross disregard of the rules and practice of this House. If he did not wish to make such an insinuation or charge, what possible object could be gained by bringing the matter here? What difference can it make to this House or the country whether I visited that railway car at an early hour or not, or even if I was afterwards introduced to those people as a stranger by Mr. Greenway? What possible difference can it make to hon. gentlemen here, unless there is behind it an insinuation or charge of improper conduct so far as I am concerned in connection with that matter? But, as the hon. gentleman has brought the matter before the House, let me state exactly what did occur in connection with this matter, Mr. Roblin's statement on oath to the contrary, notwithstanding. When those people came to Winnipeg, I was instructed by the Government in the matter. Messrs. Greenway, Grant, Smart, Prendegast, and myself met in Council and discussed the question of coming to an arrangement with the Northern Pacific Railway, a matter which we had in contemplation at that time. We heard that Messrs. Kendrick and McNaught, on a special car, had arrived to consult with the Manitoba Central people. I was instructed by Mr. Greenway to go to the car and call on those gentlemen, and to say that we would like to see them before they left the city. I went there at ten o'clock in the morning. I was the Railway Commissioner of the province, and this matter came within my department. These people were strangers, we heard they were in the city. We contemplated arranging to send one or two members of the Government to St. Paul especially to see them on this matter. They accidentally came there; and what would be more proper than that the Government should see them, that I should visit them, and that I should call on them at ten o'clock in the morning. The hon. Minister said that I went there at daybreak, an unusual hour. At all events, I went there to see them for the purpose of inducing the company to construct the Red River Railway, taking over that portion we had constructed, and completing the railway within Manitoba. Mr. Greenway knew I had been there. As regards Messrs. Kendrick and McNaught, I was introduced to them by the American consul, the late Mr. Taylor, who was present throughout the interview. Now, it is stated that when I entered the room, Mr. Greenway introduced me as an absolute stranger. That is untrue. He did not introduce me to those gentlemen, because he knew I had seen them before. Moreover, I had seen Mr. Greenway and told him of the interview, and what I had said. Mr. McNaught and Mr. Kendrick could not have been introduced to me as a stranger, when I had seen them a short time before. The only possible inference that can be drawn from the statement made is that I was trying to deceive Mr. Greenway and other members of the Government, that I was carrying on a clandestine correspondence with those American gentlemen for my own purposes. That is absurd, because I went there at the request of Mr. Greenway; he knew I had been there, and I reported to him what had occurred, and therefore it is perfectly silly to say that I asked Mr. Greenway to introduce me to those gentlemen. Even if he did so, what possible harm could accrue? The only point is that it would have been ridiculous. I hesitate to take up the time of the House by denying such statements, because, if true, it would be a ridiculous circumstance that the Premier should introduce a member of his Government to gentlemen whom he had interviewed half an hour before. As to the meeting in my room, I may say that it had been arranged by the Government and by Mr. Greenway, and we did not go there on the suggestion of Mr. Roblin because it had been arranged that those gentlemen should come to my room and meet other members of the Government there, and that we should have an interview on this matter of public interest in which we were engaged. We had an interview and discussed the matter fully. The Manitoba Central people were not building any railway. The hon. gentleman has talked about building a railway. It is true those people had a charter to build a line. They were, however, bound to make some money, and were desirous of selling the concessions they had obtained to the Northern Pacific Railway, a course which has been taken in regard to charters granted by the Government of Canada to railway speculators. I have had occasion to refer to contract brokers who obtain valuable franchises for the purpose of making money out of them, without spending any money themselves, but simply dealing in the rights and privileges which they had secured. We decided, as a Government, that we would not allow the Manitoba Central to make any money. There was no reason why the Manitoba Government, if they desired to have lines built, should not make contracts with the Northern Pacific Railway, as the Dominion Government had done with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The position of the Government of Manitoba as regards the Manitoba Central Railway was exactly similar to that which prevailed between the Government of Canada and the Canadian Pacific Railway. Would it not have been absurd if the Dominion Government had incorporated a company and entered into a contract with it in order to secure the building of the road by the Canadian Pacific Railway? We did not propose to take that position in Manitoba, and we knew that the Manitoba Central Railway, which was a mere paper company, had not a dollar of capital invested. They had no claim upon us; they had no arrangement with us; there had been no negotiations with us. Their statements to the Northern Pacific Railway Company in that behalf were quite untrue; and the desire of the Government in meeting those delegates from the Northern Pacific Company was to tell them at once that there were no such arrangements, and that any contract entered into would be entered into by the Manitoba Government directly with the Northern Pacific Company. I do not attempt to go into these matters minutely, because I think they are of the slightest importance to this House or to Canada generally, but because the hon. gentleman, not only on this occasion, but on others, has persisted in dragging them before the House. The hon. gentleman, in support of his statement that freight rates in Manitoba have not been reduced at all on account of the expenditure of some $600,000 there, has produced a letter which was written to Mr. Oakes, which was the foundation of our arrangement regarding freight rates, and he has said that that letter simply means that the Northern Pacific Company would not charge any more than the Canadian Pacific Railway Company over the same territory. The hon. gentleman entirely misunderstands the letter. In the first place, the only bargain we had with the Northern Pacific, the only bargain they would make with us, was that they would reduce the rates on wheat 3 cents per 100 pounds. At that time the rate on wheat from Winnipeg to Porth Arthur was 24 cents per 100 pounds, and from Brandon to Port Arthur 25 cents. Our arrangement with the Northern Pacific—and we made the arrangement with the parent company in the United States, which had control of the line running to Duluth—was that they would reduce the rate on wheat from 24 cents to 21 cents in the one instance, and from 25 cents to 22 cents in the other. The hon. gentleman thinks that was no relief to the people. I think that a moderate estimate of the shipment of wheat from Manitoba in a year is 12,000,000 bushels, and on that quantity a reduction of 3 cents per 100 pounds would mean a saving to the country of $216,000 a year. The country has had the benefit of that saving ever since that time, and for that we have expended only $600,000. Besides that, we have 300 miles of additional colonization railway in the country. Therefore, I think the bargain was a most economical one. But this is a matter with which this House has surely nothing to do. When I was in local politics in Manitoba, we discussed this question in every aspect, both inside and outside the House, and I am willing to meet the hon. gentleman at any proper time and discuss it with him. It is a matter of local importance, and the people have not only discussed it, but decided it. The action of the Government was considered by the people of Manitoba to be right, or they would not have returned that Government to power with such a tremendous majority as they did in the year 1892. Why, Mr. Speaker, there is practically no opposition in Manitoba to-day. The Government there are so strong that they have things all their own way, and yet the people are most thoroughly familiar with all the points the hon. gentleman mentions. Now, with regard to the bearings of this letter. The hon. gentleman says it is a bargain that the Northern Pacific shall not charge more than the Canadian Pacific Railway. Reading it casually, without understanding the circumstances, it looks like that. But let me explain the circumstances, and the House will see at once why it was obtained. When the rate from Winnipeg to Port Arthur on wheat was 24 cents, the rate from Emerson and Gretna, two points reached by the Great Northern Railway, to Port Arthur was only 21 cents. Although nearly 100 miles farther from Port Arthur than Winnipeg, the Canadian Pacific Railway hauled grain from those two points for 3 cents per 100 pounds less than from Winnipeg. Now, in our arrangements with the Northern Pacific we wished to guard ourselves against future contingencies by providing that not only should there be a reduction of 3 cents per 100 pounds in the rate from Winnipeg, and the same reduction pro rata from all over the province, but that if at any time afterwards, by reason of the competition of the Great Northern or the Northern Pacific, it should occur that the rate from Emerson would be 17 or 18 cents, or any less than 21 cents, then the Northern Pacific, by reason of this letter from Mr. Oakes, were bound at once to give the whole country the benefit which up to that time these two particular points only had. That is the explanation of that statement in the letter which was afterwards embodied in an agreement, executed under the corporate seal of the Northern Pacific Company. Now, I must say I was surprised at the hon. gentleman bringing one matter forward. I have heard it brought forward in the back districts of Manitoba as an argument against the Government; but really I did not think the hon. Minister would attempt to pass it off on this House. The hon. gentleman charges us with having given some great bonus to the company, because we allowed them to mortgage the railway for $20,000 a mile, and in that way induced some capitalists to lend them $20,000 a mile on something that cost them only $8,000 a mile. Well, what cost was that to the people of Manitoba? If those people swindled some one else, what have we to do with that? But supposing we had, the hon. gentleman is himself as great a transgressor as we are in this transaction, because not only has that company a charter from Manitoba, but a charter from this House. If I mistake not, the Bill was introduced in this House by the hon. Minister of the Interior himself, and in that Bill the same outrageous power of mortgaging the line for $20,000 a mile is given. So that the hon. gentleman is quite as guilty as we are in allowing those people to be swindled in that respect. Now, the hon. gentleman has dealt at some length with the Hudson Bay Railway. That is another matter, in that aspect of it, belonging to the local politics of Manitoba. However, since he has gone into it—

Mr. DALY. Did you not introduce it yourself?

Mr. MARTIN. No; I spoke from a Dominion aspect.

Mr. DALY. I spoke from a Dominion aspect, too.

Mr. MARTIN. And also from a local aspect. Now, with regard to this Hudson Bay Railway, I would like to say that I did change my mind upon it. It may be a great sin for a person to become wiser; but at one time I thought that it was not too much for the province of Manitoba to guarantee the interest on $4,500,000 for the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway. I came to the conclusion, after I had considered the matter further, that a guarantee of $2,500,000 was quite enough. Now, I do not consider that any great sin. I think that that is a matter on which a person is quite at liberty to change his mind. Four million five hundred thousand dollars guarantee at 4½ per cent, I think it was, would amount to something like $180,000 a year. The total revenue of the province of Manitoba is under $500,000. It would take pretty nearly half of our revenue for twenty years to pay that bonus to the Hudson Bay Railway, and I must say that when I came to consider that matter seriously, with the responsibility of power, I came to the conclusion, and so did the other members of the Government and so did the House, that we had gone too far for the benefits we were likely to receive, and we changed our minds. I do not know that there is any harm in that. I have no hesitation in acknowledging it, at any rate. I suppose the hon. gentleman thinks that if one commits himself on a public question, he should always, for the sake of consistency, stick to it, although he may come to the conclusion afterwards that he was in error. In referring to Mr. Sutherland's connection with this railway, he said that I was very hostile to Mr. Sutherland, and that my action with regard to this railway was prompted by that feeling of hostility. I wish to entirely repudiate that charge. My position with regard to the Hudson Bay Railway has at all times been based upon what I consider to be the interests of Manitoba. I stated once before in this House, and I do not hesitate making the statement again, that I do not believe that railway will ever be built as long as Mr. Sutherland is at its head; and my reasons for so thinking are not any hostility that I feel towards Mr. Sutherland, but on account of the manner in which he has acted up to the present. The province of Manitoba has practically been swindled out of $256,000 in bonds which they gave to that road for which they have no security and upon which they are paying interest to-day. Security upon lands was supposed to have been given to the Government. The Government did not intend to hand that money over to the company without the security upon the lands; but by the manipulation of Mr. Sutherland, the province of Manitoba was swindled out of that security, and that is one of the reasons why I do not believe that road will ever be constructed by the man who undertook to build it. The House will remember that forty miles of the railway has been built which have never been operated. The rails are rusting, ties are rotten, a car never passes over the road. Mr. Sutherland and his confrères went to England, and by means of misrepresentation, managed to buy the steel rails from parties there. They got those rails and put them on the railway, and the unfortunate persons who furnished them have never been paid a dollar. Now, we know that railways in Canada are not built by Canadian money. We know that it is necessary to go into the English market to raise the money for their construction. Mr. Sutherland himself has been in England a very large part of the time since he took hold of this enterprise, endeavouring to raise the money to go on with it. But do you suppose, Sir, that financial people are going to furnish money to construct a railway which has a record of that kind, in connection with which the province has been swindled out of $256,000, and the steel rails of which have never been paid for? These things stand against the railway company and are calculated to prevent the construction of the road, and that is the reason that I have in the Local House and on the platform, and also in this House, stated that I do not believe that railway will ever be constructed until it is put in the hands of reputable, solid men, without any record against them. That stand I take personally, without any feeling of hostility against Mr. Sutherland, but simply in the public interest of the province. The matter is one of no political interest in this House, but has simply been dragged into this discussion by the hon. Minister of the Interior, in order that he might have something to say against me personally, instead of discussing, as he should, the question before the House, which is the charge that I made that his Government and party are responsible for the position in which the settlers are to-day in the matter of freight rates. In answer to that charge, which is a fair one, one in which the country is interested, the hon. Minister talks about everything under the sun except the plain question before the House. This House cannot alter the circumstances in connection with that visit of the representatives of the Northern Pacific Railway, whatever it amounts to, and has nothing whatever to do with the aid given by the province of Manitoba to the Hudson's Bay Railway. I am prepared at any time to meet the hon. gentleman on local Manitoba issues, but I protest against the time of this House being taken up in discussing matters with which we have nothing whatever to do.

Mr. MARTIN.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MARTIN. Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear." No hon. gentleman on that side would be unfair enough to say that when the Minister of the Interior—not an ordinary member of this House, but one of its leaders—brings this question up here and makes statements which are not correct with regard to them—no hon. gentleman would be unfair enough to say that it is not my bounden duty to reply and place the real facts before the House. The hon. gentleman had no right to bring these things up here, but having brought them up, I am prepared to answer him, but would much prefer that the discussion should be confined to those questions only in which the House has jurisdiction.

Mr. DALY. I think that the question I was discussing, and to which the hon. gentleman referred, was perfectly germane to the subject before the House. The hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald) brought to the attention of this House the fact that numerous petitions had been placed in the hands of the Government regarding freight rates charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway. In this debate the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) rose, and sought to make this House understand that his record in relation to securing cheap freight rates to the people of Manitoba is on par with his conduct here to-day. That being the case, I have a perfect right to discuss that hon. gentleman's political record. If he says I have not, all I can say is that I am sorry he has a political record. And I think hon. gentlemen opposite are sorry that he has one, because I notice that on every occasion when that hon. gentleman is taken to task on this side, the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for South Oxford immediately rise and take him under their wing. I intend to show the character of that hon. gentleman before I get through. I fought him a fair and square fight in the largest constituency in Manitoba, and came out 465 votes ahead of him, although I had against me the hon. gentleman himself, the ex-Attorney-General, the present Attorney-General, and every official of the Manitoba Government. But notwithstanding all their efforts, I downed that hon. gentleman by the majority I have stated. We discussed these issues, and I invite the hon. gentleman to meet me again in my constituency and fight the battle over again, and I have no doubt what the verdict will be. The hon. gentleman talks of Mr. Sutherland having swindled the province out of $256,000, bonds of the Hudson's Bay Railway. The hon. gentleman did not tell you that this man whom he accused of having swindled the province out of $256,000 has, since the hon. gentleman repudiated the four and a half million guarantee, made a contract with the very Government of which the hon. member for Winnipeg was a member, and by that contract it was provided that the $256,000 must go back to the Government. The hon. gentleman's Government were a party to that contract. Why did the Government make this subsequent arrangement? Simply because the public opinion of Manitoba drove them to make the bargain with Mr. Sutherland. And the fact that they made that bargain with him shows that they had not the opinion of Mr. Sutherland which the hon. gentleman would seek to lead the country to believe they have. So far as the steel rails are concerned, Mr. Sutherland has made his arrangements with the Cumberland Company. The hon. gentleman says that I myself was the means of getting a charter from this Parliament. It is true, the Bill was in my hands. This was two years after the railway was built. Contrary to the hon. gentleman's opinion, but in the opinion of myself and in the opinion of the solicitor of the railway, it was found that we required Dominion legislation for that railway. The Bill was placed in my hands by the solicitor and was passed through its three readings. But, as I say, this was two years after the road was built. What had I to do then with the railway? The work was completed, unfortunately, though the people would like to have had the road unbuilt. As to the question of rates, the hon. gentleman has sought to have the House believe that the Oakes letter did not mean what it appeared to mean. I mentioned that the hon. gentleman and his Government at the time when the road was to be built, gave the people to understand that they would get reduced freight rates. He says they have got reduced freight rates. I say they have not, and I will read the evidence on that point of Mr. Roblin, the largest grain dealer in Manitoba:

Q. Well, in 1889 after the N. P. had come in what were the rates?—A. Exactly the same as they were in 1888.

Q. And in 1890?—A. Just the same.

Q. Then this wonderful bargain that Mr. Martin made with the N. P. had not the effect of reducing the rates as promised?—A. No, not according to the tariff. The tariffs on the Canadian Pacific Railway and N. P. were the same.

Q. Has there been any reduction on wheat and flour in bags since the entry of the N. P.?—A. There has not. In fact there has been a raise of 2½ cents per 100 lbs. on wheat in bags this year.

Q. Has the N. P. given the competition in this country that was expected?—A. There has been no competition in the sense I understand it. Grain men pay the same rates, although I have heard that wholesale men have got concessions. But the farmer has not benefited.

Q. You remember the premier's statements in the House as to better rates?—A. I do. He said he had a maximum rate letter, but when pressed to disclose it he said he couldn't on account of pledges made to Mr. Oakes. However, he said he could assure the farmers that the reduction of rates on the estimated crop of that year (1888) would alone save the farmers $400,000.

Q. Did this reduction come about?—A. It did not.

Q. You have verified the figures you gave us?—A. Yes. They are absolutely correct.

Q. Well, will you give us the all-rail rates, that is from Winnipeg to Montreal or Toronto?—A. Yes, they are as follows:—1885, from Winnipeg, 50; Portage, 51; Brandon, 52; Emerson, 50. 1886, from Winnipeg, 50; Portage, 51; Brandon, 52; Emerson, 50. 1887, from Winnipeg, 46; Portage, 46; Brandon, 47; Emerson, 46.

So much for the question of rates. But another question has arisen between the hon. gentleman and myself in this debate, as to my veracity, his veracity, and the veracity of gentlemen that were examined in that trial. I have just read the evidence of Mr. Roblin upon the interview with the hon. gentleman. I will now read the evidence of Mr. Scoble, and then the people will have the oaths of Mr. Scoble and Mr. Roblin, as against the statement of the hon. gentleman :

Q. Did you call on Messrs. Kendricks and McNaught the morning after their arrival?—A. I did. I went down to their private car.

Q. Did you meet any person coming out of the car?—A. I did; I met Mr. Martin. It was then about nine o'clock in the morning.

Q. Had you informed Mr. Greenway of their coming?—A. I think I did. I don't remember when, but it was probably the day before they came.

Q. Were you surprised to see Mr. Martin coming from the car?—A. I don't think I was. I would not have been surprised at anything he might do in that connection. I found Messrs. Kendricks and McNaught on board the car and we went down to the offices of the company over the Commercial Bank. Mr. Roblin, Mr. Dexter, Mr. Kendricks, Mr. McNaught and I went to Mr. Greenway's room that afternoon. Mr. Jones came in. When Mr. Jones came in Mr. Greenway introduced these gentlemen to him. I think Mr. Jones was there when Mr. Martin came in. Mr. Martin opened the door, walked in and said, Oh! as if surprised. I think he was going to shut the door and go out when Mr. Greenway called him in and introduced him to Messrs. Kendricks and McNaught. They shook hands as if he had never met them before. After the introduction there was a little general conversation then Mr. Martin went out.

Then he repeats what was said by Mr. Roblin, and proceeds :

Mr. Roblin went away. When they came downstairs we got into the cab and drove away. The first thing when they sat down in the cab, they burst out laughing. I asked them what they were laughing at. Mr. McNaught told us the Government had clean thrown us overboard. I said, "Not Mr. Greenway surely." He said Mr. Greenway was there and did not say anything.

Q. Did Mr. Kendricks or Mr. Dexter say anything?—A. Mr. Kendricks said something to the same effect as to Mr. Roblin. "The Government is our meat." He was laughing and he slapped Mr. Dexter on the knee and said that.

Now, that shows that there are two gentlemen who, when on oath, had the same idea as to this celebrated interview. I am sorry to take up the time of the House with these matters, but the hon. gentleman stands here as a man who does not fulfil the conditions one would expect him to fulfil from the disclosures in his political career. It does not lie in the hon. gentleman's mouth or in the mouth of any Liberal to say that this Government is chargeable with the condition of the people so far as freight rates are concerned. The reason I have to deal with these matters is simply this: Not, as the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says, that I wish to attack the personal character of the hon. member for Winnipeg, for what have I to fear from the hon. gentleman? I have met him everywhere, and on every occasion when I have met him I have defeated him, and I may meet him again.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps you will have an opportunity to meet him in Winnipeg.

Mr. DALY. I shall be very glad to meet him in Winnipeg.

Mr. MARTIN. Will you resign your seat if I resign mine to meet me in Winnipeg?

Mr. DALY. If my Ministerial duties would permit of my spending the time, most certainly I would. I would be delighted to meet the hon. gentleman in any constituency in Manitoba or the North-west. What I was going to say was that I had to bring these matters to the attention of the House, because the hon. gentleman, who now speaks of relieving the people of their burdens, when he had the opportunity, as Minister of Railways and Attorney General of that province to do something to afford the people real relief, did not take advantage of the opportunity. The hon. gentleman has been condemned by the people of Manitoba. He says that the Provincial Government is strong. And why is it strong? Because the hon. gentleman is not a member of it. The hon. gentleman knows that if he had continued to be a member of the Government, the Government would not have remained in power.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

FISHERIES OF THE MARITIME PROVINCES.

Mr. KAULBACH. Mr. Speaker, before you leave your Chair on the motion to go into Supply, I desire to offer some few remarks on the subject of the fisheries of the Maritime Provinces, more particularly Nova Scotia, with some references regarding the fish trade, and how it is effected. The importance of the fishing industry of the Maritime Provinces, with the immense capital involved and at stake by the fishermen, is my only apology for trespassing for a few moments upon the valuable time of this House. Under an Act passed in 1882, for encouraging the development of sea fisheries, and the building of fishing vessels to class with Americans, provision was made for the distribution of $150,000 annually among fishermen and fishing vessels, from which sum the fishing boats have been receiving their portion. In 1891 this amount was increased to $160,000. The resolution submitted to the House in 1882 by Sir Leonard Tilley, the then Finance Minister, and passed, read as follows:—"That it is expedient that an annual grant of $150,000 be made to aid in the development of the sea fisheries, and the encouragement of the building and fitting out of improved fishing vessels, and the improvement of the condition of the fishermen." It was learned at this time, and indeed previous to the Washington Treaty, that large numbers of our fishermen were leaving our shores for the United States, to prosecute the industry of fishing in Massachusetts vessels, better constructed, equipped, and controlled than our own, and the appearance of matters being somewhat alarming as respects our condition, our vessels being left in many instances without crews, or manned by an inferior class, our choice men being grasped up by Americans offering the greater inducements, the Government of the day was prompted and thought proper to submit the resolution I have just quoted. The object of the fishing bounty, as is well known, was to give encouragement to the industry of shipbuilding, or rather to the construction of a better class of fishing vessels, as well as improved methods of fishing, and still further to offer inducements to those having a migratory disposition to remain at home. The result of which has been to give to Canada a class of fishing vessels equal, if not superior, to any on the continent of America, and manned by a class of men unequalled by those of any other country, and who find employment equally as lucrative as abroad. As well as the object has largely been met as respects the deep-sea fisheries, yet it can be increased to a still more satisfactory degree, if the Government will grant my request for an increased amount of bounty to boat fishermen on the coast. True, we had a difficulty respecting Newfoundland bait some few years ago, during the period of the proposed Bond-Blaine Treaty, in which our fishing vessels by being deprived of certain rights for the time being in that shore suffered very considerably, hence the increased bounty to them last year, but fortunately that difficulty or trouble is now overcome. I may here state, if I am not departing too widely, that as the Government are encouraging and protecting the fishermen in the catch of fish, it ought to as carefully guard and foster the best interests of the fishermen in the sale of fish, the shipments, and the mode of shipments with a view to the best markets. To be a success both should go together. This object to my mind is not favourably met, in truth as I view it, it is obstructed by the Government subsidizing a line of steamers to the West Indies, it matters not whether it be to British, Spanish or French Islands, it is equally injurious, and felt very sensibly, not only by the vessel owners of Lunenburg who claim to be the Canadian 'Gloucester,' but by the shippers of fish as well. I do not object to steamers doing the carrying trade when fairly competing, but what I do seriously object to, is a subsidized line which greatly interferes with, and is to the disadvantage of the sailing vessels, which have had the carrying trade for years, and which besides fully meeting the requirements of the trade, are dependent upon it. The larger number of the sailing vessels are employed in the catch of fish in the summer season, and in the carrying of them to the West Indies in winter, thereby giving employment, not only to the vessels, but to the officers and men as well. For the want of employment owing to these subsidized boats, vessels are laid up, and many of our best fishermen and industrious men have to remain idle, or go to the United States, and worse than all, many of their own best fishermen, by offered inducements, remain away altogether, consequently are lost to Canada, and the masters of fishing vessels, when the season of fishing comes round, are in many cases forced to take inferior crews, or abandon fishing entirely. This, Mr. Speaker, as you will readily perceive, is striking a deadly blow, not only to the industry of fishing, but indirectly to ship-building as well. Our fishing vessels, owing to their superior construction, and sailing qualities, size and numbers, are able to attend to all the carrying trade at present done by steamers, and in some cases making equal time with them. The quantity of fish thrust upon the market at one time by these immense steamer cargoes, their capacity being, I would judge, 4,000 or 5,000 barrels, so completely glut the market and demoralize trade that sailing vessels having them to contend with, have no chance. Sailing vessels have had the experience, when arriving at a West India port with fish, on an empty market, of having to remain for days till the arrival of one of these expected immense steamer cargoes, and then, to their discouragement, find the prices drop, and they are compelled to take just what buyers please to offer. Most disastrous to shippers, and which consignees most seriously condemn. I will here ask you, Mr. Speaker, to observe the unfair position, the marked difference in this trade and the subsidized steamers. The shippers by sailing vessels are very cautious in their shipments, in fact, they make it a study, always carefully to watch by wire and by circulars, the supply, the number of vessels in the various fish ports and their movements, also the clearances, and the quantities on the way, as accurately as they can, and the capacity of the markets, so as to feel sure the supply at any of the islands is not greater than the demand, and that the markets warrant fair prices. Often vessels, loading under favourable circumstances, when loaded are held weeks at a time for improvement of the markets before sailing. This is legitimate trade. Whereas, these subsidized steamers are under contract to sail at a stated time as advertised, and often with a full supply of fish when ready to sail, find the ports they are destined for are over supplied. What is the result? No time then to withdraw or hold. Consequently, to these islands they pour in still more than the markets demand, hence disaster, not only to the steamer shippers, but to legitimate shippers by other channels, as well, in fact, as all engaged in the trade, and the poor fishermen, who is the least able, must suffer the greater loss, as the prices of fish to the fishermen in our markets depend entirely upon the prices the fish realize in the West Indian markets. As this is the experience at present of our Lunenburg shippers, which I am authorized to state. I am strongly advised, in the interest of trade, that the Government give no further subsidies to any line of steamers to the West India Islands, and if approached for a subsidy to any of the Spanish ports, the Government will reject such a proposal without hesitation. As Porto Rico is our principal market, were we to be interfered with by subsidized boats to these islands, our shippers would have to abandon the West India trade entirely. I must here request that the Government not only refuse in future any subsidized lines to these ports, but that when the present contract with Messrs. Pickford and Black terminates, which is in January next, as I understand, for the reasons alleged it will not be continued. The United States have an advantage over us of about 15 per cent in their coming first in their preferred treaty with Spain, and we now having Norway on an equal footing with us to contend with, we cannot afford to have our interests in the West India trade manipulated by subsidized boats, which benefit the fishermen nothing, and give but little employment to our men. It is to be hoped ere long we will have the most-favoured-nation treaty clause with Spain, so as to be on an equal footing with the United States. Now, with regard to another point, Mr. Speaker. The modus vivendi which at its inception was considered only temporary, and supposed not to continue for more than one year, pending a settlement of the fishery question, has been in force over six years, with the prospect of a further extension. To my mind the license fee of $1.50 per ton, charged to United States fishing vessels for bait and other privileges for their fishing voyages, is small, and, as the boat fishermen on the shores are asking for an increased amount of bounty, and believing that they should be encouraged in their industry, I would ask the Government to grant one of the three following requests:—1st. Increase the bounty to shore boat fishermen, as a compensation for the sacrifices they undergo by having extended to United States fishermen under the modus vivendi certain privileges. 2nd. Or increase the license fee to United States fishermen, so as to distribute the increased fee to our shore boat fishermen. 3rd. Or withdraw from the United States fishing vessels the privileges of the modus vivendi entirely, so as to give Canadian fishermen the advantage of our fisheries for their exclusive use. I have another object, Mr. Speaker, in introducing this subject, and it is this: to bring to the notice of the Government how necessary it is to protect the coast fisheries of Canada, and thereby prevent, where it is possible, any depletion of its waters. Indeed everything should be done to encourage and foster this industry, and the Government may rest assured the fishermen themselves will be co-workers in encouraging regulations that will tend to protect and retain to us an industry that will preserve to us that heritage which the Government have striven so nobly to foster and protect, and which I trust will be as lasting to us as the hills. In recent years large catches of mackerel have been taken in the bays and harbours of our coast from Cape Sable to Cape North in the spring of each year, but fishermen allege that they are only to be found at present in very limited quantities, owing to the fact that they are a very timid fish, and easily turned aside from their course, and when interfered with by United States' purse-seiners and diverted from their course, they seek deep water, and consequently are lost to the shore fishermen who fish in the bays and harbours of the coast. As a remedy the fishermen recommend that the fishery protective cruisers appear on the ground early, say about the 1st of May, and join the American fleet at Cape Sable, and keep company with it to Cape North, so as to keep purse-seiners outside the territorial waters entirely. What is complained of is that the fishing cruisers or cutters generally do not arrive on the scene until the mackerel and the United States fishing fleet have passed by, and entered the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The cutters should patrol the coast from early spring till late in the autumn to inspire fear, as well as to capture and thus prevent illicit fishing by Americans within our waters. I observe by the report from the Department of Marine and Fisheries that last year the number of licenses issued to American fishing vessels under the modus vivendi was less than any preceding year, only seventy-one were issued as compared with one hundred and eight the preceding year, and the revenue consequently was considerably less, only $9,130 last year as compared with $13,410 the preceding year, which means that either the number of American purse-seiners are being depleted, or they are able to elude or dodge our cruisers, and thereby avoid the taking of a license and the payment of the required license fee. It would be a great advantage, both to the United States and Canada, if an arrangement could be arrived at whereby the United States would abolish the use of the purse-seines entirely, and thereby avoid the dissatisfaction that at present exists as regards the trespass by American purse-seiners within our territorial waters. This would save Canadian cruisers patrolling our coast, foster and preserve the mackerel fisheries, and protect and retain to the waters of the United States as well as Canada that description of the finny tribe (mackerel), which so rapidly are being depleted by this unfair method of capture. Some persons might count me over-zealous in the cause of the fishermen and fisheries of Nova Scotia, but the motives prompting me to advocate the claims of the fishermen, and to seek their interests are naturally of a very legitimate character, and such as would incite to action any one who possessed a heart and an idea as to their arduous, toilsome and dangerous calling, and the limited reward in most cases in store for them compared with the many discomforts accompanying their efforts. The fishermen do not enjoy the rich and extensive fields that pervade central Canada, with fine houses and the luxuries of vineyard, orchard and garden, with fields of yellow wheat ready for the reapers to gladden their hearts, but on the contrary, with few exceptions, their cottage, which in most cases is very humble, is planted on a rock with few attractions except the roar and toss of the wild tempestuous billows rolling in on a rugged shore, and their bed and their grave, in many cases, is the cradle of the deep. Who, I ask, would not be moved and plead for them in their solitude and exposure? It is the fishermen as a class who bring into our country by the sea the needful medium, that commodity necessary for all our needs and comforts, be they what they may, and the farmers in justice should not complain of the protection given them by a prudent Government, when they consider that the major portion of the fishermen's returns from fishing goes to the west or central Canada for the purchase of their flour. Therefore, the fisherman and the farmer should go hand in hand together as each is dependent one upon the other. Welcome a Canadian at all times. Let our motto be Canada first, and Canada at all times for Canadians, always loyal to her own interests, and loyal to each other, no matter how widely removed the one from the other, let us ever count ourselves Canadians. With this friendly interprovincial feeling prompting us as Canadians I am thankful to be able to say that the augury of the future of Canada is as promising to-day in contrast with our neighbours across the border as had been any period since 1879, when under the National Policy the principle of protection was introduced and with a treasury realizing a surplus after paying current expenses sufficient to give bounties to fishermen, subsidies to railways of which we have in the east a part, and hope to have more; grants to public works of which we also have been sharers; the Fishery Intelligence Bureau, inaugurated to report the movement of bait, a great service to fishermen. I hope the Government will be able to see its way clear to grant the request I have already made for an increased bounty to shore boat fishermen, and decline granting in future any more subsidies to lines of steamers to the West Indies, finding the injury it is doing to sailing vessels legitimately engaged in the trade of fish.

Mr. KAULBACH.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach), but I certainly do not concur in his last remarks in reference to not renewing the subsidy to the line of steamers running to the Spanish and British West India Islands. I think that when we are about granting a subsidy of $750,000 a year for a fast line across the Atlantic, it is poor policy to cut off the small subsidy to the steamers running to those islands. We are all anxious to increase our trade with those islands, which now take an enormous quantity of our products. Heretofore they have been purchasing nearly altogether from the United States, principally for the reason that the means of communication from Canada to those islands have been very uncertain and very indifferent. From Boston and New York there are lines of steamers, I believe subsidized by the United States Government, running regularly to those islands; so that importers in the islands are able to get the products they require from the United States at certain and definite periods. There is no trouble about the transportation; they know that a steamer will sail on a certain day, and they know what the rate of freight will be. It is therefore much easier for them to purchase their supplies in the United States than in Canada, where they are not sure that they will get them in one or two or three months. If we have to depend on increasing our trade with the British and Spanish West India Islands by means of sailing vessels, without a line of steamers, we cannot hope to increase that trade to any extent. I believe that in the last few years the subsidy has been in the interest of Canada—that it has enabled the producers and manufacturers of goods required in those islands largely to increase their trade there. If the subsidy is cut off, these steamers will not be able to run, and then we shall have to depend on the uncertain times of sailing vessels. It is a trade which is growing and which will become very valuable should this subsidy be continued. I would certainly regret if the Government saw fit to discontinue the mail subsidies, which, after all, are comparatively insignificant. We are spending millions of dollars on works that are not anything like as advantageous to the people, and I think it would be a great mistake on the part of the Government, if they were to adopt the opinion of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) and decide to cease granting these subsidies.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. member for Lunenburg has the honour of representing one of the finest fishing counties on the Atlantic coast, a county famous for the enterprise and skill of its fishermen. They are the pride of the province of Nova Scotia, and every hon. member wishes to see the further development of their enterprise and energy. The hon. gentleman, of course looks at this question with an eager eye towards benefiting them and improving their condition, and I know that he has always held strong views on this subject of the modus vivendi. The modus vivendi grants very valuable privileges to the fishermen of the United States, at the cost, to some extent, of the fishermen of this country. Nevertheless there are many considerations which have justified the Government and Parliament in adopting that policy and maintaining it during the past few years. Without going fully into these reasons, I would point out to the hon. gentleman that while all that he has said may be quite true, nevertheless so long as Newfoundland, which together with the Atlantic coast of Canada, holds the key to the situation, maintains the same policy, there would be no great good in our abandoning it. Any advantage that Canada and Newfoundland would obtain if the modus vivendi were abrogated, would accrue to them through the crippling practically of the Gloucester fleet of fishermen. But Canada does not hold the key alone. Canada does not command the position, and if the foreign vessels were not able to make our ports the basis of their operations, they could easily transfer that base to the ports of Newfoundland. Under the 'modus vivendi' a great deal of friction between the fishermen of Canada and the United States has been removed. These fishermen hold licenses, and very many of them still continue to take out licenses, thus giving practically bonds for their good behaviour and the poaching on our exclusive rights, in waters which are exclusively ours, is far less than would otherwise be the case. Speaking briefly, I would say the course which has been followed is, under all the circumstances, the very best that could be followed, and until Newfoundland and Canada co-operate, it would be unwise to consider a change of that system. The fee at present is a considerable tax in itself—$1.50 a ton; and the raising of that fee would be, perhaps, tantamount to the abrogation of the modus vivendi altogether. The hon. gentleman, also having the interests of the fishermen in view, has advocated an increase of the bounty to the shore fishermen. It would be very gratifying to me to be able to say something to encourage that idea, but under the circumstances I am not able to hold out any hopes of an increase. It would be necessary, unless we were to deprive the schooners and the fishing vessels of their share of the bounty, to ask Parliament for an increased grant. The grant was increased a good many years ago, and now fairly represents the interest on the money which was paid Canada by the United States for the enjoyment by the latter, during a period of some twelve years, of the right to fish on our Atlantic coast. I do not think, therefore, that the suggestion is a practical one to-day. Certainly the hon. gentleman himself would not advocate an increase of the shore boats bounty, if it were to take away that portion of the bounty which the other vessels now enjoy, the primary object of the bounty being to encourage the building and equipping of a finer class of boats than obtained when the bounty system was adopted. All those from the Atlantic coast will say that whatever may have been the complaints in connection with the administration of the bounty system, its object has been largely attained. The hon. gentleman referred, and I am glad to say only generally, to a complaint that often reaches me, and that is the injury to our inshore fisheries owing to depredations by United States fishermen. Now, we have arrested and condemned several vessels in the last year, which were encroaching on our fisheries, but I have no definite information, nor has the gentleman given any, that there is any general violation of the Fishery Act by foreign vessels on our Atlantic coast during the past few years. Fishermen are fond of making complaints, and these complaints have often been investigated. When fishermen have had luck, it is perhaps only natural for them to infer that something has gone wrong somewhere, and the Government comes in for the blame. But in the various cases they have brought to our notice, investigation has shown that they were not speaking of facts within their knowledge, but of rumours that reached them that United States fishermen were encroaching on waters where they had no right to interfere. Only this year complaints were made that during the time the Dominion cutters were not on the coast, say in Chedebuctou Bay, foreign fishermen had come in and made great catches. These complaints were investigated, and it was established beyond reasonable doubt that these fishermen, who made the great catches complained of, were fishing outside our jurisdiction altogether. Another fact worth noting is that while our fishermen could easily discover the names of the vessels which were poaching, no names were ever given to us. At one time our fishermen were not so keen to keep foreign fishermen out, and we could obtain no assistance from them whatever. Everybody from Nova Scotia knows that with reference to the encroachments made on our territorial waters. But that happily has passed away, and some of the arrests made, were made on evidence furnished by our own fishermen. Our fishermen do now co-operate and take the names of vessels found fishing within our limits, and, of course, on that information being given to us, our cruisers are put on the look out, and if possible the poaching vessels are captured within the limits. From the information furnished from the commander of the 'Acadia' himself, I am convinced that the catches made by the United States vessels along our coasts were made outside of our territorial limits, and that the fears of the fishermen had not been well founded in that respect. Therefore,

I was glad to find that the hon. gentleman had no information upon that point to contradict that which we had and that many of the statements which have been current are not well founded. The hon. gentleman condemns the use of purse-seines. So do I. So does the Government. And the use of purse-seines has been prohibited in our waters. The use of purse-seines is largely prohibited under the legislation of the United States, and during a close season which has been fixed, no fish from purse-seines may be landed in the ports of the United States. We have asked the United States to go further and, with that object in view, a commission is now acting and acting very energetically in dealing with this subject, so that all the information may be obtained, on which it may be possible joint action will be taken and purse-seining prohibited altogether by both United States and Canadian fishing vessels, whether inside or outside the territorial waters. If that is done, I think the mackerel fishery will be greatly benefited. Then I was glad to hear the hon. gentleman refer to the fisheries intelligence bureau. That was established on the advice of the late Commander Gordon, who did the fisheries on the coast great service in his life-time. The bureau has been of great advantage to the fishermen, as the hon. member from Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) testified, and it has also been of great advantage to the Fishery Department, and the cruisers, because, if we know where the fish are, we know where to place the cruisers. Our object is, and our instructions are, that the cruisers shall watch the bulletins from this bureau, and endeavour to keep in, as nearly as possible with the run of the fish as they strike the different parts of the coast. The other object to which the hon. gentleman refers does not immediately concern my department, Mr. Speaker, but is a subject upon which there is, apparently, a difference of opinion. The hon. member for Kent, Ontario, (Mr. Campbell) apparently believes in protection. I am glad to see that. He evidently does not believe in the laissez faire policy, but has come out for state aid, and asks that the steamers shall be given subventions, so that the ordinary speed of commercial enterprise may be accelerated. I have no doubt he had in mind that important article of flour when he spoke of articles being carried more cheaply and to better advantage from our shores to other countries. I must say that the hon. member for Kent was more in line with the policy of the Conservative Government in that regard than was my hon. friend from Lunenburg. However, I can give no valuable information on that subject, except to say that that is one of the questions that have been brought to the attention of the Government, but the result of its consideration by the Government will not be seen until the Supplementary Estimates are brought down.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

PONTIAC PACIFIC JUNCTION RAILWAY.

Mr. BRYSON. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I have a matter to which I wish to call the attention of the House for a few minutes. It may be thought that my observations are only of local importance, but I consider that they have also Dominion interest. The railway whose future I am about to discuss has been declared to be one for the general advantage of Canada, and I believe that not only the county of Pontiac, but Canada generally is interested in that line of railway. I shall be very brief, and I crave the indulgence of the House, and ask hon. gentlemen to bear with me while I give a brief resume of the position of the road in the county of Pontiac. My object in making the remarks I do is that the House may be put in possession of the facts as to the position of the county of Pontiac in relation to railway accommodation, and its claims for consideration at the hands of the Government. As the House very well knows, very few miles of railway existed in the province of Quebec at the time of Confederation. The undertaking to build a railway from Quebec to Aylmer was taken up shortly after Confederation by two companies which were chartered by the province of Quebec. Subsidies in land and money were granted by the local Government of Quebec, and the cities of Montreal and Quebec, and other municipalities gave local aids, also. The companies met with many difficulties, and, the result was that, in 1875, the province undertook to build the road and extend it from the town of Aylmer to Deep River in the county of Pontiac. The road having been built as far as Aylmer, the Local Government, being then under financial pressure, had to abandon the building of the portion between Aylmer and Deep River, and the road was transferred to a local company, which was given a bonus of $6,000 per mile. This was prior to the time when the Dominion Government had adopted a system of subsidizing local roads. Therefore, the only amounts at the disposal of the company were the $6,000 per mile voted by the Legislature for eighty-five miles of railway, and local subsidies voted for the line of railway between Quebec and Aylmer. The municipality of Quebec contributed a bonus of about a million dollars; the municipality of Montreal about a like sum; the county of Ottawa, $200,000; St. Andrews, of Argenteuil, $25,000; Ste. Therese, $12,000; St. Jerome, $10,000; and other villages about $15,000. An appeal was made to the county of Pontiac for aid to the amount of $100,000 for the construction of the road. A bonus by-law in favour of the road was submitted to the ratepayers of Pontiac in the summer of 1881. This by-law—No. 14—was defeated. But, subsequently, on the 14th of September, 1881, a by-law was submitted to the ratepayers of the county of Pontiac which was carried, granting the sum of $100,000, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, payable in twenty-five years. Now, with the permission of the House, I will read the first, second, and fifth section of that by-law, these being the only clauses which it is necessary for the House to be informed upon for a proper understanding of the case. Section 1 reads:

Upon the terms and conditions hereinafter stipulated and provided for, the warden of the said county of Pontiac shall be and he hereby is authorized and required for and on behalf of this corporation to enter into a contract with the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company to grant and pay unto the said company a bonus of $100,000, and for that purpose to have prepared debentures of this corporation to the extent or value of $100 each, which shall be payable in twenty-five years from the date of their issue respectively, and shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, said interest to be paid semi-annually on the first day of January and July in each year, at the bank of Montreal, in the city of Montreal, and such debentures shall rank equally upon the taxable real estate in the said county, and such debentures shall be accepted by the company at par in payment of the said bonus.

Section 2. The said corporation shall pay to the said Pontiac and Pacific Junction Railway Company the sum of $2,500 per mile of said railway built within the limits of said corporation of the county of Pontiac, provided the whole amount of said bonus does not exceed for the whole line of said railway built in the said corporation of the county of Pontiac as aforesaid, the sum of $100,000.

Section 5. The said Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company shall commence the construction of said railway within one year from the date of the passing and approval of said by-law, and shall complete and finish the part of the said railway to be built within the limits of the said county of Pontiac within six years from that date; and at the expiration of the said six years, the said Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company shall have no further claim or demand in virtue of the said by-law against the said corporation for any portion of said railway which may remain unbuilt in the said county of Pontiac.

This by-law was carried by a very small vote, indeed. There were about 4,500 electors in the county of Pontiac who had a right to vote, the total vote polled was about 1,520, of which 1,080 were in favour of the by-law, and 440 against. Now, I wish to point out that the railway company have carried out their agreement so far as the construction of forty miles of the road in the county of Pontiac is concerned. This was completed in the early part of 1887, and I wish to point out to the House that since 1887 the western portion of the road has not yet had ten miles completed, but at the present time they are working the road ten miles west of where this forty miles put them in 1887. I think that is a state of affairs which should no longer exist, and that time should not be extended to a railway company who have not shown that they were desirous of completing the line.

Now, it is worth while to point out to the House how the municipalities west of the point reached by the railway company in 1887, voted on this Bill which I have just read when it was submitted to the electors:

The House will see that the portion of the county from Coulonge westward was almost a unit in the five townships I have just mentioned, except Allumette Island, where three votes were polled in its favour. Now, it seems to me that the time has been extended too often to the company for the completion of the railway. We find that of these municipalities which I have just named, one of them, Allumette Island, has $1,120 to pay this year of their portion of the bonus, and at the nearest possible point they are not within twelve miles of the terminus of the line of railway as at present operated; and other townships are paying their pro rata of the county bonus. Now, I ask this House if it can be considered fair and in the public interest that simply because due and proper consideration was not given to the passage of this by-law; the people of the western portion of the county of Pontiac should be deprived of a railway. On the 18th March, 1884, I submitted an application for aid to this line of railway, and if the House will bear with me, I will read one or two of the clauses which bear upon the subject:

That the present constituted company have held the charter for the construction of the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway for nearly four years; that their outlay thus far has been very trifling; that the contract for the construction thereof was undertaken in consideration of payment therefor in bonds of the road; that after expending considerable on the work, the contractor abandoned it, in November, 1892, nearly 16 months ago, since which time nothing has been done towards a furtherance of the work by either the contractor or the company, and that the inactivity of the present company, in making no attempt to carry out the work of construction since the abandonment of it by the contractor, when they have the right to take possession of the work and continue it, naturally leads to the belief that the company arnot in earnest, and are not desirous of constructing the road.

That there are large sums of money due to residents of both the counties of Ottawa and Pontiac for labour and material furnished for construction. This indebtedness the company have made no effort to pay off, though in doing so they would have held ample security for their outlay, in the work already done on the road.

That the present subscribed and paid up stock of the company is not at all in keeping with the magnitude of the enterprise.

From the past history of the work, it is quite apparent that to secure the construction of this important road, it becomes necessary as a protection to the people so largely interested as the county of Pontiac, that the Government in granting aid should stipulate that any company undertaking this work have subscribed and paid up stock to the extent of $400,000, and have at least half that amount expended on the road before any Dominion aid be paid them.

That the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway is a continuation of the North Shore Railway, which is equally entitled to assistance from the Dominion Government as is that portion of it, which more fortunately was built by the Quebec Government.

That to secure the construction of this railway it is absolutely necessary that a subsidy should be granted by the Dominion Government at this session of Parliament.

This was dated March 18th, 1884. Well, on 15th April, 1884, when the subsidies were brought down by Sir Charles Tupper, then Finance Minister, a subsidy of $272,000 was voted for a line of railway through the county of Pontiac, and a provision was inserted in the Bill that a contract should be entered into between the Government and the company for the construction of this line of railway. This contract is dated December 22nd, 1884, and is entitled "Contract and articles of agreement between the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway on the first part, and Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, represented therein by the Minister of Railways, on the second part." This contract goes on to specify :

And whereas the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company has established, to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council, its ability to complete the said railway within a reasonable time, to be fixed by Order in Council, such time having been fixed as follows:—For the completion of the first section of 27 miles from Aylmer, by the first day of September next (1885); for the completion of the second section of 27 miles from Aylmer, by the first July, 1886, and for the completion of the entire road by the first day of July, 1887.

Now, you will see that this agreement has not been kept. It is also further specified :

That the said company shall commence the work embraced in this agreement within three months from the date hereof, and shall complete the same, to wit:—The first section of 27 miles from Aylmer on or before the first day of September next, 1885; the second section of 27 miles on or before the first day of July, 1886, and the entire line by the first

Mr. BRYSON.

July, 1887, time being declared to be material and of the essence of this contract, and in default of such completion as aforesaid on or before the said dates, the company shall forfeit all rights, claim or demands to any and every part of the subsidy remaining unpaid, as also to any moneys whatever which may be at the time of the failure of the completion as aforesaid, due and owing to the company.

This contract was entered into between L. Ruggles Church, the late Judge Church, acting as president of the Pontiac Railway Company, and W. J. Conroy, secretary of the company, and the late John Henry Pope, Minister of Railways, and the secretary of the department, A. P. Bradley. Now we find although they were to have this road completed in 1887, it is still uncompleted, and since 1887 only ten miles of that road has been put under construction, and they only completed that forty miles of road in the county of Pontiac to enable them to make a demand for the bonus of $100,000 promised them by the electors. In 1887, I then represented Pontiac, and finding that the company were not likely to be able to complete the road, I presented a further petition :

That if the Dominion Government were to grant the same measure of assistance to the said Pontiac and Pacific Junction Railway, as has already been granted to other roads of an Interprovincial character, to wit: six thousand dollars per mile; or a subsidy of half the cost of the said bridges and approaches, viz: $200,000, conditional on the bridge at the western connection being built at the point above mentioned, your petitioners have no doubt the company would consent to carry out in good faith the terms which they have always been led to believe would be assured them.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that you will take the premises into your most favourable consideration, and grant to the said line of railway an increased subsidy of $200,000; or one-half the cost of construction of the two bridges required, and an additional mileage subsidy of $6,000 per mile, for a distance of ten miles.

This petition was presented in 1887. Since that time little or nothing has been done on the western portion of the road, and the reason why to-night I ask a fair consideration of this subject, in the interests of the people I have the honour to represent, is simply because the primitive undertaking for the construction of the North Shore road included as part and parcel of it the present Pacific and Pontiac Junction Railway as far as Deep River in the county of Pontiac. Hon. gentlemen are no doubt aware that $6,000 per mile was paid on the road from Hull to Montreal; whereas, if the Pontiac Pacific Road had been built by the Provincial Government, no doubt the Federal Government would have been obliged to give the same consideration to that portion of the road west of Hull that it gave to the portion east of Hull, between Montreal and that point. At the same time that discussion was going on with respect to subsidies being voted to railways of a local character, an interview was arranged on May 21st, 1891, by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) with Sir John A. Macdonald. On that occasion the province of Ontario was largely represented. I was present in the Railway Committee Room, and I listened with much pleasure to the remarks of the gentlemen who addressed Sir John Macdonald and the present Minister of Finance. The demand made by the speakers was, in brief, that the province of Ontario had largely subsidized local roads, and that they now came and asked that those subsidies should be repaid them, they having put their hands in their pockets to assist local roads. There were represented at that meeting one hundred and fifty municipalities, five cities and twenty-two counties. The amount of money represented by the delegates was no less than $8,957,000. The leader of the Government, Sir John Macdonald, who replied to Mayors Parker and Tyler, said that the question submitted by the deputation was one of very serious moment, namely, whether the Government could then entertain certain propositions involving as they did the expenditure of a very large sum of money; and as the House of Commons was composed of representatives from the different provinces, he felt assured that they would not feel disposed to grant the application of the delegation. At the same time he asked the Minister of Finance, who was present, to express his opinion. The opinion expressed by the Minister of Finance was much in the same line as that presented by the First Minister, that if the municipalities had assisted the construction of railways they had no doubt materially benefited by their construction, and if the policy of the Government was to repay such bonuses to the provinces and municipalities, then the provinces by the sea would be entitled to the same consideration. On the afternoon of the same day a deputation from the county of Pontiac visited the Capital, and the leader of the Government agreed to meet the deputation in his private room. I regret to say that that was one of the last deputations which the late right hon. gentleman met in the House of Commons. When that deputation, which was composed entirely of the county council of Pontiac, the secretary-treasurer, and a few friends who were invited, as well as the then representative of the county, Mr. Murray, met the Premier, the right hon. gentleman is reported to have said :

Gentlemen, I am pleased to see such a representative deputation from Pontiac upon so important a subject, and I must say it is not a surprise to me that you should be found here to-day, inasmuch as this seems to be a day for railway subventions to municipalities which have themselves assisted railway enterprises in the different sections. Your claims are, however, upon a different footing from those of the large deputation of to-day from Ontario. I would ask you to send in the memorials mentioned by one of the speakers, prepare your case as it really is, and I can promise you I shall lay it before my colleagues, and will give it my most serious consideration.

The case of the county of Pontiac was quite different from that presented to the First Minister by the representatives of municipalities who waited upon him on the same day, as the county of Pontiac was not receiving the advantages of a railway connection which had been expected. There are at least in the county thirty miles of road now operated to which the people are annually contributing by way of bonus, and at least 3,000 people of the county are deprived of railway advantages, and under these circumstances I appeal to the House for further consideration of this question. I contend that the Government of Canada to-day has a right to redress the wrong that has been imposed on the county. In that county there is a railway running partially through it and terminating at Aylmer, at which the people are obliged to take the Canadian Pacific Railway into Ottawa, a distance of eight or nine miles, and it certainly was not the intention of the people of the county that they should have to deal with two lines of railway in order to secure entrance into the capital. If you send special articles of carload lots they cost, in many cases, more to send from Ottawa to Aylmer by the Canadian Pacific Railway than from Aylmer to the western end of the road operated, a distance of 61 miles. I contend that inasmuch as the province of Quebec built the interprovincial bridge at Ottawa, that the Dominion Government have not expended one dollar on the bridge or its approaches, the whole involving an expenditure to the province of $225,000, at least the Pontiac Railway should have received running powers over the road from Aylmer to Hull and from Hull across the interprovincial bridge to Ottawa. Only a few days ago a very large and influential deputation waited on the Government in reference to assistance for a new bridge at Nepean Point. I had not the pleasure of being present on that occasion, but from the reports that were published in the city papers, I saw that the reception the deputation received was not such as to insure success, no direct promise being made by the Government of assistance to this great enterprise; and, with all due respect to those who may differ from me I say that it is a great hardship to the people of the county of Pontiac to be deprived of an entrance into the city of Ottawa other than that which at present exists. A few years ago, when the Canadian Pacific Railway short lines were all consolidated, I pointed out that, in all probability, at some time in the near future, the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company would require to purchase that portion of road between Aylmer and Hull. Legislation was brought down in the following session. I think in 1890, giving the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company power to acquire that portion of road by entering into an agreement for its purchase. That road has been subsidized by the Local Legislature for $6,000 per mile and by the Federal Parliament for $3,200 per mile; but, notwithstanding that $9,200 a mile has been voted to it by the Federal and Provincial Legislatures, the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company have not availed themselves of the opportunity of taking over that portion of line, and thereby running their own trains into the city of Ottawa. Sir, I appeal to the hon. Minister of Railways and to his colleagues to see that justice is done to the county of Pontiac. Inasmuch as the county of Ottawa voted, but never paid, $200,000 in aid of the construction of the present Canadian Pacific Railway, although the line was not then owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway, but by a private company; and inasmuch as nearly all the counties in this district have railway facilities without having contributed one dollar directly in the way of a direct tax upon the people, we believe that the county of Pontiac should be placed on the same footing. We believe that it was by an oversight that the Local Government chartered the link to complete the line of railway to Deep River—that it was an error of judgment on their part; because when the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway is completed to its western terminus at Deep River and there taps the Canadian Pacific Railway, we shall have a shorter line between Deep River and the city of Montreal by about twenty-two miles. In consideration of the fact that we shall then have a short line of railway for all heavy freights from the west to the east, I think it will be only fair that the Government should do for the county of Pontiac what has been done for other counties, namely, give sufficient aid to the railway company to enable them to complete the road so as to tap the Canadian Pacific Railway at its western extremity and the city of Ottawa at the east, without being obliged to interchange freight. And further, inasmuch as the Government have undertaken to relieve the town of Pembroke of the sum of $85,000 and interest, because the terminus of the Canada Central Railway was not left at Pembroke, and inasmuch as the route of the Pacific Junction has not satisfied the people of Pontiac, not having touched some of the important villages in the county, I think fair consideration should be given to the appeal of the county of Pontiac for relief. It was stated last year and the year before that pledges had been made by me that if I were returned, the people of the county would be relieved of the bonus. It was further stated that I had in my possession a letter guaranteeing something to that effect. Last year I took the opportunity of contradicting that statement. I said that I had not in my possession any such letter, and that I had never made that statement on a public platform. My statement was corroborated by the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), who, I regret to see, is not in his seat to-night. He was in the county and heard the statement I made. But I am free to admit that the electors of the county were continually urging that point, just as it was found in the last local election in the city of Ottawa, when a member of the Ontario Cabinet was a candidate, that the speakers supporting him on the public platform advocated his return on the ground that he would have influence with the Government to obtain assistance for the interprovincial bridge. We did not find that hon. gentleman saying he would obtain assistance, and I am not one of those who would accuse him of arguing so; but the same argument which applied to the electors of Ottawa was the argument which applied to the electors of Pontiac, that in order to get what was considered justice at the hands of the Government, they should send a supporter of the Government to bring the claims of the county before it. Sir, in bringing forward this matter, I have done simply what I have considered it my privilege and my duty to do. I desire to point out further, that the operation of the line of railway as it at present exists in the county of Pontiac is by no means satisfactory. I want it distinctly understood that I am not making any appeal for the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company. I am anxious that, if that railway company do not do justice to the ratepayers of the county, the Government shall use due diligence, when the time expires for the completion of the road, if it is not completed, to have some other company undertake its completion, and transfer to such new company the money that has not been earned by the present company, if the new company give assurances to the Government of a serious intention to complete the road and thereby provide the county of Pontiac with railway facilities from one end of the county to the other. We were told a short time ago by some of the members of the Government that the county of Pontiac had not paid anything. At that time that statement was quite true. But, Sir, let the hon. Minister not fall into the same trap now, as the people are now paying, and I have no doubt will be obliged to pay. It was then argued that the railway through the county of Pontiac had received the same consideration that all railways of the same local character are entitled to; and, with your permission, I will call the attention of the House to some of the different railways of this Dominion that have received further aid. In April, 1884, a subsidy of $3,200 per mile was voted by this Parliament to the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway, while a subsidy was voted to the Gatineau Valley Railway of $5,160 a mile for sixty-two miles, giving a total of $320,000. The Montreal and Western Railway, which is largely a road of the same character, had a subsidy of $5,161 a mile for seventy miles, or a total of $361,270. The Quebec and Lake St. John Railway had a subsidy of $4,046 a mile for two hundred and eighty-four miles, or a total of $1,003,495. The Ottawa, Arnprior and Parry Sound Railway, which largely duplicates the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway through the eastern part of Ontario, received $4,018 a mile for one hundred and seven miles, or a total of $430,000. The Temiscouata Railway received a subsidy of $5,637 per mile for one hundred and nineteen miles, or a total of $670,800.

Mr. LISTER. Did those roads get provincial aid also?

Mr. BRYSON. I regret that I am not in a position to answer the hon. gentleman on that point, as I do not know what the provincial aid was. I know that the Gattineau Valley Railway received provincial aid, but to what extent I cannot at the moment state positively. Now, the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway is subsidized only to the amount of $3,200 per mile by this Government. An additional subsidy of $5,100 a mile for the twenty miles yet to be built would only increase the average subsidy for the ninety-five miles of the road to about $4,000 a mile, or a little over half the amount voted for the Temiscouata Railway. I appeal to the First Minister, the Minister of Railways and his colleagues, as well as to this House, whether it would not be better to increase the subsidy to a company to construct and maintain a line of railway which would give us entrance into the city. Would that not be simply putting us on a par with other roads which have received so large and favourable considerations at the hands of the Government? The townships in the eastern portion of the county of Pontiac, namely, Bristol, Clarendon and Onslow, when they are shipping their grain westward, are obliged to send it by rail to Ottawa in order to strike the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they have to pay something like $17 or $18 a car from Shawville, Bristol and Onslow, to get their cars into Ottawa in order to connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway. Therefore, you will see what difficulties we have to meet, and how we are handicapped through having no western outlet, and I ask the Government to give their favourable consideration to this matter at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. LISTER. How much was the Dominion subsidy to this road and the Provincial subsidy?

Mr. BRYSON. The Dominion subsidy was $3,200 for 85 miles, and the Provincial subsidy was $6,000 per mile.

Mr. LISTER. That makes $9,200 per mile. How much municipal bonuses were given?

Mr. BRYSON. $2,500 per mile for 40 miles in Pontiac.

Mr. LISTER. That makes $11,500 a mile for 40 miles at any rate.

Mr. BRYSON. This road is built from Aylmer through the western portion of Ottawa, which contributed nothing, and the portion of the road not yet built has no municipal bonuses whatever. It has the local bonus of $6,000 per mile, and the Federal bonus of $3,200 per mile for 85 miles.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman has made a statement with regard to the position in which his county is placed by the building of the Pontiac railway. He claims from the Government assistance for the purpose of taking it out of the trouble into which it seems to have got, through giving bonuses to a large amount to a section of the road which is not completed, and which does not offer sufficient accommodation to the people of that county. It is unfortunate that the people of the county voted their money in that particular way, and it is unfortunate that a municipality like the county of Pontiac had power to bind the whole of the municipalities of the different townships to the extent they did. For, as the hon. gentleman states, several of the municipalities in the western part voted, almost to a man, against giving this particular bonus, but they were compelled to contribute, and are being compelled to contribute, a certain sum annually to a road which is not of the slightest benefit to them. It is unfortunate that the municipality of the county of Pontiac has had power by a majority vote to tax these township municipalities which receive no benefit whatever, and the hon. gentleman is naturally very anxious that some extension to the railway should be made in order to accommodate these particular townships. The fault, I do not think, lies with the Dominion Government. The Dominion Government are not in any way responsible for the giving by the people of Pontiac of a sum of money to an uncompleted road—a road only completed to the extent of 40 miles. All that the Dominion Government were pledged to was the sum of $3,200 per mile for the road when completed. I am aware that the terms of the bonus extend beyond the 40 miles completed. When any part of that extension is completed, when the bonus is earned, of course the Dominion Government are perfectly willing to pay the amount. The hon. gentleman appeals to us for a further increase, on the ground that other roads in different sections of the country have received larger sums than $3,200 per mile, and he makes the further appeal that if the company does not exert itself to a greater extent than it has in the past, some means should be taken to compel it to do so, or else take from it the right of acquiring the bonus. I think that part of his argument is perfectly correct. If the railway company is not in a position to go on and build the road, and if there is any other company willing to build the extension of the road in the direction the hon. gentleman asks, the bonus might be changed from a bonus to this particular road to a bonus for an extension in the direction the hon. gentleman mentions. But the same difficulty would arise in that case which has arisen at Aylmer. The road would then consist, in order to reach its natural market at the city of Ottawa, of three portions, namely, that portion of the Pontiac railway and that along the Pontiac railway down to the town of Aylmer, and from Aylmer to Ottawa. I do not think the hon. gentleman will be able to get any company to extend a road which had a terminus at this particular junction, and I think his only chance would be to get the Pontiac railway into live hands, into the hands of people who would be active and make it a paying and live institution, by extending it in the direction the hon. gentleman wishes. There is no doubt that that little section of road, only 40 miles, having a junction nowhere, and extending down to the town of Aylmer, where it is, so to speak, collared by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and where on every bit of freight they will have, perhaps, as the hon. gentleman says, to pay as much for taking it over these seven or eight miles as they pay for taking it over the whole 40 miles. The hon. gentleman thinks we ought to, in some way, enforce the right of the Pontiac railway to the usage of that road from Aylmer to Hull. I do not know of any possible way in which the Government could do that. They could hardly call upon Parliament to give another bonus to a road which would almost parallel the line from Aylmer to Hull, and after the road got to Hull, to carry out the idea of the hon. gentleman would necessitate the building of another bridge, because the bridge at present across the Ottawa River is under the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It would necessitate the building of another bridge and terminus in the city of Ottawa, in order that it might be of any benefit at all to the Pontiac railway. I sympathize to the fullest extent with the hon. gentleman; I do not know of any county in Canada which has been so shamefully used by a railway company as the county of Pontiac has been. They gave their money evidently with the intention of having the road finished nearly, any way, throughout the whole of the municipalities of the county of Pontiac. They made that arrangement and bargain with the Pontiac Railway Company, but through some flaw or some clause that was slipped into their by-law, the company managed to acquire the whole of the bonds, when only 40 miles of the road were completed, and the people are now being taxed for the benefit of a road which is of very slight advantage to them. I do not see in what particular the Government can in any way come to the aid of the county except by the bonusing of the extent of road for which the hon. gentleman asks a bonus. I do not know that the Government intend this session to bring down any subsidies to railways at all. The statement which the hon. gentleman has made in this House, I will, however, bring to the attention of my colleagues, and ask their consideration to it when the question of subsidies is being considered. The hon. gentleman states as another reason why the Government should give a larger bonus than $3,200 per mile to this road, that the intention of the Quebec Government, when the North Shore road was built, was to complete this road up to Deep River, and that if it had been built to Deep River instead of to Hull, when the bargain was made with the province of Quebec, the Quebec Government would have been receiving $12,000 per mile for that road, and would have had the road completed. It might be that that small distance between Hull and Deep River, which the hon. gentleman speaks of, might have been the means of preventing the bargain ever having been made. It was sufficient, I think, and it was all that was proposed, that the Quebec Government should, at the time, get $12,000 per mile from Ottawa to Montreal. I think the Quebec Government ought to have contributed more or ought to have seen to the completion of the road which had been completed to Aylmer, the original intention being to complete it to Deep River. I can only say to the hon. gentleman that it would be a very bad and a very dangerous precedent in this country if the Dominion Government were for any excuse, or for any reason at all to give any municipality in the country a sum of money to recoup it for a bonus given to a railway. Once this was done for any county, every municipality or county in the Dominion would claim an equal right to be recouped. I can only tell the hon. gentleman that I shall bring his statement to the attention of my colleagues and that his claim for a larger subsidy than $3,200 per mile for the portion of the road that remains to be completed will be considered.

Mr. LISTER. I would ask the hon. gentleman how much this road was bonded for per mile?

Mr. BRYSON. I think it is not bonded at all.

Mr. LISTER. I think it was bonded for $15,000 per mile.

Mr. BRYSON. All I can say is that if that is the case I am not aware of it. I think the money advanced for the construction of the road was advanced by the late Senator Ross.

Mr. LISTER. That was only a part of it.

Mr. BRYSON. I do not think there were any bonds sold on any portion of the road.

Motion agreed to; and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Militia, Gratuities to officers of the active militia placed on the retired list	$4,400
--	---------

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Of this sum $2,000 is a gratuity to Major Street, of Winnipeg, who has been in the service since 1870. He went up with the First Red River expedition as an officer. He remained in active service until last year when I retired him. I had not funds at that time out of which to give him a gratuity. I am giving him two years' pay. He served for twenty-two years. The sum of $2,400 is for a gratuity for Colonel McShane, of Halifax. He has served twenty-one years, part of the time as Brigade-Major, and the last twelve months as Superintendent of Stores. This amount is equal to two years' pay.

Clothing and necessaries	$12,000
--------------------------------	----------

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I found last year that I had bills to pay for the year ending 30th June, 1893, to the amount of $12,485, and I had no funds to pay them. I was not aware of these bills when I took charge. I had to pay them out of my supplies for the year ending 30th of June, 1894. I have now bills to be paid amounting to $13,000 and I have only $1,400 to pay them with. Therefore, I have to come to the House for this amount to make up the deficiency. These bills were for clothing contracted for and actually delivered prior to 1st July, 1893.

Mr. LAURIER. It amounts to this—the hon. gentleman's predecessor had exceeded his appropriation.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The clothing was furnished; I can give my hon. friend the items.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman who is filling the office of Adjutant General in his department now?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Colonel Walker Powell is Adjutant General.

Mr. LAURIER. But he is not filling the duties of the office.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I have no official information on the subject.

Mr. LAURIER. I thought the Minister was head of the department.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think the hon. Minister had better explain this matter. I do not understand it.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I have asked for official information on the subject, which

I will be happy to furnish to the House when I get it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that it is only right that the hon. Minister should give us this information. The military department proper is subordinate to the hon. gentleman as Minister of the Crown. He is the head of the civil department, and, if an officer who has been so long in the service, who has stood so high in the general estimation, not only of the House, but of the country as well, for the last thirty years as Colonel Powell, is suspended or removed from office, it strikes me as rather a serious matter, and one concerning which the fullest explanation should be given to the House.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I can only say that I expect to have information to be laid before the Governor in Council, and that if I get it I shall be happy to communicate it to the House to-morrow.

Mr. LAURIER. The item will stand meantime?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I think the hon. gentleman should not ask the item to stand. The money is overdue, and there are many other items in my department on which this subject can be discussed.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman will pardon me, but I do not understand his position at all. He is the head of the department, and it is inconceivable that the public press should announce for two days that an important officer of the department has been suspended and the hon. gentleman have no knowledge of it. I think that until he is in a position to give the information to which the House is entitled he is not in a position to ask for any money.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I have told the hon. gentleman that I have asked for an official report which I can lay before the Governor in Council and before this House.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Has any one the power to suspend one of the hon. gentleman's officials without his knowledge and consent. I do not understand fully the etiquette of the department. That is why I made my inquiry. It seems strange to me, the Minister being the head of the department, an officer of the department can be suspended without his knowledge.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). That is one of the questions at present receiving my consideration.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Can an officer under control of the Minister be laid off active duty without the Minister's sanction? Has this been done without the Minister's sanction or knowledge?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I have never suspended any officer, either military or civil, in the department.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But can such an officer be suspended by any one else without the consent of the Minister ?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). It depends upon what position the officer might occupy. I suppose it is possible for a military officer to be suspended in that way. A civilian can only be suspended by the Minister, or in his absence by the Deputy. I have not the slightest wish to keep anything back from my hon. friends, and shall give the information as soon as I can.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that question was settled many years ago in a dispute that arose between Sir David Dundas and Lord Palmerston, and I think the whole discussion will be found in one of the volumes of Clode's Military Forces of the Crown.

Mr. LAURIER. We will have a report to-morrow, then ?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Yes.

C.P.R. Construction..... $4,000

Mr. HAGGART. This sum is required to pay salary and expenses of the engineer in charge of the award works, and to pay land damages. The value of the work remaining to be done under the award of $559,255.20 is $115,710. This is to pay the salary of the supervising engineer at $120 per month, and to pay a large number of land claims unsettled. The amounts due are small, but the demands are large.

I.C.R. Construction... $73,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not quite understand how that comes to be a revote here ?

Mr. HAGGART. The amount was voted for a train ferry between Mulgrave and Point Tupper, but the ferry boat was not built until after the time had expired. We had to get a Governor General's warrant, and this is to cover the warrant. The money was voted before for the service. The vote had expired, the work was done, and the contractor was a couple of months longer than he ought to have been, and we had to get a Governor General's warrant ; $63,500 of this money is for that, and the balance for the extension along the front of the city of St. John.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What was the total cost of the boat ?

Mr. HAGGART. The train ferry cost $117,691.89.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is that a ferry on which the freight cars are run ?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes ; I think there is a tow boat and a ferry besides. The boat carries four passenger cars.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron).

Annapolis and Digby railway construction..... $1,000

Mr. HAGGART. This is to pay for land damages, $406, and legal expenses, $594.

Mr. PATTERSON (Colchester). Is the Annapolis and Digby part of our system now ?

Mr. HAGGART. No ; that belongs to the Western Counties Railway. That is the line for the building of which the Government gave $500,000, and we took it over and built it ourselves, and gave it to the Western Counties Railway.

Lachine Canal—Construction... $12,500

Mr. HAGGART. This is to pay some outstanding accounts in connection with the Lachine Canal, $8,000 ; and towards building a drain on the Lachine shore, $4,500.

Mr. LAURIER. What kind of work is that ?

Mr. HAGGART. It is some work in connection with the Wellington-street bridge.

Mr. LAURIER. The Curran bridge, rather.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Done by days' work ?

Mr. HAGGART. I have not got the details.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is it Curran or the bridge that is so expensive ?

Mr. HAGGART. It is some of the few accounts that we admit are correct, but I have not got the items here.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman cannot be surprised if, in a matter of that kind, we would like to see the accounts ?

Mr. HAGGART. Then I will have to let the item stand until to-morrow.

Soulanges Canal—Construction . $2,200

Mr. HARWOOD. (Translation.) I regret that, at this late stage of the session, it should be necessary for me to take the time of the House, but I think it incumbent upon me to refer now to the reply made to a question put by me, a few days ago, to the Government. The hon. Minister of Railways did not give a satisfactory reply to my question. I am positive that the claim of Mr. Odilon Lalonde, who entered into contract with the Government for the purchase of his land, in July, 1893, had not yet been settled last week. The hon. Minister said that there was nothing in the department to show that contracts had been entered into without the claims arising out of the purchase of property having been duly settled. And at that very time of speaking, there was an item before the department showing that the heirs to a certain estate had entered into an agreement with the Government in the month of January last, while the Government notary informed me that the cheque in payment of the promised sum had not yet been issued, because the Government had no appropriation to meet that claim. I am quite surprised at the hon. Minister being kept in the dark as to what is going on in his department and I no longer wonder at irregularities having occurred within a short distance from the capital, in connection with the Soulanges Canal, without the department knowing anything about them. In order the better to understand the facts I am about to bring before the committee, it will be necessary for me to give a general topography of the premises, in connection with the Soulanges Canal. You are aware, Mr. Chairman, that the Soulanges Canal was built in order to unite the waters of Lake St. Francis with those of Lake St. Louis. The difference in level between the two lakes is 82½ feet and the canal is being built in order to overcome three rapids, the Cascades, the Cedars and the Coteau. The canal line, which is located on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, is 14 miles long. The canal has been subdivided into 13 sections. I may here remark that the first lock occurs in the fourth section, and is eleven miles distant from Lake St. Francis. This canal is cut almost perpendicularly, within a certain distance from the river; and the lands in the first concession, as well as in the parish of St. Ignace as in that of St. Joseph of Soulanges, are intersected by the canal within a greater or less distance from the front. The arbitrators appointed by the Government were Messrs. Wood, Paradis and Lalonde. From an examination of their work, I think I am in a position to speak with a thorough knowledge of the matter. The arbitrators set to work in September, 1892. They had had about from one hundred and forty to one hundred and fifty cadastral numbers to expropriate in the county of Soulanges. As several of those numbers belong to the same owner, they are not to be looked upon as so many lots. Those 140 to 150 cadastral numbers are owned by a about ninety persons. The arbitrators made tenders to some individuals. One would be led to think that men of their experience in that kind of work should have followed a more sensible course than the one adhered to. But such is not the point at issue. I cannot, however, refrain from remarking in that connection that the more sensible course for them to follow would have been to secure a copy of the cadastral reference book and a copy of the official plan of the canal, to repair to the premises in order to examine into the real value of the whole lot, taking into consideration the inconvenience and damages likely to result to the land owners from the projected location of the canal line. Such considerations were of considerable weight in view of the damages entailed upon the land owners by the severance of their property and by the means of access to his house or land being rendered less convenient from the construction of the canal. The location of the bridges is also an important element entering into the assessment of damages awarded to land owners. Such, however, was not the system adhered to by the arbitrators; and their expropriation proceedings will be better illustrated by quoting a few cases. First, I may preface these remarks by saying that for over thirty years past I have, in my capacity of land surveyor, travelled in all directions over the counties of Soulanges and Vaudreuil, and acquired in that line an experience which enables me properly to appreciate their work. The arbitrators, Mr. Chairman, as will be seen, acted in a very queer way. In order the better to elucidate the matter, I shall endeavour to institute a comparison only between such properties as are similarly situated. To begin with, the head or upper end of the canal, which is in the third section—let us take the land of Mr. Stanislas Filiatreault, which is intersected by the canal. This property is estimated at $2,000, and the arbitrators awarded him for it $435 per acre. Mr. Moise Giroux's property is estimated at $3,700; he should have been awarded a larger sum, on account of the greater inconvenience and damage suffered by reason of the severance of the property, the house and barn being on the south side and the farm on the north side of the canal; and also on account of access being cut off to his farm except by crossing a distant bridge. Still, while entitled to the same compensation as his neighbour for the depreciation of his land, he was only awarded $172 per acre. Mr. French, who is in a position exactly similar, and whose land is estimated at $3,000, was paid an indemnity of $212 per acre. On the whole line, there are two farms which occupy a peculiar position, as they lie in a small bay, north of the River St. Lawrence. One of these proprietors, and his neighbour, Mr. Guerin, have no land on the south side of the canal. The canal intersects a portion of the land, so that the house and the barns are on the north side, and on that side is found the macadam road which runs from Coteau to the Cascades. These proprietors will then have their frontage to the road. The property of the former, Gareau, is estimated at $2,100; he was allowed $638 per arpent. Guerin, whose land is estimated at $2,650, was allowed $357 per acre, about one-half of his neighbour's compensation. Gareau, who was in exactly in similar circumstances, was granted but $212 per arpent, although made to suffer the most serious inconvenience by the severance of his land for the purpose of the undertaking, as it necessitates crossing the canal to go over to his barn, or the removal of his buildings to the other side of the canal. Numerous instances might be adduced of people living along the line of the canals who have been made the victims of similar blunders. I pass them over in silence, in order to come to the farms which have been intersected by the centre. They are mostly lands containing from twenty-five to thirty arpents in depth, running irregularly along the line of the river. Let me quote three instances of lands intersected by the middle. The first one is a land belonging to Mr. Healy, estimated at $1,350. The arbitrators had offered him a sum of $1,600. Healy appealed from their decision to the Exchequer Court, which allowed him $2,362, or $362 per arpent, provided that a bridge should be built one mile above the property, failing which he should be entitled to a further compensation. The neighbouring lot, owned by Mr. Pilon, is valued at $1,200, and the arbitrators have paid him only $184 per arpent, notwithstanding the fact that this property is as valuable as that of Healy. The third lot, the property of Mr. Watier, is estimated at $2,000; the sum of $178 per arpent was awarded him. Let us now come to the parish of St. Joseph of Soulanges. Here again we meet with lands intersected by the centre, but whose peculiar location in connection with the bridge will enable their owners to have access to their property. Mr. Tremblay owns a land estimated at $2,800, one mile distant from the bridge; it will necessitate his going down one mile on the south side and his going up one mile on the north side. The sum awarded him is $126 per arpent. Mr. John McKay owns a property estimated at $1,750, six miles distant from the bridge; therefore, he has only twelve miles to travel up and down. The arbitrators have granted him a compensation of $250 per acre, while Mr. Tremblay only gets $126 per arpent for a property worth twice as much as the latter. Mr. Seguin's farm is estimated at $3,600, and is four arpents distant from the bridge. A sum of $500 per arpent was awarded him by the arbitrators. The injustice of such awards is patent. Tremblay, whose property is one mile distant from the bridge, is granted $126 per arpent, while Seguin, whose farm is but four arpents distant from it, receives an indemnity of $500 per arpent. Now, let us take the case of Mr. François Bissonnette, who is the owner of a farm valued at $2,000, situate in close proximity to the bridge. There is no road to give him access to the central portion of his property; he avails himself of the acclivity to cart his grain. Now, this man was granted $425 per acre. Mr. Laurent Tessier owns a property equally worth $2,000, fifteen acres distant from the bridge. This gentleman has the inconvenience of having on his property the bank of the channel, some twenty feet high—and I called attention to the fact that the first lock was eleven miles distant from Lake St. Francis, to show that sections 6, 5, 4 and 3 of the canal are entirely above the level of the lands—and on Laurent Tessier's property, the bank, as stated, is twenty feet high; now, from the general experience obtained from other canals, it is an ascertained fact that with a twenty-foot pressure, the neighbouring lands, if not completely flooded, will, at least, be made so cold and so damp by water filtering through the bank of the canal, that they will be much depreciated in value. Still, in all the contracts entered into between the Government and the vendors, a clause has been embodied providing that in consideration of the award mentioned in the agreement, the land owner exonerates the Government from any further claim for damages which might be sustained or suffered on the residue of his property by reason of the construction of the canal. In pursuance of this clause, Tessier would, therefore, no longer be entitled to make a claim for damages to be recovered from the Government by reason of damages suffered from dampness. Now, while the latter was offered but $275 per acre, Bissonnette, who owns a property in close proximity to the bridge, was paid $425 per acre. Other land owners, whose property is so located as to be altogether free from any future damage or inconvenience resulting from water, owing to the fact that such property is on a level with the canals, have been paid, some $620 per acre, others $425 and $300. Let us take the case of two other lands similarly situated. Thauvette owns a land estimated at $3,500, three arpents distant to the west from the bridge, the St. Antoine coast. The arbitrators have awarded him $388 per arpent. Honoré Leroux is the owner of a property three arpents distant from the bridge, estimated at $5,050. The latter was allowed $200 per arpent. Let me mention the case of two other properties in close proximity to the bridge, just to show the House the utter lack of judgment and impartiality of the arbitrators in assessing the damages, or how perfunctorily they have performed the duties of their office. For instance, a land belonging to Mr. Quiqueland de Beaujeu, situated in the parish of St. Ignatius, a locality where land is but little market value, was estimated at $1,000. The arbitrators allowed him $200 per arpent, while they offered the Dumesnil estate but $120 per arpent for property estimated at $5,150, a land, too, far superior in quality. From these few instances the House is enabled to judge of the character of those awards. Now, Mr. Chairman, that you have an insight into the features of the work performed by the arbitrators and of their proceedings, I may also be allowed by the committee to inquire into the cost of such work. By referring to the Auditor General's Report, Section C, page 99, for the year 1891-92, it will be seen that one of the arbitrators, Mr. A. G. Wood, for services, 69 days at $10 a day, was paid $690; living, 73 days, at $3.50, $255.50; transport, $200; a total of $1,145. Now, in this connection, I may be allowed to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to the item of board expenses. For over thirty years past, I have travelled a great deal through the county of Soulanges, and I may state that, from my personal experience, I never paid over twenty-five cents a meal and twenty-five cents for a bed. That is the general rule at the hotels where I have stopped, and I have been unable as yet to find a Windsor Hotel in Soulanges. The Government, I understand, allow the arbitrators $3.50 a day for maintenance. As I am aware that the arbitrators are far from having completed their work, I thought it my duty to call the attention of the Government to those expenditures which otherwise might have passed unnoticed. Mr. F. X. Paradis, another arbitrator, was paid $820 for 82 days of work, at the rate of $10 per diem—a baker's dozen, by the way, or thirteen days in excess of Mr. Wood's bill; living, 80 days at $3.50 per diem, $283.50; transport, $123.50; a total of $1,227. The Auditor General's Report passes over in silence Mr. Lalonde's bill, who ought to have co-operated with the above gentlemen. From the Auditor General's Report for 1892-93, Section C, page 122, I gather the following data: Mr. Wood was paid $690 for 69 days of work at $10 a day; living, $183.70. I notice, by the way, that he has charged the Government this time only $2.70 a day; transport, $154.09; a total of $1,027.79; and a total sum for both years, aggregating $2,173.29. Mr. Paradis, according to the same report, same page as above, same year, was paid $890 for services, 89 days at $10 a day; living, $210; transport, $56; in all, $1,156; or a total of $2,383. Mr. Lalonde was paid $760 for services, 76 days at $10 a day; for living, $145.25, and transport, $110; a total of $1,015.25. If we add up those various amounts we find that the Government have paid the arbitrators $3,850 for services, 385 days; $1,077.95 for maintenance, and $643.59 for transport; a total of $5,571.54; to which, if we add up the sums paid from July 1st, 1893, up to January, 1894, we reach an aggregate sum of $7,116.54 for both years. Judging from the above figures, one would be led to the belief that the work carried on by these gentlemen ought to cover a large tract of territory, while, as a matter of fact, it covers but 13 miles of lands taken. From my own experience of their expropriation proceedings, I may state that they have spent more time travelling on the Queen's road than on the lands taken. They even declined visiting the lands, for the obvious reason, they stated, that the mere inspection of the cadastral plan dispensed them with inspecting the premises. I could even vouch for the fact that they did visit the lands taken only in a small percentage of cases. At Cascades Point, the Government took possession of the lands by their contractors, and the land owners received no notice either from the Government or from the contractors before January last. The lands in question were the property of the Harwood estate. Mr. Wood, one day, sent me word that he wished to confer with the family about these lands. After having opened his paper-case and unrolling his plan, which I knew quite as well as he did, Mr. Wood inquired from me as to the amount of indemnity the family wished to be paid for the land. My reply was to the effect that the family did not wish to part with the property; that, at any rate, if the land were required for the canal, it was for him to make a tender of satisfaction, and that if we were dissatisfied with the award we would take an action before the Exchequer Court to set aside the award. He told me he was in a position to make offers which the Harwood family would certainly accept, although he stated the land was worth very little, and so rocky as to be hardly fit for cultivation. I told him he was quite mistaken as to the value of the land, that it was this very circumstance which enhanced the market value of the property, as it was a Potsdam sandstone quarry. On hearing this bit of news, he gave a start, as stung by an adder. I called his attention to the fact that a simple inspection of the pebbles scattered on the ground, if he had visited the premises, would have enabled him to verify the fact, and he put an end to the conversation by telling me that he would first consult a professional man and make a tender later on. I ascertained the fact that he had not visited the premises, despite the fact that the Government had taken possession of the land. I further ascertained that the Government had not laid off the land; that by their contractor for the construction of section 12, they had taken possession of and entered upon the whole property; that they had taken stone wherever they pleased; that they had removed a dam which supplied a water power which had set in motion for a number of years a saw-mill with five saws and a grist mill with five mill-stones. Mr. O'Leary was busy carting stone to complete the macadamized road; and all this went on in the presence of the engineer in charge of the road, Mr. Coutlée. As I happened one day to be on the premises, I asked Mr. Coutlée whether the Government had had their property laid off and surveyed; and he replied to my query that it did not concern them. I called his attention to the fact that they had entered upon a land which the Government had no intention of buying. Meanwhile, the matter having been referred to Inspector Munroe, I noticed, on a subsequent visit, some ten days later, that a line had been drawn; but neither could it escape the notice of any professional man that the line had not been drawn by a surveyor; and when I called his attention to the fact, he told me that it had been drawn by them without any warranty of precise measure, the Government property having not yet been laid off. The engineer would allow the contractor to remove the stone or whatever article he thought fit to remove, as also utterly to ruin the water power just mentioned. All this goes to show that Mr. Wood and the other arbitrators had never been on the premises; and that, while pretending to be well informed enough as to the value of the property to warrant their making a tender to me, they ignored the very existence of a Potsdam sandstone quarry on the property. Now, as stated above, the arbitrators were paid for services, $3,850 for 385 days; $1,077.95 for living, and $643.59 for travelling expenses, or a total of $5,571.54. Although a statement of their expenses from July, 1893, to the end of January, 1894, was not available, I can state positively that the arbitrators have been on the Government service during the whole of the season, last fall, down to the opening of the session of the Ontario Legislature; and had they been paid at the same rate, the expenditure in connection with their arbitration would have reached an aggregate of $7,116.50 down to the month of January last; and while this large expenditure was being incurred the arbitrators did not properly perform their duties, and did not settle all the claims they had to award upon. The data I am about to give has been procured from the only available source, the registry office of deeds for the county of Soulanges. In the parish of St. Ignace, while there were to be found from twenty-seven to twenty-eight claims, the arbitrators have awarded upon eighteen. In the parish of St. Joseph of Soulanges, sixty-seven persons had claims against the Government, and only twenty-two claims have been settled. Thus, out of ninety-two claims, there are still fifty-four unpaid. The arbitrators have thus been paid $7,116.54 for awarding upon forty claims upon the Government for property taken. These expropriation proceedings are open to serious criticism, on a double ground: first, in that it is a source of increased expenditure for the Government, and because, in other cases, it deters people from making their claims before the Exchequer Court. These gentlemen would tell people that their awards were final and conclusive, not appealable, and that those who were dissatisfied with the award, and declined to accept it, would never be paid. They thus succeeded in frightening out of their wits poor people who were coerced into accepting compensations quite inadequate to the losses suffered by them. Further, many proprietors wished to take an action before the Exchequer Court to set aside the award, and obtain an augmentation of their indemnity; but the trouble is now how to find proper evidence either in favour of the Government or in favour of the land-owners, for everybody is aware of the difficulties the Government had to contend with in securing evidence when the Healy case was appealed to the Exchequer Court, witnesses having been secured only on the third appeal. The parties who have not yet been appropriated, and who wish to make their claims before the Exchequer Court, shall need evidence as the boundaries of their lands are now altered beyond recognition. In some cases, the Government has been in possession of lands for over two years; the ground has been ploughed and the canal excavated. In such a case, no evidence could be secured from the immediate neighbours, as they are interested parties; none but strangers could be appealed to. Much trouble would be experienced in securing proper evidence, so as to do right, both to the Government and to the land-owners. I would not have risen in my place to speak on this arbitration question, if my experience in the matter had not warranted me in expressing my opinion. I have been appointed as arbitrator, and made arbitrations and awards in three different instances for railway companies: the Canada Atlantic, the Canadian Pacific and the Montreal and Ottawa. I have also conferred on the matter with experts who had also been called upon to act as arbitrators in expropriation cases, and who were agreed that in no instances had proceedings been adopted like those in the Soulanges Canal case, and the work was proceeded with in the speediest way possible. Probably if the valuers in connection with the Soulanges Canal had been paid a fixed sum for each cadastral number taken, business would have been dispatched more speedily. The fact is that they were paid by the day, and work or no work, they knew that they would be well paid, but for the poor land-owner who is not yet expropriated, it is quite different; the Government may have been in possession of his land for over a year or two, and he may have been under the necessity, when carting his crop, to carve his way through the ploughed field and a crowd of workmen busy with scrapers and ploughs; for such a man delay means serious loss and damage. Further, when the contractor arrived in the month of May last to start the work, he crossed the pasture land, and the proprietor had to quit sowing his grain to put up his fence thrown down by the contractor over a distance of six arpents. For such inconvenience and depreciation of property, he is allowed no indemnity so long as the Government is in possession of the land, and previous to any offer of satisfaction being made, and to the signing of the contract. Had the arbitrators set to their task with a will, within two months, all claims might have been settled. It must be borne in mind that all they had to do was to make an estimation of the damages, to make a tender of satisfaction, and then report their findings to the Government. But to come and make to the land-owner an absurd offer, which he is bound to decline, and then go back to Coteau, after such a day's work, is a pure mockery, and by no means an expeditious way of despatching business. The hon. member for Soulanges (Mr. Bain) can vouch that what I state is a fact. In more than one instance arbitrators have acted in this way. I recollect a case where Mr. Wood wrote in English to a French-Canadian who does not know a single word of English, inviting him to meet him on a certain day; the letter was signed by Paradis and brought to its address by Lalonde; the poor devil had to travel fifteen miles from his home in order to find somebody who could explain to him the contents of the missive, and to learn that he was to meet somebody else at his third neighbour's house on the next day. Such is not the way for arbitrators to proceed. It is not for the party whose land is taken to go and meet the arbitrators: it is the duty of the latter gentlemen to proceed to their valuation on the premises, to make a tender of satisfaction under the statute, and then to report their findings to the Government. But they preferred adopting a different system, as such proceedings might have proved too expeditious. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, to have taken the time of the House, but I trust the information conveyed to the committee may prove useful. I was in hopes that during the present session the hon. member for Soulanges (Mr. Bain), who is much more deeply interested in the question than I am, would have offered some suggestions to the Government in regard to the matter; I was even confident that he might call the attention of the Government to the matter with a view to protecting his electors, for it is within my recollection that, at the election of 1892, that question was his stronghold. He was then of opinion that it was of the utmost importance that the county of Soulanges should return to this House a supporter of the present Government, as the citizens of that county would then secure all their demands and a fair and speedy settlement of all their claims. I have turned over the Debates of 1892 and 1893 without being able to ascertain that in this House, at least, the hon. member for Soulanges had championed the cause of the electors he was bound to protect. I have, therefore, thought it my duty to rise in my place and seize this opportunity of calling the attention of the Government to the matter, in the hope that they would see to it that the arbitrators be forced to bring their work to a speedy termination, and especially that the land owners who have accepted the tenders made by the Government be paid without delay the compensation money they are entitled to.

Mr. BAIN (Soulanges). (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I am quite surprised at hearing the hon. member for Vaudreuil making the charges he has just been uttering against the arbitrators. From what the hon. gentleman stated, one would be led into the belief that the arbitrators had nothing else to do but to go and tell the land owners: "Here, sir, is the tender we make for your land; should you decline to accept it, we shall report to the Government adversely to your claim." Such was not the proper course for the arbitrators to adopt, and, fortunately, they took a more enlightened view of their duties in connection with that question. The whole question is now settled, or on the eve of being amicably settled. The valuers have done their duty. In spite of the difficulties this question was beset with, arising out of the exaggerated claims of certain land owners, I am happy to state to the House that the claims upon the Government for property taken have been amicably settled. The course adopted by the hon. member in censuring the valuers is not one calculated to promote the interests of the land owners, as the fact of claiming a sum in excess of the real value of the property is rather calculated to injure their cause. All the claims up to the present time have been amicably settled, and the interested parties are greatly benefited thereby. The three-fourths of the unsettled claims are likely to be settled privately, a course which will better serve the interests of the Government, seeing that it is preferable to pay somewhat in excess of the real value, rather than to go to law and pay five or six hundred dollars in excess, not to mention the legal costs involved, as the case occurred quite lately. It is preferable for the Government to pay five or six hundred dollars in excess of the real market value of the land, rather than face all the legal costs. The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Harwood) stated that the commissioners had threatened the land owners and told them that unless they accepted the tenders of satisfaction made by them they would not be paid at all. Never did the commissioners utter such threats. Never did they tell the land owners: "Unless you accept what we consider to be a fair and reasonable offer, you shall be forced to go to law to prove the amount of damages sustained by you." The hon. member further stated that it would be quite impossible for the proprietors to adduce proper evidence to ascertain the amount of damages sustained. None less than the land owners are liable to suffer from want of evidence on that score, as everybody is aware that land owners have no trouble in adducing proper evidence in the matter, while the Government have no end of trouble in securing evidence favourable to their cause. Farmers, as a rule, stick together, and the Government alone are liable to suffer from that inconvenience. The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Harwood) also told us that the owners of lands taken over a year ago had not yet been paid the amount of their indemnity. A single case has been adduced, that of Mr. Odillon Lalonde, and that is owing to the fact that there were arrears of seigniorial rents outstanding on these lots. The Government declined to settle those arrears of rents as also the capital of those 'constituts.' After I had shown the hon. Minister of Railways how matters stood, and that it was unfair to oblige the land owners to pay the arrears, the Government agreed to settle the amount involved. Further, I believe the hon. member, as heir to the Harwood estate, will receive his cheque before many days have elapsed.

Mr. HARWOOD. (Translation.) The affair has been dragging on since January last.

Mr. BAIN. (Translation.) The hon. member is surprised at the member for Soulanges not having better promoted the interests of his electors, in connection with this expropriation question of the Soulanges Canal. The hon. member is quite mistaken. Let the hon. member allow me to inform him that, for many months past, I never called less than three or four times a week at the Department of Railways and Canals, in connection with those claims, connected with land damages, fences, etc. To-day everybody is satisfied. Whenever complaints were made against the contractors, I have without delay, seen to it that proper works should be carried out, so as to give land owners all the advantages they were entitled to. I may say, at any rate, that the charges levelled at me this evening by the hon. member are utterly baseless. Now, would the hon. member who has deemed it fit to attack me, answer a single question and tell me how many times he has waited on the Minister to inquire about his own claims and those of his electors as well?

Mr. MONETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I may, perhaps, be allowed to say a word or two in connection with this question,—not that I claim to give the House any additional information on the matter, for I confess my utter ignorance of the subject-matter before the House—but because I happen to be pretty well acquainted with one of the arbitrators appointed by the Government to settle the claims of the land owners. Mr. F. X. Paradis, who has been paid a larger salary than that paid to his colleagues,—no doubt because he has managed to work more steadily and more assiduously than his confrères,—is the gentleman in question. The only plausible reason why he should appear in this arbitration matter, is the fact that he has run in the interests of the Conservative party in former days, in the county of Napierville. I gather from the Auditor General's Report that Mr. Paradis has been paid $1,618.50, while his colleague, Mr. Lalonde, has drawn on the public exchequer but $428.25, and Mr. Wood, $1,386.40. Mr. Paradis was paid at the rate of ten dollars a day and apparently he has been on active service during one hundred and ten days. These gentlemen were employed on the very same errand, having been appointed to estimate the value of the properties taken for canal purposes. They had, therefore, been directed to travel together. How, then, is the fact to be accounted for that this gentleman has charged for 110 days, whereas Mr. Lalonde has claimed payment but for 83 days, and Mr. Lalonde, the third valuator, still less. On examining the item of travelling expenses, a still stranger fact is brought to light. Those three arbitrators, owing to the very character of their duties, were bound to and I presume did travel together. Still, they charge each one two dollars a day for transport. The hon. Minister of Public Works smiles. I quite understand that for a gentleman accustomed to roll in wealth, $2 a day is a paltry allowance. But neither Mr. Paradis nor Mr. Lalonde were used to this high style of living. Six dollars a day is a respectable sum for any man who has to take it out of his own pocket, but one is not so particular when it comes out of the public exchequer. The question is one that deserves serious consideration at the hands of the House: for an allowance of six dollars a day for transport is rather out of proportion to what is generally paid in the country, when the general rate for conveyance is from two dollars to two dollars and a half a day. The same remark applies to the expenses for board. Three dollars and a half a day is a rather high figure to charge for living in the country. As stated by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Harwood), one dollar a day is the rate charged for board at hotels in the county of Vaudreuil.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Well, let us put a dollar and a half a day.

Mr. MONETTE. (Translation.) Let us split the difference, as suggested by my hon. friend the member from Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley). What then did the hon. gentlemen do with the two dollars extra charged to the Government?

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) That's the liquor bill.

Mr. MONETTE. (Translation.) The hon. member says that item stands for liquor; but the Government should not be called upon to foot such bills, when liquor is so expensive. I shall refrain, Mr. Chairman, from making any further remarks, beyond entering my protest against this system, and censuring the Government for its favouritism to old Conservative candidates, who are not otherwise entitled to the favours of the Government.

Mr. HAGGART. In answer to the remarks made by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Harwood), I must say by way of explanation that my statement respecting Mr. Lalonde is correct. The cheque for payment of his claim was issued and was received by the notary. In regard to the expropriation of land, the proceeding is a simple one. The engineer in charge reports to the department that a certain piece of land is required for canal purposes, at the same time stating the probable value. The department immediately sends the Government valuers to the locality for the purpose of valuing the land or making arrangements with the parties who live on it. I venture to say that in nineteen out of twenty parties settled with, the settlement is obtained by mutual arrangement between arbitrators and the parties owning the land. A cheque is sent from the Justice Department so soon as the title is found to be correct, and a proper transfer has been made. As to the mode by which the arbitrators are paid for travelling expenses and allowances, I may say the rate is a fixed one. Each of the arbitrators receives a salary of $1,000 a year, besides which he receives $3.50 per day for travelling expenses. That rate was fixed by Order in Council, and it matters not whether an arbitrator expends 50 cents per day, or $5.00 per day, he is entitled to $3.50 per day. The Order in Council has, however, been changed, and in future an arbitrator will only receive his actual expenses. The parties who conducted the arbitration were Mr. Wood, Mr. Paradis, and Mr. Lalonde. I have heard no complaints. No less than forty properties have been expropriated and nearly $70,000 awarded, and the price has ranged from $135 to $600 per acre. I think the Government are paying a pretty full price for every acre taken for the purpose of the Soulanges Canal.

Mr. HARWOOD. I am sorry to differ with the hon. Minister, but there is a question in regard to which we do not seem to understand each other. I stated that a deed was passed in July, 1893, and the amount awarded has not yet been paid. The answer of the Minister was there was trouble respecting the seigniorial rents.

Mr. OUMET. The title is not clear.

Mr. HARWOOD. The title is perfectly clear. I obtained this statement from the notary himself, Mr. Bastien. As to the question of seigniorial taxes, that was settled in January between the Government and the Seigneur of Vaudreuil. The Government should not be able to retain the money on these grounds, as the question is settled. It was under these circumstances that some of the parties have been deprived of their money. A man named Gamelin was compelled to leave his property on the 19th October, 1892. I happened to be present when the notary came and served the notice on the man's wife, he being captain on a barge on the river. Six days were given him to leave the premises. The woman said that she had no money and that her husband was absent, and that she would have to remove six miles to Cedar Village, in order to obtain lodgings. At all events, the family was obliged to move shortly afterwards. It was not until the 6th March that the valuers and this man came to an understanding and settlement. The deed was passed. The man was promised to be paid within thirty days, the sum being $750. At the end of October, 1893, the man had received $700, and he stated that $50 was yet to come. The deed was passed on the 6th March, 1893, but the man did not receive the $700 until the end of October. These are matters of which I have positive knowledge.

Mr. HAGGART. Was it not in Lalonde's case that the payment of seigniorial fees was in question?

Mr. HARWOOD. No. That matter was settled by the very fact that the Government had undertaken to pay them.

Mr. HAGGART. I am informed that the amount was placed in the hands of the notary, to hand to Mr. Lalonde whenever he performed the conditions of the sale. In regard to the member for Soulanges (Mr. Bain), I desire to say that that member is most anxious and attentive to the interests of his constituents. He has been three or four times every week in my department, in fact, he has hunted me night and day respecting these claims, and no representative could possibly have paid more attention to these matters than the hon. member for Soulanges (Mr. Bain) has done.

Grenville Canal—To pay final estimate to S. Toms for rebuilding wing walls at guard lock... $3,365

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does this close the entire expense on the canal?

Mr. HAGGART. That is the final estimate.

Trent Valley Canal—To pay judgment of Exchequer Court, W. S. Hall vs. Regina $975

Mr. HAGGART. This is to pay the judgment of the Exchequer Court.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is the amount of the claim?

Mr. HAGGART. I have not the particulars at hand.

Mr. McMULLEN. Who received the $300 costs.

Mr. HAGGART. I suppose the solicitors, but I do not remember who they were.

Mr. McMULLEN. Perhaps the Solicitor General could tell us who they were.

Mr. CURRAN. The Solicitor General could not tell. Those cases were instituted before my time.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Could the Solicitor General tell us how many suits he has won?

Mr. CURRAN. I have won a good many for the Government.

To pay balance of final estimate of Beatty & Sons for dredge..... $3,000

Mr. HAGGART. This is a revote. The construction of the dredge of which Messrs. Beatty & Sons were the contractors, was not completed at the close of the year 1892-93, and a portion of the vote lapsed, and it is now asked that it should be revoted.

To pay contribution towards construction of swing bridge at Fenelon Falls—Revote..... $13,000

Mr. McMULLEN. What is supposed to be the cost of this bridge?

Mr. HAGGART. This is our total contribution towards the cost of the bridge. The Grand Trunk Railway Company contribute the rest. The bridge is finished.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is it in the charge of the Grand Trunk ?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes. Owing to our making the stream navigable, the Grand Trunk were obliged to alter the location of the bridge and to put a swing on it.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Grand Trunk attend to the swinging of it, and the Government have nothing to do with it ?

Mr. HAGGART. We have nothing to do with the swinging or anything else. This is a final payment.

Lachine Canal—to pay salaries and expenses in connection with commission of inquiry... $10,000

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Has there been a report of that commission ?

Mr. HAGGART. The report of the commission and all the papers are before the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. BRODEUR. Could the Minister tell us to whom that money was paid ?

Mr. HAGGART. It is not paid yet. Mr. H. A. McLeod, Mr. Vanier, and Mr. R. C. Douglas were appointed a commission to investigate the expenditure on the Lachine Canal. It was found that there were great irregularities in this expenditure. The total cost of the inquiry will be $11,300. There was paid in 1892-93 $648, and there was paid by Governor General's warrant in 1893-94 $1,348, leaving a balance of $9,303.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What was the loss to the country through these irregularities ?

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know. On my main estimates I gave the full amount that was paid. There are a couple of amounts in dispute. There was suit instituted against the Government in the Exchequer Court, and there are several other claims which the Government refuse to pay.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But in addition to the claims which the Government refuse to pay, I think this is a proper opportunity for the Minister to give us some statement as to the intentions of himself and his colleagues with regard to the outrageous frauds which, even on the fact of this commission, appear to have been committed on the people of this country. Judging from the partial report which has been published and placed in the hands of the House, there does not appear to be any room for doubt that, over and above the grossest extravagance, there was gross and deliberate fraud, and fraud of a character which requires criminal proceedings on the part of the Government; and I desire to know now, before we pass this vote, what the intentions of the Government are with respect to the very outrageous delinquencies which appear to have been practised, and to have resulted in huge loss to the people of this country in connection with that same Curran Bridge.

Mr. HAGGART. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will wait until the Public Accounts Committee have finished; there will afterwards be an item in the Estimates. But I can state for my department that where there has been a fraud committed on the Government in any way, by parties taking any sums of money, by fraud or otherwise, to which they were not entitled, I shall recommend to the Department of Justice their prosecution.

Mr. LAURIER. What has become of the officers who were proved to have been implicated ?

Mr. HAGGART. They have been suspended.

Mr. LAURIER. They have been suspended for a year, and the department has not come to a conclusion whether they are to be dismissed or reinstated.

Mr. HAGGART. The department has come to a conclusion.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does the Minister believe that there will be a conclusion of this inquiry and a report before the House rises this session ?

Mr. HAGGART. I think so. The length of the inquiry depends a good deal upon the Opposition; but I think that three days more will finish it. I think that all the evidence will be in to-morrow, and the committee should be able to finish after sitting on Tuesday and Friday of next week.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At what date was the report to which I have alluded placed in the hands of the Minister? If I remember rightly, that commission concluded its sittings seven or eight months ago.

Mr. HAGGART. I think it was about the beginning of March or the latter end of February that the report was handed in to the department.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). With reference to the Minister's remark about Friday of next week, it has been stated in the press, and I think the idea has been gained from the Treasury benches in some way, that prorogation would take place next week. It is about time that it should. I think I never saw the Government so unready for business as they have been this session; but at the same time we have duties to perform. I think the House would not be satisfied to prorogue without a result of the work of that committee. If the Minister puts the meeting of the committee so far back as Friday of next week, that means there will be no prorogation next week. Now, I think if there are only three sittings required, the Minister ought to arrange so that these sittings may take place even through a sub-committee while the House is sitting, so that we may not be compelled to remain here in order to close this matter up.

Mr. HAGGART. If it is agreeable to the committee, we will say, to-morrow, and we can sit on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister said that several of those employees had been suspended. Were their salaries stopped at the same time?

Mr. HAGGART. Certainly. Under a by-law, whenever any person is suspended, his salary ceases from the date of suspension.

Mr. LAURIER. I asked the hon. gentleman the conclusion the department has come to with regard to the suspended officers. I did not understand the hon. gentleman's answer.

Mr. HAGGART. All I can say is that the department made a recommendation to Council which has not yet been acted upon. Perhaps I should not say what it was, but the departmental action would be to dismiss them.

Mr. BRODEUR. By whom was the Government represented before the commission?

Mr. HAGGART. The Minister of Justice furnished the counsel for the commission. I believe his name is Mr. Atwater.

Mr. BRODEUR. I understand the Minister to say that he would prosecute every man who had been guilty of fraud. I am told that the department has been informed that some frauds had been committed. Were any actions taken against those who have committed the frauds?

Mr. HAGGART. The only evidence that has come to the department of actual fraud, is the evidence of the time-keeper, Mr. Doheny, that was given before the Exchequer Court yesterday.

Mr. LAURIER. Was he not examined before the commission?

Mr. HAGGART. He was examined before the commission, but his evidence was not as complete as that which he gave before the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. LAURIER. Was not a man examined before the commission who swore to fraud in the pay-lists?

Mr. HAGGART. There was no evidence upon which an action could be based, so I was informed.

Mr. BRODEUR. Was it not reported to the Government that some of the pay-lists had been increased, that the number of men on the pay-lists was much larger than the number employed?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government was not informed of that. The Government have taken every possible means to get at the bottom of that affair. I employed detectives for the purpose of finding out everything, and I was enabled to furnish such evidence to the Exchequer Court as I think will convince that court that Mr. St. Louis had no claim for damages.

Rideau Canal—The sheet piling of deep cut, Ottawa; Governor General's warrant $10,000

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What will be the total cost of that?

Mr. HAGGART. This is a work which you can see from the bridge. The banks had fallen in and nearly closed up navigation. I think the total cost is about $20,000. Half of the work was done last winter and the other half is to be done next winter.

To pay balance of Hog's Back bulk head contract $1,431

Mr. McMULLEN. Was that work done by tender?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Welland Canal—To repair about 500 feet of canal bank which slid in on 24th August, 1891. . . . $4,000

Mr. McMULLEN. How is it that this payment has been delayed so long?

Mr. HAGGART. This is a revote. The contractor for the removal of the slide did not complete the work at the close of the fiscal year on 30th June, 1893. Even yet the work is not quite finished, there will probably be a few more days' work to be done.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Has he received any of the money?

Mr. HAGGART. I think so. It will be paid on progress estimates.

To pay award of official valuator on claim of John Carlston. $200

Mr. BRYSON. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to the fact that a large number of claims in the county of Pontiac have remained unpaid to the present time, and I would urge upon him the necessity of sending an arbitrator to make an examination and report as soon as possible. Many of the claims have been settled, but a few remain unsettled, and the parties are continually pressing upon the Government to have a settlement effected. Last year I understood the Minister of Railways had a survey made of the entire section of the country from where the dams are built at Calumet Falls up as far as the Culbute Locks. That report is completed now, I presume, and I think it is desirable in the public interest that, at the earliest possible moment a valuator should visit the locality and proceed to complete the settlement of these claims. These dams were constructed about the year 1882, and those people who have been paid seen to be in very much better position than those who have not been paid, and I think it is only right that every possible diligence should be used to settle these legitimate claims without delay. In the discussion on the 12th of the present month, if I am allowed to refer to it, the Minister of Railways said, in reply to the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) that a valuator by the name of Mr. Wood would be sent up. I hope that this valuator, Mr. Wood, will have power from the Department of Railways to effect a final settlement of legitimate claims. I understand that it is the intention of the Government to remove the dam, which has caused portions of farms to be submerged. I can only say that if that is done it will be a great misfortune to those who are now navigating that portion of the Ottawa River, because the immense volume of logs which have floated down there in the last ten years have so worn away the banks that there is a deposit of sand in the channel from Bryson to Chapeau, and the channel will be found in many parts impossible of navigation from August until the autumn. I hope the Government will take the matter into their consideration, and make a full investigation before they remove the dam.

Mr. HAGGART. I am sending the valuator as soon as possible for the purpose of having a final settlement of these claims. The reason the claims were not settled before was, as the hon. gentleman is aware, that the farmers were sending in to the department some claims which were, perhaps, not correct, and I ordered a survey, a full and accurate survey, so as to find out whether the level of the water was such that the water could possibly have caused these damages. I have prepared a list of the properties that could be affected by the rising of the water for the valuator, so that he may settle. In reference to the Culbute dam we find that it is of no further use for navigation purposes. It may be of advantage to those who are passing logs down the river, but it is a large expense to keep it up, and last year I made a promise that it should be removed. I discharged the lockmaster and took the tender off the bridge. I am giving instructions that the dam shall be removed as soon as the state of the water will allow the workmen to go on.

Lachine Canal—Staff..... $7,600

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How comes it you require so considerable an amount of this additional for the staff?

Mr. HAGGART. They were paid from other sources before. This is to pay one paymaster, previously paid from other sources, $1,200—

Mr. McMULLEN. Who is he?

Mr. HAGGART. Hugh McMillan. This includes also the salary of a draughtsman, two constables, an additional amount for Wellington-street bridge, expenses of the superintending engineer, paymaster's expenses and various accounts for supplies.

Mr. BRYSON.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What sources were these payments made from before?

Mr. HAGGART. Paid from special votes for works.

Mr. LAURIER. Who was the paymaster before Hugh McMillan?

Mr. HAGGART. Dowker.

Mr. LAURIER. What became of Dowker?

Mr. HAGGART. He died.

Welland Canal—To provide refund of half toll paid by Capt. B. Manson on 7,536 tons of coal, being at the rate of ten cents per ton..... $753.60

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are the circumstances under which this toll was collected?

Mr. HAGGART. It was collected on 7,536 tons of coal, at 20 cents per ton.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When?

Mr. HAGGART. Last May.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How does Captain Manson become entitled to the refund of half?

Mr. HAGGART. He has been in the habit of passing through the canal at 10 cents a ton for his coal. He wrote down to the department and asked what was to be the rate for the succeeding season, and he received his answer: 10 cents per ton, on coal going through. He entered into contracts for the delivery of coal on that understanding with the department. When he came to pass his coal through he was charged 20 cents per ton. This is to refund him.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But how did he come to be charged 20 cents per ton?

Mr. HAGGART. Instruction was afterwards given to the officer in charge of the canal that the tolls were to be 20 cents per ton.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And the rate for Captain Manson is lowered to 10 cents per ton. Am I to understand that that is the case?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It appears to me a rather dubious policy that one man should be allowed to take coal through at 10 cents while others have to pay 20 cents. The department may have been in error, they may have misled this man; but the result is practically that all the rest of the people who carry coal pay twice the tolls that Captain Manson pays.

It seems a very extraordinary thing that a special rate should have been fixed to him when the policy of the department was to charge 20 cents.

Mr HAGGART. That is all he paid the year before, and prior to entering into these contracts he wrote down to the department and asked the rates on coal for the ensuing year, and he got as an answer 10 cents a ton.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did everybody else last year pay 10 cents ?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, the rate was common at 10 cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How did it come that the department could have written to this gentleman that the rate was only 10 cents, if they had made up their minds to charge 20 ?

Mr. HAGGART. The rate was fixed afterwards ; it was a mistake by the department. The department had no right to inform him that the rate would be only 10 cents per ton. He furnished information to the department, with an affidavit and the official letter, showing that on the faith of them he entered into a contract for the delivery and payment of this coal, and the department thought that as it was their error, it was their duty to return him the 10 cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where was this coal coming from ?

Mr. HAGGART. From Cleveland to Cobourg and Port Hope.

Williamsburgh Canal—Staff.... $1,500

Mr. McMULLEN. When paymasters are appointed for these canals, is security taken from them ?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, they have to give security.

St. Peters Canal—To pay Dan.
Fugère for time laid up from injury..... $26 07

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I do not object to this item, but as the Government are paying damages to this man Fugère, I would like to know if they are going to give something to the relatives of those who were killed some years ago on the St. Charles Branch of the Intercolonial Railway ?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government are considering the subject.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. This case has been four years before the Government. I was counsel in the case, and know all the circumstances. The families are poor, and it is time that the Government should come to some decision about it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Time has been consumed by litigation up to last session.

But the hon. gentleman will get an answer next week.

Three lines of steamers to run between St. John and Halifax, or either, and the West Indies and South America... $103,000

Mr. KAULBACH. I must acknowledge that I am not in accord with the Government in the granting of a subsidy to a line of steamers to the West Indies, but, on the contrary, strongly opposed to it, on the grounds that it greatly interferes with, and is destructive to the legitimate carrying trade by sailing vessels, particularly that class built expressly for the purpose. The county I have the honour to represent, is renowned for its fine class of sailing vessels, which for numbers, speed and adaptability cannot be excelled on the continent of America, a class that has been engaged in that trade very successfully for years—save late years, when barred by the subsidy to steamboats. I am as anxious as any one to facilitate and encourage the trade of Canada, more particularly to any port of the British Empire, and it is very gratifying to find by our late trade report that five-eighths of Canada's exports is with countries under the British flag. The United Kingdom buying in values about twelve times as many goods from us as all the rest of the Empire put together. Newfoundland comes next, and the British West Indies third. As far as the British West India trade is concerned, it could have been even greater, and well maintained, but for the Government's subsidized steamers. The merchants of Halifax do not want subsidized steamboats, and have expressed themselves in and out of this House in that direction in no uncertain sound time and again. Take the merchants of Halifax engaged in the West India trade from the south to the north end of the city, as far as the dock yards on Water Street, and you will find, I believe, without an exception, all are denouncing these subsidized boats. Is it for the sake of a few in Halifax that all the rest engaged in the West India trade should suffer, and the trade they had built up and legitimately been carrying on destroyed ? Certainly that should not be permitted for one moment. There certainly is no reason whatever for subsidizing steamers when other steamers without subsidies in the West India trade are able to compete, and at a profit. We are told the days of sailing vessels are passed, which I contend is not the case so far as the West India trade is concerned, inasmuch as they are able to compete with steamers on account of their excellent sailing qualities, and in the carriage of fish and farm products excel, providing steamers are not bounty fed or subsidized in the shape of Government grants. If it were correct that sailing vessels cannot compete with steamers in the West India trade, which I deny, then the greater reason for the Government to grant aid to the sailing vessels instead of to steamers, to encourage the Canadian industry of ship-building, and utilize our timbers. I seriously make the request that no subsidy be given to steamers engaged in the trade between any of the maritime ports of Canada and the West Indies. This I am prompted to ask for in all fairness to the merchants of my port and others outside of Halifax in the Maritime Provinces engaged in the West India trade, as well as on behalf of the fishermen, and vessel owners, on the grounds that the large steamer cargoes glut the markets of these islands and so demoralize trade by the immense quantities thrust on the market at one time, that frequently fish have to be sold at ruinous rates, as they cannot be held over, or stored owing to the heated climate. It has further been the experience of shippers that when sailing vessels with small cargoes of fish arrive at the islands frequented by these steamers, on an empty market, they are unable to sell at once till after the arrival of these boats with an over-supply, which they (the buyers) are looking forward for, when shippers have to take at a sacrifice just what buyers please to offer. You will observe, Mr. Chairman, that subsidized boats are under a certain contract to perform certain trips, and are bound to sail on time, as advertised, weather permitting, and they often thrust fish on the market when it is already well supplied, whereas the small sailing-vessel cargoes are only dispatched to such islands where the supply is not greater than the demand and where prices warrant a fair return. In this way shippers watching the markets are informed by wire, when fair prices are offered, and business is transacted in this way on a legitimate and fair basis. As I do not wish to detain the House I would here state that if the Government is committed for the time being to continue the subsidy under certain contracts to steamers to the West Indies, I can expect nothing more than that the engagement should be carried out, but this I do ask, and emphasize it, that as quickly as the contract referred to expires, which I understand is shortly, it will for all time cease, or, in other words, that no other subsidies be given for that trade.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When will this contract expire?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON: The contract will expire at the end of December next.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are the Government prepared to state their policy?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We propose to readjust the subsidy on the Cuban Line, as it is not a very desirable one to maintain during the present state of the tariffs; but we think the other line is a very useful one, notwithstanding what my hon. friend has said, and it affords facilities for export, which could not be furnished by the schooners, admirable as they are, in my hon. friend's county.

Mr. KAULBACH.

Mr. FLINT. What assistance, if any, does this line obtain from any of the Governments of the West India Islands?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. None.

Mr. FLINT. It seems to me the Government should at least insist that the Government of the West India Islands relieve us of some of the burden of this subsidy, if this Dominion Government consider it absolutely necessary that this subsidy should be paid in order to keep the line afloat. I am not aware as to what negotiations or correspondence have been entered into or passed on the subject, but I think it has been discussed in the House to some extent, and I was under the impression that the line had been aided at one time by some other Governments. This matter was discussed very thoroughly when the Government originally proposed to grant this subsidy, and at that time the hon. member representing Halifax, Mr. Jones, on several occasions propounded the view taken by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach), with much energy and ability. We all know with what opprobrium his position was treated by some of the hon. gentlemen supporting the Government at that time, and particularly by the Government press of the Maritime Provinces. Of course he was accused of being a reactionary politician, one who was not up to the grandeur of the times, one who was likely to look at such matters with a very small magnifying glass, and the epithet "the schooner statesman" was applied to him. But notwithstanding that incident, a large portion of the public of the Maritime Provinces felt it was not right, that the Government were placing a subsidy at the disposal of those who were competing with private individuals and corporations already engaged in the West India trade. I think the view taken on this side of the House was that it was an unsound departure commercially, and one which should not be encouraged; but notwithstanding that, the cry of development and the necessity of assisting certain branches of trade to extend to the West India Islands prevailed. To what extent that subsidy has succeeded in increasing the facilities for trade, I am not prepared to say, but I think there is a great deal still to be urged on behalf of the view taken by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) that the Government is going out of its way to add to the competition which owners of sailing vessels and schooners have to contend with in carrying on that trade. As has been explained by the hon. gentleman, and as was fully explained by Mr. Jones when the subject was discussed, it is plain that it is absolutely necessary to the prosperity of a large class of fishing vessels, and to people engaged in our fishing industry, that they should ship large quantities of lumber, shooks and articles of that kind to the West Indies, and the competition introduced by the subsidizing of steamboats by the Government has had a most demoralizing effect on that trade and industry. No one would complain if the subsidy were granted in the direction of increased mail accommodation carried out by the Government, because that has always been shown to operate successfully, aside entirely from a commercial undertaking, and those subsidies should be generous in order that mail facilities might be as rapidly as time would permit. But when it comes to interference with trade, they have very reasonable ground for complaint. Probably this is not an appropriate time at which to raise the question, but the Government will take notice that at the proper time, namely: when the contract has expired, the whole question will be discussed by the House with a view to arriving at a conclusion as to whether some other means might not be adopted in accordance with fair-play and with sound principles of political economy. Contracts have been entered into and steamboat companies are carrying them out. But I trust our Government will see its way clear to look into the position of those whose trade is so largely interfered with by subsidized steamers. At another session probably those who object may have a more full statement to present to show to what extent the trade is injured and their property imperilled. I join heartily with the view expressed by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach), and I think when the matter comes up at another session it will be more fully discussed than it is proper to discuss it at this late stage of the session.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish to inquire whether, as the hon. gentleman has stated that the contracts will expire in December next, they will be renewed without being submitted to Parliament, or whether Parliament will have an opportunity to pronounce on them before renewing them for a term of years?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They will only be renewed subject to the approval of Parliament. As regards the Cuban subsidy, it is proposed to adjust that so as to give communication with some of the other West Indian islands, but not with Cuba in the present state of affairs.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Are we under contract for all these items?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As we are on this subject of mail subsidies, it would be convenient for the Government to inform us whether they propose to proceed with their resolution in reference to the fast Atlantic service, and if so, when?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. On Monday or Tuesday of next week. It has been deferred on account of the absence of the Finance Minister.

Port Maitland, N.S.—Repairs to breakwater $273 75

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the explanation of that?

Mr. OUMET. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) objected to this the other night, and I promised to send him the report. I sent it to him, and he has returned it to me, apparently satisfied that it was correct.

Mr. FLINT. I may say that I have a communication from residents of this locality, which I have communicated to the Department of Public Works, intimating that possibly this very season the expenditure of a very moderate sum would be required at that breakwater to save the Government considerable expense later. I trust the Minister will take that into careful consideration, and if possible make a small appropriation out of the money provided in order to have it attended to.

Mr. OUMET. I shall be obliged to the hon. gentleman for any information he is kind enough to send me.

Harbours and Rivers, British Columbia, Williams Head
Quarantine station wharf—
Revote of lapsed balance... $10,394.29

Mr. OUMET. This is balance of the vote given in the Supplementary Estimates of 1892-93, for the building of a wharf at William's Head, as part of the equipment of the quarantine station there. The works had not been done on the 1st of July, and the amount lapsed, and the work had to be prosecuted. So that we were obliged to have recourse to a Governor General's warrant, and this is to make it good.

Ottawa City, bridges over the River Ottawa, the slides, the Rideau Canal and approaches thereto—Amount of Canadian Granite Company's account for pavement..... $3,127

Mr. OUMET. That was the amount of the contract, and the department thought we could take it out of the general vote for roads and bridges in the Dominion generally, but the Auditor General would not allow that, and so we have to get it voted. Really, it is nothing more than what was included in the amount voted last year.

Surveys and inspections and temporary clerical assistance, also, National Art Gallery, revote of lapsed amount... $4,469

Mr. OUMET. This is nothing in excess of what was voted for the department. An amount was voted, I think some $49,000, for the permanent staff, and another amount of $30,000 for the temporary staff. I expected that during the year I could fill the positions vacant on the permanent staff, but I have not been able to do it, and this amount is only taken from the one vote to the other, but the total amount for the staff of the department is not exceeded. It is only a transposition of the amount.

Amount required to pay the Allan Steamship Company for ocean mail service between Great Britain and Canada $126,533.33

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is for the service of the year past, I see. Is nothing paid to any other steamship companies?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The arrangement was made with the Allan line, but in that arrangement they agreed to take so many of the Dominion line.

To pay for steam service between St. John, N.B., Digby and Annapolis, N.S., for the months of January and February, 1893. $1,916 67

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How does it come in this shape? These services were discharged nearly eighteen months ago. If that sum is due, it ought to have appeared in the Supplementary Estimates of the preceding year.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It did not appear. As was the case with the first item, this amount was omitted.

To pay for steam service between Baddeck and Grand Narrows, N.S., 19th February to 6th April, 1892. $1,410

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is under special circumstances. Every year we take a vote for that service to pay a steamer so much per trip during the whole season of navigation. At the close of the calendar year the lake is usually frozen over, but the end of 1891 and the first few months of 1892 being a most exceptionally mild season the lake was open to navigation practically all the year, this service was continued, with the assent of two or three members of the Government who were consulted, but the vote did not cover the service, and no vote has yet been taken.

To pay $15 each to persons for services in compiling and forwarding daily reports in connection with the Fishery Intelligence Bureau $ 465

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I have been listening to the discussion on this subject, and particularly to the Minister's lucid explanations, but I have never understood how this information, which seems to be considered valuable, is obtained. It would seem to me that if the information is really valuable, $15 is a very small compensation for it. Is the service these people perform the mere sending of a telegram?

Mr. OUIMET.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We have the assistance of various officers along the coast and many of these get $15 in addition to salaries, small salaries, which they receive for other services. They send in telegraphic messages at reduced rates—due to the generosity of the telegraph companies in large measure—and these telegrams are all tabulated at the head offices and then sent out in the shape of bulletins. The press publish them gratuitously, and the central office answers all prepaid telegrams on the "collect" basis, and merchants and fishermen avail themselves of this opportunity to gain information. It is no great trouble to people along the coast to tell how the fish are running, notably the mackerel. They wire to the central office that the mackerel have "set in," as they call it, at a certain point. The information is given to the fishermen through the bureau, and they arrange their trips accordingly.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). How soon does this information reach them?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. About twenty-four hours afterwards. The bulletin is published every twenty-four hours.

Dominion Government share of the expense of re-survey of the south coast of Anticosti Island. $10,031 41

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who is paying the balance?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The British Government is bearing half the expense and doing all the work. This amount is our half.

Indians--Nova Scotia--To provide an additional amount for medical attendance $1,000

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Has there been a great deal of extra sickness?

Mr. DALY. It appears that the Indians of Nova Scotia are poor, and they are, from congenital causes, subject to lung disease, and la grippe has caused a great deal of trouble amongst them. The amount formerly voted was not sufficient by the amount called for here.

New Brunswick--To enable the department to purchase a reserve for the Indians of Oromocto, and to remove the Indians of Kingsclear and St. Mary's to Oromocto. $600

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). How many Indians are there in King's Clear and St. Mary's?

Mr. DALY. Sixty.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You are getting a cheap reserve. Does this represent the total cost?

Mr. DALY. Yes. The reserve contains one hundred acres, thirty acres cleared land and seventy acres bush, with a barn thirty by forty feet. We are getting a pretty cheap property.

British Columbia—To provide for medical attendance..... $8,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This requires some explanation.

Mr. DALY. A large expenditure was occasioned on account of the small-pox near Victoria and in the Fraser River Agency near the coast. The Indians are too poor to pay for medical attendance, even at rates of fees for the physicians so low that the physicians complain. The heavy expenses of quarantine after the small-pox increased the expenditure.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What use do you intend to make of the water right, flume and ditch of the Chinese Mining Company?

Mr. DALY. The reserve of the Fountain band, which comprises 338 acres, is now without water for irrigation purposes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Have they no trust fund?

Mr. DALY. They have no funds at all.

Further amount required to meet expenses connected with Lieutenant Governor's office in North-west Territories..... $1,950

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are these amounts?

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman will recollect the discussion on the main Estimates in reference to the expenses of the office of the Lieutenant-Governor, and I then told him that in addition to the amount that was asked for he would find in the Supplementary Estimates an item for $1,950. This item is required to make up the actual money expended. The amount granted in the fiscal year 1892-93 was less than had been previously granted, by $1,000 or $1,500. The present Lieutenant-Governor found, as I stated on the former occasion, that the funds were not sufficient to meet the requirements of his office, including travelling expenses and other items.

Patent Record—additional amount required to pay Queen's Printer for printing and engraving..... $2,800

Mr. CASEY. What is that?

Mr. DALY. The explanation of that is as follows: we owe the Queen's Printer $1,058.80, and carried forward from the previous a deficit balance of about $1,800. The cost of the Record for the next three months, at the present rate, will be about $600 per month, and an additional amount of $2,800 will therefore be required to pay for the service of the year and redress the adverse balance brought forward from the last fiscal year. Apart from the question of arrears, the printing of the 'Patent Record' at the present number of patents issued, is about $8,000.

Mr. CASEY. Does not this 'Record' pay for itself?

Mr. DALY. Yes, we get the money back.

Statistics—to pay balance due Queen's Printer for "Year-book and Statistical Abstract." $2,300

Mr. CASEY. Who prepared that Year-book this year?

Mr. DALY. Mr. Johnson, the statistician.

Mr. CASEY. Did he do the actual work of compiling?

Mr. DALY. Of course, he is assisted by his staff.

Mr. CASEY. The name of Mr. Roper is usually attached to this book as having compiled it. Did he not do it this year?

Mr. DALY. I presume so; but, of course, Mr. Johnson is at the head of the branch.

Mr. CASEY. Why was Mr. Roper's name not put to it this year?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He has gone to Trade and Commerce, in connection with statistics there.

Mr. CASEY. If he had done his work before he was transferred, I think he should have the credit of it, as formerly, by having his name put to it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Why has this work been taken out of Mr. Roper's hands and transferred to Mr. Johnson?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Roper has been transferred to Trade and Commerce, because his experience in connection with statistics was particularly useful in connection with the trade statistics of the country. Mr. Johnson has held for some time the office of Dominion Statistician, and it was thought proper that the publication of this book should be in charge of the statistician himself. It was so, to a great extent, before, although Mr. Roper did the principal part of the work.

Mr. CASEY. The book used to bear the name of Mr. Roper as being prepared by him, and I understand it was prepared by him this year. What increase of salary has Mr. Roper received since the change?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He has the same salary.

Experimental Farms—additional amount required for maintenance, arising from adverse balances, $3,000 in 1890-91, $1,580 in 1891-92, and $2,200 in 1892-93..... $6,800

Mr. McMILLAN. What has that been spent for?

Mr. DALY. It appears there were deficits in the farm vote for several years past. The whole of the above balances were carried forward and paid from votes of following years.' The last item is the aggregate of the three years, and is desired to be voted to redress the balance of the present year. Mr. Saunders' written explanations are given in voluminous details. Their meaning is that while the vote is simply for maintenance, he has paid under ministerial sanction and direction, for many things which are not maintenance, such as services for exhibitions, stock, printing and distributing reports and bulletins, obtaining, packing and distributing reports and bulletins, obtaining, packing and distributing seeds, plants, trees, &c. But as against these deficits, the farms have given the following items to the credit of casual revenue, which have been detailed in the Auditor's Reports, in the corresponding years:—

1890-91	$4,985 08
1891-92	5,711 73
1892-93	3,981 41
	$14,678 22

There is, therefore, a balance of $7,878.22 of revenue over the $6,800 item of aggregate deficits, which may be considered as an argument if it cannot be set against the account. The figures of expenditure of the three years show that the items for maintenance proper are well within the Estimates, and it is plain from an examination of the items there has been good economy in the management.

Mr. McMILLAN. This shows the necessity of taking a separate vote for each farm and keeping the accounts separate. The item, instead of $75,000 should be $90,000 for the farm.

Mr. MCGREGOR. In travelling through the country, we find that mention is made of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture is not a member of this House. We trust this will be rectified.

Mr. DALY. The deficit has arisen owing to expenses at headquarters. When the member for West Huron (Mr. McMillan) brought up the matter of the accounts of each farm being kept and published separately on a former occasion, I took a note of it and mentioned it to the Minister of Agriculture, and he has promised to meet the hon. gentleman's views next year.

Mr. McMILLAN. At the Ontario farm, there is a regular account for each animal.

Mr. DALY. That information is given in connection with the Brandon and Indian Head farms. I have called the attention of the Minister to it, and it will be remedied.

Mr. CASEY. At the Guelph farm, maintenance of buildings, fuel, and other charges are entered against the farms. This does not seem to be the practice here.

Mr. DALY.

Immigration—To pay Henry Merrick and Thomas Connolly, late immigration agents, a retiring allowance of $1,200 each. $2,400

Mr. FLINT. Are these final allowances?

Mr. DALY. Yes. They each received a salary equal to $2,460; one has been in the employ of the Government eighteen years, and the other thirteen years.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Have they been replaced by any other officers?

Mr. DALY. No.

Cattle Quarantine. $11,468

Mr. CASEY. What services have the North-west Mounted Police performed in connection with this service?

Mr. DALY. The work was done by the Mounted Police, and the expenditure was made out of their own funds, and is to be recouped, and the only way that can be done is by vote of Parliament. They carried out the quaranting of cattle from Greta to the Rocky Mountains. They took charge of the cattle on their arrival, fed and cared for them, and in many cases drove them across the country. The veterinary inspection was either conducted by their own veterinary or by some other veterinary who was employed.

To pay Miles Cowan, in addition to his salary as a clerk in Her Majesty's service, for services as acting collector at Windsor, Ont., from December, 1889, to December, 1892. $600

Mr. MCGREGOR. Mr. Cowan served in the place of the collector for three or four years. He got, I think, $1,200 a year, while the collector got something like $1,700 or $1,800. He is a most estimable young man, and should have got the position of collector. As he did not get it, I think he ought to have got the difference between the pay he was getting and the pay the collector got. He went to considerable expense, expecting that he would get that amount, and I understood that it was the practice of the Government to pay the acting collector the same as the collector. Under these circumstances, I think Mr. Cowan should get something in the neighbourhood of $1,200. He is a first-class collector, and, having gone back to his old position, he is a first-class accountant and a man of fine character.

Mr. WALLACE. The practice to which the hon. gentleman refers has been largely abandoned, and it is the exception rather than the rule to make such votes as this. Mr. Cowan is an exceedingly good officer. He performed the duties of collector for several years, and the Government have recommended to Parliament that he should be paid $600 extra for his services in those years.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 156) respecting houses of refuge for females in Ontario—(from the Senate).—(Sir John Thompson.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 1 a.m. (Friday).

Bill (No. 157) to revive and further amend the Act to incorporate the Brockville and New York Bridge Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

REPORT.

Reports, Returns and Statistics of the Inland Revenues of the Dominion of Canada, for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1893; Part III. Inspection of Weights, Measures and Gas—(Mr. Wood, Brockville.)

DOMINION NOTES.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee, on Monday, to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend the Act respecting Dominion Notes, chapter 31 of the Revised Statutes, by substituting the words "twenty-five" for the word "twenty" in the fourth line of section 3.

Motion agreed to.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. PERRY. I desire to call attention to the fact that some time ago a return was brought down with regard to the removal of the flag station from Mill River to Howland Road. The papers contain a reference to a letter from Hon. George E. Foster. I do not know whether this document is private or not; if so, it should not be referred to in the correspondence. If this letter is mentioned in the return, it should be brought down to the House. Other four or five documents have been also referred to and have not been brought down. If we are only to get part of the documents brought down which have been ordered by the House, it is only humbug; there is no use of passing orders here. I believe Mr. Pottinger was sent down by the Minister to investigate and make a report; he was there, I think, some time in March. The Minister has not brought down that report; and what is the reason? Is there anything disloyal in it? The only information I can get is in the report which has been brought down, and I do not call it a report; I call it a garbled document, which means nothing at all. If the Minister has any more papers to bring down, I want to know it; if not, I will use some other means to get the papers brought down. I want my answer.

Mr. HAGGART. I have answered the hon. gentleman half a dozen times already. There are a couple of private letters which I do not intend to bring down—one from the Rev. Mr. Burke, and one from Mr. Foster inclosing a letter from Lieutenant-Governor Howland to myself.

Mr. PERRY. There are other documents mentioned in the correspondence.

Mr. HAGGART. There are none that I know of except these letters.

Mr. LAURIER. Why can they not be brought down?

Mr. HAGGART. Because they are private letters.

Mr. PERRY. Why mention them in the correspondence if they are private?

Mr. FRASER. I would like to ask when the Government will bring down a return to an order of the House granted six weeks ago in regard to the industries in Guysboro? I would also like very much to have a return to an order which I obtained last year as to the amount of the debt of the Dominion, both as paid and as voted. I would like to get these returns before the end of the session.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The return about the industries, I think, was delayed in consequence of there being no funds out of which the Department of Agriculture could make up returns of that kind. But now that the appropriations are practically passed, I am sure the return will be got on with, so that I may hope to lay it on the Table next week. The other has escaped my recollection altogether, but I will find out about it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I beg to call the attention of the Government to the fact that an order of the House was carried in March, 1893, for a return giving the industrial statistics of the city of London, and up to the present time no return has been made. I met the statistician of the Department of Agriculture, who said that there was no appropriation for the purpose. While that may have been true for some months past, it could not have been the case at the time the order was carried.

Mr. McMULLEN. Has the Minister of Public Works anything to say with regard to a return which I asked for yesterday? He said he would inquire and let me know to-day.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have asked my deputy in regard to the matter. The order of the House is always sent to the Under-Secretary of State, who immediately sends it to the department from which the return is expected. The answer as to why delays have occurred I expect to receive to-day or to-morrow.

THE INTERCOLONIAL CONFERENCE.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, before the Government Orders are called, I would like to ask the right hon. the First Minister a question as to which I had some conversation with him. I wish to ask: Will the Government instruct the Canadian Commissioners to the Colonial Conference to endeavour to secure the co-operation of the Australasian and South African commissioners in furtherance of that policy of preferential trade between the self-governing colonies of the Empire and the mother country which was endorsed by this House in the following resolution:—

If and when the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland admits Canadian products to the markets of the United Kingdom upon more favourable terms than are accorded to the products of foreign countries, the Parliament of Canada will be prepared to accord corresponding advantages by a substantial reduction in the duties imposed upon British manufactured goods.

I may just say that the reason why I wish to ask this question of my right hon. friend is that the great organ of public opinion in England suggested, in an important leading article at that time, that if Australasia and South America joined with Canada in making such a requisition to the mother country, it would be a matter worthy of the serious consideration of the Home Government, and would possibly give rise to a new departure altogether. These are, as nearly as possible, I think, the words that were used by the London 'Times' at that time. We have now with us representatives from Australasia and from South Africa, and I just wish to ask my right hon. friend whether it is not the intention of the Government to endeavour to induce them to carry out the policy which this House at that time endorsed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the House will see that it would be inopportune for me to discuss at the present moment the question of the instructions to the Canadian delegates to the Intercolonial Conference; but the subject which the hon. member has referred to is so immediately connected with the subjects which are generally understood as likely to engage the attention of the conference, that I think he may fairly assume that it is one that will not fail to be considered by the delegates during their deliberations. The delegates, of course, desire to deliberate without public inspection, and, therefore, their debates are not open to the public. That necessarily arises from the fact that they are in confidential communication with their own Governments, and with Her Majesty's Government doubtless, and desire that that communication should not be in any way hampered by the disclosures in detail to the public of anything that takes place. But at the conclusion of the conference, which may be expected, I believe, early next week, the conference will, no doubt, decide to what extent it would be advisable that their conclusions and deliberations should be made public; and after that I shall be in a position to inform the hon. gentleman whether I am at liberty to give a more definite answer to his question than I am this afternoon.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

Resolutions reported from Committee of Supply on 3rd, 4th and 5th July were read the second time and concurred in.

CRIMINAL CODE, 1892.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 126) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.

(In the Committee.)

On section 22,

Mr. MARTIN. That clause provides:

That every peace officer who, on reasonable and probable grounds, believes that an offence for which he offender may be arrested without warrant, has been committed.

Now, a peace officer may arrest any person found committing an offence against the Act without a warrant, but a person other than a peace officer can only arrest without warrant persons found committing those offences mentioned in section 552. But it is not clear whether this section means those persons whom a peace officer may arrest without a warrant or those persons whom any person may arrest without a warrant. I would suggest a slight change which will make that clear. Instead of the words "for which the offender may be arrested without a warrant," substitute the words "against this Act." It will then read :

Every person who, on reasonable and probable grounds, believes that an offence against this Act has been committed.

That probably is the meaning of it now, because the peace officer himself can arrest any one who has committed an offence against the Act.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand the hon. gentleman's view is that we should make it clear that a peace officer may arrest without a warrant any person whom he believes to have committed an offence against the Act. The hon. gentleman will see that the Act provides for a great many minor offences, even trespasses and assaults, and one would suppose that it was better to allow peace officers to arrest such offenders without a warrant.

Mr. MARTIN. It says : "an offence which the offender may be arrested without a warrant." Now, an offender may be arrested without a warrant for any offence under the Act, by a peace officer.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This was intended to provide that a peace officer who had reasonable and probable grounds for believing that an offence had been committed, might arrest without a warrant. If it were such an offence as that, a peace officer could arrest an offender without a warrant.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman will see that by section 552, subsection 3, a peace officer may arrest without a warrant any one whom he finds committing any offence against this Act. That is what I would understand to be the meaning of the section. The hon. gentleman will see that it is not clear what this amendment means.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I move to strike out the words "for which offenders may be arrested without warrant," and insert "against this Act."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN. I observe in one of the sections that no person apprehended shall be detained in custody over the following day without being brought before a justice of the peace. The difficulty that has arisen is this : in Winnipeg the police officers frequently receive telegrams to arrest certain persons. They have no knowledge of the crime committed further than the statement contained in the telegram. They hesitate to lay an information until witnesses come from the east or elsewhere. These people are generally criminal fugitives from the United States, who enter Canada either via Winnipeg or via British Columbia. Two or three days are required to obtain witnesses. In the meantime the supposed criminal cannot very well be kept in custody. I suggest an amendment providing that a justice of the peace may remand a person for a reasonable time, so as to allow an information to be laid. I can understand that objection may be taken to retaining a person in custody without an information having been laid against him, even though he may be retained only three or four days. On the other hand, it is almost impossible to hold an alleged criminal, in regard to whom generally extradition proceedings are necessary. A similar difficulty also occurs in regard to persons reaching Winnipeg from other portions of Canada and attempting to go to the United States ; but the difficulty occurs chiefly in connection with persons who are sought to be extradited.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The subject is a very important one, and requires not only reflection but examination. I should prefer not to adopt the amendment, which might interfere with the liberty of the subject, even though it might be only three or four days. I will consider the point and inquire into it.

Mr. LISTER. A complaint has been made in regard to vagrancy. On the border towns we are troubled with vagrants, and in most of the towns the mayor is the police magistrate and administers criminal justice. Justices of the peace are often difficult to obtain, and the mayor of my own town has asked me to bring this matter before the attention of the Minister of Justice. The Act should be amended so as to give the mayor acting as magistrate, power to deal with vagrants, instead of making it necessary that two justices of the peace, the mayor and another justice should act in order to convict a vagrant or commit them for trial. I call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that many serious offences can be dealt with by the mayor acting as magistrate alone, and I do not see why it is necessary to give this class of offenders additional protection by providing that two magistrates are necessary to deal with this class of offences. It is true that in Windsor they have a police magistrate, but in towns where there are no police magistrates, the mayor does all the criminal work and frequently finds very great difficulty in obtaining the services of another magistrate.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will bring up the matter and prepare some amendment on the third reading ?

Bill reported, and amendment read the first time.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the second reading of the amendments.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think that an amendment such as that just made in committee on the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg, ought to be considered with a little more care before we pass it; therefore, I would ask that the Bill be allowed to stand. It does appear to me to be a serious innovation to provide that a person may be arrested for any offence against the statute, because this statute, as the hon. First Minister remarks, covers every possible offence, small and great, and if a man is to be arrested for an offence for which a magistrate would not issue a warrant, but might issue a summons, it seems to me to be carrying matters rather too far.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I agreed to the amendment on the ground that that appeared to be the intention of the Act.

Mr. MARTIN. While this is before the House, I wish to call attention to section 552, which mentions a lot of offences for which any person may be arrested by any one without warrant; but a great many offences are left out which ought to be there, for instance, robbery from the person. You would think that if there was anything for which one should be arrested by any person, it would be for pocket-picking. There are other offences which ought to be included.

Amendment concurred in.

PETROLEUM INSPECTION.

Bill (No. 122) further to amend the Petroleum Inspection Act, was read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 3,

Mr. BRODEUR. Would it not be advisable that the oil imported in tank cars should be immediately inspected? Those who have in their stores some store tanks are obliged to transfer the oil from the tank cars into barrels, which compels them to have two kinds of vessels. In some cases, however, in Montreal, I am informed that the inspection is made in the tanks.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The idea is to allow the tank in a warehouse to be made a bonded warehouse, and the inspection will be made in the tanks.

Mr. RIDER. It is almost impossible to keep the oil in barrels on account of the loss by leakage, and there is no provision to enable retail dealers to transfer the oil from barrels into tanks and sell from the tanks.

Mr. WALLACE. That is just what it does do.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Subsection 3 says that all petroleum imported in tank cars shall, before being entered for consumption, be put into packages, which means they must be put into barrels. Why is it necessary to transfer from the tank cars to barrels and then from the barrels to a metal tank? Why not inspect directly in the tank cars or metal tank without transferring into barrels?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). We must make some provision for the safety of the public, and we find it still necessary to require that petroleum should be put into barrels from the tank cars.

Mr. RIDER. But owing to the leakage in wood, there is great loss when the oil is kept in barrels, and what retailers require is that they should be allowed to transfer from the barrel to a metal tank and then sell by retail direct from the tank.

Mr. WALLACE. That is exactly what the clause permits. The intention is that the oil may be drawn from the tank and sold. That will be perfectly legal.

Bill reported, and read the third time, and passed.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 158) further to amend the Inland Revenue Act.—(Mr. Wood, Brockville.)

SUPPLY—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. EDGAR. Before that motion is carried, I wish to read a couple of sentences from a speech made by the Postmaster General, on the 3rd July, in which, referring to myself, he said:

I thought he could hardly be the same gentleman who, for so many years had been the manager and the manipulator of the most corrupt election fund that has ever been organized in Canada to debauch the electorate. Sir, those who were in public life for a number of years will remember the Northern Railway, and the scandals which have since attached to the name of the hon. gentleman in connection with it.

Now, I would like to state for the information of the hon. gentleman, as he seems to be under a misapprehension, that neither in connection with the Northern Railway, nor with anything else, was I ever a manager, or a manipulator, or a distributor of any election fund whatever. I can say more than that, that in my electoral contests, which, I am sorry to say, have been rather numerous, I never received one cent from any general fund; possibly some of my contests might have been more successful if I had, but I did not. If political success is to be measured by being able to control and distribute large election funds, my own, in comparison to that of the Postmaster General, is most insignificant, I must admit. However, the Postmaster General referred to the Northern Railway, either in connection with election funds, or something else of a mysterious character, and connected my name with it in an offensive way. Now, I wish it to be understood that I have not been the first to refer to the Northern Railway, the Postmaster General has been the first to refer to it, and as the subject has been introduced, I would like to say a word about it. The Northern Railway is a short line of railway which is now in the hands of the Grand Trunk Railway. Some years ago, when Mr. Mackenzie was in power, the Northern Railway owed the Government of Canada a large sum of money, and as they desired some rearrangement of their public debt, the Government thought it a good opportunity to get from the company payment of some of the indebtedness of that railway to Canada; and, in order to make an inquiry into the position of that company, a Royal Commission was issued, and a report was made as to the dealings of the Northern Railway with the surplus money which apparently belonged to the Government and should have been paid to the Government of Canada. This Royal Commission made a report, and I desire to refer to two or three paragraphs in it. I may say that the president of that railway company at that time was the Hon. John Beverly Robinson, a member of this House and a supporter of the Government, an ex-Minister and a prominent man in the country. The commission reported :

That we find that various sums, amounting together to $5,440.68, were paid out of the railway funds for the election expenses of the Hon. John Beverly Robinson, a candidate for the district of Algoma, the said John Beverly Robinson being at that time president of the Northern Railway, and under Mr. Cumberland's direction the said amount was charged in the books of the company, one-third to contingencies, one-third to parliamentary expenses, and one-third to legal expenses.

Another paragraph of the report states :

We further find that Hon. John Beverly Robinson, while president of the said company, overdrew his account to the extent of $4,500, in addition to the amount of $5,540 above mentioned, and it is with interest still unpaid.

Another paragraph says :

We further find that there was paid out of the funds of the Northern Railway Company $1,000 for stock in the 'Mail' newspaper, which Mr. Cumberland subscribed for, and still holds in his own name, and the amount of the same was by his direction charged in the books of the Northern Railway Company to legal and parliamentary expenses and printing and advertising, but no value in printing and advertising was to be given.

The 'Mail' newspaper was then being published as the new organ of the Conservative party, whatever it is now. Then there is another paragraph in the report which possesses some interest. It is as follows :—

We further find that $2,500 charged in the books of the Northern Railway to Hon. D. L. Macpherson, was not money due or owing by that gentleman or for which the company had received or was to receive value, but was a subscription paid by Mr. Cumberland to Hon. D. L. Macpherson as treasurer of a fund raised as a testimonial to Sir John A. Macdonald, and was so paid out of the funds of the Northern Railway Company, and that sum was made to appear in the books of the company as assets of the company, until the amalgamation of the company with the Northern Extension Railway Company was completed.

At that time Mr. Cumberland, who was the manager of that railway, and a leading and prominent Conservative, and for some time in the Provincial Legislature and this House, was a personal friend of mine, and I suppose it was suggested by some one that very likely he desired to keep his company in favour with both sides, and contribute something to the Liberal side in politics as well, and the probability was, from a personal view, that he would have contributed to my election expenses. Although I have never allowed politics to interfere with private friendship, I should never expect an opponent, however great a friend he might be, to contribute to my election expenses.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. You never take anything ?

Mr. EDGAR. Well, I never ask an opponent to contribute to my election expenses, and I never had any contribution to my election expenses outside of my own riding. If the people want me to carry the county they can assist me. But I have never sought contributions outside of my riding. This suggestion as to the probability of my having received direct contributions was also inquired into by that commission, and they reported on that subject in the following language :—

In consequence of the report that other parties interested received sums of money for improper purposes out of the funds of the Northern Railway, and that Mr. J. D. Edgar had been the recipient of sums of money for his election expenses, it was considered proper to have Mr. Cumberland and Mr. Edgar examined in relation thereto, and this having been done, we find that there is no ground for such rumour, and whatever money Mr. Edgar received from the Northern Railway Company was so received in his professional capacity for legal and parliamentary services performed for the company, in 1874-5, when he had no seat in Parliament, and the amount paid for his services had the sanction of the board of directors for the time being.

If the hon. gentleman would like any further information on the subject of my relations with the Northern Railway Company, I should be very glad to refer him to his colleague, Sir Francis Smith, who was the last president of the railway, who was president for a great many years, and was very prominently connected with the company during any professional or other connection I had with it. I ask the hon. gentleman to make such statement as he may think proper after what I have said.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman has gone into a long history of a very important epoch in the political history of his party, and the hon. gentleman has suggested that I could secure more information from my colleague, Sir Francis Smith. I will certainly follow the hon. gentleman's advice, and I will take the earliest possible opportunity of consulting Sir Francis Smith, and endeavouring to obtain all the information, which I am perfectly certain he will give me, in connection with the Northern Railway.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In other words, the hon. gentleman knows nothing about the Northern Railway, good, bad or indifferent, and the hon. gentleman has forgotten the findings of the commission, which were that the railway fund had been used as a secret service fund for many years for the benefit of the Conservative party.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It will not do to take for granted that my hon. friend has forgotten as much as the hon. gentleman hopes he has.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then I will recommend the Prime Minister to read the report, and his innocence will be enlightened.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have done so. It will, however, take a good deal to add to the enlightenment of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright).

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Excise—To pay British American Bank Note Company award of Exchequer Court for stamps on hand when change in system was adopted: award, $3,503.90; cost of suit, $485.90 $3,989 80

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was this a formal and regular suit brought by the company, and decided in the usual course of law?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Oh, yes, and fought out to the bitter end, too. The action was brought against the Government under the Act of 1883; but a new system was introduced under which all the stamps are of a fixed denomination, instead of, as formerly, having the denomination filled in. The new system affords much greater protection to the revenue, while according equal, if not greater, facilities to the trade. The award is a little over one-third of the amount claimed. The award was based upon the right of the company to hold six months' supply to meet the requirements of the department.

Mr. EDGAR.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In the interval, I rather think that company's contract was renewed, and renewed without a chance being given to other parties to tender.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That was before my time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When favours of that kind are granted, I think it might be made a part of the bargain that these old standing claims should be passed over. Do the costs of the suit include our law costs as well as those we had to pay to the company?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Yes.

Excise—Further amount required $5,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. For what is this required?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). For stamps. I need not point out to the hon. gentleman that this does not mean any additional taxation. On the contrary, it means additional revenue on account of an increased amount of business. If the stamps are not used, they will be on hand.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the Finance Minister were here, I suppose we should congratulate him that if the rest of his revenue is going down, the revenue from fermented liquors is increasing.

Weights and Measures—To pay T. H. McKenzie, ex-inspector at Hamilton, an amount equal to the difference between his superannuation allowance and salary as inspector, his services having been required during the month succeeding his retirement $81 66

Mr. McMULLEN. When was Mr. McKenzie superannuated?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I can hardly give the hon. gentleman that information now, but I shall be glad to obtain it for him.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How old was he when he was superannuated?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Eighty-three.

Mr. McMULLEN. Who has been appointed in his place?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Mr. Freed.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the salary of the new inspector?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). $1,400.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How comes there to be such a difference between the superannuation allowance and the salary? The monthly salary is $114.33, and the monthly superannuation allowance only $32.67.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I may say that the salaries of the inspectors are not fixed by any rule. We try to arrange them according to merit.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He must have been a very old man when he was appointed.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I think Mr. McKenzie's friends regret very much this whole action. As the hon. member for Bothwell says, Mr. McKenzie was advanced in years when the appointment was made: but in justice to him, I may say that his discharge of his duties has been thoroughly efficient. No one regrets more than myself the circumstances which led to his superannuation. Up to the last moment, there was no fault to be found with his discharge of the duties of his office, although a man of eighty-three years of age, and the treatment he has received from his friends, in thus placing him on a retiring allowance in order to create an office for the editor of the 'Spectator,' is not very commendable. I regret very much that the country is called upon to pay superannuation for even ten or twelve years' service, for the purpose of making a vacancy for another man who seemed to be anxious to get it. Mr. McKenzie was never a political friend of mine. Ever since I have known politics, he has been a consistent supporter of the Government, but all parties regret very much his retirement.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the Minister say whether any number of years were added to his time?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). No.

Mr. BOYLE. With reference to the official just superannuated, when a man reaches the age of eighty-three, there ought to be no objection to his superannuation. I am informed by those who know him well that he became quite incapable of discharging his duties, and his superannuation was absolutely necessary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He must have been seventy years of age when appointed, and what the hon. gentleman now says might have been a good argument against his appointment.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). In justice to Mr. McKenzie, I must say that I never heard of any fault being found with him in the discharge of his duties.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. member for Monck (Mr. Boyle) has been entirely misled by some one, because Mr. McKenzie to-day is as capable a man as there is in the Government service, and the hon. Minister acknowledges that no fault could be found with the work of his office. Evidently, it was party exigencies alone that required his retirement from the service, and it would be unfair to let a statement of that kind go to the country uncontradicted. I know, as a matter of fact, that he was not unfit for the office.

Mr. BAIN. The duties of the office, as the hon. Controller admits, were always efficiently discharged. Personally, I know that during the latter part of last winter Mr. McKenzie was ill for a couple of months, but that is an evil we are all exposed to. I wish to point out this fact, that during the whole period of his incumbency, there never was the least complaint with regard to the efficient discharge of his duties, and down to the last moment no complaint was made. Under those circumstances, even if he be eighty-three years of age, it seems cruel to a friend of the Government to retire him when the fate which is bound to overtake us all would shortly end the period of his connection with the office, and he was superannuated simply to create a vacancy and enable the Government to place one of their friends.

Weights and Measures—Contingencies..... $2,000

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). This is required to enable the department to meet the expenses to the end of the current year. The expenditure in 1890-91 was $18,738, and in 1889-90, $17,628, showing that the expenditure has reached its lowest limit. The vote of the current year is now completely exhausted, and the operations of the office had to be completely suspended, which causes a loss of revenue greater than the amount that would be gained by a reduction of the expenditure.

To provide for the completion of payments for mail service by railways and steamboats, being the difference between the amount voted by Parliament and the amount actually required..... $44,800

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to learn from the Postmaster General how so very large an amount as $44,800 over the vote already given comes to be required?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is required to pay for the mail service of railways and steamboats for 1893-94. The estimate by the department was $1,301,687, an increase of $44,845. The amount voted by Parliament was $1,256,842, and consequently we are obliged to provide for the difference in the Supplementary Estimates. The items of increase are as follows: Grand Trunk Railway, $32,000; other railways, $11,245; steamboats, etc., $1,600. Total $44,845.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How does the $32,000 for the Grand Trunk Railway accrue?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It was over some portions of the line which had not been utilized before, and an increase of what was paid on others. In some instances, they were paid below what was the agreement between the Government and the company.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the exact figure per mile for the service you now pay?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. About $160 per mile, night and day service and side service also.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do we pay no more than that on the main lines? Is it a kind of omnium arrangement, or have you a heavier figure in one case than in the other?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The amount we pay on the main line is $160 per mile, and on the other lines $80 per mile, covering also the side service on the main line, carrying the mails between the stations and the post offices, which is done by the company instead of by ordinary contractors.

Mr. CHARLTON. What do we pay the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. One hundred and five dollars on the main line, and on the other lines strictly in accordance with the Order in Council.

Mr. CHARLTON. Does the main line include from Toronto to Owen Sound and the Credit Valley system?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That seems a high figure if it covers tracts of territory that are practically uninhabited.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman knows that in the United States their transcontinental lines are favoured in this respect because of the difficulties that have had to be encountered in building them, and because of the advantage they confer in opening up the country.

Mr. CHARLTON. Can the hon. gentleman make a comparison between the cost of mail service on the Canadian Pacific Railway and on transcontinental roads in the United States, such as the Union Pacific, the Northern Pacific and the Southern Pacific?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is more than double.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total for this purpose at present paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and what to the Grand Trunk Railway?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Of course these figures appear in the report. I think the

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

amount to the Grand Trunk Railway is $400,000, and to the Canadian Pacific Railway, $497,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In a general way does that mean day and night service?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have practically only three railways to deal with. What are the arrangements between the Post Office Department and the Intercolonial Railway? Do you pay a fixed sum to that road?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, $130 a mile; a little less than to the Grand Trunk Railway.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much does it get all told?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The length of the line is about 1,200 miles.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How long has that been paid?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Ever since the road began to be operated, I believe.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Would it not be a good way for the Minister of Railways, to get a surplus, to get a "raise" from the Postmaster General?

Mr. HAGGART. I should be receiving more than the other roads.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Grand Trunk Railway gets $160; you only get $130.

Mr. CHARLTON. How long has that arrangement been in force?

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know—it was in force before my time.

Mr. McMULLEN. There has been some increase in the mileage in recent years, therefore the mail subsidy for the road must have been increased beyond what it was under the hon. gentleman's predecessor.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes; the mileage length of the road was only 700 miles in 1878 and now it is nearly 1,200.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is it the rule to pay the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway the same for branches as for main lines?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No. I stated that the main line got $160 and side lines $80.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the rule on the Intercolonial Railway?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. We pay $130 on the whole line.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then we are paying more on the Intercolonial Railway than on the other. No doubt this arrangement is made in order to bolster up the Intercolonial Railway and give evidence of prosperity which does not exist. It is unfair to pay the Intercolonial Railway more than the others in order to help it out of its unfortunate position. That is evidently what it is done for.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The increase is not at all recent. It was made when Sir Charles Tupper was Minister of Railways. There is no evidence of bolstering so far as my hon. friend the present Minister of Railways is concerned. Moreover, I could tell the hon. gentleman that the change took place years ago, under Sir Charles Tupper's administration.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is one of the national blisters that Sir Charles Tupper left us, like the St. Charles branch. While Sir Charles Tupper is responsible for that increase, it would be right and just that the Minister should no longer continue the injustice of allowing the Intercolonial Railway $130 per mile, and other lines only $80.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. We will have to look into it and see what can be done.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Postmaster General must admit that the country is presently losing about $1,000,000 a year on the mail service, as between the receipts and expenditure.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. $600,000.

Mr. McMULLEN. Now, why is the Intercolonial Railway credited with $50 a mile more than it is entitled to, and why is that surplus saddled on to the postal service of this country?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I tell the hon. gentleman that we will have to look into it and see what can be done.

Mr. FRASER. I am glad the Minister will look into it, because while in one way it may be said that the country loses nothing for the $50 additional given to the Intercolonial Railway, I think every department should stand upon its own basis, and should be run on business principles. I look upon the Intercolonial Railway, as I have said heretofore, as the connecting link between the provinces, and for myself I shall not object very strongly if there is a deficit on the Intercolonial Railway, because it is the bond between all the provinces. I would be glad if the railway could be run as a paying speculation, and I would be glad if the Post Office Department would pay no more to the Intercolonial Railway than it does to any other line, for this reason: that it is a matter of the greatest importance to the people of this country to have postal communication, and if $50 per mile more is paid to the Intercolonial Railway, the Postmaster General will not be able to do what he would otherwise feel inclined to do in providing better postal communication to sparsely-settled districts. Consequently, I think we should pay no more to the Intercolonial Railway than to other lines, and if the Intercolonial Railway does not pay expenses when economically conducted, I do not think the people will object if it shows a deficit. Let each department stand on its own merits. I look upon the transmission of the mails as of more importance to the people generally than the mere existence of the Intercolonial Railway, because there are more people interested in having postal communication than there are in travelling on the Intercolonial Railway. I trust before our next meeting this matter will be carefully looked into. I think that the Government should provide the fullest means of communication between citizens of this country, so that information of all kinds may be freely circulated by mail; and to this end I would like to see the Postmaster General enabled to open up new offices where they are needed, as I believe his deputy in Nova Scotia is inclined to do, so far as he can, and therefore I think the Postmaster General should have all available funds put at his disposal.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the public will agree with the observations made by my hon. friend in respect to the Intercolonial Railway: that should there be a deficit the people will not complain whenever the freight and passenger charges along the line of railway are the same as they are in other sections of the country.

Mr. McMULLEN. I cannot see why the Intercolonial Railway cannot be operated so as to pay running expenses. I do not believe the people of this Dominion will be satisfied to pay a sum in addition to the earnings of the road, in order to keep it in operation. They are looking forward hopefully to the time when, at least, it will pay running expenses, and when the country will get something out of it in the way of a return for the $50,000,000 sunk in that road. The country is now paying over $2,000,000 a year in interest on the money sunk in that road, and have been paying a considerable sum to keep it in operation. While we are willing to admit that the Intercolonial Railway was constructed as a connecting link between the provinces, at the same time it is not necessary that it should be run at an annual loss, and the people will not be content to have it run in that way. I believe if it was judiciously and properly operated it would pay some return, let alone paying working expenses. While there have been extravagances connected with it, it is not fair that the Post Office Department should contribute to its support more than is just to help it out of the ditch. I believe that each department, as my hon. friend has said, should stand by itself, and that no one department should be overridden with charges in order to help another out of a deficit, and in the Post Office Department there is a still larger deficit than there is on the Intercolonial Railway. I dare say that the Minister of Railways is doing all he can to make both ends meet; I believe he has reduced expenses considerably. We are all glad of that, and we want him to go on in the same direction and make further reductions. We can remember the time when the Government told us that it was not possible to run the road with a less number of men than were employed; still, we find that hundreds of men have been dismissed, and the road is not less efficient than it was. We hope the Minister will go on and discharge still more men. I think he can discharge half the truckmen he has got to-day, and still run the road as efficiently as it has been.

Mr. FRASER. I hope the hon. gentleman has not misunderstood me. The position I take is that: that so long as the Intercolonial Railway charges fair rates, and is run economically, I would not object if there was a deficit in its operations. I am not at all speaking now as a representative from the lower provinces, for while we pay our fair proportion of the deficit on the canals, and while we pay our share of interest on the money given to the Canadian Pacific Railway, for which we receive very little advantage, I say that when we consider what the Intercolonial Railway does for the country, I am willing that there should be a deficit in order that it may be kept up efficiently. I say this, let it be understood, no matter what Government or what party are in power. We must remember that the Intercolonial Railway was the principal foundation of Confederation, consequently we in the lower provinces, while we want the road to be run economically and at fair rates, want its efficiency to be sustained. I think the country will be satisfied if an efficient service is maintained, and the road is economically conducted, even though it should not always pay expenses. That is my position. I agree with the hon. gentleman that each department should stand on its own bottom, that one should not help another, in order that the various services shall be conducted with a view to judicious economy, for there may be an economy that is not judicious. I am glad that this subject will be taken into consideration during the recess, and I trust the Postmaster General will arrive at a different decision in regard to it.

Mr. HAGGART. From the observations addressed to the House by the hon. gentleman, he would lead hon. members to believe that the Intercolonial Railway is obtaining more than its share for postal service. The hon. gentleman has stated that the Grand Trunk receives $150 for the main line, and $80 on the branches, and that the Intercolonial, which had no branches, received $180 for the main line. The Intercolonial Railway is nearly all main line, and if the hon. gentleman will allow

Mr. McMULLEN.

$80 for the branches, he will see that that railway is receiving less for postal service than either the Grand Trunk Railway or the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. McMULLEN. I dare say the hon. Minister is right, in a sense. I have no doubt the road from Oxford to New Glasgow is called the main line. There are no branches. The Intercolonial Railway has been used in many sections for political purposes, and the whole road is called main line. If the Intercolonial Railway had been allowed to remain as it was when first constructed, as a connecting link between Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and western Canada, no doubt it would have been a more profitable undertaking. But we have added branches until the length of the line is 1,200 miles instead of 700 miles, and the result has been that the increased mileage has not earned a proportionate amount. But, unfortunately, non-paying branches have been added, and certain sections of the country, such as Colchester, Pictou, and Cumberland have been granted railway facilities in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, on which they have made heavy expenditures. In the west, the people had to pay for railway facilities.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Eastern Extension is as much a part of the Intercolonial main line as any other portion of it.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

PARK AND ISLAND RAILWAY.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 68) respecting the Montreal Park and Island Railway.

(In the Committee.)

On subsection 3a,

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the amount of stock provided under the provincial Act?

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). $500,000, with power to increase to $1,000,000, if a majority of the shareholders so desire.

Bill reported.

EDMONTON TRAMWAY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 23) respecting Ordinance No. 32 of 1893, of the North-west Territories, empowering the municipality of the town of Edmonton to construct and operate a tramway.—(Title changed to an Act to incorporate the Edmonton Street Railway Company.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 3,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask some member of the Government whether the North-west Territories Act as it now stands does not confer municipal powers upon the North-west Legislature ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then, what is the object of undertaking to legislate here on a municipal subject ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The conferring of powers in relation to any railway is beyond the powers of the North-west Legislature, and I think there is some doubt whether they have power to legislate in relation to a tramway. I think the object is to remove doubts.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would suppose that to build a tramway in a street of a town was as much a municipal proceeding as to make an ordinary paved road.

Mr. MASSON. This tramway goes beyond the town ; it crosses the river.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 139) to incorporate the Pontiac and Ottawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Bryson.)

Bill (No. 132) respecting the Cobourg, Northumberland and Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Guillet.)

Bill (No. 85) to incorporate the Boynton Electric Railway Company.—(Mr. Gillies.)

Bill (No. 73) respecting the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company.—(Mr. Bergin.)

DILLON RELIEF BILL.

Order for second reading of Bill (No. 148) for the relief of James St. George Dillon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand that there is another member of the House who wishes to discuss this Bill. If there is no objection, I would like it to stand over until Monday.

Order allowed to stand.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 157) to again revive and further amend the Act to incorporate the Brockville and New York Bridge Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply.

To meet proportion of expenditure in connection with the International Bureau, Brussels..... $600

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. A convention has been entered into by the principal countries of the world for the establishment of a bureau at Brussels for the purpose of collecting information as to the customs tariffs of the world, and the convention countries have contributed a small sum each for the maintenance of that bureau.

Mr. CHARLTON. And this bureau gives information to the convention countries respecting customs changes in various parts of the world ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Commercial agencies, including expenses in connection with the negotiation of treaties or in the extension of commercial relations..... $10,000

Mr. McMULLEN. What does this include ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is the usual vote for commercial agencies and to pay expenses of persons who are sent out to make trade arrangements with other countries or to propagate in other countries information respecting Canadian trade. Some agents have been employed in different quarters, who are paid a small sum annually. There are seven who are paid $250 each. There are seven who receive no remuneration, but who correspond with the department. The expenses in connection with the French treaty last year, about $2,650, and also the expenses of the mission to Australia, are among the items charged to this account.

Mr. CHARLTON. I suppose there is no part of this vote used for the purpose of maintaining a commercial agency or commercial agent at Washington ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have no such agency yet.

Mr. LISTER. Is this the first time the amount has been asked for ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It has been voted every year that I have been in the House.

Mr. LISTER. I do not see how the expenses of Mr. Bowell's mission to Australia, which is in the nature of an extraordinary expenditure, can be charged against this, if the vote is no larger than in former years.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The vote is taken every year, but the charges against it are not fixed charges. Many of the missions are occasional missions. The vote has been $10,000 for many years, but we have not always expended the whole sum.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask whether there has been any communication with the English Government with a view to securing the recognition of our agents in any way ? When they visit a country are they recognized by the British consuls or Ministers, or do they go in a private capacity ? I apprehend that we have not power to give them any official character, and that they stand in the same relation to the Government as a private agent does to the house employing him, unless there is some arrangement with the foreign office that they shall be recognized.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Of course, our agents have no official character, that is, no consular character. As the hon. gentleman has said, they go as would the agents of a private house, except that in this instance they represent a great country, and are treated with respect, and are given facilities everywhere by those who represent Her Majesty in a consular character. We are in correspondence with Her Majesty's Government with a view to securing proper recognition of our commercial agents, and especially commercial agents that will be appointed at the capitals of the several great countries.

Mr. McMULLEN. What was the amount of the expenses of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his mission to the Australian colonies?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand they will reach not quite $2,000.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to suggest to the right hon. leader of the Government that if it is advantageous to employ commercial agents anywhere—and the vote shows that the Government thinks it is—we should certainly have a commercial agent, not necessarily an ambassador or high commissioner, at Washington. If a necessity exists for a commercial agent anywhere in the world greater necessity exists for the appointment of an agent there than anywhere else. If the Government were to appoint a suitable person, a gentleman with a knowledge of the trade of the two countries and possessed of business capacity, no doubt the cost to the Government would be repaid many fold by the services such an agent would render. I desire to make this suggestion to the head of the Government, and say that in my opinion no better appropriation of public money could be made, if a judicious appointment were made, than one to maintain a commercial agent at Washington.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see that in the Auditor General's Report, under the head of commercial agencies, is a charge: "C. J. Gould, Chesterville, services re poultry and egg trade, $400." Will the hon. gentleman please explain?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This was for expenses incurred by authority of the Finance Department in relation to the egg and poultry trade of Canada with Great Britain in the interests of the great Canadian hen.

Mr. McMULLEN. I thought Sir Charles Tupper was attending to the poultry trade. It seems to me very singular that it was found necessary to send a special agent from this country. It is rather a reflection on the High Commissioner. He sent a report telling us all about how the poultry were to be killed and cured and assuring us that if his directions were followed a great trade could be built up, as the English people were very anxious to get our poultry, there being a kind of wild taste to it that the people over there liked very much. It seems strange that the Government had to send an agent, after such extensive correspondence and such a fine report, to ascertain whether Sir Charles Tupper had given us accurate information or not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was beneficial to have somebody to go from this side who was acquainted with the circumstances of the poultry and egg trade here. While Sir Charles Tupper could do a great deal for us, even the best of agents must be placed in a better position through having the latest information as to the circumstances of the trade in this country.

Mr. FRASER. I would suggest to the Prime Minister that perhaps a little less restriction would save this expenditure. Trade is such a natural thing, it finds its own channel. It does seem a waste of money and a humiliating thing to pay $400 to send a man to a country like England, that is anxious to receive the goods of the whole world, to tell them that we have eggs to sell. Give the people an opportunity to sell without restriction and there will be no difficulty.

Mr. McMULLEN. It seems quite clear that this money was spent to give some good supporter of the Conservative party a trip to England. Besides the $400 paid for his services he received money for his fare to England and back, and $175 for expenses while there, and all this, as my hon. friend says, in order to tell the people there that we have eggs to sell.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Would there be any objection on the part of the Government to bring down the correspondence with the Imperial Government with reference to these commercial agents?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Superannuation—extra allowance to Mr. Wallace, ex-postmaster at Victoria, B.C. $240

Mr. McMULLEN. How long is this to continue? This man was superannuated many years ago, as I have said on previous occasions, in order to make room for Mr. Shakespere, who was at one time a member of this House. He was superannuated with a grant of his full allowance—I think some years were added to his time. And we have been every year since then voting this $240 more.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Wallace was superannuated, as the hon. gentleman says, about seven years ago. It was ascertained, after his superannuation, that an understanding had been given him by the Postmaster General of that time that an addition would be made to this allowance. My recollection is that there was no addition of years to his term of service, but an addition was promised which is made up in this way. As to that I am not perfectly certain. But the promise of this allowance was made, and we have felt it our duty to come to Parliament and ask that the vote be given.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think the House should be called upon to implement such contracts entered into by any Postmaster General six or seven years ago. This was an arrangement that should not have been entered into. Mr. Wallace was not an old man, and some four or five or six years were added to his time of service to qualify him to retire. The change was made to find a place for Mr. Shakespere. I think it is time this voting of excessive sums each year to a man who, when he was retired, was quite capable of discharging his duties, should cease. I should like to ask where Mr. Wallace's cheques are sent to. Are they sent to Victoria or to England?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand he is living in Victoria.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think his address is not Victoria, but England.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Perhaps, but it has not been long so.

Mr. LISTER. I intended some time during the session to bring a matter in which the principle involved is the same as appears to be involved in the matter now under consideration, before the attention of the House. This officer in British Columbia appears to receive the superannuation allowance of $912 annually, and in addition to the statutory allowance he receives $250 annually under an agreement entered into by the then Postmaster General. I was not aware until this evening that the Government had in any case recognized the principle of paying to a superannuated servant a sum in addition to the amount allowed by law, and as it appears there is a precedent established, I take the liberty of drawing the attention of the Government and the House to a case which, in my opinion, is one of extreme hardship. Some years ago, when Mr. McLelan was Postmaster General, Mr. Griffin was the Deputy Postmaster General. He had given service to the country for upwards of fifty years. He was first employed by the British Government when this was a British colony under the direct control of the British Government, and after we obtained our autonomy he was appointed a servant of the Government of Canada. He was a man at that time, seven or eight or nine years ago, capable of discharging to the fullest extent all duties that devolved on him as Deputy Postmaster General; he was familiar with that portion of the service from its inception up to that time, and there is no reason, as far as I am able to ascertain, why he was superannuated. The then Postmaster General called on Mr. Griffin and intimated that his resignation would be accepted. It was a startling surprise to Mr. Griffin, for he never had the slightest reason to think that his services were not acceptable to the Government. It was proposed by the Postmaster General at that time that if he would resign the Government would grant to him, in addition to his superannuation allowance, a bonus of $5,000, and in addition would grant him leave of absence for six months on that pay. He was superannuated or resigned—at the present moment I am not able to say which, but I think he was superannuated. There was an Order in Council passed by the Government, a copy of which I possess, by which the Government bound itself to pay Mr. Griffin the sum of $5,000; it is as solemn a document as the Government could issue or make, and in the following session, in the Estimates brought down by the Government, the sum of $5,000 appeared there to carry out and fulfil the promise that had been made by the Postmaster General on behalf of the Government. That happened eight or nine years ago, and from that time up to the present applications have been made to the Government to carry out the solemn agreement they had made with Mr. Griffin, but thus far the Government have failed to recognize the claim the public servant had on the Government. It is not now for me to consider or to discuss whether that was a wise act on the part of the Government or not; all we know is that the faith and honour of the Government were pledged to carry out the arrangement made with Mr. Griffin under which he consented to superannuation. Sir John Macdonald, on his dying bed, caused a letter to be written to Mr. Griffin, in which he stated that the circumstances connected with that transaction formed one of the most painful acts of his life, and if he recovered, the matter would be made right. That Sir John Macdonald caused that letter to be written a few days before his death can be established by a Senator in the other branch of this Legislature. That Senator has applied to the Government; I have placed the matter before the Prime Minister, and I am bound to say that he treated me considerately. Mr. Griffin is now an old man, nearly eighty years of age, although still vigorous. He has the great misfortune, however, to have a son who is entirely helpless, and the grief of his later years is that he will leave that boy unprovided for. He hoped that the sum of money I have mentioned, obtained from the Government, would enable him to form a fund, the interest from which would be sufficient to pay for the support of the boy in some of the public institutions in England, where such cases are taken in, in case of his, Mr. Griffin's, death. Mr. Griffin may live a year, or several years, or he may die at any day. This matter has been a constant cause of worry to the old gentleman. When I spoke to the Prime Minister, he acted as considerately as, perhaps, he could under the circumstances, because he said that if anything happened to the old gentleman before the House met again, the Government would see, at all events, that the income of $5,000 would be applied to the support of his imbecile son, who, at the present time, is helpless and unable to walk. This is the only charge the old man has, and he hoped, with the $5,000 to be received from the Government, to be able to provide for him, because we know that in the civil service of this country, when a servant dies, as a general thing, there is very little left to the family. The Prime Minister made that statement to me. I do not bring the matter before the attention of the Government with any desire to reflect upon the present Administration, but in order to remind them that while they have succeeded the Government that was then in power, they are still the Government, and any promise made by the Government at that time is as binding on them as if it were made by themselves. I feel that this is a matter which in all justice and fairness should be attended to by the Government. The promise made by the Postmaster General at that time, was ratified by Order in Council of the whole Government, and subsequently confirmed by a letter of Sir John A. Macdonald himself, written on his dying bed; and if there ever was a case in which the promise of a Government should be carried out, that case is the present.

Mr. McCARTHY. Why was not the money paid?

Mr. LISTER. The item was in the Estimates, and I think that one member on this side of the House got up and objected to it, and it was dropped at once without any discussion. I merely state these facts to show that a promise had been made, that it was being carried out by the Government in asking the House to vote that amount, and moreover, that Sir John A. Macdonald considered it a promise that should be sacredly observed, because almost his last act was the causing of this letter to be written, promising that if he recovered the matter would be attended to, and stating that it was one of the most painful regrets of his life that it had not been attended to before. Here is an old public servant who was fifty years and upwards in the employ of the Government; the man who organized the whole post office service of this country in its earliest days, and who lived to see it become the great institution it is now. I am not going to enter into the reasons of his superannuation. He did not expect to be superannuated; but he was told by the Postmaster General at that time that it was the wish of the Government that he should be superannuated, and it was agreed that if his superannuation took place, he would get the usual six months leave of absence, and be paid this amount. That an Order in Council was passed, recognizing fully the agreement which had been made, and providing for the payment of the money; that a vote was placed in the Estimates in fulfilment of that order; and the statement of the then Premier that the matter would be attended to if he recovered; all show conclusively, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that there was such a promise. There being that promise, the Government are as much bound to carry it out as if the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald were still in power. The right hon. gentleman who leads the House spoke kindly of the old gentleman, and promised to submit the matter to his colleagues. I suppose he has done so, and I hope for the honour of Canada and the honour of the Government that a promise so solemnly made will be, even at this late hour, faithfully carried out.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. member has put the case very strongly indeed, and for my part I would regret to have to ask the House to qualify in any way the statements he has made as regards the binding nature of the arrangement made when Mr. Griffin retired from the service. I do not quite regard it in the light he does; I do not regard it quite as a promise. I rather put the circumstances of the transaction in this way. Mr. Griffin had come out to this country from England, as the hon. gentleman has stated, and he performed very efficient services here during something like fifty years.

Mr. LISTER. Fifty-four years.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Fifty-four years in connection with the Post Office Department. He was a man of great diligence, zeal and fidelity. When the time came to superannuate him, when he was superannuated, he had passed by twenty years the age at which the Government had a right to superannuate him without asking his consent; and, therefore, what was done for him was not to induce him to resign and accept superannuation, but it was done by way of showing in a signal manner the appreciation by the Government of his services for the country; and it was stated to Mr. Griffin that, on account of his very advanced years, while his activity was wonderful for his age, the Government found it necessary to reorganize the Post Office Department, and for that purpose to put it into the hands of younger and more active men, and men more fully acquainted with modern post office systems than he could possibly be. The result was a reorganization of the service, and a considerable saving by that reorganization; and the reorganization extended also to the Accountant's branch of the department. The changes were made under the late Mr. Cunningham Stewart, and they were found to be very beneficial and very generally appreciated throughout the country. Mr. Griffin was assured that while it was a matter of sheer necessity to part with his services under those circumstances, the Government's appreciation of him was so high that not only would they give him the pension provided by law, but, I think, they added ten years to his service, though I am not sure of that. It was also stated, as I understand, that Parliament would be asked to vote some $4,000 or $5,000 for him in consideration of his services, and that the leave which the hon. gentleman refers to would be given him. The leave was given him, and he received the highest superannuation the law allows, and the Order in Council referred to was an order suggesting that Parliament should be moved to vote to him the sum I named. The sum was placed in the Estimates of the following year, and while it was not long under discussion, yet the late Sir John Macdonald ascertained pretty definitely that it was not the pleasure of the House that the item should pass. In consequence of that Sir John Macdonald withdrew the item from the Estimates, and allowed it to drop. I know it was a matter of deep regret to him that he was not able to fulfil his intentions with regard to Mr. Griffin, and we have not seen our way to do it since. With regard to what the hon. gentleman has said about the son of Mr. Griffin, I should think that if the father should be removed, the claim to have some provision made for the son would be the most meritorious claim that could be made to the House for a pension. It would be preferable for the House to make provision in that way to voting what appears to be a large sum to Mr. Griffin.

Mr. McMULLEN. I may say that there was no time added to Mr. Griffin's service. He did not even get an allowance for the full time of his service. He served thirty-seven years, while the Act only allows 35-50ths of his salary. He draws $2,239.92, which is just for thirty-five years' service on a salary of $3,200.

Mr. LISTER. There was nothing added to his time of service.

Mr. McCARTHY. He could not draw any more.

Mr. LISTER. No, he could not, but it is said that Mr. McLelan, the then Postmaster General, stated positively to him that that $5,000 would be paid to him, and that, in addition he would get the usual six months' absence with full pay. He did not get the six months' leave of absence, and went out of the office. And the promise that had been made by the Postmaster General—an absolute, not a conditional promise—has not been fulfilled. Of course, these Orders in Council for the payment of money are mere recommendations, which have to come before the House, but so far as the Government is concerned, when it makes an Order in Council recommending a payment, that is a promise on its part that the payment will be made, and as the Government controls the majority of the House, its act would be sustained. I do not believe there is any gentleman on either side who would object to that deliberate promise being carried out. However, the right hon. First Minister says that if anything happens the old gentleman, provision will be made in the way indicated for this imbecile boy. That has been the great trouble on the old gentleman's mind all these years. He does not want to leave that boy a charge on any of his relatives. I do not think there is any gentleman in this House who would object to that promise being carried out.
