SECOND SESSION—EIGHTH PARLIAMENT

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 20th May, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 110) to incorporate the Southern Counties Railway Company.—(Mr. Préfontaine.)

KINGSTON POSTMASTER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (for Sir Charles Elbert Tupper) asked :

1. Has Mr. James Shannon, postmaster at Kingston, been superannuated or retired ?
2. If so, upon what ground ?
3. If Mr. Shannon has been retired and a successor appointed, what is the name and age of his successor ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Mr. James Shannon, the postmaster at Kingston, has been superannuated. He was superannuated for the purpose of improving the efficiency of the post office at Kingston ; Mr. Shannon being a gentleman of advanced age and feeble health. His successor is Mr. Gunn, formerly a member of this House. His age has not been made known to the department.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I be allowed to draw the attention of the hon. the Postmaster General to the fact, that Mr. Gunn's age has to be made known to the department.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Then I presume that if it has to be known it will be made known, but I have given the answer that at present his age is not known.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact, that Mr. Gunn is obliged to give his age.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have given the information given me to-day by the secretary of the department.

JUBILEE POSTAGE STAMPS.

Mr. GIBSON asked :

1. Is it intended by the Post Office Department to issue a set of Jubilee postage stamps on the occasion of Her Majesty's approaching Jubilee ?
2. If so, will such stamps be put into public use, and what course will be adopted whereby the public may purchase such stamps ?
3. Will there be any limit to the quantity to be issued ?
4. Of what various denominations will such issue consist ?
5. What will be the amount of each denomination to be issued ?
6. What steps will be taken to limit the number to be issued ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). It is the intention of the Government to issue a set of jubilee postage stamps. Such stamps will be put into public use by being delivered to postmasters throughout Canada for sale to the public in the same manner as ordinary postage stamps are sold. There will be a limit to the quantity to be issued. The denominations of jubilee stamps, and the total number of such jubilee stamps to be issued are set forth in the following schedule :—

SCHEDULE showing the Denominations and Total Number of Jubilee Stamps to be issued.

Number to be issued.	Denomination.
150,000	½c. stamps.
8,000,000	1c. do
2,500,000	2c. do
20,000,000	3c. do
750,000	5c. do
75,000	6c. do
200,000	8c. do
150,000	10c. do
100,000	15c. do
100,000	20c. do
100,000	50c. do
25,000	$1 do
25,000	$2 do
25,000	$3 do
25,000	$4 do
25,000	$5 do
7,000,000	1c. post cards.
Total value of one stamp of each kind, $16.21½.

As soon as the total number of stamps mentioned in said schedule is issued the plates from which they will have been engraved will be destroyed in the presence of the head and two officers of the department. On the 10th June, the Post Office Department will proceed to supply jubilee postage stamps to the principal post offices in Canada, and through them the minor post offices will obtain their supply until the issue is exhausted. If this jubilee issue were to wholly displace the ordinary postage stamps it would supply the ordinary wants of the country for between two and three months, but as the use of the ordinary postage stamp will proceed concurrently with that of the jubilee stamps it is expected that the jubilee stamp will last beyond the three months. Inasmuch as the department is already receiving applications for the purchase of jubilee stamps, it may be stated that the department will adhere to the established practice of supplying them only to postmasters and through them to the public, who may purchase them on and after the 19th June, 1897.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend state where these stamps are being printed, if they are now being printed?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. They are not at present being printed. They will be printed in the city of Ottawa.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to rise to a question of privilege. In the "Daily Witness" of May 15, appears a letter from the correspondent at Ottawa, in which the correspondent writes as follows:—

Mr. Davin, prefacing his doctrine with the declaration that he was an authority on journalism, laid it down as a cardinal principle of newspaper management, that every communication sent to the paper must be published, a remark which showed Mr. Davin to be as ignorant of journalism as he is of parliamentary propriety.

I never made the declaration, and the statement of the correspondent that I did so has no foundation in fact. It would be an absurd statement from a person who knew nothing of journalism and from a person who knows something of journalism, it would be still more absurd. What I did say—I quote now from the unrevised "Hansard"—was this:—

Mr. Fairlie asked to have his letter published, and newspaper men know that it is the practice to publish a reply.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It was also sent to the "Free Press."

Mr. DAVIN. I have had as long an experience of journalism as either my hon. friend or the editor of the "Free Press." I know what is the duty of a journalist: it is that if a man accused by a newspaper sends a reply it is the duty of a journalist to publish it. The Finance Minister is a journalist, and he knows what the practice is. Especially is this the case when the newspaper has criticised it. To criticise a letter he receives, and then put it into the waste paper basket or into a pigeon-hole is equivalent to slapping the man's face and then boxing his ears.

There is therefore not a tittle of foundation in the statement in the letter of the correspondent. Again, the same correspondent, in the last issue of the "Witness" to hand, that of May 19, referring to one of the debates here, says:—

Mr. Davin announced that he had not risen to discuss the tariff matter, but now he would do so.

Mr. Davin had three newspaper files on his desk, one in French and two Winnipeg newspapers, all bearing on the tariff and on a discussion which proceeded some time ago on a tariff motion of his own; so that, while professing no intention to speak on the subject, the evidence all pointed to the contrary.

My hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) is not here, but there are gentlemen around me who were here at the time, who know, and it is not necessary to have their evidence at all, because my word is sufficient, what occurred. While speaking, I bent down to my friend the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), and asked him to send a page into the reading-room for the papers from which I wished to quote. Here are two letters, in an interval of two or three days, making two complete misstatements as to a matter of fact regarding the conduct of an hon. member of this House.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to raise a question of privilege. There appears in the correspondence from Ottawa of the Montreal "Gazette" of to-day a heading in which I remark the following words: "An Important Question regarding the Préfontaine Clause." As I am not responsible for the preferential clause, which is the one evidently referred to, and do not understand how the typesetter on the "Gazette" happened to have my name on his brain, I wish to have my responsibility perfectly disengaged from the authorship of this clause.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—EXTENSION TO MONTREAL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways to the following announcement made in the Speech of His Excellency at the opening of this session:

I have much satisfaction in informing you that arrangements have been concluded which, if you approve, will enable the Intercolonial Railway system to reach Montreal, and thus share in the large traffic centering in that city.

That speech was delivered to us on the 25th day of March, and I wish to ask the hon. Minister if he is prepared yet to take the House into his confidence and lay before us these arrangements which were declared to be concluded on the opening day of the session.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I think I will be prepared, at the first opportunity which will be convenient for the purpose, to make a complete statement of the proposed arrangement. I do not know just in what form the hon. member would desire that it should be presented.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What I propose is that the promise made by the Governor General should be fulfilled and that this arrangement should be laid before this House for its approval.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is no question but that will be done in the ordinary course. I thought that the hon. gentleman desired to have some explanation prior to the submission of the resolution and the Bill, so that the House might be informed as to the details. I shall take occasion, if it will answer the convenience or suit the purpose of the hon. gentleman, when the Estimates are on having reference to the Railway Department, to make a full statement with regard to these details. I have no wish to conceal anything from the House, and only desire to take a convenient opportunity of putting the matter in the form in which it would be properly presented.

PRINCE ALBERT BRANCH, C. P. R.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the Government to the following article from the Prince Albert "Advocate":—

The management of the Prince Albert Branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway seem to conduct their business on the penny wise and pound foolish plan. While they charge us the highest rates charged on any road in Canada, they give us the worst possible service. During the last two or three years they have done away with section men on this road, and, as a result, the train is delayed by the excessive growth of weeds on the roadbed in the summer time and by the drifting snow in the winter. This winter the snow-fall has been heavier than usual, and the train has been making about as good time as the ox teams of the freighters. Passengers have been kept four or five days on the trip from Prince Albert to Regina, which should not take more than ten hours, though the schedule time is fourteen hours, and have been subjected to great hardships through cold and the want of proper food. It is disgraceful that such a state of things exist on a railroad which is receiving a subsidy of $80,000 a year from the Government, especially when at a very small expenditure a few fences could be erected along the road in the open prairie, where the wind fills the cuttings with snow, and by the employment of the usual section men, who could easily keep the remainder of the track clear. The attention of the Minister of Railways should be brought to this matter at once, to see if he cannot force the company to keep up to their contract by giving us at least two trains each week; and if he cannot afford us the relief we need, our member, Mr. Davis, should bring the matter to the attention of the Government, who would, no doubt, find a remedy for this grievance.

I might say that this state of things has been going on for the last two or three years, and it is a very serious matter indeed with us, because the rural districts are served with their mails from the town of Prince Albert. If the mail does not get in in time, say at nine or ten o'clock in the evening, the postmaster is unable to get it assorted in time for the mails that leave for the rural districts about ten o'clock the following morning, and as the result of this the people throughout the district of Saskatchewan have to wait a whole week for their mails. This country is paying $80,000 a year as a subsidy to this company, and they should be compelled to fulfil their contract with proper expedition. This matter has not been brought to the attention of the Government before, and I press it upon their attention now at the request of the citizens of Saskatchewan, and I would urge on the hon. Minister of Railways to take such action as will compel this company to fulfil its contract.

Mr. DAVIN. I would like to know whether the committee in Prince Albert has approved of the hon. gentleman bringing this matter before the House.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY—QUEEN'S JUBILEE CELEBRATION.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, a Supplementary Estimate of a sum required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending on the 30th June, 1897, to provide for the pay, allowances, transport and general expenses of the Militia Contingent to be sent to England to represent Canada in June, 1897, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," the Governor General recommends this Estimate to the House of Commons.

Government House,
Ottawa, 20th May, 1897.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved that His Excellency's Message, together with the Estimates, be referred to the Committee of Supply. He said: This is a special Message relating to the sum necessary to pay the expenses of the Jubilee contingent. The amount required is $26,000. I have had a conversation on the matter with the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) and have made the suggestion which, I think, he is willing to concur in, that we should go into Supply for the purpose of passing this exceptional item, and after it has been dealt with, proceed with the regular Orders of the Day.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In Committee.)

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose the acting Minister of Militia will give us a full explanation.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). This is for the purpose of paying for the transport and the pay and allowances expected to be necessary for the 200 men and officers who are to proceed to England to take part in the Jubilee celebration. Our idea is that officers and men should receive the pay of their several ranks; and that, in the case of the men, some additional subsistence allowance will be necessary while they are in England. As nearly as we can calculate, the money will be divided into two parts of nearly equal size. Perhaps about $11,000 or $12,000 will be required to pay for the passages from this country to England and back again, and also for transport from the respective homes of the men in Canada to the port of embarkation and from the point of arrival in England to whatever place the military authorities there require the men to report at. The pay of the officers and men will, as I have said, be in proportion to their rank which, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), of course, is aware of. It will amount probably to something like $13,000 or $14,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Do I understand that you have here sufficient to cover all expenses?

Mr. FIELDING.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I hope so. But this is, of course, a matter in which it would not be to the interest of the country that there should be any stinginess; and, if this is not sufficient, I am sure the House will not object to grant us more.

Mr. FOSTER. But this is supposed to be sufficient?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Yes, this is supposed to be sufficient. The contingent will be absent, I suppose, about forty days in all.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) made any arrangement for reduced fares?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The contingent are to go by one of the Dominion steamers, the "Vancouver," about the 5th of June, and return about the 1st of July, by which time, I am informed the Jubilee celebration will be over. They will return by some other steamer of the same line, probably the "Scotsman." We got fairly favourable rates. Of course, there is a great rush to England this summer, and we had to pay, probably, a little more than we should have had to pay at another time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to make a suggestion to the committee and to the Government. As I understand it, a number of gentlemen prominent in military circles, some of whom have occupied seats in this House and other honourable positions in the country, have been invited to accompany this contingent on their visit to England. I feel—and I believe the great majority of the members of the House and the people of the country will agree with me—that some reasonable allowance should be made towards the payment of expenses of these gentlemen. I do not advocate anything in an extravagant way. But I think that the gentlemen who are to accompany this contingent, it may be with the Premier or in some supernumerary capacity, considering the important positions they occupy and the greatness of the occasion, will go as the representatives of Canada, and I think that the people will be perfectly satisfied that their representatives on this occasion—they will be only few in number—should be allowed some reasonable amount for expenses. It appears to me that without some such allowance, only men of great wealth can accept the invitation. I do not think that that would not meet the approval of this House or of the people of the country. This being a representative delegation, reasonable provision should be made for expenses for the men who have earned the right to an invitation. I simply bring this matter up that it may be taken into consideration by the department, by the Government, and by the House, in the hope that some arrangement can be made to provide as I suggest.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it would be better to deal with this resolution on its own merits, not raising the question which my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) has raised. That question can be raised at any time and can be considered by the House. But I may just say that, so far as I am able to judge, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, representing the Militia Department, has already said that the Government may require to ask the House for more liberal consideration on this account than is proposed in this resolution; and I am quite certain that anything that the Government feel obliged to call upon the House for would be responded to in a very generous and liberal spirit. The question the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) has raised is one of considerable importance. I am inclined to think that the gentlemen who have the good fortune to be selected are only too happy to perform this service to their country, and are only too happy to have the invitation upon such terms as the Government may provide for them, and that, in fact, if there were any gentlemen included in that arrangement who were not prepared to accept the terms that are offered, they would find a great number of volunteers who would be delighted to take their places upon the terms offered by the Government.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Perhaps it is well that I should mention for the information of the House that the Imperial authorities intend to provide not only barrack accommodation and rations for the non-commissioned officers and men, but barrack accommodation for the officers who may accompany the contingent. While I entirely agree that this is not a case for cheese-paring or undue economy, and while I shall not hesitate to ask the House for more money if I find it necessary. I am, as at present advised, inclined to think that the gentlemen who are appointed, who are mostly men of considerable rank and who will receive the pay of their rank, will be fairly well provided during the short time they will remain in England, which, I suppose, will not much exceed three weeks. However, I am glad to hear the expressions of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), and, as I say, I shall not hesitate, in case of need, to ask the House for a further sum.

Resolution reported, and read the second time.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). It is desirable, as the House has been kind enough to accept this item without debate, that we should proceed to carry it through as many stages as possible. Therefore I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, That towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty, for the service of the year ending the 30th June, 1897, the sum of $26,000 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Resolution considered in committee, reported, and read the second time.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 111) for granting to Her Majesty the sum of $26,000 required for defraying certain expenses of the militia contingent to be sent to England for the Jubilee of Her Majesty in June, 1897.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first and second times.

SUPPLY—THE AMERICAN BANK NOTE PRINTING COMPANY'S CONTRACT.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the House goes into Committee of Supply, I wish to call the attention of the members present to some circumstances in connection with the granting of the contract for printing the bank notes, the inland revenue stamps, postal cards, stamps, &c., for the use of the Government. There are certain things in connection with this which I think merit the attention of all the members of this House, and it shall be my endeavour to put the facts of the case in as short and lucid a statement as I possibly can. It is a proper ambition, I think, for every country to be the maker of its own currency so far as that can possibly be done, and the mere accident or incident of more or less relative cheapness is not to be taken into account very largely in carrying out what is, on the whole and in principle, laudable and correct. On this assumption, at least, the Dominion of Canada has gone from the time that it was a Dominion; and at the time of confederation when, by the constitution, this power came to it, it took up the old line of policy of preparing the paper currency, stamps and the like for the service of the Government, in Canada itself. From 1866 this has been done, and been done, I believe, by one firm, and from 1868 when the Dominion came to take this matter in charge, it has been consecutively carried out on the same line and under the same management, but with certain changes and gradations, of course, which were incident to the changed conditions from one quinquennial period to another, for a period of five years has generally been the term of the contract. The notes—to confine myself to that—because where notes are made the other supplies are made, and by the same person—the notes at first were made in the city of Montreal, and as well supervised as the Department of Finance could do, which was the responsible head in the matter. But it was early felt that as soon as possible the work of the preparation of these notes and stamps should be as close as possible to the supervising power; so that this contract, and the work under the contract, which went on in the city of Montreal in 1868 and from that time forward, gradually was brought into closer supervision by the Finance Department, and at the time of the granting of the contract in 1881, an option was introduced into the contract, by which the Minister of Finance could compel the contractors to do this work in the city of Ottawa. That option, however, was not put into force, it was put in as a principle into the contract, but the option was not exercised. At that time, in 1881, a step was taken in cheapening the cost of notes and such supplies to the Dominion, not so much in the actual rates which ruled before in the case of bank notes, as to the number of impressions which were to be taken from each plate, which, of course, operates in the way of cheapening the product. The number of impressions which were to be taken under that contract of 1881, was raised from 25,000 and 15,000 respectively, to 30,000 impressions from the first plate, and 25,000 from the plate retouched, that is, giving 55,000 impressions in all. That contract term ran out in 1886, and another contract was entered into. Under this contract there were absolute reductions in the rates to a very large extent, running, if we speak in the gross, up to about 15 per cent of the work so far as bank notes and inland revenue stamps were concerned, and a reduction of about 30 per cent in postal stamps and supplies. In that year, 1886, the option was exercised, and the condition was made absolute that the contractor should provide a suitable home for this work in the city of Ottawa, and that the work should thereafter be carried on in the city of Ottawa close to the supervising department. In 1892 came the period of another renewal of the contract. Tenders were asked for, the whole matter was gone into exhaustively in the department, and as a result, the work was given to the British American Bank Note Company, the same concern which had done the work for all these past years of which I have been speaking. In 1892 great reductions also were made in the rates which were paid for the work, and to establish the point which I have been making that these reductions went on from time to time as circumstances permitted, I desire to state from a report by the Deputy Minister of Finance, what were the principal reductions made in the contract of 1892:

In the case of the notes supplied to this department, the cost of the $1 notes was reduced from $104 a thousand to $91.31; the cost of the $2 notes, from $126.50 to $109.04, and of the $4 notes, from $113.75 to $97.54. Similar large reductions were made in the cost of the postal and inland revenue supplies. Thus, postage stamps were reduced from 20 cents to 13 cents per thousand; registration stamps, from 40 cents to 28 cents; post cards, from $1 to 80 cents or 90 cents, dependent upon whether Canadian or imported stock was used; reply cards, from $3.25 to $2.75 or $1.50, dependent on the quality of the card.

In law stamps, in post bands, in gas and weights and measure stamps, in tobacco stamps, and all other stamps for the Inland Revenue Department, a large and substantial reduction was made. Improvements were made in the methods of manufacture, improvements in prices were made, and these improvements following in direct line with cheapening of manufacture meant that substantial reductions were effected. So much then for the history of the bank note work from the time of confederation up to the present with respect to those two lines: (1). The plan upon which the Government acted of having the work done in Canada and by Canadians, and of drawing it continually closer and closer under the supervision of the Department of Finance; and (2) the gradual and substantial reductions which took place in connection with the price for the work.

This work of printing the bank notes and other like kinds of work has been always carried on under very definite and plain conditions, and I wish to indicate some of the principal conditions of the contract which expired by notice given on 23rd April of this year, these conditions being found on page 3 of the blue-book brought down. In the first place, it was a condition of the tender, and of the specification assented to, for the contract is based upon the specification, that the contractor was to engrave, print, furnish and deliver all the Dominion notes, postage stamps and revenue stamps; the Government of Canada, on its part, agreeing to employ the company to perform all the work which the said Government may require during the period covered by the agreement; and that the work to be done—the engraving, printing and delivery—should be done at Ottawa, in such building as should be approved by the Government of Canada—fire-proof building, all safeguards considered necessary being applied. The conditions of the work are outlined with definiteness and clearness, and a general supervisory power is given to the Minister of Finance, to the Postmaster General and to the Controller of Inland Revenue in each case to see that the supplies are up to the requirements in quality and in every other respect, each of these Ministers having arbitrary power to reject supplies which did not come up to the standard of quality or in other respects as required. Those conditions have been very well understood: that the whole of the work should be done at Ottawa, that the Government should give all its work to that contractor, and that there should be this supervisory power and general power to a certain extent on the part of the Ministers so that the grade and quality should be kept up to the specifications and terms of the contract.

That brings us to the consideration of the present case. The contract entered into in 1892 was made for five years, and the period expired on 23rd April, 1897. The contract was to expire at that time if six months' notice were given by the Minister of Finance. If six months' notice had not been given in advance, then the contract would expire on six months' notice having been given either by the Minister of Finance or by the contractor, each in his several interest. The notice was given on 26th September, 1896, by the Finance Minister, and the British American Bank Note Company received notification that on 23rd April next the contract would expire. Just about that time the British American Bank Note Company, through the president of the company, invited the Finance Minister, who, presumably, had the larger interest in this matter and who was the person who had under his charge the arrangement of the contract, to go down to the place of the manufacture of the bank notes and stamps and look at the establishment, as he might wish to see something of the method and manner in which this work was executed. This was almost a necessary condition, because no Finance Minister or any other Minister possesses the least knowledge of the technique of this branch of the business, and unless he makes himself acquainted with it in a practical way by actually visiting the establishment and seeing just how the work is carried on, it is impossible for any man, I do not care how intelligent he may be, to approach the subject from the point of sufficient information. So the president of the British American Bank Note Company courteously invited the Minister of Finance to visit and inspect the establishment. The invitation was acknowledged by the Finance Minister, as the papers show, but, so far as I know, he never put his head inside the doors of the establishment. This invitation was given by the British American Bank Note Company on 16th October. On 19th October the Finance Minister called for tenders, getting an Order in Council on his report authorizing him to give notice for the termination of the old contract and to call for tenders for a new contract. Tenders were called for on 19th October, and the specification will be found on page 15 of the blue-book, and it would be well that hon. members should pay attention to the specifications, because they are the basis of the whole business, they are the pledge of good faith between the power asking for the contract and the parties who are tendering for the contract; and when these specifications are definitely stated it is a rule, and I think a wholesome rule, that these specifications, which are the basis of the contract, are as much a pledge between the parties as they would be between man and man, and which should be thoroughly, absolutely and definitely observed; or, if they are not definite, and at any stage of the progress of negotiations the contracting power finds it is in the interest of the Government to make a change in the specifications, then it is the absolute duty of the contracting power to give the same information to every one of the tenderers as he does to any one of the tenderers. What were the specifications? The specifications stated what was to be tendered for, as follows:—

Engraving, printing, furnishing and delivering to the Government of Canada, as and when required during the period and on the terms and conditions hereinafter set forth:

- A. Dominion notes;
- B. Postage stamps, stamped envelopes, post and letter cards and post bands;
- C. Inland revenue stamps.

That was the work to be done, and the House will see that it takes in all the work, exactly on the lines which have been followed up since confederation, exactly on the line of previous tenders, exactly on the line of previous contracts, and no person who had had any knowledge of the previous history of tendering for this branch of the Dominion's work, had the least doubt but that these words meant exactly what they stated, and what they included, namely, that the work, and all of the work, should be done in the city of Ottawa. That was an essential basis in the calling of the tenders. The usual five years' term was fixed as the period during which this contract was to continue. Section 7 goes on to state:

All work under the contract—

That is the engraving, and printing, and delivering, and so forth.

All work under the contract shall be done at the city of Ottawa in such building or buildings as are approved of by the Government of Canada. * * * No contract shall be entered into with any tenderer until he has satisfied the said Government of Canada that he has, or will have by the time he begins the work under the contract, a proper building or buildings in Ottawa in which to carry on the work under the contract.

The usual precautionary clauses are put in the specifications, and they agree very nearly with the specifications of the preceding tender, and terms of the preceding contract. Section 22 declares: That there should be a deposit for bona fides of $5,000, and a deposit of $50,000 to remain in the hands of the Government at interest for the due execution of the work. There was also the usual clause 23: That the Government of Canada does not bind itself to accept the lowest or any tender; leaving itself entirely free at any stage of the negotiations to act as it considered in the best interests of the country.

So much then for the specifications upon which the present tenders were called.

Now, I do not know exactly for what purpose or with what aim, but the fact is, that when these tenders were asked for the area of the call was made very wide indeed, and these specifications were sent to Great Britain, to the United States, and to Canada. At pages 20 and 21 of the papers brought down will be found a list of the firms and companies to whom these specifications were sent, ostensibly with the view of giving them information so that they might tender for this work on the basis as set out in the specifications. Numbers of these were sent to London, and the letter of the Minister of Finance accompanying them is as follows:—

Finance Department,
Ottawa, 22nd October, 1896.

J. G. Colmer, Esq.,
Canadian Government Offices,
17 Victoria Street, London.

Dear Mr. Colmer,—I send you a dozen copies of a circular in relation to our new contract for engraving and printing the Dominion notes, postage and inland revenue stamps. I think it is hardly probable that we shall have any tenders from parties in England, but I am desirous of having the contract made known as widely as possible to parties in the trade. I shall, therefore, be obliged if you will cause these circulars to be sent immediately to the leading houses in England in that line of business.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) W. S. FIELDING,
Minister of Finance.

Mr. Colmer followed out the instructions to the letter, and in a communication to Mr. Fielding he details the corporations, and firms, and parties to whom he sent the circulars. Immediately following upon that came inquiry from some of the firms, as to whether or not the stipulation in clause 7: that the work shall be done in Ottawa; was to be firmly adhered to, and, in furtherance of that inquiry, Mr. Colmer sent the following telegram to the Finance Department:

Tenders for engraving. Firms point restrictions clause seven manufacture Canada. Also state tenders impossible without specimens mentioned clause fourteen.

The specimens referred to were specimens of stamps and the like of that. To that the Minister of Finance replied:

Tenders for engraving. Cannot abandon condition requiring manufacture at Ottawa. If responsible parties wish to tender, we will send specimens.

The answer of the Finance Minister to the English inquirers is firm and decided, that this work must be done at Ottawa. That, as Mr. Colmer says a little later on, cut out all the English firms from attempting to tender. They had not their engravers and their machinery over here, and they had no buildings to carry on this work in the city of Ottawa. There was also a tender received from a firm in Toronto, Barber & Ellis, and that firm also made inquiry as to whether any of the conditions in the specifications would likely be relaxed. What they wished to have relaxed, was, not the condition that the work should be performed at Ottawa, but the condition as respects the $50,000 deposit. Their argument was that it would require $50,000 to put up an establishment, and then, if the firm had to deposit $50,000 in hard cash with the Government, that that was an outlay of $100,000 which was pretty nearly equivalent to a year's work. The Barber & Ellis Co. signified their intention of tendering, but they wanted the restrictions relaxed to the extent, that they would be allowed to give undoubted personal security of some kind, instead of depositing the $50,000 cash. To that, the Minister of Finance was equally firm as he was in reference to the inquiries from London, and his letter in reply emphasizes it, and declaring that this is a very special and important work, he says:

The engraving contract is one which, from its nature, can only be undertaken by persons having a considerable amount of capital, and who are able to assure the Government of their thorough responsibility; therefore, it is necessary to impose conditions different from those which apply to ordinary contracts.

The Minister there declares that these restrictions and conditions of the specifications cannot be departed from. He is firm with the London inquirers; he is equally firm with the Toronto inquirers.

This brings the matter to another stage; that is the stage when the tenders were received. These tenders were advertised to be in on the 23rd of November, and on the 23rd of November, whether at 12 noon or at any other hour during the day I cannot glean from the papers, but presumably at the hour of 12 noon, three tenders were in. One was an irregular tender; why? For the reason that there was no deposit. That was from the Barber & Ellis Company. They were quite willing to make the deposit of $5,000 for bona fides, and they were willing to put up any amount of satisfactory personal security for the due performance of the work; but they were not willing to deposit the $50,000 with the Receiver General. That tender, then—number one, we will call it—was ruled out because it did not conform with the specifications. There was another one which did not conform with the specifications: that was the tender from the American Bank Note Company, which has its headquarters in the city of New York, with reference to the history of which, and the bona fides of which, and the large operations of which it is not necessary for me to say anything at this stage of the matter. Now, the Barber & Ellis tender was ruled out because it was informal, in that it did not comply with one of the specifications, the specifications being in their principal conditions such as I have read to the House. The American Bank Note

Company's tender was informal in a much more essential condition than the Barber & Ellis tender; why? The Barber & Ellis Company were willing to do all the work in Ottawa, willing to put up their building, willing to do everything except put up this deposit of $50,000 in cash, instead of which they wished to give undoubted and sufficient personal security; but their tender was informal, and was ruled out. The American Bank Note Company's tender was informal in this condition, that it entirely overrode the basis of the whole specification, which was that the work should be done in the city of Ottawa, and they added a rider in these words:

The American Bank Note Company understands and makes it a part of this tender that it is not required by the specifications hereto attached to manufacture bank note and other papers, steel rolls, steel plates, the dies and other tools of the trade, inks, colours, &c., in the city of Ottawa, but that such supplies necessary to the faithful fulfilment of the contract may be obtained elsewhere.

Now, Sir, I make bold to state that there was not an employee in the Finance Department, or a gentleman in Canada who has had any knowledge of the history of the bank note work of this country from 1867, who did not know absolutely and positively, in reading these specifications, that they called for all the work, and that that was the essential condition insisted upon from confederation—insisted upon when in 1886 the old contractors were forced to come to Ottawa and place their capital and large plant in a new building here. But the American Bank Note Company simply said to themselves, as they said afterwards to the Minister: "No, we cannot comply with that condition; if you enforce it, we cannot take this contract, and therefore we put this rider in, that we shall not be obliged to conform with that basic specification, but that we shall be allowed to do this work in New York, and bring it in here." The American Bank Note Company, if they be not a firm of lawyers, have graduated somewhere very near to a lawyer's office. They are skilled casuists, altogether too skilled for my simple and unsuspecting friend the Minister of Finance. With extreme skillfulness and shrewdness they expressed their contentions, as mild-looking as though there were no harm in them; but they were accomplishing the deadly business they were after, of doing none of the essential work in the city of Ottawa. "It is not required," they say, "by the specifications hereto attached, to manufacture bank note and other papers." No one ever thought it was, no one ever said it was. "Steel rolls." No one ever thought it was, no one ever said it was, if they were plain rolls. "Steel plates." No one ever thought it was, no one ever said it was, if they were blank plates. And here is where the astuteness comes in. "The dies and other tools." They slide right over the dies as if they were on a descent of glare ice, and they get to the tools as quickly as they can, as if they were no distinction between dies and tools. An engraver's chisel is a tool, but the design which he transfers by months of hard work and an accumulation of skill which can only be learned by years of practice, is the essential thing in the work. But that, say this company, is only a tool, like the engraver's tool. The dies and other tools are to be got in New York or wherever else they can be got most cheaply. When that casuist sentence came before the Finance Minister, he was a little troubled in his conscience. He took the precaution of having a report upon these tenders from the Deputy Minister, who, from the time he has been in office in this country, has been contemporaneous with this work, and has known everything in connection with it. Now, I want the House to attend to the report of the Deputy Minister of Finance, who with the officers of his department—good officers who are used to making that kind of calculations—moneyed out, as it were, the tender. On the face of it the report of these officers is this: that the old contract totalled up to $123,000; that the present contractor's figures amount to $128,843, about $5,843 more, while the American Bank Note Company quoted prices equivalent to $99,646, a difference of more than 20 per cent in favour of their offer. That struck the Deputy Minister as being peculiar. If the Deputy Minister had been as new a comer in that department as the Finance Minister, it would not have struck him as being peculiar. But it so happened that when the contract of 1892 was being made, the Deputy Minister had to make certain calculations and researches, and he made them. When he finds that $99,646 is the tender of the American Bank Note Company, he feels moved in spirit to comment upon those figures, which he does as follows:—

This difference is so great that the undersigned deems it advisable to make some remarks thereon, and while he is unable fully to understand the reasons for it, he considers it might arise from various causes. In the first place, the new tenderers—the American Bank Note Company—may possibly think that they would be able to make up the difference by the increased rates at which they tender for supplies that are not generally in demand. If the contract is awarded to them, this feature should be kept in mind and carefully guarded against.

That is a very wise suggestion. It is what would immediately strike a professional man who was looking into this matter and trying to get at the bottom of it. He then goes on to say:

Further, a very great difference between theirs and the tender of the British American Bank Note Company arises in the prices given for printing notes.

Now, mind, not for engraving the plates but for printing the notes.

Seeing there is such a manifest difference between the two tenderers on this item, the undersigned thinks some inquiries should be made through some expert, and he would suggest that the matter be submitted to the Queen's Printer, in order to ascertain whether the tender of the American Bank Note Company is one that can be carried out successfully, seeing they may have tendered at the unremunerative price in order to secure a foothold in the country.

Now, that is a very pregnant remark, and why is it made. It is made from previous knowledge. The Deputy Minister goes on to say :

In connection with the foregoing the undersigned begs to point out that at the time the present contract was entered into, full and explicit inquiries were made as to the rates of the American Bank Note Company, and also as to the charges made by the British American Bank Note Company to the chief monetary institutions in Canada ; and in one case the department was allowed access to the bills rendered for printing notes for the institution in question by the British American Company. The result of the inquiries proved that the rates charged to the Government for this class of work were in no sense larger than for the institution in question, and were not then higher than the rates quoted by the American Bank Note Company. The account rendered to the institution in question is now in the possession of this department. It can hardly be possible that since the present contract was entered into prices for the work have fallen to such an extent as the rates offered by the American Bank Note Company would lead one to believe. Indeed, from the tender of the present contractors, it would appear that it was found necessary to raise the rates in some lines in the offer now submitted. Accordingly, it would appear that other reasons exist than those pointed out inducing the American Bank Note Company to tender at rates so much lower than now paid.

Before entering into a contract with this company, if it be intended to do so, the undersigned respectfully suggests that care should be taken, and a distinct understanding arrived at, that no safeguard observed by the present contractors in conducting the business should be omitted in executing the work under the new contract. In this regard the undersigned may state that very great care is taken by the British American Bank Note Company for the custody and safe-keeping of our notes when in course of preparation.

He goes on to state what preparations are taken, and then adds :

Should the Government decide to enter into an agreement with the American Bank Note Company, it would appear to be desirable to bear in mind also that the institution is an alien corporation, and the officers who would in all probability conduct the business with the Government and carry out the orders, would probably come here from New York. In this connection the undersigned has to call attention to the condition appended to their tender that they are not to be required to manufacture bank note and other papers, steel rolls, steel plates, the dies and other tools of their trade, inks, colours, &c., at Ottawa, but may obtain elsewhere such supplies necessary to a faithful fulfilment of their contract. This would appear to allow them to do a large portion of their work in New York, and is a feature of the offer which seems to require very careful consideration, and while nothing is stated definitely on the point, the undersigned presumes the company took into consideration that they would have to pay customs duties on all dutiable articles brought into Canada.

And lastly, and most important for the House to bear in mind, he says :

The undersigned would further add that a contract with a new company would necessarily entail an immediate outlay for designs, rolls and dies—

Not tools—the Deputy Minister did not think they were tools —necessary in the preparation of the new plates required. It would, in fact, entail all the expense attaching to the preparation of new notes and stamps. This of course would be unnecessary if the work remained in the hands of the present contractors, and this extra expense has not been taken into consideration in comparing the tenders. Undoubtedly, it would seem that even with this taken into consideration the tender of the American Bank Note Company is much lower than that of the British American Bank Note Company.

That I consider to be a very fair, a very judicious and a very pregnant report. Well, the hon. Finance Minister read that report, and what did he do ? Here was a company—and I believe my statement will be acceded to by every unprejudiced gentleman who reads it or who hears it—here was a company, one of the tenderers, which wished to have its tender accepted, although it had specifically ignored the basic consideration of the tender, namely, that the work of engraving and the preparation of these plates should be done in the city of Ottawa. The hon. Minister could not accept the Barber & Ellis tender because the $50,000 were not deposited, although personal security, undoubtedly satisfactory, would be given. On that ground he ruled it out. He could not allow the London men the tender because the work must be done in Ottawa ; but when he has got the tenders before him, and he finds that this American Bank Note Company had put in a tender ignoring the specific and most important clause in the specification, what does he do ? Does he call for new tenders ? Not at all. Does he call the three tenderers together and enter into communication with them and give them all an equal chance ? No, he studiously ignores the British American Bank Note Company, one of the tenderers, whose tender was perfect in every respect, whose tender complied in every respect with the specifications, who had deposited the $5,000 and had agreed to put up the $50,000 with the Receiver General. He passes over that, he ignores the other two tenderers entirely, and he enters into communication with the American Bank Note Company. The British American Bank Note Company were within the sound of his whistle ; the American Bank Note Company were in New York and an alien corporation. He will not have a word to say to the Canadian organization when the essential basis of the contract is ignored entirely by the American company, but enters into communication with the latter. He goes on to state in a letter written immediately, the 14th of December, to Mr. Freeland, the secretary of the American Bank Note Company :

Dear Sir,—Referring to your company's tender for engraving and printing the Canadian Government notes and stamps, there are one or two points upon which we require some additional information.

1. In conversation with you, I understood you to say that your company would be as well pleased if the stamped envelopes were withdrawn from the proposed contract. I shall be glad to have from you a confirmation of this statement.

Now, Sir, the very moment that it was mooted that these tenders were called for, that very moment constant and continuous personal communication was had between the American Bank Note Company and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) here in Ottawa and in New York ; but not one word, not one item of interview or conversation could the British American Bank Note contractor have with the Minister of Finance. Will the House please note what this clause that I have just read means ? When all the other contractors from confederation up, when the other two tenderers in this case, gave in their tenders upon remunerative and unremunerative work equally and submitted the whole tender, why was it that the Minister of Finance was forward to intimate to the American Bank Note Company that the one unremunerative part of their tender might be dropped, and they not called upon to carry out ? Stamped envelopes have not gained great currency in this country on account, I suppose, of their lack of cheapness. The machine to make stamped envelopes will cost from $5,000 to $7,000. The profit in making stamped envelopes that are used from year to year in this country will not more than pay the interest on the cost of the plant, and so that is not a remunerative part of the contract. The Finance Minister suggests that this may be dropped out of the American Bank Note Company's contract, and that the Queen's Printer may do this work. If the Queen's Printer is to do it, the Government must supply the Queen's Printer with $6,000 worth of machinery, which will be left for all time to come entirely unremunerative. It is a most singular thing that they should be dropped out, and that this intimation should come from the Minister of Finance. But it did.

2. In the case of a number of inland revenue stamps, the prices are abnormally high.

I should think they were abnormally high in the offer of the American Bank Note Company—sometimes ten times as large as the tender of the British American Bank Note Company. Chewing tobacco stamps are $100 per thousand ; snuff, under 40 per cent, $57.06 per thousand ; law stamps, $72.34 per thousand. And the Minister says these prices are abnormally high. He said :

I find, however, that the quantities of these stamps hitherto used and consequently made the basis of our estimates as given in the specifications, have been quite small. I can understand that if only these quantities are required, the price on which you tender must be made high enough to include the cost of engraving. This price, while it might be reasonable as applied to a small quantity, would be excessive in the event of a large quantity being required.

But, by the Minister's own admission, a large quantity is not required.

It is possible that, owing to the changes in our revenue laws, some of these stamps may be used in larger quantities.

And he asks him to amend his tender with reference to these items for larger quantities if they should be necessary. But now follows the important point.

3. I desire to call your attention to the following paragraph in your tender :—

“ The American Bank Note Company understands and makes it a part of this tender that it is not required by the specifications hereto attached to manufacture bank note and other papers, steel rolls, steel plates, the dies and other tools of the trade, inks, colours, &c., in the city of Ottawa, but that such supplies necessary to a faithful fulfilment of the contract may be obtained elsewhere.”

I think it would be well—

How mildly the hon. Minister corresponds with this favoured company.

I think it would be well for you to offer some explanation of this clause. Our specifications were not intended to prevent the importation of paper, ink, colours, &c., &c., or the ordinary—

That is a good word.

—ordinary tools of the engraving trade. Nor were they intended to prevent the importation of steel rolls or steel plates where such rolls or plates are of a plain character, without any engraving, impression or other such work. The only point in which your condition seems to conflict—

He does not like to put it too rawly or too roughly by saying that they do conflict——with the terms of our specifications is in respect of the dies. If you attach importance to the making of these outside of the Dominion of Canada, I shall be obliged if you will furnish me with fuller information on the subject. Our chief purpose in requiring the work of this contract to be done in Ottawa is that it may be performed by workmen in an establishment coming immediately under the supervision of this department, with a view to the greatest possible security against loss or fraud. I shall be pleased to receive any information you may be able to furnish as to the circumstances which in your judgment require these dies to be made abroad.

Yours very truly,

W. S. FIELDING,

Minister of Finance.

Now, I take it that that letter is an invitation, couched in the most alluring terms, to Mr. Freeland to make good his case, and an invitation that if done in a plausible way, it would be admitted. Mr. Freeland is ready for the occasion, and he does not allow many hours to pass until he indites a letter and sends it back saying :

First. That we confirm your understanding that the company would be as well pleased if the stamped envelopes were withdrawn from the proposed contract.

Why shouldn't they ? There is nothing in it for them. New machinery would have to be brought and kept, and the best they could get out of it would be the interest on the cost of it—nothing to be made. Yes, they say, we would be pleased if you would just withdraw that from the contract.

Second. In compliance with your request that we furnish a statement of the terms on which we will supply certain inland revenue stamps in larger quantities, if required, we would say that, over and above the quantities of same in the printed specifications, and multiplied by 5, on which, on November 23rd, 1896, is based, we will supply from the same plates at the following rates per 1,000 stamps for the term of the contract.

And they give a schedule of prices. I will not go into that.

Third.—

This is the important point.

Third. We are pleased to know that our understanding of the printed specifications is correct, as to obtaining elsewhere papers, inks, colours, or the ordinary tools of the engraving trade, steel rolls and steel plates ; as the language of the specifications is such that a different construction might have been intended ; and stating also that the only point in which our conditions seem to conflict with the terms of the specifications is in respect to the dies, and asking, if we attach any importance to the making of these outside of Canada, to give fuller information on the subject.

Then follows the information.

But, Sir, one of the aims of this present Government from 1878 up, and of the old Government preceding it, was to cultivate and establish here in the Dominion of Canada a force of men of sufficient skill and sufficient working power to make for us our currency in the engraving and in the mechanical execution as well. The mechanical execution, when you have the machine and the machine-like men, is nothing compared with that skilful and ingenious and unfrequent talent of doing the nice work of the engraver, of being able to design for yourself, transfer that design to the steel and make the dies. What follows after that is all mechanical. If the Minister of Finance does not know that, five minutes spent in the establishment will tell him that the work after the design is on the steel, is mechanical. The die is, if hon. gentlemen know it, and most of them do, I suppose—I am sorry that I have not one here—the die is the first product of the engraver's skill. He makes his design, be it a beautiful maiden, or a ship at sea, or some pregnant ideal. The engraver goes to work with his plates, his steel, and the tools of his trade, and he transfers that image or design, by patient work, taking from two to eight weeks to perform it properly, and at a cost which will run from $150 to $1,000 for the skilled work alone of transferring that to the steel, which is the die. After that all you have to do is to harden the die, transfer it to the soft steel roll, and transfer that again, by the same mechanical process to the plate, and then print off your stamps, bills or whatever they are. The essential work is done by the engraver, but this product of the engraver is simply a tool of the trade, according to the argument of Mr. Freeland, which has been admitted by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. But, Sir, from the moment that the New York concern got the Minister's consent to have that work done in New York, from that very moment there is no heart or soul in that business in Canada, there is simply the work of a machine which turns off from the die, which is the product of the engraver's skill, simply the mechanical product. Well, they go on to argue that out. I could follow their argument, but I will not. It is apparent to every member of this House that a die is not a tool of the trade, and does not belong to that category. What do they say ? Enough to make the Finance Minister's blood boil, or ought to have made it boil, at least :

It being this company's intention to prepare the work in the highest style of the art, the limitation of the use of such talent as is procurable within the Dominion, would be detrimental to our intention. Such talent is not resident in Canada, nor obtainable in the market, while the portrait, vignette and lathe work engravers of the parent establishment could be employed here with much greater efficiency, each in their several branches, in executing the original and preparatory work, immediately under the personal supervision of the officers of the company ; nor would it be wise to dismount and move to Ottawa the extremely delicate machinery which we propose to use, for the short term of five or six months required to produce all the original dies and matrices for the entire contract term of five years.

I ask the members of this House to examine the work of their Dominion bills, to examine the work of the bank bills of this country, to go down to that establishment and examine the dies and the prints from them, and to say whether there is talent in Canada, and resident to-day in Ottawa, which is able to do fine work. I say that the Finance Department had found no fault, I say that the style of the art is good, equally as good in quality, it is well executed, and there are native Canadians to-day doing that work in that establishment, and who can successfully compete with the men in the parent establishment in the city of New York. But, Sir, it is not for the Finance Minister of this country, when he is engaged in the important work of seeing how the money currency of this country should be made and where, to be swift to depreciate the talent of his own country, and to make a contract which eats out all the ambition, all the heart, and the whole kernel of the work, so far as skill and artistic ability are concerned, and leave the mechanical shell for Canada and for Ottawa. Then he says :

It might be well to state the company's intention more in detail, with the paragraph in question made a part of the proposed contract.

I want you to note that, because when you come to the contract, you will find it is not in it.

It is our intention to submit a model, or models, of each instrument, note, stamp or card, exhibiting the same just as it will appear when printed from the engraved plate, for the approval of the Government, and, upon approval of the same, to engrave in the parent establishment—

That is in New York.

—the original dies of portraits, vignettes, lathe work, borders, &c., with which the matrix die of each note or stamp will be partially prepared, carrying same to Ottawa for finishing.

What finishing? Simply assembling or putting together, and then lettering in the name of the bank, or the name of the note, that is all. The whole of the important work has been done before they are assembled together.

All the transferring—

Simply the mechanical operation. Here is your round roll of soft steel, here is your die, and you put it in place, apply the pressure, roll it two or three times, and you have a transfer from the die to the roll. There is the work, but it is simply mechanical.

We might add, that no Canadian labour would be displaced by our so doing, as the labour employed heretofore in making such original engravings, in our opinion, has been largely that of non-residents.

Now, that is an imputation which is not true. In the early history of engraving, outside labour had to be obtained; but in the course of the work our own Canadian people have come to learn it, and to become adepts in it; and it is an imputation which I, for one, am not going to take from Mr. Freeland or any other alien who wants to get a contract. But he puts in another memorandum, and he goes into it still more closely, and he says now :

But, desirous of meeting your wishes, we modify the seemingly objectionable paragraph so that it may read, "partially engraved dies." And to prevent misunderstanding as to the meaning of the word "partially," we will prepare here the different pieces composing the details of the different dies, transfer them to what we may term the matrix dies—those from which the rolls are taken that make the plates—put in such work as may interlace with the several pieces, but always leave some portion of these matrix dies unengraved, and transporting them to Ottawa, finish and harden them there, and do all the balance of the work in Ottawa.

Which means, when translated into English, that nine hundred and ninety-nine thousandths of the work is done in New York, and that simply the assembling of the parts and some little lettering have to be done after they are put into the plate in Canada. He says here :

At our interview on Monday it was stated that the present contractor intended to purchase $20,000 worth of machinery.

That sentence just opens the light upon—what? Upon the fact that not only was the Finance Minister willing to interview, and to talk, and converse with the American Bank Note Company, and be willing to use the correspondence of the British American Bank Note Company in his conversation, but he was not willing to ask Mr. Burland, who is president of the American Bank Note Company, if that Bank Note Company had any other proposition to make. Now, they say :

But, desirous to meet your wishes, we modify the seemingly objectionable paragraph so that it may read, "partially engraved dies."

Let us go to the contract; the contract reads this way :

That the original dies of portraits, vignettes, lathe work, borders and other patterns or designs, and the matrix dies used in connection with any work under this agreement, may be engraved at the establishment of the contractors in the city of New York, in the State of New York, one of the United States of America.

No partially engraved dies in the contract. Willing to meet their wishes in a letter, but when it comes to the contract, the contract is absolute and gives them the whole power, the word "partially" being left entirely out. Now, I think I have made it pretty plain as regards the conditions and specifications. What happened after that? Well, Sir, on the 5th of January, directly after this correspondence, the Minister is convinced by that letter and memorandum, and he telegraphs to the American Bank Note Company that he is willing to recommend the acceptance of their tender, provided the details can be arranged to his satisfaction. The hon. gentleman then goes to Council and reports, and on the 7th of the month he gets an Order in Council passed, on his report, authorizing him to do that, if the details are arranged to the satisfaction of the Finance Minister. Until he obtained that authority, he never opened his lips, nor had the department any communication with the British American Bank Note Company. After he had committed himself thoroughly to the American company, after this correspondence and after the hon. gentleman had received the power, then he wrote a letter to the British American Bank Company returning the $5,000 deposit and stating, we have had a better offer and we return your deposit. I say what should have been done by the hon. gentleman, as hon. gentlemen opposite are anxious that Canadian labour, enterprise and skill shall be assisted in this country, was when the essential conditions of the specifications were ignored by the American Company, to have asked the British American Bank Note Company and the Barber-Ellis Company whether they had any propositions to make. The hon. gentleman did not do it. He simply cavalierly ignored the establishment which has done work since 1868 to the satisfaction of the Dominion, and he never opened communication with that company until he had received and accepted an irregular tender and had committed himself to the American Company. When that occurred Mr. Burland, as president of the British Bank Note Company, wrote to the Minister and asked for an interview, at the same time asking whether a plan he was prepared to submit could not be admitted; and stating that rather than the work should go out of Canada, he would be prepared to do it in his own establishment at the same rates as those offered by the American Bank Note Company. This was on 15th January, and at that time there was no Order in Council passed, and there was no contract entered into, there was no purchase by the new company, there was nothing to prevent the Finance Minister at that period of the negotiations accepting the offer of the British American Bank Note Company at the reduced rates, thus allowing the work to be done here in Canada. My hon. friend the Finance Minister will argue: I could not honourably do that. Why not? If the Barber-Ellis tender was ruled out for informality, much more should he have ruled out the American Bank Note Company's tender for informality. The only formal tender was that of the British American Bank Note Company. The hon. gentleman ignored that, and entered into communications with the other company. The contract was not authorized to be executed by Council until April 5th, and the contract was not indentured until March 9th, whilst on January 15th Mr. Burland's offer on behalf of the British American Bank Note Company, was before the Minister, offering to do the work at the same rate as those offered by the American Bank Note Company. There is another phase of the question. What is that? What was mentioned by the Deputy Minister of Finance. It is true that on the fact of it the tender for the work was $128,000 by the British American Bank Note Company, and $99,900 odd by the American Bank Note Company, but that does not take into account the charge for engraving. What is meant by that? Simply this. If the British American Bank Note Company's tender had been accepted, every die which was necessary for the printing of the bank notes of the revenue stamps and postage stamps, having been made and stored, and being to-day in store in that establishment, would not have cost the Government a single cent. When the old company is thrown aside and the new company comes in, the latter has to recoup itself for the engraving of every bank note and revenue and postage stamp, and so they have to be paid at high rates for engraving the dies and making plates. What does that amount to? It reaches a large sum. Let me point out this fact. The American Bank Note Company has obtained this contract on the ground of paying a less amount for workmanship. Let us see how the figures stand. Here is a statement showing the difference in cost of engraving between the American Company and British American Bank Note Company:

	American Prices.	Brit. Am. Prices.
$1 Notes—
Face plate.....	$ 250 00	$ 300 00
Back .....	125 00	100 00
Retouching, one-half price	187 50	200 00
Tint plates for patent green	687 50	412 50
	$1,250 00	$1,012 50

Difference in cost of engraving 9 sets of plates, per annum, $2,137.50.

Difference in cost of engraving five and one-quarter years' supply, $11,221.38.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Take the engraving and printing together.

Mr. FOSTER. I am dealing with the matter in my own way, and I leave it to the House to say whether I am treating it fairly or not. What does the hon. Minister of Finance consider unfair?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not complain; but the hon. gentleman is taking one part of the work, which happens to be at low prices and makes a comparison with higher prices for that particular class of work. He should take all branches of the work together, and give the House the total sum. That is what we have to deal with.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman object to my taking a different course?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman does not take the total.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask my hon. friend if he will allow his hon. friend to finish his statement. I propose to do this in my own way, for the sake of conciseness. I am only afraid I will not be able to bring out everything.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am afraid you will not.

Mr. FOSTER. Then as regards $2 and $4 notes, the following are the figures—

	American Prices.	Brit. Am. Prices.

Now, if you come to the Inland Revenue stamps, you will find that the same difference exists, only accentuated, because the prices of the American company for engraving are still higher in comparison. Let me give the difference in favour of the Canadian company for the five and one-quarter years' supplies of Inland Revenue stamps, in the matter of engraving alone. The saving is, as compared with the American company, $5,397.97, so that there is altogether about $24,000, in which, on the matter of the engraving alone, the tender of the British American Company is lower than the tender of the American company. Now, the point I wish to make, and the reason I take these separately, is this: I make a distinction between the skilled work and the mechanical work. I say that the skilled work is the heart and soul of this business, and on the skilled work or engraving, the British American company is $24,000 less for the five and one-quarter years' term of the contract, than the American company. What did the Deputy Minister say in his report? He intimated that they got this contract by making a cut rate on the mechanical work. Now, you take the printing, and there is where the American company got in their work. They are lower on the printing, on the simple mechanical work, and lower by a great deal; but there are some things to be considered in that as well. There are the qualities, and the costs of paper to be considered, and whether the American company will give and can be got to give the same quality and price of paper, that the Canadian company has given, upon which it tendered. There is this other consideration: The bank note printing of this country has always been done by hand. The bank note printing in Washington was done by hand, but machine work was afterwards substituted, and the machine work was all sent out, and it is now again done by hand work. Every man knows that hand work is much more costly than machine work. Are they going to do their bank note printing by machine or by hand? The British American Company tendered on the ground of doing it by hand work, as they had always done it, and the least that could have been done in the course of these negotiations, when the formal tenders were before the Minister would be, to take both into his confidence and find out in reference to those matters, and whether the cost would be reduced by the British American Company, in the line of printing, and of cost of paper and the like of that. What does my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) find fault with? I read the totals for engraving and printing, and showed that the American company was cheaper by 20 per cent. But, I have made this point, and it is a point which should have been made: That on the life and soul and essence of the work, the engraving, the Canadian company, made up of Canadian citizens, Canadian stockholders and Canadian workmen, tendered $24,000 lower for the five and one-quarter years than did the American company.

Now, Sir, I do not intend to go very much further with reference to this. My view has been to make a statement, what I think is a fair and adequate statement—maybe not adequate—but a fair and honest statement of the facts as they are here. Let them be faced. If this Parliament is willing to hand over this work to an alien corporation which has no entity in this country, and which has to get an entity by forcing a Bill through this Parliament in order to give it the same rights as it has in the city of New York, a company in which there is not a single Canadian, in which the capital is alien and the labour alien, if this Parliament is willing to face that condition of things and to close up one of our Canadian industries, which has done the work to the satisfaction of the department, and the country, let them face the whole facts of the case, and let them vote upon it with the facts before them. To my mind, Sir, certain things are patent in this whole matter. The Minister of Finance, from the very beginning ignored the Canadian company. He treated them with scant courtesy. He did not deign to visit the establishment and make himself acquainted with the technique of the work, which would have been of great advantage to him. He handed down his specifications, and proclaimed in London and in Toronto and in Ottawa that the conditions could not be departed from, and that the work had to be done in Ottawa. He received only one formal and complete tender; that of the British American Company. He received two informal tenders, one without the deposit of $50,000, the other with a rider that all engraving that should have been done in Ottawa be cut out and sent to New York. He ignored the formal and perfect tender and he did not even communicate with that tenderer, but undertook to communicate with the American and alien company to the end, that he gives way to every one of their contentions and is to-day, or will be, the possessor of an establishment in this city where the simple mechanical work, and that only, is done; and the heart and soul and essence of the business is to be done in the city of New York and by an alien corporation. Well, Sir, why should we ignore a Canadian industry? Will any man take the history of that work in Canada, where art was small in the beginning, where skill gave place to brawn and naked strength, and where all this nicety and beauty of detail and of conception had to be a gradual process, a fruition worked out through the hard struggles and stages of successive years. Will the hon. gentleman remember that the Canadian Government has, to a certain extent, fostered that talent and brought it out until it has made an accretion of it which has done honour to Canada. Our present Finance Minister has the doubtful honour of entirely passing by, ignoring, setting back all of that, leaving it houseless and homeless, so far as the patronage of the Government is concerned, and of transferring it all to a large and alien corporation. It is a distinction which I do not covet; it is a distinction which I think my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) should not covet. And for what reason? There is no reason that he dare to give this House but one; that is, that he declares he has got it done a little cheaper. But how much cheaper? When he takes into consideration the matter of engraving, he has got to meet the whole bill for the engraving of every die that is necessary for the making of all the notes and stamps and which he would not have to meet if the old company had been given the contract. And if it comes to that, what is the saving, anyway? There is an actual loss, for the company which has, up to the present, been doing the work, offered, on the 15th day of January, to do it at the same price as the American company, and the Minister of Finance would have escaped all the extra cost of engraving, because these dies are in the possession of the present contractor. Dies never wear out when they are made. When your efficient skilful man put in his two months of labour, and the portrait or vignette is finished, that is hardened and remains there for ever. All that you have to do is to transfer it at any time to a new roll, and make from that a new plate, and you have everything. These are two simple mechanical processes. All of that accretion of skill is contained there in that building which we forced them to come to Ottawa to build, and to put their brains and money in, and he has only the petty excuse that his honour would not allow him, after he had committed himself to the other company, to accept the Burland Company's offer, and give the work at the same rate to the Canadian company. I think that is worthy of note; and if the hon. gentleman attempts to argue that the engraving was not the essential feature of the whole work, he will have a hard row to hoe. That is undoubtedly the essence of the whole thing, and it was that which the present contractors had to cope with, and for which they had to incur heavy expense in a small field, bring their men to a high condition of skill, and keep them employed, though for months of the year they were paid when there was not work to be done. They were kept there, and were a source of expense to the establishment, and added to the cost of the work in the establishment; yet even with all that, the company would have done the work in the end just as cheaply as the American company, and this would have saved money to the country. My hon. friend took the stamped envelopes out, and actually increased the expense of the Government in so doing. Did he do that for the sake of economy? Was he in for saving? If so, I could have given him a suggestion as to how he could have saved probably $100,000, and saved it easily. He could have had the Queen's Printer print all the postal cards for the use of this Dominion. That is a simple process mechanically. All you have to do is to have one or two little dies engraved, which are very simple and very easy to be made. Once the engraving is done at a cost of probably not more than $100, and the plate is fixed, the work resolves itself into the purchase of paper, and the mechanical work of passing it through the press, cutting and trimming it, and sending the cards to the Post Office Department.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Did you do it?

Mr. FOSTER. These gentlemen seem not to have one positive quality. When you point out one single thing to them, their only defence is, "Why didn't you do it?" The Minister of Finance was going on this, his only plea, that he wanted to save. You have a printing establishment and a staff of men; you have the capital and maintenance already provided for; and in order to print the postal cards, all you would have to do would be to pay a hundred dollars or two for the engraving and get one or two inexpensive machines.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Why did you not do it ?

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend has not any positive quality in himself, if he will always shirk behind what he thinks to be somebody else's failing, he will never go to heaven.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Then why did you not do it ?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not with that negative sort of virtue that people ever do any thing or ever come to anything in this country.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. If it was such a good thing for us to do, why did you not do it ?

Mr. FOSTER. Why do you not follow us in everything else ? Why make any changes ? Just as the hon. gentleman will take one part of the census which shows that the population has decreased, and will hold that to be as true as the New Testament and will take another part which shows that the industries of the country have increased and will hold that that is as false as any thing his Satanic majesty can invent ; so when he does one little thing that is positive, he boasts that he is doing better than we did, while when he is brought up with something he did not do, his only answer is : "You did not do that either." Now, what my hon. friend has done has been to destroy a native industry and introduce an alien company into this country. On the simple ground of saving, I ask him why he did not print the postal cards also ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Will the hon. gentleman allow me to put a question to him ? He has stated that at a trifling expense of about $100, the necessary plates could be obtained for printing these postal cards, and that as we have all the machinery and appliances and staff of the Queen's Printer, the whole of that work could be very well done in our own printing department. The hon. gentleman was Finance Minister and had the giving out of this very work for a great many years ; and to test his sincerity, if that is the proper place in which to do that work, I would like him to say why he did not have the postal cards printed in the way he says it should be done.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will give me time, I will answer all that. It is the privilege of some people to answer a question by asking another, and I will put a question to my hon. friend. Mine was a negative fault ; I did not do a certain thing. My hon. friend, when in Opposition, was very positive on one thing ; he was positive that the Governor General's salary ought to be reduced. Why, may I ask my hon. friend, now that he has possession of the power and is autocratic, does he not carry out his positive assertion of a few years ago ? Now, I will proceed to number two. In the first place, my hon. friend does not seem to be able to state fairly a position which I took two moments before. I did not state that the Queen's Printer's department had all the machinery that was necessary ; I did not state that at an expense of $100 the printing could be gone on with. I said that the die which was necessary for the postal cards could be made for probably $100. I am not positive whether it would cost that or not. I said that you had the whole establishment, its capital and maintenance, and all that would be necessary would be to put in a few inexpensive machines, and you could carry on the work for yourself. Why I did not do that, and why the Finance Minister did not do it, are very different questions, and I will tell you why I did not propose at any time to destroy the heart of the engraving business, and give it to an alien New York firm. So far as I was concerned, I was solicitous to see the establishment in its entirety, soul and body, engraving and mechanical work, put together and patronized as an institution worthy of this country, and both were continued. My hon. friend is not in that position. He is destroying the soul of the thing on the ground of economy, and yet he is not distributing the parts of the body in a way for the best interest of the country. Now, the Finance Minister showed all the way through a very accommodating spirit to the New York firm. In interviews, in correspondence, in every possible way, his whole communication with them seemed a sort of invitation for them to do what I suppose they wanted to do, and what they succeeded in the end in doing. Now, my hon. friend has destroyed a Canadian industry, which was built up here through twenty-five or thirty years of constant effort. He has introduced in its place an alien corporation, which not only takes from the Canadian corporation the work previously given to it, but on the basis of Government patronage, had established an enginery of rivalry to destroy what remains of the private work of that establishment which the Government had caused to be established at Ottawa at great expense. At a time when even the most common Canadian labourer cannot cross the Niagara River and do a day's work and get a dollar for it on the American side, without running the risk of deportation, at a time when a Canadian cannot hold a mining license in the United States or a contract from an American authority unless he abjures his allegiance, the hon. gentleman is so far imbued with that very Christian spirit that he turns both cheeks to be smited and brings an alien corporation to this country to take the employment from our own people and take the bread out of our children's mouths. I think that this year, more than all others, it would have been well if the hon. Finance Minister had at least pursued an even course of absolute fairness to the Canadian company. Had he done that, he would have been on the right side of economy and of the common sense by giving to our own people the employment we have to give.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I hope it will not be necessary for me to occupy the attention of the House very long in reply to the observations of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) on the subject of the engraving contract. It appears to me, Sir, that the question that the hon. gentleman put at the close of his speech this afternoon can be answered in a very simple way. This is not a case in which a man should multiply words, because the facts of the transaction are so simple that a long speech might only serve to divert attention from them. The hon. gentleman asked, as he concluded his speech to-day, and asked with an air of, shall I say, assumed warmth, what reason there was for passing over the tender of the British American Bank Note Company, or, as we commonly speak of it, the Burland Company. Sir, there were one hundred and fifty-three thousand reasons for doing so, and every one of these reasons represented one dollar of the money of the people of Canada that is being saved by the course pursued by the Government and that would have been squandered had we followed the course recommended by the hon. gentleman this afternoon. I venture to say that if, in the face of an offer from one of the most respectable establishments in the engraving business in America, of $153,000 better than the offer of Mr. Burland, we had accepted Mr. Burland's offer, there would have been a grave public scandal, a gross waste of the public money, and the Government would have taken a step which would have deserved, and I am sure would have received, the emphatic condemnation of this House. Now what are the simple facts of the case?

The hon. gentleman seemed to assume, and his whole argument was based on the idea, that the Burland company were entitled to some monopoly of this business. Happily, Sir, the Government have not taken that view. The facts were these: Mr. Burland's contract was about to expire. The Government, in the exercise of their judgment, for what they believed to be the best interest of the country, invited public tenders for the work. They received tenders, and they awarded the contract to the party whose tender was the lowest. This is a course which my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is not prepared to approve of. I am afraid he has not as much faith as I have in the policy of awarding contracts to the parties whose tenders are lowest; for I think that experience has shown that hon. gentlemen opposite were not ready to regard that principle as warmly as I am disposed to regard it to-day. My hon. friend, in his speech this afternoon, was disposed to encourage the idea that the Burland company was entitled to a monopoly. I am sorry he took that view, because otherwise I might be able, on the face of the papers, to give him credit for a different opinion. That Mr. Burland and his associates felt that they should have a monopoly is quite evident, and they felt it so strongly that a year before their contract expired, they applied to the hon. gentlemen to give a private renewal of the contract. If my hon. friend will turn to page 9 of the papers, he will find that on the 17th April, 1896, a year before the contract expired, the Burland company applied to the late Government for a renewal of the contract. They pleaded in the name of this Canadian industry in behalf of which we have had so much sympathy expended to-day. They stated that in consequence of the growing importance of the business it was necessary for them to have new machinery, and they did not feel that they were in a position to put in that new machinery and extend their works unless they had an assurance of the renewal of the contract. But I regret to say, assuming that the hon. gentleman was sincere in his apparent argument this afternoon, that the Burland company was entitled to a monopoly, his action was not consistent with that; for, in the most hard-hearted way, he refused to give the extension demanded. Mr. Burland not only urged this renewal in consideration of the growing importance of the establishment, but he urged it in the interests of the hard-working people whom he employed. He said in the petition that some of his employees were working in places in that building in Wellington street which were entirely unsuited to them, and in the name of the employees, and in order that their health might not suffer, he asked for a new contract. But the hon. gentleman was deaf to the entreaty of this native industry and of these suffering sick men. He allowed the matter to go and Mr. Burland did not get a renewal of the contract.

So the matter stood until the present Government came into power. In September last we gave notice, under the terms of the contract, that the contract would expire in April, 1897, and thereupon steps were taken to invite new tenders. The hon. gentleman asked us this afternoon why such a large area was covered in the invitation. Well, Sir, I think that if you want to get competition for public contracts, the best way is to extend the invitations over the largest possible area. But if you do not want competition, if you want a private deal, you had better not issue invitations very widely, because others than those you expect may come in and tender. We thought that as this was a contract involving a considerable sum of money it was the sound policy to invite tenders over as large an area as possible. There are special reasons why, in a transaction of this kind, invitations should be widespread. The business of engraving is a difficult and delicate one. There are few people in Canada who are acquainted with the business, and few who are able to engage in it. I feel that if we had confined our invitation to the Dominion of Canada we might have had difficulty in obtaining proper competition. In fact, the result goes to show that we should have had difficulty. It was suggested this afternoon that it was wrong on the part of the Government to issue these circulars and allow foreigners—Americans—to come in and tender for this contract. I do not think we have adopted, either by statute or by any rule, the principle that we will not allow foreigners to tender for public contracts. Certainly my hon. friends opposite have not always been anxious to exclude foreigners from competition. But there seems to be a material difference between their action and that of the present Government. They not only allowed foreigners to tender for public works, but they were prepared to give contracts to foreigners who were not the lowest tenderers. Our policy is, having opened the matter to public competition, to give the contract to the lowest tenderer, regardless of whether he was a foreigner or a Canadian. I have already said that if we had not invited foreign competition we might have had no competition at all, and I think the result of our invitation shows that there is much ground for that view. We imposed—properly imposed—special conditions upon this contract. We required that the work should be done in a building to be specially constructed for the purpose in the city of Ottawa, and we required a deposit of $5,000 to be made with the tender, this to be supplemented with the sum of $45,000, making a total deposit of $50,000. These were, I grant you, somewhat severe conditions; but, as I explained in the letter which my hon. friend read this afternoon, the peculiar character of the work, the necessity for security, the necessity for having the work in the hands of responsible people, was, I thought, such as to be ample justification for imposing these conditions. So severe were these conditions that they were objected to by some of the parties interested. My hon. friend tried to convey the impression this afternoon that I had been very unjust towards the British American Company. But, in reading this afternoon some of the correspondence on the subject he might have read this letter which certainly does not go to show any desire on the part of the Government to deal unfairly with the company.

On page 25 of the documents, the following letter will be found:—

Wm. Barber & Bros., Georgetown Paper Mills,
Georgetown, Ont., 4th Nov., 1896.

Hon. W. S. Fielding,
Minister of Finance, Ottawa.

My dear Sir,—Several of my friends who wish to tender for engraving, &c., of Dominion post office and other supplies, find themselves very much handicapped by the condition requiring a deposit of $50,000. It was thought all along that this condition was inserted at the request of the present contractor, who is a very wealthy man, and would be eliminated from the new tenders. If this matter cannot be got over in some way, I fear the work will remain with Mr. Burland, and at his own price. A new contractor would have to provide a suitable fire-proof building, a plant costing at least $50,000 and put up a deposit of $50,000, all for a business of about $100,000 per annum. This would be all right if we could be assured of a few years' business at current prices, but if the Government is to get fair business rates for their work, no contractor can afford to comply with the above conditions. For the safety of the Government the security may be required. On that point I am not able to express any opinion.

I have, &c.,

JOHN R. BARBER.

Here, you see, Mr. Speaker, was the impression existing in the mind of the gentleman who wrote that letter that the conditions we had imposed were designed to leave the business in the hands of Mr. Burland, and to give him the monopoly of it. Well, Mr. Barber's opinion that we were not likely to get any tender under these conditions, had unfortunately too much foundation. His opinion would have proved correct but for the fact that we received a tender from the American Bank Note Company of New York.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman say when the tender was received? Was it before the 23rd of November?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I thank the hon. gentleman for putting that question because it contains—I am sure not offensively on his part—it contains a suggestion which is a repetition of a gross misrepresentation, and one of many which have been made in relation to this matter. It has not been stated here, my hon. friend from York did not state it this afternoon, but it has been stated by the public press, under the inspiration, evidently, of persons interested in the British American Bank Note Company, that the tender of the New York company was not received on the day named, but that they were allowed to put it in afterwards. There is not a shadow of foundation for that statement; the tender was received at the same time as the other tenders, before 12 o'clock on the day named. I thank the hon. gentleman for affording me an opportunity of mentioning that here.

Mr. WALLACE. The statement was made in the public press.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is quite correct. I am not finding fault with his question. I think he has done me a service in giving me an opportunity to make this statement. The statement was made, it is true, in the public press, but it was in the Tory press; and in the same press there was the further statement that the Government had permitted this American company to obtain a contract for ten years, while the specifications only allowed them to give a contract for five years; and that also was entirely unfounded. In the same Tory press the statement was made that the Government had permitted the New York company to bring in their materials free of duty, while the others would have to pay duty; and that statement was entirely unfounded. I would cordially advise my hon. friend opposite not to place too much credence in these statements of the Tory press.

Mr. WALLACE. Then you would place no reliance in the newspapers at all?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Well, I would not go so far as that. There are papers and papers. Now, Sir, as I said a moment ago, we would have been without competition, we would have had no tenders in competition with Mr. Burland's company but for the fact that the American Bank Note Company had put in a tender. We had the tender of Barber, Ellis & Co., Toronto, which we were not able to entertain, for the reason that there was no deposit with it. I think it will be admitted that when a deposit is exacted in connection with a contract, it is one of the essential elements of the transaction, and if that deposit is not produced, clearly the tender should not be entertained. I will venture to say that if my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works and my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, were to put a condition in their advertisements for tenders that a certain amount had to be deposited with the tender, and if that amount was not deposited, the tender would not be entertained, and the whole House would say that the Minister did perfectly right in not entertaining it. Therefore, we dismissed the Barber-Ellis tender, and the gentlemen who were interested in that tender fully understood that there was ample justification for our refusing to entertain it. We had the tender of the Burland company and we had the tender of the American Bank Note Company. Now, what would have been the position of the Government in this matter if we had had no tender from the American Bank Note Company? It is quite evident that the Burland company—as I call it for convenience, that being the name of the gentleman who is president of the company—had the impression that they would secure a monopoly. They had the impression that there was no competition. Just how it came about that there was no competition within Canada, I do not know; but I do know that while we had considerable inquiry about this matter, it ended in our having only one tender which complied with the conditions, one tender in the Dominion of Canada, and that tender was from the British American Bank Note Company; and so firmly convinced did that company seem to be that they had the game in their own hands, that they were not content even to do the work at the old price, but they added $30,000 to the price of their contract. I think when the House understands that, they will see that it would have been a rather unfortunate thing for the Government, an unfortunate thing for the taxpayers of Canada if we had had no other tender than that of the British American Bank Note Company. Well, Sir, two tenders were received. If you will turn to page 40 you will find the figures summarized. In the first column you will find the figures for the old contract, that is a contract existing for some years with the British American Company. In the next column we have the tender of the same company for the new contract; and in the last column we have the tender of the American Bank Note Company for the new contract. These are the figures prepared by Mr. Fitzgerald and Mr. Treadwell of my department, and I am sure that the ex-Finance Minister will admit that the figures have been most accurately and most carefully prepared. The summing up of this statement is as follows: For the whole term of five and a quarter years which is involved in the contract, the existing rates of the British American Bank Note Company would amount to $646,147.64; their rates for the new contract, when they added $30,000, evidently thinking they had a monopoly in their hands, amounted to $676,428.80; and the tender of the American Bank Note Company for the same work was $523,146.17; showing a difference as between the old contract rates and the American company's tender of $123,000, and between the British American Company's new tender and the American Company's tender the difference on the whole contract term was no less than $153,242.63. That was the position in which the Government found themselves. We found that the old contractor was not even content to work on the old terms, but that he had added $30,000 to his tender, and we found that as between that tender and the tender which we were offered from the American company there was the enormous difference of $153,282. Now, I do not think that there are many members of this House, on either side of politics who, if they will give us their candid opinion, will say that the Government should have accepted the tender of Mr. Burland. But they say: Why didn't you send for Mr. Burland? Why didn't you talk to him? What was there to send to Mr. Burland about? There was no doubt about

Mr. FIELDING.

Mr. Burland's tender. He had put his tender in in a simple and straightforward way; but he thought he had the game in his hands, and he put up his price $30,000 above the former price. There was nothing to explain, we had nothing to ask him about. We knew that his price was $153,000 worse than the other tender. That is why we did not send for Mr. Burland, and that is why we did enter into negotiations with the parties who had offered us the lowest prices, the difference being the large sum which I have mentioned. Now, it is stated that we permitted the American company to depart from the specifications. I do not know that we ought to admit that. My hon. friend from York stated to-day that it was beyond all question a grave departure. Well, I must tell him that some hon. gentlemen no less intelligent than himself, and better informed in law than he is or I am, have taken the view that it was not a departure from the specifications, that the statement in their tender that they desired to make the original dies in their establishment in New York was not a departure from the specifications. I do not urge that view, because I am inclined to think that there was a slight departure from the specifications. But what we had to consider was this: Is the departure from the specifications a material one, having due regard to the amount of money involved for the people of Canada? Reference has been made to-day to a report made by the Deputy Minister, and the impression, I am inclined to think, was left upon the minds of some members that the course I have pursued in this matter was at variance with the recommendation of the Deputy Minister. If such an impression was left on the minds of any hon. member, I desire to remove it. The report of the Deputy Minister pointed out that the matter was one of great importance, and that there were certain questions which should be well and carefully considered before final action should be taken. The enormous difference between the tender of the American Bank Note Company and the tender of the British American Bank Note Company, or the Burland company, struck Mr. Courtney as so remarkable that he thought he might well stop and consider all the circumstances surrounding it. He very properly pointed out that, as respects a few items, there was a possibility that under certain conditions the prices given might prove unfavourable. There were certain stamps for which the price mentioned was quite high. The issue of the stamps specified was a small one. The tenders had to include the cost of engraving, and that made the tender somewhat high. It was pointed out that if by any change in our revenue laws it became necessary to have a larger quantity of those stamps, the price given would be exceedingly high, and while probably we would not want a large quantity, still it was prudent to protect ourselves in that respect. So we called the attention of the American Bank Note Company to the fact that while their price might be all right for a small issue, it involving the necessity of including in the price the cost of engraving, we thought it possible that circumstances might arise which would require the issue of a larger number of those stamps, and therefore we wanted to know what rates would apply in such an event. The company made a statement, which was perfectly satisfactory, that they were compelled to tender on the quantity specified in the advertisement, but if a larger quantity were required they were prepared to make a lower rate. Thus the precaution Mr. Courtney advised was taken; every material precaution that was advised by Mr. Courtney was taken, and in the end every step was taken with his advice and full knowledge and concurrence. Of course the Minister is responsible, and the Government is responsible. I am not at all disposed to throw any responsibility on a Deputy Minister, and I only allude to this because the remarks of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) tended to leave the impression that the course of the Minister was at variance with the views of his deputy. I have pointed out that there was this very large difference. I think when there was so much difference it would have been a very foolish act of the Government if they had gone on dealing with the Burland company. The hon. gentleman had much to say respecting that item in the tender of the American Bank Note Company which referred to the making of the dies. The die, he said, is the soul, heart, everything of the whole business, and if we allowed the die to be made abroad that was practically throwing up the whole work. If the hon. gentleman's soul bears no greater proportion to his body than the die bears to the whole undertaking, I am afraid I shall have to regard him as a rather small souled gentleman, because he may be surprised to learn that the dies and all the preliminary work in connection with them amounts to only about $6,000 out of the contract of $523,000. I have asked the gentlemen interested, and I have received the information, which I believe to be correct, that all the preliminary work done on this contract, all the work done outside of the city of Ottawa, will involve a payment of not more than $6,000 out of the total contract of about $523,000. So it means this, that instead of crushing a native industry, instead of breaking down one of our Canadian workingmen's establishments, what we have done is to accept the offer of gentlemen who are giving us reasonable and fair prices and are going to do one per cent of the work in their establishment in New York, while 99 per cent of the work is to be done in Canada by Canadian workmen, and the company have already erected a building in Ottawa by Canadian labour, and have expended a large sum of money among the workmen of this city during the past few months.

Mr. FOSTER. Allow me to set the hon. gentleman right in one respect. I did not want to interrupt his beautiful simile about the die and the soul; but I wish to say that I did not state, and never intended to state, that the die was the soul of the whole business.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The soul won't die.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a witty remark, but I was making an explanation to the Finance Minister. What I said was, that there were two branches of this work, one mechanical and the other what might be called artistic, which was the engraving part, and I said the engraving part, the skill, the art necessary to do the engraving was the soul of the whole business; that the other was merely mechanical. I also made the statement that ninety-one-hundredths of that engraving under the present contract will be done in New York; and I adhere to that statement most thoroughly.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The impression which the House received from what the hon. gentleman said, what all hon. members who heard him must have understood, and all who would read his remarks would have understood the hon. gentleman to mean, except for this explanatory passage, was that a very large part of this contract work was to be done by aliens and foreigners in a city elsewhere, and not in Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will take a bank note and show what is the die portion, and what is the other large portion of the work, I shall feel obliged.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am afraid I am not capable of explaining to the hon. gentleman the details. I do not think that either he or I knows as much about engraving as we ought to know, and I suppose that neither of us could explain the matter.

Mr. FOSTER. I am simply asking for information.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I frankly admit that I do not know all the details of the work.

Mr. FOSTER. Ninety-nine-one-hundredths of the work on a bank note is the die.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I still adhere to the first statement, which I think is the most important one. I understood my hon. friend was raising the question whether the work is going to be done in Ottawa by Canadian labour or done in New York by American labour. That is what the hon. gentleman attempted to convey. If the hon. gentleman thoroughly understands that only 1 per cent of the work will be done by foreigners, and he has made all this row about that 1 per cent, I will accept his explanation. The relation of the die to the work is such that there is some room for the view that the die is one of the tools of the trade. These plates are not engraved by hand, but by machinery, and the die is a part of the machinery through which the plates are produced. But I do not think the public are interested in these technical matters. The public are, however, interested in the question as to where the work will be done, what proportion of the work will be done here, and what proportion abroad, and above all whether the country will receive fair value and whether the contract was awarded to the lowest tenderer. I wish to say a word with respect to the English proposal to which the hon. gentleman referred. He thought it wrong that we should go abroad for tenders, but we thought it was the right thing to make the letting of this contract known abroad. True, there are but few people who could tender for it, but in order to reach that few it became necessary that we should widely distribute the notices, and so we sent them to the High Commissioner's office in London with a request that they might be placed in the hands of the trade. Now, what was the response? My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has rather conveyed the impression that we dealt in a different manner with the parties who might have tendered in England, from that in which we dealt with the American parties. The English people simply asked whether we were going to insist upon having these notes manufactured at Ottawa, and we said, that we could not waive that condition. We did not waive that condition; they are going to be manufactured in Ottawa by the company which has taken the contract. There was no suggestion on the part of the English parties that they desired to do a part of the work in England. They simply ask us to abandon the condition that the work was to be done in Ottawa. We refused to abandon that for the English parties, and we refused to abandon it for any parties. The contract in that respect has followed the conditions of the specifications, and the work is to be done in the city of Ottawa. But, Sir, the difference between the tender prices of the American Bank Note Company, and the tender price of the British American Bank Note Company is the essence of the whole matter. One other point I may allude to. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) tried to make very much out of the fact, that we had allowed the American Bank Note Company to drop out of their contract the stamped envelopes. He said, that was unremunerative work, and that we were doing a great favour to this American company when we allowed them to drop it out of their contract. Now, what are the facts? My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) said that the price the American company had offered to do the stamped envelopes for was an unremunerative price. I do not blame him for thinking that, because his idea of what is a fair price is the price that can be gathered from Mr. Burland's tender. He does not seem to have any other idea of what is a fair price, and when he finds that the tender of the Burland company was $2.50 and $3 a thousand for stamped envelopes, and that the tender of the American company was $1.50 and $1.75 per thousand, he sees there was a material difference, and possibly the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was justified in thinking that probably that was an unremunerative price.

Mr. FIELDING.

Mr. FOSTER. That helps my argument.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Exactly, it helps it; but if my hon. friend would read the letter of Mr. Barber which he will find at page 35, he will get some interesting information in respect to the stamped envelopes. In the letter of the Barber & Ellis Company, dated 21st November, 1896, there is some interesting reading; there is for example this sentence, which I do not know anything about except that I find it in the letter:

We might say that we have employed an experienced steel engraver from New York to visit Ottawa to examine the samples, and on his recommendation have made up our prices. He found on examination that supplies had been delivered that were not steel plate work.

I do not know what foundation there is for that.

Mr. FOSTER. Not the least.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Well, the Barber & Ellis Company give it upon the authority of an expert engraver, who probably is a better judge than either my hon. friend or myself. However, I did not read it for the purpose of endorsing it; I frankly admit that on that point I have no knowledge, and I offer no opinion. But down at the conclusion of the letter you will find the following passage:—

We would ask your attention to the prices we are prepared to supply stamped envelopes. The prices that are at present paid are practically prohibitive, as no consumer will pay the difference between the stamped and the plain envelope. As the whole amount used annually only amounts to three or four hundred dollars, we would urge the Government to reserve the right to cancel that portion of the tender at any time, as we are prepared to lay before your department a plan very much in line with that adopted in the United States, and we are confident that the consumption of stamped envelopes would very soon amount to as much per week as they do now in the whole year, and they could be sold at such a price as to yield the Post Office Department a large annual revenue.

Now, Sir, in looking over the matter we found that the stamped envelope provision in the contract was not a very important element, and it was left out of the contract simply because our attention had been called to the fact that it was hardly to be regarded as in the same line as the engraving. It was shown that it could be done under conditions different from those which necessarily surrounded the engraving, and we were led to believe that the work would probably be done as cheaply, and perhaps more cheaply elsewhere, than by insisting on having it done as part of the engraving contract. When my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) says that we left it out of the contract in order that we might relieve the American Bank Note Company of a piece of work that was unremunerative, and which they were glad to get rid of, I would call his attention to the fact that while the prices of the American Company for stamped envelopes were $1.50 and $1.75 per thousand, the tender of the Barber & Ellis Company to do the same work was $1.25 per thousand. Therefore, it could not have been dropped out of the American Bank Note Company contract because the price was remunerative, when the Barber & Ellis Company was prepared to do it at a lower price.

Mr. FOSTER. How many would they do?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They would do as many as we wanted.

Mr. FOSTER. Two hundred thousand?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Their proposal was that they would do just as many as we wanted. I call attention to the fact that we left the stamped envelopes out of the contract, because we discovered that they could be conveniently done in the ordinary way of printing, and my hon. friend the Postmaster General is now free to make a new and special contract if he chooses with the Barber & Ellis Company, or with any one else, for these stamped envelopes; or, to have them done, as he probably will have them done, and as I believe is his intention, by the Government Printing Office in Ottawa.

I believe, Sir, that in this matter, we must always get back to the main question of the difference between the tender of the American Bank Note Company and the tender of the British American Bank Note Company. I wonder what risk there is involved in accepting the tender of the American company. One would suppose from the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) that there was something very dangerous in it. Now, the method this company proposes to adopt in dealing with this business is set forth in their own letter which is to be found on page 47. They say:

It is our intention to submit a model, or models, of each instrument, note, stamp or card, exhibiting the same just as it will appear when printed from the engraved plate, for the approval of the Government, and, upon approval of same, to engrave in the parent establishment the original dies of portraits, vignettes, lathe work, borders, &c., with which the matrix die of each note or stamp will be partially prepared, carrying same to Ottawa for finishing; all the transferring and finishing of the printing plates with their necessary retouchings to be done in Ottawa; and we might add that no Canadian labour would be displaced by our so doing, as the labour employed heretofore in making such original engravings, in our opinion, has been largely that of non-residents.

My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) disputed that to-day. I have no knowledge on the subject except to call attention to the tenderer's own statement. The company further state:

In regard to security against loss or fraud, we have to say that we shall take every precaution and care in the execution of the proposed contract, as is our invariable custom established by long experience. The company has been entrusted with the preparation of securities such as bonds, paper money, stamps, mint dies, &c., &c., from governments and banks of almost every nation, and without even the requirement of a bond or deposit, excepting a bond to the United States for postage stamps only; and no claim for loss or fraud has ever had to be made.

That, Sir, is the statement made by the tenderers, and though it may be said that we are not bound to accept their own estimate of themselves, I may say, that I made proper inquiry in quarters well informed, and I am in a position to add that the American Bank Note Company is one of the most respectable, reliable, and responsible concerns engaged in the engraving business on the continent of America, or for that matter, throughout the world. As a further proof of that, I quote the statement they make as to the banks for which they are doing business. They have been making notes, according to their statement, for the Dominion Bank, Bank of Toronto, Canadian Bank of Commerce, Ontario Bank, Standard Bank, Bank of Montreal, Bank of Nova Scotia, Merchant's Bank of Halifax, People's Bank of Halifax, Bank of British Columbia and Bank of New Brunswick. I venture to say, that every one of these banking institutions is just as jealous of the bank's interests, and as anxious to guard against fraud, and as interested to have good work, as is the Government of Canada, and if these great banking institutions the managers of which are known to us all as gentlemen of very great sagacity and prudence, can deal with the American Bank Note Company without any risk of loss or fraud, I do not see why there need be the least alarm at the Government of Canada dealing with them. My hon. friend, before concluding, called attention to a letter written by Mr. Burland on the 15th of January, in which he proposed that we should allow him to do the work on the terms offered by the other company. That is to say, after we had invited public tenders, after we had received the tender of the other company, after we had negotiated with them, after we had accepted their tender and notified them of the fact, Mr. Burland asked to be allowed to substitute a new tender at their figures. That was a most extraordinary proposition. Mr. Burland declared in his correspondence that his business had been injured, and he thought it necessary to add $30,000 to the price of his former contract. He thought it necessary to name a price which was $150,000 more than the price of the American company, when he thought that he had a monopoly, and that we were at his mercy; but when he found that there was competition, he coolly proposed to drop off the whole $153,000 and take the contract at the price of the American company, and he thought this Government were going to accept his proposition. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for York make the statement he did to-day that when that letter of Mr. Burland was written no action had been taken, there was no decision arrived at, there was no Order in Council, there was nothing done, but the whole matter was still open.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will allow me, I have here exactly what I did state—the bones of it, at any rate. I said that at that time there was no Order in Council confirming the contract, that no contract had been granted, and that there was no purchase of property in Ottawa. That is exactly what I stated.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If that was exactly the bones, I suspect that the flesh had another colour.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend put the colour on.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Very often it is necessary. The hon. gentleman's statement was that on the 15th of January, when Mr. Burland wrote that letter, no action had been taken which was binding on the Government. Surely that was what the hon. gentleman meant to convey.

Mr. FOSTER. No, I meant to convey exactly what I stated.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the hon. gentleman did not mean to convey the idea that the Government at that time were free and open to make a contract with Mr. Burland, what point had his observation?

Mr. FOSTER. I did claim that they were free and open to do it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If my hon. friend will turn to page 49 of the blue-book, he will find that ten days before the date of Mr. Burland's letter a telegram had been sent to the New York company stating that I was prepared to recommend the acceptance of their tender provided the details could be arranged satisfactorily.

Mr. FOSTER. And my hon. friend has only to think for a moment to know perfectly well that his recommendation simply goes to the council of Ministers, and that the Ministers in Council decide whether his recommendation shall be carried out or not. That is not a contract under an Order in Council.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman must not escape in that way. In the first place, he must know that no Minister of the Crown, with a proper sense of his responsibility would send a telegram of that character unless he had every reasonable assurance that his view was going to be concurred in by his colleagues.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend must know that I have been a member of a Dominion Government as long as he has, and that I have looked into these matters a little; and I say that the statement that a Minister will recommend a thing is not to be considered as an actual carrying out of the thing.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I hope not to make a statement in my official capacity that I will recommend a thing to Council, leaving another party to be led astray by my statement, unless I have the concurrence of my colleagues.

Mr. FOSTER. But an intelligent party will not be led astray by that.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. But when a gentleman in a foreign country receives a telegram from a Minister of the Crown stating that he is prepared to accept his tender if the details can be agreed upon, he understands that he is dealing with a responsible Minister, and that the Government of Canada will not, and ought not, to repudiate that undertaking.

Mr. FOSTER. Sometimes the responsible Minister makes a rash promise.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. On that point my hon. friend is speaking in the light of a very considerable experience which I have not had. But we need not discuss the question how far the Minister binds the Government, for my hon. friend will find that two days later there was an Order in Council, dated the 7th of January, whereby my action was confirmed, and that was eight days before Mr. Burland wrote this letter.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the order?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman will find it on page 51. The Minister having reported the transaction, the order concludes as follows:—

The Minister, therefore, recommends, in view of such saving, that he be authorized to accept the tender of the American Bank Note Company, provided that the details of the contract can be arranged with the company to his satisfaction.

The hon. gentleman will find, therefore, that not only had I agreed to recommend the acceptance of the tender, but I had agreed to do so with the knowledge and concurrence of my colleagues, and it was put in the proper form and confirmed by His Excellency in Council more than a week before Mr. Burland wrote his letter.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, why on the 5th of April was it necessary to get an Order in Council to authorize the concluding of the contract?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Because it was exceedingly proper, when the details of the contract came to be arranged, that it should be submitted for the approval of His Excellency in Council. But, nevertheless, there was in the first place the acceptance of the tender by the Minister of the Crown, which a gentleman dealing with the Government, and especially a gentleman in a foreign country, had a right to accept as a definite statement of the views, not merely of the Minister himself, but of the Government for which he was acting; and then we have the report to Council, and the confirmation by the Governor in Council, many days before Mr. Burland sent this letter. But even if there had been no acceptance of the tender of the American company, I believe it would have been a scandal and a great injustice to have permitted Mr. Burland, after he had had a fair chance in a free and open competition to tender for the work, to come in afterwards and make changes in his figures. Let it not be said that the other parties were allowed to make changes. They were not allowed to change a figure or a line. There were statements in their tender which required explanation; the warning note of my Deputy Minister suggested certain things which had better be cleared up, and I took steps to have them cleared up; but the American Bank Note Company were not allowed to change one line or figure of their tender. They were asked to explain their statement in regard to the dies, and their explanation resulted in this conclusion, that while it was desirable that the work should be done in Canada, it was not desirable, for the sake of preventing 1 per cent of that work being done abroad, that we should pay $153,000 of the people's money above a fair price. That is the whole story. We put the work up to public tender; we opened it widely to all skilled men to come in and tender; we accepted the tender of a responsible party, a tender which we were satisfied was made in good faith, and which we are satisfied will be carried out in good faith. We believe the work will be done no less excellently than Mr. Burland's work—and I am finding no fault with his work; 99 per cent of the work will be done within sight of the Parliament building, in a handsome structure put up by the American company, it will be done by Canadian labour; and we will have $153,000 of the people's money in the treasury, which would have been thrown away if the Government had adopted the course which the hon. member opposite has advocated to-day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am glad to know that I shall be obliged to detain the House for a very short time, because anybody who has listened to the clear, succinct and able indictment of the hon. Finance Minister by his predecessor (Mr. Foster) will admit that but very little need be said in reply to the extremely lame and impotent defence which the Finance Minister undertook to make. The hon. gentleman commenced by charging Mr. Burland, who represents the British American Bank Note Company with being a monopolist, and the late Government with having regarded Mr. Burland as entitled to a continued monopoly. But in his very next sentence the hon. gentleman refuted his own charge. In the very next sentence he said that Mr. Burland had applied for an extension of his contract, and that my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) had refused. My hon. friend would not permit Mr. Burland's contract to be extended, but insisted on the contract being submitted, when the proper time came, to tender in the usual way. The hon. gentleman thus himself conclusively proved that the late Government entertained no such idea as that a monopoly existed in favour of Mr. Burland, but that, on the contrary, they determined, when the proper time came, to have the contract submitted to open competition. So much for the charge, again and again reiterated by the hon. gentleman, that the late Government treated this contract as a monopoly to which the Burland Bank Note Company was entitled. The hon. gentleman says this Government gave wide and extended notices. He asks why did they go to England as well as to the United States. I think that I can furnish the reason. If the hon. gentleman had made up his mind to give the work to an American company in the city of New York, the best means he could possibly devise of covering such a design was to make the pretense—for it can be regarded as nothing else, considering the character of these specifications—of having tenders called for in England. But he knows that the moment he was asked the question whether these specifications were to be adhered to, the moment that Mr. Colmer, whom he had instructed to give notices of the specifications and call for tenders in England, asked whether these specifications were to be adhered to, the only answer he could give—unless the system of inviting tenders is to become a farce—was that there could be no variation, and that everyone who tendered would be held to the exact terms of the specifications. That was a proper position to take, but did the hon. gentleman adhere to it? I maintain that he had no tender from the American Bank Note Company at all. No one who knows anything of the character of the tenders can pretend for a moment that the hon. gentleman had an honest and legitimate tender from the American Bank Note Company. Why? Because their tender was not according to specifications; and if he had given them the answer he gave the English contractors who wished to tender, namely, that no change could be made in the specification, that it was a dishonest pretense to put forward specifications and then allow anyone to send in a tender entirely at variance with them and accept that tender, we would have heard no more about this contract with the American Bank Note Company. The only legitimate tender which the hon. gentleman had in his possession was that of Mr. Burland, representing the British American Bank Note Company. In every particular, as the hon. gentleman himself admits, the terms of the specifications were complied with exactly to the letter by Mr. Burland. Whereas, on the contrary, the tender sent in by the American Bank Note Company was one he was bound to reject entirely, because it contained a most material and substantial change by stipulating that the work, instead of being done in Ottawa, as the specifications required, should be done in New York. They would not undertake to do the work in Ottawa, but insisted on doing it in New York. Therefore, I say that the hon. gentleman stands here to-night without the shadow of foundation for the claim that he accepted the lowest tender. As a matter of fact, he had no lowest tender to accept. The hon. gentleman was unable to make any variation to suit the English tenderers, but to the American Bank Note Company he could give latitude to vary the specifications and conditions, according to their own pleasure. Yet he calls their offer a tender. Why was not the tender of the Barber-Ellis Company considered as a tender by the hon. gentleman? I agree that it was not a tender because it did not comply with the terms of his specifications, which required that $50,000 should be put up with the Government as security for the carrying out of the work. They did not put up the money, but they offered to give to the hon. gentleman personal security, to his own complete satisfaction, for the $50,000, in addition to the $50,000 which they would have to invest in the city of Ottawa in order to carry out the contract. The hon. gentleman knows that that approached much more nearly to a legitimate tender—although I admit it was not one—than the tender he had in his hands from the American Bank Note Company, who told him, on the face of that tender, that they were not prepared to accept his specifications. I deny that he gave this contract to the lowest tenderer, simply because he had no lowest tenderer. But that is not all. The hon. gentleman wants to know why the Government should have sent for Mr. Burland. I will tell him why. Instead of such a course being a scandal, as he has described it, let me tell him that the records of his own department, the records of every department in the public service, under all governments, will prove that again and again the various departments of the Government have done precisely what the hon. gentleman would have done if he had sent for Mr. Burland and discussed this matter with him. Why did he not do so? The hon. gentleman had no other tender. Burland's was the only legitimate one, the only one in conformity with the specifications. Why, then, did he not send for Mr. Burland and say, we cannot accept your tender unless you make a large reduction. That has been done scores of times by the Government of the day, by the Liberal Government when it was in power just as well as by Conservative Governments. Again and again, when tenders were higher and there were objections to lower tenderers, the highest tenderer has been sent for, and the question put to him: Will you undertake to do this work for such a sum? And again and again it has been complied with, and the contracts have been entered into on conditions of that kind. Where, Sir, would be the scandal? He asks why he should send for Mr. Burland. I will tell him—not only because Mr. Burland was the lowest tenderer (for he was the only tenderer) but because he was a man of the highest character and standing and because he had for thirty-five years performed this service for the Government, first of old Canada and then of the Dominion in a manner which the hon. gentleman himself admits here to-night was in every way admirable, and gave the utmost satisfaction to the department. Was that not a reason, particularly when Mr. Burland was a representative of the British American Bank Note Company which had invested about half a million dollars in this enterprise, which capital would be swept away by the action of the hon. gentleman. These are reasons why he should have given Mr. Burland an opportunity of saving the capital which the hon. gentleman, by a stroke of the pen, by an unfair and unjust stroke of the pen, was willing to sweep away. Such an act strikes at the very foundation of the system of tender and contract. He says it was too late when Mr. Burland made the offer which he did make, that he would perform this work on the terms that the Government was prepared to give to the American Bank Note Company. Does the hon. gentleman deny what Mr. Burland alleges—that again and again Mr. Burland sought an interview with the hon. gentleman and was refused?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman asks me a question, and I desire to answer it. I have no recollection of Mr. Burland having been refused an interview with me.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say that my information is that he again and again begged an interview, and that he begged the hon. gentleman to go and see his establishment. But, not only that, but I think he went from colleague to colleague of the hon. gentleman and met with a great deal of sympathy and many expressions of regret for the position in which he was.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me? Mr. Burland came to me; I had an interview with him. He saw nearly all my colleagues. What I deny is that Mr. Burland was refused an interview with me.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What I have stated is on the authority of Mr. Burland, and everything goes to prove the accuracy of his statement. And, having a capital of half a million dollars which was going to be sunk and destroyed by the injustice the hon. gentleman was attempting to perpetrate, why did he not give Mr. Burland an opportunity—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am sure the hon. gentleman must have misunderstood Mr. Burland. I did see Mr. Burland and discussed the matter with him. I did not refuse to have interviews with him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say—

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) will accept—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Of course I accept the hon. gentleman's statement at once, and have no doubt that that is the impression that rests upon his mind. But I think he will find that Mr. Burland was not afforded the opportunities he desired. We have his own declaration of his inability to obtain the consideration of this question at the hands of the hon. Minister of Finance. Now, why was that? Why is it that a Canadian, a man of such high standing and a man who for so long had been a public contractor, and had given complete satisfaction, was not deemed worthy of the consideration of the hon. Minister of Finance? When that hon. gentleman found himself in a position where he might not only correctly and properly but where it was made his duty to give consideration to this man, why should he turn his back upon him and refuse consideration, while he could hide himself away to New York and put himself in personal communication with these American capitalists for whom he appears to have entertained such affection. Sir, nobody denies that people from the United States, coming into our country are allowed to compete for public work. But, if ever there was a time in the history of Canada when we should not treat that country with undue favour it is at the present moment when the humblest workman in Canada is prevented from crossing the boundary to do a day's work in the United States. Is this a time when a prominent man in our country, a contractor who has done his work faithfully, should be treated with injustice and a member of our Government should cross our border and seek in the United States, parties, not to receive the tender by open, fair, public competition, but to be treated with a consideration that has invariably been denied to any Canadian contractor. Whenever any Canadian contractor, I care not in what part of Canada he is, sends in a tender that does not comply with the specifications, it is the invariable practice to treat that tender as waste paper. You may use it to say to another contractor, will you do the work on the same terms as this tenderer offers to do it on? That is the only legitimate way in which such an offer could be used. Why, Sir, the Order in Council that was passed is of a most extraordinary character. Here are tenders invited by the Minister of Finance for a most important and delicate public work. And what happened? Why, instead of the hon. gentleman being able to go down to his colleagues, the members of the Government of Canada and say: Here is the lowest tender, am I authorized to accept it? He could not say that, because it was not true. What he did get was contained in this sentence:

The Minister, therefore, recommends, in view of such saving, that he be authorized to accept the tender of the American Bank Note Company, provided that the details of the contract can be arranged with the company to his satisfaction.

Not, provided that the specifications that were offered alike for the consideration of the Burland Company and the English tenderers and everybody else were complied with, but that he might have permission to go and negotiate a new contract that was not provided for in the specifications. The hon. gentleman talks of the employment that has been given to the citizens of Ottawa in the erection of this new building. Does he plume himself upon that when he sees the capital destroyed in the building that has been erected by the citizens of Ottawa, standing alongside of it, half a million of money sunk by a Canadian contractor in faithfully discharging his duty to the Government? Why, Sir, on these very dies, the hon. gentleman knows that Mr. Burland was in a position, if he had treated Mr. Burland with that justice to which every man in his position is entitled, to have saved to the Government of Canada a very large sum of money. Mr. Burland found that he was in a position where his property was likely to be destroyed, and he concluded to perform those services not only upon the same terms that are contained in the American Bank Note Company's tender, but to comply to the letter with the specifications.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

and to save to the Government of Canada all this money that is to be paid for the manufacture of those dies and plates and other things that are now permitted to be manufactured in the city of New York. I do not believe that such a thing would be entertained by any Government anywhere, as to go to a foreign country to get work of that kind executed, when one of the citizens of their own country was able, and had shown himself qualified, to perform that work in a most efficient manner. I do not believe you can find any other Government that would go into a foreign country and entrust to foreigners their dies and plates. I do not mean to say that the work could not be so guarded as to protect the country from loss, but I say it opens a field for fraud upon Canada that will be appreciated by any person who knows the character of such work, and the means and the opportunities that will be opened for the contractor to be imposed upon by his own employees, with the result of setting on foot a fraudulent currency in Canada. Now, the hon. gentleman talks about stamped envelopes. Why, Sir, it strikes one as a most extraordinary thing after reading those papers. Where did the hon. gentleman get this hint about stamped envelopes? Why was it that the suggestion came from him? It is a curious thing that the hon. gentleman should go out of his way to suggest an alteration in the contract which was going to take $5,000 or $6,000 of public money out of the treasury of Canada, which would be required to obtain plant for the Queen's Printer to do that very work. The hon. gentleman has given us no explanation of that. Why is it that the suggestion coming from the hon. gentleman to his American friend, to this foreign contractor, was so quickly seized upon if that work was to be a profit to him? Why, Sir, it was known at once, and the eagerness with which this American contractor closed upon the Finance Minister's proposition to eliminate that part of the work, shows that importance was attached by the contractor to having that feature of his contract eliminated. Now, Sir, I am astounded when the hon. gentleman tells this House that the Deputy Minister approved of this transaction. Why, there is no man who can read English but will say that the Deputy Minister, a man of great ability, a man of great experience, as every member of this House knows, a man understanding this subject infinitely better than it was possible for the Finance Minister to understand it—I say it is impossible to read Mr. Courtney's letter without finding in it the most emphatic condemnation of the course pursued by the Minister of Finance that it is possible to put into the English language, especially when we look at the relative position of the Deputy Minister of Finance and his chief, of the letter that Mr. Courtney addressed to the head of the department. Why, in every line of that he points out the danger, he points out the suspicious character of this tender, he does everything that a man can do to show that he disapproved profoundly of the change that was about to be made. I say that a graver act of injustice, not only to the British American Bank Note Company, but to the Canadian people, in my judgment, the hon. gentleman could not have perpetrated in connection with the mode, the illegal mode, in which he has dealt with this subject of tender and of contract, than is disclosed by the statements which have been placed before the House and by those papers which he himself has laid on the Table. I say that if the hon. gentleman had wished to destroy the whole system of tender and of contract, to destroy its sacredness, to prevent its being regarded as a safety to the people; if the hon. gentleman had wished to sweep away all the safeguards that surround that most important question of tender and of contract, he could not have adopted any means more thorough than those he has adopted in the treatment of this question. The hon. gentleman, instead of having accepted the lowest tender, had no lowest tender. If Mr. Burland could have obtained access to him, I say an offer would have been made long before in order to save his property from destruction and confiscation at the hands of the hon. gentleman, and to protect himself from the injustice which was about to be done him, and by this offer he would not only have saved a large amount of public money, but he would have preserved inviolate that system of tender and of contract which, for a country like Canada, with its enormous public works and its enormous transactions, is of the most vital importance to the people of Canada.

Mr. CRAIG. I do not flatter myself that I can say anything new on this question, as the ground has been covered so fully by the previous speakers, especially by the ex-Minister of Finance. But there are one or two points to which I wish to direct the attention of the House, and which seem to me of some little importance. I shall not go over the facts stated by the ex-Minister of Finance about the contract held so long by the British American Bank Note Company, and executed by them to the satisfaction of the Government, and I think to the satisfaction of the country. I find that previous to 1886 the work was done in the city of Montreal, but in that year a new contract was entered into, the provisions of which compelled the contractor to have the work done in Ottawa. Of necessity he had to erect here a building and bring machinery here, necessitating a large expenditure on his part. That is a point which I think we should bear in mind. The British American Bank Note Company had to go to a considerable expense in 1886, not so very long ago, in erecting this fine building in the city of Ottawa. We are told that there is a capital of $400,000 invested in that business. I want to say that provision was made that all the work pertaining to that contract had to be done in the city of Ottawa; there was no exception, none of the work was allowed to be done in the city of Montreal at all. Previous to that the work had been done there, but now the contractor has to do all the work in the city of Ottawa. Now, this contractor, in order to do all this work in the city of Ottawa, had not only to erect a substantial building costing a large amount of money, had not only to purchase and put into that building fine machinery, but he had to get skilled workmen, he had to bring them to the city of Ottawa, and no doubt at great expense. He had not only to bring them here, but he had to train other men in this city to take their places and to do part of this work. Well, this contract lasted for five years, and in 1892 another contract was entered into. We find that this second contract was taken at a considerable reduction in price compared with the previous contract, that additional security was given for safety, and for taking care of and guarding the work that was done, for the safety of the plates, &c., and this contract was in force until April 23rd, 1897.

We are told that in April, 1896, the British American Bank Note Company applied to the late Government, and said they wished to add some more machinery and make improvements in their building, and before doing so they wanted to ascertain whether they would obtain a renewal of the contract for a further term of five years after the contract had expired. I was a little surprised at the Finance Minister speaking of this company as he did, and talking about them as if they thought they had a monopoly of this contract, and as if under the old Government they had such a monopoly. What do we find? Instead of the old Government entertaining that proposition for a renewal of the contract, they declared, after considering the matter, that they were not prepared to consider any renewal of the contract until its expiration in April, 1897. So the late Government is not open to the charge of favouring the British American Company. If they were open to such a charge and desired to favour that company, that was the time to have done it; but they absolutely refused to do so and allowed the contract to run to its expiration, and at that time the Government had changed. The Finance Minister gave six months' notice to the British American Company, which was necessary under the contract, and called for tenders. Particular attention should be given to the terms of the new tenders. It is all very well to argue that words do not mean what they apparently express; but in looking over the conditions of the tenders it is distinctly stated that all the work must be done in Ottawa, and no exception whatever is made. I think even a lawyer, and members of that profession can twist the meaning of words pretty well, would hold the opinion that word "all" means all, that it means every particle of the work shall be done in Ottawa. There was good reason for inserting such a condition. It was that the Government wished to retain constant supervision over the work, that the Government should at any time send an officer to inspect the work, and they should safeguard the country from any possible loss through carelessness. This point should be fully considered in this discussion, and I repeat this as being the most important point in the contract, that the work was to be done in the city of Ottawa. Circulars were sent to the Canadian agent in London enclosing forms of tender, and these were sent to a great many English firms. Those firms refused to consider the matter at all. Why? Doubtless because all the work had to be done in Ottawa. That stipulation ruled them out, and they said, we cannot compete with that condition in the contract. But if those firms had known that a great part of the work could have been done in England, the making of the dies and the engraving work could be executed there by skilled workmen, they might have put in tenders for the work. They said, we do not tender because there is the stipulation that all the work has to be done at Ottawa. When they ask if that was considered an important condition, the reply they received was that no deviation could be made in that respect, and that all the work must be done in Ottawa. It appears that only two tenders were received. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) said that only one was received; but I will admit, for the purpose of my argument, that the tender of the American Note Company was a proper one. I ask, and I wish the careful attention of the House to this point, why were only two tenders received? Why was only one tender received from the United States? It was because there is only one company there possessing the necessary facilities for doing the work. How did they acquire those facilities? Because the company gradually acquired capital from doing government and other work, purchased plant and built up a large establishment and secured skilled workmen, and now they have facilities which enable them to tender for work of this class. But there is only one company in the whole of the United States willing to tender for this work. We find also that only one company in Canada tendered for the work. It is said that the British American Bank Note Company thought they had a monopoly. It seems that they had practically a monopoly in Canada, because no other company was willing to tender. When other companies were asked to tender, they declined to do so. I will read an extract from a letter from a Canadian company, in which they gave as a reason for not tendering not only that they were unwilling to put $50,000 as a cash deposit, but they gave other reasons as well. Mr. John R. Barber, writing on November 4, 1896 (at page 25 of the blue-book) says:

A new contractor would have to provide a suitable fire-proof building, a plant costing at least $50,000 and put up a deposit of $50,000, all for a business of about $100,000 per annum. This would be all right if we could be assured of a few years' business at current prices, but if the Government is to get fair business rates for their work, no contractor can afford to comply with the above conditions.

That is a very strong statement, and it bears out the fact, which I shall show more clearly later on, that the British American Bank Note Company had not been paid more than fair prices for their work. The Barber & Ellis Company knew what the British American Company had been receiving, and yet they were afraid to tender. They stated that unless they were guaranteed the contract for a few years—evidently more than the five years for which the contract would run—there would not be money in it to induce them to make the investment. The British Bank Note Company had incurred this expense; they had erected a building here, put in machinery, trained workmen, and because they had this building, expensive plant and large capital invested they were able to make a tender at fair prices. So, as I have said, there were only two tenders received, and of those the tender of the British American Company was the only tender in strict accordance with the stipulated conditions. I mention this because the tender of the American Bank Note Company was not in strict accordance with the conditions set out; they made a special stipulation that they should not be required to manufacture the dies in Ottawa. I now wish to call attention to the memorandum of the Deputy Finance Minister respecting these tenders. It is a most important document. Mr. Courtney, in his memorandum, shows the difference in prices. No doubt those differences are large, amounting to $30,000 a year; and Mr. Courtney points out some reasons which may account for this great difference in prices. What does he say? He says:

In the first place, the new tenderers—the American Bank Note Company—may possibly think that they would be able to make up the difference by the increased rates at which they tender for supplies that are not generally in demand.

To my mind that shows, and I shall prove it very soon, that Mr. Courtney did not think that the prices given by the British American Company were excessive. But he pointed out some reason why the prices in the tender of the American Bank Note Company were so small, and his idea is, that they thought they would be able to make some of it up on account of other supplies that are not generally in demand. He suggests another reason in these words :

Whether the tender of the American Bank Note Company is one that could be carried out successfully, seeing that they may have tendered at unremunerative prices in order to secure a foothold in the country.

I have no doubt that they did tender at low prices in order to secure a foothold in the country, and that was a very natural thing for them to do. They have a large establishment in New York, they are doing a very large business there, and they have specified in their tender that they shall make all their dies and their tools in their factory at New York, and that they shall bring to Ottawa a great many of the supplies which they are using in their ordinary business. I repeat, that I have no doubt they tendered at a very low rate in order to get a foothold in this country, and I am very sorry to say they have succeeded. Now, it is a serious matter for us to notice, that the important part of this work is to be done at New York. I was very much impressed with the remark of the Finance Minister when he said, that only 1 per cent of this work was to be done in New York and 99 per cent was to be done in Ottawa with Canadian labour. If that is the case it is a very strong point, but I cannot reconcile that with the statement in the memorandum of the Deputy Finance Minister. Listen to what he says :

In this connection the undersigned has to call attention to the condition appended to their tender, that they are not to be required to manufacture bank note and other papers, steel rolls, steel plates, the dies and other tools of their trade, ink, colours, &c., at Ottawa, but may obtain elsewhere such supplies necessary to a faithful fulfilment of their contract.

Nothing could be more plain and emphatic than that, and if it is a fact as stated by the Minister of Finance that only 1 per cent of the work is to be done at New York, and that 99 per cent is to be done at Ottawa by Canadian labour, then I cannot understand the following statement by the Deputy Finance Minister :—

This would appear to allow them to do a large portion of their work at New York, and is a feature of the offer which seems to require very careful consideration.

Well, it ought to have our careful consideration, and I have no doubt in my mind that the Deputy Finance Minister is correct and that they will be allowed to do a large portion of their work in New York. That, Sir, is the objectionable part of this contract. Not only is a large portion of the work to be done in New York, but it is that very portion which we would like to have done in this country, namely, the skilled labour. An establishment like the British American Bank Note Company ; a Canadian institution, was a school for young men who might learn to engrave and perfect themselves in this business. What are our young men going to say when they find that the skilled labour is carried from our country to the United States ; and that the fine work is to be done in New York and the ordinary work is to be done in Canada. That would seem to imply that we have not the skilled workmen here, and that we have not the young men who will learn this, even in the course of years. It is now proposed that we should go to the States to get men to do this work, instead of teaching our young Canadians to do it.

Another question that arises is this : Were the British American Bank Note Company charging too much ? That is a point also for our consideration. I shall read from page 39 of the blue-book, a statement which will answer that question completely. Mr. Courtney was unable to account for the low prices at which the American Bank Note Company tendered, and so he suggested reasons for it. It seemed to be a point which impressed him very much, because he tried to find out reasons why they tendered so low, and on that subject, he says :

In connection with the foregoing the undersigned begs to point out that at the time the present contract was entered into, full and explicit inquiries were made as to rates of the American Bank Note Company, and also as to the charges made by the British American Bank Note Company to the chief monetary institutions in Canada ; and in one case the department was allowed access to the bills rendered for printing notes for the institution in question by the British American Company. The result of the inquiry proved that the rates charged to the Government for this class of work were in no sense larger than for the institution in question, and were not then higher than the rates quoted by the American Bank Note Company. The account rendered to the institution in question is now in the possession of this department. It can hardly be possible that since the present contract was entered into prices for the work have fallen to such an extent as the rates offered by the American Bank Note Company would lead one to believe.

It would seem from this that in 1892, before the Government entered into the contract with the British American Bank Note Company, they wanted to find out whether the prices were fair, and they discovered on inquiry and from seeing actual invoices, that the prices of the British American Company were not higher than the prices at that time charged by the American Bank Note Company. That bears out the assertion I made, that the American Company has tendered low in this contract in order to get a foothold in this country. They knew the prices charged previously, and they were determined to come in, and as is done very often by business men, they made a very low offer. I venture to say for myself, that I regret very much that the Government has seen fit to go out of the country to get this work done. The speech of the Minister of Finance was in great part, not an argument, but a mere statement of facts which nobody denies, and as his great reason for giving this contract to the American Company he said, there were 153 thousand reasons. If it is a fact that the prices tendered for and charged previously by the British American Company were fair prices, were not higher in 1892 than the prices charged to our banks by the American Bank Note Company; is it not a fair inference that the American Company's tender was a cut-rate tender, put in, in order to be sure of getting the contract and with a hope that on some extra work they might be able to make up for these low prices. I have very little doubt, Sir, that they will do it before their five years term is up.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Would you be in favour of giving the British American Company $153,000 more than the other company?

Mr. CRAIG. I was going on to say, that I had no doubt that in the course of five years the American Bank Note Company will have an opportunity of making a good deal on extra work.

Mr. TALBOT. That is a supposition.

Mr. CRAIG. Certainly it is a supposition, and it is a supposition not of mine but of the Deputy Minister of Finance himself. He gave that as one of the reasons why the American tender was so low, and I think he is perfectly right.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Deputy Minister of Finance has expressed no such opinion, and does not hold such an opinion, but fully recognizes the fact that there is a saving of $153,000 on the transaction.

Mr. CRAIG. Perhaps I might read for the benefit of the Finance Minister, what I read a little while ago. The Deputy Finance Minister is writing about the difference in the two prices, and in trying to account for it, says this:

In the first place, the new tenderers, the American Bank Note Company, may possibly think that they would be able to make up the difference at the increased rates at which they tender for supplies that are not generally in demand.

I think that bears out entirely what I say. I did not wish to misrepresent the Deputy Minister.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend said it was not clear that there was any saving, and that the Deputy Minister of Finance was the party who had suggested that. I said that was not fair to the Deputy Minister of Finance, who had not suggested anything of the sort. He made a report suggesting that certain figures required explanation, but he did not say that there would be no saving in the transaction.

Mr. CRAIG.

and he will not say so if called before the committee.

Mr. CRAIG. I did not say that the Deputy Minister suggested there would be no saving. I merely said that no doubt the American Company might be able to make up the difference, which is just what the Deputy Finance Minister said. I do not know whether they will or not, but it is very likely they will in the course of five years. They have taken this work at a low rate, and the Deputy Finance Minister thinks they may make up the difference. He says further:

Seeing there is such a manifest difference between the two tenderers on this item, the undersigned thinks some inquiries should be made through some expert, and he would suggest that the matter be submitted to the Queen's Printer in order to ascertain whether the tender of the American Bank Note Company is one that could be carried out successfully, seeing they may have tendered at unremunerative prices in order to secure a foothold in the country.

I mention this to show and I think it shows conclusively that the Deputy Minister, who has had a large experience, thought these prices were extremely low. He knew the prices of the British American Bank Note Company were fair prices, and he thought the matter should be referred to an expert like the Queen's Printer to see whether the work could be done at those rates. Now, I regret that the Government have gone out of the country to get this work done. In doing so I think they have made a mistake. I thought so at the time, before I had examined the matter at all, and I think so still. I think this business should be confined to Canadians. Canada is well able to print its own bank notes, postage stamps and inland revenue stamps. It seems to me it is rather humiliating to say that we have to go to the United States and get an American company to come here and do this work for us, because we are not able to do it for ourselves; and that is especially the case when we read the remark made in one of the letters of the American Bank Note Company. What do they say? They say that we have not skilled workmen in this country capable of doing this work. The ex-Finance Minister was perfectly right when he said that any Finance Minister should resent such an imputation on the people of this country. The work has been done well in the past. We have skilled workmen in Canada able to do this work as well as it can be done in New York, and therefore there was no reason on that account for going out of the country at all. But I repeat, a business of this kind should be confined to Canadians. The Finance Minister said that the previous Government had allowed foreigners to tender for public works. I suppose they have; but this is a special kind of work, a work which must be done in the city of Ottawa, according to the specifications of the Government. You could not imagine the Government of the United States giving a contract for the printing of their bank notes, postage stamps and inland revenue stamps to a Canadian firm. They would scout and laugh at such an idea. They would say, "Do you mean to say that we have to go to Canada to find a firm to do work of this kind for the Government of the United States?" Any Congressman who proposed to do that would never be elected again. There is no question that would touch the pride of the American people so quickly. If any Congress voted to do such a thing as we are voting to do to-day the men composing it would not have a chance to sit in Congress again. The American people would think it an outrage on their sense of propriety and on their national pride to suggest that they should go to Canada and get Canadian corporations to go into the States to print their bank notes and postage stamps with pictures of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln on them; and I think they are right. I think sometimes that the American people have a little too much braggadocio; their children are taught in their histories and geographies that the United States is the only country in the world. But I think Canadians have too little of that sort of thing, and the present Government have even less than the people of Canada. I think the people of Canada would rather pay a little more for work of this kind in order to have it done by a Canadian company, which has done it well and at fair prices in the past, than to have it said that we have to go to the United States to get it done. We must always remember that this work has always been well done; no complaint had been heard about it, and it had been done by Canadian workmen. I must confess, notwithstanding the statement of the Finance Minister, that in reading over the blue-book it did appear to me that he had favoured the American Bank Note Company a little, because I find that after the tender of the British American Bank Note Company had been sent in, that was the end of it so far as they were concerned; but when the American Company wanted to make certain changes in their tender if they accepted the work, the Finance Minister was willing to talk to them about it. He discussed these changes. He did not say this condition throws you out and we must give the contract to your rivals. He did not tell the British American Bank Note Company anything about this, but discussed the matter with the American Bank Note Company just as if it was an ordinary matter of bargain and not of tender at all. The British American Company had complied with every condition of the specification. They made no stipulations, they did not ask to be exempted from any conditions, but these other parties did. The hon. Finance Minister, however, discussed the matter with the American Company, wrote them letters, saw them personally, and after a while agreed to accept their conditions, and in this I think he favoured the American Company. I do not say that he did so intentionally, but none the less he did so. I am satisfied in my own mind that the Canadian people would rather pay a little more for work of this kind to a Canadian company and have the work done entirely in Canada, than give it to a foreign corporation and go to the United States to have it done. I am very much mistaken in my estimate of the temper of the Canadian people if that be not their opinion. While the price of the Canadian Company was rather higher, yet we have, at the same time, the evidence of the Deputy Minister of Finance that in 1892 these were fair prices. Does the Government want to have things done for less than their worth? The hon. Finance Minister boasted a great deal of having saved the people $153,000. Well, apparently he has effected a saving, but we are not through with the contract yet. If the hon. gentleman should ask my opinion, I could have told him how he might have saved the Canadian people a great deal of money in other ways. He could, for instance, admit coal oil free. If he wished to save the Canadian people money, there are many other ways in which he could do it without giving important contracts to a foreign corporation. There is a principle at stake in this connection, and in my opinion Parliament should lay down the rule that, in matters of this kind, only Canadians should be allowed to tender. That would be an encouragement for Canadians to equip themselves to do work of this kind. What will be the result of this contract? It will throw us back for years. Our young men will have no encouragement to learn engraving, because the hon. Finance Minister has closed the principal field open to them in this country. The hon. gentleman has admitted the statement of the American Bank Note Company that we have no skilled workmen in Canada who could do this work as well as it can be done in New York. For my part, I dissent from that statement. It is not a true statement, but the hon. Finance Minister accepts it as if it were gospel. Under this contract there will be no encouragement for our young men to practice engraving, because only the ordinary mechanical work will be done in Ottawa, and the skilled work, the engraving, will be done in New York. I think it would have been better if this Government, before closing the contract with anybody, had asked the British American Company to make a reduction in their prices; and if they had done so, we might now have had the satisfaction of knowing that the work of printing our bank notes and postage stamps and inland revenue stamps and work of that kind was not being done by an American corporation.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Boularderie—Wharf and approaches at Ross Ferry ..... $500

Mr. BETHUNE. Is this in excess of the contract price ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). It is to make the road which leads to the wharf. The right of way was given us free.

Margaretville—Reconstruction of pier.... $12,000

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The contract was awarded to the lowest tenderers, Simon & Burpee, for $10,554, and the balance is for clerk of the works and so on.

Judique—New wharf..... $4,000

Mr. FOSTER. There is an increase of $2,000 in this.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. As my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) sees, there is a re-vote of $2,000. This amount is to be devoted to the construction of a breakwater 750 feet in length and 29 feet wide. After careful examination it has been found that $2,000 more was necessary for this.

Mr. FOSTER. Is Judique a port ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I never heard of that port. What part of the globe is it in ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is in the county of Inverness, and I understand that it is a very important port for fishermen.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before we pass from the province of Nova Scotia, I would like to call the hon. Minister's attention to two very important works in the county of Cape Breton. One is the breakwater at Cow Bay, upon which a very large sum of public money has been expended. I am afraid that unless an appropriation is made in the Supplementary Estimates, the work will be actually carried away and a great deal of property destroyed. The other is the breakwater at Gabarous which is regarded as of great importance. My hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) will find further information in his department with reference to both these works. I trust they will be duly considered before the Supplementary Estimates come down.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have a full report as to the Cow Bay breakwater. It would require, I understand, about $20,000 or $25,000 to put it in a good state of repair. I quite realize the importance of every word the hon. gentleman has said.

Pugwash—New wharf..... $10,000

Mr. FOSTER. This is an additional vote of $6,000.

Mr. CRAIG.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This work is under contract, the contract having been awarded to Messrs. Simmons and Burpee for $8,640.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose there is a large amount outside of the contract which goes for expenses ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think it is within the experience of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) that it is just as well to keep a few dollars at our disposal. Of course, we are not obliged to spend every cent.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid that if the hon. gentleman had a dollar he would have to spend it. How is this superintended ? Do you put a man on there locally and keep him there, or is this superintendence undertaken by provincial officials by periodical visits ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. As the hon. gentleman knows, we have local engineers who have the general supervision of the works. But as they cannot be all the time on the spot for every work which is going on, we have local men under them who are paid by the day, and who may be called clerks of works.

Mr. FOSTER. How much do you pay a man a day in this case ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The rule I have adopted is to pay $2 or $2.50 a day.

Mr. FOSTER. The man starts in when the contract is let and remains several days after it is finished ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He starts in when there is work to be done. Oh, yes ; my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) need not shake his head. It will be all right.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). Is it the intention of the Minister to call for tenders for the Judique breakwater this season ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not asked for tenders. I am now considering whether we should ask for tenders now or later on. I can assure my hon. friend that Judique wharf will receive our careful attention.

Wallace—New wharf..... $1,600

Mr. BETHUNE. I am very much disappointed at not seeing a large sum here for the construction of a harbour of refuge at North Pond, Aspy Bay, in the county of Victoria. Money should be appropriated for a harbour there. I would call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the necessity of having a harbour of refuge constructed at Aspy Bay. The county which I have the honour to represent is sparsely-settled, especially in the northern portion. Beginning at English Town and following the coast line, facing the Atlantic round Cape North up the western side, facing the Gulf of St. Lawrence to the boundary line between Inverness and Victoria. There is only a fringe of the land, as it were, settled in all that distance, and between these settlements, facing the St. Lawrence on the west and the Atlantic on the east is a large tract of land of half a million acres of Crown lands, clothed in primeval verdure, in which roam at will moose, cariboo, deer, bears, foxes and other valuable fur-bearing animals. This territory is uninhabited by man, and no one knows what treasures may lie here undeveloped. Those places along the coast have been settled some of them for over a hundred years. The settlers there are as fine a class of people as we have in Canada. They are intelligent, frugal, industrious, and loyal to church and state. They are mostly engaged as farmers and fishermen, who to the present time, have endured and still endure many difficulties in prosecuting the calling of fishermen, for the reason that they have no place of shelter for their boats, except the beach. Commencing at Beach Cove, at the boundary line between Inverness and the county of Victoria, and passing by the settlements of Wreck Cove, Bay St. Lawrence, Cape North, Money Point, Aspy Bay, North, South and Middle Harbours, White Point, Cape Egmont, New Haven, Neil's Harbour, Black Brook, Green Cove and North Bay, Tignish—in all this distance of sea-coast there is not a single harbour, not a single place of refuge for the fishermen's boats. When they go out fishing and come in again, their boats must be hauled upon the beach. If there is a storm threatening they dare not launch their boats. There is no place of shelter but the beach, and their lives would be endangered while landing in the surf. Whenever they come in they must haul their boats upon the beach, if there is any sign of a storm. Of course they suffer great loss on account of this want of accommodation, as they can use only small open boats instead of large decked boats in which they could go out in any moderate weather, and engage in deep-sea fishing to a larger extent than is now done. Any hon. gentleman will realize what loss they suffer on this account, besides the hardships they undergo in hauling and launching their boats. If a storm threatens of course they cannot go out, because in coming to shore again their lives would be endangered on this rough coast. Again, when their fish is cured, they have trouble in getting it to market, because they have no harbour. They must wait until calm weather arrives so that a vessel may get near the shore, and then they carry their fish in boats to ship them. Of course a vessel cannot come near the shore unless the day is calm. If a storm arises, the vessel has to go off to find a harbour somewhere else. The farmers in this district suffer equally with the fishermen in getting their products off to market. They also have to wait for a calm day until a vessel can come near, by which they can export what they have to sell. When they want to export cattle or horses the animals are made to swim out to the vessel and are then hauled on board by some kind of tackling. Hon. gentlemen will readily see the difficulties people there have to undergo. Now, in order to remedy this trouble, at least to the people of Cape North, all that is wanted is to give them a harbour at Aspy Bay. This can be easily done by opening a channel through the bar which lies in front of what is commonly called North Pond. This bar is nearly three miles long, through which a channel can be easily cut. The people round there say that there is only about three or four feet of sand, and underneath that is adhesive clay, which would form a good foundation for a pier. The water inside this point is about three miles long and about two miles wide, and the water is of sufficient depth to allow any large ship to ride safely. Then I call the hon. Minister's attention to this matter for another reason. A harbour of refuge is needed here, on account of the number of vessels which frequent those waters. Last year there passed by within a few miles of this place going to the port of North Sydney, 627 steamers, 158 coasting steamers, 5 ships, 90 brigs, 54 brigantines, and 1,237 schooners, with an aggregate tonnage of 762,000 tons. I would remind the Minister of Public Works that this coast is strewn with wrecks, which have been attended with great loss of property as well as of life. Not many years ago a ship was wrecked within a few yards of where I want this harbour constructed in which 14 lives were lost. There is no place in the coast I have already mentioned where a vessel can harbour, no matter in what distress seafaring men may be. Another reason why I want a harbour constructed there, is because it would afford communication between Newfoundland and Cape Breton every day in the year. In this connection I will call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that the Cape Breton and Newfoundland route has attracted a great deal of attention for some years; and a conference concerning it was lately held in New York attended by the Deputy Minister of Railways of Canada and by Mr. R. G. Reid, contractor of the Newfoundland Railway. Referring to this route the Toronto "World" editorially says:

The Cape Breton-Newfoundland route will possess features that can be duplicated by no other route across the Atlantic. The trip from Montreal or New York to England via Newfoundland will offer a variety that ought to prove attractive to trans-Atlantic passengers. Instead of spending seven days continuously on the ocean, as is the case on the trip between New York and Liverpool, passengers going via Newfoundland will spend only four and one-half days on the water, and this will be divided into two periods of three and one-half days and one day respectively. The trip will be made by steamship and rail alternately. On the whole, time will be saved by this route, as the distance is shorter than via New York or Montreal, and half the trip will be made by railway. Many people who are afraid to trust themselves for a week on the ocean on account of sea sickness, would not hesitate to venture on a voyage that could be covered in half that time. The Newfoundland route is certainly something new in trans-Atlantic travel, and we will not be surprised if a considerable volume of passenger traffic is attracted to it. It ought to be much more economical to maintain a fast service via Newfoundland than from New York or any other American port. Two vessels are all that are necessary to maintain a weekly service between Newfoundland and Great Britain. These vessels need not be one-half the size of the ordinary trans-Atlantic steamers, as they require only half the quantity of coal and provisions. A single steamship costing a quarter of a million dollars will maintain a tri-weekly service each way between the west coast of Newfoundland and North Sydney, C.B., where connection is made with the American railway system.

You will notice here that this route will only afford communication between Newfoundland and Cape Breton for about seven months in the year, because the harbour of North Sydney would be ice-bound for about five months in the year. But if we had a harbour of refuge at Aspy Bay I am informed by seafaring men that we can have daily communication during the winter as well as summer. Cape North extends northward, and Cape Ray extends southward from the coast of Newfoundland, leaving about fifty miles between the two points. It is said by those who are acquainted with the locality that when the tide changes, say from the west to the east a "jam" is formed between the two points, and of course the ice recedes leaving an open space of water. During this time a good steamer could run in comparatively open water from Cape Ray to Aspy Bay in about three hours.

Again, when the current changes from the east to the west there the same thing occurs, and a space of free water is left open. Of course the project I am now considering would necessitate the building of a few miles of railway from Aspy Bay to some point on the Intercolonial Railway. I am told on good authority that the Government is going to extend a line of railway to Margaree, and from that to Cape North would be only a few miles further on. This would benefit trans-Atlantic traffic. Mails and passengers could be landed there three hours after leaving Newfoundland; the ocean passage from Newfoundland to England would be made in three days and a half, and the passage between Newfoundland and Cape Breton would be made in three hours, and passengers would then commence their trip overland hours before they could by going to North Sydney. Seven hours would be occupied in the run between Cape Ray and Sydney, and this during the summer months only. Again, if we have this harbour constructed, it would not only benefit the people there, but would open up a large tract of country, no less than half a million acres, which is at present lying waste. There is no railway through it, the timber is uncut, minerals are lying hidden in the soil. By having this line of railway built and the harbour established the whole Dominion would reap the benefit. I ask the serious attention of the Minister of Public Works to the importance of this subject. Again, it would be a strong inducement to Newfoundland to enter the union if we had this communication established. There is nothing chimerical about this project, because it is a practical one. The Island of Cape Breton was the chief station placed within a short distance of Newfoundland for a purpose, and no doubt was to afford communication between Newfoundland and Canada during the whole year. Then, of course, besides the carrying out of this project around the coast of my county are much needed the construction of a great many breakwaters and wharfs. But we are modest in the east; if we get this appropriation this year we will hope for more next year, and by reason of those facilities being provided the people would be able to obtain a livelihood with some comfort to themselves, because at the present time, as I already stated, they endure many hardships in the pursuing of their calling. We have heard a great deal of the west and of its importance; but in my opinion, Cape Breton has never received that attention at the hands of the Government which its many and valued resources and its importance demand. There is not any place in Canada of its area which possesses equal wealth, and the Government should pay more attention to that island. My county especially has received no justice whatever for many years past. If I were desirous of proving that fact as regards Cape Breton, I need only call the attention of the Minister to expenditures in some other parts of the Dominion not nearly so important as Cape Breton, on which large sums of public money have been lavished. For the sake of making one comparison, let me take a portion of Canada, a small island in the Gulf of St. Lawrence known as Prince Edward Island. It is 130 miles long, four to thirty-four miles broad, and contains 2,133 square miles. Cape Breton is 100 miles by 85 miles, and its area is 3,220 square miles, or about 1,000 square miles more than Prince Edward Island. The population of Prince Edward Island is 109,078; the population of Cape Breton is 86,854. Let hon. members now look at the Estimates. What does Cape Breton get this year, and what did it get last year? This year it receives $6,900, of which Inverness County receives $6,400, while Prince Edward Island has lavished on it $73,800. We have ten times the amount of coast water; there are no harbours in my county, I am now referring to the county north of Ingonish. Last year the appropriations for Cape Breton amounted to $8,300, of which Inverness County received $5,500. Last year Prince Edward Island received $53,850. Hon. members will at a glance see the great disparity, and Cape Breton is the most important portion of Canada, according to its size. Our waters teem with the finest of fish. The soil is as fertile as any in the maritime provinces, our rivers are full of the finest salmon and trout, we have an almost inexhaustible coal supply, also gold, silver, copper, iron, manganese, marble, limestone, gypsum, plumbago and other minerals, which are all awaiting development. If the island received greater attention from the Government these resources would be developed and become a source of wealth not only to Cape Breton but to the Dominion at large. I think I have said enough to convince the Minister of the necessity of establishing a harbour of refuge at North Pond, Aspy Bay in the county which I have the honour to represent, without delay. I am willing that it should be called after the hon. Minister if he likes—Harbour Tarte would sound well—and in that way his name would be perpetuated during the ages to come. If he carries out these works for the county of Victoria, I am satisfied the people there will call him blessed. This subject is one of importance to my county and I earnestly hope it will receive the Minister's attention; in fact I am satisfied it will, because I am convinced the hon. gentleman is inclined to do what is right and just.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks made by my hon. friend from Victoria, and it will be my pleasant duty to give his observations every attention when I consider my Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. KAULBACH. While on the subject of harbours, I desire to offer a remark or two with respect to the county I have the honour to represent. For some years we have been asking for repairs to be made at a place known as Sawpit Wharf, a work that should have received the attention of the Government some time ago. There has been no lack of appeals made by myself in regard to it, but it now needs the attention of the Government. It is a work that is much required, for the wharf is of great convenience to persons coming and going to the town of Lunenburg. It is only about three-quarters of a mile from the town, and they very often are compelled to go a distance of something like twenty miles around the arm of the bay, and to go into ruffled water in order to get into the harbour. It necessitates not only that distance of travel but also the dangers of the open ocean. It would not cost more than $250 to repair that structure. I have been previously answered by the Government, that the reason for not giving the grant, was, that there was no transfer of that property from the local Government to the Dominion. That is no fault of mine. I have made the request several times, and nothing has been done by way of obtaining that transfer. Another structure placed somewhat similarly, is known as Young's Landing, it is about two miles from the town and is of as much importance as the wharf previously referred to. It is in the Back Bay of Mahone, commonly known as Mastine Brook, and in the winter time the town can be reached from no other point conveniently, except by going out or around that immense peninsula, and into ruffled water which entails many risks. That is another convenience to the public that I am asking for and it is somewhat similar to Sawpit wharf. That structure is also claimed by the local Government, and a request has been made that a grant be given by the Federal Government for the necessary repairs which would cost like that of Sawpit wharf also about $250. These amounts are very small, and there is no reason why these repairs should not receive attention and the necessary grant given. I would ask the hon. Minister of Public Works to make immediate inquiry, and if it is possible for him to do so, I should be much pleased if he would make the grant. While I am on my feet, I might draw the attention of the Government to another matter in connection with our harbours. The harbour of Lunenburg is more frequented than any other harbour of Nova Scotia, except that of Halifax. We have no less than 130 or 150 sailing vessels independent of steamers belonging to this port. With the exception of Halifax, we have as large an export as is to be found in the province, the export of fish more particularly, and we also export very largely of agricultural products. We find the depth of water in that harbour a very great inconvenience for vessels at low tide. The tide is only six feet rise and fall, but still, the waters are so shallow that at certain seasons of the year—particularly in spring when the westerly winds blow stronger than at any other time, and drives the water from the coast—that it very frequently occurs, that steamers are unable to reach the piers and are compelled to remain in the mud until the tide permits them to come further. This has been a request of mine for some years, and a definite promise was given me three years ago that a dredge would be sent there. It has not been sent yet, and I would urgently appeal to the Minister that this work shall receive his very earliest attention. It is a matter of greater importance than the dredging of any other port in the province. The Minister will find on inquiry, that my statements are correct, and he need have no scruples in granting the request I make. I will therefore ask that these public works should receive his early attention.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
Hear, hear.

Mr. GILLIES. I listened with considerable pleasure to the observations made by my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Bethune), and I rise to endorse every statement he made in connection with the necessity of a harbour of refuge being established at Aspy Bay. If the Minister will take the map of Cape Breton and study that coast for a few moments, I am quite sure that he will as readily as I do, endorse every word that has fallen from the lips of my hon. friend (Mr. Bethune). The Minister will remember, that on the whole of this iron-bound coast there is not for some 120 miles, a single place of refuge for a ship or boat of any kind. This is not only a matter of local importance to the fishermen, but it is really a work of national importance, because if a harbour of refuge were established there it would be frequented by very many of the vessels seeking the coast on the eastern seaboard in the early spring.

While on this subject, I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to a question which I brought to his notice last session, and to which he promised to give his attention at a very early period. I refer to the L'Ardoise breakwater. I am sorry to see that there is no provision whatever made in the main Estimates for that work. During the last summer session, I gave notice of motion inquiring from the Minister if it was the intention of the Government to have that work enlarged, both seawards and landwards, this being necessary as I pointed out and as was reported on by his own engineer last year. The Minister then told me, that he contemplated devoting some attention to this very important work at an early date. During this session I also had a motion in connection with this matter, and the Minister was good enough to give me the same—perhaps not very satisfactory answer—but still the somewhat hopeful though somewhat indefinite one: that it was under consideration. I hope that he has given it careful consideration, and although these main Estimates show no provision for that important work, I do trust the Supplementary Estimates will demonstrate that it has received the Minister's favourable consideration. I again impress upon the Minister the importance of that work. L'Ardoise is situated at a point on the Atlantic coast distant some 60 miles from the harbour of Louisbourg on the east, and there is no harbour on the west for some considerable distance; the nearest being St. Peter's, which is very inconvenient for that locality. The Minister will kindly remember that that is a very large and important section of the country. It is populated entirely by fishermen. The reports in the office of the Minister of Marine will show, that some 200 boats manned by five or six hundred people go out on the bosom of the waters that surround those coasts, day in and day out, during the season, seeking a precarious livelihood from these great waters and not a single shelter have they, except the small shelter formed by that breakwater, which is only partially built, and to which I now draw attention. It was the intention of the late Government to complete this breakwater by extending it further towards the shore, thereby making it more commodious and safer, and also, extending it a little towards the sea, thereby affording a wider area for the boats to shelter in. I again press upon the Minister the absolute necessity of having that work completed at the earliest possible time. I would be sorry to insinuate that such a thing as favoritism prevails with the Minister in the distribution of public money, but I cannot help observing that I find, when I look at these Estimates, that counties which are represented here by Conservatives are in a marked degree absent from these Estimates. Not a single county in the Island of Cape Breton, nor one on the mainland, represented by a Conservative, has a vote in these Estimates that I can find. Surely politics have nothing to do with the construction of works which are absolutely necessary for the preservation of life on our sea-coasts. Such a course was not the policy of the late Government. My hon. friend will see, if he refers to the appropriations in his own department, that the county of Yarmouth was very well looked after by the late Government, although it was then represented in this House by a member very hostile to that Government. The same was the case with the county of Digby, which was represented in the last Parliament by a gentleman who never cast a vote in favour of the late Government. That county was very lavishly provided for by the late Minister of Public Works. Not one of us found fault with this, because these works were works of necessity, and as all the counties contribute to the public treasury, it would be almost criminal to distinguish one county and provide for it handsomely, because it was represented in this House, perhaps accidentally by a gentleman supporting the Administration of the day, and to discriminate against another county which, wisely or otherwise, thought proper to send a gentleman here to represent it who was not in harmony politically with the Government that held sway for the moment. I will ask my hon. friend now if it is his intention to make some provision in the Supplementary Estimates for the work to which I am calling his attention. If so, I personally will appreciate it, and the people who sent me here will appreciate it in no less degree.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not think my hon. friend is quite fair to me. Since the last session of Parliament I have caused a survey to be made at that point, and when the Supplementary Estimates come down, I hope my hon. friend will be pleased. It is not customary to place in the main Estimates votes for works which are not initiated. The main Estimates contain only votes for works which have been begun, and that is the reason why many works which will find a place in the Supplementary Estimates are not mentioned here. My hon. friend is not just when he says that counties represented by opponents of the Government do not receive a fair share of public expenditure. If he will kindly look at these Estimates, he will find that in one case $500 is going to be voted, that $17,500 is voted for the Souris breakwater, and that $12,000 is to be voted for Margaretville pier. When I have to ask this Parliament for money I do not consider whether it is going to be voted for a Liberal county or a Conservative county; it would not be fair to do so. In that respect I quite agree with my hon. friend, and when the Supplementary Estimates come down he will find that the rule he advocates will have received application.

Mr. GILLIES. I am very much obliged to the hon. Minister of Public Works for the kind manner in which he is disposed to look upon the work to which I have drawn his attention; but this is a work that was long ago initiated, and that is why I draw his attention to it on these main Estimates. The plan was made by his own engineer nearly three years ago, and it is now in his department. I am also pleased to know that he is in line with me when I say that it would be a very improper way to distribute public money by signaling one county favourably when it had a representative here supporting the Government, and discriminating against one represented by an opponent of the Government, and that he is likely to be actuated by that view of the matter.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works if anything has been done in connection with a work to which his attention was called last session by my colleague, the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who urged the necessity of a wharf or some other protection for fishing boats at Cape John in that county. While on my feet, I will mention another matter. I was informed by residents of Merigomish, in the county of Pictou, that they had sent a petition to the Minister asking for some grant to extend and strengthen the wharf at that point. They did not use me as a medium, and it is possible that this may be provided for in the vote I see lower down for general repairs and improvements of harbours in maritime provinces.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will look into the facts, as I do not remember now whether we received a petition or not.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). The hon. member for Richmond has referred to me as having been returned by accident. If he will look back to the record he will find that I was elected twelve times the majority which returned him.

Mr. GILLIES. I never mentioned the hon. member for Inverness. In fact I had not the hon. gentleman in my mind at all. I would be delighted to see every grant possible made to the county of Inverness. He is entirely mistaken in the impression that I referred to him as being here by accident, and I should be delighted to see any grant the hon. gentleman applied for, now or in any other session, for Inverness, put in the Estimates.

Prince Edward Island—Souris—Reconstruction of breakwaters at Knight's Point ..... $17,500

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The expenditure up to date on that work has been very large. It has amounted to $171,000. For this year we badly want the sum asked for. A part of the work is under contract and another part is being done by day's work. The amount of the contract is $27,000.

Mr. FISHER. Last year the hon. gentleman got $37,500. There is a re-vote of $10,000 which leaves $27,500, and this year he is asking for $7,500. He is thus asking for $35,000, and the contract is for $27,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The balance will be employed in completing by day's work that part of the work which is not given under contract—the part inside the breakwater which could not be properly given by contract.

West Point wharf, Prince Edward Island.. $6,000

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is to be applied to replace the wharf which was carried away during a gale in 1891. The total cost will be $9,000.

Mr. PERRY. This was a wharf built by the local government of Prince Edward Island some years ago. In 1882 it was handed over to the Dominion Government. It had cost the local government $5,000 or $6,000, but the Dominion Government paid the local government $7,000 for it. Since then the Dominion Government never saw fit to spend a dollar on it just because the county was represented by myself, and the result of this neglect was that the wharf was carried away. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) has thrown out the insinuation against the Minister of Public Works that he is partial and has not treated the county of Richmond properly because it is represented by a Conservative. Well, for the last fifteen years the late Government never spent a dollar on the wharf at West Point. How much money did they spend on the Tignish breakwater? Why, Sir, since 1878 they have not spent $1,- 500 on that breakwater. I contend that Tignish breakwater is second to no port in Prince Edward Island. The $12,500 that the present Government has been kind enough to grant will enable them to build a breakwater from the bar inward, so that the large vessels from Gloucester, N.B., drawing five feet of water, over one hundred of which come there, will be able to go up where there is plenty of water and leave the mouth of the harbour free for other vessels to go in and out. The hon. gentleman says that the present Government is partial, that the hon. Minister is not doing right. Look at this $17,500 which is granted to Souris in King's county. That is not represented by a Liberal, but I hope it will be before long. I know very well that the game played for years by the late Government was to starve the public works of Prince county and to starve out old Perry as well. But old Perry is here, and he is here to stay. The Government deserves credit for doing justice to King's county, and I hope they will not act in any of these things from a party standpoint, but will do justice to every part of Canada. I am not going to back any Government that will do injustice.

Mr. FOSTER. We are glad to hear the familiar voice once more.

Summerside Harbour—Protection works.. $30,000

Mr. FOSTER. This is a large vote.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I quite admit that it is a pretty large amount. And I may immediately say, that if we are going to do this work a very much larger amount than this will be required. The estimated cost of the work is $104,000. We ask only $30,000 this year, because we find we cannot afford to spend more. Of course, we will not do this by day's work.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the whole plan that is to cost $104,000?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. A breakwater 3,000 feet long.

Mr. FOSTER. That would go nearly all around Prince Edward Island.

Mr. POWELL. What is this work wanted for there?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. To make a safe harbour. I have here a plan of the harbour and I would be very glad to show it to my hon. friend (Mr. Powell).

Mr. POWELL. This is already one of the safest harbours of the whole Gulf of St. Lawrence. I have gone in there a dozen times myself after dark.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The report of the engineers of my department, the report of the local engineers who are not appointed by me, and the report of the chief engineer who was not appointed by me, are to the effect that this work is a necessary work. The harbour is filling all the time, and the breakwater is to prevent the sand from drifting in. I will be glad to show the plan to my hon. friend; it is a very interesting piece of work.

Mr. FOSTER. We are such tyros in these matters that we should not understand it, but most of us have been in the harbour.

Mr. PERRY. I want to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works—he has done very well, and I greatly approve of his course—to the fact that there is one item that is omitted—the harbour of Miminegash. This harbour is in want of repairs. A small sum will save it now, but, no doubt, the fall storms will carry off the south part of the work unless some repairs are made.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Miminegash is a name I have heard before and when the Supplementary Estimates are considered, I will be glad to give my attention to the proposal of my hon. friend (Mr. Perry).

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). I would like to ask if the amount here for Souris breakwater is sufficient to cover the expenditure undertaken there?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We hope so.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to call the hon. Minister's attention to the necessity of doing something for the breakwater at Belle River.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Belle River breakwater does not belong to this Government, and I do not see why I should spend public money there.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. Minister is well aware that the Dominion Government has spent money on works in the same position in every part of the Dominion. We are doing that every day. So far as the riding I represent is concerned, I fear there may be a little truth in what has been stated by my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Gillies). There is only a vote of $500 for the whole of East Queen's, while large amounts are appropriated for other parts. There is a revote here of $20,000, I think that amount should have been expended. Now I suppose they are making a show of spending a large amount in Prince Edward Island again, and next year I presume it will be found that very little of it has been actually spent, and that the money will be revoted again. I trust the hon. Minister will not steel his heart against the just claims of my constituents.

Public Works—New Brunswick—Port of St. John..... $16,000

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have resolved to complete the survey of the harbour at St. John first of all. We have no survey at all, and I have made up my mind not to do any more work until we have a survey.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a protection to the harbour which is absolutely necessary, whether there is a survey or not. That has either to be kept up, or the harbour will be destroyed. My hon. friend knows that a large amount of money has been spent there. A system has prevailed of putting in large blocks, and the storms which are very heavy there, will sweep them away. I think within the last two or three years there has been some solid work done there.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Our idea is to join Partridge Island with the works that are now made, so as to fully protect the harbour. But before we do that work, the engineer reports that it is necessary to have a full survey of the harbour.

Mr. FOSTER. There seems to have been only $5,000 spent last year.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In repairs, in making concrete blocks. They have been found to stand very well.

River St. John and tributaries..... $16,000

Mr. FOSTER. Where is this to be expended?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The idea is to build a dredge for inland navigation work, costing about $9,000, and repairs are to be made at the Oromocto dam and a weir is to be constructed at the Oromocto Island. The idea of this work is to give eleven feet of water between Fredericton and St. John, and four feet of water between Fredericton and Woodstock. Of course, it would require a larger sum of money to complete the work.

Mr. FOSTER. This is to be operated above the city?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Public Works—Maritime Provinces in general ..... $10,000

Mr. POWELL. I desire to draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to a breakwater in the county of Westmoreland, the artificial harbour at Cape Tormentine. A large sum of money has been spent upon that, and the department is now brought face to face with a very serious problem indeed, either that work must be abandoned altogether or some immediate repairs must be made. I think $8,000 or $10,000 judiciously expended now, would save in the course of a few years $40,000 or $50,000. A mistake was made at the beginning owing to the fact that creosote wood was not used in the construction, and in consequence the borer or worm that destroys wood in the salt water on the shores of the Gulf, has been very destructive indeed. It has undermined all the woodwork, and the stones in the cribs are now tumbling into the sea. It is not an uncommon thing for immense portions of this work to be case ashore by the tide. The work must be proceeded with at once, in order to save what remains. For years the trade has increased immensely in that harbour. The lumber from the eastern portion of the country is now all shipped there, trade is being drawn there and in a few years, if the harbour is maintained in a state of efficiency, the trade will have largely increased. Last year the Minister of Marine inaugurated a winter steamboat service there, and this winter service must be always maintained, unless my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Domville) is successful in having the tunnel constructed.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend is mistaken as to the cost of the work. If it was only a matter of $10,000 or $15,000, perhaps I would have undertaken it; but reports have been laid before me showing that to put the Tormentine works in a good state of repair, would require $100,000, and the magnitude of that sum frightens me. I quite agree with my hon. friend that this is a work of great importance, and a great mistake was committed when it was constructed with timber that had not been creosoted. In consequence, the work has been nearly destroyed by the worms. I quite agree with him that something must be done. I will bring the question before Council for very serious consideration.

Mr. POWELL. In my estimate of $10,000, I was basing my view upon what would have been sufficient last spring when I called the Minister of Public Works attention to it. In the present state of the harbour, the estimate of the Minister of Public Works may be true, if the report of his engineers is to be relied upon. But this I will say, that if $10,000 or $15,000 had been expended last summer, it would have been sufficient to put the works in a fair state of repair, no matter what the hon. gentleman's engineers may say about it. It is a matter for the exercise of a little common sense. To go to work and rebuild it may take $100,000. But if, when I called the Minister's attention to it last year, $10,000 had been spent simply in dumping stones on the outside—because this borer will not work in the dark—that pier would have been preserved, and the action of the water would not have worn it away. It may be that at present the work of disintegration has proceeded so far that it is necessary to expend $100,000; but $15,000 judiciously expended last year would have saved the expenditure of that large amount.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think my hon. friend is once more mistaken, because if we had done as he proposed the work would have been destroyed all the same. This borer is doing his work all the time. A great mistake was made at the inception of the work, and I do not see how we can remedy it without rebuilding anew.

Mr. POWELL. I acknowledge a mistake was made, and the engineers were either ignorant of what was before them or negligent of their duty. But in respect to dumping this stone on the outside, if the worm has done its destructive work, then it is the action of the tide that completes the work of destruction. The work could be renewed by just planking the inside. Any one who is familiar with engineering is aware that if the planking had been renewed on the inside of the work, the work could have been carried on with very little expense.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will give my immediate attention to the matter.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.). Has the Minister in contemplation the construction of a wharf opposite to Cape Traverse, and has the matter been brought before him in any way?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My attention has been called to the proposed work referred to by the hon. gentleman, but I must remind him that the estimated cost is half a million dollars, and perhaps Parliament would hesitate before granting that sum this year.

Laprairie—Work in connection with ice piers, dredging steamboat channel, &c... $9,000

Mr. FOSTER. Where are these ice piers?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They are opposite Montreal, and as the water is falling there, dredging is essential.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the Government own the wharf?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

River Richelieu—Belle Isle Channel guide piers ..... $6,000

Mr. MONK. What are these guide piers?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot very well explain what they are, but the hon. gentleman can see them outlined on a map which I have here.

Mr. MONK. The reason I make this inquiry is because I understand there are guide piers there at present.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The piers are rotten and are falling into the river. The hon. gentleman may be a very able lawyer, but I must depend on the opinions of my engineer, who has made a careful survey. The Richelieu boat cannot now approach the pier, on account of its bad condition.

Mr. MONK. The piers are there still.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. They must be reconstructed.

River St. Lawrence—Removal of rocks.... $3,000

Mr. FOSTER. Where are these rocks?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They are on the Gaspé coast, and are very dangerous to fishermen. Every year we vote a certain amount of money to remove rocks, so that the fishermen may land there without danger.

Rivière Ste. Anne de la Pérade—Repairs to protection works..... $5,000

Mr. MONK. In regard to repairs for protection works, I would remind the Minister of Public Works of the promise he made to me last year respecting works of a similar nature at Ste. Geneviève. These are necessary, and the hon. gentleman promised that he would look into the matter. He began an investigation three or four days before the 11th of May last, which gave us great encouragement in that part of the county. I hope he will prosecute those investigations and find out whether the works are necessary, and if the inundation of that part of the county is caused by works done by the Dominion Government, he will see that a sufficient sum is placed in the Estimates next year to carry out the necessary works. Although this investigation was made a few days before the 11th of May, nothing has been done, and I desire to keep the matter fresh in the mind of the Minister.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am very glad that my hon. friend has again called my attention to the work at Ste. Geneviève. May is the best month to make these surveys, and they have been made all over the Dominion during that month. That is the reason why the month of May has been chosen.

Mr. MONK. I would ask the Minister to bestow some attention to the wharf which was projected by the late Government to be erected at Pointe Claire in Jacques Cartier county. The result of a survey which was made there was that a wharf would cost about $2,000. Pointe Claire is a short distance from Montreal, on Lake St. Louis. There is a wharf at Lachine, a wharf at Ste. Annes, and on the opposite side of the lake, there is a wharf at Caughnawaga, another at Chateauguay and another at Beauharnois. Pointe Claire, one of the most important places on Lake St. Louis, is the only place without a wharf. That, I believe, the hon. Minister knows himself.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONK. I appeal to the hon. member for Maissonneuve (Mr. Préfontaine) who is familiar with that portion of Montreal, to bear me out in the statement I now make. At Pointe Claire there is the remnant of an old wharf abandoned by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and the establishment of a new wharf would require but a small expenditure by the Government. I trust that the Minister will see his way to erect a wharf there.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I understand that the cost of a wharf at Pointe Claire would be $5,000 or $6,000, but still I quite recognize the importance of Pointe Claire, and I hope that my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) and myself will be able some of these days to rejoice over the building of a wharf there.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I can bear out what the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) has stated. If any place on Lake St. Louis should have a wharf, it should be Pointe Claire. I can well understand why it was not properly treated by the former Conservative Government, because it is one of the most Liberal parishes in the county of Jacques Cartier.

Mr. MONK. That is perhaps an additional reason why the Minister of Public Works should build the wharf.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman is asking for a larger vote this year, still, if we consider the damages suffered by the farmers along the river Ste. Anne, I think something more than mere repairs is required, but considerable protection works are needed. I thought my duty to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to that fact, and ask him to send out an engineer from the department to find out what repairs are required and to see to it that protection works be carried out along the river Ste. Anne. Those protection works are of high importance for that village, which is all the time liable to suffer serious damages from the water. Now, I hope the hon. Minister of Public Works will do all within his power to protect the village from those dangers, both on the east side and on the west side. I wish also to ask the hon. gentleman whether the outlay has exceeded the amount of $3,000 that was appropriated last year, or whether he is going to pay the arrears due in this connection out of this appropriation of $5,000?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). (Translation.) In reply to the hon. gentleman, I may tell him that not a cent over the appropriation was expended; so, at least I understand from the report of the officials of my department. As to the additional $5,000 asked for, we shall try to apply that sum in the best way we can. The hon. member should not forget that these are not purely Dominion works, therefore, I think the people of Ste. Anne are also bound to look after their own interests. However, the Government, in view of the considerable importance of those works, have thought it fit to ask Parliament for this appropriation. But still let the hon. gentleman not forget that these are not purely Dominion works.

Public Works—Ontario..... $306,000

Mr. FOSTER. As a number of the Ontario members are not present to-night I would suggest that the vote for Collingwood Harbour and Rainy River, which are new votes, should be allowed to stand, and that we pass the others.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Very well.

Mr. REID. I understand that the Government have been making a survey at Prescott, and it is generally reported that they intend building a new breakwater there. Is that the case?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We are now dredging at Prescott, but I may say it is not the intention to build a breakwater. We think that by careful dredging we can give all the accommodation that is required at present.

Mr. REID. That is my own opinion, and so far I agree with the Minister. At the same time it was reported that they were going to build a breakwater.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not intend to do so now.

Mr. REID. Did not the Minister receive a deputation about the breakwater?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. REID. I see that the Government tug is there now. Is it the intention to have the dredge to do some dredging?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is going on now.

Mr. REID. It is a very important work, and I am glad he is doing some dredging there, because the large vessels which go to Port Arthur go into Prescott.

Mr. CLANCY. I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the promise made last session with regard to the improvement of the river Sydenham, between Wallaceburg and Dresden. The port of Wallaceburg stands fifth in the list of ports trading with American ports, and this traffic is very much impeded for the want of this necessary work. I see nothing in the Estimates so far, and I wish to ask the hon. gentleman if we may expect that something will be done there during the present season. It is not a large work, but it is a very important one.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am very sorry to have to inform the hon. gentleman that we have no dredges. There are hundreds of calls made upon us which we cannot comply with, for the want of sufficient equipment.

Mr. CLANCY. I understand that the dredge that has been engaged in that work is going to do some work at Port Stanley. I hope the hon. gentleman will see the importance of having this work done.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will give my attention to the remarks of my hon. friend.

Mr. SPROULE. Has the hon. Minister any idea of what it will require to finish the dredging at Owen Sound harbour?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. About $50,000.

Toronto Harbour—Works at eastern entrance ..... $20,000

Mr. CLARKE. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works if any changes have been made in the plans for the works at the eastern end of the island? Has any appropriation been made for the protection of the western end of the island? I understand that deputations waited on the Minister and pointed out to him the necessity of taking some means by the construction of groynes or otherwise to protect that part of the island. Is it the intention that this sum shall be devoted entirely to the extension of the works at the eastern end, or will there be a further sum in the Supplementary Estimates to provide for the protection of the western end?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. As my hon. friend says, a deputation waited on me a few months ago and urged the construction of groynes. The plans submitted to us were not altogether accepted at the time. I do not know whether there will be groynes, as suggested; but we are bound to do something and my chief engineer is now giving his best attention to that question.

Mr. CLARKE. I may say that the work now being performed at the eastern end of the island unless supplemented by other works further west, will very seriously affect the western end. Heavy seas are being diverted to the south-western part of the island, which is not at all protected.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. A pretty large portion of this sum will be employed for dredging. My attention was called last year to the necessity of building groynes to protect the western end of the island, but we have not yet made up our minds as to the kind of work that is required. I understand that it is a pretty difficult matter.

Mr. CLARKE. Can the hon. Minister give us any idea of what further sum will be required to complete the works at the eastern end of the island?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. About $80,000 in addition to this.

Goderich Harbour..... $53,000

Mr. FOSTER. What is the whole cost of this harbour to be?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This sum covers the whole cost of the work, which is now under contract.

Resolutions to be reported.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.25 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 21st May, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Bill (No. 66) respecting the Canadian Power Company.—(Mr. Gibson.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved:

That when the House adjourns this day, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, the 25th instant, at three o'clock p.m.

Mr. BRITTON. Is it understood that Thursday of next week will be a holiday, and that there will be no session of the House on that day?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Thursday is Ascension Day, and is, therefore, I think, of necessity a holiday, and has always been observed as such.

Mr. WALLACE. Is Thursday a statutory holiday for this House?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It is a statutory holiday. This House has sometimes disregarded statutory holidays, as the hon. gentleman knows; but I do not suppose that we shall trifle with tender consciences by sitting on Thursday.

Mr. WALLACE. If the House would sit on Thursday, and not sit on Wednesday, it would suit the convenience of members much better.

Mr. FOSTER. Call Wednesday Ascension Day.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would suggest that the Government give Saturday of next week to private members, in place of Monday. There are a great many items in the Public Bills and Orders. It is within the knowledge of the House that the entire time of the last session of the last Parliament was taken up with the Remedial Bill, so that there was no legislation at all, and in the last session of this Parliament there was no time for legislation in the hands of private members. This year, owing to the Queen's Jubilee, the Government are trying to get through with the business of the session, and I do not for a moment wish to stand in their way; at the same time, there are no less than twenty-four Bills in Public Bills and Orders, some reached once, and some twice, and I would suggest that the Government take into their consideration whether they would not give us Saturday of next week for private members instead of Monday. We have to be here, and let us have that day as well as the following Monday, and we shall be able to get through the list pretty well.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. We will consider the hon. gentleman's suggestion between this and Tuesday.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL ASSENT TO BILLS.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The Speaker of the House of Commons has received the following letter from His Excellency the Governor General's secretary:—

Governor General's Office,
Ottawa, 21st May, 1897.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General will proceed to the Senate Chamber this afternoon, at 5 o'clock, for the purpose of giving assent to such Bills as have been passed by Parliament.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,

DAVID ERSKINE,
Governor General's Secretary.

FAST ATLANTIC SS. SERVICE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce to a statement which appears in this morning's "Citizen"

Within a day or two Sir Richard Cartwright may be able to make the announcement in the House, that the contract made with Messrs.

Peterson, Tate & Company, of Newcastle, for a fast Atlantic service, has been concluded. The terms of this offer, entailing a subsidy of $500,000 a year from the Dominion Treasury for ten years, have already been embodied in a provisional contract with the Canadian Government, and has only awaited the sanction of the Imperial authorities. This, it is learned, has been obtained. The Government yesterday received a telegram from Mr. Chamberlain, Secretary of State for the Colonies, stating that the contract, which had been under consideration for some time by the Admiralty, had been approved by the Imperial Government. And this is understood to mean that Her Majesty's Government has also consented to contribute the promised annual subsidy of $350,000.

Is this information authentic?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). No notification, so far as I am advised, has been received from the Imperial authorities.

SUPPLY BILL—QUEEN'S JUBILEE CELEBRATION.

Bill (No. 112) for granting to Her Majesty the sum of $26,000, required for defraying certain expenses of the militia contingent to be sent to England for the jubilee of Her Majesty in June, 1897, was considered in committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

PROTECTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS.

Bill (No. 105) to amend the Act respecting the protection of navigable waters was read the second time, and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The only object is to enable the department to remove obstructions in navigable waters without incurring liability to the owners of wrecks, and the immediate object is to remove a wreck from a ledge lying off a harbour in British Columbia. It provides that if the proprietor of the wreck does not remove it, we can remove it at his expense. The Bill passed the Senate under the late Government, but was not in time to pass this House, and having received the approval of both Governments, it cannot be the subject of any controversy.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY—ALASKAN BOUNDARY.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before you leave the Chair, I would like to call the attention of the Government to the question of the Alaskan boundary. I see by the papers that an agreement has been entered into between the Imperial Government and the Government of the United States, and that that measure is now before the Senate of the United States. This is a very important question, considering the character of the mineral discoveries immediately along the boundary, and I think it would be well for the Government to lay on the Table any information they have in regard to this matter and the terms of the treaty which has been entered into. I merely mention the matter now in order that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) may be prepared to lay upon the Table of the House any information on this subject in possession of the Government.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The arrangement between the two governments was not an arrangement which involved any departure from what was already understood, but simply laying down of the boundary that had been agreed upon, a scientific determination of the 141st meridian. There is no objection to laying the papers on the Table if the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) so desires.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should be very glad if the House were given whatever information is in possession of the Government, because there is in connection with that question a matter of very great importance looking to the value of that section of the country.

BICYCLES AS BAGGAGE.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before the Railway Committee yesterday, a statement was made with regard to the Intercolonial Railway having for some time, carried bicycles as baggage. I would like to know how long it is since that arrangement was made and by whose instruction. It is generally understood that railways charge for carrying bicycles, but here is a railway owned by the Dominion and run by the Government at a loss of about half a million dollars a year to the people, carrying bicycles free, while, in other parts of the Dominion, wheelmen have to pay for the carriage of bicycles. I would like to know under what circumstances and under whose instructions a system of that kind was established on the Intercolonial, when it was not adopted by other railways throughout the country.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I very gladly furnish the information asked for by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen). The arrangement referred to has been in existence for some little time. I trust that it will not be assumed, because I do not particularly refer to it, that I accept the hon. gentleman's statement as to the balance against the Intercolonial Railway under the present administration or for this year. The amount, I think, has not run up to anything like what the hon. gentleman says of late years. Last year the gross deficit on the running of the Intercolonial was about one-tenth of the amount named by my hon. friend. When the hon. gentleman mentioned the matter to me. I wired the general manager at Moncton to give me a statement of the mode adopted by the management in respect of the carriage of bicycles, and how long the system had been in operation that is now in vogue. And he made this reply :

We have not charged, on the Intercolonial, for carrying bicycles. They are carried in the same way as baby-carriages are carried. Bicycles actually in use by passengers are carried free, but carried entirely at the risk of the owner as to injury or loss. If the bicycle and any other baggage of a passenger combined weigh more than 100 pounds, excess is charged for the over-weight. The passenger is required to sign a release freeing the railway from any claim for damages. The use of bicycles has gradually grown, and at first, I believe, all railways carried them without charge. About a year ago, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway began to charge for them, and the question arose whether we should do the same. But I thought it better to wait until arrangements concerning traffic were completed. Of course, we do not find the carrying of bicycles so onerous as railways do that run near large cities and in a thickly-settled country.

DUTY ON COAL OIL.

Mr. DAVIN. I have a notice of motion on the Orders, and I wish to explain to the House and to the country why I think it useless to move that motion. The motion is as to the duty on coal oil. I had, on the same Order paper, a notice respecting the duty on agricultural implements and other matters, and, when it came to the vote, those gentlemen in this House from whom I might have expected support did not support me.

An hon. MEMBER. Name.

Mr. DAVIN. Is it necessary to name them? Why, they are known to fame already. But I will name them, seeing my hon. friend asks me to do so. One of them is the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). He certainly was bound to support me, because he had his constituency placarded with bills, "Vote for Richardson and free implements." And I suppose that when he goes back to his constituency, as go back he will within two or three months, he will have it placarded, "Vote for Richardson who voted for keeping the duty on agricultural implements."

Now, I am not going to impugn the motives of these hon. gentlemen, my hon. friend from East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) and other gentlemen who came into this House professing Patronism. I have no right to do it. On the contrary, I assume that they have voted as they have done with the best of motives as they understand it and up to their lights. They seem to be under the impression that no good could come from a vote for a motion if their voting were to be in a minority; and I find that some newspapers that used to take an interest in these questions and used to advocate free implements also take the view that a man should never bring forward a motion in this House if he is likely to be left in the minority. Because that is what it comes to. The size of the minority is nothing, for if you are beaten by a majority of two you are beaten just the same as if you had against you 90 per cent of the vote.

I will not refer to a past debate, but I believe it is proper to refer, when dealing with the tariff, to anything that has taken place on a previous occasion in this House when the same subject was under discussion. I may say, then, that some time ago I referred to what took place in England—how Mr. Villiers came forward in 1841, though in hopeless minority in the English Parliament, and moved that motion which, by being pressed again in 1842, in 1843, and 1844, so affected public opinion in England, that at last the greatest parliamentary England ever saw, Sir Robert Peel, adopted Mr. Villiers' policy. I also referred to the case of the ballot. I pointed out how Mr. Grote, the Greek historian, came forward with a motion in favour of vote by ballot. He was hopelessly voted down. After three terms, I think, he retired from the House of Commons, and then Mr. Henry Berkeley took up the cause of the ballot, and brought it forward yearly, and was, yearly, as hopelessly voted down. And yet the time came when the ballot was adopted by the House of Commons and became part of the law of England. But, Sir, to show that it is useful to divide the House, even if you should be in a minority, to show that it is useful to press a Government, even though that Government may have the sympathy of the Opposition and may be in a position to sit upon your motion, to show that that is the way, really, to affect opinion inside and outside of this House, I have a case in point, in the records of this House, and that case will kill two birds with one stone. In these debates, we have had a statement made that I was very valiant to bring forward motions for the farmers, but that, after proposing these motions and fighting for them, I, nevertheless, never divided the House. I remember my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries saying that he would be very glad indeed if I could point out a single case where I divided the House against my own Government. He thought it was impossible. I do not blame him for that, because he knows very well how rare it is in a Parliament where we have party so highly organized, for any man to divide the House against the Government of the party to which he belongs. Now, in 1887

I brought forward in this House a motion to do justice to those who, by the legislation of 1886, had been deprived of the right they got in 1883, a right for second homesteads. I did not contend for the principle of second homesteads, I was contending simply that persons to whom a certain right was given by the legislation of 1883 and who were unjustly deprived of that right by the legislation of 1886, should be placed in the position that justice demanded. I brought it forward in 1887. My friends in and out of this House smiled at me for doing it, for my temerity, for my folly. They thought it was impossible that I should succeed, there was no chance of doing anything, the opinion of the House was absolutely against me. I brought it forward in 1888, again in 1890, and again in 1891. Now, I call the attention of my hon. friends in this House who represent Patron constituencies, to what occurred, and I call the attention to it of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), who, I am sure, mistakingly, not wilfully, misrepresented me in regard to this matter. I am carrying out and illustrating a principle, and a parliamentary method; I am carrying out a promise that I gave him and others that if these misstatements were repeated, however innocently, in this House, I would bring forward evidence that the statements made all over the west, in newspapers whose interest it is to malign and misrepresent me, and statements sometimes made in this House, had no foundation. Now, having brought forward that question again and again, on June 1st, 1891, I moved:

That, whereas in 1893 an Act was passed granting second homesteads to those settlers who had completed the conditions of the first homestead entry; and whereas in 1866 an Act was passed abolishing the policy of second homesteads; and whereas in 1887 an Act was passed which acknowledged the principle and right of those second homesteads, it should now be enacted that all those settlers who came in between the 1st of June, 1883, and 2nd June, 1886, should, on completing their improvements, be granted a second homestead.

We had a debate, in which I find that the leader of the then Opposition, the present Prime Minister, took part, and the then Minister of the Interior (Mr. Dewdney) took part, and opposed my motion; Sir John Thompson took part in the debate, my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) took part, as did also Mr. Watson, who then represented Marquette; Col. Tisdale, Mr. Macdowall, Mr. Daly, Mr. Mills of Bothwell, Mr. Trow, then whip of the Opposition; Mr. O'Brien and Mr. German. I want to point out to these gentlemen, and I want to point out to the west, that at the very time when I was on the comble of the wave to win, from the very men that I might have expected support, from the very men from the North-west Territories, from the representatives of Saskatchewan, Brandon and Marquette, I received opposition. Yet what did

I do? I determined to divide the House. In order to knock me off, Sir Hector Langevin said:

I spoke to the leader of the Opposition at the beginning of this sitting, and, though the news that we had then was not so serious as that we have now,—

He referred to a lamentable matter, namely, the impending demise of our great leader, Sir John A. Macdonald.

—I said we would probably ask for an adjournment at six o'clock, and the hon. gentleman agreed with me. I will now move the adjournment of the debate, and we will take care that the hon. member for West Assiniboia will not lose his place on the paper.

Now, Sir, I believe it is known with certainty that neither in this House at the time nor in the country, was there one man who felt more keenly what was taking place in a neighbouring mansion than I felt, nevertheless I had a duty to perform to my constituents, and I was determined to perform it, and you will find the following in "Hansard":—

Mr. DAVIN. Do I understand the leader of the Government to say that my question will stay at the head of the paper?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We will give the hon. gentleman a chance of having his motion discussed.

Mr. DAVIN. Will the leader of the Government fix a place on the paper for it? I ask this question because I am pledged to divide the House on this question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Divide it now.

Mr. LAURIER. I must say to my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), that, according to the rules of the House, if a motion for the adjournment of the debate is carried, his motion goes to the bottom of the paper. I should myself object to the adjournment, because I think a vote ought to be taken, and I believe he has a grievance. It is true that the hon. gentleman opposite told me, at the beginning of the sitting, of the condition of Sir John Macdonald, and that I said that I would be ready at any time to adjourn the House; but I am not ready to agree to the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. DAVIN. For the reasons I have stated, I cannot consent to the adjournment of the debate. I have carried my constituency with the whole weight of authority against me,—

And I carried it, mind you; I want hon. gentlemen to remember that I carried it with the weight of the House and with the weight of the Government against me.

—and I am pledged to my constituents to divide the House on this very question.

The House divided and the vote stood 87 to 73, the Government had a majority of only 14. What occurred after that? Sir John Thompson came and told me that he would put not only the Bill dealing with Dominion lands, but all my other Bills upon the Government Orders. I want to point this out to the Patrons, that if they want their principles carried out, it is not by silently and tamely lying down behind the

Mr. DAVIN.

Government, but by pressing them in this House and fighting for them like men. On the 3rd of August, when I had a Bill, No. 108, on the paper, as well as the motion which I have read:

Order being called for resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Davin,—

That is, on the adjournment. Mr. Davin said:

I may explain that the principle of this motion is embodied in my Bill (No. 108) further to amend the Dominion Lands Act, and I think that the Government are likely to place that Bill on the Government Orders, so that I need not proceed with the discussion of this motion. I, therefore, move that the Order be discharged.

On September 18th Mr. Dewdney had his Bill, the Dominion Lands Act, before the House for the second reading, and on that occasion Mr. Davin, amongst other things, said:

I hope the Minister and the Government have considered the suggestion I ventured to make on the first reading of this Bill. I had a Bill on the paper and a resolution with regard to one of the clauses, and the House will remember that there was a very strong feeling in favour of a resolution embodying the principle of one of the clauses, and that feeling was expressed by a vote in this House, and there were other means taken to express the same sentiment. I withdrew that resolution, and I also refrained from moving the second reading of the Bill, because I was told by the Government that my Bill would be placed on the Government Orders. The reason it was not placed on the Government Orders was, that the Minister of the Interior brought down a Bill, and there would have been two Bills dealing with Dominion Lands on the Government Orders. The Minister of Justice is not here, but he told me that he would make a statement to the House at any convenient time, declaring that that was the position of the Government. Therefore, I assume that the principle of these clauses in Bill No. 108 is agreed to by the Government. One of the clauses deals with the prevention of the pollution of the waters, another deals with the sale of homesteads for taxes, and another deals with second homesteads. I assume that the principle of these clauses has been acceded to by the Government.

The Bill went into committee. I had had some conversation with Sir John Thompson, and it was agreed that while two of the clauses of my Bill were embodied in the then legislation, this one should be held over in order that they might learn certain facts that the Government thought it desirable to know before adopting that clause.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Bill is reported, I trust that the hon. Minister of Justice will say something about the second homestead clause, because we really had a kind of understanding, though not such as pledged the Minister or the Government, that the matter would be placed in a more satisfactory position.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I certainly did promise that I would state our views upon the question of second homesteads before the Bill should be disposed of, at the time that the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) presented his resolution to the House.

Now, mark this, Mr. Speaker, he took a hostile view of the principle of the resolution. Even so late as 1891 we had the then leader of this House taking the same hostile view that Sir John A. Macdonald had taken year after year, when I was fighting here for my life against a powerful Government, and against a feeling on this side of the House against myself.

At the time the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) presented his resolution to the House, I took a hostile view of the principle of the resolution; but I specially urged the House to adjourn the discussion of the matter for some time, in consideration of two views. One view, which was put forward not only in the argument of the hon. gentleman, but in petitions which had just then been placed upon the Table, was, that there were persons in the list of claimants who had peculiar claims in relation to second homesteads; and the other was, that the conceding of the principle involved a very large extent of the public domain.

He goes on to explain that the Government were desirous to know the exact extent of the public domain, which, he said, would be millions of acres, that would be alienated under the conditions of my contention, if my contention were adopted. We had the Dominion Lands Act amended in 1891, and I sat next to the Minister of the Interior with my Bill in my hand, and he asked me for the clauses. Clause 12 I handed to him just as it is; also clause 14, which provides in respect to the pollution of water, which has been a boon of the greatest value to the North-west. In 1892 my clause literally as I handed it to the Minister, will be found as 4:

The clause substituted by section five of chapter thirty-one of the Statutes of 1887 for clause forty-three of the said Act, is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor.

And it embodies the 'ipsissima verba' of my own clause, as drafted by myself, and it was placed in that legislation. What does that show? It shows the same thing as occurred in the case of Mr. Villiers in regard to the Corn Laws, and in regard to Mr. Grote and Mr. Berkeley in regard to the ballot, that if any hon. member supporting a Government takes the course that is freely taken in England, in that Parliament which is the august mother of all the colonial parliaments where he is never looked upon as a worse party man if he shows himself independent he is bound in the end to succeed. Take the present leader of the Liberal party, Sir William Vernon Harcourt I have seen him attack the policy of Mr. Gladstone, Bills introduced by Mr. Gladstone and features of Mr. Gladstone's policy and yet subsequently he became the trusted Chancellor of the Exchequer of the Liberal Government, and is now the leader of the Liberal party. It would be of immeasurable advantage to hon. members of this House if we could only bring the methods of the English Parliament into this Parliament, if instead of having two machines here, a Government in power with a hundred and twenty or a hundred and fifty members supporting it, and every one of them here not to give the country the benefit of his judgment, knowledge and ability, but coming here to watch the leader stand up, and then like jacks-in-the-box up they are—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not say that against your party. This remark applies to every party in this country, because we have not the methods that obtain in the English Parliament. Those young members who have come into Parliament and who think that is the proper course for them to take, are doing great harm to the country, to themselves and to their cause. Look at what harm they are doing to themselves.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. DAVIN. It is not carried just yet. I think my views will carry by-and-by, but it will take a much longer time to carry them—I do not expect such an easy job as that.

An hon. MEMBER. Take it as read.

Mr. DAVIN. If I do so, I will let down the hon. gentleman too easily, for I am going to point out the slough in which one of his colleagues in the Liberal party is wallowing now. I have here the Winnipeg "Tribune." I do not think much importance should be attached to the utterances of that paper, for if I can believe my eyes, it is now denouncing a railway project that it strongly advocated four or five days ago, declaring in unqualified terms that it would be a boon to Manitoba and the North-west. It would seem as regards the "Tribune" that something extraordinary has taken place. I do not know whether the "Tribune" was put in a corner and golden spectacles put on its nose or not, in order to enable it to see matters from a wholly different standpoint. The "Tribune" published an article on June 17th, seven days before the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) was declared its representative here. It is headed, "The Manitoba Candidates"—that independent and precious batch of members who came here to show us what free western men are, to show us how those free and independent western men, who are supposed to have a streak of greater daring than other men in any part of Canada, would act. The "Tribune" discusses among others Mr. McCarthy, and his name appropriately precedes that of the hon. member for Lisgar. Here is what it says about Mr. McCarthy:

It is needless to enlarge upon the qualifications of Mr. Dalton McCarthy, whose reputation is Dominion-wide.

I may say in that connection what a favourite of the North-west Mr. McCarthy was; he took the North-west under his wing; the dual language in the North-west Territories was a pang to his sensitive soul; the school system of the North-west Territories wounded him to the heart. We have at the present time the same state of things precisely as when the hon. gentleman talked violently from platforms in this city and from his place in this House to divide the people of this country in race and religion. But where has he taken himself now?

Mr. BENNETT. He is under the barn.

Mr. DAVIN. He is under the barn. I suppose; to use the classic phrase that has been given us by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). Now, this is what this paper says of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson):

Of Mr. Richardson, the anti-coercion candidate in Lisgar, whose connection with this journal is well known, nothing further need be said than that he will, as a member of Parliament, stand by every pledge and principle which he has given or advocated as a candidate.

And the pledges he gave were: to put binder twine, and barbed wire, and farm implements, and coal oil, and the cheaper cottons, all on the free list. Richardson and free implements! Where is Richardson and free implements to-day?

An hon. MEMBER. Under the barn again.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, he is not under the barn yet, for the rain has gone and the sun is shining out, and the fashionable Richardson is away forgetful of the farmers, and enjoying the otium cum dignitate that belongs to a favoured supporter of a successful government.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Carried.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, no. I know you would like to have it carried and I would do anything to oblige the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell), but I cannot stop just now for him. Then, Sir, on 19th June we have the startling head-line, and we know what an immense lot was made out of head-lines in this House some time ago. I have to travel in the wake of those superior persons whose independence I admire so much. It is impossible for me to give full vent to the heart deep admiration I have for the brilliant creatures that astonish the world on the opposite benches. Here we have the "Tribune" of 19th June, and here are the headings that stare me in the face:

Patrons will not be fooled.

Mr. McMILLAN. And you were not able to fool them.

Mr. DAVIN. I never tried. Does the hon. member mean, that the Government can do what I have failed in? I grant you that up to the present you have fooled them, but you cannot fool them all along.

Patrons will not be fooled.

Mr. DAVIN.

This was the assurance given in that heading. But, Sir, we have here what is of much more importance now than anything the member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) could say; we have the utterances of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior. He will remember having been a leading star at the Brydon rink in Winnipeg, and he had a paragraph in his speech which is headed: "The National Policy arraigned." Here is what he said:

He would just say this, that whatever arguments could be advanced for the National Policy in the east, none could be advanced here, where the National Policy bore heavily on and kept back the farming community. Here was a fact to consider. It had been stated by a gentleman conversant with the facts, that the Massey-Harris binder, which sold in Winnipeg for $140, was sold in Glasgow for $75. Here the Canadian farmer was unduly burdened, as against his competitors. The great competitors of the Canadian farmers were, among others, those in the Argentine Republic, and in that country they were buying their machines for about half what the Canadian farmer had to pay for them. Another competitor was Australia. Now, was it not time to think about these things and to see if something could not be done for the farmer, who had to fight against these competitors, who brought the price of wheat down to 40 cents a bushel? Is it not time to forget party and do something for the good of the country?

That is what my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior said. But, Sir, the duty to-day is the same on agricultural implements as when he made that speech; the duty is the same in protecting the Massey-Harris Company as when my hon. friend made that speech; and not only that, but Massey-Harris, and the hon. member of this House who is a manufacturer of farm implements; they have got their iron lower, they have been put in a better position, and the duty on the implements remains the same, and we have not heard one word from my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) who is the leader of these gentlemen, to explain how it is, that he has not succeeded in getting his colleague to give us agricultural implements free, as he said they would be given.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have shown that my hon. friends could do something if they had supported me the other day. I have shown that if these gentlemen will themselves take the lead and move in these matters—and I would be most happy to walk humbly behind them as their supporter—they could do something to make this Government keep its pledges with the farmers of Canada, and its pledges with the Patrons. My hon. friend from East Assinibola (Mr. Douglas) has declared authoritatively that the Patrons did not want anything on the free list. Why, Sir, I have the authoritative programme of the Patrons here, and this is it:

Tariff for revenue only. Farm implements, binding twine, fence wire, nails, lumber, coal oil, to be free of duty.

Mark that. Farm implements amongst the things that should be free ; nails amongst the things that should be free ; lumber and coal oil amongst the things that should be free ; the very things that I am fighting for here, Sir. Why, I am a better Patron than any of them.

Mr. ROGERS. You are stating what is false now.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. ROGERS. I take it back.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) must withdraw the expression he has just used.

Mr. ROGERS. I will, Mr. Speaker. He is not quoting from the Patron platform now.

Mr. DAVIN. Do I understand my hon. friend (Mr. Rogers) to say that this is not authoritative ?

Mr. ROGERS. You are not reading from the Patron platform.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I have it published in the "Standard," which is one of the Patron papers in the west.

Mr. ROGERS. That is not the Patron platform.

Mr. DAVIN. Does the hon. gentleman deny this :

First, the maintenance of British connection. Is that true ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I do not think it is right to catechise in that way.

Mr. DAVIN. What is it the Postmaster General is muttering ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I was stating to Mr. Speaker, if you desire to know, that I do not think it is quite in order for a member of the House to proceed categorically to examine another member of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest that if my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) speaks to the Speaker, it would be only courtesy for him to rise on his feet.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That is why I rose.

Mr. FOSTER. You spoke before you rose.

Mr. DAVIN. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I will not mind my hon. friend the Postmaster General ; there is not very much in that. When my hon. friend the Postmaster General says something that is worth my while to deal with I will deal with it. Here we have the minutes of the fourth annual meeting of the Grand Association of Ontario, of Patrons of Industry, held in the Temperance Hall, Toronto, on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday of March, 1895, with Mr. Mallory, Grand President, in the chair. I suppose that is authoritative. I suppose I shall have to say to my hon. friend what I said to the member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) that he is really not everybody, and that he does not apparently carry the Patrons in his pocket, any more than he carries out their pledges in this House. Here is what is in this pamphlet published in 1895 :

Luxuries shall be taxed to the fullest revenue-producing extent, and the following shall be admitted free into Canada, viz.:—cotton, tweeds, woollens, workmen's tools, farm implements, fence wire, binder twine, coal oil, iron and corn.

Well, Sir, is that not satisfactory ? I want to call the attention of the House and the country to this. As a great Italian writer said of Italy, if I may compare very great things with very small, "Would that I could have my hands in her hair, that I might wake her up." I know that in this case it would be hard for me to get my hands in the hair of the hon. member ; but certainly I wish I could do something to wake him up to the principles which he is pledged to follow. Here is a peculiar thing : When I am stating here the Patron platform and advocating it, a Patron stands up and actually says it is not the Patron platform at all. The blandishments and allurements of polite society have recently so bewildered and hypnotized him that he is ready to say with the Irishman, "I am not myself at all."

Mr. ROGERS. I ask the hon. gentleman to give me the privilege of reading two or three paragraphs of the Patron platform.

Mr. DAVIN. I have the floor, and the hon. gentleman can reply to me afterwards. Now, what I have said is also a reply to what was said by the "Patrons Sentinel" last year, when I moved a similar motion. That paper said :

Messrs. Davin and Boyd brought forward a resolution in the House of Commons last week to place farm machinery, binder twine and coal oil on the free list, when a revision of the tariff takes place ; but the motion was voted down, supporters of the Government taking the attitude that the matter should be left over till the whole question was under consideration. It would have done no harm, however, to have placed themselves on record as favourable to the change, as their vote against the resolution will not strengthen the confidence of the farmers in their professions of paternal solicitude for the interests of agriculturists.

This is what the "Patrons Sentinel" said last year when they had the excuse, that the tariff was not brought down ; but now, when the tariff is brought down, and is taken back, and we are within two or three days when it will be brought down again, as a revised tariff, I am taking one of the last opportunities we have of urging on the Government to give us free implements and free coal oil, or greatly reduced duties on both. Now, it was said that we accomplished nothing. I have shown what I accomplished almost single-handed—yes, single-handed. By pressing the Government in regard to binder twine and implements in years past, I got my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance to put implements down to 20 per cent, and reduce the duty on binder twine and barbed wire 50 per cent, and I was confident had they remained in power to get implements, lumber—all those things free. A Tory Government, on protectionist principles, pressed by me, reduced implements from 35 per cent to 20 per cent at one stroke, while a Liberal Government does not take a cent of duty off, but gives some additional protection to the manufacturer. That is the difference between them. Look at this picture, and then on that, the counterfeit presentment of two Finance Ministers—one an honest protectionist and Conservative, who says he will do the best he can for the country, the other a blatant free trader, who went from one end of his own province to the other proclaiming himself a free trader and leading a party many members of which declared that there should be no duty on coal oil, as it was one of the necessities of life. I heard the Postmaster General make that declaration; and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in and out of this House, declared that coal oil ought to be free. Yet, what do we find? We find two Finance Ministers—the one a Tory, if you will, who takes 15 per cent off; the other, after having promised, vicariously and directly to remove the duty, does nothing at all but strengthen the hands of the supposed enemy of the farmer. One is an honest statesman; the other is—well, you can describe him as you please. In 1894 the ex-Finance Minister brought down his revision of the tariff, and there was a general discussion in regard to coal oil, the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) leading the way. The tax, he said, bore with special weight on the maritime provinces; and I am told that in Halifax the changes were rung on the duty on coal oil until coal oil seemed to be the great staple of discussion in that contest. The duty before the reduction of the late Government was a specific duty of seven and one-fifth cents per gallon. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries asserted that the protection amounted to 123 per cent on the coal oil imported into Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; and he concluded with a touching appeal for sweeping away the enormous monopoly. This is what he said—and I wish I could imitate the Boanergean style in which, with the echo of the sea in his ears, he thundered out:

I plead on behalf of the mass of the people; not on behalf of the rich people in the cities and towns, who have their electric light and gas, but for the great mass of the people, who are obliged to buy this oil. This is class legislation of the worst kind. It bears most seriously upon the maritime provinces, and it bears with enormous weight upon the poorer classes in the maritime provinces.

Yet the present Government have 5 cents a gallon on it still, or about 80 per cent, with no sign that it is to be swept away. I see my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) smiling. I do not think we shall hear from him about coal oil. He is one of the distributors of the coal oil, and they are as much responsible for the high price of coal oil in the North-west as anybody else. My hon. friend has about 20 cents on every gallon of coal oil he sells: and yet he is a friend not only of the Government, but of those who properly talk so much about the burdensome and extravagant duty. Mr. Casey was also eloquent upon the subject. He said that the oil producers in the west were ringsters and combinesters. The duty on petroleum he declared to be a protection of 150 per cent, which was outrageous and should be cut down at least one-half. Now, what is the result of all this now? The duty is reduced from 6 to 5 cents per gallon on the refined and from 3 cents to 2½ cents per gallon on the crude. The duty of 6 cents a gallon, which was hitherto enforced, the Liberals declared to be a protection of 100 per cent, and a measure of extortion which the late Government allowed the combines to practise on the people at large. But now they have a protection of from 80 to 85 per cent in the shape of 5 cents per gallon. I spoke a short time ago about the mesmeric influence of polite society on my Patron friend, who wanted to interject something that was not a point of order. I should like to know whether the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) has mesmerized his colleagues and the Government and converted them to his views on this subject. I hope that on Tuesday next, as the result of the ventilation of these things in this House, we shall see coal oil on the free list in the revised tariff which is to be brought before us, or else greatly reduced. I hope, above all, that we shall see lumber on the free list, which, the other day, I moved should be put on that list. Sir, that duty upon lumber is a fearful impost on settlers in those prairies out west. All you have to do, when you have 20 per cent upon lumber, is to divide the cost of a farm house on these vast prairies by five, and the quotient gives you what is paid into the treasury by the farmer. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) told us in his speech in the rink at Winnipeg how this duty pressed heavily on the farmers. He knows well that there is a combine not far from Winnipeg, and I hope we shall have his influence in the direction in which I am now pleading. There is a gentleman in this House who is no longer capable of taking part in our debates, owing to his high office, but who, in other years, eloquently discoursed upon the necessity of reducing the duty upon the cheaper cottons. Well, Sir, that duty has not been decreased but increased by this tariff. With regard to those cheaper cottons, I have also urged the Government to lower the tariff. But we have a stronger support than the hon. gentleman I have mentioned, who is not in the Government, we have one of the Ministers themselves, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) who, we all know, with his unmeasured power of eloquent vituperation, branded these duties upon the necessaries of life as legalized robbery, and used still stronger expressions than my limited power of enunciation would enable me to get round—all denunciatory of the very men, of whom the tariff of this Government is in the interest, as much as any tariff could well be. I hope we shall see implements on the free list or at least the duty reduced. I am not going to move a motion because we have the declarations of those hon. gentlemen that they are going to stand by the Government through thick and thin. They have left the independent position of Patrons, they have taken up their position, not on a Patron but on a Liberal base, as thick and thin supporters of the Government; and what their conduct means is this, that on every Patron in this House, Ichabod is written. Their glory is departed, their usefulness is gone, they can effect nothing. The principles they undertook, the pledges they made, the promises they scattered broadcast over the western prairies, and on the strength of which they were elected—all these are now obliterated and trodden under foot by these men who came here—I was about to say on false pretences, but will refrain from doing so—and who have falsified their promises and pledges in a way that it is depressing to contemplate, that is degrading to parliamentary life and injurious to the country.

FAST STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. WALLACE. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I understood the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, in his reply to the leader of the Opposition, to say that the Government had no intimation from the Imperial Government regarding the trans-Atlantic service. I would like to ask whether they have had any communication from Mr. Peterson, of Newcastle, with regard to the signing of the contract. I would like to ask, also, whether there is any ground for the rumour that has been circulated that Mr. Peterson, of Peterson, Tate & Company, of Newcastle, the gentleman who contracted for these steamships, is a German, and that the German Government is making up a portion of the subsidy required for the fast Atlantic service, and that in return the company will give preferential rates on German freight from Great Britain to Canada?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I have not heard of any such rumour, or that Mr. Peterson is a German. So far as I can recollect, he is a Scandinavian.

An hon. MEMBER. He is a Dane.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I shall make it my particular business to inquire whether Mr. Peterson has entered into a contract with Kaiser Wilhelm for the purpose of giving preferential rates, but I am afraid my hon. friend has been what, in vulgar parlance, is called stuffed. We have not received any communication from Mr. Peterson other than the report that everything is going satisfactorily.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Public Works—Chargeable to Income—

Collingwood Harbour—Improvement of. $80,000

Mr. BENNETT. Before this item passes, I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works what the intention of the Government is with regard to a large contract which it is rumoured the Government is about to undertake. A short time ago, in answer to an inquiry, the hon. Minister of Public Works said that already the large sum of over one-quarter of a million dollars had been expended on the harbour of the town of Collingwood, and if rumour is right, a contract now for considerably over $250,000 is to be let, or has been let, with the view of completing the work at that town. At the outset, I do not wish to be understood as remonstrating against an expenditure at the town of Collingwood in this regard. I fully realize the fact that, owing to the falling of the waters of Lake Huron, the people of Collingwood have been placed at a very manifest disadvantage. A large town of some 6,000 people is there. The people have considerable enterprise and public spirit, and it has been a most unfortunate thing for that town that by the receding of the waters the harbour which, at one time, had a good average depth of water, is now limited to some twelve or thirteen feet and utterly unnavigable by the large tonnage which now sails on the upper lakes. I do not wish to be understood as representing a selfish interest at all. While at the town of Midland we have unlimited depth of water, and although we are a rising town, we should be very loath to in any way endeavour to damage the interests of Collingwood by pursuing a dog-in-the-manger policy and forcing the trade of the upper lakes to centre at Midland, which it inevitably would be, were it not the policy of the Government to come to the assistance of the town of Collingwood. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House when in Opposition, were always very quick to condemn appropriations for public buildings or harbour work on the ground that these were simply thrown out as a bait to capture constituencies. But if that was their cry in the past, what can they say of the present instance, where upwards of a quarter of a million dollars is to be expended in a single harbour, when, almost within shouting distance, is another harbour where hardly a single dollar is required to be expended. If it is the policy of the Government to place this large contract, I think it is only fair that the House should know what is the amount of the contemplated expenditure. The sum in the Estimates is $80,000. The Minister, I think, will frankly admit that that is hardly half, perhaps not even one-third, of the contemplated expenditure. If the hon. Minister intends to undertake the work of deepening the harbour of Collingwood to the depth to which it should be deepened in order to accommodate the traffic of the upper lakes, I am informed the expenditure will considerably exceed a quarter of a million dollars. And while the Minister is generous in expending this large sum in one harbour, I trust that, though I have the honour to oppose the Government, he will extend his consideration to a harbour that requires only a trifling grant. The Minister was pleased to send a dredge to Midland to do some trifling work; but no sooner had that dredge got into the harbour and done one or two days' work, than, to our great amazement, it was ordered to leave the port and abandon the work which it had commenced. I think it is only fair to every constituency that, where public interest demands it, there should be a fair expenditure of money; and I am going to protest against the Minister fighting the town of Collingwood with a quarter of a million dollars against a town that requires but $1,000, on the ground that it is not fair-play. If the Minister is going to act upon it as a principle that any constituency which may be pleased, as it has the right to do, to oppose this Government, is to be sat upon, then that fact had better at once be known. Now, as I said at the outset, I am not speaking to enter a protest against this large expenditure of a quarter of a million dollars in the town of Collingwood. But I rise to ask the Minister to give the committee information as to the extent of the estimated expenditure in Collingwood harbour, and furthermore, what will be the depth of the water to be attained at that port, when this work is completed. We should be told, also, whether the appropriation asked now is part of the total contract and if the contract when completed will give the harbour of Collingwood a depth of water that will accommodate the tonnage of the great lakes.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am glad to give my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) the information he seeks. We have entered into a contract with Messrs. Boon & Armstrong for a total amount of $144,000. The work consists of dredging a channel 4,000 feet long, 2,000 feet in what I may call the outside harbour to be dredged to 20 feet, and 2,000 feet in the inside harbour to be dredged to 18 feet. I ask for the sum of $80,000 this year, because that will be quite sufficient to pay for the operations of the present season. My engineers report to me that the completion of this contract will be quite sufficient to give to the harbour of Collingwood all the accommodation that it would require. Now, I think my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) is not altogether fair in his readiness to reproach me with being a partisan. Not very long ago the hon. gentleman called at my department and I frankly told him that in a few days a dredge would be working at Midland. I will repeat what I have already said in this House, that whenever it is reported to me, or whenever I find out that a work is necessary in the county which is not represented by a friend of the Government, that will make no difference.

Mr. BENNETT. What will be the width of the trench that is to be 2,000 feet long?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It will vary somewhat, but the average width will be 450 feet.

Mr. BENNETT. I did not find fault with the promise of the hon. Minister that a dredge would be placed in Midland to do some work this summer. All I can say is that the dredge is not there yet, and what I did refer to is the fact that though the Minister last year gave me his word that certain work would be done at the town of Midland, no sooner was the dredge there and perhaps two days' work done, than, for reasons best known to himself, for reasons he has always been afraid to state to the House, the dredge was sent out of the harbour. I allege that this was done through political influence, and I have every reason to believe that the Minister acted on that occasion on political considerations. I trust that as an earnest that he has dismissed the idea of carrying out such a policy in the future, he will have the dredge in Midland this summer and do the trifling work that requires to be done there. The Minister has stated that the work would cost $144,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is the amount of the contract.

Mr. BENNETT. At the same time he tells us the nature of the work, I must confess that I regret to see that there should be such an immense amount of public money expended on what must seem to every hon. gentleman, if he realizes what is being done, a work of most trifling nature. The hon. Minister proposes to dredge a channel to a depth of 20 feet, 2,000 feet in length and about 150 yards in width. The Minister and the House must see that the Government are spending about $150,000 to dig a trench to permit vessels to be towed in, because it is utterly impossible for sailing vessels to sail in through such a channel. If ever there was an expenditure of public money that should call forth the condemnation of hon. gentlemen opposite—that is if they have been correct in their denunciations of public expenditures in the past—this is one, and more especially when the hon. Minister must admit that almost within hailing distance there is a natural harbour, the harbour of Midland, where there is a very large elevator, and on the other side, there is the town of Owen Sound with a natural harbour. Yet the hon. gentleman proposes to take $150,000 to dig a trench to endeavour to permit vessels to come into the town of Collingwood, when he knows that it cannot possibly become a point for grain distribution, or handling of freights to any large extent. Of course, we all know the reason why it is done. The reason is, not on grounds of public policy, not because the town of Collingwood is to be accorded it as a matter of right, but simply because the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), as a powerful supporter of the Government, has demanded that it should be done. I am not condemning the Government for doing this work on behalf of the people of Collingwood, because the wharfs there are in sore straits, but I am saying this in order to show that these hon. gentlemen opposite when in Opposition were always ready to denounce an expenditure, no matter how trivial it was, simply as a bait, as an allurement, to constituencies to send representatives to support the then Administration. Yet, in face of all their past professions and promises, they are plunging this country to-day in an expenditure of $150,000 simply to dig a trench, nothing more, and the Minister, I believe, knows that it does not at all come up to what the people of Collingwood asked for. I say that the people of Collingwood can never expect to have a good harbour there when they have nothing more or less than a trench 150 yards wide in which to tow vessels. Now, I want to ask the Minister this further question: Is there any understanding with the people of Collingwood, or with the representative of North Simcoe, that there is to be a further appropriation made so that the harbour, when completed, will at least present the appearance of a natural harbour, or is the Minister prepared to state that the Government does not stand pledged to do anything further than to dig this trench of 150 yards in width, at a cost of $150,000?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Had the hon. gentleman known the facts of the case, he would not have spoken in the very unfair way that he has spoken. When I came into office I found that tenders had been asked for by the late Government, and plans had been prepared. Messrs. Boon & Armstrong were the lowest tenderers, for the sum of $144,000. Of course, the hon. gentleman is a better engineer than those that I have in my department, and he says this amount of money is excessive.

Mr. BENNETT. I did not say that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I understood my hon. friend to say that this sum was only sufficient to dig a little trench. Well, as I said, I found plans had been prepared and tenders asked for; and the chief engineer of my department had reported that the tender of Boon & Armstrong was too low, that it could not be acted upon, and the Minister had accepted the advice of the engineer, and had decided not to accept Boon & Armstrong's tender because it was found to be too low. I sent back the cheques with the tenders. Later on Boon & Armstrong came to me and offered to change the conditions, and the chief engineer arranged to make the conditions as stringent as possible. They represented that they were quite able to do the work for the amount tendered, and although the chief engineer thought it was a very low price, I consented to give them the work, imposing, as I said, upon them very stringent conditions. I am glad to inform my hon. friend that they have placed the security to our credit in one of the banks of Canada, that all arrangements are completed, and that they are about to start work. Now my hon. friend finds that the width is not sufficient. I am sure that he knows that in many places in the St. Lawrence the width of the river is no broader than that, and still large vessels are able to pass up and down. I did not change the plans that I had found prepared. I found the tenders in my department, and after careful consideration I gave the contract to these gentlemen.

Mr. BENNETT. Now the Minister has not answered the very pertinent question that I put to him, namely, is it the intention of the department to limit the expenditure at Collingwood simply to the excavation of this trench?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The intention of the Government is first to carry out this work, and we shall see later on what to do.

Mr. BENNETT. That is the point to which I wish the Minister to commit himself. Now, I asked him to what further extent, after the expenditure of $150,000 has been made, does he intend to saddle the country? Does he intend to carry out the pledges which have been made to the people of the town of Collingwood—because I understand that they have been assured that an expenditure will be made there of over a quarter of a million dollars. Now, I want the House and the country to understand where the Minister stands. He is asking us to-day to make him a grant of $150,000, in round numbers. He proposes then to dig what is only a trench into the port of Collingwood, and then next year, or some subsequent year, the Minister will come to the House and make his apologies, and say, It is quite true we have resolved to expend $150,000, but now that we are doing the work it will be found to be totally inadequate to the requirements, and Parliament will no doubt be asked to vote another $150,000 to complete the unfinished work. I point out this fact, that the Minister is only getting in the thin end of the wedge, and that, behind the curtain, there is no doubt a proposal to spend on this harbour, not only $150,000, but a further proposition will be submitted which will involve an expenditure considerably over a quarter of a million. The hon. Minister of Public Works has already frankly stated that, in his opinion, a further expenditure would be necessary there.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
I never said that.

Mr. BENNETT. If the Minister will not give the House an assurance that a further expenditure will be made there beyond $150,000 in dredging this trench, it will be utterly impossible for sailing vessels to come in unless they are towed in, and the hon. gentleman is aware that a large carrying trade on the upper lakes is by sailing vessels. The Minister will then have sunk there, if he makes no further expenditure, $150,000. I am rather inclined to hold the opinion that the Minister is doing exactly what a short time ago he intimated he would do, namely, spend $150,000 this year and during next and subsequent years, come down to Parliament and ask for further grants in this regard. I should like to ask the Minister this further question: Has an application been made by the contractors, Boon & Armstrong, under which their plant and dredges will be admitted from the United States free of duty?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
No, there has been no arrangement of the kind. Of course, they will supply their own plant.

Mr. BENNETT. Has the request been made that this plant should be admitted free of duty?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
I have no knowledge that any request of this kind has been made. In regard to the trench, as the hon. gentleman describes it, it is accepted by the people of Collingwood as a proposition that is satisfactory to them. What I stated was this—that the average width of the dredging to be done was about 450 feet, but inside of the harbour the width would be about 600 feet.

Mr. BENNETT. That is the basin.

Mr. BENNETT.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
Yes. The work is under contract now, and no further agreement has been entered into between the Government and other parties.

Mr. HAGGART. What is the amount to be given towards the work by the Grand Trunk Railway and also by the town of Collingwood? The Minister has stated that the late Government decided to ask for tenders for this work. One of the conditions was that a certain sum was to be contributed by the Grand Trunk Railway and another sum by the town of Collingwood, and there was no undertaking entered into by the Government that even then they would enter into a contract. Is the Minister aware that a report was made by the marine officer, by an officer of the Imperial service in the employ of this Government, in which he showed that within any reasonable expenditure it would be impossible to make a harbour at Collingwood? Is the hon. Minister aware of that fact?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
I understand there has been a report made by an engineer; but, at the same time, I have in my own department engineers in whom I have confidence. They have prepared plans and have made careful examinations in regard to the practicability of the work. I may have acted wrongly in carrying out a plan which was adopted by the Conservative Government. I hope, however, I have not been misled. Since the acceptance of the plan by the town of Collingwood, I have not entered into any arrangement with other parties.

Mr. BENNETT. I desire to ask if the Controller of Customs has had any application made by the contractors, Boon & Armstrong, asking that the dredging plant for the work at Collingwood be admitted free of duty, and if there is any communication in the department in relation thereto?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I am sorry I cannot give the hon. gentleman a definite answer. My impression is that some applications have been made, but where the works were situated or who were the parties mentioned, I cannot at present recall. If the hon. gentleman desires, I can obtain the information for him.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. Minister of Public Works can surely give the committee accurate information as to the amounts to be given by the town of Collingwood and the Grand Trunk Railway.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
There has been no arrangement made. We have entered into a contract for $144,000; there is no arrangement made beyond that.

Mr. BENNETT. In the event of Boon & Armstrong making a request that their dredges and plant should be admitted free of duty from the United States to perform this work, can the Controller of Customs express an opinion as to whether he will assent to their request or not. It would be grossly unfair to do so when there are Canadian dredges on the upper lakes that are private property.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman surely does not desire me to express an opinion on a subject which I do not know as having been before me or not. I will, however, look into the matter and make inquiries.

Committee rose, and the Deputy Speaker took the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. SPROULE. I must take some exception to part of what was said by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) about the expenditure in the town of Collingwood, on account of there being other good harbours in close proximity to it. It is true that there are other good harbours in the Georgian Bay not far from the town of Collingwood, and where the expenditure of public money is needed from time to time; but it is also true that the town of Collingwood is one of the live towns on the Georgian Bay. The residents of that town have expended a large amount of money on the harbour, and they have three lines of steamers chiefly owned by themselves. They have the largest abattoir and meat packing establishment in the Dominion of Canada, and the lake trade in that town is very large and is increasing every year. Now, for some years past, owing to the falling of the water, it has been impossible for the people of the town to do their trade satisfactorily or profitably, because vessels when more than half laden were unable to get into the dock. I confess that I for one think the Government are doing right in making this expenditure. I think perhaps they might have gone a little further, and given an outline of the work that is to be done there, and ascertain what assistance the town is prepared to give, because I understood that an offer was made by the town a year or two ago, that in the event of the Government undertaking this work, the residents of the town would contribute $15,000, and the Grand Trunk Railway $10,000, which would make $25,000. I wish to ask the Minister (Mr. Tarte) if that $25,000 is to be included in this $144,000 for which the contract has been let.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
No.

Mr. SPROULE. I am quite sure it will take a larger expenditure than this to make the harbour what it should be, and I have no doubt but that the Minister will take care that he will avail himself of the offer made by the town and the railway company, and have it included in the next expenditure he proposes there. While I think the channel is not as wide as it should be, it will at least enable vessels that are owned there to carry on the trade. There was a very urgent necessity for this work. The town required it, the country generally required it, and the trade of the town could not be properly carried on without it. It is not by any means, money thrown away. I know that my constituents are largely interested in the town of Collingwood because many of them do their trade there, and the same remark would apply to all south of the Georgian Bay. I am quite sure that if the Minister undertakes to complete the work, though it may require a large amount of money, he will be justified in making that expenditure, because the importance of the trade of the place is entitled to it.

Mr. WALLACE. This is only part of the scheme to make Collingwood harbour a good harbour, and I think it very necessary that the money should be expended, and expended judiciously, but the Minister should give the House an outline of the work. As I know from my visit there, the harbour itself requires deepening on account of the falling away of the water, and on account of the larger class of vessels that are now navigating the upper lakes. Would the Minister explain what the whole programme of the improvements comprises?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am sorry not to be in the position to give more information. I have had a good deal of communication with the mayor, and the city council, and the people of Collingwood, and I have had several interviews with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I understood from the people of Collingwood that these improvements would be sufficient for the time being.

Mr. WALLACE. Does that complete the work.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not say that by any means. I say that it is considered as sufficient for the time being.

Mr. WALLACE. They are deepening the channel going in. When they get into the harbour would they not require to deepen the harbour so as to accommodate these larger vessels? The navigation way that was sufficient ten or fifteen years ago, is not sufficient under the present circumstances when there are larger vessels trading on the lakes than formerly.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I quite understand that, and the work we are now doing is precisely what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) points out. The first part of the work is the dredging of 2,000 feet outside the harbour to a depth of twenty feet, and then we dredge on the inside of the harbour to eighteen feet.

Mr. McCARTHY. I understand that this work which is now in progress, and which I believe has been contracted for, is to do all that is proposed or required to be done in the harbour. The town, and the railway company interested in the town, agreed to give $25,000 towards that work, and an arrangement was entered into by the late Government to the effect that if the town and the railway company would give the $25,000, the Government would supply whatever sum further was required in order to make a complete and perfect job.

Mr. SPROULE. The Minister says the town is giving none of this money.

Mr. McCARTHY. Not any part of the $80,000, but the town is giving $25,000 towards the total sum.

Mr. SPROULE. *I asked was the $25,000 included in the contract which amounts to $140,000, and I understood the Minister to say "no."

Mr. McCARTHY. I was not in the House at the time. When the town of Collingwood pressed for these improvements some four or five years ago, the late Government sent an engineer to Collingwood and had an estimate made of what it would require and what it would cost. In January last year the Government called for tenders for that work as specified by their engineer. Tenders were received, but owing to the fact that no money was granted during the session of 1896 the work was not awarded. The matter thus stood when the change of Administration took place, and the result was that one of the tenderers, Messrs. Boon and Armstrong, tendered at a much lower sum than the Government engineer estimated, and the contract was awarded to the firm for about $140,000. I understand also, that the town are to contribute towards that the balance of the $25,000 which they have not already spent. During the summer or spring of 1896, a certain sum was spent under an arrangement made with the Government that that amount should be credited on the $25,000 which the town and the railway company agreed to give between them. The balance of that, I understand the town is prepared to hand over to the Government.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that the Minister should take advantage of their offer and have it included, because it would be a saving of so much money. They are quite willing and ready to give it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am quite prepared to take it.

Mr. BENNETT. The Minister of Public Works has failed to state to the House, what must be the most important question in the whole matter, and that is: What is his intention to do in reference to Collingwood harbour. He tells the House frankly that he proposes in the coming season, and under the present contract, to make the channel of a certain width, 450 feet. He tells us that outside it is to be eighteen feet, and then when he comes inside the harbour, he is to give a basin of twenty feet deep. A little while ago, the Minister so to speak, poked fun at me on my knowledge of engineering. To that, my answer is, that I do not assume to know anything about engineering, but I think it would be sagacious advice to the Minister and perhaps to his department, to have the deep water outside and the shallow water inside.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I said that.

Mr. BENNETT. Let me tell the Minister something. Collingwood harbour is at the bottom of a bay which has a sweep of over 100 miles from the North-west when the wind blows in that direction, and it is better that the outside should have deep water than the inside.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I said that surely. If I did not, I must have made a slip of the tongue.

Mr. BENNETT. I am glad that the deep water is to be at the outside. But if the Minister is not going to avail himself of the joint contribution of the Grand Trunk Company and the town of Collingwood of $25,000, it must be that he anticipates an expenditure of more than $150,000 to make a good job of the whole work, and it is evident that he is going to hold that in reserve. As I said at the outset, I am not opposing this grant on the ground of the amount involved, because I believe the town of Collingwood ought to receive sympathy and consideration from the Dominion Government. I quite agree with the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) that it is an enterprising town; and if Parliament is to be asked to assist the town, it should be told what is to be the extent of the assistance, and then it will know whether it should grant the assistance or not. No other town would be accorded such a very large grant for an uncompleted work, particularly under the circumstances. It is simply making a rival harbour to two harbours nearly adjoining it, which I take it is due to the great influence of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) with the Minister of Public Works. I have no objection to a grant being made to help the town of Collingwood, because I believe it should be helped. But it is the duty of the Minister to give Parliament the details of what expenditure he is prepared to assume for the town. The House will then be responsible, if it undertakes an expenditure of over a quarter of a million dollars for that harbour.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have said over and over again that I have entered into a contract for $144,000. I have said that there is no other agreement, and that I do not anticipate any other expenditure, and have not been requested to make any other.

Mr. BENNETT. Then the hon. gentleman has shifted his ground.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am obliged to my hon. friend from the adjoining riding for the compliment he has paid to my influence; but I am afraid that it is not altogether deserved. This work was undertaken when I certainly had not any influence with the preceding Administration, for the purpose, I think, of weakening any little influence I might have in my constituency. Most urgent and pressing efforts were made to have this work undertaken, and I certainly had not a word to say against it. But I found matters in this position when the Government changed, that the work had been proposed, that tenders had been called for, that the tenders were then lying in the Public Works Department, and that one of the tenders, since accepted and embodied in a contract, was for $144,000. I found the present Minister of Public Works hesitating as to whether, with the information he had from his engineer of the cost of the work, it would be safe or prudent to let it for that lesser sum. But ultimately, after full inquiry and investigation, the Minister became satisfied that he could in the public interest safely make a contract for $144,000, being some $60,000 less than the estimated cost. As I understand the matter the proposition was that this work would be a completed work, and that when this contract is performed nothing more will be required for the Collingwood harbour, so far as can be seen at present. In consideration of that, the town was willing, with the assistance of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, to contribute $25,000. The arrangement I understood, was that whatever the cost should be the town was willing to pay $25,000; and if the cost is $144,000, the country will have to pay that amount less the $25,000, or to be strictly accurate, that portion of the $25,000 which has not yet been expended. During the spring of 1896 the necessities of the harbour were such that the then Minister of Public Works authorized the corporation to expend $2,000 or $3,000 on work required to be done immediately, on the understanding that that sum was to be credited to the $25,000.

Mr. BENNETT. Since the Minister has made the further statement now that this is to be regarded as a complete and total work, and that he will not come to Parliament in a future session and ask for a large further grant, I have only to say that it will be a matter of deep regret and mortification to the people of the town of Collingwood, who have been led to understand, as I gather from conversations with gentlemen from that town and from reading the files of their newspapers, that they were to have a work of a large and a substantial nature. I can tell the Minister frankly that a depth of eighteen feet of water will not place the harbour of Collingwood in a position to compete with either Midland or Owen Sound for the grain trade of the west, from Port Arthur and Duluth. At present we have vessels coming into Midland carrying as much as 130,000 bushels of grain, and eighteen feet of water is not sufficient to accommodate them.

Mr. FOSTER. I have listened to this discussion with a great deal of interest, because this matter was before the late Government for some time. In the first place, I want to ask my hon. friend, if, as it appears, the $80,000 is voted for 1897-98, and that there is no corresponding appropriation for the preceding year, whether any preceding vote for Collingwood harbour was made for this work?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think there was a vote of $25,000 charged to capital account. I think there was some debate last year on the same ground.

Mr. FOSTER. I was inclined to dispute the accuracy of that statement. I quite remember the debate. The estimates, as they were brought down, proposed to vote these items and some others on capital account. The debate arose as to why these should be charged to capital account whilst all other similar appropriations were charged to the consolidated fund, and it ended with the Minister of Trade and Commerce advising and the Finance Minister accepting the advice, to transfer it from capital account and charge it to the consolidated fund. My own impression is that when we came to that agreement, it was struck out from the capital account, but was not afterwards charged to the consolidated fund, so that there was really no vote of money for Collingwood harbour in the Supply Bill. What I want to call attention to is this: My hon. friend led me to think that what he was doing by this vote of $140,000 was simply making an entrance to the harbour, but I have mistaken entirely the whole trend of the communications which extended over four or five years between the town of Collingwood and the Government, if the entrance to the harbour was all they required. It seems to me they had two objects in view; in the first place, a deeper and a better harbour; and in the second place, a deeper entrance to that harbour.

Mr. McCARTHY. I understand the work was, just as the hon. gentleman says, intended to be, not merely the entrance to the harbour, but the harbour itself, and it is for this whole work that the contract was let.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is so.

Mr. FOSTER. This contract does not make a complete work.

Mr. BENNETT.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, it is all the work which the Government engineer thought was necessary, both inside and outside.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. And the Grand Trunk Railway, also. They saw the plans.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman knows better about the present condition than I did. He and his department ought to know whether or not this expenditure of $140,000 will complete the whole work in Collingwood harbour, or whether it is simply the entrance.

Mr. McCARTHY. It will do the very work you called for by your invitation to tender which was sent out in January, 1896. That tender is now being embodied into a contract.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The plans are absolutely the same.

Mr. FOSTER. I quite understand that, but the impression I wish to have confirmed or dispelled is this, that no matter whether contracts were called for or not for this very work by the preceding Government, this is not the whole work, but simply the entrance. I understood from the hon. Minister that this would not complete the work, but that what was required to be done afterwards would have to be looked into afterwards.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. What I meant to say was this: Suppose in ten years or twenty years more, there should be more accommodation required, that would be looked into.

Mr. FOSTER. That makes that matter clear. But my hon. friend will admit that he should not lead the House into a large expenditure for an initial work without taking the House into his confidence as to the cost of the whole work. My own opinion was that the preceding tender was more a tentative tender to find out what the actual cost would be, and it was not carried out because we had not the money voted. It was not proposed to put that tender into execution until we had the authorization of Parliament in a vote. That, I think, is a fair principle to go upon. Here you are simply coming down and saying you want from this Parliament $140,000. On being asked what for, you reply: Well, my engineers have looked into this thing, they have made me a recommendation, and I have undertaken, in the name of the Government, a contract calling for an expenditure of $140,000, not one dollar of which is voted. My hon. friend will find that that is a very bad rule, especially in large expenditures. Parliament should be left unfettered and it is the right of Parliament to demand that before a Government binds a country by a contract, Parliament should be called upon to give its adhesion to the scheme and vote the money for carrying it out.

An essential part of this bargain all the way through, and of the negotiations, was the co-operation of the Grand Trunk Railway and the town of Collingwood. It was freely offered by them and accepted as the basis of the negotiation, and I was very sorry to see my hon. friend ignore it. I think he will find that the records of his department will confirm this statement, and he should see that that aid is got from the town of Collingwood and the Grand Trunk Railway.

Mr. McCARTHY. The town raised the money for it. They passed a by-law.

Mr. FOSTER. While we had no vote in the spring of 1896, the work was urgent, so we said to the people of Collingwood: If you will allow a portion of your contributions to go to this work, on which we have no money now to expend, that work can be done and paid for out of your money.

Mr. SPROULE. I have a very distinct recollection of the application of the town of Collingwood. The Government contended that it would cost more than the town thought it would cost. The town said $150,000 will do all the work we required: and if you will do the work, as we have it mapped out by our engineer, we will contribute $25,000. The town did this. What they asked then was that the outside channel should be 400 feet wide and eighteen feet deep, and that the inside channel should be 600 feet wide and twenty feet deep. That is the way the contract was let and that was regarded as the complete work, which they would be quite satisfied with. That is all they expected and for which they were prepared to give their money.

Rainy River..... $20,000

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is days' work.

Mr. FOSTER. What is to be the cost of the whole work?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is quite impossible to give exact amounts as to the cost of the work, for the work consists mainly in removing large boulders. Before we do any more work, I must have a complete survey made.

Mr. FOSTER. From what vote has the hon. gentleman paid for the work that is being done now?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Out of the vote of last year. I do not remember what the amount of the vote was.

Mr. FOSTER. It is misleading that you have not that in the parallel column.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I find that it was charged to capital.

Mr. FOSTER. It was in the Estimates, but do I understand it was not in the Supply Bill?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I remember quite well that we changed the item from income to capital. I have the Supply Bill here, and I will send it across to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster).

Mr. FOSTER. I see that is so. Then, the instructions of the House were not carried out.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is not my fault.

Mr. FOSTER. No, that is not your fault.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask the Minister's reason for doing this by days' labour and not by contract.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is almost impossible to do such work under tender. There are boulders here and boulders there. It is a work which has to be done with great care, and that is the reason why I sent one of the officers of my own department. I might have found a good man there, but I thought it better to send one of the officers who are under our immediate supervision.

Mr. BENNETT. I would like to ask, with reference to the work at Owen Sound harbour, for which $35,000 is asked, is that under contract, and if so, who are the contractors?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The dredging at Owen Sound is done by a dredge which we engage so much an hour—$8 per hour, which is the usual price that we pay for the dredges that we have to secure from outside parties.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. Minister has not answered the other part of the question. Perhaps I might ask him further: Is this dredge the property of Mr. John A. Barron and of Dr. Horsey, son-in-law of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Macdonald)?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I understand that the dredge is the property of a company.

Mr. BENNETT. Is not the hon. Minister aware that Contractor John A. Barron and Contractor Horsey, who, I may say, is the defeated candidate in North Grey, are the owners of the dredge that has this contract at this princely rate of pay? Were tenders called for in this case?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We never ask for tenders in such cases, and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) looks at the record of past transactions, he will find that I am paying the same rate as has always been paid. My officers informed me that there was only one name known in connection with the company, that of Mr. Canan. We have a clerk of works who looks after the work of this dredge and makes reports.

It being Six o'clock, the committee rose for recess.

After Recess.

FAST ATLANTIC SS. SERVICE.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Before we proceed with the business of the evening, I may mention for the information of the hon. leader of the Opposition, that we did receive, this afternoon, a formal communication from Her Majesty's Government to the effect that they approved of the arrangements for the fast Atlantic line.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) in a position to say, generally, what the terms of the arrangement are?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The arrangements are those, substantially, which were previously communicated to the House. An offer was made by the Messrs. Peterson, Tate & Company to perform the fast Atlantic service at a stipulated speed rather exceeding twenty knots per hour, say 500 knots per day, from port to port. This is to be done in consideration of $500,000 a year to be paid by us, and $250,000 or thereabouts to be paid by Her Majesty's Government. Of course, I will, at the earliest moment, lay on the Table the contract and details.

RESTIGOUCHE AND VICTORIA RAILWAY.

House resumed further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Wood (Hamilton) for second reading of Bill (No. 99) respecting the Restigouche and Victoria Railway Company.

Mr. McALISTER. I wish to state that I received a telegram yesterday from the warden of the municipal council of the county of Restigouche.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I would remind the hon. gentleman that he has already spoken on this question.

Mr. McALISTER. I was simply going to read the telegram. At the close of a special meeting of the municipal council, held at Dalhousie, the warden sent me a telegram, as follows:—

Special meeting of Restigouche Council to-day. Resolution unanimously passed that Bill respecting Restigouche and Victoria Railway Company and Restigouche Railway and Bridge Company do not pass.

That is merely the telegram; the resolutions will be prepared and forwarded in a few days. I ask that this Bill be not further proceeded with until the resolutions come to hand. There will be a joint meeting of the two municipal councils of Bonaventure and Restigouche counties either at the end of this week or at the beginning of next.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it only reasonable that my hon. friend's request be complied with, and that this Bill stand over until the hon. gentleman receives further information.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is evident that a Bill like this can be considered much better in committee than here. The hon. gentleman who proposed the Bill has generously said that he does not want to block Bills behind it, and the leader of the Opposition will see that details had better be considered in committee than on the second reading.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

RESTIGOUCHE RAILWAY AND BRIDGE COMPANY.

Mr. CAMPBELL (for Mr. Domville) moved second reading of Bill (No. 104) to incorporate the Restigouche Railway and Bridge Company.

Mr. McALISTER. Explain.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Full explanations will be given in the Railway Committee, and it is certainly better that objections should be taken and discussed there rather than in the House on the motion for second reading.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman will hardly be able to do that. The explanation should be given on the second reading, and the promoter of the Bill should be here to explain it.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). This is a Bill connected with the Bill which has just passed its second reading. It is to make connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. McALISTER. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) state where this connects with the Canadian Pacific Railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). It is the Intercolonial Railway, the hon. gentleman says. I am not acquainted with the details of this Bill but I am safe in saying that the work proposed to be authorized will, if constructed, connect with the Intercolonial Railway on one side of the river and with the Baie des Chaleurs Railway on the other. I understand that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood Hamilton) desires that this Bill should pass to the second reading, and I apprehend that there will be no public interest jeopardized if it were referred to the Railway Committee. The whole matter can be fully discussed there.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

DOMINION SAFE DEPOSIT AND TRUSTS COMPANY.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Gibson) moved second reading of Bill (No. 106) respecting the Dominion Safe Deposit, Warehousing and Loan Company (Limited), and to change the name of the company to the Dominion Safe Deposit and Trusts Company (Limited).

Mr. WALLACE. I would take objection to the second reading of the Bill, from the fact that the proposal is to change the name of the company to the "Dominion Safe Deposit and Trusts Company." This Parliament has already chartered a company called the Dominion Deposit Company, and I think such a conflict of names should not be allowed.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The name could be altered in committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the names conflict it is not likely that the committee would pass the Bill under this name. I quite agree that in the case of a company such as this, the greatest care should be taken not to have conflicting names. If the Bill be allowed to go to committee, we will have evidence as to the companies existing under similar names, and we can change the name of this company.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 109) respecting the Ottawa and Gatineau Railway Company.—(Mr. Champagne.)

Bill (No. 110) to incorporate the Southern Counties Railway Company.—(Mr. Préfontaine.)

SUPPLY.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BENNETT. Relative to the grant of $35,000 for dredging at the port of Owen Sound, before six o'clock I asked the Minister of Public Works who the contractors for this work are, and also the manner in which the work was being performed. I understood the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) to inform the House that the work was being done by a firm of contractors at $8 an hour. I then asked the Minister who this firm were, and asked if Mr. John A. Barron and Dr. Horsey were members of it, and the hon. gentleman assured me that the only person he knew in the firm was a Mr. Canan. May I ask the Minister if the work is being done by a joint stock company, or if he is aware of the presence of Mr. Barron and Dr. Horsey in the contracting company; and if there is a written contract?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The name of the firm in the department is the Canan, Sadler Company.

Mr. BENNETT. May I ask the hon. Minister if Mr. Sadler is known to him as being Mr. Sadler of Lindsay; and furthermore, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) has ever been interviewed in reference to the work that has been done this year by Mr. Barron as a member of that firm or on behalf of that firm?

Mr. CAMPBELL. And suppose he has?

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) wants to know, "suppose he has." All I wish to know is, if Mr. Barron and Dr. Horsey are of the firm, and if there is nothing wrong about it then there is no reason for suppressing the fact if these gentlemen are in the firm.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Is it a limited company?

Mr. BENNETT. I have asked the Minister that and he has not been able to inform me.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not know whether it is a limited company or not. The only thing I know is we have secured a dredge from the Canan, Sadler Company, and the same dredge has been employed by my department for the last eight or ten years under the very same conditions.

Mr. BENNETT. Is it dredge No. 9, please?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes..

Mr. CLARKE. Have any tenders been called for this work which is to cost $35,000?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No tenders were asked. We are just doing the work by the hour, as I have said.

Mr. BENNETT. I must ask the Minister to please be good enough to answer the question: Is Mr. John A. Barron a member of that concern?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot really say whether he is a member of that firm or not.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, then, can the hon. Minister state whether there is any correspondence on file in his department; or has there been any personal interviews between himself and Mr. Barron as representing this company?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not remember that Mr. Barron ever represented himself as one of the firm. He may have spoken to me about the work, but I really do not remember that he has ever said to me that he was a member of the firm. I do not remember either whether there is any correspondence with Mr. Barron. If my hon. friend asks me for the correspondence, I will gladly bring it down.

Mr. BENNETT. As I understand from the drift of the statements of the hon. Minister, Mr. Barron saw him in reference to the contract being performed by this company at Owen Sound, and the question was, no doubt, in his mind whether or not Mr. Barron represented himself to be a member of the firm. Do I understand the Minister to assent to the statement that Mr. Barron has seen him on one or more occasions in reference to this contract being performed by this firm?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I hope my hon. friend will not put in my mouth words which I did not use. I have said that I do not remember whether or not Mr. Barron spoke to me about this. He is a friend of mine, and he may have spoken to me about it, but I really do not remember now.

Mr. SPROULE. Are there two dredges engaged—one at number 9 and one at number 4, or only one at number 9?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Only one dredge is now engaged.

Mr. SPROULE. Is there an overseer who keeps track of the time the dredge is working, entirely independent of the company that is doing the work?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The man engaged by us is a Mr. Ross. He has been recommended to me.

Mr. SPROULE. He is appointed by your department?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, and we have given a great deal of attention to the work. We have required reports as frequently as possible.

Harbours and Rivers—Manitoba..... $11,500

Mr. DAVIN. I would like some explanation of this.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The vote for general repairs and improvements is the vote we take every year. We cannot say in advance where the money will be spent. As to the wharves on Lake Winnipeg, they are not yet located. We intend to have surveys with the view of locating them.

Dredging ..... $218,000

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. Minister be good enough to tell us how many dredges we have now available?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have nineteen dredges in different parts of the country.

Mr. SPROULE. Where are they distributed?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Five in Ontario, five in Quebec, six in the maritime provinces, one in British Columbia, and one in Manitoba.

Mr. SPROULE. Are any of these dredges in the Georgian Bay now?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, we have one at Collingwood.

Mr. McALISTER. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if we may expect a dredge at Campbellton on the Restigouche this year, to complete what has been done there. A dredge was sent there early last season after navigation opened, but it was removed before the work was completed, and unless it is sent there again soon, the work that has been done will be practically of little use.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Unfortunately I cannot extend any hope to my hon. friend. As he knows numerous calls are made upon us, and we cannot comply with one-tenth of them. I am very sorry I cannot do better with the number of dredges we have.

Mr. McALISTER. I may say that the port of Campbellton is one of the most important ports on the north shore; and any person acquainted with the place will know that the facilities we have are far from adequate to the requirements of the place. The price that lumber has brought in the last few years has been so low that unless it is handled with a great deal of skill and economy, it is impossible to make it pay. As we are situated there, vessels cannot get in to the wharfs, and sometimes, when loaded, they have to remain several days before going out, from the fact that the bar is outside of the loading ground, and they can only get out at the spring tides. Last season the dredge dredged a part of that bar, and the work should be completed. I do not think there is any place in the maritime provinces more needful in this respect at present. At the port of Dalhousie, at the mouth of the harbour, the sand is accumulating around the public wharf, and vessels cannot be got in, and I think if at all possible the dredge should be sent there also.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My chief engineer has taken a note of what my hon. friend has said. I quite realize the importance of the work, but the hon. gentleman will understand that it is impossible to comply with all the demands.

Mr. McALISTER. There are six dredges for the maritime provinces.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is one at Prince Edward Island, two working in the St. John harbour, which is a very important and urgent work, and three in Nova Scotia. We gave my hon. friend three months of dredging last year and must give other places a show.

Mr. McALISTER. The way the current runs in this harbour, the bar is filling in constantly, and in a very short time what has been dredged will be filled in again. In the spring, when the river is high, earth and other material running down lodge in the cut, the channel will fill in again unless the cut is made clear through.

Mr. DAVIN. Why has the appropriation for Manitoba been reduced by $1,800 as compared with last year?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My chief engineer tells me that the $1,800 of last year was to cover work that had been done and had not been paid for, so that the appropriation is still the same.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) Where is the dredge in Prince Edward Island going to work during the coming season?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. At Charlottetown first, and Summerside afterwards.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) I would draw the attention of the hon. Minister to the fact that some dredging was done at the breakwater at Souris, two seasons ago, but the work was not completed, and the dredge was to have returned the following spring. The dredge was required there to make the work already done of service and enable the breakwater to be fully used. I hope the hon. Minister will see his way clear to send her there, after she has got through with the western portion of the island, if not sooner. There was also some dredging promised me at Murray River and elsewhere. The latter is becoming quite a central shipping place, and as there is hardly sufficient water there to enable shipping to get backwards and forwards, a little dredging is much required. The hon. gentleman will find in his department a petition from the people of that section some years ago.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If I had the dredges, I would do all the dredging required, but I cannot comply with all the demands made upon us.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How many of these dredges are employed in the maritime provinces?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Six.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How many are to be used in Nova Scotia?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Three, one in Guysborough county, the other at Liverpool, and the other at Yarmouth.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will they be employed at these places the entire season?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Where does the hon. gentleman propose to employ them afterwards?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My chief engineer tells me that our programme is not yet mapped out for Nova Scotia. We have work to do there now, and later on will decide what to do next.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Has any call been made for dredging the port of Halifax?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, I do not think I received any petition.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In the vicinity of the new railway wharf?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Perhaps some petition was sent to the Railway Department, but it has not come to my attention.

Mr. KAULBACH. I hope the hon. Minister of Public Works will not be unmindful of Lunenburg, but will see that the dredging which is absolutely required is done there. It is the most important of the dredging required in Nova Scotia, and judging by the smile on the hon. gentleman's face I should say he contemplates sending a dredge there early in the season. I might mention another work in my county, which is also important, and that is the crooked channel, at the La Have Islands at the mouth of La Have River. It is a channel which is much needing dredging, for at every low tide boats are compelled to go out into rough water at great risk to the occupants. It is a work that should have been attended to some time ago. I give the hon. Minister an invitation to the county of Lunenburg. If he comes there we will treat him well and endeavour to show him how very important is the work I am speaking of, and how necessary it is that it should be attended to as the first after Lunenburg and Mahone Bay are cared for.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. As a matter of fact, I intend making a tour of the maritime provinces and gladly accept the kind invitation of my hon. friend.

Mr. SPROULE. Will it be convenient for the hon. gentleman to have some dredging done at Thornbury and Meaford? There was some dredging done at Meaford, year after year, but the work is not yet finished, and a dredge would be only required there a week or two to finish the work which is very much needed.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I shall do so.

Mr. SPROULE. I would suggest that it be sent not too late in the season, because in the fall it is not so handy for a dredge to do the work as in the summer.

Mr. MARTIN. On the south side of Prince Edward Island, the harbours of Murray River, Wood Islands and Vernon River Bridge require dredging. Those harbours were to have been attended to some years ago. Last year the intention was to attend to this work, but the dredge went to Charlottetown and Crapaud instead. I hope that when the hon. Minister is making his tour of the maritime provinces, he will visit Prince Edward Island, and I tender to him, on behalf of the people, a very hearty welcome. When he visits that province, I think he will be disposed to be a little more generous, especially with regard to those works to which I call his attention.

Mr. GILLIES. I would draw the hon. Minister's attention to a work much required in my county at Fourchu Harbour, a place on the confines of the two counties of Cape Breton and Richmond. The hon. Minister is aware, from the information furnished him by myself and by the officers of his department, of the great importance and necessity of having that work done. It is a point, as the hon. Minister knows, of very great consequence to the people in that part of the country. It is a work which, when once completed, will be of a permanent character. There is no danger of it filling up, because the mud there is of such a character that when once the channel is made, it will be kept open by the running stream between the ocean and the harbour. If the hon. Minister will consult his officers, and particularly his chief engineer, he will bear out what I have said and will, to a word, corroborate my statement in this regard. A dredge was sent there the year before last, and did some excellent work. Last year the dredge was sent there and did further work, but was sent out post-haste to another county at a very important stage of the work. But when I represented the matter to the Minister of Public Works, he was good enough to have the dredge sent back, but she was again taken away before the work was completed. There are full plans of the work in the hon. gentleman's department. The cost will be very moderate, and it is very important and will be permanent. The dredge was taken away from there and sent to Larry's River, Guysborough county, though the work there is not as important, nor of such public requirement as that at Fourchu. Larry's River is surrounded by harbours, whereas Fourchu has no harbour on the east nearer than Louisburg, which is more than twenty-five miles away, and on the west, St. Peter's, which is fifty miles away. I trust that when the dredge completes her work there she will be sent to Fourchu to complete the work that has been begun there.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I understand that to complete the work my hon. friend (Mr. Gillies) is speaking of, would require three months. As soon as I find time to do that work, I will gladly do it.

Mr. GILLIES. I would like to ask the Minister if I may expect the dredge to be sent there some time during the present season.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot speak positively, but my chief engineer tells me that he hopes to be able to send the dredge there this season.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I wish to call the attention of the Minister to changes in the staff of the dredge "Canada." Some time ago my hon. colleague (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) who is absent from the House to-day, put some questions to the Ministry as to the reasons for the dismissal of Captain Mackenzie from this dredge. If I remember well the reply of the hon. Minister of Public Works was that the captain was not dismissed, that this was an annual appointment and that he was not reappointed. I would like to call attention to the facts of the case, which do not quite agree with that answer. Captain Mackenzie was appointed, I believe, some time in the autumn of 1896. He had no reason to believe that his appointment was an annual one. I understand that the practice in connection with these dredges has been that in the fall, when the season's work is completed, the crew are paid off except the engineer and captain, who, I understand, are retained and continue in charge of the dredge and continue to receive their salaries. In 1896 the crew of the dredge "Canada" were paid off at Liverpool, N.S., and the captain and the engineer remained in the dredge all winter. Repairs were being carried on, and these officers continued regularly in the service of the department, and were on the pay-roll of the department. But, without notice, on the 21st of April, I think, just the day after the local election in Nova Scotia, Captain Mackenzie received peremptory notice dismissing him, without any explanation whatever. It would seem that the Minister had not been correctly informed in his reply given to the House, because I think there can be no question about the fact of the captain remaining in the dredge all winter engaged in repairs, and not dismissed until the 21st April, when the dredge was about to begin work, and when, as Captain Mackenzie might suppose, his position was sure for another year.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The facts as stated by my hon. friend (Mr. Bell, Pictou) are, I believe, about right. It has been the rule, or perhaps it would be better to say the habit of the Department of Public Works to keep the engineer and captain of a dredge, or one of them, as caretaker, but at half pay. When the time came this year to engage a captain for the dredge "Canada," I thought it was quite permissible for me to engage another man than Mr. Mackenzie. He was not engaged by the year but by the month, and at half pay for the winter season, and when the time came to engage a captain I thought it would be just as well to engage another man, who is a very capable man, indeed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Are we to understand that the officers on board these vessels are not to be regarded as permanent employees? The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) stated the other day in reply to an inquiry that all the officers of the vessels in the service of the Government were continued, all were treated as permanent employees, and retained in their positions. I do not see why a distinction should be drawn between the officers commanding the vessels in the service of the Marine and Fisheries Department and the officers engaged in this important work of dredging. The hon. Minister, I believe, will know that Captain Mackenzie had been for many years—

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. For only one year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Was he employed for only one year? At all events, the practice, I believe, was not to make any changes, but to continue the employment of the captain of a dredge, provided he performed his duties in a thoroughly satisfactory manner, and I presume there was no fault found with the manner in which Captain Mackenzie performed his duties.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And I think the hon. Minister will admit that there is an advantage in having for this service a man experienced in the work, that every year a man is in the service qualifies him better to perform his duties efficiently. It is carrying the spoils system to an unnecessary length to dismiss a man simply because some other person else wants his place.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) I would say with respect to the dredge "Prince Edward," that it has been the habit for many years past to continue the captain's services from year to year. He might have been paid by the month, but he was kept on during the winter season. The captain that has been there for the past year has been displaced, and another man has been put in his place, I understand. Now, with respect to this man, I do not think that any fault in the world could be found with him except that he might have voted Conservative. He is a man whose character is above suspicion, he is a man the like of whom can seldom be found in any community, a most thoroughly reliable man, and I wish that the public service in every capacity had men like him. Now, I must take this occasion of expressing my great regret that the Minister of Public Works has not seen fit to continue that man. I had great pleasure in recommending him for the position; I knew he was thoroughly reliable to put into a position of trust. He has filled that position with credit to himself and satisfaction to the public; and I think it is a great mistake on the part of this or any other Government to dispense with the services of a public servant of that kind who has filled his position in the manner that that man has done.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not think that it would be quite correct to say that officers of the class mentioned by the hon. gentleman are perma-ment officers. They are engaged by the month, they are not appointed by Order in Council, and it seems to me that they cannot be classified as permanent officers. I quite agree with all that the hon. leader of the Opposition has said that the services of men of experience should not be dispensed with, but I would add that they should not be dispensed with unless we find men equally as good to take their places. In the case of Captain Mackenzie, he had been engaged for only one year, and he has been replaced by a man as competent as he was. Now, the case of Captain Macdonald was a very peculiar one, indeed. I may say to my hon. friend that I did not dismiss Captain Macdonald. What took place was this: The chief engineer went to Halifax, in either January or February, and on inquiry found that there were two men employed on the dredge "Prince Edward," these were Captain Macdonald and the engineer. The chief engineer found that two men were not necessary, and then he instructed Mr. McCormick to make the choice between the two men, and he chose to retain the engineer, because repairs had to be made to the boilers. I may say that although he was not authorized to do so, he dismissed Captain Macdonald, although he did what was for the best. When the time came to engage another man, I took Captain Larkin. I am very glad to say that there were no complaints at all against Captain Macdonald, but he was a good and capable officer.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) I must say further with respect to this matter, that I did understand before the change was made, that it was quite settled among the leading friends of the hon. gentleman down there, that Captain Macdonald was to be continued as captain of the dredge; but there were one or two parties in the county that Captain Macdonald comes from—I am now speaking only from what I have been told,—that one of my late opponents in the election and another gentleman who was formerly an opponent of mine, brought pressure to bear on the Government, and succeeded in having the services of Captain Macdonald dispensed with. I only hope that the Minister has got as good and as worthy a man in his place. I believe the chief recommendation of the man who has taken his place, is that he was the prosecutor of Mr. Hackett in his election trial.

Roads and Bridges—

Bridge across the Saskatchewan at Edmonton, N.W.T..... $50,000

Mr. OLIVER. I would ask the Minister of Public Works if it is intended to expend this money this present season?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This question is under the very serious consideration of the Government. I received not long ago a cheque from the town of

Mr. TARTE.

Edmonton for $25,000, and later on I received through the Bank of Montreal the balance of the money contributed by that town toward the construction of this bridge. I am not quite free to say any more than what I am saying now.

Mr. CLARKE. Are tenders to be called for the construction of this work?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, of course. If we go on with the work there is no doubt that tenders will be asked for.

Telegraph Lines—British Columbia—To provide for an alternative line connecting Cape Beale and Carmenah with Victoria by extending the French Creek-Alberni Line southwardly to the south-west coast of Vancouver Island..... $4,600

Mr. McINNES. When does the Minister propose to begin the work on this telegraph line?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We expect to begin work in a month.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish to point out to the Minister of Public Works the position that Prince Edward Island occupies in reference to telegraphic communication. I do not suppose there is any other part of the Dominion which suffers in that respect as much as Prince Edward Island. Under the terms of union the Dominion Government undertook to maintain a telegraphic service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, and it was supposed that it would give the public such a service as the public had in other parts of the Dominion. Now, the fact is that a telegram from Prince Edward Island across the straits of Northumberland, a distance of only nine miles, costs 50 cents, while for an equal distance in any other part of the Dominion, the charge is only 25 cents. I am sure the Minister of Public Works, in reading the terms under which Prince Edward Island entered the confederation, will conclude that the understanding was that the Government would establish such a telegraphic service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland as would afford the people the same advantages that they have in other parts of the Dominion. I am aware that the company holds, as it were, a monopoly of that service, but I think the Minister of Public Works should make an arrangement with the company in order that cheaper rates should obtain between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. Every hon. member will agree that messages going from the capital to that province are charged 25 cents or 50 cents more than to any other part of the Dominion, except to British Columbia, and that this is a state of affairs which should not continue. The Government, having undertaken that service, they should charge the customary rates in other parts of the Dominion, and I hope the Minister of Public Works will see that some arrangement is made by which lower rates will prevail across the straits.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If I am not mistaken, the Dominion Government pays annually the sum of $2,000 to the Government of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MARTIN. It is not paid to the provincial government, but to a company called the Anglo-American Telegraph Company.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think the Government give $2,000 to the local government; at all events, I will look into the question.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. Minister will find that the money is paid to the Anglo-American Company. The island had a telegraph service before it entered confederation, and the rates were nearly as low as they are to-day. When the rates are being lowered all over the Dominion, the time has arrived when this matter should be looked into, and the same low rates extended to the island as are enjoyed by other provinces of the Dominion.

Miscellaneous—Towards a monument to the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie..... $5,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should not like this resolution to pass without taking the opportunity of expressing the gratification that I feel at seeing the provision for a statue of the late lamented Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. I believe there is no appropriation which appears in these Estimates under consideration, that will give more genuine satisfaction to the people of Canada, without respect to party, than the appropriation for a statute to the memory of a man, whose memory will never die, even though it should not be preserved in marble or in bronze. The services that great man—for he was a great man—rendered to his country, by his devotion to British institutions, by his readiness on every occasion to maintain that which he believed would best promote the interests of Canada, will, I am satisfied, never be forgotten by the people of Canada, irrespective of party. It is a source of great pleasure to me to have the opportunity to support this vote, which I think should have appeared in the Estimates long ago.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). It gives me great pleasure, and it must have given great pleasure to both sides of the House, to hear the terms in which the leader of the Opposition has spoken of my lamented friend Mr. Mackenzie. Of this I feel certain, that the leader of the Opposition has expressed the feelings of all men, now that the echoes of the party strife in which Mr. Mackenzie took part have disappeared. I believe, from one end of Canada to the other, there will be a general feeling of satisfaction that the memory of Alexander Mackenzie is fittingly honoured. Long before his death, I think the opinion was entertained all over the Dominion, that whatever his little failings may have been, Mr. Mackenzie was, at heart, as sincere a lover of his country as any man could be; and more than that, that in many ways both parties acknowledged that Mr. Mackenzie saw clearly and distinctly a great many matters in respect to which his judgment has been vindicated by events which have come to pass since he ceased to hold the position my hon. friend now fills. But I rose more particularly to say, that I feel the hon. gentleman has done himself and has done his party credit by the manner in which he has expressed his appreciation of the services of that lamented statesman.

Telegraph Lines—North-west Territories. $20,000

Mr. HAGGART. Has the Government not got rid of a good many of the telegraph lines in the North-west Territories?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No; the lines are about the same. There are slight increases and decreases in the mileage, but, speaking generally, we have the same lines.

Mail Service..... $2,257,137

Mr. CLARKE. I notice that in the Toronto division there is a decrease of $1,200 for second class clerks, and a decrease of $780 for third class clerks. What is the explanation of that.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The decrease of $1,200 arises from the transfer of Mr. Crocker from the inspector's office to the railway mail service office, and the $780 arises from the death of Mr. Whiteside, and it is not necessary to fill the office.

Mr. DAVIN. I notice the vote to meet the increased cost of living in the North-west Territories, Manitoba and British Columbia has been reduced $10,700.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That is merely a book-keeping entry.

Mr. DAVIN. Then, as a matter of fact, the officers in the North-west Territories have not been deprived of anything.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No. It is because of the arrangement making the mail service an independent branch. The $10,700 is voted in another form.

Steam communication between Halifax and Newfoundland, via Cape Breton ports... $2,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is it proposed by the Government to make any provision for steam communication between the Island of Cape Breton and the railway on Newfoundland?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). That railway is not yet completed, as I understand.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understood they expected to be able to have a steamer on the route during the present season.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman is, perhaps, better acquainted with the locality than I am, but I think that a considerable section of that railway is still uncompleted. I believe the railway has made its way to within sixty or seventy miles of the point in Newfoundland opposite Cape Breton.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It possibly may not be completed.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I believe some contract has been entered into when the railway has been completed; but until that, I hardly think we are in a position to ask for a vote.

Steam service between Victoria and San Francisco ..... $5,000

Mr. HAGGART. There seems to be a decrease of $5,000 here. If I remember rightly, there was an arrangement between British Columbia and the Dominion, that that service should be kept up. What is the cause of the decrease?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. One year there was some difficulty with the contractors, and they did the service, but the sum was not paid. The subsidy is only $5,000 a year, but in last year's Estimates it was voted for two years.

Steam communication during the season of 1897, i.e., from the opening to the closing of navigation, between Baddeck, Grand Narrows and Iona daily; between Port Mulgrave and St. Peter's; between Grand Narrows, East Bay and Irish Cove..... $7,000

Mr. GILLIES. By what company is the service to be performed, and under what conditions as to running?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The Bras d'Or Steam Navigation Company, and they have three steamers employed.

Mr. GILLIES. I notice a discrepancy between this item, as set forth in the Estimates, and the item formerly put in the Estimates. It used to read formerly, "Steam communication during the season, from the opening to the closing of navigation, between Baddeck, Grand Narrows and Iona, daily; between Port Mulgrave and St. Peter's, and to East Bay and Irish Cove."

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Between Grand Narrows, it is now.

Mr. GILLIES. That will not do at all. The great object of this service is to have direct communication between Port Mulgrave and the Bras d'Or Lake in a direct line; but here the service stops short at St. Peters, and the other portions of the Bras d'Or Lake get their communication from Grand Narrows. I want the Minister to change the reading, to make it read: "Between Port Mulgrave and St. Peters, thence to Irish Cove and Grand Narrows, and then back to St. Peters and Port Mulgrave."

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I candidly confess that I am not as well up in the geography of the Bras d'Or as I would wish to be; and if the hon. gentleman has any fault to find with the way this is arranged, and if it is not in accordance with the terms of the contract, I will cause investigation to be made; but this is verbatim et literatim as it was in the Estimates of 1896-97.

Mr. GILLIES. But it was changed in the contract.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. As I understand, the contract has not been changed.

Mr. GILLIES. I want the service continued in the future as it has been in the past, namely, between Port Mulgrave and St. Peters, thence to Irish Cove and Grand Narrows, and back to St. Peters and Port Mulgrave. East Bay has connection with Grand Narrows by the boat from Grand Narrows. As the item reads here, the people at Irish Cove and the large surrounding districts on the front and rear would only have connection with the Grand Narrows; but the object of the service is to give them direct connection with the railway at Port Mulgrave.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will take a memorandum of the hon. gentleman's suggestion, and if he will come to my office at any time convenient to him next week, we could look into the matter together. I think this is in accordance with the contract that has been going on for a number of years; but there may be ground for the change the hon. gentleman suggests, and if there is, and we are not tied up by the terms of the contract, I shall be glad to make it if we can do it without additional expense.

Mr. GILLIES. There is no additional expense. The item appeared this way in the Estimate formerly, but when the contract was drawn up, it was in the terms I suggest. If the hon. Minister will tell me that the contract will be drawn up in the terms I suggest, I shall be satisfied.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I could not make that promise until I have gone over the matter in detail, but I will be quite willing to consider the hon. gentleman's suggestion. If my hon. friend will send me a memorandum putting in writing the alterations he wishes made and will step over to my office, I will look over the matter with him with the contract in my hands. I think the hon.

gentleman will find I am correct in saying that there has been no alteration made for some years.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no doubt the contract is all right, and perhaps only requires some change in the verbiage to make the item agree with the contract.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I have here the estimates for 1895-96, which prove that I was correct, as the words are identically the same with those I have used.

Mr. GILLIES. The estimate was amended in the committee just as we are asking to have this amended now. By referring to the contract the hon. gentleman will find that the service now performed is exactly in the way mentioned in the contract between the Government and the company.

Steam communication from 1st April, 1897, to 31st March, 1898, daily, between Port Mulgrave, Arichat and Canso: four trips a week between Port Mulgrave and Guysboro', and from 1st April, 1897, to 30th November, 1897, semi-weekly, between Port Mulgrave and Port Hood, such trips to be extended once each week to Margaree ..... $8,000

Mr. GILLIES. By what company is this service performed?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. At present by Hugh Cann & Sons, of Yarmouth.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). I would point out, before we pass this item, that a portion of the duty assigned to that company has not been performed during the past season, namely, the trip to Margaree. I would ask the hon. Minister to take a note of that, and to compel the company to perform their service in full or withhold their appropriation.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will take a note of that.

Mr. GILLIES. Has a contract been entered into between Hugh Cann & Sons and the Government to run a daily trip between Mulgrave, Arichat and Canso? If so, what is the date? Was this service performed last year under a written contract, and what is the date of that contract?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The contract was simply for the year ending 31st March, 1897, and was apparently a written contract. That contract is now under consideration. If I recollect rightly, the contract was sent to these gentlemen for execution, but has not been returned.

Mr. GILLIES. If that service was undertaken under a written contract, it was very ill-performed. They were under contract to have a daily service from Mulgrave to Canso and Arichat, and for two weeks at a time there was not even a semi-weekly trip. The boat they had was totally inadequate.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think they had two boats.

Mr. GILLIES. That makes it worse. It is a difficult service to perform, heavy ice collects there, and a very strong boat is required to do the service properly. An excellent service was given two or three times a week by Mr. McDonald, of Halifax.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. There were very grave complaints made to the department as to the services rendered by Mr. McDonald.

Mr. GILLIES. There was no complaint at all as to the regularity of the service performed by him. During the winter he had to perform a weekly service, and I am sure there were not three trips missed during the whole period. Last winter, however, there was constant ground of complaint that the service was not performed at all, owing to the weakness of the boats. I would like the hon. Minister to see that the company puts on a boat fit for the service, and if they miss any trips during the season a certain proportion of their subsidy should be withheld.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will certainly do that.

Mr. GILLIES. If that is done, they will make some effort to put on a proper boat for the service.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will make inquiries forthwith and may tell the hon. gentleman that if the service is not properly performed he can rest assured that the parties will not get paid.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). I quite endorse what my hon. friend has said, that one of the boats is totally unfit for the work. The "J. M. Cann" gives fair enough service, but the "Weymouth" does not. The company should be compelled to put proper boats on the route under their agreement.

Penitentiaries..... $417,650

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It was understood that the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) should be here when the penitentiary Estimates were discussed. But if the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has no objection, we might consider the penitentiary items, reserving one item, with liberty to full discussion, covering the whole penitentiary vote.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think that will meet the case.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). But I want it to be well understood that I wish to observe the spirit of the tacit compact that these Estimates should not be brought up in the absence of the hon. member for Pictou.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the suggestion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce meets the case, one item to be reserved, with full liberty to discuss the whole penitentiary vote.

Penitentiaries—Kingston..... $167,300

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps you had better reserve that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Stand.

Resolutions to be reported.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRAYERS.

SPECULATION IN BUTTER AND CHEESE.

Mr. PARMELEE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 112) to prohibit improper speculation in the sale of butter or cheese. He said: I suppose at this late stage of the session there is no hope of this Bill becoming law this session. My object in introducing it is to bring it before this House and the country, so that it may be discussed by the Dairymen's Associations. I am credibly informed that a practice of speculation has grown up in butter and cheese which is decidedly detrimental to the interests of the producers. As everybody knows, the butter and cheese industry is perhaps the largest industry in this country, and if we could eliminate speculation from it, we would be taking a step in the interest of dairymen. The export trade in butter and cheese is controlled by a few firms who, I understand have a practice of cabling over large offers, which have the effect of making the English importer timid, of placing the English market in a waiting mood, of depressing values on this side, and enabling our Montreal shippers to purchase our summer makes at prices lower than they ought to be. The object of this Bill is to make it a criminal offence for the shippers of butter and cheese to sell or offer to sell these articles in the English market in advance of their being made in this country. If a

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Bill of that sort can be passed, it will have the effect of improving one of our most important industries and of giving our dairymen far better prices than they are now obtaining. I do not think it necessary that I should go further into an explanation of the Bill at the present time.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION ACT.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 113) to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act. He said: The amendments proposed are important for the inland lakes, but do not apply in the case of sea-going steamships. They are made on the report of the Board of Engineers for the Dominion. As the law stands, a first-class engineer is qualified to take charge of a steamboat, irrespective of her horse-power, and that is found to work badly. By the change proposed a first-class engineer can be qualified to take charge of a steamboat, not with respect to her tonnage, but her steam power, so that it would not matter so much what the tonnage of the vessel would be, if this Bill passes. A third-class engineer would be qualified to take charge of a single cylinder engine of 30 horse-power and a compound engine of 45 horse-power, which is equivalent to a single cylinder engine of 30 horse-power.

The other alteration is in subsection 5 of section 42 of the old Act. Applications have been made from time to time to the department to enable fourth-class engineers to act in conjunction with or as assistants to first-class engineers. Curiously enough, as the law now stands, a fourth-class engineer can act as an assistant to a second- or third-class, but not to a first-class engineer, and the change proposed will enable a fourth-class engineer to act in the capacity of assistant to any engineer. It also proposes that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries may be authorized upon the report of the inspector of boilers and machinery in whose district the steamboat is running, to grant permission to an applicant, sufficiently qualified by his knowledge of steam machinery and engineering, to act as engineer on a steamboat carrying passengers within certain specified limits on the Canadian waters. As the matter now stands, there are small steamboats in our lakes and rivers which are run by men possessing practical knowledge of engines, but who have not their certificates, and the large steamboat owners have petitioned time and again that the Minister in charge, on the report of an inspector of boilers and machinery, may authorize an assistant, who is not a qualified engineer, to act as engineer on these smaller boats.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 114) to amend the North-west Territories Act. He said: The provisions of this Bill are somewhat miscellaneous in their character. I need not explain them at length now, because they will hardly be understood until the printed Bill is in the hands of hon. members. I may say, however, generally speaking, that the main provision of the Bill is to change the constitution of the government of the North-west Territories in this respect, that whereas they have what is called an executive committee, a committee that was entirely a statutory body—and I fancy without precedents in our constitutional system—under the proposed Bill they will have an executive council which will, to the extent of the statutory powers conferred upon the Government of the North-west Territories by the Act, exercise such powers in the same way as the executive council of a province. The effect will be rather as to the methods in which the Government is carried on than as to any extension of the powers of the Government itself. The natural effect of this provision will be that the system of responsible government in the North-west Territories will be more clearly defined and established than it has been heretofore.

Various clauses of the Bill are amendments for the purpose of bringing the Act into conformity with this provision. The other amendments which are not mere verbal changes, are in the first place, a provision which places it within the power of the legislative assembly of the Territories to deal with the qualifications of justices of the peace, that being a purely local matter which may be better disposed of by themselves than by the Parliament of Canada. The appointment of clerks of the courts in the Territories is also given to the executive government of the Territories. The sheriffs and clerks of the court have heretofore been appointed by the Federal Government. The sheriffs will continue to be appointed by the Federal Government, but by this Bill, if it receives the assent of the House, the clerks, who are paid entirely by fees, will be appointed by the Territorial Government. Another clause refers to the qualifications of police magistrates. Another clause gives the Territorial assembly power to pass ordinances respecting the road allowances. I may say that the fact that the Department of the Interior has been compelled to deal with every local application respecting road allowance in the Territories, has been a source of great annoyance and difficulty to the people there, and also of considerable annoyance to the department itself.

Mr. DAVIN. I am very glad the hon. Minister (Mr. Sifton) is introducing this Bill. I should like to ask him one question. He used the expression "Executive Council of the province." Does he intend to change the name from "Executive Council of the North-west Territories?"

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No; the word "province" is not used in the Bill.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. Minister used that word in his speech. So far as I can see, the Bill is designed to bring in reforms which I have contended for year after year.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Are there any changes with regard to the limitation of the legislative powers of the legislature?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It just occurs to me—I may say in answer to the hon. gentleman's question—that I omitted to state one feature of the Bill. It gives the Territorial Assembly power to deal with questions of insurance, the incorporation of local insurance companies, and other necessary insurance business. This is a power possessed by the provincial legislatures, but heretofore not possessed by the Territorial Assembly. Difficulties have arisen through the lack of local regulations, and it is to meet these difficulties that this change has been made.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LAND TITLES ACT.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 115) to amend the Land Titles Act, 1894. He said: I may explain that the Land Titles Act, 1894, is an Act under which what is known as the Torrens system of registration is carried out in the Territories. It has been discovered by the registrars under that Act that the law makes no provision for the registration or use of what are known among lawyers as general powers of attorney. These instruments have been registered and acted upon in the Territories several times since the passing of the Act, but on a close construction of the Act, it appears this is not provided for, and it is to provide for this omission that the present Bill is proposed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION LANDS ACT.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 116) further to amend the Dominion Lands Act. He said: The first clause of the Bill is to give to the Immigration Commissioner at Winnipeg power to grant leave to persons who may be nominated by him to act as agents for settlers who may come in and wish to make homestead entries. Several clauses relate to the powers of official of the department, which, I presume, I need not explain at this stage of the Bill. Section 4 of the Bill embodies the provisions of a Bill introduced by the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), which has passed its second reading, and the main provisions of the Bill introduced by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), which has also passed its second reading. I may say that I introduce these clauses in order that all the changes made in the Dominion Lands Act may be embodied in the same Bill, as it is inconvenient to have more than one Act passed in the same session amending the same main Act. Section 5 of the Bill provides that where an assignment or transfer of the homestead or pre-emption right of a settler is made, it shall not necessarily work a forfeiture of the settler's rights. Heretofore these provisions have been made under the Dominion Lands Act, but a new provision was made every year or two to cover this case. I have so drawn this section that it will apply to future cases, and forfeiture will not be worked unless it be deemed necessary, and the Government so decide. Section 6 gives power to the Minister of the Interior to grant grazing leases without going to the Council to get them ratified. Sections 7, 8 and 9 relate to matters of detail in connection with school lands. Section 10 amends section 96 of the Dominion Lands Act by changing the word "and" to the word "or." It was intended that the Commissioner of Dominion Lands should act otherwise than jointly with some other officer, and to carry out the original intention of the Act, this change is made. Section 11 gives power to vary the forms of the Act. Section 12 gives power to the Minister to decide, in cases of dispute, whether a woman is sole head of the family or not. Section 13 provides for those cases in which a patent is issuable to a person who turns out to be dead before the patent is issued. This will enable the department to deal with a great number of cases which have been hanging fire for years. In these cases the department has not issued the patent because the person could not be found, and thus the title to the property has been hung up and nothing done with it. The people entitled can be found, but not those to whom the patent was originally to have been issued. This amendment will enable the department to issue the patents to those originally entitled to them, and the question of title can then be dealt with by the courts of the province in which the property happens to be. Section 14 applies to cases of persons who may be insane or mentally incapable of performing homestead duties. The guardian or committee of the person so becoming insane or mentally incapable may carry out the provisions of the Act. Section 16 relates to the registration of liens given by settlers upon their claims. Sections 17 and 18 refer to the abandonment by settlers of homesteads which they have obtained, and on which they have a lien after it has been decided by competent authority that the land is not of such quality that it is possible for them successfully to make a living upon it. These clauses are provided to meet the case of the Crofter settlement in the southern portion of Manitoba. Section 21 authorizes the Minister of the Interior to make a special survey of lands in the Yukon district, departing from the ordinary terms of the Dominion Lands Act. This becomes necessary on account of the nature of the country.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 105) to amend the Act respecting the protection of navigable waters.—(Mr. Davies.)

SUPPLY.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). It was understood that we should proceed to-day to submit to the House such amendments as may be deemed necessary to the tariff resolutions, and it is our desire to carry out that intention; but it will be more convenient if we are permitted to do that at a later period during the afternoon. I would therefore propose that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply, with the intention that at a later hour we shall take up the tariff resolutions in accordance with the previous understanding.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Salaries of immigration agents and employees in Canada for the year ending 30th June, 1898..... $30,000

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Minister goes into these items of Estimates, perhaps it would be well for him to state briefly to the House the policy that his department is pursuing in reference to immigration. We have had it stated that there was to be a brand new and energetic immigration policy under the new Minister, and we would like to know the lines on which it is to proceed, and the differences that exist between it and the policy which has been pursued during the last five or six years. The Minister may not know, but I will remind him of the fact that last year, when he was not present, and we did not have the extreme felicity of possessing a Minister of the Interior as we have at this time, the Prime Minister was acting as Minister of that department, and when I asked him for the lines of policy distinguishing the new immigration work from the old, he was good enough to tell the House there were no distinctions, that they were following out exactly the same lines as before. That may have been excused because of not having a responsible Minister here ; but, of course, now we are expecting something new, and we would be very glad to have the Minister favour us with a statement of his policy and the differences between it and the old.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr Sifton). There is, of course, no objection whatever on my part to making a statement as to the work which the department is doing in connection with immigration. Whether my hon. friend is justified in his evident assumption that the Government have promised something brand new and extraordinary in the way of an immigration policy, I am hardly prepared to say. As the hon. gentleman remarks, I was not here when the Prime Minister made the statement at the last session of Parliament ; I do not think, however, that the hon. gentleman would be justified in assuming that, in consequence of anything said by the Prime Minister, or anything that may have been said on behalf of the Government, this Government has promised anything in the way of an extraordinary, unknown, or unprecedented departure in connection with the work of immigration. The hon. gentleman no doubt, as well as the leader of the Opposition who sits beside him, knows very well the difficulties in connection with the great and important subject of immigration. It is one of the most, if not the most, difficult subjects that the present Government have fallen heir to, and with which they have to grapple. For my part, I would deem it a very foolish and absurd thing for myself, or any other member of the Government, after having been in charge of the administration of this department for a few months only, to undertake to speak with any great degree of assurance in regard to what is likely to follow from the policy which we may undertake to pursue. We have not made any large promises, Mr. Chairman, and we do not propose to make any large promises at the present stage of the proceedings. I think I will be justified in saying that we intend to pursue a policy which will in some respects be an improvement upon that of the hon. gentlemen who proceeded us, in this respect at least, that in that portion of the country where we hope to secure settlers, where we hope to locate them permanently, we are endeavouring to take greater care in regard to their location, and in regard to the care which should be bestowed upon them when they arrive in the country. I may say that my own experience as a resident of the North-west for somewhat over twenty years, led me to the conclusion, and confirms me in the conclusion that one department of the work which has been most neglected in the past has been the care of the people when they arrive in the North-west, where we hope to make permanent citizens of them. I do not say that I have successfully grappled with that portion of the work up to the present moment. I am quite aware that the efforts I have made in the way of organization of a bureau, from which these settlers will be handled and by whom they will be located, have not resulted in a perfect system being attained, and I do not expect without more than one year and more than two years of careful examination of the results of the work to be able to bring about a system which will approach exactitude and perfection and meet the difficulties of the case. I might say, however, that we have organized a bureau in the North-west which has for its particular object the locating and the settlement of people there—a bureau similar in principle to that which existed in former years under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, and which, theoretically, existed in later years, but which became so far absorbed in the Dominion land system that it was of very little benefit, and I say that without any special desire to reflect on the gentlemen who were engaged in the work, because it was made a secondary portion of their work when it should have been a primary portion. Apart from that, I have endeavoured to take advantage of the evident desire of a great many ex-Canadians now resident in the western states to make their homes in north-western Canada, and I have for the purpose arranged a staff of officers, and they are at present at work in the western states, particularly in Michigan, Minnesota, North and South Dakota and Kansas, and we have excellent reports as to the probability of their efforts being successful. Like other arrangements that have been in operation for a short time, I do not feel like speaking in a too sanguine tone as to the results. I can only say that the system has been carefully organized, and we hope that good results will flow from it.

As regards immigration from Europe, my hon. friends opposite, and particularly the leader of the Opposition who, for many years, occupied the position of High Commissioner in London, England, will certainly not expect a Minister who has been a few months in office, and who has not been for many years at least in the old country, to speak with any great degree of certainty or knowledge of details of immigration work in Europe and the British Isles. Since I have been in office I have devoted as much time as it was possible for me to take from other duties that pressed on me, to obtain details of the work, and I have had the advantage of close conversation on these matters with Sir Donald Smith, now High Commissioner, who has made a careful study of the whole question, and I have gone into it with him in great detail. I am not, however, in a position to speak with any great degree of confidence in regard to the results of that work. I find, however, that, in the opinion of Sir Donald Smith, of the steamship agents, and of the transportation companies' officials, we are now suffering and are likely to suffer for the next year or two, from the fact that efforts in that direction has been relaxed during the last two or three years. Hon. gentlemen who formerly occupied the Treasury benches seemed to have become discouraged—I do not know whether it was due to the result of the last census or not—and they did not carry on the work with the same vigour. We are now, I am told by those acquainted with the facts, suffering from the lack of vigour shown in the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite; and while I do not speak from my own knowledge but from the opinions of those most competent to judge, I arrive at the opinion that such is the case. I hope to be able to overhaul that branch of the work during the next six or eight months, and to bring about a system whereby a knowledge of the resources of Canada will be acquired in a much larger degree by European peoples than has hitherto been the case. I might say upon that point that, while I do not hope that this Government will, in a short space of time, be able to fill up the North-west, yet I have the strongest hope that when the people of Europe, the people who are unable there to make a livelihood for themselves, become acquainted with the territory which we have and which we can offer them, the tide will turn and we shall have a stream of immigration poured into the north-western portion of Canada such as we have not seen of late years. It may be that it will be slow in coming; it may be that it will be a difficult task, as I have no doubt it will be, to bring it about and to get the tide turned in our direction. But we have a number of things in our favour, and if these are used to advantage, we will be able, in the near future, to accomplish even greater results than we have anticipated. I hope I have made myself clear to my hon. friend, that it is not the intention of the Government to uselessly spend a very large sum of money. I think I would be justified in asking my colleagues to recommend to this House a vote, not of $175,000, but of $1,000,000 for immigration purposes, if I could show that the money would be used to advantage, and would bring about commensurate results; and I think the work of immigration is so important that if it could be shown with any degree of probability that commensurate results would almost certainly be obtained, any reasonable sum would be voted cheerfully by this House for the purpose. But, on this the first occasion when I have had the honour of explaining a vote of this kind, I wish to say this, that strong as my feelings are in connection with this subject, and strongly as I feel that if a knowledge of the resources of Canada could be brought before the people of the older countries, a great stream of immigration would flow in, I will not ask Parliament to vote any money, the expenditure of which cannot be successfully explained. In regard to details, it will be seen that I have left some money not appropriated to any specific purpose, which will be used to pay for work done here and there as occasion may arise. That is particularly necessary in immigration work. One of the main difficulties which has attended immigration work in the past has been that there has been too little flexibility in connection with portions of the work. It is sometimes represented that an agent can do good work at a certain place. The best man is appointed and sent there. Later, it turns out that his work is not to our advantage, and the officer is withdrawn or recalled. A few weeks later it is represented that advantageous work can be done in another district, and a man is appointed and sent there; and consequently, during the year the work of the department is undergoing change, and for that reason it is absolutely impossible to closely and accurately define the work in advance, as it is possible to do in connection with other departments of the Government. I do not think it is necessary at this stage to make further explanations; if, however, there are other details desired, I shall be glad to afford any information in my power.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps the House will have heard with some disappointment, and perhaps not, but I am quite sure the country will read with disappointment the rather meagre explanation that has been made by my hon. friend, inasmuch as the people had been led to expect something more and something definite. My hon. friend stated there had been no large promises made that he had heard of. Well, I take issue a little with him in that respect. The immigration policy in Canada is, with the ablest men and under the most carefully-considered conditions, a very difficult problem to deal with, but that did not restrain the criticisms of the former Administration, for the criticisms of hon. gentlemen opposite were not only continuous but very definite and carried out on well-known lines. Those criticisms were the stock-in-trade of hon. gentlemen opposite for the last ten years. With the gradual approach of the elections of 1896 that was one of the points which probably received, after the tariff issue, as great attention as any other in the whole programme that was discussed before the people. The great need of opening up the North-west to immigration, the great quantity of fertile land there waiting for population, the essential interest this country had in increasing its population in those fertile and productive regions, all these were expatiated upon, and the late Government were criticised very strongly and very continuously on the ground that they had failed to fulfil those conditions. As the time of the elections drew nigh, that was put before the electorate, and it was stated that the Liberal party, and, if they won, the incoming Liberal Government, would make a revolution in regard to this matter, that they would fill up the North-west, that they would discard the old methods and the old policy, and would introduce a new vigorous immigration policy which would rapidly fill up the North-west, and consequently tend to the improvement and progress of this country. If one had done nothing else but read the columns of the Toronto "Globe" for six months before the elections and for the six months after the elections, he would have seen that that was a very large burden of its song. The new Government has come in, and the old party has gone out, and for a year the new Government has had the opportunity of incubating and maturing its plans—plans I suppose which were already known, for the criticisms made by hon. gentlemen in Opposition must have had some basis. One year has passed away, and the new Minister who was specially presented to the country as the man who was to introduce something new in the way of an immigration policy, who was the one to redeem the credit of the country as regards immigration matters, has made a statement, and it has been a very mild and very tame statement indeed. The hon. gentleman has declared that the Government has no new policy; he has not delineated any new policy. He has made a statement that he has only been a few months in office and cannot be expected to have his policy outlined and settled. There is a great deal in that plea. The hon. gentleman knows, as his colleagues know, that there is every difference between offering criticisms from the Opposition benches and framing and adopting a policy to meet the circumstances of the case, and a little of the active work of Government has wonderfully sobered the hazy ideas of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues. The hon. gentleman says he has been only a few months in office, and he asks for delay. But the hon. gentleman was only a few weeks in office when he "fired out" some of the ablest officers in his department. He did not ask for delay then—he knew all about it himself. But he now pleads for delay, and we must give it to him of course. Are there any differences between the old line of policy and the new? The hon. gentleman has not stated one. He declared that he will try to take good care of incoming immigrants. He then stated that that matter was not lost sight of by the late Government, but he thought they had failed in some respects. It was a cardinal point with the preceding Minister of the Interior and with his predecessors that good care should be taken of the immigrants from the time they came into the ports of Canada until they were settled on the lands of the North-west, and from the time they landed in Halifax or Quebec until they went to their homes in the North-west, they were attended by the officers and servants and followed by the kindly services of the Dominion Government. My hon. friend stated that the Government will throw still greater force in that direction.

That will be all the better. But the line of policy is exactly the same in that regard as that followed by the old Government, and it remains to be seen whether there will be any greater efficiency in the service, and whether greater vigour can be infused into the department by the hon. gentleman than by his predecessors. I very much doubt it. The hon. gentleman then declared that he had organized a bureau to look after that branch of the work and for various other purposes with respect to settlement in the North-west, a bureau similar in principle, to use the hon. gentleman's own words, to the bureau carried on by preceding Ministers of the Interior. It is carrying out the same idea, the principle of caring for and guarding the immigrant from imposition, being a friend to him in a strange land, guiding him to his future home, and making him feel from the time he touches the shores of Canada until he arrives at his home in the North-west, a rude home though it be, he is surrounded by and has the advantage of the kindly offices of the Government; and for this work, of course, the hon. Minister has a staff in hand. A new line of policy inaugurated by the late Minister of the Interior was that of looking largely to the re-settlement of Canadians and the descendants of Canadians in the North-west, and some four years ago my late colleague the Minister of the Interior inaugurated a system of imparting intelligence, not only by means of the press and by circulars, but by active and able agents, who traversed the very same states of which the hon. gentleman has spoken to-day, and who made known to the people there the advantages of our North-west, and who, in every possible way made them acquainted with the conditions of that portion of the country, and made known the kindly wishes of the Government, and offered the kindly services of the Government in transporting those people from their homes in the western states to Canada. And for the three or four years that this policy was pursued, some of the best settlers who are to-day in the North-west were brought in from those north-western states, most of them probably at one time Canadians, or descendants of Canadians, but who, finding the conditions of life less favourable than they had hoped in the home they had chosen, transferred their families and their goods to Canadian territory. My hon. friend takes up that line of policy and is going to carry it out; and he has already looked out a staff of able men whom he will send out as immigration missionaries to prosecute the work—the same policy, on exactly the same lines, and for the most part with the same salaries.

With reference to Europe, my hon. friend has not very much to say, except that we are suffering there from relaxed efforts. Well, there may be a difference of opinion about that. It is not a fact that the efforts in the way of sowing information in Europe have been in the last eight or nine years appreciably relaxed; but it is a fact that in certain years the conditions have so changed that no amount of effort you could put forth would be as successful in drawing immigrants from Great Britain and some other portions of Europe as would be the case in former years. When a person is doing fairly well, inducements for him to immigrate are less alluring than when times are hard and he is not doing well; and for the last three or four years, one of the strongest difficulties the preceding Government had to contend with in inducing immigrants to come to this country was in the fact that during that period the kind of people we wanted were doing fairly well, and were disinclined to break up their homes in the old country and start for the new. I do not wish to take up the time of the House in expatiating on this, but my hon. friend, from conversations with his officers, and from his own knowledge, is aware that this is the fact. The late Government sowed information through the schools, through the press, by its own agents, and in other efficacious ways, and in none more so than through the late High Commissioner, who is worthily succeeded by Sir Donald Smith, in the effort to arouse the different communities of Great Britain to a knowledge of the fact that Great Britain had a large dependency here, where there were fertile lands in abundance, to which it was possible for her to transplant her hardy sons without losing any subject from the flag in the transplantation process. My hon. friend is going to throw some more effort into this work, and for all that effort and the good resulting from it none will be more glad than the gentlemen on this side of the House; but let me point out that this was exactly the line of policy pursued by the late Government.

My hon. friend is not going to ask for millions of money, and he is wise in that, but he thinks the process of settlement will be slow. That is the sobering effect of coming to view the subject from the standpoint of the facts; but my hon. friend indulges in a prophecy, the fulfilment of which he first put a few years ahead, but afterwards said that it might take a long time—a prophecy that at some time in the dim and distant future streams of people from the old country would come into Canada and build up homes for themselves. It was not so twelve or fifteen months ago. Then all that was necessary was to wave the Liberal flag, and, like the magician's wand, it would direct streams of population into the North-west. But now the process is to be slow and difficult; and the fulfilment of my hon. friend's prophecy must be relegated to many years in the future.

But my hon. friend desires flexibility in his votes. For instance, he says, if I put a man in Wisconsin, and I find afterwards that he is not doing much, I wish to be in a position to put him somewhere else; I do not want to be tied up. Was any Minister ever tied up? You have a vote for foreign agents, which covers all foreign agents, and you have a vote for agents in Great Britain. This is the same amount of flexibility, no more and no less, that a Minister ought to have; and it is the same that has been in existence in the last ten years; unless in its practical application my hon. friend makes it more flexible to serve some purpose of his own.

My hon. friend has prophesied that by-and-by, after a slow and difficult process, the North-west may be filled up. Does my hon. friend not see fitting before him the ghosts of his twelve-months-old promises? How was he going to fill up the North-west twelve months ago? How was the Toronto "Globe," how was the Liberal party all over this country, going to fill up the North-west? By making the conditions of life easy to the people of the North-west; by sweeping away this robbing and murdering system of protection, which was bleeding the farmers white, and by giving them free agricultural implements, cotton goods, woollen goods and everything else necessary for them in their conditions of life. How could you expect to get people to go to the North-west while you were taxing the farmers to keep up these heavy eastern monopolies? And here is my hon. friend, with his far-off prophecy and his pleading for flexibility, putting 20 per cent duty on agricultural implements, making cottons higher than before, and taxing woollens 35 per cent; in all of which my hon. friend must see the ghosts of his past promises fitting before him—at night when he lies down and in the morning when he wakes up; and, if he has a conscience, it must be uneasy as these ghosts flit past him, while behind them, waving as on an airy screen, is that North-west farmer's prayer. "Let Mr. Laurier only give us free trade," and "God bless Mr. Laurier" will be put up as a motto on the wall of every bedroom in the North-west.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I wish to call the attention of the House to something which took place in the province of Quebec in the last election. My hon. friend who has just sat down has drawn a contrast between the promises made in regard to this immigration policy in some parts of Canada and the relaxation of those promises now that the Government is in power. My hon. friend is probably under the influence of French domination as regards this policy of immigration, because while in the province of Ontario and the North-west the speakers on the Liberal side and the Liberal organs were promising that if the present Government came into power we would have a great stream of immigrants flowing into the North-west, all the Liberal organs in the province of Quebec, and a great many of the speakers on the hustings and a great many of hon. gentlemen opposite from that province, went through Quebec promising that if the present Government came into power we would not see all these foreigners coming into the North-west and Manitoba to stifle what they called "Nos Chers Compatriotes." These were the cries raised in the province of Quebec. These people said that the Conservative Government had spent millions of dollars bringing into this country aliens and foreigners—Icelanders, Mennonites, Englishmen and Scotchmen—to the great detriment of the French Canadian population of the country. It seems to me that if the promises which were made by my hon. friend and the Government supporters in other parts of Canada have not been realized, the only reason is that the Minister of the Interior has felt the influence of French domination and probably the great influence of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). That is the reason why these great promises which were made by hon. gentlemen opposite when in Opposition, have not been carried out.

I would like to call my hon. friend's attention to another side of the question. Whilst our friends in the province of Quebec were blaming the Conservative party generally for their immigration policy, whilst they were blaming them for bringing into this country people from the other side of the ocean, another standing ground of complaint was that they had nothing to bring back from the United States our French compatriots, who, they alleged, by the policy of the late Government, were compelled to leave their homes in the province of Quebec and go into the great American Union to earn their livelihood. I see nothing in the explanations which have been given by my hon. friend which can lead me to believe that the policy pursued by the late Government in this connection has been altered by these hon. gentlemen. I would like to ask him if he is ready to assure the House that he is going to fulfil any of the promises which were made, not by himself, but by a great many of his supporters in the province of Quebec, that a very serious effort would be made to bring back into this country, into the North-west Territories especially, those French Canadians who had left our province in order to earn their living in the United States. If he were to do this, he would be fulfilling the promises made during the elections, and would also redeem to a certain extent the promises which had been made by those gentlemen who accused the Conservative party of having brought into the country a great many foreigners, while they left our French Canadians in the eastern states to starve. The hon. gentleman has told us that he would send agents to the western states to bring back to this country Canadians who had emigrated to that part of the union. Well, if he does that in the western states he is bound to do it also in the eastern states. I would ask the hon. gentleman to give us the names of the agents now employed by the Government in Europe to promote emigration to this country.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I do not think it is necessary for me to reply at any length to my hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), whose remarks were evidently couched in a spirit very different from that which animated the remarks I have made. It must have been perfectly evident to the hon. gentleman that in the explanation I gave, I did not attempt to make any political capital. I spoke in the most gentle possible terms of the efforts my predecessors had made and in no way attempted to reflect upon their policy, but simply endeavoured to explain, as a matter of business, what I thought it was my duty to explain in going through the Estimates. The hon. gentleman, however, sunk, as I think, to a lower plane altogether, in a debate of this kind, by discussing the question, not for the purpose of obtaining information, but of scoring a point against the Government from a party standpoint. It would be an extremely easy matter for me to elaborate a scheme which would contain a great variety of points and might be regarded as something new, and which might perhaps in appearance, be somewhat impressive. But the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that this Government will be judged, not by promises, professions or schemes, but by results. It may be that in some respects the revision of the tariff has not been satisfactory to the hon. gentleman. The proper place to discuss that is not in the Committee of Supply, but when the tariff is under discussion in the House proper.

I think that when Parliament adjourns, it will be found that more has been done by this Government in three or four months to ameliorate the condition of the people in the North-west than was done during ten years by the hon. gentlemen who preceded it.

In reply to the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), I may say that it is my intention, as it is my desire, to carry out the promises which my hon. friend says were made by my political friends in Quebec in connection with the repatriation of French Canadians who have settled in the eastern states. I sympathize most strongly with the desire of the people of that province, and I have no doubt the Prime Minister is actuated by the same feeling, that those Canadians who have left us should be brought back to live in their own country.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). We have begun.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. We have at present a number of men who are principally engaged in that work. I have the names of four of them—Messrs. Swanson, Morin, Corbell, Mousseau. These men are almost entirely engaged in this work. Three of them were employed by the late Government and were retained because their services, so far as I can judge from the short time I have been in office, were fairly effective, and I thought it was better to continue them in office. An additional agent has been appointed, named Brousseau, who, I have reason to believe, will prove an efficient officer. In addition, the Repatriation Society of Montreal—an institution with the details of which no doubt the hon. gentleman is more familiar than I am—is provided for to the extent of $3,000 in the Estimates, which I have no doubt will meet with the hon. gentleman's approval. I may say in addition that we have during the last month or so taken steps to bring back numbers of French Canadian people from different places where unfortunately they had been beguiled into going. A large number was brought back only a few days ago from the city of Detroit, where they had collected almost in a state of destitution, having settled in different parts of Michigan and gradually drifted down to Detroit. These people I have brought back and settled in the Lake St. John district. In addition to that, the Government has been under the necessity of spending something in the neighbourhood of between $3,000 and $4,000, speaking from memory, for the payment of expenses in bringing back French Canadian people who went to Brazil under representations that were made that they would be able to succeed there to a much greater extent than was proven to be justified by the facts. These people got into a state of distress in Brazil, and we considered it was a proper thing for the Government of Canada, having regard to the dignity of the Government and of the country, and of our own citizens, that we should pay the expenses of these people and bring them back. And we have done so. I may say that these people went out to Brazil notwithstanding the strong protests of the officers of the department, who, at the time, told them that the results would not be commensurate with their hopes. I do not know whether I have answered all of the hon. gentleman's questions. Any further information that he desires, I will be glad to give him.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Can the hon. Minister tell me how many agents he has in Europe?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) wishes me to include agents in the British Isles?

Mr. CASGRAIN. Yes.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. There are sixteen at the present time, according to the memorandum I have. I may be one or two out on account of late changes.

Mr. SIFTON.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask if the expenses of these people who were brought back from Brazil were paid out of the immigration vote?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes; they were charged to the immigration vote, but we propose to ask for a special supplementary vote to recoup the immigration vote the amount that was paid out.

Mr. FOSTER. You might as well have it paid out of the Hudson Bay expedition vote.

Mr. LAVERGNE. I wish to say a word in answer to my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain). I was rather surprised at the statement he made. He must have had the misfortune to strike places where bigotry existed. So far as I am concerned, and so far as my friends who sit about me are concerned, we heard no such things as trying to raise a national cry against the immigration of persons from Great Britain and elsewhere. We have always stated, taking the census figures as our proof, that there was really a decrease in our population, allowing for the natural increase, that our people had gone away and that we had spent large sums of money to bring immigrants here, but without any success whatever. We told what the Government had done for immigration with a view to increase population, but as to complaining that the English people or any other people had been brought here to choke the French Canadian element, my hon. friend has really been very unfortunate to strike places where such a thing was stated. My friends and I had no such misfortune. This is the first time I have ever heard such a statement made. I have been in a good many counties and never heard such a statement as the hon. gentleman refers to. My hon. friends beside me, I believe, could say the same.

Mr. BENNETT. It is painfully plain that there is a wide divergence between the idea that the Government have to-day of an immigration policy and that which has prevailed in this country for the past few years. I can recollect well the denunciations fast and furious in this House of the immigration policy of the past Administration. It is quite true that the First Minister rather pulled in his horns, if I may say so, in regard to the immigration policy of the late Administration, when he said:

Though I must say I am not altogether an admirer of the immigration policy of our predecessors I quite approve and commend the system which has been, I will not say inaugurated, but attempted to be inaugurated, by them, with a view to securing immigrants from the western states.

But, rather strong denunciations from the back benches, and foremost among those who uttered them was the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) who declaimed against the immigration policy on these lines, and who, speaking for the great province of Manitoba, made this statement :

I recognize that there will be political differences with regard to the tariff, but I am strongly convinced that the best immigration policy that can be adopted for Manitoba, the North-west Territories especially, is to lower the duty on the necessaries of life to a minimum, and also to lower, in fact, to wipe out entirely, the duties on agricultural implements.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think so to-day.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman may think so, but I will be bound to say he will not vote so.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am prepared to vote for the abolition of the duty on agricultural implements.

Mr. BENNETT. The spirit may be strong but the flesh will rather wilt, when it comes to the point. There is another gentleman who sits opposite and gives the Government a strong allegiance. He gave them another line of policy. I refer to the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), who said :

It is a matter of the utmost necessity for the binding together and building up of this Dominion, that there should be a strong settlement from the eastern provinces of Canada in the North-west, because that is the only guarantee that we have that it shall remain part of Canada, the only means of cementing the eastern and western parts of Canada together.

Now, after all this kindly advice by, I will not say subservient, but I will say admiring supporters of hon. gentlemen, is to be unheeded. Their ideas are to be neglected, and the policy is not to be to attract people from Ontario or from the western states, but if the statements of these immigration agents themselves are to be credited, an entirely different policy is to be adopted. There was a gentleman, Mr. Devlin, who was a member of the last Parliament, and who was recently appointed as immigration agent in the old country. But, strange to say—and I am sure the hon. First Minister does not know it—Mr. Devlin has particular instructions as to the class of immigrants he is to direct to this country. We have enough trouble in this country, I should have thought, with cries of race and creed ; but Mr. Devlin has gone to the old country commissioned by the Government to carry out a new idea and build up an Irish Catholic party in this country. If the immigration money of this country is to be disposed of for any such purpose as this, I am sure affairs are coming to a deplorable pass. Yet, speaking at Aylmer, Que., Mr. Devlin made use of this most remarkable language. I hope the Minister of the Interior will say that Mr. Devlin had no warrant to make such a statement :

Were it otherwise, I would not accept the mission which he—

Speaking of the First Minister (Mr. Laurier).

—confides to me, and which I hope will be fruitful in as far as our race is concerned, and also the best interests of our country. I thank you, my dear friends of Lowe, and, speaking to you, I address myself to my fellow Irish Catholics of Canada, who have always been so kind to me. I am proud to observe that you appreciate the importance of the step the Government is taking in regard to Ireland, the land of your birth and your love.

Now, that seems to be a strange utterance. Here Mr. Devlin is commissioned by the Government of Canada, and he says he is specially commissioned by the First Minister and he says his duty is to go to Ireland, not to ask immigrants to come here, irrespective of religion but to endeavour to attract hither Irish Roman Catholics. I have no objection to Irish Roman Catholics or Irish Protestants either coming to this country, but I do regret to see a gentleman commissioned specially as Mr. Devlin says he is, by the Prime Minister, to go over there and endeavour to import into this country people of a particular faith. My hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) raised his voice in protest because one Alfred Jury, of Toronto, had been sent out to the old country as immigration agent. I do not know Mr. Jury personally, but I do know him by repute as having been for years past one of the most noted atheist and free-thought speakers in Toronto and any gentleman from Toronto will bear me out in this statement. I do not assume it was simply by reason of the fact that Mr. Jury had been on the platform in Toronto protesting against Sunday cars, protesting against Sabbath desecration, as the opponents of Sunday cars pleased to term it, that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) objected to Mr. Jury ; but I believe the reason he objected to Mr. Jury was the fact that he is a Western Ontario man, and that Mr. Jury's record in the city of Toronto for a number of years past has been simply that of an advocate of socialism, free thought and atheism of a most pronounced plan. Well, Sir, if we are going to have immigration from the old country, if we are to have men like those in the sphere in which Mr. Jury will move, if he is at all true to his likings in the past, then I say that the result will be most deplorable. And if in Ireland Mr. Devlin is simply to confine himself to the particular field that he has stated he is going to explore, then I say that will be a deplorable fact as well. On the whole, the statements made by the Minister of the Interior to-day as to the immigration policy, will, I think, be disappointing after the promises that have been made as to the new era that was to be introduced. In view of the statements of Mr. Devlin, made on the eve of his departure, and not repudiated—and I hope they will be repudiated here to-day—and the fact that a man of the stamp of Mr. Jury has been commissioned, I can only say that the immigration policy of the new Government will not, I think, have any very beneficial results as compared with that of the past few years.

Mr. CASEY. I regret that the Minister of the Interior has not been able to boast sufficiently to satisfy the late Minister of Finance. I note, however, with approval that he prefers to refer his success to the arbitrament of actual trial. The hon. Minister had not the advantage of being here in the years when the hon. gentlemen opposite used to do their boasting, and has not been trained to that style of administering affairs; consequently, he will have to triumph in the line which he himself has chosen, and I have every confidence that he will come out of it with success. It is for that reason that I wish to bring to his attention a suggestion in connection with immigration matters, not expecting any promise or any definite answer to it, but to have the matter discussed. The bulk of our immigration expenditure heretofore has been for the benefit of the newest parts of Canada, I think it is possible to do something for the older parts. Taking south-western Ontario, for example, perhaps the most fertile and prosperous part of Canada, with the exception of every other locality in which every hon. member here may happen to live, we have suffered to some extent by the development of Manitoba and the North-west. There has been such an emigration to those new districts as to reduce the demand for land in that part of Ontario. Now, I believe that a good deal could be done by judicious management to attract that class of tenant farmers from Great Britain who are possessed of considerable capital. Those farmers are required to possess a certain capital before renting a farm in England, and the amount of capital that they are required to possess there before renting would be sufficient, at present rates of farm lands in Ontario, to buy them very comfortable farms here. I think they would be the most valuable class of immigrants that we could possibly attract; and I would suggest that the hon. Minister should devise some means of bringing to the attention of this class the favourable openings for them in the older parts of Canada. We know that the Britisher, as our friends across the line call him, rather likes to settle in a place where there are institutions something like those that he has left, and the prospect of having good schools and churches and roads and everything of that kind, would be an inducement. Most of the immigrating class in England, and most of the tenant farmer class to which I refer, are not aware that such things exist in Canada. They look upon Canada either as a backwoods district or as a prairie district, or as a mining district; they are not aware that there are great extents of country here where they can, for a small capital, get comfortable and well-established homes. I would ask the Minister's attention to this matter, and if he has thought about it at all, I would ask him to say what conclusion he has come to.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not wish to detain the committee, but this is an extremely interesting subject. There can be no doubt in the mind of any person who has taken the trouble to investigate this subject, that the importance of successful immigration cannot possibly be overrated. There is also no doubt that our efforts in the past have not been as successful as we desired. There were reasons which tended to check the efforts that were being made to bring immigrants into this country. Take one circumstance that is familiar to the mind of every hon. member present, the drop in the price of wheat, that was a tremendous blow to immigration. When wheat fell to one-half what it was worth a few years ago in the North-west, everybody felt that the great attraction that our North-west had presented to immigrants was very seriously affected, and that it was impossible to stem successfully such an adverse current as set in in consequence of the price of wheat dropping to a point that made its production unprofitable even in the North-west of Canada, where it can be produced, I believe, more cheaply than in any other part, certainly of North America. This constituted a very great obstacle to our efforts to bring people into this country. Now, my hon. friend by my side (Mr. Foster) has referred to the fact that the Government are following very much in the footsteps of their predecessors. Well, I take it that is a fact that we ought to congratulate ourselves upon; I am sure I shall be the last person to find any fault with hon. gentlemen opposite for following as closely in the footsteps of their predecessors as they possibly can, and the more nearly they approach to the modes by which the various departments endeavoured to promote the interests of this country, the more likely, I think, they will be to succeed in the work in which they are engaged. But there are other reasons besides the one which I have alluded to, that affect very seriously our efforts to bring immigrants out of the United Kingdom and other countries into Canada. One of these reasons is the greatly improved condition of the class of persons who are accustomed to emigrate. No doubt that has been a very serious drawback. We know that the love of home, the love of one's own country, so dominant in the human heart everywhere, is extremely difficult to get over, and it is only necessity that compels people to seek in foreign lands new homes for themselves, and the fact that the general condition of people in Great Britain and Europe is improving, tends to diminish the volume of emigration. Now, I was in hopes that before this we would have had laid upon the Table of the House the arrangements that are proposed in reference to the fast service. I saw a statement, and I would like to ask the hon. gentleman opposite if there is any truth in that statement, that Messrs. Peterson & Tate, contractors for the fast service, were making arrangements by which they would be able to commence their operations in a month, or to commence the service. I suppose it must have referred to the commencement of the organization for the construction of the ships or something of that kind; but I thought it was just possible that they might have been able to make arrangements for obtaining the service of a line of steamers that would enable them very promptly to commence the work. I do not know whether there is any foundation for that statement, but I should have been only too glad if it were true. I am told by the Messrs. Allan, who have investigated this subject with the greatest possible care, and who have given the subject of immigration the closest possible attention, that one of the gravest difficulties that Canada has to contend with in reference to immigration, is the existence of the fast steamers to New York, and that the poorest immigrants will make the greatest sacrifices in order to get a ship that will take them across the Atlantic in a day or two less than other lines. I therefore look forward to the establishment of the fast steamship service as a most invaluable adjunct in increasing the tide of immigration to Canada, because we all know very well that if the immigrant starts with the view of reaching Canada and comes through the United States, there is a strong probability that he will not reach his destination but will be induced to remain in that country. Reference was made to my successor in the position of High Commissioner in Canada. I am quite sure no person could fill that office who would be better able, from his knowledge of the subject and from his deep interest in this Dominion, to turn as rapidly as possible the tide of immigration to the North-west. But from a summary I saw a day or two ago in one of the newspapers, I was not surprised to see that my successor stated that every possible effort which could be made by the Immigration Department in England had been made, and that the same efforts would be continued, but in order to materially increase the results he felt sure it would be necessary to supplement the assistance given by a considerable addition of a large sum of money. I see that the Minister of the Interior proposes to take a largely increased vote. I am very glad to see it, because I believe the prospects of effecting such successful results are very much greater at the present moment than they have been recently. In the first place, the price of wheat—the low price of which in recent years had a most material effect in frustrating our efforts to secure immigration—has materially improved, and I hope that improvement will continue, and that wheat at all events will command a price which will make its cultivation profitable to the producer. I am quite sure nothing would be a greater stimulus to immigration so far as the North-west is concerned. There is also another influence, which at the present moment will conduce to bring a large body of people into Canada, and that is the immense development of the mineral resources of the country. Within the last year discoveries have been made not only of gold and silver but of copper and lead and other minerals, that must necessarily attract population. In fact, experience in various parts of the world has shown that nothing has been so successful in attracting population to a country as the discovery of gold. I believe our country is so rich in mineral wealth that parties coming here and engaging in mining enterprises will obtain a very rich reward, and not only will the country be benefited by the creation of wealth taken from the bowels of the earth, but people coming into the country—as occurred in British Columbia many years ago when there was a large influx of population in connection with the placer mines of Cariboo, after the gold was supposed to be exhausted, although I believe it was only commencing to be discovered, as will shortly be proved to be the case—will remain in the country and engage in agricultural and other industries. So the mining population brought into British Columbia for the purpose of developing the mineral resources of the country, and also into Rainy River, Lake of the Woods and other portions of the Dominion, which are proving to be so eminently rich in mineral wealth, will have the effect of attracting agriculturists to the North-west because the mining industry will produce a demand near at hand for food products. The time is therefore especially propitious for an active immigration policy, and I believe the Minister of the Interior is perfectly right in availing himself of the opportunity now afforded, and in asking from Parliament an increased vote for the purpose of placing in his hands the means necessary to give the greatest possible effect to his immigration policy. So far as repatriation is concerned, I am quite sure there is no hon. member who does not regard efforts made to induce Canadians, who for any reason have left the province of Quebec or any other portion of the Dominion to settle in the United States, to return as of great importance, and these efforts will commend themselves to the approval of every member of this House. There is no class of immigrants that are better calculated to advance the best interests of the Dominion than those engaged in agricultural industries, especially in the adjoining states, and who having found the superiority of British institutions over those of any other country, will be glad to come back to the homes of their fathers. I am very sanguine that the efforts the Government will now be able to make, under the improved condition of things, will result in a very largely increased immigration to this country, and that result will be hailed with the utmost satisfaction, not only by every hon. member of this House but by every man in Canada, who knows how important this question is to the progress and prosperity of the country.

Mr. CASGRAIN. My hon. friend the member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) contradicted me rather flatly just now. When I made the statement to which he referred, I knew whereof I was speaking. I understand quite well that in a part of the country like Arthabaska, where he resides, these statements I have quoted, and which I imputed to hon. gentlemen opposite, would not have been made, for the very simple reason that there are a great many English-speaking electors there, and therefore it would not be politic from a party point of view to say anything against immigration from the British Isles. I was quite surprised to hear my hon. friend make the lapsus linguæ he did, when in referring to immigrants he spoke of English and other foreigners brought into this country. That is a sample of statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite in some portions of Quebec. When those hon. gentlemen come here they have to face the music, for many of their colleagues are of English origin, and they then deliver speeches which are quite opposite in character to those delivered not only in the back parishes of Quebec but in other portions of the province where there are no English-speaking electors. I state distinctly before this House that such speeches have been made, not from one platform, but from a dozen platforms by members of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Where?

Mr. CASGRAIN. In several parts of Quebec, in Montmorency, in Lévis and other counties, and in the district of Montreal, as the hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Dugas) reminds me, the principal organs of the Liberal party present the same arguments to the French population of Quebec. I am surprised that any hon. gentleman should question the accuracy of this statement; I am quite aware that in some cases they were astonished at the arguments used by Liberals in the province of Quebec. Just as they were ashamed during last session when I reproached them with having, all through the province of Quebec, in the campaign of 1896, accused the Conservative party of expending $3,000,000 in buying rifles with which to fight the battles of the English Empire. They were ashamed of that argument just as they are ashamed when I bring up the statements they made in the province of Quebec and which they would be ashamed to make before this House. But some of these gentlemen, speaking French in this House, have used language covering not quite the same argument, but an argument which went to a certain extent in the same direction. I take from "Hansard" for 1896, the following words which fell from the lips of one of the hon. gentlemen opposite, supporting the Government. This is a translation of what was spoken in French:

I have already had the opportunity of protesting against the expenditure incurred for immigration purposes, a policy which, to my mind, far from favouring our interests, is directly opposed to it. The Government have expended large sums of money to assist the passage of newcomers having an imperfect knowledge of our manners and laws, often picked up the lower strata of European towns, while we have allowed the exodus to take away our farmers, the backbone of the country, to the United States.

If this language can be used in this House. I ask hon. gentlemen to consider how it is emphasized and what kind of language is used when these gentlemen are speaking to their French Canadian fellow-citizens of the province of Quebec. I have brought to the notice of the House these arguments that have been used not so much to score a point against gentlemen opposite as to induce them, when they are discussing public questions on the platforms of Quebec, not to use arguments that they are ashamed to have brought up before their fellow members here.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I am not going to discuss what has been said at the last election. If we were to repeat all that has been said by hon. gentlemen on the other side, the hon. members would be the first to be ashamed of their conduct. I must say that I fully endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne). There is only one English elector in my riding, and I never heard a word spoken in the sense of those referred to by my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain). But I have heard this by candidates on the other side, especially in the last election—I have heard them accuse us of seeking to prevent French Canadian Catholics going to Manitoba and the Northwest because they said we were against separate schools. That is the argument they used to fight us, and they said that in the position we took we were fighting against the French Canadians and in the interest of foreigners.

Mr. TAYLOR. I expected to hear the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) question the Government whether they had selected any person to canvass for emigrants from the North of Ireland. Mr. Devlin, it appears, has been specially appointed by the Government to go to the South of Ireland and seek to bring to this country Roman Catholics exclusively. Mr. Edward O'Kelly who has also been appointed as immigration agent to Ireland, I am sure, has not been appointed to go to the North of Ireland, because he is of the same religious belief as Mr. Devlin, and will, I am sure, operate in the same field. I think the hon. member for North Wellington, who, I am informed, is a member of the Orange order—at least I am informed that just previous to the last election he went up and joined the Orange lodge in his own county so as to catch a certain wing of the Orange vote in the last election, and I think the hon. gentleman will not deny that—should inquire of the Government whether they intend to select an Orangeman to go to the North of Ireland and see if we cannot get some immigrants from there. But I wish to inquire especially from the Minister of the Interior what Mr. Jury's mission is. I presume he is sent to the old country for the purpose of soliciting immigrants to come to Canada irrespective of their vocation in life. I remember very well when Mr. Jury led an agitation in Toronto a few years ago—the "Globe" was full of it—which resulted in protests being sent down here, and voiced by Mr. Jury himself who came before a committee to protest against the Government spending public money to induce immigrants to come to this country. This is the same Mr. Jury who is now appointed immigration agent. Resolutions were passed by the labour organizations, of which Mr. Jury was one of the principal spokesmen, protesting against the Government taking money from the treasury for the purpose of inducing immigration to this country. But now, this same Mr. Jury is sent as special agent, and I would like to know what his mission is. The Minister said that the late Government relaxed their efforts somewhat. This may have been due to the efforts of Mr. Jury and the labour organizations, who, perhaps, were put up specially to create this excitement, an agitation through the country, charging this Government with having spent money to bring immigrants to this country while many of our people were out of work because there was no work for them to do. I hope the hon. member for North Wellington, as he is the only member of the Orange order on the other side of the House, will see to it that the Government appoint an immigration agent whose duty it will be to canvass the North of Ireland and see that a few Orangemen are transplanted to this country to level up and offset the effect of Mr. Devlin's special mission, as Mr. Devlin himself describes it, to induce Irish Catholics to go to the North-west.

Mr. McMULLEN. As the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) has called upon me to make a statement, and as my name has been mentioned by another hon. gentleman in connection with immigration, I wish to say a few words. As to what my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) said with regard to my joining the Orange order immediately before the last election with the object of getting an increased number of votes, I can tell him that his information is wholly incorrect. There is no truth in these statements.

Mr. TAYLOR. I believe that the exact facts were that the hon. gentleman joined the order a few years ago, but withdrew his certificate, and then, shortly before the last election, he deposited his certificate with a lodge whose name I have forgotten in one of the townships of his own riding.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman's information is wholly incorrect. Now, with regard to the question put to the Minister. I have been instructed by him to say that the instructions given to Mr. Jury and Mr. Devlin, have been to operate largely among agricultural classes in order to secure the immigration of this class, this being the class we stand most in need of. Their attention will be largely directed in that line. Now I wish to say, in reply to the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), that I very closely and pointedly criticised the policy adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to immigration which they adopted when in power. The money that was spent on immigration during the last ten years was virtually squandered. There was no results from it, the best evidence of which was that the census showed that we had hardly our natural increase, apart from the number of immigrants who were supposed to have come to the country. I also criticised the expenditure, because the late Government sent a great many of their camp followers to different parts of the United States, not because they were fitted to become desirable immigration agents, but because they wanted something to do. At one time I believe they had no less than forty-three tramping through Nebraska, Kansas and other western states taking a holiday, and drawing allowances as immigration agents. We had a striking illustration of that in this House on one occasion, when it was brought out that one immigration agent had withdrawn $3,100, and the entire result of his efforts in the United States was that he had brought to Canada three German Jews, who shortly after their arrival in Winnipeg were caught with packs on their backs travelling around selling the worst kind of jewellery, and were arrested and tried and sent to jail; and in the course of their trial it was proved that they were brought from Chicago to settle in the North-west as farmers, but instead of that they were peddling spurious jewellery. I strongly protested against the money of the people of Canada being used to promote the immigration of that kind of people, and I do hope that this Government has turned over a new leaf, and that, while following to a certain extent the line of the late Government in sending men to the United States as immigration agents, they will appoint a better class of men, and that their efforts will be more productive than those of their predecessors. I am quite ready to grant any reasonable amount of money, so long as efficient work is done; but I object to public money being squandered. One man named Holmes, who lived at Napanee, and was supposed to be a devoted friend of hon. gentlemen opposite, was proved in the Public Accounts Committee to be drawing a salary as an immigration agent in the United States while he was living in Napanee. That was the sort of thing I objected to in the late Government, and I will object to it if my hon. friend permits it to take place. We want the money spent on immigration to be properly spent. We want our agents to do earnest work in bringing people into the country, and I hope that my hon. friend will pursue a policy which will show better results in the next census.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I want to say a word to the hon. Minister of the Interior in reference to one of the late immigration agents, a gentleman who has occupied for many years a very important position in the Immigration Department of Great Britain; I refer to Mr. John Dyke. Mr. Dyke, while occupying a very good position under the Government of the province of Ontario, was induced by a former Minister of Agriculture, I think the Hon. Mr. Pope, to abandon that position, and devote himself to the work of immigration. I believe it would be impossible to overrate the value of Mr. Dyke's services in that capacity. In addition to his duties at the very important port of Liverpool, he had the supervision of the Scandinavian and continental immigration generally; and I am able to bear testimony not only to his great ability, but to his untiring industry, and to the great success which in the face of very great difficulties, attended his efforts. I am quite aware that his health recently has not been so good as it was before, and while I held the position of High Commissioner in London, I made the most earnest efforts to induce the Government then in power to place Mr. Dyke in a position to be superannuated in case his loss of health should at any time oblige him to leave the service. I regret to say that I was not able to secure that object, but I take this opportunity to say to the Minister of the Interior that anything he can possibly do to recognize the services of Mr. John Dyke in connection with immigration will not, I am satisfied, be misplaced, but highly approved of by every one who has come in contact with him and has had an opportunity of knowing how long and faithfully he has served Canada in the position he has held.

Mr. McMULLEN.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). What the hon. leader of the Opposition has said of Mr. Dyke's services corroborates what I have heard from everybody else who has had anything to do with Mr. Dyke in connection with the discharge of his duties; and it is a matter of great regret to me that Mr. Dyke's health does not appear to be such as to enable him to cope fully with the duties of the office. While I cannot say anything definite to the hon. gentleman, I may say that the representations he has made have been made by others, and that every effort will be made to recognize Mr. Dyke's services.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the item passes, I would like to ascertain from the hon. Minister who is the immigration agent at Halifax at the present time? I understand, from a statement that has appeared in the public press, that the former agent has been dismissed, and that the appointment has been tendered to a gentleman in Halifax who has declined it with a good deal of indignation. If such a state of affairs exists, perhaps the hon. gentleman would state who is acting at the present time, whether the former agent, Mr. Clay has been dismissed, and whether the appointment has been tendered to any other gentleman in the city of Halifax?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The office of chief agent at Halifax is vacant in consequence of the dismissal of the late agent, whom, I regret to say, I was compelled to dismiss by reason of the fact that charges were made against him of improper conduct in connection with the accounts of the institution. A commission was appointed, and reported that the charges, some of them at least were proved, and it became necessary for me to remove Mr. Clay from office. Another Mr. Clay, I am not sure whether a relative or not, is the second official in rank, and he is acting in the capacity of chief agent at present. I have not yet decided upon the appointment of an agent to take the place of the official who has been removed, and therefore cannot say who will be appointed or where his residence will be.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the hon. Minister what are the instructions given the agents with regard to the class of immigrants desirable for this country. I understood from the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that he had been instructed to say that the agents were instructed to bring out particularly the agricultural classes. I must say that I entirely dissent from the proposition that only the agricultural classes are to be brought out to this country. Agricultural pursuits are pretty much depressed in Canada at present, and unless men can find employment in other pursuits rather than exclusively in agriculture, we cannot hope to make much progress as a country. We must find something for men to do here besides farming; and if we bring the agricultural class alone to Canada, we should see that those we bring are men of means. It is a false and a dangerous policy to bring out men without means to follow the pursuit of agriculture. I do not at all object to the sum demanded, because I think it may be well spent if properly spent. But I think it would be a misappropriation of the money, were we to use it in bringing out to this country agriculturists who are not possessed of some considerable means. That argument, of course, I do not apply to the repatriation of Canadians. I think that our money would be well spent in bringing back our own people who understand our country and who would make all the better settlers for their enforced absence from it and consequent better appreciation of its advantages, but I think it would be a serious mistake to bring in immigrants, whether from England or foreign countries, who have not a very considerable amount of means to start with. They would simply be a drawback to all those who are engaged in a calling which is now well known to be in a very depressed condition—the calling of agriculture.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. Minister said that a bureau had been organized in the Northwest, but did not say where.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR.
At Winnipeg.

Mr. DAVIN. What officers are there ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR.
There are six in Winnipeg. That is to say, they operate from Winnipeg.

Mr. DAVIN. Who is the immigration agent at present in Regina ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR.
There is none at present.

Mr. DAVIN. There was a Mr. Stemshorn there, who had only $40 a month, and who proved himself one of the best officers in the department. He was a German, speaking German, and from the opening up of the North-west Territories he had done good service. He worked as a clerk in the office and acted as an agent to meet the Germans and others coming in, and nothing could exceed the zeal which he manifested towards the incoming settlers. But the moment the hon. gentleman became Minister of the Interior he dismissed this man, so far as I know, without rhyme or reason. He was a most exemplary officer, he had the confidence of his superior officers, and certainly as an immigration agent he was in my opinion most zealous and effective. I would also ask my hon. friend what he meant when he said he quoted Sir Donald Smith as saying that we were suffering from a cessation of effort in recent years. Did he mean that a sufficient amount had not been voted from year to year or that the agents for whom it was voted had lain on their arms and done nothing ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR.
I did not express any opinion as regard to that, but referred to the opinion which Sir Donald Smith and the heads of transportation companies had expressed, that sufficiently vigorous efforts had not been made in the last three or four years, and that we would be likely to suffer to some extent for the next year or two because of that fact.

Mr. DAVIN. Is the hon. gentleman going to remedy the evil ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR.
The hon. gentleman will be able to tell better next year.

Mr. DAVIN. If Sir Donald Smith complained that nothing had been done because the sinews of war had not been voted, then the hon. gentleman is not asking as much as was voted in recent years. I find the following amounts were voted :—

1886-87.....	$279,000
1887-88.....	229,525
1888-89.....	116,389
1889-90.....	95,125

The first vote in 1891 was $101,525, but the total vote ultimately was $251,525. I may say, as a fact that cannot be controverted, that the change in that vote took place in consequence of a disturbing speech made from this side of the House by myself, criticising the Government of that day for not giving sufficient. In 1891-92, the vote was $197,000. In 1893, the vote was $197,000; in 1894, it was $200,000, and in 1895, $130,000. Now, I know very well that complaint was made, from time to time, by the late High Commissioner in London that sufficient means was not at the disposal of the Minister of the Interior to deal actively with immigration. And if, in this case, Sir Donald Smith has made the same complaint, I am not sure that the Minister is taking a sufficient amount of money to meet the defect that Sir Donald speaks of. At the present time, undoubtedly, there are favourable circumstances that may well give the Minister hope and confidence in telling us to look for results. At the same time, it would not be unreasonable of us if we expected a little more from the Minister than he has given us. I think that the Minister might have given us a statement of his plans. After the statement made, we are not very much enlightened as to what is being done. All we know is that the Minister is proceeding very much on the lines of his predecessors. Now, there is one advantage he has, which, undoubtedly, his predecessors had not. He is confronted with an Opposition that will criticise his efforts as a Minister dealing with immigration, fairly. If you look back on the debates in committee, you will find that hon. gentlemen on the other side, when in Opposition, whenever this vote was before the committee criticised it from no fair standpoint. The criticism of my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) to-day, was, in my opinion, very mild. I have before me the debate upon this item in 1891. We have here speeches from the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) and other members of the Opposition of that time. And what do they all say? What is the reason given by them that the Government's efforts in favour of immigration were not successful? Why, the very thing mentioned by the hon. member for York—namely, that the tariff prevented immigrants coming into the North-west Territories, that this tariff was a wall that kept them out. This is a fair point of criticism when hon. gentlemen opposite come down here asking a vote for immigration, I think only $40,000 more than we asked the last time, but with the tariff that opposes the same barrier to immigration going into the North-west Territories.

Now, I would like to ask the hon. Minister—because the other points have been taken up by other speakers before me—if he will say why he dismissed Mr. Stemshorn from the position he had in Regina, in which position, I know, he was most useful.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I dismissed him because I was informed, on authority which appeared to me to be perfectly unimpeachable that Mr. Stemshorn had neglected his duties for the purpose of going out and informing the German settlers in the hon. gentleman's electoral division that if they voted for the hon. gentleman's opponent and the result of their votes should be to bring into power a Liberal Government, they would not get the titles to their lands, and the country generally would go to the dogs and would not be fit to live in. I thought that a gentleman occupying such a position should not act in such a way, and I summarily dismissed him; and, under similar circumstances, I would do the same again.

Mr. DAVIN. I would like to ask if the hon. Minister gave Mr. Stemshorn an opportunity to reply to that charge.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I did not, because I was quite satisfied of the truth of it. It was quite notorious, and the hon. gentleman knows it, no doubt.

Mr. DAVIN. I know nothing of that kind. The hon. Minister says it was quite notorious; I know nothing of it, and Mr. Stemshorn denies it strenuously.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have not the slightest doubt that what I have stated is correct. I am quite prepared to take the responsibility of saying that it is correct.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, this is a very peculiar state of things. Here is a Minister who is also a lawyer, and he tells us that this charge is made against Mr. Stemshorn behind his back, but he is not allowed to reply to it and is dismissed without a hearing; that he is not to be given a hearing, though he asks for it; and the hon. Minister tells us that he, who had no means of knowing anything about it and except an ex-parte statement, is confident that the thing is as he says.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman's assumed innocence may work with members of the House who are not acquainted with the manner in which these things are done in the North-west, but it has no effect upon me. The hon. gentleman cannot but be aware of the fact that a considerable number of officials of the Government were employed and used almost entirely, before election, as election agents. It was notorious in the North-west that this was going on, and I was not prepared to advise the waste of public money in investigating the actions of men who acted as election agents simply, and about whose conduct there was no doubt whatever.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman says he does not propose to waste public money. It seems to be regarded as a great waste of money to criticise hon. gentlemen opposite. It was not a waste of money for them to criticise the Conservative Government, but it is a great waste of public money to come here and defend any poor man who is oppressed if the hon. Minister has the certificate of a person who is a Liberal that there is some ground of suspicion against him.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Is not that notorious? We have the "Hansard" here, and we have records here of entire sittings taken up with the discussion of this immigration vote. But they are not to be criticised. Last session, they were not to be criticised, because it was too soon after the election, it was a short session and there was another session before them. This session they are not to be criticised because a number of them are going over to be infinitesimal joints in the tail of a magnificent ceremony. The business of the people of Canada is to be neglected, things are to be hurried through, and justice for citizens of Canada is not to be fought out here, because, they cry out, this is to be a short session. We have got into power, they say, and, though we have criticised everything in the past even down to table napkins for Rideau Hall, we are not to be criticised. Do we not remember the night spent over the case of Mrs. or Mr. Wallace in British Columbia—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). McManus, not Wallace.

Mr. DAVIN. No; it is not McManus. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) has interjected the name "McManus."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I thought that was the person to whom you referred.

Mr. DAVIN. No, I said Wallace. I saw the account in the paper, that must have been prompted by a Minister, and I may tell my hon. friend and his colleagues that they will hear more about that question, and about Mrs. McManus, too. But the position taken here by the Minister of the Interior is that he does not propose to waste public money in having an inquiry as to whether Mr. Stemshorn was or was not guilty of being an offensive partisan. Just to show how incorrect the Minister is in this case—he says that for months before the election this man was an active agent for the Conservative party.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I said there were many officials that had been employed for months, I did not say that this gentleman had been employed for months; I said he had been employed, and had made certain statements, and had acted in a certain way; I had no reason to doubt that my information was correct, and I took the responsibility of acting upon it.

Mr. DAVIN. What is the meaning of trifling with this Parliament in this way? What is the meaning of saying that for months agents had been so employed if it had no bearing on the case in hand? If it had no bearing, then why withdraw the statement? Because the moment I could show that the statement that this man had been for months acting as a political agent was not correct, the hon. Minister rises up and withdraws what was meant to be a charge against this man.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. Finance Minister desires to make a short statement in relation to his tariff resolutions, before the adjournment at six o'clock, and I would ask the hon. member for West Assiniboia if he would kindly allow him to do so.

Committee rose and reported progress.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, and that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I desire to place on the Table of the House, when I conclude, the amended tariff resolutions. I may say that we are proposing a number of changes in these resolutions. The House will, of course, desire, before proceeding with them, to have the printed papers in their hands, and they will be distributed before the evening session. In the meantime, I may facilitate the business of the House if I ask the attention of

hon. members to the nature of the changes, or the principal changes which we propose to make. In the case of the Inland Revenue and Excise Department, it will be remembered that we brought down a resolution imposing a duty of ten cents a pound on raw leaf tobacco unstemmed, and 14 cents a pound on the stemmed; that is an excise duty. It has been represented that it is desirable, in the interest and convenience of the trade, that that duty, if it be imposed, should be imposed by way of a customs duty. There would be a manifest disadvantage in imposing it at the first stage as a customs duty, for reasons which I think perhaps it is not necessary to enter into, but which the House will quite readily understand, reasons which are very largely in the direction of increased public revenue. We propose, however, that the excise duty on raw leaf tobacco shall be continued until the first day of July, and thereafter as respects any raw leaf tobacco which is now in warehouse, and which remains in warehouse after the first of July, but as respects all importations of tobacco after the first day of July, we propose that that duty shall be levied by way of a customs duty instead of an excise duty. In the meantime, as respects the levying of excise duties, we shall ask the House to authorize the Department of Inland Revenue to make such changes in the regulations as will facilitate the payment of excise duty on the raw leaf at convenient times, so that dealers who might feel it an embarrassment to be called upon to pay those duties immediately, will find the department anxious to make every reasonable arrangement with them, so that that duty may not be found to be too oppressive.

Mr. FOSTER. They pay in instalments.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think the idea is that they might be able to pay in proportion to the use of it, practically as they do now on the manufactured product, that is to say, as it comes out of the warehouse. We leave the Department of Inland Revenue to make arrangements. This is only a temporary provision to extend to tobacco now in warehouse; and we think that any arrangement which will facilitate the handling of the business to the convenience of the tobacco trade will be readily concurred in by the House.

Mr. DUGAS. You make a difference on stemmed tobacco?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Ten and 14 cents are the two rates, which I believe will be quite reasonable and in proportion to the value of the two articles. In the matter of excise duty on cigarettes, a change was made from $1.50 a thousand to $3. We propose that that change shall stand as respects cigarettes made from foreign leaf tobacco; but we propose that as respects cigarettes made from Canadian tobacco, the old rate of $1.50 shall stand ; so that as between our former resolutions and the present one, there is a reduction in favour of Canadian leaf. These two articles are regarded, perhaps, by some as coming in competition. The parties in the tobacco trade, however, seem to think that they are not so closely in competition as would be thought from a general view of the question. However that may be, if there is any advantage in this for the grower of Canadian tobacco, we are desirous that he shall have it. With regard to customs duty, we have made a number of increases, but in the great majority of cases the changes that we make are in the direction of a decrease. We have desired to meet the views of manufacturers who complained that they were severely affected by our tariff reductions : we have desired to meet them, so far as it was possible to do so, not by increasing the duty upon their manufactured article, but by endeavouring to diminish the cost of their raw material, and in a number of cases we have been able to do that. There are a few items in the tariff where the rates were comparatively low, and when you apply to those items the preferential rate, which is one-eighth in the first stage, and one-quarter at the next stage, the result would be that the rate would come down below what, perhaps, any of us would consider fair, and would bring the tariff down to 15 or 17 per cent. In a very few cases it will be found that we have changed these duties in the direction of an increase, but in every case in which we have increased the duty, it will be found that, having regard to the reciprocal tariff rate, the net result will be that the duty on those articles is substantially lower than under the old tariff. In three or four cases. I think, we have adopted specific duties. We have endeavoured to resist, as far as possible, the somewhat general demand of manufacturers that specific duties should be maintained ; but there are three or four cases in which it seemed that the convenience of the, Customs Department and generally the difficulties created by the situation, might best be met by specific duties. Those, however, are quite exceptional, and we have, in the main, adhered to our desire—

Mr. FOSTER. It cuts down about half the changes.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am glad to be able to assure my hon. friend that the number of cases in which we adopt the specific duties is quite small, and I should be pleased if we could make it even smaller. Let me now draw attention to a change with regard to the reciprocal tariff. In schedule D it will be found that there is a slight change in the wording, but it is of no substantial importance ; it is merely a change in the wording which describes the articles excepted. The description of spirits, wines, malt liquors, &c., is changed, but it makes no change in the substance of the schedule. In the enacting clause in relation to the reciprocal tariff, section 16, it will be found that one or two words which are mere surplusage and are repeated have been omitted. But we have also introduced into that section a subsection, in accordance with an intimation given at an earlier stage of the discussion, as to doubts that unquestionably existed in relation to the effect of foreign treaties. In presenting the Budget to the House I was asked by hon. gentlemen opposite as to the effect of those foreign treaties upon the reciprocal tariff, and my answer was that it was a matter of doubt, that we were not prepared to admit that those treaties did apply or should apply to Canada, but we could not give at that time final judgment in regard to it, for we would be influenced to a considerable degree by the judgment of Her Majesty's Government. We hold to that position to-day. We maintain that those treaties do not apply to Canada, and that our course is entirely consistent with any obligation we might owe as a part of the Empire. Nevertheless, there being a doubt in the matter, not so much in our own minds perhaps, though we go so far as to say that the thing is not certain—in view of all the discussion that has taken place, we think it is well to make provision therefor, if it shall appear ultimately that those treaties are held to apply to Canada. We provide by subsection B of section 16, as follows :—

Mr. FIELDING.

That the Governor in Council may extend the benefits of such reciprocal tariff to any country which may be entitled thereto by virtue of any treaty with Her Majesty.

We do not anticipate that we shall have any occasion to act under that clause, but in view of any possible doubt in the matter, it seems wise that we should provide for the possibility by putting in this clause. If we should find that the treaties with Germany or Belgium or any other foreign treaties are held to apply, undoubtedly it would open the question in a new form and might necessitate our reconsidering the whole subject. At all events we want to be free to reconsider the whole subject, if that view should be taken by competent authority. But our own judgment was that the treaties did not apply, and nothing has occurred since to apply, and nothing has occurred since to change the judgment of the Government in this regard. If it should be determined that the treaties apply, it would be our duty to recognize them and act on them, but then the whole question would have to come up for further consideration.

I now propose an amendment, which may be regarded in some quarters as desirable, to the what is commonly called the combine clause, No. 17. We propose before the Government shall take final action under that clause that they shall refer to a judge of one of the higher courts the question as to whether or not a combine exists of the character contemplated by the resolution: that is to say, the determination of the question shall not be a political determination but a judicial determination, and upon that determination the Government shall then proceed to carry out the intention of the clause.

Mr. TAYLOR. Another back-down.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is in the right direction.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. On the item surgical instruments: in our original tariff surgical instruments were placed on the free list. We propose to deal with them as we have dealt already with barbed wire and binder twine, that is to fix the date at which they should come in under the free list at 1st of January, as in the other two cases. In the meantime surgical instruments will pay the present rate of duty, 15 per cent.

In the matter of mining machinery, in our tariff resolutions we included a class of mining machinery exclusively used for mining, and provided that it should be admitted duty free. Under the old tariff there was a clause of somewhat similar character restricting it to machinery not made in Canada. There was difficulty in the interpretation of that clause and there would be difficulty in the interpretation of our new clause, owing to the uncertainty as to what is mining machinery exclusively used for that purpose. We have had interviews with gentlemen interested in the manufacture of mining machinery and also with many people who use such machinery, and after very full discussion we determined to place 25 per cent duty on certain articles of mining machinery and to specify all the articles which we wished to make free. There are a few items of mining machinery which are made in Canada, and which are well made and satisfactory to mining people, and these classes will still have to pay 25 per cent. Then we place on the free list a large number of items which are desired by the miners. Item 535 in the amended resolutions reads as follows:—

Mining, smelting and reducing machinery, viz.:—Pressure or exhaust fans, rotary pressure blowers, coal cutting machines except percussion coal cutters, coal heading machines, coal augers and rotary coal drills, core drills, miners' safety lamps, coal washing machinery, coke-making machinery, ore drying machinery, ore roasting machinery, electric or magnetic machines for separating or concentrating iron ores, blast furnace water jackets, converters for metallurgical processes in iron or copper, briquette making machines, ball grinding machines, copper plates, plated or not, machinery for extraction of precious metals by the chlorination or cyanide processes, monitors, giants and elevators for hydraulic mining, amalgam safes, automatic ore samplers, automatic feeders, jigs, classifiers, separators, retorts, buddles, vanners, mercury pumps, pyro-meters, bullion furnaces, amalgam cleaners, gold mining slime tables, blast furnace blowing engines, wrought iron tubing, butt or lap welded, threaded or coupled or not, not less than 2½ inches diameter, when imported for use exclusively in mining, smelting, reducing or refining.

These articles all go on the free list.

Mr. FOSTER. Speaking generally, are these articles manufactured in Canada or not?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think some are, but not many.

Mr. FOSTER. Then it is a difference in the specification?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Largely so. The items we place on the dutiable list are: ore crushers and rock crushers, stamp mills, cornish and belted rolls, rock drills, air compressors, cranes, derricks, percussion coal cutters. These are to be dutiable, and all the others are on the free list.

Item 257, covered wire for electrical purposes, has been changed from 25 to 30 per cent. The preferential rate will bring that down to 18¾ per cent, which is below the former duty. This is an article made both in the United States and England.

Item 257, rubber belting, is classified in the resolutions with leather belting. We have separated them. The leather belting remains at 20 per cent, and we have placed rubber belting with other rubber goods at 25 per cent. Under the old tariff it was 32½ per cent.

In clause 197, plate glass, small sheets not to exceed 25 square feet we have reduced from 30 to 25 per cent. This will be subject to a further reduction under the preferential rate, if brought in from the old country. Silvered glass which we placed at 30 per cent, we have increased to 35 per cent, on the ground that it is the highest class of glass and should pay the highest duty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Was it a slip of the tongue when the hon. gentleman said that those goods might come from England under the preferential rate? I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he had abolished the preferential rate.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is not correct if he understands anything of the sort. I can assure him we have not abolished the preferential rate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understood the hon. gentleman that he had not only abolished it, but he had abandoned the term "preferential rate." He now calls it reciprocal rate.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the hon. gentleman will read the original resolution he will find it always spoken of as a reciprocal rate. If preferential rate is mentioned in my remarks, it is an expression which means the same thing.

Linseed oil was 20 per cent, and the reciprocal rate would be 15 per cent. That is lower than a fair revenue tariff, and we propose to place it at 25 per cent, which under the preferential rate would make the duty on this article brought from England  $18\frac{3}{4}$  per cent.

Newspaper outsides were placed at 20 per cent in the resolutions. We found that we had placed a half manufactured article at a lower rate than plain printing paper, which was clearly something that should not have been done, and so we have placed both at 25 per cent.

Cut nails and spikes, item 248, under the old duty paid  $\frac{3}{4}$  cent per pound. We first placed them at 30 per cent. We have agreed to make a specific duty, but at half a cent instead of  $\frac{3}{4}$  of a cent, which was the rate under the former tariff. This rate is subject to a still further reduction by the preferential rate. Nuts and bolts, 269: The old duty was 1 cent per pound and two different ad valorem rates. This is one of the three or four specific duties we have retained. We propose that the duty shall be  $\frac{3}{4}$  per cent and 25 per cent ad valorem as against 1 cent and 20 and 25 per cent ad valorem. On wire nails, the old duty was 1 cent per pound. We had placed them on the 35 per cent list. We now make them three-fifths of a cent per pound, as against 1 cent per pound under the old list.

On item 235, bridges and structural iron work, the duty was 30 per cent, and we have now placed it at 35 per cent, which will be subject to the reciprocal rate. The old rate was 1 cent per pound; the present rate will go materially lower, especially under the preferential or reciprocity rate.

As regards item 409, buttons, we have increased the duty on pantaloons and shoe buttons from 20 to 25 per cent. The button item has been changed in form, and all buttons except those mentioned, will pay 35 per cent. That will make a clear definition.

Twine and cordage, item 414. These were reduced to 20 per cent, and we now place them at 25 per cent. Cordage will probably come in from the old country, and under the preferential rate the duty will be reduced to  $18\frac{3}{4}$  per cent, as against the former duty of  $1\frac{1}{4}$  cent per pound and 10 per cent ad valorem. The former duty was equivalent to 29 or 30 per cent. The present duty will be 25 per cent, subject to the preferential rate or reciprocal rate.

In the case of customs duty on tobacco we make a change, without, however, increasing or decreasing the duty. In the first resolution the customs duty on manufactured tobacco was 45 cents per pound and 25 per cent ad valorem. We think it better to have a specific duty instead of a compound duty, and we place the duty at 50 cents, instead of 45 cents per pound and  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent ad valorem. The effort is to make it equivalent, and I think we have done so. The 5 cents per pound added is intended to be equivalent to the ad valorem duty. In regard to cut tobacco, item 425, we have applied the same rule. The first resolution provided for a duty of 50 cents per pound and  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent ad valorem, and we now make it a specific duty of 55 cents per pound.

On the coal duties, we still reserve final action, as was formerly stated, but in the wording of the tariff resolutions as submitted some new words were inserted which have created difficulty in regard to coal screenings. We have rewritten the item but we have not changed the rate. There is no change in the duties on coal or coal screenings for the present.

Mr. FOSTER. You make a change in the regulations?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Whatever have been the customs regulations in the past, will be continued.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Are the screens to be larger?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We have never had any mention of screens in our customs regulations other than a half inch screen, and this is mentioned in the tariff of the United States. I think this is the established size of screens. However, the matter has been regulated in the past by the regulations of the custom-houses, whereby whatever proportion of slack came in was charged as slack and the remainder came in at the higher rate. Whatever the practice has been in the past, we desire to continue until we finally deal with the coal duties.

Roofing slate we placed at 25 per cent. But there was a limitation in the old tariff that it should not exceed 90 cents per square. We left that out. We are told that in some cases the rate of 25 per cent would be unreasonably high, and so we have provided that it shall not exceed 75 cents per square.

The duty on grindstones has been reduced from 20 to 15 per cent. Under the old tariff there was a specific duty of $1.75 per ton.

Mr. FOSTER. That is to grind the face of the poor.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We have somewhat re-arranged the duties on marble and other stones, under items 187, 188 and 189. They will be found to be as follows. There are three classes of duties. Rough stones are dutiable at 15 per cent. Those in the first stage of manufacture, dressed or building stone, and marble sawn, whether on two or more sides, are dutiable at 20 per cent. The finished marble and granite is 35 per cent, as in the resolutions brought down. As the granite will come to some extent from the old country, this rate will be subject to the cut on British goods. The change is a reduction on the lower forms of marble and granite from 20 per cent to 15 per cent. Worsted yarns and worsted tops are dealt with in items 375, 376 and 377. We have had some difficulty over these, owing to the conflicting interests of the various woollen mills. There are a few woollen mills in Canada which make worsted yarns, and there are a considerable number which do not make them, but which desire to use them to improve the manufacture of cloth. In the resolutions first brought down, the item fixed the duty at 15 per cent on worsted yarns costing 20 cents per pound and under. This does not express what we had in mind. Instead of "under" it should read "over."

Mr. FOSTER. That was a clerical error.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We have a few clerical errors, but we have also a few which we confess we do not want to blame the clerks for at all. Like other human beings, we have made a few mistakes, and we have the good sense to acknowledge them and come here to make them right.

Mr. HENDERSON. Some of them are very pleasant.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am glad some of them are pleasant. Next to pleasing our friends on this side, we like to please our friends over the way. Worsted yarns costing 30 cents per pound and upwards will be dutiable at 20 per cent. That is an encouragement to the woollen mills which do not spin these yarns. A reduction to 15 per cent, we think, would be perhaps a pretty severe reduction to those who are making these yarns. The rate decided upon will, we think, give them a fair chance to continue the spinning, and not make the yarns too expensive for the large number of mills that want to use them in order to make a better quality of cloth. Worsted tops we propose shall be dutiable at 15 per cent when made from wools of a similar character to those grown in Canada; when made from other wools they shall be on the free list. These items have given us considerable trouble owing to the conflicting interests of the different branches of the woollen trade. I do not suppose we can compliment ourselves on making it wholly satisfactory, but I hope it will be reasonably so to the different interests. I have said that we have endeavoured to make a number of things cheaper to the manufacturers rather than to increase the duties on the finished product—giving them cheaper raw materials. In conformity with that view, we have provided that the cloths used for the making of umbrellas, parasols, neckties, and so forth, to be cut into shape for such purposes in bond, shall be dutiable at 20 per cent. We make a similar proposal in regard to the shirt trade. We propose that cotton fabrics, fronting linens, interlinings and flannel shirtings, when imported for use by the manufacturers, and to be cut into shape for such purposes in bond under proper regulations, shall be dutiable at 15 per cent. This is a concession to the manufacturers of shirts, collars, cuffs, blouses, shirt waists and things of that sort. In item 24, we reduce the duty on soap powders and pear-line from 35 to 30 per cent. In patent medicines the old duty was 50 per cent on liquid medicines and 25 per cent on medicines other than liquids. In our first resolutions we proposed to make the duty on liquids 35 per cent, leaving the others 25 per cent as before. On reconsideration, we have come to the conclusion that the proper line of division is between the medicines which contain spirits and those which do not contain spirits. On liquid medicines containing spirits, we place the duty at 50 per cent as before; but on those which do not contain spirits, and on what I may call dry preparations, we make the duty 25 per cent. On the item of books, it will be remembered that the old duty was a specific duty of 6 cents a pound. In some cases that seemed to bear harshly, and we changed it to an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent. I do not think that, applied generally, is a high rate, but on a certain good class of books it did bear heavily, and we thought we might reconsider it. The conclusion we have reached is to place paper covered and unbound books, those of a very cheap character, and not as a rule the best kind of literature, at 20 per cent. These we say shall not include Christmas annuals, juvenile books and toy books, which are cheap, and which come in in large quantities at the Christmas season; these will come in at a lower rate. On books other than these the rate will be 10 per cent. We propose that the concession hitherto given to colleges and universities with regard to the free admission of books, not printed in Canada, which are on the curricula of the universities, for the use of students, shall continue, with the omission of the words "for the use of students." Practically very few of these books are used by others than students, and, for the little revenue obtained, we think it is not worth while to retain this distinction.

Mr. FOSTER. It is practically no difference.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not very much. Then, we have enlarged the scope of the item with reference to libraries, in which we thought there were certain libraries not included. While keeping in view the intention of the old tariff in that respect, we make the item read: "books specially imported for the bona fide use of incorporated mechanics' institutes, public libraries, libraries of universities, colleges and schools, or for the library of any incorporated medical, law, literary, scientific or art association or society, and being the property of the organized authorities of such library, and not in any case the property of individuals—the whole regulations to be made by the Controller of Customs.” We put in a proviso which we think will convenience the book trade of the country. It is said that every book store is a centre of education, and we do not wish to do anything to inconvenience the book trade. They have, heretofore, not been able to sell books as freely as, perhaps, they should have sold them to the universities, in consequence of the privilege being granted to the universities and not to the book trader. We propose to allow the bookseller this privilege. On importing the books, he will pay the duty in the usual way, but on proper evidence that he has sold them to a library that might have imported them free, he will be entitled to a refund of the duty. He will thus be enabled to continue to do business with the library. I think the change is one which will be of great advantage to the book trade. Then we propose to put on the free list for everybody books such as would be used by young men interested in the study of mechanical arts :

Books, viz.: Books on application of science to industries of all kinds, including books on agriculture, horticulture, forestry, fish and fishing, mining, metallurgy, architecture, electric and other engineering, carpentry, ship-building, mechanism, dyeing, bleaching, tanning, weaving and other mechanical arts, and similar industrial books ; also books printed in any language other than the English and French languages, or in any two languages not being English and French, or in any three or more languages ; and bibles, prayer-books, psalm and hymn-books and religious tracts.

A part of this item is based upon the old tariff, but that portion which places upon the free list books on the application of science to industry is a new item, and I think the House, on both sides, will regard it as worthy of consideration. We also include the item which was in the old tariff putting on the free list books printed by or for any Government or by any association for the promotion of science or letters, and official annual reports of religious or benevolent associations and issued in the course of the proceedings of the said associations and not for the purpose of sale or trade. Printed music, under the old tariff, bore a specific duty of 10 cents per pound. Under our first resolutions we changed this to 20 per cent ad valorem. We found that this bore severely upon some good music and we are going to reduce it to 10 per cent. Then we have printed and lithographed matter. Under the old tariff this bore specific duties under two items, one at 6 cents per pound and 20 per cent ad valorem, and one at 15 cents per pound and 25 per cent ad valorem. There is a large class of this matter which has no commercial value, being printed for distribution by people who sell patent medicines and other goods. The customs authorities say they cannot put a commercial value upon it. We retain, in that case, the specific form of duty. That class of lithographed goods which has no commercial value, we make dutiable at 15 cents per pound ; but, as respects the lithographed matter, labels for cans and matter of that class, we impose a duty of 25 per cent. Stereotypes, electrotypes, &c., item 292 of the present tariff, the former duty was 2 cents per square inch. We reduce this to 1½ per square inch. In another case, where the duty was three-eighth cents per square inch, we make it one-quarter cent per square inch. Steel tubes for bicycles, formerly 15 per cent, now 10 per cent. Pig lead, formerly 20 per cent, is reduced to 15 per cent. As it comes from England, there will be a further reduction under the preferential clause. Buckthorn and strip fencing, formerly 25 per cent is reduced to 20 per cent. The item of wire we have divided into several items. Brass wire is made dutiable at 10 per cent, copper wire 15 per cent, other wire of iron or steel is 20 per cent. We have placed spring steel, spiral spring steel, billets and axle-bars for the manufacture of carriage springs and axles on the free list. Steel for tool makers is reduced from 15 per cent to 5 per cent. Scrap iron under the old tariff was $4 per ton ; under our first resolutions we made it $1.50 per ton ; it is now made $1 per ton. Steel ingots, billets, iron puddled bars, &c., under the old tariff were $5 per ton ; under our first resolution, $4 per ton ; now reduced to $2 per ton. These are articles used largely by manufacturers, and as we are dealing more generously with the producers of these goods under the bounty, we think the reduction is one that can fairly be made. Structural iron is reduced from 15 to 10 per cent. Bridge plates of steel for bridge manufacturers under item 223, is reduced from 15 to 10 per cent ad valorem. Rolled iron or steel plates, used by boiler makers, are reduced from 15 to 10 per cent ad valorem.

Veneers of wood, item 321, are reduced from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent. Glycerine, for the manufacture of explosives, formerly 20 per cent, is reduced to 10 per cent.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Have you increased the bounty on iron ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman will find the bounty resolutions on the Order paper, and, for the present, we do not propose any change concerning them. Those resolutions propose an increase in the bounty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But you are reducing the duty on iron still further, and I want to know if you are increasing the bounty further at the same time.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We reduce the duty on the billets, but not on the pig iron. There is an increase in the bounty on steel billets over the bounty under the former Administration, but no other change in that respect now.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). The size of the billet is changed from what it used to be.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We are not dealing with the size of the billet. It is the cause of some embarrassment. We think we can deal with the item without regard to size.

There is a prohibition in the Act in respect to prison labour. It is found that in some cases people make articles of a similar character and mix them up with articles made by prison labour, so that it is extremely difficult for the customs authorities to draw the line. We have amended the item so as to cover such cases. The item now reads as follows:—

604. Goods manufactured wholly or in part by prison labour, or which have been made within or in connection with any prison, jail or penitentiary. Also goods similar in character to those produced in such institutions, when sold or offered for sale by any person, firm or corporation having a contract for the manufacture of such articles in such institutions or by any agents of such person, firm or corporation, or when such goods were originally purchased from or transferred by any such contractor.

In other words, where a person is in a business selling certain articles which are the product of prison labour, and he offers other things of a like character which he says are not the product of prison labour, it is difficult to draw the line between them, and the law is to be made to exclude all the goods of that character offered by the person engaged in that business.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question? There is a large quantity of that class of goods in the country. How does he propose to deal with them?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the hon. gentleman will bring such cases to the notice of the Controller of Customs, I have no doubt that the matter will be dealt with.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You cannot deal with that in a customs tariff.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In regard to the item of books, we inserted in the list of prohibited books, reprints of British copyrights. But that brings up the somewhat difficult question of the copyright law. The item was put there not so much as the declaration of the policy of the Government as a statement of what was regarded by many as the existing law. But we have deemed it better to leave the copyright matter as we found it, and the schedule of prohibited goods, in this respect, as at present. Therefore, excepting reprints of British works copyrighted in Canada, we do not propose that they should be prohibited. The item will be changed accordingly.

I have to thank the House for remaining so long and listening so patiently, and I place these resolutions on the Table.

It being Six o'clock, the Committee rose for recess.

After Recess.

The House resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

On resolution 1,

Mr. FOSTER. Would the hon. gentleman who is in charge of these resolutions kindly tell me whether the expressions from "e" to "i," inclusive, involve any change from the definitions as given in the preceding Customs Act?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). These are just the same as in the hon. gentleman's own tariff.

That the importation into Canada of any goods enumerated, described or referred to in Schedule C hereto appended, is prohibited; and that any such goods if imported shall thereby become forfeited to the Crown and may be destroyed, and that any person importing any such prohibited goods, or causing or permitting them to be imported, shall for each offence incur a penalty of two hundred dollars.

Mr. FOSTER. I see there is a change in the wording here. "Shall" has been changed to "may." Is it to be at the discretion of the Government to destroy or not such goods?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. As I understand, it is optional on the part of the Crown. I am told that cases have arisen in which it was not thought expedient to destroy absolutely.

Item agreed to.

That all medicinal preparations, whether chemical or other, usually imported with the name of the manufacturer, shall have the true name of such manufacturer and the place where they are prepared, and the word "alcoholic" or "non-alcoholic" permanently and legibly affixed to each parcel by stamp, label or otherwise; and all medicinal preparations imported without such names so affixed shall be forfeited.

Mr. FOSTER. There does not seem to be any reason why the additional word "alcoholic" or "non-alcoholic" should be inserted. The Controller of Customs or his officers would not take the simple fact that the label was marked alcoholic or non-alcoholic as proof. The liquids would have to be tested.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). This would be simply an aid. We are making a distinction between liquid medicines which are alcoholic and those which are non-alcoholic. Of course, it would be always open to us to make the test and this would be useful.

Mr. FOSTER. You would not rely upon that.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Not solely.

Item agreed to.

12. That packages when imported shall be subject to the payment of the following duties, viz.:—

(a.) All bottles, flasks, jars, demijohns, carboys, casks, hogsheads, pipes, barrels, and all other vessels or packages, manufactured of tin, iron, lead, zinc, glass or any other material capable of holding liquids, and all packages in which goods are commonly placed for home consumption, including cases, not otherwise provided for, in which bottled spirits, wines or malt liquors or other liquids are contained, and every package being the first receptacle or covering inclosing goods for purposes of sale, shall in all cases, not otherwise provided for, in which they contain goods subject to an ad valorem duty or a specific and ad valorem duty, be charged with the same rate of ad valorem duty as is to be levied and collected on the goods they contain, and the value of the packages may be included in the value of such goods ;

(b.) Provided that all such packages as aforesaid containing goods subject to a specific duty only, and not otherwise provided for, shall be charged with a duty of twenty per cent ad valorem ;

(c.) That packages not hereinbefore specified, and not herein specially charged with or declared liable to duty, and being the usual and ordinary packages in which goods are packed for exportation, according to the general usage and custom of trade, shall be free of duty ;

(d.) Provided further, that all such special packages or coverings as are of use, or apparently designed for use other than in the importation of the goods they contain, shall be subject to the same rate of duty as would thereon be levied if imported empty or separate from their contents ;

(e.) Provided also, that packages (inside or outside) containing free goods shall be exempt from duty when the packages are of such a nature that their destruction becomes necessary in order to release the goods.

Mr. FOSTER. The provisions in this resolution are a little differently arranged. Perhaps my hon. friend the Controller of Customs will tell me whether or not there is any change from the old law.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. There is not any change ; but we take power, if the package is not of any value whatever, that a duty may not be charged, but that it may be destroyed.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no generic change.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. No.

14. That with respect to goods imported for manufacturing purposes that are admissible under Schedule A hereto appended for any specific purposes, at a lower rate of duty than would otherwise be chargeable, or exempt from duty under Schedule B hereto appended, the importer claiming such exemption from duty, or proportionate exemption from duty, shall make and subscribe to the following affidavit or affirmation before the collector of customs at the port of entry :—

I, (name of importer) the undersigned, importer of the (names of the goods or articles) mentioned in this entry, do solemnly (swear or affirm) that such (names of the goods or articles) are imported by me for the manufacture of (names of the goods to be manufactured) in my own factory, situated at (name of the place, county and province), and that no portion of the same will be used for any other purpose or disposed of until so manufactured.

Mr. HENDERSON. It appears to me that this resolution might be made much more workable by inserting a provision that an affirmation might be made before some other person than the Controller of Customs. It is very inconvenient for a manufacturer say twenty miles from a custom-house, to have to proceed there to make this declaration, and it might be much more convenient if it could be made before a notary public or a commissioner. That, I believe, is the practice, although the law does not seem to provide for it.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Parties living at a distance could enter the goods through an agent. The subject has been considered, but it was not thought well to adopt the suggestion which the hon. gentleman has thrown out.

Mr. HENDERSON. Neither an agent nor a broker can make this declaration, as it should be made by the manufacturer himself. I believe this provision is got over by the manufacturer making a declaration before some person who has no authority to take it. It would therefore be well to make the law so that it could be complied with.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. In most manufacturing towns there is a custom-house, and I presume that in a case where there is no custom-house, this concession which is referred to by the hon. gentleman is made to the manufacturers.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have taken these declarations by the hundreds, and I am quite sure I have no authority to do so. However, the goods are passed in this irregular way. To my mind the law should be changed so that this can be done regularly.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. We will consider the suggestion of the hon. gentleman.

16. That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be entered for duty, or taken out of warehouse for consumption in Canada, at the reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff set forth in Schedule D.

(a.) That any question that may arise as to the countries entitled to the benefits of the reciprocal tariff shall be decided by the Controller of Customs, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council.

(b.) That the Governor in Council may extend the benefits of such reciprocal tariff to any country which may be entitled thereto by virtue of any treaty with Her Majesty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House must have sympathized with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in the painful duty which devolved upon him to-day. After a brief month during which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) had posed with great distinction as the founder of preferential trade between the mother country and Canada, after having enjoyed that popularity for a month, and having posed as having conduced to the unity of the Empire, by having formulated a system of preferential trade between the mother country and Canada; the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) was obliged to come down to the House to-day, and to dispel all the illusions of his friends on that subject, and he was obliged to turn back in the most complete manner on the position he occupied such a short time ago. I dare say the House will remember that when the Minister of Finance first propounded this resolution—for which another very dissimilar one has now been substituted—I ventured to make the following remarks:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) to the fact that the treaty is not made between Canada and other countries. The treaty is made between Great Britain, Belgium and Germany, and applies to all countries that have most-favoured-nation treatment with England. The express terms of one of those treaties, at all events, is that England will not permit any higher rate of duty to be charged upon articles coming from those countries than is charged upon like articles coming from Great Britain herself. If I am correct in my reading of the treaties, the proposal of the hon. gentleman is entirely delusive, and will have no effect whatever.

I may remind the House that we not only have the statement of the Minister of Finance, that he proposed to apply this, as he called it, "preferential clause" to England alone; but we also have the authoritative statement of the First Minister: that goods from Belgium and Germany would not be admitted in like manner as goods from England. The hon. gentleman in his brilliant peroration said:

My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition says that our project of freer trade with England is a delusive one.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is so delusive that when I place these resolutions on the Table of this House to-night, they go into effect, and I speak with pride, in the name of the Liberal party, and the hon. gentlemen around me will share that pride, when I say that to-morrow morning, in every custom-house from ocean to ocean, the doors will open on terms of preferential trade with the mother country.

The hon. gentleman spoke with pride, and that pride was shared in the most hearty and enthusiastic manner by his friends behind him, who, labouring under the illusion that the hon. gentleman had some foundation for the statement he made to the House, burst into song, and rendered "God save the Queen" in the most enthusiastic fashion. I wonder what were the feelings of hon. gentlemen opposite to-day, when the Finance Minister, after a short-lived month of his ill-deserved popularity, had to make the announcement, that his statement then was an utter delusion, and that the warning given him from this side of the House turned out to be well founded. Were not hon. gentlemen opposite completely deluded by the statement of the Finance Minister, as to what the effect of his resolution on the policy of the Government would be? We heard no wild cheers from the Opposition benches to-day when the Finance Minister admitted that he had learned wisdom from this side of the House, and learned also that the important public measure which he had put before this House, and before the people of the country, was an utter delusion. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) recognizes that now, if he did not recognize it before.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) venture to deny that, in the face of the fact that a day or two after he made the first announcement of his policy, I told the House and the country, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) would be obliged to do one of two things: Either to withdraw that resolution from the consideration of the House, or to come down with an additional resolution providing for the extension of this privilege to Belgium and Germany, and to all other countries that had the most-favoured-nation clause with England. I told the hon. gentleman further: That there was not a Governor in a British colony where self-government existed, who would permit a Bill containing that clause to receive the Royal assent. Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) knows right well, that to-day he occupies the humiliating position in this House, of having to confess that he completely misled the House. He has to admit, that if he was not deceived himself, he had deceived the House, and he has further to admit, that this tariff Bill with that clause in it, could not obtain the Royal assent from the Governor General. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) was compelled to admit, that all he had led this House to believe he was accomplishing for Canada and the Empire, was nothing but a delusion. But, the Finance Minister still ventured to tell this House:

We maintain that the treaties do not apply, but as a doubt exists—

Why, Sir, the Finance Minister still puts his opinion against all the constitutional authorities upon this subject, and he declares, that he and his colleagues still believe that the course they pursued a month ago was the correct course.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does my hon. friend say "Hear, hear?" I tell him that the course the Government pursued a month ago was nothing short of a declaration of independence on the part of Canada. It was a declaration in the face of the world that Canada refused to be bound by the treaties which England had made in regard to Canada, as well as to herself. That was the attitude which the hon. gentleman occupied when he made his Budget speech, and now he is obliged to come here, and to take it all back, and he is forced to adopt a course that we on this side of the House told him he would have to adopt. But the Government still endeavour to shelter themselves behind the absurd statement:

We maintain that the treaties do not apply, but as a doubt exists—

Sir, if a doubt still exists I trust I will be able to clear away that doubt, and I trust that this "doubting Thomas" will get rid of these doubts which have induced him so to mislead this House, and to mislead the people of this country.

For sixteen years Canada has been endeavouring to get the Belgium and Germany treaties modified, and to have this colonial clause eliminated from them. What reason had we for wishing to get this clause of these treaties eliminated? Why, Sir A. T. Galt, my distinguished predecessor as High Commissioner for Canada, applied to Her Majesty's Government in 1881, asking them to induce Germany and Belgium to abrogate this clause which prevented Canada from treating the products of the mother country on any other terms than those extended to the goods of Germany and Belgium, and all other countries which had most-favoured-nation treatment with England. The Imperial Government made application to both Belgium and Germany, in this direction, and both these countries refused. On a subsequent occasion, in 1891, hon. gentlemen opposite know, that application was again made. The hon. gentleman knows that application was again made to the Imperial Government to obtain a modification of these Belgian and German treaties—what for? What concern was it to Canada if the hon. gentleman and his colleagues now entertain doubts that these Belgian and German treaties in any way interfere with preferential trade between England and Canada? I hold in my hand the declaration of Lord Knutsford, Secretary of State for the Colonies, when applied to in 1891, as follows:—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

His lordship observed, regarding the favoured-nation clause of the German and Belgian treaties, that "the undoubted effect of these two clauses is to prevent lower duties being charged in British colonies on the importation of goods the produce of the United Kingdom than are charged on similar goods the produce of Belgium or Germany. Moreover, under the most-favoured-nation clause contained in most of the treaties in force between Great Britain and foreign states, this privilege, which is enjoyed by Belgian and German goods in the British colonies, is extended to the goods of all the various countries parties to those treaties.

I think the hon. gentleman will find that if he has doubts on this subject, he is the only public man who has given attention to it who entertains the slightest doubt upon it. Then, in 1892, this question came up again, and with a like result. In that year, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, one of the most eminent statesmen in the Empire, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer of the British Government, in the House of Commons, said on this subject:

The treaty of 1862 with Belgium, and the treaty of 1865 with the Zollverein, do not prevent, as I think my right hon. friend is aware, the establishment of any kind of relations between the different colonies of this country. All they do prevent is the establishment of, so to speak, preferential relations between the United Kingdom and one of the colonies, and one of the colonies and the United Kingdom.

I think this ought to be quite as authoritative as the opinion of the hon. Minister of Finance; and yet, with these statements before him, the hon. gentleman pretends to this House that he still doubts whether these treaties have the effect of doing what Lord Knutsford and Sir Michael Hicks-Beach declare they do, that is, prevent Canada giving any preference to the goods of the United Kingdom coming into this country. Well, Sir, the House will remember that the Ottawa conference in 1894 took up this question of preferential trade, and passed a resolution upon it; and, Sir, I will read that resolution to the House:

Therefore resolved, that this conference records its belief in the advisability of a customs arrangement between Great Britain and her colonies by which trade within the Empire may be placed on a more favourable footing than that which is carried on with foreign countries.

Lord Jersey reported the result of that conference to Her Majesty's Government in an elaborate state paper; and the hon. gentleman has in the archives of the Privy Council at this moment a copy of the document which I hold in my hand, that is, the answer of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Marquis of Ripon, to that appeal on the part of Canada and the South African and Australasian colonies that measures should be taken to provide for preferential trade within the Empire. The Marquis of Ripon quoted Article 15 of the Belgian treaty, which says:

Articles the produce or manufactures of Belgium shall not be subject in the British colonies to other or higher duties than those which are or may be imposed upon similar articles of British origin.

The French translation of the treaty agreed to at the same time uses the words Great Britain instead of the word British. The despatch of the Marquis of Ripon on this important question which was sent to the Governor General of Canada for the advice of the Governor General and any persons who might be called on to administer the public affairs of this country, quoted article 6 of the Zollverein of the German Empire, as follows :—

The stipulations of the preceding Articles I. to VI. (they contain the whole treaty) shall also be applied to the colonies and foreign possessions of Her Britannic Majesty. In those colonies and possessions, the produce of the states of the Zollverein shall not be subject to any higher or other import duties than the produce of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

The Marquis of Ripon then gave the opinion of the law officers of the Crown ; and I have already mentioned that the Lord Chief Justice of England, Lord Russell, one of the most brilliant lawyers and eminent judges, gave the authoritative opinion that these treaties do prevent preferential treatment by the British colonies in favour of the United Kingdom. Lord Ripon goes on to observe :

In regard to the third proposition, it seems clear that, under the terms of Article XV. of the Belgian Treaty, and of Article VII. in the treaty with the Zollverein, the British colonies cannot grant to the produce of the United Kingdom any preferential treatment as to customs duties without such treatment being also extended to Belgium and Germany, and, through them, to other countries which have ordinary most-favoured-nation clauses with Great Britain.

I may say that there were two applications. One was that Great Britain should by legislation remove the difficulties which stood in the way of preferential arrangements being made between one British colony and another. In reference to that Lord Ripon said :

While, however, Parliament has thus removed all legislative restrictions on the colonies, so far as Imperial legislation is concerned, it will be necessary, in order that Her Majesty's Government may be in a position to give effect to their responsibility for the international obligations of the Empire, and for the protection of its general interests, that any Bill passed by a colonial legislature providing for the imposition of differential duties, should be reserved for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure, so as to allow full opportunity for its consideration from these points of view.

For this reason the Governor General of Canada was told in 1894 to reserve all such Bills, and these gentlemen who express these doubts have this document under their hands and are not warranted in having any doubts, because nothing could be more clearly expressed.

For this reason, and in order to prevent inconvenience, it will be desirable, if such duties are included in a general Tariff Bill, that a proviso should be added, that they are not to come into force until Her Majesty's pleasure had been signified.

I give that to the hon. gentleman as the most conclusive evidence possible that this proposed arrangement was one that was utterly in the face of all the authorities, and the hon. gentleman ought not to have been ignorant of this, because he had these authorities, the very highest in the Empire under his hand, to give him the information, if he had it not before.

Now I want to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that he supposed that this resolution would be the great means of establishing preferential trade between Great Britain and Canada. So confidently was that conviction expressed that the hon. gentleman ventured to conclude his speech by saying, in reply to my statement that his project was delusive :

My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition says that our project of freer trade with England is a delusive one. It is so delusive that when I place these resolutions on the Table of the House to-night, they go into effect, and I speak with pride, in the name of the Liberal party, and the hon. gentlemen around me will share that pride, when I say that to-morrow morning, in every custom-house from ocean to ocean, the doors will open on terms of preferential trade with the mother country.

Are the doors open now ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) and some hon. gentlemen. Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, preferential trade with the mother country does not mean, and the hon. gentleman knows it does not mean, placing the mother country in the same position as Belgium and Germany and the other nations entitled to the most-favoured-nation clause. No person knows better than the hon. gentleman that it is a perfect abuse of the term "preferential trade" to apply it to any such system as that. The hon. gentleman is aware that this construction, which he admits now he has been compelled to accept, brings us back to the same condition of things in which this country was practically from 1873 to 1878. I ask the hon. gentleman if that was any value to England ? Had we preferential trade from 1873 to 1878, when we had a lower tariff on English goods than you will have even under this present tariff, modified in this way ? Will the hon. gentleman attempt to tell me that Canada had preferential trade with Great Britain from 1873 to 1878, when the trade and revenue accounts of this country show that during that period the imports from the United Kingdom into Canada fell $37,500,000 ? Was that preferential trade with England ? Is that what he is seeking ? Is that what he assumes is going to be a great boon to the mother country ? Sir, I have no hesitation in saying that the policy which has been pursued for the last eighteen years was, to an infinitely greater extent, a British policy than the policy of the Mackenzie Government from 1873 to 1878 or the policy that is propounded now. Why, the moment you admit Belgium and Germany and all these other countries to come into competition with England, where is the boon to England? Where is the preference? Can the hon. gentleman pretend not to know that Germany is making rapid strides in her manufacturing industries and fast overtaking England? The Marquis of Ripon says, in this very despatch, on page five:

There can be no question as to the fact, that in many branches of trade in which Great Britain once held a distinct superiority, other nations now compete on equal terms.

Then where is the preference? The hon. gentleman will find, if he will turn to the "Times" of the 30th of January of this year, this statement:

It is true, too, that the value of exports from Germany, for example, has risen faster than those of this country. For the United Kingdom the value per head in 1870-74 and 1890-94 were £7 7s. 3d. and £6 2s. 1d., while those for Germany were £2 16s. 7d. and £3 2s. 9d. Already, in markets which were once exclusively ours, we find our rivals forcing their way, and the official report sounds a note of warning that their competition with us in neutral markets, and even in our home markets, will, unless we ourselves are vigilant, probably increase. "Every year will add to their acquired capital and skill, and they will have larger additions to their populations to draw upon."

So much for the competition of Germany to which this trade is also opened, because the preference is destroyed by permitting Germany, Belgium and all those other countries to share in it. I see the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) gloating, as he well may, over what has happened. I see the hon. gentleman in a position to claim that his policy has triumphed, that the policy of free trade, the policy of striking down the manufactures of the country has been at last obtained; and if he could not obtain it directly, the hon. gentleman has been sagacious enough to obtain it indirectly. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman has deluded his hon. leader, the First Minister, who had pledged himself to the protectionists of this country that he would not injure our manufactures, into the belief that this proposed preferential clause meant nothing, because England could not accept it and it would have to be withdrawn, and then the general tariff would remain fairly protective and carry out the pledges which the First Minister had given the people.

I see in the "Times" of 29th January, 1897, a statement made by a gentleman of very high authority, Sir Courtenay Boyle, a leading gentleman connected with the Board of Trade. What does he say about this competition:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The increase of population in Germany and the United States has recently been greater than the increase in the United Kingdom, and those countries, enjoying, as they have, a period of peace which has lasted for nearly a quarter of a century, have rapidly developed manufacturing and industrial power.

I give that to the hon. gentleman as an additional reason why this clause of preferential trade has been divested of every particle of preference. Its effect will be simply this. The industries of Canada built up at such enormous cost, industries which have made Canada what it is to-day, industries that represent an enormous amount of capital invested, industries that have enriched Canada by the progress and prosperity she has enjoyed while they have been in operation—these industries will become paralyzed again, when exposed to a reduction of 25 per cent on this general tariff, and one after another they will succumb. The hon. gentleman may, perhaps, be a little more fortunate than he is to-day. A month ago, when he exposed his tariff to the world, he thought it was perfection. He was extremely proud of it. But what has been the result? Why, he has been listening for a month to deputation after deputation coming to tell him that he had struck down their prosperity, that their doors had to be closed and that thousands of employees had to be hungry in the streets for want of employment which he had destroyed. He has done the best he could, I admit, to patch up this heterogeneous mass, and, I hope, has improved it a little. But he allows these Canadian industries to stand exposed, as they are to-day, under his new proposal, by which not England alone is to have the benefit of a preferential trade, but all the world, comparatively speaking, because the countries that have most-favoured-nation treaties with England embrace almost all the manufacturing industries of the world. So, the hon. gentleman finds that while he has brought about most deplorable results so far as Canadian industries are concerned, his preferential trade with England vanishes like a dream. The hon. gentleman still calls this preferential trade with Great Britain. I say again the term "preferential trade" has a well-understood meaning, and every one in this country recognizes that meaning. Preferential trade within the Empire means the reception of goods from England in Canada and of goods from Canada in England upon different terms from those which goods from foreign countries would enjoy, it means the whole structure of a united Empire growing out of the commercial relations which exist between Great Britain and her colonies, if within the bounds of the Empire there were a different tariff from that between any part of the Empire and the rest of the world. The United Empire Trade League has long been fighting that battle loyally and vigorously, and have shown the people of England and her colonies that such a system would build up a trade which would be equally useful to the colonies and the mother country and that it would make England a mightier Empire even than she is to-day. The hon. gentleman might have done something to assist and carry out this scheme if he had even been true to the declaration of his leader. And I invite the hon. gentleman's attention to that. What did Mr. Laurier do in his last appeal to the country? He declared again and again from platform to platform, that he was as devoted to the principle of preferential trade, of discriminating trade between the motherland and Canada as Sir Charles Tupper was. He did more; he pledged his solemn word to the electors of this country that if they put him in power one of his first acts would be to send a commission to England to negotiate preferential trade between Canada and England with Lord Salisbury upon the lines I have indicated. Where is that pledge to-day? The hon. gentleman has made a reduction in the general tariff, without protecting the industries of Canada, sufficient, in my judgment, to have accomplished preferential trade within the Empire. Did the hon. gentleman make the proposal to England that she should denounce the German and Belgian treaties? I confess that I was not without hopes, knowing how thoroughly the First Minister had pledged himself to this policy of preferential trade, that when these gentlemen found themselves in a position where they must either withdraw this clause or extend it to all the world, they would take the opportunity of saying: England has refused the offer we made, she says she cannot accept it; and therefore we will now withdraw it and will use the proposal for the purpose of obtaining preferential trade within the Empire. I have studied the question closely; I have watched the course of public opinion; I have felt the public pulse in England as shown by the utterances of the press and of the most eminent public men, and I do not hesitate to say that I believe that, if hon. gentlemen opposite had taken that course, they would have obtained from the mother country that immense boon for Canada. What would preferential trade mean for Canada? What would a fiscal policy do for Canada that would add to the value of every acre of land in the Dominion? What would a fiscal policy do for Canada that would add to the value of every animal in the Dominion? What would a fiscal policy do for Canada that would add to the value of every bushel of wheat, of every bushel of grain of any description, and every product of the soil throughout the country? Why, Sir, it would do what the "Saturday Review" said it would do—a ten per cent duty on the products which came in competition with those of the colonies in Great Britain would put Canada in a position, within a few years, to furnish England with all the bread she requires and all the meat she requires. When these gentlemen were determined to strike a blow at the protectionists, when they were determined to paralyze the industries of this country, why could they not make an offer such as I have suggested, which would have cost them nothing. They would have had a better revenue at the end of the year; and if they found they could not have from England the concessions of preferential trade, they could say: We have done the best we could to meet your views, but now we will have to follow our own course. In 1891 the Senate and House of Commons passed an address to Great Britain declaring their readiness for preferential trade. In 1891 Lord Salisbury was approached by the United Empire Trade League, and was asked to have the Belgian and German treaties denounced. His answer was: The public mind is not ready yet for such a course; if you believe in it, go out and fight for it, and after you have convinced the country that it is a good thing, your battle will be won. They took him at his word; they did battle all over the country. At the close of the last election, when Lord Salisbury was brought into power by a triumphant majority, they went back and said: We obeyed your mandate; you told us to go and fight for preferential trade and we have fought the battle and won it—for if your lordship will look at the addresses and speeches of a majority of your own supporters throughout the country you will find them pledged to maintain preferential trade by favouring goods from the colonies as against goods coming from foreign countries. Well, Sir, that was not at all discouraging. Then, in 1892 this House of Commons passed the following resolution:—

That if, and when, the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland admits Canadian products to the market of the United Kingdom upon more favourable terms than it accords to the products of foreign countries, the Parliament of Canada will be prepared to accord corresponding advantages by a substantial reduction in the duties it imposes upon British manufactured goods.

Now, what happened? Why, Sir, every person knows that that great historic event, one of the most important that has ever taken place in Canada, resulted from this resolution. Every person knows that here in Ottawa, at the seat of Government of Canada, you had assembled the most eminent men from South Africa, the most eminent men from Australia, the most eminent men from New Zealand, and you had meeting with them and meeting with Canadian statesmen, a representative of Her Majesty's Government, a distinguished nobleman sent to take part in those deliberations; and, Sir, the result of that conference was the passage of this resolution:

That this conference records its belief in the advisability of a customs arrangement between Great Britain and her colonies in which trade within the Empire may be placed on a more favourable footing than that which is carried on with foreign countries.

Now, is there anything unreasonable in that? England is the only country in the world who does not give her colonies a more favourable fiscal treatment than it gives to foreign countries. I say that under these circumstances there was every reason for looking forward with confidence and with hope. Sir, the abandonment of this policy by the course that has been pursued here, is a breach of faith with the public men of all the outlying portions of the Empire, it is a breach of faith with them to turn round and abandon the preferential trade policy to which they have been pledged, and to take a step that, in my judgment, is as fatal to preferential trade as it is to the industries of Canada. When the United Empire Trade League went back to Lord Salisbury, he met them in a very different spirit from that in which he met them before. He did not pretend that there was not an overwhelming change in the public sentiment of England, but he said :

That he was in thorough accord with the views expressed by Mr. Chamberlain as to the extreme importance of securing as large a share as possible of the mutual trade of the United Kingdom and the colonies for British producers and manufacturers, whether located in the colonies or in the United Kingdom.

Lord Salisbury, according to the letter from which I quote, goes on to say :

While the Prime Minister fully recognizes the inconvenient character of the stipulations in question—stipulations which would never again be agreed to by this country—he is not prepared to give notice for the termination of these otherwise valuable treaties until a definite scheme has been produced offering such probabilities of increased trade within the Empire as would fully compensate for the risk involved.

Hon. gentlemen had the means which they are now abandoning without giving any special advantage to England whatever, they had the means of showing how trade within the Empire could be greatly increased, and of taking a step greatly in advance. I need not remind the House that the Toronto Board of Trade passed a resolution, and that the present representative of Toronto West (Mr. Osler), president of the Toronto Board of Trade, moved the resolution that passed at the third congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the Empire. That resolution was as follows :—

Whereas, in view of recent events, and the attitude of other nations towards Great Britain, and the fact that there exists within the British Empire resources in men and materials and arable land for its every requirement ;

Whereas, while the trade legislation of other nations is framed to subserve their local interests, all British trade and other legislation should aim to secure within the Empire a union of interest of a federal character, and the policy of each British community should be designed to retain within the Empire subjects whose labour would otherwise go to foreign lands ;

Whereas, Canada has already formed a basis for closer relations with the mother country and other colonies by building a highway across British America, by creating steamship connections between Vancouver, Hong Kong, New Zealand and Australia, by offering a large subsidy for a fast Atlantic steamship service, as well as by her precedent of confederation, making for British unity ;

And whereas closer commercial relations between the mother country, her colonies and dependencies will be hastened by further subsidizing fast steamship services and completing postal, wire and cable communications with the different portions of the Empire, thus making such routes for commerce, food supply and munitions of war the fastest and most secure from attack ;

Resolved, that, in the opinion of this conference, the advantage to be obtained by a closer union between the various portions of the British Empire are so great as to justify an arrangement as nearly as possible of the nature of a zollverein, based upon principles of the freest exchange of commodities within the Empire, consistent with the tariff requirements incident to the maintenance of the local government of each kingdom, dominion, province or colony, now forming part of the British family of nations.

Well, Sir, this resolution was moved by Mr. Osler, president of the Board of Trade of Toronto, before the third congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the Empire, and it was responded to by the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, in a speech of the deepest possible significance. That hon. gentleman, immediately upon taking charge of the Colonial Department, issued a despatch to all the colonies asking them to point out the most effective means by which trade within the Empire could be promoted. The hon. gentleman recognized that England had it within her power to change a policy under which every pound of her trade that is given to a foreign country is building up a foreign country, that every pound of her trade that goes outside of her own Empire is contributing to the greatness, prosperity and power of a country with whom the next day she may be at war ; and that England, possessing, as she does, these enormous resources, and invaluable possessions in the great outlying portions of the Empire, in Australia, in South Africa, and in Canada, is in a position to adopt a system of commercial preference within the Empire, which would increase the greatness, not only of the United Kingdom by the augmentation of her trade, which all statistics show is immensely greater, in proportion to the population, with the colonies than with foreign countries, but would build up great possessions like Canada, Australia and South Africa, all of which would make her, as I said before, a still greater and more dominant power in the world than she is at present. Well, Mr. Chamberlain took up this resolution and made it the basis of a speech—I will not read his speech again, because I used it on a former occasion ; but I will say that the whole point of his argument was that if the colonies would approach the mother country with a proposition of that character, they would not meet with a refusal, or, at all events, they would meet with the fairest and fullest consideration, and, in a broad and patriotic spirit. Now, the Hampshire "Advertiser" had an article upon this subject, of which I will read a short extract. Speaking of Mr. Chamberlain's attitude on this subject, it said :

He has come to the conclusion, apparently, that a practical solution of the whole problem can be found in the adoption of a customs union, and his speech was, in effect, an invitation to the colonies to approach the Colonial Office with a view to getting at an agreement. We have often referred to the almost infinite advantages to be gained by a welding together of all parts of the Empire in a solid Imperial federation, and Mr. Chamberlain has accepted a modification of the ideal which certain ardent men have for a long time past been advocating. We are all agreed upon the wisdom of the closest possible union ; but where we are not agreed is in regard to the practicability of finding a foundation of material interest sufficiently real and mutually advantageous to prove abiding and satisfactory.

No doubt will be left in the mind of any person as to what would be the result of such a measure, if properly pressed. I deplore again in the deepest manner the fact that this Government, while professing to desire to draw the mother country and Canada more closely together, while admitting as the Minister of Finance did, the immense advantage it would be to this Dominion to have preferential trade with England and the products of our country admitted on more favourable terms than those of foreign countries, has not only not availed itself of this opportunity, but has taken measures which make it utterly impossible to accomplish it. Hon. gentlemen may ask me why I say they have rendered it impossible of accomplishment. I refer hon. members to a passage in Lord Ripon's dispatch which covers the case. The noble Lord says :

Such denunciation would be a step of the greatest gravity, and, whilst Her Majesty's Government are fully alive to the desirability of removing any treaty stipulations which may hamper the action of the colonies in regard to trade relations, they consider that the advantages to be derived from such a step should be very clearly shown to outweigh the disadvantages before it could properly be resorted to.

Yesterday you had the advantages in your hands. Yesterday you were in a position to say to England : If you will denounce the Belgian and German treaties at the close of the year, we will be prepared to receive from England and from England alone all products of her industries at 25 per cent less duty than we will impose on the products of other countries. That proposition, looking at the effect it would have had on Canada, looking to the importance as regards England that this country should not only be prosperous but great and secure a large population and have her enormous and practically illimitable resources developed, and Canada thus become the right arm of the mother country, is one that although it might not have immediately resulted in the object desired to be obtained, yet it would have laid the foundation in the hands of parties anxious to promote the unity of the Empire and prepared to adopt such measures to accomplish the object in view. It is to be deplored that such an opportunity should have been lost. I am glad the First Minister has given the House the light of his countenance for a few moments because I have been endeavouring to draw attention to a point on which, if he does not take a deep interest in regard to it, he should do so, that is the redemption of pledges. When the hon. gentleman sought power he pledged himself to two measures : first, he declared that he was a devoted advocate of preferential trade within the Empire ; second, he announced that if returned to power, he would send a commission to negotiate with Lord Salisbury for the purpose of endeavouring to secure that result. The hon. gentleman has had an opportunity that will not again present itself in his lifetime, and he has thrown it away. Not only has he failed entirely to obtain preferential trade within the Empire for Canada, but he has adopted the most complete and effective means he could take to prevent this boon ever being obtained. And why ? Because if Lord Salisbury or Mr. Chamberlain—who has shown his anxiety to endeavour to secure the unity of this great Empire on a commercial basis—were to go to the House of Commons with a proposal such as this : if the Imperial Government would denounce the Belgian and German treaties at the end of the year, Canada would make a reduction in favour of England and England alone, provided England imposed moderate duties on articles in her markets coming into competition with those of Canada, I believe such a result could be accomplished. The hon. gentleman may not be so sanguine as I am, but I believe that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, if they had grappled with this subject in a statesmanlike manner, could have accomplished this object and secured a boon to Canada that would have been of inestimable value. But they have not done that, they have disarmed Mr. Chamberlain and the United Empire Trade League and all the friends of preferential trade in the Empire, of the most potent influence possible to be used to secure preferential trade. It is one thing to go down to the House of Commons and show the great advantages that would immediately accrue to the mother country under a policy of that kind, and it is another thing to go down and talk about the advantages of adopting such a policy when we have nothing more to give away, when in fact we have thrown away the very means by which this result could have been accomplished. So, in my judgment, the hon. gentleman has unfortunately taken a course that is diametrically opposed to the statement urged by the Minister of Finance, and for which the Government has obtained such kudos here and elsewhere for what was supposed to be an effort to establish preferential trade between Canada and the mother country. I hold in my hand a report of a speech delivered by an eminent member of the present Administration, Mr. Goschen. In dealing in parliament with this subject on February 17th, 1891, Mr. Goschen said :

I think it is possible that the advantages of the consolidation of the Empire may be so great that, if the increase in the price of the loaf is extremely small, the producers, with whom the power now lies far more than with the consumers, may not object. I differ with the honourable member for Leeds, who supposed that if we had any customs union or arrangement by which favour was shown to the colonies, the United States would have a right to interfere. I do not think the United States would have a right to remonstrate or interfere in the way he suggested. The right honourable gentleman suggested England would be brought to her knees, but I must enter my protest against such an extreme view, that under no circumstances could we make any arrangements with our colonies without bringing in the other bread-producing countries. If we find we could make the whole Empire one as regards customs, surely we have the right of Zollverein union as Germany has with Bavaria or the United States among themselves. I claim for ourselves the same right. We ought to have securities from the colonies, not merely that they would put a 5 per cent extra on foreigners, but that their tariff itself should be such as would be likely to protect this country from loss.

That was precisely the position the hon. gentleman occupied with this tariff in his hand, and had he taken the ground: We have offered you preferential trade; you say you are bound by treaties that forbid you from accepting our offer, and, that being the case, we will now give you a substantial advantage of 25 per cent reduction on the general tariff of our country, and we will give that exclusively to England, if you will give us a similar preference. I am sorry to say, Mr. Chairman, that there is another point in which I believe the public of Canada, and the British public, will be greatly disappointed with reference to this tariff. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) by a very ingenious handling of words—and I must confess he did it with great success—led the House to suppose that this was a British tariff, and that it was anything but an American tariff. He (Mr. Fielding) led the House to suppose that his object was to draw the bonds closer between the mother country and Canada, and to let the United States understand that if they were not disposed to trade fairly with Canada, Canada proposed to wait and see what attitude the United States were going to assume before granting her any favours.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The House and the country understood the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) to say that, but yet we find, that instead of this being a pro-British tariff it is a pro-American tariff. I, as a Canadian, am most anxious to preserve the most friendly relations, commercial and otherwise, with the United States of America, but I have to remember that we have been taught again and again by the most severe lessons, that that country has little regard for us. When the Hon. George Brown went down to negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the United States of America, and when he made generous offers on the part of Canada, he was met with the declaration: Mr. Brown, we may as well understand this matter at once, you must agree to discriminate against England or we will not negotiate a reciprocity treaty with you. That was the answer to Mr. Brown, and that hon. gentleman (Mr. Brown), to his credit be it said, turned upon his heel and replied: Then my mission is at an end because the Government I represent will never consent to discriminate against the mother country in favour of any foreign nation. And later, when representatives of the Canadian Government went to Washington to negotiate a treaty with Mr. Blaine they were met with the open statement: If you want to share in the advantages that American citizens enjoy, you have got to become American citizens. Sir, no person can study the McKinley or the Dingley tariff for a single moment, without coming to the conclusion that the policy of the United States is to cripple Canada in every possible way. We have unfriendly tariff Bills, and alien Bills, we are threatened with the abrogation of the bonding privilege, and there is nothing but threats from the American Government, and nothing to show that they are prepared to trade with us upon equal terms. Let me show how this tariff announced by our Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) is not a pro-British tariff. When he came to deal with the mother country, what did he do? Before he made this cut of one-eighth which is to last for a short time, and then to be followed by a reduction of one-fourth, he increased his tariff over and above what his friends denounced as the high protective tariff of the Liberal-Conservative Government. The proposed reduction was a delusion to a very considerable extent, because it was not a reduction of one-eighth on the tariff as it stood when he came into power, pledged to carry out a very different policy. The Liberal-Conservative Government were charged with discriminating against England, but if you turn to the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) you will find his statement on record, that out of $5,000,000 worth of cottons imported into this country, $4,500,000 worth (under our anti-British tariff as these gentlemen called it) came from England, and only half a million dollars worth from the United States of America. On a former occasion I dealt with the false imputation that the Liberal-Conservative tariff discriminated against England, and, Sir, I do not intend to repeat that argument now. How did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) treat the United States under this tariff? He intimated that he did not intend to make any change in the coal duties until he knew what the United States would do. But the hon. gentleman took duty off corn. That is a great American product, and yet it is made free. Does that show anything else than that while the United States has turned the cold shoulder on our country, Canada has cringed towards her. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) has no justification for taking the duty off corn. I say that his action in that respect is a severe blow struck at the agricultural interests of this country. There are a few cattle feeders, who would like to have their corn free, and they will thank the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), and I dare say they will be able to show their gratitude to him; but a large number of the farming population of this country were engaged in growing corn on Canadian soil, and with Canadian hands, and the action of the present Government in admitting American corn free has paralyzed these hands, and has made it impossible that another ear of corn can be grown in Canada. That has been done by taking the duty off this product which is so abundant in the southern states of the Union. And, Sir, what more? It is an injury to the farmers who raise the coarser grains; it destroys the value of pease, oats, rye, barley; it not only sweeps away the corn-fields that were blossoming over a considerable portion of Canada, but it strikes down all these large industries by the introduction of free corn, which has more fattening qualities, and can be used in some respects to more advantage. But even that is not without its injurious effects. The Canadian, as he walks along the streets of London to-day, looking into the windows of the great groceries, is delighted to witness the spectacle of Canadian cheese with the price and American cheese with a considerably lower price. He is also delighted to witness the spectacle of Canadian bacon labelled at a much higher price than American bacon. Why is that? It is because the pea-fed bacon of Canada is much better and much more highly prized than the corn-fed bacon of the United States.

Mr. GIBSON. What has that to do with cheese?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say the high position which the cheese industry of Canada occupies has been attained by furnishing to the palates of the English people an article of higher quality than they were able to get from the United States. A few years ago the cheese of the United Kingdom was largely supplied by the United States. To-day the American cheesemakers have lost that position. They have been distanced, and the only difficulty Canadians now have is to prevent Americans getting their cheese into the English market labelled as Canadian cheese. So that I tell my hon. friend that it has a good deal to do with it. I say that the excellence and pre-eminence in the great market of the world which our cheese has obtained it would be a pity to lose by doing anything tending to lower the character and standing of Canadian cheese. In the same way, by taking off duty on corn you strike a blow at the character of Canadian bacon which has secured for it a great reputation and a high price in England. But the hon. gentleman has also lowered the duty on wheat and the duty on flour. In fact, wherever there was an opportunity the hon. gentleman has tried to show the United States, what they have always believed, and what is one of the most fatal errors in the minds of American statesmen, that Canada is dependent upon them, and that they can at all times trample on our best and dearest interests; and the Finance Minister, without any desire on their part to reciprocate, is prepared to lower the duty on one article after another. Take the duty on iron. The hon. gentleman knows that under the National Policy we had built up an iron industry in this country which was gradually increasing, which showed a great increase in 1896; and yet the hon. gentleman has struck a fatal blow at that industry, not for the benefit of England, but for the benefit of the United States. Does he want the proof? Let him look at the iron girders coming from Detroit for the construction of the great bridge at Montreal. That is the way the hon. gentleman has shown his independence of American interests. I am as ready as any man in this country to treat that great republic with all the consideration to which it is entitled. No one has a more sincere admiration for it than I have. Its magnificent development has astounded the world. But on the northern half of the continent of America, with our great natural resources, all we need is to have faith and confidence in ourselves, and foster Canadian industries on Canadian soil, in order to build up a country which will be all that Canadians desire. So distinguished a man as the Hon. David Wells gave utterance to this tribute to the position that Canada had attained under the National Policy:

In the Dominion of Canada, separated territorially from us on the north by an imaginary line, there has been no panic, no unusual demand for money, no stoppage of industries, no restriction of trade, no increased rate of interest; in short, nothing beyond the ordinary course of events, except so far as these events may have been influenced by contiguity to what may be termed a financial cyclone, whose pathway of destruction was contiguous to, but not within, Canadian territory.

This is a tribute to Canada uttered during the time of one of the greatest depressions the United States or Canada has known for many years—a contrast by a high American authority drawn between Canada and the United States. While on this subject, I may be permitted to read a passage from a greater and still more eloquent man than Mr. Wells in regard to Canada. The Hon. William A. Seward, when Secretary of State, after a lengthened visit to Canada, uttered the following prophetic words:—

Having its Atlantic seaport at Halifax and its Pacific depot near Vancouver Island, British America would inevitably draw to it the commerce of Europe, Asia and the United States. Thus, from a mere colonial dependency, it would assume a controlling rank in the world. To her other nations would be tributary; and in vain would the United States attempt to be her rival, for we could never dispute with her the possession of the Asiatic commerce, nor the power which that commerce confers.

That, Sir, was from one of the most eloquent and distinguished men of the United States about the date of confederation, or a little before. I would like to know what that distinguished gentleman would have said if he had lived to the present day and had seen a great transcontinental line of railway extending from the shores of the Atlantic to the shores of the Pacific, with towns and villages built up all along its course, and with a development of the whole country such as the most sanguine men at that time would not have ventured to predict. Now, I propose to bring these remarks to a close by embodying in an amendment to this resolution the views I entertain. The first is that this proposed tariff, exposing the industries of Canada to competition with all the world, and the reduction of 25 per cent below the general tariff which is adopted, will be fatal to Canadian industries. That may not be felt perhaps immediately, but at a very early day it will be felt; and, the gentlemen on the back benches have enlightened us by telling us that after personal communication with the Government, they have obtained a pledge that this is only the entering of the wedge, and that it will be driven home until every vestige of protection is rooted out. My second and great objection is that this policy has destroyed the prospect of obtaining preferential trade, the most gigantic boon which, in my judgment, could be obtained for Canada, and one which, if the hon. gentleman was determined to make his attack on the industries of the country, they ought to have secured if for no other reason than as some compensation for the injury they were doing. Then the third and last point is one of some importance, and I propose again to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen to the statesmanlike views on this subject—that is with reference to that part of this clause which leaves it in the power of the Government to control, to a considerable extent its application—of the Marquis of Ripon. That part of the clause reads:

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to—

That puts the entire lowering and raising of duties in the hands of the Government of the day, because it leaves the decision to their judgment, whether Japan or any other country shall come into competition with us; and I hold that the principles embodied there is a most vicious principle. I hold that everything that touches the tariff, everything that touches the fiscal policy of the country, ought to be settled by the members of the Commons and not by the members of the Government, and just in proportion as you encroach upon the rights of Parliament, you are encroaching upon the rights of the people and adopting a policy that is of an utterly unsound character.

Now, I will read, in confirmation of my views, the following sentence from Lord Ripon's despatch on page 9:

I trust, therefore, that the colonial legislature—
This is a despatch to the Governor General but it is addressed as if Lord Ripon were speaking to the House of Commons of Canada:

Her Majesty's Government trust, therefore, that the colonial legislature will not seek to divest themselves in any measure of their power to fix the amount of their taxation in order to confer on the executive a power the exercise of which, without the fullest deliberation, might inadvertently give rise to serious complications, not only with other colonies, but with foreign powers.

The hon. gentleman will see, therefore, that there is good ground for questioning the course which this Government have pursued. I shall now read the resolution which I propose to move in amendment to the clause before the committee. I move that all the words after "that" be left out, and the following be substituted therefor:—

That in the opinion of this House the reduction by 25 per cent of the duties upon all imports except wines, malt liquors, spirits, spirituous liquors, liquid medicines and articles containing alcohol; sugar, molasses and syrups of all kinds, the product of the sugar cane, or beet-root, tobacco, cigars and cigarettes in favour of any country whose tariff is or may be made on the whole as low as that of Schedule D, is calculated to imperil the industrial interests of Canada and is in principle opposed to preferential trade of any kind with the mother country.

That on several occasions the Government and Parliament of Canada have requested Her Maesty to be pleased to take such steps as might be necessary to terminate the effect of the provisions of all treaties which prevent the Parliaments of the United Kingdom and the self-governing colonies adopting such tariffs as may be required for the promotion of trade within the Empire, but no decisive action has been taken in this direction.

That the desire for preferential trade with the United Kingdom is now general throughout Canada.

That this House is of opinion that the Government of Canada should cause Her Majesty's Government to be advised that so soon as the difficulties in the way are removed the Parliament of Canada is ready to enter into a preferential trade arrangement with Great Britain and Ireland.

That this House cannot consent that any arrangement made by the Government of Canada with any country involving serious considerations of tariff and revenue should become operative without the sanction and ratification of Parliament.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I confess to entertaining a feeling akin to consideration that an hon. gentleman, with the record of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, should have delivered such a speech as we have heard from him to-night upon such a subject as that now before the committee. The hon. gentleman has posed for many years as the author and the advocate of what he has termed preferential trade with Great Britain; but while he has always, and at all times and under all circumstances, been ready to discuss that question, so long as it remained an academical question, the moment it is presented to him in a concrete and practical form, he turns his back upon it, and for two long hours opposes not only the author of the proposition but the proposition itself. One might be pardoned also if one were somewhat annoyed at the extreme length of the hon. gentleman's disquisition. In what possible way the hon. gentleman could drag in to this debate the very interesting question whether pease or corn are the better food with which to fatten hogs, and how that question could have any effect in determining whether the proposition before the House is a legal one, it is certainly difficult to conceive. The hon. gentleman had to-night one of the greatest opportunities of his life. He had the opportunity of showing that he was not merely a politician but a statesman. He had the opportunity of rising above the trammels of party and showing that he preferred the welfare of the country and the Empire to mere party politics. He has shown himself, however, unable to rise to that position, and he stands here to-night in the humiliating position of a man who professedly has been a supporter and an advocate of the great proposition of free trade and fiscal development within the Empire, but who to-day abuses and denounces that very proposition when it is presented to him for acceptance.

In his opening sentences he sought to persuade the House that the simple amendment proposed by the hon. Minister of Finance, in order to make plainer the proposition originally tabled by him was a reversal of that proposition. He endeavoured to lead the House to believe that we had withdrawn that proposition and were now submitting something entirely different. WeM, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there can be any doubt in any impartial mind that the suggested amendment which my hon. colleague, the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) has submitted in the resolutions before the committee, does not in any sense or way alter the proposition originally tabled. And any hon. gentleman who sat here and listened to that resolution as it was explained by the Finance Minister knows that it was, and was intended to be, an offer of reciprocal trade to any country which would accept the conditions embodied in the resolution. It was not confined to one country more than another; and when questions were raised as to whether we should not be bound to extend the concessions we were making to those countries that had treaties containing the most-favoured-nation clause whether they gave reciprocal concessions or not—I say when legal, technical legal questions, were raised as to whether we should not be bound as to extend these concessions, my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) to remove the possibility of doubt, placed on the face of the resolution this clause:

That the Governor in Council may extend the benefits of such reciprocal tariff to any country which may be entitled thereto by virtue of any treaty with Her Majesty.

When the Finance Minister tabled that clause, he was only making that more clear which he himself thoroughly well understood and which everybody who listened to his speech understood—

Mr. FOSTER. Which the Premier did not understand.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Premier thoroughly understood it. The Premier took that stand which the Finance Minister took, which every member of the Cabinet took and holds to-day, that these treaties did not apply and did not bind Canada. The Premier took the stand, which is now carried out in every customs-house in Canada, that these treaties do not bind Canada, and that German and Belgian goods are not entitled to preferential treatment because of these treaties. I do not intend to go into a long dissertation upon the history of these treaties, but to submit, briefly, the reasons upon which we base that legal conclusion; and I think I can satisfy, if not all, a great majority of the members of this House that the extravagant and extreme language which the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) has thought fit to use was not only unworthy of the great question he was discussing, but wholly without warrant in the case. When this resolution was tabled, the hon gentleman declared it an illegal and unconstitutional resolution. Can he lay his finger, Sir, upon a single paragraph published in any newspaper of weight in the world endorsing that extravagant statement of his? Can he produce the opinion of a prominent lawyer, or even of a fledgling lawyer, endorsing the absurd and ridiculous statement made by him that the resolution was unconstitutional and illegal? He, the leader of the great Conservative party, pronouncing 'excathedra' in such extravagant language such an opinion is, I am proud to say, alone in the position he takes. But, Sir, he tells us that no one but the Finance Minister has any doubts that the Belgian and German treaties do apply. Well, the gentlemen who are colleagues of the Finance Minister, and some of them are not altogether undistinguished as lawyers in the localities from which they come, hold the same opinion as the Finance Minister. The leading organ of public opinion in England, the London "Times" newspaper, in its leading editorial, published after the proposition had been received by the cable, pronounced itself upon this doubt in the following language:—

There is, in the first place, much doubt whether the treaties in question have any bearing on Mr. Fielding's propositions.

So, the hon. gentleman says that no one in the world has any doubt but the Finance Minister. I give him his answer in the editorial opinion of the leading organ of public opinion of England. What have we more? The cable has told us, within the last few days, that one of the most distinguished lecturers upon international law in Great Britain, Sir Charles Malcolm Kennedy, lecturer upon international law at University College, Bristol, states that in his opinion, the German and Belgian treaties do not apply to this proposal. I quote this opinion to show the ridiculous absurdity of the position that the hon. gentleman takes that he alone is right and that there is no ground whatever for our contention that these treaties do not apply. This is what the despatch says:—

Unusual importance attaches to the statement of Sir Charles Kennedy, who, during a lecture on international law at the University College, Bristol, yesterday, touched on the new Canadian tariff. In view of Sir Charles's position as an expert, and in view of the fact that he only recently retired from the head of the commercial department of the Foreign Office, his words have weight.

Sir Charles Kennedy said that, while on the surface the new preferential clause of the Canadian tariff appeared contrary to the Belgian and German treaties, the circumstances of the case were materially altered since these treaties were enacted.

For instance, said Sir Charles, self-government has been conceded to Canada, including the power to regulate her own fiscal policy. Acting on that power, Canada has prohibited the entrance of prison-made goods, an export favoured by Belgium and Germany.

Mr. DAVIES.

Moreover, he continued, Canada is willing to concede tariff preference to every country on reciprocal terms. This tariff rule was adopted by the United States, and had, to some extent, been recognized by the powers already having agreements with the United States, including England and France.

Now, on referring to the authorities to ascertain who this gentleman is, I find that he is not only a distinguished lecturer upon international law, but that he has been for forty years in the Foreign Office in England, and that he has been accredited by Her Majesty to leading cities in Europe—to Paris, the Hague and other places, to carry out diplomatic embassies with which he was entrusted. And though the hon. gentleman must have read this, he calmly says to his followers that this whole thing is illegal and unconstitutional, that there is no doubt that the treaties apply, and that nobody has any doubt about it except the Finance Minister. I ask his friends and followers if this is a creditable position for the hon. gentleman to take, especially upon a question which we had a right to hope would have been raised above party fights.

The hon. gentleman has hardly attempted, I think, to discuss the proposition itself, to show how far these treaties do apply or to give reasons why they do apply. With the permission of the House, I will give, shortly, some reasons why, in my humble judgment, these treaties do not apply to the proposition before us. Two questions meet us on the threshold of this inquiry. The first question is: Do the German and Belgian treaties apply to the proposition now before the House in the absence of any Imperial or Canadian legislation giving effect to these treaties? The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) who has just spoken, is not a lawyer, but he will understand, I am quite sure, the full meaning and import of the words that I have used. The second question is: If the German and Belgian treaties do apply, do the tariff resolutions, in the form in which they present themselves conflict with the terms of the treaties?

Now, Sir, taking up the first question, I admit frankly that the constitutional right of the Crown to make treaties binding the Empire is unquestioned. But that right has a limitation, like many other rights and powers that the Crown possesses, a clear and distinct limitation; and that limitation is that the carrying of treaties into effect is subject to the discretion of the Imperial or Colonial Government which may be affected by the treaties. That is a proposition of constitutional law, which I take it, will not be challenged by any hon. gentleman. The Crown in its prerogative right, simply acting by virtue of its prerogative right alone, has no right to make a treaty which can impose a tax upon a subject of Great Britain. The Crown, acting by virtue of its prerogative right, has no power by treaty to impose a tax upon a Canadian subject; nor has the Crown, acting by virtue of the same right, the power to apportion taxation, or define the manner in which taxes should be levied upon Canadian or British subjects. I say therefore, that while the Crown has an indisputable and undoubted right to make treaties, that while it is the only representative that foreign powers can look to to make treaties, and an undoubted right to make them with foreign powers, the moment the Crown makes a treaty which affects the fiscal legislation of an autonomous or independent colony, that treaty has no legal effect and cannot be brought into legal effect until the Parliament which has this autonomous and fiscal control, by proper enactment brings it into effect.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does my hon. friend mean to say that the Imperial Parliament ever took any action upon the German and Belgian treaties?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, I am coming to that. If the hon. gentleman will permit, I want to present first the purely legal argument, and I will show the hon. gentleman why they did not do it. I say that this argument must equally apply to treaties which impose a prohibition or restriction on constitutional rights which otherwise are absolute. Now, the constitutional right of this Parliament of Canada to declare what taxation shall be raised, how it shall be raised, in what manner customs duties shall be levied and appropriated, is absolute and unquestioned, and is undivided with anybody else; and I say if the Crown, by virtue of its prerogative alone makes a treaty which interferes with that absolute and unqualified right, that treaty does not apply to us until this Parliament has sanctioned it. But my hon. friend asks, has the Parliament of Great Britain passed any law making this treaty applicable to Great Britain? Just the very point I was stating. There has been no Imperial legislation making this treaty law. If there had been Imperial legislation making this treaty law, that Imperial legislation would have applied to Canada as well as to Great Britain, because the Imperial Parliament has the power to legislate over Canada as well as over Great Britain; but because there is no Imperial legislation, and because there is no Canadian legislation, we submit to the House that the treaty does not bind Canada. There was no occasion for any Imperial legislation quoad Great Britain and why? The treaty, so far as Great Britain is concerned, is a mere treaty applying the most-favoured-nation clauses to Great Britain, and nothing else; in so far as the colonies are concerned, it adds on this one clause of prohibition, prohibiting us from levying taxation or customs duties. That prohibitory clause does not apply to Great Britain. The portions of the treaty which apply to Great Britain are only those most-favoured-nation clauses which come into operation by themselves; but so far as the prohibitory clause is concerned which applies to the colonies, my submission to this House is that that prohibitory clause requires Canadian legislation to give it effect. Well, Sir, what position did Canada stand in in 1862, when this treaty was entered into? Had Canada customs autonomy then? Had she fiscal independence then? I say she had, Sir, and I want to draw the attention of those hon. gentlemen who do me the honour to follow my argument on this point, very closely to what I am about to say now. The question which every legal mind will ask itself is, What was the condition of Canada in the year 1865, when this treaty was agreed to? At that time Canadian fiscal independence was a fact, a fact which not only had been demanded by Canada, but which had been conceded and acceded to by Great Britain. We are all familiar with the correspondence which took place in 1859, when Canada passed a customs law, clauses in which contained differential duties. The object of passing that customs law was challenged by the Duke of Newcastle, who was then Colonial Secretary, and animadverted upon in the most strong and vigorous language. Sir, what reply did he get from the Finance Minister of the day? I will read you a paragraph referring to that. Sir Alexander Galt, the then Minister of Finance, in answer to a despatch of His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, dated 13th August, 1859, said:

Respect to the Imperial Government must always dictate the desire to satisfy them that the policy of this country is neither hastily nor unwisely formed, and that due regard is had to the interests of the mother country as well as of the province. But the Government of Canada, acting for its legislature and people, cannot, through those feelings of deference which they owe to the Imperial authorities, in any manner waive or diminish the right of the people of Canada to decide for themselves both as to the mode and extent to which taxation shall be imposed. The provincial ministry are at all times ready to afford explanations in regard to the Acts of the legislature to which they are party—but, subject to their duty and allegiance to Her Majesty, their responsibility in all general questions of policy must be to the provincial parliament, by whose confidence they administer the affairs of the country. And, in the imposition of taxation, it is so plainly necessary that the administration and the people should be in accord, that the former cannot admit responsibility or require approval beyond that of the local legislature. Self-government would be utterly annihilated if the views of the Imperial Government were to be preferred to those of the people of Canada. It is, therefore, the duty of the present Government distinctly to affirm the right of the Canadian legislature to adjust the taxation of the people in the way they deem best—even if it should unfortunately happen to meet the disapproval of the Imperial Ministry. Her Majesty cannot be advised to disallow such Acts, unless her advisers are prepared to assume the administration of the affairs of the colony, irrespective of the views of its inhabitants.

Sir, that claim to fiscal independence, that claim to customs autonomy, was acknowledged by the Duke of Newcastle, and the Bill which the Canadian Parliament then passed, and which was sent home for his approval, received the assent of the Queen without any other question. I say as a matter of constitutional law which is within the knowledge of every one, that from that time down to the present there has been no attempt to interfere with the exercise by the Canadian Parliament of its undoubted right in this regard. Now, Sir, I say more; I say the subsequent enactment of the British North America Act of 1867, the removal from the Governor's instructions, of the clause relating to differential duties, and the concession lately given to us of our right to be consulted in making treaties, settles this point now beyond all question. It is not now in controversy, it is admitted by everybody, by writers upon constitutional law, by statesmen, politicians and everybody else. I submit, therefore, in closing this branch of the argument, that if I have made my point clear, in view of Canada's customs autonomy in the year 1865, when that treaty was entered into, it was not and could not have been the intention of the Imperial Government to bind Canada without her consent. The words of the treaty, it is true, if read, generally, are broad enough to cover Canada, but I say these words must be read with the constitutional limitation which I have referred to, that where a treaty made by virtue of the Crown's prerogative, limits the power of the Colonial Parliament in the imposition of its customs taxation, that treaty is operative only as, and when the Parliament assents to it. Now, Sir, I will call attention on that point to a distinguished writer on constitutional law, Mr. Anson, a book quoted and acknowledged everywhere as one of the highest authorities upon this branch of the subject. He says on page 279:

This much appears to be certain, that where a treaty involves either a charge on the people or a change in the law of the land, it may be made, but cannot be carried into effect, without the sanction of Parliament. Such treaties are, therefore, made subject to the approval of Parliament, and are submitted for its approval before ratification, or ratified under conditions.

Such are treaties of commerce which might require a change in the character or the amount of duties charged on exported or imported goods.

I submit that is a strong authority for us to take on this constitutional point. I go further, and say that the constitutional point was discussed and admitted by Lord Kimberley, when he was Colonial Secretary, at the time he was in correspondence with the Australian colonies on the subject matter of this treaty. I call the attention of hon. gentlemen to that correspondence, and they will find that as far back as 1871 the delegates of the different Australian colonies, New South Wales, Tasmania and Australia, claimed the right to impose preferential duties as between themselves and foreign countries, irrespective of the wishes of the Imperial Government, and they submitted a memorandum, two paragraphs of which I will venture to read to the House. It is signed by the Attorney General, the Postmaster General, the Premiers and the Chief Secretaries of the several colonies. It says:

As members of the British Empire, the relations of which with other countries are conducted by the Imperial Government, we deny that any treaty can be properly or constitutionally made which, directly or indirectly, treats these colonies as foreign communities.

With the internal arrangement of the Empire, whether in its central or more remote localities, foreign countries can have no pretense to interfere, and stipulations respecting the trade of one part of the Empire with another, whether by sea or land, are not stipulations which foreign governments ought to be allowed to become parties to in any way.

The article in the treaty with the Zollverein to which Lord Kimberley refers,—

This is the very one now under discussion.

—is, therefore, one from the obligations of which we should claim to be considered free, if it were interpreted so as to prevent these colonies from imposing differential duties as between themselves and foreign countries.

There is the claim made broadly; there is no question about it. My hon. friend smiles, but I suppose he would hardly challenge the fact that in the words I have read their claim to be free of obligations at this time was preferred in this diplomatic note in as clear and distinct a manner as it is possible for the English language to make it clear and distinct. It is true Lord Kimberley overruled the objections. But why? When I call the attention of the House to his reasoning, I will ask hon. gentlemen opposite to answer this question: does a single word of the reasoning used in overruling that claim apply to Canada? If it does, then I can say that this authority is against me and not for me; if not, then I say that by the very strongest inference this authority is in my favour. In the despatches which Lord Kimberley wrote—and I may say they were exceedingly lengthy and remarkably lucidly reasoned—he said:

I will deal, in the first place with the point raised as to the obligation of the Australian colonies to conform to the Seventh Article of the Zollverein treaty.

Her Majesty's Government apprehend that the constitutional right of the Queen to complete treaties binding on all parts of the Empire cannot be questioned, subject to the discretion of the Parliament of the United Kingdom or of the colonial parliament, as the case may be, to pass any laws which may be required to bring such treaties into operation.

The right to pass the treaty, he says, is unquestioned, subject to the discretion of the Colonial Parliament which is affected by it to bring the treaty in to effect. Here is the argument :

But no Acts of the Australian legislatures could be necessary to give validity to a stipulation against differential duties, inasmuch as by the Australian Colonies Government Act, 13 and 14 Vic., chap. 59, sec. 27, it is provided that "no new duty shall be imposed upon the importation into any of the said colonies of any articles, the produce and manufacture of, or imported from, any particular country or place, which shall not be equally imposed on the importation into the same colony of the like article, &c., from all other countries and places whatsoever.

So that the constitutional Act of the Australian colonies contains a special stipulation prohibiting them from imposing preferential duties in any shape or way, and therefore, Lord Kimberley says : it was not necessary for you to pass colonial legislation to give effect to the Zollverein treaty ; your Constitutional Act contains words rendering that unnecessary. I need not remind hon. members of this House that no Constitutional Act that Canada has now or had at the time of that treaty ever contained such a prohibition upon her power. Lord Kimberley goes on to say :

Moreover, the Australian Colonies Government Act and the New Zealand Constitution Act prohibit the colonial legislatures from levying any duty, imposing any prohibition or restriction, or granting any exemption or privilege upon the importation or exportation of any articles contrary to, or at variance with, any treaty concluded by Her Majesty with any foreign power.

So that here they were with two constitutional limitations in their Act, in the Imperial charter given to them : one saying, you shall not under any circumstances be permitted to impose any preferential duties ; and the other saying, you shall not be allowed to pass any law against any treaty entered into by Her Majesty. Their mouths were closed. Why should you reason further ? But I call attention to this fact, that neither of these constitutional prohibitions is in our Act. I therefore submit that in the face of our customs autonomy, in the absence of any such restrictions as exist in Australian Constitutional Acts, and in virtue of the limitation on the treaty making power of the Crown, and the absence of Imperial or colonial legislation giving effect to these treaties, they do not apply to Canada.

I am aware that the opposite conclusion has been for the time tacitly assumed ; we have gone on assuming that treaties apply as a matter of course. It may be that my argument is all wrong. I do not profess to be able to speak ex cathedra on a great constitutional point of this kind ; but I do profess that my argument is sufficient to say that we have exceedingly good ground for coming to the conclusion that these treaties never did or never were intended by the Crown to bind us until we have assent to them. Now, I proceed to the second branch of the inquiry. Assume I am wrong ; assume that the treaty applies to Canada and requires no colonial legislation or assent to bring it into effect—what then ? The second question is, does the tariff resolution conflict with the terms of that treaty ? Sir, hon. gentlemen have on their desks this resolution, and I may be permitted to call their attention specially to it :

1. That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to, are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce, or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be imported direct into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein at the reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff.

There is no differential rates of duty proposed there ; there is no preferential duty enacted there in favour of any one country, and withheld from another. All trading countries are placed upon the same footing by that resolution. The enactment is general ; but the privileges offered are accompanied by a condition. The condition is applicable to all. Those who choose to take advantage of the condition can do so, and those who refuse to accept the condition cannot surely ask for the concession. If any foreign country applies a tariff to our goods as favourable as the reciprocal tariff is to theirs, then they get the benefit of our reciprocal tariff. If they do not apply such a tariff to us, then they do not get the benefit of our reciprocal tariff. The carrying out of the condition lies with the other countries and not with us. The words of the treaty read as follows :—

The produce of the states of the Zollverein shall not be subject to a higher or any other import duties than the produce of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

This resolution does not submit Belgian or German goods to any higher or other duties than the goods of Great Britain. You cannot read anything of that kind into this proposal, and it is a violently forced construction to say that the resolution does.

It is true that the fiscal policy of Great Britain enables her to get the benefit which we offer, because she complies with the conditions upon which the offer is made. Germany and Belgium can do so to-morrow, and if and when they do so, they will receive the advantage equally with Great Britain. But until they come within the terms of the resolution and offer us a reciprocal tariff as favourable as our reciprocal tariff, they cannot ask, either that their goods shall be received here at the lower rate, nor can they complain if their refusal to accept our offer subjects their products to higher or other duties than Great Britain. I say that this resolution neither discriminates nor differentiates. It attaches no terms which are not common to Great Britain and to all countries, and if Great Britain's fiscal system entitles her, as it does, to the immediate benefits which are daily flowing from the acceptance of our conditions; and if Germany and Belgium do not get the same advantages now, it is not because of our legislation, or our offer, but because of their own refusal to comply with the conditions which we have put in our offer. At any moment and by their own act, they can claim all the benefits under this offer, and I say it would be intolerable—both sides of the House will acknowledge that—that they should be allowed to enjoy the benefits, while repudiating the concessions on which alone the benefits are tendered.

Now, I say, that Canada makes this offer by virtue of her customs autonomy, and in the exercise of her undoubted constitutional right. She contends it is not open to the charge of preference or partiality, because its application depends on the voluntary action of any foreign nation that may wish to take advantage of it. We rejoice, we have rejoiced from the first, that the mother country comes under the clause at once, and that we were enabled to open—as the Minister of Finance said—the door of every custom-house in Canada the day after the tariff was tabled, to the products of Great Britain at lower rates than the products of any other country in the world. We are all pleased that such is the fact. We do not conceal our satisfaction at being able in this practical way to testify our gratitude to the mother country for what she has done for us; but we challenge the right of any foreign power, under cover of the favoured-nation clause, to reap the advantage of the offer with one hand, while repudiating the conditional reciprocal concessions which are the essence and reason for that offer. If the treaty applies to Canada, then, while we cannot make a preferential trade arrangement with Great Britain, neither can we be prevented from making a general reciprocal trade offer, which it is open to all countries in the world to accept.

Now, Sir, I have endeavoured to place my views on this point before the House as clearly as I could, and I must say that upon this branch of the case I do not entertain any reasonable doubt whatever, that Sir Charles Kennedy's opinion is the right one, and that this offer will not be held to violate the conditions of that Zollverein or Belgian treaty, and if so, we can claim that we stand in the proud position: that we have achieved by one master stroke what the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) has been years talking about. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) has been a strong advocate (I acknowledge that) of what he is pleased to call preferential trade; but as was wittily remarked in one of the English papers the other day: the hon. gentleman treated this question like a buried bone which he exhumed from time to time merely for vain show. We have not been burying this bone and exhuming it from time to time for vain show. We have not been treating this question in an academic way. We have boldly grasped the nettle; we have solved the problem. Unless our legal position is entirely wrong. I say that undoubtedly we have solved the problem, and the best illustration which I can give of that statement, is the fact, that to-day, as was said, the customs offices in Canada are receiving British goods at the preferential rate. But, Sir, if that is all wrong; if we are wrong in our first legal point that the treaties do not apply, and if we are wrong in our second point, and it is held that our resolution does distinctly infringe the treaties, then, I say, we occupy the proud position, the great vantage ground, the only vantage ground from which this question can be successfully fought, for if the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) wants to obtain preferential trade with Great Britain, he can obtain it in this way and no other way. If he wants really and practically to give the advantage which we are offering to British goods, it can be given in no other way than this, because this is the only possible way by which we can hope to get the treaties denounced. What has been the result of all the talking, and what has been the result of the meetings of the Imperial Federation League? What has been the result of the eloquent speeches which the leader of the Opposition has delivered from one end of Great Britain to the other, calling for the denunciation of those treaties? Sir, they have gone up in smoke; but what position do we stand in to-day? We stand in such a proud position, that we are told by the great organ of public opinion the London "Times": that even if we are wrong in our legal position; even if we are wrong in the constitutional point we have submitted, our case is so strong that the mother country will be obliged to denounce the treaties at once. What does the "Times" say? In its article published on the 26th of April, after the text of our offer was cabled to it, it said:

We have no hesitation in saying, that if any such stipulations stand in the way of a free and fair arrangement of duties between this country and her great colony in North America, the earliest opportunity should be taken to relieve us from their obligation.

Could anything be more definite, more clear, or more pronounced? I say upon all these points we occupy a splendid vantage ground. I may call the attention of hon. gentlemen to some remarks which were made in that regard by Lord Salisbury some time ago, as showing what his opinion is of these treaties. In addressing a meeting of the United Empire League as far back as 1891, Lord Salisbury is reported in the "Times" to have said:

With respect to those two unlucky treaties, they were made by Lord Palmerston's Government some thirty years ago, when, I am sure, our relations with our colonies could not have been fully considered. We have tried to find out from the official records what species of reasoning it was that induced the statesmen of that day to sign such very unfortunate obligations, but I do not think they could have known what they were signing. I have not been able to discover that they at all realized the importance of the engagements into which they were entering. We shall be very glad indeed to take any opportunity that may arise for delivering ourselves from these unfortunate engagements.

Sir, we tender to the Premier of the Empire the opportunity he has asked for. We ask him in a practical way to implement his pledge; and there is not a man who knows Lord Salisbury who does not believe that he will carry out that pledge. Sir, we say that if this treaty does apply and entitles Germany to the favoured admission of her goods without concessions, then it must be denounced; first, because it was made without our knowledge or assent, and imposes a dangerous limitation on our constitutional powers of raising our revenue; second, because concessions to Germany, in view of her hostile tariff, would be unpopular and inexpedient in the extreme, and because the trade returns show that the results of the trade between Canada and Germany are not such as flow naturally but are results achieved by means of a very onerous tariff which Germany imposes on Canadian goods; and third, because on broad grounds of policy it would not be right to ignore the good feeling existing between Canada and Great Britain, and to compel Canada, by virtue of treaties concluded without her knowledge or assent, and unratified by her Parliament and that of Great Britain, to extend to nations with hostile tariffs the commercial privileges we cheerfully extend to the motherland. I say that this proposition does not deserve to be denounced in the opprobrious language the leader of the Opposition has chosen to use, because it has touched a chord of sympathy which has vibrated through Canada and the Empire, and has lifted the question out of the region of political jugglery, and the mists of academic discussion into the region of practical politics and accomplished fact. Search the annals of colonial history, and you will search in vain to find a parallel case where so difficult a problem has ever been so boldly grappled with, and so satisfactorily solved. The proposal has been received with paeans of praise and almost unqualified approbation by the daily press of Great Britain, and the more staid and quiet weeklies also. It has dissipated at one blow and for ever the slanderous charges of disloyalty against the great Liberal party, and has opened a door whereby the trade of this country can be turned into British channels, and the fiscal federation of the Empire promoted.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not know whether the hon. leader of the House proposes to go on with the debate further tonight, or whether he will consent to an adjournment.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). If the hon. gentleman prefers not to go on this evening, we will agree to an adjournment.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and committee rose and reported progress.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved:

Motion agreed to.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT.

On the order for the introduction of a Bill to amend chap. 50 of 49 Victoria (North-west Territories Act),

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) having introduced a Bill to amend the North-west Territories Act, it will be unnecessary for me now to introduce this Bill, and I desire to have the order dropped.

Order dropped.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 117) to provide for the registration of cheese factories and creameries, and for the branding of dairy products, and to prohibit misrepresentation as to dates of manufacture of such products.—(Mr. Fisher.)

DISMISSAL OF MR. EDWARD AULT.

Mr. REID (for Mr. Broder) asked :

Why was Mr. Edward Ault dismissed as an assistant in the engineer's office at Morrisburg ? Was any charge preferred ? If so, by whom ? Was any investigation held ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Mr. Edward Ault was a time-keeper on the Williamsburg Canal, and was not holding a permanent office thereon. My instructions to the superintending engineer of the Williamsburg Canal were identical with those to the superintendent of the Welland Canal, and in accordance therewith, he was directed in reorganizing the staff of employees for the present year to select and retain in the service all of those who were well qualified and who had not made themselves obnoxious by taking an active part in the elections. I see no reason to doubt that Mr. Rubidge carried out my instructions, and I presume that the services of Mr. Edward Ault were dispensed with on the ground that Mr. Rubidge did not consider the interests of the service required that Mr. Ault should be continued in the employ.

DISMISSAL OF MR. A. B. ROBERTSON.

Mr. REID (for Mr. Broder) asked :

Why was A. B. Robertson dismissed from his position as lockmaster at the head of Williamsburg Canal ? Was there any investigation ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Mr. A. B. Robertson was not a permanent employee, nor was he dismissed as the result of any directions from the department having special reference to him. Mr. Rubidge received the same instructions as to the reorganization of his staff on the Morrisburg Canal as were given to the superintendent of the Welland Canal, and it is presumed acted upon such instructions. There were only two out of the nine persons employed on the Morrisburg Canal last year who were not employed for the current year, Mr. Robertson being one of them. Mr. Robertson believed that his tenure was a political one. The department, if Mr. Robertson so desires, would be willing to hold an investigation into the question as to whether the reports of his having purchased the position are well founded or otherwise.

ROBERT McMANUS.

Mr. ROGERS (for Mr. Davis, Saskatchewan) asked :

1. What information is in possession of the Government in regard to the character and record of Robert McManus and Mrs. McManus, late postmaster at Northfield, British Columbia ?

2. Was this Robert McManus a deserter from the English Army ?

3. Did he act as spy and informer in the Behring Sea arbitration against Great Britain ?

Mr. DAVIN.

4. Are there any papers on record in the possession of the Government giving the particulars as to the character and doings of said McManus and his said wife ?

5. If so, what is the nature of such particulars, and will the papers be placed upon the Table of the House ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). From papers in possession of the Government it appears that Robert McManus deserted from the Life Guards on the 25th day of September, 1869 ; that he came to Canada and enlisted in the 2nd Battalion or Quebec Rifles and accompanied the regiment to the Red River in September, 1870 ; that he deserted from that regiment ; that he made certain affidavits on behalf of the United States against Great Britain in connection with the Behring Sea arbitration. There are certain papers of a confidential nature in the possession of the Government to which it is not deemed proper here to make reference further than to say that they will be shown to any gentleman who is a member of Her Majesty's Privy Council.

THE TARIFF AND HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT.

Mr. TAYLOR (for Mr. Maclean) asked :

1. In drafting Tariff Resolution No. 15, now before the House, did the Government consider how its operation might be affected by the following clauses of Lord Ripon's despatch of June 28th, 1895 :—

" 34. While, however, Parliament has thus removed all legislative restrictions in the colonies, so far as Imperial legislation is concerned, it will be necessary, in order that Her Majesty's Government may be in a position to give effect to their responsibility for the international obligations of the Empire, and for the protection of its general interests, that any Bill passed by a colonial legislature providing for the imposition of differential duties should be reserved for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure, so as to allow full opportunity for its consideration from these points of view."

" 35. For this reason, and in order to prevent inconvenience, it will be desirable, if such duties are included in a general Tariff Bill, that a proviso should be added that they are not to come into force until Her Majesty's pleasure has been signified."

2. Is it the intention of the Government to attach a proviso to the Tariff Bill that Resolution 15 is not to go into force until Her Majesty's pleasure has been signified thereto ?

If not, why not ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The Government fully considered Lord Ripon's despatch. We are acting under the view that tariff resolution No. 15, now before the House, does not come within the class of measures referred to in the despatch.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) mean resolution No. 16 ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I took the number as it appeared in the question.

I see that it should be No. 16. We will allow this to stand as a correction.

RETIREMENT OF LT.-COL. GRAY.

Mr. KAULBACH (for Mr. Clarke) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to grant Lieut.-Col. Gray, late inspector of stores, the usual retiring allowance granted to staff officers on being retired, or on the abolition of the office held by them?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). It is not the intention of the department to grant to Lieut.-Col. Gray, late inspector of stores, the usual retiring allowance granted to staff officers on being retired, or on the abolition of the office held by them, as the position he held, for one year, was regarded as a sinecure.

THE NEW BANK NOTE COMPANY.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

1. Is Mr. Reid, of New York, who is now placing the machinery in the building for the new Bank Note Company at Ottawa, Mr. Geo. M. Reid, a son of Mr. Robert Reid, the collector of customs of London, Ontario?

2. Is Mr. Geo. M. Reid a member of the new Bank Note Company?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The Government have no information as to who is placing machinery in the building for the new Bank Note Company at Ottawa.

RAILWAY TO STANLEY BRIDGE.

Mr. POWELL asked :

1. Has the Government, or any member thereof, received any petition or petitions praying for the construction of a railway from the Prince Edward Island Railway to Stanley Bridge?

2. If so, (a) How many signatures are subscribed to such petition or petitions? and (b) Is it the intention of the Government to construct or aid in constructing such railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Department of Railways and Canals has not received any petitions since the present Government came into power asking for the construction of a railway from the Prince Edward Island Railway to Stanley Bridge.

JUDGE JONES, COUNTY OF BRANT.

Mr. BENNETT asked :

1. Has Judge Jones, of the County Court of the county of Brant, retired from such position?

2. If so, who has been appointed in his stead?

3. Has Judge Jones been allowed a pension or retiring allowance?

4. If so, what is the amount of such pension or retiring allowance?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Judge Jones has retired from the position which he occupied as judge for the county court of the county of Brant, and Mr. A. D. Hardy, of Brantford, has been appointed in his place. Judge Jones has been allowed a pension. The amount of the pension to which he was entitled and which he now receives, is $144.44 per month.

PATENTS FOR FENCES.

Mr. TAYLOR (for Mr. Sproule) asked :

1. How many patent rights have been granted that are now in force for fences with wire fastenings?

2. When and to whom were they granted, and when do they expire?

3. Does the Minister of Agriculture consider it in the interests of the agriculturists of the country to grant such patent rights?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). The following patents have been granted in Canada for farm fences and are still in force :

Pat. No.	Patentees.	Date.	Period Granted.
16,813	A. & A. J. Russell, expires 1898.....	May 5, 1883.....	15 years.

49,241	E. Litt.....	June 17, 1895.....	6 do
50,217	T. Stillaway.....	Oct. 9, 1895.....	6 do

In all, eighteen patents are now in force; 78 applications for patents for fences have been refused since January, 1891. In reply to the last part of the question, an opinion of this kind would have to be determined upon the merits of each particular patent. The ten and six years patents may or may not be renewed, consequently expiry dates cannot be given.

LAND GRANTS TO THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. LISTER asked :

How much of the land grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has been patented? Does the exemption from taxation on the land grant run from the date of patent for each parcel of land, or from the date of the Letters Patent incorporating the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and providing for land subvention?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I would like to let the first question stand. Information has been furnished to me by the department to answer the question, but I am not absolutely sure of its accuracy, and I wish to examine it more closely before the answer is given. As to the second part of the question, the exemption runs from the date when the patent issues.

POST OFFICE AT PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE.

Mr. TAYLOR (for Mr. Roche) asked :

1. What disposition has the Government made of the site purchased for a post office and public building in Portage la Prairie some three years ago?

2. If sold, how much was got for it, and to whom was it sold?

3. Has the purchase money been paid?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The site in question is still in the hands of the Government.

EQUIPAGE OF THE "DIANA."

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. The names, residence, duties assigned and salaries of all officers and men engaged to go by the "Diana" on the expedition to Hudson Bay?

2. The names and residence of all those not under pay who are permitted to accompany the expedition either as representatives, agents, passengers or otherwise?

3. The names, residence and salaries to be paid to the representatives of other governments, corporations or individuals?

4. Was the application of the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway Company to send Captain Bourke, R.N., as their representative on the expedition accepted by the Government? If so, does the Government know why Captain Bourke refused to go?

5. What offer did the Government make to Captain Bourke?

6. Did the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company apply to send a representative in the event of Admiral Markham declining to go?

7. If so, why did the Government not grant the application?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I am not able to give the hon. gentleman a complete list of the crew. Commander Wakeham is sending that forward. I think the first officer and the interpreter are missing from the list that I have in my hand, and the name of the carpenter appears to be missing. But as nearly as possible, with the information at present in the department, the names are here given. Commander Wakeham, in charge, and receives his present salary, with any gratuity the Governor in Council may subsequently decide to add. Dr. Macdonald holds the position of physician and meteorological officer at $100 per month. A Mr. Drinkwater is secretary and photographer, at $75 per month. Then the officers of the ship are Captain Whitely, whose salary does not appear to be placed here, I forget what it is fixed at. The others are given in the following list :

Name.	Capacity.	Advance.	Allotment due two months after sailing.
Jas. G. Joy.....	Mate .....	$ cts. 50 00	$ cts. 25 00
Alfred King.....	Boatswain .....	37 00	18 50

Mr. FISHER.

These sailors, whose names I have read, the engineers and the fireman, are all men who were selected in Newfoundland to form the equipage of the ship. 2. Dr. Bell and A. P. Low, of the Geological Survey, in charge of a staff accompany the expedition. The salaries of these officers and pay of the men are arranged for by the Department of the Interior. 3. James Fisher, Esq., Q.C., of Winnipeg, Manitoba, represents the Government of Manitoba and North-west Territories and the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway Company. No salary or remuneration has yet been settled upon. 4. Yes, the application was accepted, but not as the representative of that company. No; the company stated that Captain Bourke would be unable to accompany the expedition. 5. The Government merely accepted Captain Bourke in lieu of Admiral Markham. 6. Yes. 7. The Government were willing to accept either Admiral Markham or Captain Bourke, R.N., on the expedition because it was thought their great naval experience, and, in the case of Admiral Markham, his Arctic experience would have been of great service. They were not being permitted to accompany the expedition as representing any special company, but on account of their great experience. No other equally experienced person has been suggested to take their place. If any such had been suggested, the Government would have been willing to accept him, but it was not thought necessary to appoint any additional representatives unless they were possessed of qualifications such as those of Admiral Markham or Captain Bourke.

POSTMASTER OF HARTNEY, MAN.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. Has the postmaster of Hartney, Manitoba, been dismissed?
2. If so, why?
3. Were there any charges against J. H. Hartney?
4. If so, were the charges investigated?
5. Was any notice given to J. H. Hartney? If so, what notice?
6. Did the Postmaster General receive a petition from the residents praying that if J. H. Hartney was dismissed, S. H. Dickson should be appointed?
7. Was that petition signed by ninety-five per cent of those using the post office?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The late postmaster of Hartney, Manitoba, was dismissed upon charges made by the Hon. Clifford Sifton, testifying to the postmaster having been guilty of offensive political partisanship during the last election. The postmaster was given the usual official notice some time before the office was transferred to his successor. A petition was received by the department asking for the appointment of Mr. S. H. Dickson as postmaster, but the department is not able to state whether the number signing do or do not amount to the percentage mentioned in the question.

Mr. FOSTER. No. 4 has not been answered.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have answered the question.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg to call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that he did not answer question No. 4.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have answered the whole question.

Mr. FOSTER. That may be in your view.

Mr. SPEAKER. It lies in the judgment of the Minister.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I rise to a question of privilege. In the Manitoba "Free Press" the correspondent—and I believe the correspondent is the same as the correspondent for the "Globe" and "Witness," and in both papers there have been misstatements about myself under date of May 22nd, in correspondence dated 21st May from the gallery here, it is stated :

Mr. Davin explained how it came about that he did not divide the House on the question of free coal oil. His party had gone back on him. The Patrons gave him loyal support, and, under conditions like these, what could a man do?

This is what I said :

Mr. DAVIN. I have a notice of motion on the Orders, and I wish to explain to the House and to the country why I think it useless to move that motion. The motion is as to the duty on coal oil. I had, on the same Order paper, a notice respecting the duty on agricultural implements and other matters, and, when it came to the vote, those gentlemen in this House from whom I might have expected support, did not support me.

An hon. MEMBER. Name.

Mr. DAVIN. Is it necessary to name them? Why, they are known to fame already. But I will name them, seeing my hon. friend asks me to do so. One of them is the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). He certainly was bound to support me, because he had his constituency placarded with bills, "Vote for Richardson and free implements." And I suppose that when he goes back to his constituency, as go back he will within two or three months, he will have it placarded, "Vote for Richardson, who voted for keeping the duty on agricultural implements."

Now, I am not going to impugn the motives of these hon. gentlemen, my hon. friend from East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) and other gentlemen who came into this House professing Patronism. I have no right to do it. On the contrary, I assume that they have voted as they have done with the best of motives as they understand it and up to their lights. They seem to be under the impression that no good could come from a vote or for a motion if this voting were to be a minority; and I find that some newspapers that used to take an interest in these questions and used to advocate free implements, also take the view that a man should never bring forward a motion in this House if he is likely to be left in the minority.

Then I go on to mention some of the Patrons, among them the member for East Assiniboia and others, as hon. gentlemen whom I had expected would support motions such as I gave notice of, and who had risen and declared they would vote with the Government. There was therefore no use in dividing the House on the question of coal oil. I never said that my own party, which is the party on this side of the House, had gone back on me; on the contrary, what I said was that the very people mentioned in the despatch as supporting me were those who did not support me.

THE ALASKAN BOUNDARY.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) laid on the Table papers relating to the Alaskan boundary. He said: The leader of the Opposition a day or two ago asked that papers relating to this matter be laid on the Table. I have had prepared a copy of the convention to which the hon. gentleman referred, and the Order in Council which ratified that convention. If the hon. gentleman desires any further papers regarding this subject—the papers are very voluminous—I shall be happy to bring them down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What is the date of this arrangement?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The Order in Council was approved on 23rd January, 1897, immediately after it had been received here.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. DAVIN. I desire to ask the Postmaster General when he intends to bring down the evidence taken in the inquiry as to the postmaster at Northfield, B.C., moved for?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I will endeavour to bring the return down to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIN. The House will not sit to-morrow.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Then I cannot bring it down to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIN. You mean Friday.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Not on Friday—it is an unlucky day.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. DAVIN.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I desire to say a few words with respect to the amendment which the leader of the Opposition has proposed, and more particularly in connection with the speech which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has addressed to the committee with respect to this matter. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries made some rather pointed allusions to the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and among other things he ventured to suggest that some of his statements were absurd and that the speech was not in accordance with a statesmanlike policy. I venture to think with all deference to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, for whose ability I have the very highest regard, that the hon. Minister need not have travelled very far out of his own speech to find statements very much on the border line of absurdity; and so far as a statesmanlike speech is concerned, the remarks of the leader of the Opposition will compare most favourably with the speech the hon. Minister thought fit to address to the committee last evening. The hon. gentleman is a member of the Government which has seen fit to characterize itself as a business Government. Some of the hon. gentleman's friends have mistaken that expression, I believe, for that of a business-is-business Government; but we must assume that this is entirely a mistake, and that those hon. gentlemen are what they profess to be, a business Government. Well, what has this business Government done? This business Government has brought down a policy to the House; it has professed to be making a tariff which contains preferences in favour of the mother country, because although the tariff on the face of it is called reciprocal, from first to last the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite have referred to it as being in effect a preferential tariff in favour of the mother country. They have done that, and one would suppose that before doing it a business Government, at least, would have ascertained definitely whether such a measure as that would have the effect claimed for it by hon. gentlemen opposite, or whether it would have the effect suggested by the Opposition; but the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries last evening gave us alternative after alternative, if this is wrong why such and such is the case, if that is wrong such and such follows, and so on from one alternative to another, not placing the position of the Government on any sound principle which would commend itself to the judgment of the House.

The hon. gentleman said that the leader of the Opposition had retired from the position he had taken in the past in favour of preferential trade with England. I venture to say that if the speech of the leader of the Opposition impressed the hon. gentleman in that way, it impressed no other

hon. member in that way, because from first to last the speech was a vindication of the policy for which my hon. friend has laboured as assiduously and as earnestly in the past as any hon. gentleman in this House or out of it, either here or in the mother country. I did not understand the hon. leader of the Opposition to take back a single word he ever uttered in the past in favour of that policy, and I cannot realize how the mind of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) could have been so clouded as to cause him to assume, that the hon. leader of the Opposition had receded from the position he has taken in the past on this question. The speech of the hon. the leader of the Opposition was a plea in favour of a preferential tariff. It was an attempt, and a successful attempt, to show that this proposal of the Canadian Government is the very last means in the world to arrive at that happy consummation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to state as fairly as I can what I understood the hon. Minister of Marine to lay down as his view of the treaty and his view of applying to the German and Belgium treaties the construction which the Controller of Customs has already seen fit to adopt. In the first place, I understood the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) to argue, that the German treaty is not binding upon Canada, and if I am in error the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) will see fit to correct me. Now, that would depend upon the question as to whether the power which made this treaty with the German Zollverein was competent to make a treaty binding upon the whole Empire; and in the second place, it depends upon the consideration, as to whether or not the terms of that treaty do plainly set forth that it is to be binding not only upon Great Britain and Ireland but upon the British colonies. I do not understand that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) denies that Great Britain had power to bind the Empire by such a treaty. I believe that no member of this House who has made these matters a subject of investigation will venture to deny for a moment, that so long as the Imperial Government and the Imperial Parliament are supreme over the British possessions throughout the world, the power to make a treaty binding upon the whole Empire is possessed by the Imperial Government, and by it alone. If that be the case, let us turn for a moment to the treaty and observe what its provisions are. It provides first:

That the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty who dwell, either temporarily or permanently, in the states of the Zollverein, shall enjoy therein, in respect of the exercise of commerce and trades, the same rights, and be subjected to no higher or other taxes than the subjects of any third country, the most favoured in these respects.

That is followed by somewhat similar provisions with a reference to which I need not detain this House. The third article of the treaty I desire to refer to, because it is important in one respect of the argument which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) addressed to the House. It is:

That no other or higher duties shall be levied in the Zollverein on the exportation of any goods to the dominions and possessions of Her Britannic Majesty, nor in the dominions and possessions of Her Britannic Majesty on the exportation of any goods to the Zollverein, than are or may be levied on the exportation of the like goods to any third country, the most favoured in that respect.

The 5th article of the treaty provides:

That any favour, privilege or reduction in the tariff of duties of importation or exportation which either of the contracting parties may concede to any third power, shall be extended immediately and unconditionally to the other.

And the 7th article provides:

That the stipulations of the preceding articles 1 to 6 shall also be applied to the colonies and foreign possessions of Her Britannic Majesty. In those colonies and possessions, the produce of the states of the Zollverein shall not be subject to any higher or other import duties than the produce of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of any other country, of a like kind; nor shall the exportation from those colonies or possessions of the Zollverein be subject to any higher or other duties than the exportation to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

I shall not trouble the House with any reference to the Belgian treaty, because, so far as my argument is concerned, that treaty stands in exactly the same position as the German treaty. In view of these articles of the treaty, what is our position in Canada? We have it conceded that the Imperial power has a right to make a treaty binding upon Canada, and we have an express provision in that treaty, that it shall have effect in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, but that it shall also be applied to the colonies and foreign possessions of Her Britannic Majesty, and that in those colonies and possessions the produce of the states of the Zollverein shall not be subject to any higher or other import duties than the produce of the United Kingdom.

Let me ask, then: On what does my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) base his argument that this treaty is not binding upon Canada? I do not know that I was very well able to follow the argument of the hon. gentleman on that point, but I understand it to be principally this: that this treaty is not binding upon Canada because no legislation has been introduced into Canada for the purpose of ratifying it or carrying it out. That is what I understood him to say, and if I am wrong I wish he would correct me.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The hon. gentleman has correctly stated my position; if he inserts the word "Imperial" in addition—neither Imperial nor Canadian.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am very glad that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) has asked me to insert that word, because it gives point to the argument which I propose to make. I do not understand that any legislation was necessary in a case of this kind, and I believe that there has been no Imperial legislation with regard to this treaty, in so far as it relates to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) agrees with me in that, and if you carry out his argument to its legitimate extent, then, this treaty is not only not binding upon Canada, but it is not binding upon the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Does the hon. gentleman say that there is any distinction between the two?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Would my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) permit me, if this is to be a legal argument. The prohibitive clauses of the treaty apply to Canada alone and are not intended to apply, and do not apply to Great Britain.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend (Mr. Davies) shall not escape in that way because there is a prohibitory clause in the 3rd article of the treaty which says:

No other or higher duties shall be levied in the Zollverein on the exportation of any goods to the dominions and possessions of Her Britannic Majesty, nor in the dominions and possessions of Her Britannic Majesty, on the exportation of any goods to the Zollverein, than are or may be levied on the export of like goods to any third country, the most favoured in that respect.

If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) is right so far as article 7 is concerned, then the same result which he claims for Canada would obtain so far as the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland is concerned, in respect to the third article; because the third article contains a similar prohibition in respect to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to that which is contained in the 7th article in respect to the colonies and foreign possessions of Her Majesty. Therefore, the argument of my hon. friend drives him to this logical result: That the 3rd article of that treaty, although it has been in force for some thirty-five years is not now binding upon the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. That seems to be a most astonishing result of the position of this Government with respect to the binding effect of this treaty. I am bound to say that if there was anything in the contention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies), I think it would have occurred to the law officers of the Crown to whose mind this treaty has been present for the last thirty-five years.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am sure my hon. friend wants to put my position accurately on this point. If my hon. friend looks through the records, he will find that when the question was raised in the Imperial Parliament some years ago, the then Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, I think it was, stated that there was no necessity for Imperial legislation, as no action was contemplated by the Imperial Government which required legislative action.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). And nothing has occurred in Canada which requires legislative action, except this, that the Government of which my hon. friend is a member proposes now to pass a resolution, and upon that to frame an Act which, according to the construction put upon it by members of the Government who have spoken in this House, would result in a direct violation of this treaty, if it is binding upon Canada. That is the position of affairs, and no other, if the argument of my hon. friend is carried to its legitimate conclusion—a conclusion from which I think he, upon sober, second thought, would be the first to shrink. Now, my hon. friend has had before him for the last twenty or twenty-five years the utterances of Imperial and Canadian statesmen with regard to the binding effect of these treaties upon Canada. During all that time—if I am in error, my hon. friend will correct me—it has been conceded that these treaties do bind Canada. It has been taken for granted by statesmen who have spoken in the Parliament of England, and by Canadian statesmen and lawyers of the first rank who have spoken upon this question in this House. It has been taken for granted by gentlemen on the other side of the House who now occupy the Treasury benches. It was taken for granted in this House when the joint address of 1891 was passed; it was taken for granted when the French treaty was adopted in 1894; it was taken for granted, and so far as I am aware no man raised a dissenting voice, when the Act respecting commercial treaties was adopted in 1895; and during all these years no man has ventured to suggest, until my hon. friend spoke last night, that these treaties were not binding upon Canada. And why did they not suggest it? Simply, I submit, for the reasons I brought to the attention of the House a moment ago. The German treaty in its terms is binding upon Canada, and the power which contracted that treaty with the German Zollverein had power to make a treaty binding the whole Empire. These are the reasons, which I submit are sufficient to satisfy any gentleman who has given any attention to this subject, that the treaties are binding. Now, what argument does my hon. friend bring to the consideration of this subject other than what I have already suggested? In the first place, he quotes an article from the London "Times." I have as much respect as any gentleman for the editorial utterances of that paper; but I venture to think that my learned friend produces very poor authority in face of the utterances of

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Canadian and Imperial statesmen, and the law officers of the Crown of England, to the effect that I have already mentioned. The hon. gentleman referred to a cable despatch giving the views of Sir Charles Kennedy on this question. The views of Sir Charles Kennedy are very briefly and no doubt very imperfectly stated in this despatch; but so far as they are stated, I venture to think they do not commend themselves to the reasoning faculties of any gentleman in this House:

Sir Charles Kennedy said, that while on the surface the new preferential clause of the Canadian tariff appeared contrary to the Belgian and German treaties, the circumstances of the case were materially altered since those treaties were enacted.

In what respect have the circumstances of the case been changed? I am not aware of any respect, and the hon. gentleman did not see fit to inform the House. The only respect in which the circumstances have been changed, so far as I am aware, is the passing of a clause of the British North America Act, which possibly the hon. gentleman might have thought would afford some argument in his favour, but which he did not see fit to quote. The clause in question is section 132:

The Parliament and Government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada, or of any province thereof, as part of the British Empire, towards foreign countries, arising under treaties between the Empire and such foreign countries.

Now, I submit, and I have very strong authority to support my contention, that this section does not confer upon the Parliament of Canada any other or greater powers than those which were possessed by the legislatures of the different provinces previously to confederation. In support of that, I will refer to what is said in the second edition of "Parliamentary Government in the British Colonies," by Mr. Todd, at page 277. After quoting the clause I have just read, he says:

This clause of the Confederation Act embodied no new principle, but merely conferred upon the Dominion Government the powers formerly exercisable by the several provinces in Canada.

But my hon. friend proceeded further to state, and I mention it in connection with this point, that the British North America Act did effect some change in this respect. So far as I understand the British North America Act, no clause in it affects this matter except the clause I have mentioned, and the enactment of that clause did not in any way touch the question to which reference is made in this telegraphic despatch. Now, the same quotation, upon which the hon. gentleman depended for his argument to some extent, proceeds as follows:—

For instance, said Sir Charles, self-government has been conceded to Canada, including the power to regulate her own fiscal policy.

And the provinces had the same power before confederation, and did impose duties upon goods coming from the mother country, and upon goods coming from other countries:

Acting upon that power, Canada has prohibited the entrance of prison-made goods, an export favoured by Belgium and Germany.

The enactment referred to did not make any distinction between Germany and the rest of the world, including Great Britain, in this respect; they are all precisely in the same position under that statute. The rest of the report of Sir Charles Kennedy's address does not deal with this branch of the case, and I will leave it until I come to another branch of my hon. friend's argument, which I propose to deal with in a moment. That being the case, what is the position of Canada in respect of this treaty. As I have already said, the Imperial Government possesses the treaty-making power, and this treaty has, by express words, included Canada. How, then, does this question of legislation in Canada, to which my hon. friend has referred, touch the matter at all? It does not touch it at all, because up to this time there has been no need of any legislation in Canada with regard to that question. I concede that there may be a case in which it is necessary to supplement the provisions of a treaty by legislation, either Imperial or colonial. An extradition treaty, for instance, would require to be supplemented by provisions to enable the courts to deal with a criminal whose extradition is demanded. The Imperial Act of 1819 relating to the inshore fisheries was rendered necessary because it was desirable that the courts of the different provinces of Canada should be invested with the power to carry out the treaty of 1818 by making seizures of American vessels. In all such cases, it is necessary, desirable and right that the provisions of the treaty should be supplemented by legislation. But that does not at all touch the question, as to whether, between nation and nation, the treaty does affect the whole of the Empire or not. As between the Governments of England and Germany, this treaty became binding upon the entire British Empire, and any legislation, whether passed by the Imperial Parliament or the Canadian Parliament, in violation of the terms of the treaty would be a direct violation of the compact made by the parties to that treaty. The result of any such legislation, which the German Zollverein might consider in derogation of the rights conferred upon it by the treaty, would be a conflict between the two nations, which would, perhaps, end in war. And if the Canadian Parliament should see fit to pass an Act which conflicted with the terms of the treaty, the Imperial Government would no doubt feel bound to exercise the right it possesses of disallowing such legislation.

Another consideration suggests itself. For the past thirty or thirty-five years, British subjects, including Canadian citizens, have participated, so far as the treaty with the Zollverein is concerned, in the provisions of that treaty. Let us assume, for a moment, that my hon. friend is right in concluding that Canada had the option of being bound or not bound by that treaty, could Canada, after enjoying the rights conferred upon her by that treaty for so many years, in all fairness, claim now to take advantage of that portion of the treaty which confers benefits upon her and repudiate that portion which confers favours upon the Zollverein and imposes burdens upon Canada. Such a contention would be monstrous, and yet it is the legitimate conclusion to be derived from the speech made by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) last night. Does the hon. gentleman state that the citizens of Canada have not the rights in Germany conferred upon British subjects by that treaty? If we have enjoyed those rights for the past twenty-five years, is it competent now for the Parliament of Canada to pass legislation discriminating against the citizens of Germany by imposing upon the citizens of that country who are exporting goods into Canada higher duties than they would be entitled to pay under the terms of the treaty? Such a conclusion would be monstrous, and yet it is the conclusion to which we would be legitimately driven by the argument of the hon. gentleman.

So far as the authorities are concerned in support of the proposition that this treaty is binding upon Canada, I shall not weary the committee by reading them. The joint address of 1891, the utterances of Canadian and Imperial statesmen to which I have referred, the utterances of hon. gentlemen in this House in 1894 and 1895, Lord Ripon's despatch subsequent to the report of Lord Jersey at the Intercolonial conference, the report of Lord Jersey which contains the opinion of the law officers of the Crown—all these authorities, one after the other, have laid down the proposition, have taken it for granted in many cases, that this treaty is binding upon Canada. And all that my hon. friend has offered in support of the view which he alone and for the first time in the history of this country, has brought forward with regard to this treaty, is an editorial in the London "Times" and a brief, imperfect, report of an address of Sir Charles Kennedy. Well, if this question is to be decided by the weight of authority, there does not seem to be very much question about it. But, irrespective of the weight of authority, to which I have referred, I think, so far as my own apprehension of the case is concerned, I have made it abundantly plain that, conceding the propositions which, I understand the hon. gentleman does concede, and which he must concede, there can be no doubt, in fact, that this treaty is binding in every respect upon Canada and upon the inhabitants of this country.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Now, my hon. friend referred to a couple of other authorities, which, for the moment, I did not mention. He referred to the Duke of Newcastle's despatch in 1859. I have only to refer him, as to that, to the way the despatch is dealt with in the second edition of Todd, pages 229 and 230, already quoted by me. Sir Alexander Galt then took a certain stand respecting the fiscal policy of this country. He claimed that the people of this country had a right to control its own fiscal policy, even though it should be different from the fiscal policy of the mother country. That is a right that has long since been conceded. But the despatch in question did not deal with the question of the binding effect of an Imperial treaty upon Canada. The hon. gentleman also referred to the despatch of Lord Kimberley in 1872. I shall not weary the House with any extended reference to that, further than to say that it did not deal with this particular question, except in one portion of it, which the hon. gentleman did not see fit to read to this House; but which I will take the liberty of reading. The last clause of the despatch in question is as follows:—

But although for these reasons Her Majesty's Government might not feel justified in refusing to allow the colonists to adopt the policy which they think best for their own interests, they desire to point out that, in order to meet the views of the colonial governments, as expressed in the papers now before me, it would be necessary not only to repeal so much of "The Australian Colonies Government Act," 13 and 14 Vic., Chap. 59, as prevents the imposition of differential duties, but to exempt the colonies in question from the operation of any future commercial treaties which may be concluded by this country, containing stipulations against such duties, leaving them at liberty, subject to the obligations of existing treaties, to make such arrangements as they may think fit for reciprocity with each other or with foreign nations; and, before so serious a step is taken, they would ask the colonists gravely to consider the probable effects of a measure which might tend materially to affect the relations of the colonies to this country and to the rest of the Empire.

And so the view of Lord Kimberley is that if the colonies are to take the position that, so far as the making of treaties is concerned, the Imperial Government is not to be supreme, such a contention, if carried out by the colonies, if forced upon the home Government by the colonies, would have most serious results upon the relations between the colonies and the mother country. And such, undoubtedly, must be the result of the policy advocated by the hon. gentleman last evening. If, in the face of this treaty, which has been held by the home Government to be binding upon Canada, which has been held by her statesmen to be binding upon Canada, this Government sees fit to proceed with these resolutions and give them the interpretation put upon them by hon. gentlemen opposite, one of two results must follow—this country must repeal the legislation and retire from the position the Government is assuming or come in direct conflict with the Imperial Government on this point. In addition to that, I would like to point out that on page 272 of the work of Todd, to which I have referred, the following passage occurs, which I think is of great importance in this connection :—

Finally, it should be observed that the responsibility of determining what is the true construction of a treaty made by Her Majesty with any foreign power, must remain with the Imperial Government, who can alone decide how far Great Britain should insist upon the strict enforcement of treaty rights, whatever opinions may be entertained upon the subject in any colony specially concerned therein.

And so the hon. gentleman will see that it is not so much the opinions of the lawyers to whom he referred last night—members of the Government—for whose opinions I have every respect, but the opinions of the Imperial Government that must be considered. I should have supposed that the business Government of which my hon. friend is a member before bringing down this resolution, would have seen fit to consult the Imperial Government, whose opinion must be paramount on this subject, that they would not venture upon a step which may be regarded as a direct violation of treaty rights, without consulting the Imperial Government and ascertaining whether that Government would see fit to depart from the construction which the law officers of the Crown have so long placed upon these treaties so far as they relate to Canada.

I must apologize for detaining the House so long with respect to this matter, but I desire to make a short reference to the second branch of my hon. friend's argument. The hon. gentleman, so far as I understood him, said :—First, this treaty was not binding upon Canada ; second, if this treaty was originally binding upon the provinces, it did not become binding upon Canada, by reason of some provision, which he did not see fit to state to us, contained in the British North America Act ; third, if it was binding upon Canada notwithstanding the British North America Act, it is not binding upon Canada by reason of the fact that legislation has not been passed ; fourth, if I am wrong, he said, on all these, I take the position—and it seems a remarkable position for the Government to take after the declaration of the Finance Minister in bringing down the tariff—that this treaty does not discriminate against these countries, and, therefore, does not violate these treaties. Whether it amounts to a discrimination against these countries, it certainly does amount to a violation of these treaties. In what language is this resolution couched :

16. That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be entered for duty, or taken out of warehouse for consumption in Canada, at the reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff set forth in Schedule D.

The argument of the hon. gentleman, so far as I could follow it, amounted to this : He said, this resolution is not a violation of this treaty ; this, at all events is not a discrimination against these countries, because it contains or is coupled with a condition with which it is possible for these countries to comply. Well, is that the right which these countries have under the treaties ? The provisions of the treaty which I have read, do not say anything about conditions, but they give an absolute and unconditional right to the German Zollverein to have their goods admitted into Canada upon payment of the same duties as those levied upon goods from the mother country. My hon. friend says that this resolution, as interpreted by the Controller of Customs is not a violation of the treaty ; that it is not a discrimination, because the German Zollverein can fulfil the condition and so bring themselves within the terms of the resolution. I would put this case to my hon. friend. Suppose this resolution were in these terms : That goods from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland should be admitted at the lower rates of duty under schedule "D," and that goods from any other country whose tariff policy is made to accord with the tariff of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland should be admitted at the same rates of duty. In that case, would my hon. friend venture to say that the conditions of the treaty were not violated ? And will he venture to say that such a resolution is not exactly the same thing in principle and effect as the resolution that the Government have brought down ? They have brought down a resolution, which, in its terms, can apply at present only to the mother country, and possibly two or three other countries. They say that the German Zollverein has all its treaty rights under that resolution, because it can modify its tariff and make it the same as that of Great Britain, or, as the resolution says, "on the whole, as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to." What would be the difference between the two resolutions ? But you could reduce the matter to an absurdity by suggesting other conditions. Suppose the Government brought down a resolution that any country adopting the British constitution or the British mercantile law should be entitled to the benefits of the duties under schedule "D"—the offer of the lower tariff would be made upon a condition which any country could fulfil ; but it would smack of absurdity, as I think the hon. gentleman will himself admit to say that such a resolution fulfilled the treaty obligations. My hon. friend shakes his head; I suppose by way of dissent. I will repeat what I said before—that if you should put the resolution in the form of allowing advantages to Great Britain directly so long as the tariff of Great Britain remains as at present, if you should also provide that any other country with a tariff as low as that of Great Britain should be entitled to the benefits of schedule "D," that would be the same in principle as this resolution, as it is interpreted by the Government; and I think that no hon. gentleman who has given this matter any consideration at all would venture to say that such a resolution would not be a direct violation of the rights of the German Zollverein under this treaty.

Now, the hon. gentleman has one other point which, it seemed to me, was still less in accord with what we might expect from a business Government. The Government of this country saw fit to open the doors of the custom-house to British goods at a certain low rate of duty and to shut the doors of the custom-house to goods of the German Zollverein and of Belgium so far as the low rate of duty was concerned. And my hon. friend comes down to the House and says that this business Government, after having done that, have this consolation at least—that if they are wrong, probably Lord Salisbury will come to their rescue and denounce these treaties. Is it likely that the British Government, or the German Government, for that matter, would have their hands forced by the Government of this country in that way? Is it a proper way to obtain the denunciation of these treaties to pass a resolution which is in direct violation of these treaties—because the hon. gentleman, for the purpose of this portion of his argument, must admit that the passing of this resolution, as it has been interpreted by the Government, will be in direct violation of these treaty rights? According to him, then, the proper and statesmanlike way to deal with a great question like this is to bring in an Act which is in direct violation of treaty rights, of treaties solemnly made with the German Zollverein and Belgium, and then look to the mother country to denounce those treaties because this country has seen fit to pass a resolution in violation of them. I venture to say that that is not a statesmanlike way of settling this question, but that the better way, the statesmanlike way would have been to first definitely ascertain the position of this country with respect to these treaties, and to learn whether the views hitherto expressed by English statesmen and lawyers would be receded from by the British Government, before taking a step which may have more far-reaching consequences in the history of this country than any gentleman on the other side has hinted at.

So far as this branch of the case is concerned, I commend the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, to the very able speech made by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), a week or ten days ago in this House, which, to my mind, contained an unanswerable argument to show that this resolution, if acted upon in the spirit in which the Government say they propose to act upon it, will be a direct violation of those treaty rights. I was surprised that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in dealing with this question after a speech of that kind from this side of the House, did not venture to open his mouth to controvert a single argument which that hon. gentleman addressed to this House. I venture to say that those arguments have not been answered by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I venture to say that those arguments, which express my own ideas much better than I would have been able to express them myself, cannot be answered by that hon. gentleman, or any other hon. gentleman in this House, to the satisfaction of any person who applies a reasonable amount of diligence to the consideration of this question.

Now, Sir, if I have been right in the view which I have taken of this question so far, what becomes of the noble contribution which the Minister of Finance has made to Her Majesty in this her Jubilee year? What is this noble contribution? The noble contribution is this: That hon. gentlemen opposite, without taking the trouble, in an important matter of this kind, to ascertain whether they were right or wrong, have seen fit to take a step which can, to my mind, have only one of two results: Either it is bound to bring this country into direct conflict with the mother country on this point, or else it is bound to bring the mother country into direct conflict with Germany. One or the other of these results must follow.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Let us have it, then, and we will know where we stand.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend opposite says: Let us have it. I suppose the hon. gentleman thinks that it is a fitting contribution to Her Majesty in her Jubilee year, that we should either bring ourselves into direct conflict with the mother country on a question of this kind, or that we should so force the hand of the mother country by heedless and reckless legislation of this character, that she will be brought into direct conflict with Germany. Does the hon. gentleman mean either one or the other of those things? Is he serious in the suggestion which he has made? Does he desire that this country should be brought into direct conflict with the mother country on a question of this kind, or does he desire that Great Britain should have her hand forced in this matter so that she should be brought into direct conflict with Germany? If there is anything in the suggestion of my hon. friend, it means one or the other of those things; and I leave it to his own good sense to determine which of them he thinks would be most in the interest of this country and of the Empire as a whole. Sir, I yield to no man in my desire, consistently with the interests of Canada, of promoting preferential trade, but I think that the course which the Government has taken in this regard is not a course which is likely to promote that result. It would have been well, in this Jubilee year of Her Majesty, that some contribution of this kind should have been made, but hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have not seen fit to take a course which was likely to lead to that happy result. They have seen fit to take a course which is likely to lead to one or other of the results which I have referred to, and I do not think that they can be congratulated in adopting that course. I am most anxious that the trade of this country, so far as the interests of this country will permit, should be in the direction of the mother country and in the direction of other colonies of the Empire; and I agree with the view which my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has so often advocated, that it might be well in the interests of this country in the long run to make some sacrifices at first for that purpose. Possibly I would not go so far in that direction as my hon. friend; I would not like to see any of the great industries of this country cut down or shattered, or the bread taken out of the mouths of our workmen for that purpose. We might well make some amount of sacrifice for a purpose that would be in the interests of this country and of the Empire and that would well repay the sacrifice in the end; but to take the step contemplated by the Government, as I said before does not seem to be calculated to attain that result. Such a result might have been attained by further negotiations with the home Government for the purpose of obtaining a denunciation, either in whole or in part, of these treaties, negotiations tending to have the home Government deal with the question in a statesmanlike spirit and in the best interests of the Empire, negotiations which possibly, not this year, not next year, not immediately, would have that result, but negotiations which in the end would bring about what my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has so long fought for, preferential trade between Canada and England, preferential trade between England and the whole Empire.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not think for a moment that on a question of this kind and of such grave importance, hon. gentlemen representing the Government of Canada would allow the speech, the able, argumentative, and conclusive speech of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Borden), to remain unanswered. It does seem to me that hon. gentlemen opposite either do not perceive the gravity of the question which is now being determined by this House, or if they do perceive it, they are absolutely dumb, and unable to make an argument in favour of the policy which they have proposed.

You may search the records of government in this Parliament from 1867 to the present and you will not find any instance when a question of the greatest importance, involving a generic and absolute change in the administration of affairs by this Parliament has been proposed by a Government, has been combatted by an Opposition, when the Government has not had the courage or the ability to put their side of the case before the House and the country. If hon. gentlemen think they can take refuge in craven silence against arguments like these, if they think that the force of their mechanical majority can win the day, hon. gentlemen must remember that in this country reason is to-day stronger than brute force, and argument counts for more than a solid vote in this Parliament. I call on hon. gentlemen opposite as Liberals, as they profess to be, to answer this one question: Is it a light thing that in this year of grace 1897, men who have declared, through the mouthpiece of their leader, that they are Liberals of the old English school, should propose to shear this Parliament of one of its greatest and best rights, the right of saying what shall be the taxes levied on the people, and what shall be the revenues that this country shall derive from which to pay its public expenditures? Yet to-day this resolution is put before this House by Liberals of the old Liberal school, to denude Parliament of its right to say from year to year and from time to time what shall be the tariff conditions which shall prevail between this country and every other country in the wide world. Sir, if this resolution passes and the Government get this power, the Government are in a position, through the will of the Controller of Customs, to make a commercial treaty at any hour of any day with any country, and this Parliament has nothing to say about it. I say, as one member of this Parliament, I refuse to sit still and allow a measure of that kind to be carried without entering my earnest protest against it, and I do not hesitate one single moment to say this, that if a Liberal-Conservative Government had proposed a departure of this kind, the Liberals would have raised the country; their organs, their speakers, their men from one end of the country to the other would have let loose the dogs of war and would have protested to the very strongest and very bitterest end against this denudation of the power of Parliament. I wish to press that opinion strongly. The argument upon the merits of the case as regards the treaty has been ably sustained on this side of the House, and has not been met, and I venture to say, cannot be met by hon. gentlemen opposite. I say cannot be met. They have themselves shown the white feather. When they came down with this tariff a month ago, their brave leader, who is not in his seat to-day, declared in the face of this Parliament and the country that they did not intend, as they were not bound to do, to give one-eighth or one-fourth remission of duties to Germany or Belgium, or any nation which had a most-favoured treaty with Great Britain. They declared that by the words of the resolution. A month's cogitation leads to a change. They have now come down with another tariff. It takes away all the certainty and definiteness of their former position, for it contains a clause to enable the Government to admit Germany and Belgium and all nations having the most-favoured-nation treaties with Great Britain. Why was that clause put in? Because the element of strength which hon. gentlemen opposite supposed they possessed a month ago, they do not now possess. Looking to the near future they dare not go one step further with this legislation without giving themselves a chance to crawl out of the position they had assumed with respect to Imperial treaties. If hon. gentlemen had the courage of their convictions they would have inserted in the tariff clause just so much as they declared to be the opinion of the Government in the matter, but the very moment they introduce this clause which enables them to open the door by Order in Council to every one of the most-favoured nations, that very moment they recede from their position and acknowledge the weakness of their position. So on that point the argument is against hon. members on the Government side of the House, and the conclusion is against them forced by their own introduction of this clause. Yet they stand up behind their own admission and declare: true we have admitted it, but we do not believe it is true; true we have unlocked the door, but we do not believe we ought to have done so or ever will open the door; true, we have acknowledged that these treaties may have something to do with Canada, because we see them looming up before us and we have provided a means of escape, but, at the same time, we do not intend that there shall be any escape or any necessity for escape. My hon. friends to-day by the terms of their tariff have opened up 25 per cent reduction to nine-tenths of the great manufacturing countries of the world; and yet they stand up like school boys and declare that this is preferential trade in which Great Britain alone is favoured. They say Great Britain alone is the favoured one, when Germany and Belgium are to-day knocking at the door; when hon. gentlemen opposite have themselves inserted the key which is to open the door, and put it into the lock by means of section b of the tariff clauses which have been brought down after a month's deliberation. There is no need for hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to press this question further, but there is this other question to be pressed. As a Liberal-Conservative, who is in favour of adequate protection to the industries of Canada, I am not going to sit still and see a horizontal cut of 25 per cent in duties opened up to other countries competing with us, Belgium, Germany and France and twenty or thirty other countries as well as the mother country. As a consistent protectionist I cannot do it, and I do not propose to do it, and I do not propose that hon. gentlemen opposite shall go forth in this country and masquerade in a garment cut as if it were staid preferential trade hue, when it is a garment of twenty-one colours or more, and when every country having a most-favoured-nation treaty can use it and also other nations provided their tariffs equally fulfil the conditions. Mr. Chairman, you have heard the debate on this resolution, a new thing introduced by a new Government, and I ask you if you are aware that a single moment has been given by the Government to explain what it really means, or how it is to be carried out. Who in this House knows to-day? I doubt if the Ministers themselves know; but so far as any explanation is concerned, no one of their followers and no one in the country knows what it means. I ask the Controller of Customs to-day before he invites Parliament to pass this resolution to explain the methods of its operation. He is to be the great arbiter. Imperial treaties are nothing. What Germany and the mother country agreed upon and settled by a definite and sanctioned by an absolute treaty amounts to nothing; a new condition is to be interposed by a colony, and that condition is to be interpreted by a gentleman in the Canadian Government who is not even a member of the Cabinet. Now, I ask the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson), before he expects us to vote upon the question; I ask him to explain how he proposes to carry out that resolution? There is a country across the sea by the name of China; an immense empire with 400,000,000, and does he (Mr. Paterson) know, or does he not, that if you to-day take the average tariff of China, it is lower than the reciprocal tariff which he proposes. Is he going to say to this Parliament, so that Parliament may vote with its eyes open: that the great Chinese Empire will have, first by one-eighth, and afterwards by one-fourth of a reduction on the duties an open door into the Dominion of Canada for anything that it may produce and that Canada may wish to buy. Is the condition to be interpreted by a general average of the tariff as a whole, as compared with the average reciprocal tariff of Canada as a whole, or is it to be conditioned upon the average tariff upon selected articles; or in what way?

Or, is it to be simply conditioned upon the will or the whim of the Controller of Customs for the time being. I have never yet seen an important proposition like this put before a business Parliament with such an utter lack of definiteness and knowledge as to how it is to be carried out, as this proposition has been put before us. Is there any Minister in the Government who can explain it? Is there any man amongst these business men who can stand upon his legs and tell us what this means? Are they all struck dumb, or has incapacity brooded over them until it has reduced them to a state of utter and craven silence in the matter? Have they no word of explanation for an intelligent Parliament? Do they expect us to vote without knowing the machine that we are placing in their hands? Again, I ask the Controller of Customs: Is this in each case to be decided by his own will and his own whim, or is there a definite method upon which it is to be based? If there is a definite method, in the name of all that is parliamentary let him give us that definite method before he asks us to vote. Am I asking too much? Sir, I am asking nothing too much. I am asking what, if hon. gentlemen deny this Parliament, and put their measure through simply with their majority—I am asking what will be their strongest condemnation amongst business men and intelligent men this wide country over.

Now, Sir, I go to another point. There is not only the indefiniteness of that proposition, and not only the extremely vague nature of what these conditions may be, but I come again to this essential point: How is this proposition to affect the industries of this country? Granted that all those most-favoured treaty nations may come in; granted, Sir, that these countries which are not under these treaties, but which fulfil the condition of having a tariff on an average equal to, in point of vantage, this reciprocity schedule; granted that they can come in; taking in Japan, taking in China, taking in many other countries in the world under that condition; granted that, Sir, I want to ask hon. gentlemen who sit on both sides of this House, who are protectionists in their hearts, who are protectionists from party affiliations and on party principles so far as Liberal-Conservatives go, who were protectionists during the whole fight which culminated in the elections of June, 1896, and who in every district in this country went to manufacturers upon the Liberal side, and told them, "vote for us, we are not going to destroy the industries of this country;" to that class of men I appeal. Sir, there are to-day sitting in this House men connected with industries in this country, who have Liberals and Conservatives as promoters of these industries, and as regards which industries the Liberal leaders gave assurances to the Liberal promoters of these industries that if they would vote for them and stick to the Liberal party, their industries should not be put in jeopardy or danger. Hon. gentlemen cannot deny it from the top of the Government down to the very lowest peg in the Government support. I appeal to those who believe in keeping the industries of this country for Canadians, under what is a fair and adequate protection; I appeal to them, whether or not they are willing to allow countries with the cheapest labour in the world to come in at a reduction of 25 per cent in the duties which are placed in favour of goods manufactured in Canada, and to have open access to Canadian markets, to compete with Canadian labour and with Canadian capital on the basis of higher cost of capital and of infinitely higher wages for labour itself. But, Sir, I go from that which is an important consideration: I go to a higher consideration still, and that is this: That we are asked by this legislation to make of ourselves not a Parliament, but a dumb show. So far as the tariff of this country is concerned, for five years, if this Government remains and for twenty-five years if the same Government remains and the same conditions exist, commercial treaties can be made with every country in the world, now with one and now with another, involving the very greatest changes in the conditions of trade and of industry in this country, and Parliament will not be asked to, and Parliament will not have the right to open its mouth with reference to them. Is this Parliament willing to abrogate its functions in that way? Have we sunk so low in this year 1897 that we are going to give thirteen Grit men in this country the power to make commercial treaties for us, and to arrange our tariffs for years to come? Why, Sir, the wonderful thing is that any thirteen Grit men would have the cheek and the gall to ask such a thing. If any hon. gentleman thinks for a moment of the history of the growth of responsible government, does he not know that one of the basic powers of Parliament, obtained through a series of the greatest struggles in the country, was the power of Parliament to set its tariff views, and so regulate what should be the revenues of government. That is the function of the lower House of Parliament. So great a function of Parliament is it, so great a function of the Commons is it, that the powers of the Lords in Great Britain and the powers of the Senate in this country are very greatly shorn with reference to that branch of legislation. It is made a predominant prerogative of the Commons both in England and in Canada, and in every constitutionally governed British country.

Yet, to-day we are asked to relegate to a chance Cabinet our right of declaring whether we shall have a commercial treaty with any country, and upon what terms; and to entirely substitute that Cabinet for the voice of Parliament. Can we trust them?

Can the country trust them? Go back to 1891. Is there a man amongst them on that side who, in 1891, was not trailing along after the colours of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States and discrimination against Canada?

No, Sir, and their leader, who does not sit in the place where the leader's master just now does sit—their leader, who does not sit there, declared that not for one year, but for many years, they were going to follow that line of battle until they got what they were after. Are they wiser to-day than they were then? They are more powerful; they are no wiser. From 1891 till now they have not grown, Sir, in the appreciation of this country. I will tell you what they have done; they have got power under false pretenses. They have shown themselves, from the lowest to the highest, capable of swallowing themselves whenever they have thought it best for their party interests. These same kaleidoscopic gentlemen, who can turn on the colours at any hour of the day, and swallow themselves in a great final act at any time they choose, are capable of swallowing themselves on this occasion and making still another change. There sit men on that side of the House who would love nothing more dearly than to make a commercial treaty with the United States on the lines of their policy of 1891. Give them this power, absolve this House from its functions, go to your interim work, and the members of this House may come back to the next session of Parliament and find that unrestricted reciprocity with the United States has been brought about by the authority of the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson), backed up by the Cabinet of thirteen, who make up their minds upon his opinion. Why, Sir, there is not a country in the world whose goods they cannot admit into Canada on whatever they think is a fair condition; for there is nothing at all to bind them to any definite condition. If the Controller of Customs were to say to-morrow, "If the United States will give us free fish and free fishing, or two or three other concessions, we will consider that that act puts them on the ground of advantage, which will make it for the advantage of Canada to admit them under this clause;" and these hon. gentlemen could legally do it. They are bound by no conditions. There is no programme, no process, set forth. This is a blank resolution, which leaves it simply to their own will to fill up and to put into governmental and executive form, as to what country shall have these advantages, and what not. Now, Sir, I proceed to a still higher consideration. Hon. gentlemen opposite have for the last twelve years agitated in this Parliament for the power for Canada to make her own commercial treaties independent of the mother country. From Mr. Blake's time down they have proposed resolution after resolution, they have argued for it, they have declared that Canada should have that right. The contention on this side of the House has been that so long as Canada is a dependency of the British Empire, the Imperial power must have the paramount and absolute right to make treaties. But that absolute and paramount right is not arbitrarily carried out; for Great Britain to-day enters into and concludes no treaty with reference to Canada without inviting the co-operation of Canada in the negotiation, or without inviting the consent of Canada to the instrument after it is negotiated. She is a wise mother and a gentle mother, but she is still the mother of this country; and so long as we are children, she must be the mother, and we must pay filial obedience to her in that respect. These hon. gentlemen have declared for the right of making commercial treaties without reference to Great Britain. They have been defeated on every occasion. These brave and straightforward fighters, when they are unable to carry their point by placing it fairly and squarely before Parliament and the country, seek to smuggle it in under a clause of the tariff—a place where I take the liberty of saying no great and high-minded Government would place a measure of that gravity and that importance; to cover it up between the clauses of a tariff Act, which imposes certain disabilities as regards the function of parliamentary endorsement. Why did not these gentlemen come out under their full colours; and if they wanted to have independent treaty-making powers, which means independent powers as a country and a Government in the long run, why did they not come out and say so in the open? Why did they smuggle in this great power between two tariff resolutions, and bind it up in the general tariff conditions of the country, so as to prevent free and proper inquiry and action by the combined legislature of the country? But more than that: has Britain no Imperial obligations? Has she no treaties to-day? If a colony were to get the treaty-making power absolutely and fully under the guise of a tariff Act, and were to exercise that power, what would be the result if a complication should arise between Great Britain and the sovereign powers with whom she has treated? She is either a sovereign power, or she is not. When she stands side by side with Germany, Germany does not see Canada or Australasia, or Cape Colony or the Dependency of India. What Germany sees is the Queen and Parliament and Government of Great Britain, and them alone; and when the Queen and Parliament and Government of Great Britain make a solemn treaty with Germany, they are to carry out that treaty to the very last letter, loyally and truly, or lose their prestige as a great power, or, what is worse, become involved in possible complications which may have the direst and gravest consequences, not only in the matter of trade, but in the matter of national existence as well. So, I say, give this power to these gentlemen, and they can make a treaty of commerce with any power under the sun without any reference to Great Britain's treaty obligations at all. That is the gravest point of all in connection with this matter. Sir, I am not going to multiply words. I rose simply to call the attention of the country, and I have done it, to the fact that hon. gentlemen are proposing a complete revolution in parliamentary methods, and that they cannot explain and defend their resolution on good and arguable grounds; that they are asking, under the cover of what they wrongfully declare to be preference for Great Britain, for power to open Canada to a competition from almost every country in the world; that they are doing that not upon any well-defined line or method of procedure, but simply on the will of men who form the Government of Canada for the time being; that under this, they propose to get the actual, the virtual right to make a commercial treaty with any foreign country as well as with any dependency of Great Britain, and to make that treaty entirely without the control and without the overshadowing influence of the Imperial treaties which Great Britain has existent to-day. They ask Parliament to consent to this and thus consent to the utter abnegation of the duties of Parliament and the highest and dearest privileges of Parliament. Sir, we appeal first to hon. gentlemen opposite and this House, and then from hon. gentlemen opposite and this House we carry our appeal to the country, and we are confident that we have the right side of this question. We are confident that we are standing up for the privileges of Parliament, for the sanctity of Imperial treaties, for the best industrial interests of this country, when we oppose a resolution which proposes by such a drastic method as this to take away the power of Parliament and to tread to the very verge of excessive danger, a path upon which no true British or Canadian citizen should in this Jubilee year wish to enter.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. I would be glad to avoid wearying the House, but I rise just to say a word or two because I feel that a preferential duty on British goods is a direct violation of the principle of protection. I would certainly not give, unless for a very material consideration, any advantage to either the workmen or the manufacturers of Great Britain, or, for that matter, to the workmen or manufacturers of any country in the world. This preferential consideration will not, however, weigh heavily upon the Government, which looks upon protection as an expedient and not as a principle. I am not willing, on the contrary I am most unwilling, that British manufacturers should have the money that Canadian manufacturers need. While, therefore, I came here pledged to support the Conservative trade policy, feeling that even its line, in this particular, is beyond my limit, I prefer choosing the lesser of the two evils and will vote for the amendment now before the committee. I hope that hon. gentlemen on this side may be mistaken in their opinion that Canada must give to the manufacturers of Germany and Belgium the preference which this Government proposes to extend to the manufacturers of Great Britain. As a matter of law, it is argued that Germany and Belgium can claim this preference; but I hope and believe that, as a matter of principle, neither Germany nor Belgium will get this preference. It is all right to say that this preference goes so far as a matter of law, but as a matter of practice it should only go so far as the Government will let it go. There is something more sacred, yes, more important than even the principle of protection, involved in the claims of Germany and Belgium for preferential treatment; and as a Canadian I hope that the Government will stand firm. If Germany or Belgium complain through the British Government, I trust that this Government, through the same medium, will return the answer, that Canada intends to administer her own customs laws without any advice from Berlin or from Brussels, or for that matter, from Downing Street.

Mr. CRAIG. From the evident and unconcealed desire of hon. gentlemen opposite to close this discussion and prevent, if possible, debate on this preferential arrangement by their policy of silence, it is clear they regard the proposition as one that cannot stand very much light. I thought myself that the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) was rather apologetic yesterday in his remarks on this preferential arrangement, and I fancy that hon. members on the other side feel convinced, after reading the speech of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries last night, that the less said about it on their side the better. At any rate they are endeavouring to carry out their policy of silence. It looks indeed like a conspiracy of silence. I am sure that some hon. gentlemen opposite would like to speak on this question. I have seen one or two, one particularly, taking notes and apparently ready for the debate, but the order seems to have gone forth to say no more, and the desire of the Government seems to be to rush this thing through and give the country as little information as possible about it. While, Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to detain the House, this resolution, which is one of the most important questions that has occupied our attention for years, involving the most important interests, is one which it seems to me we ought not to dispose of as we would an ordinary resolution of no particular importance, and therefore I propose to state some of the reasons why I am opposed to it. In the first place, I am opposed to it because it is most indefinite. Let me read it for the benefit of the House:

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to, are to the countries to which it may apply,—

In my opinion, nothing could be more indefinite. No amount is fixed, no percentage is taken, but it says: "Terms which, on the whole, are as favourable"—I do not see how anything could be more indefinite. I can imagine a resolution framed, declaring that when the tariff of other countries was not above 15 per cent or 20 per cent or 10 per cent against this country, we were willing to allow them to enter their goods at the preferential rates, but instead of that we find the most indefinite arrangement conceivable. It is sufficiently indefinite without the words "on the whole." The words "on terms which are as favourable to Canada"—who is to interpret that?—are indefinite enough, in all conscience, but when you add the words "on the whole," any possible definiteness is taken away.

I object to this resolution, not only because it is indefinite, but because it is arbitrary. I feel, in speaking on this resolution, that I am addressing myself to hon. gentlemen opposite in the hope that I may possibly convert some of them. I do not know if that is a vain hope or not. But I hope their minds are not made up without hearing discussion at all. I hope they are not so hidebound in the party affiliations that they are not willing to listen to any reasons at all upon this question. I want to address myself to members on the other side, and especially to members who have come here calling themselves independent. I hope they are independent and will listen to arguments with an independent mind; and I hope to be able to give them some reasons for voting against the resolution, and in favour of the amendment.

I object to this resolution, not only because it is indefinite, but because it is arbitrary. As I have said, there is no standard in it; the matter is to be left entirely to the Controller of Customs. I was very much amused last night at a remark made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies). He said that Germany and Belgium could come within the resolution by conforming with its requirements. But what are those requirements? And how are these countries to know? They do not ask to know, because they claim to come in under the existing treaties. But suppose they have not this right and ask on what terms they can come in, what will be the answer? They will be told: Go and see the Controller of Customs; if he says you can come in, you can come in, but if he says you must stay out, why, stay out. When the question was asked in the first place whether Belgium and Germany could come in, hon. gentlemen opposite said that the Controller of Customs had decided that these countries could not come in. On what ground has he decided that? I do not think he has investigated their tariffs. I do not think there ever was a more arbitrary provision put on the Statute-book than this under which it is proposed to leave treaty-making and tariff arrangements of the country in the hands of the Controller of Customs. How is he to be guided? I think he himself will be puzzled to know. Shall Japan come in? That country has a low tariff. He has no means of judging whether she is legally entitled to come in or not, but he gets over the whole difficulty by simply saying: I have decided. The resolution is so indefinite that his decision is simply arbitrary. I object to a resolution leaving in the hands of the Controller of Customs the power to say to one country: Come in under the low tariff, and to another: Stay out.

But I object to this resolution for another reason, and that is that it is dangerous. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) has elaborated that point. He has shown how dangerous it is to take out of the hands of Parliament the power of making treaties, for that is what this resolution virtually amounts to, and conferring that power upon the Controller of Customs. I hold that a more dangerous proposition never was placed before Parliament. Is it to be supposed that this Parliament is to pass such a resolution, allowing the Government to make treaties with Germany, Japan, China or any other country? They may make a treaty with the United States, and we would have nothing to say, because we will have handed over all our powers in the matter. The United States may make an offer to the Controller of Customs. Is he obliged to communicate it to Parliament before it is confirmed? Not at all. The Government may say: We think that this complies with the terms of the resolution, and so they may allow the United States to come in. There might be differences of opinion in the Cabinet itself, and in that case, I suppose, the Controller of Customs would be the arbiter. I am surprised that the Government should place before the House a proposition to take out of the hands of Parliament power to make treaties and hand it over to the Controller of Customs and the members of the Government. I think that is taking a long step backwards. We call ourselves a free people. We here call ourselves an independent Parliament. But if we are prepared to accept such a proposition as this, we deserve to have a Government that will demand that we shall yield them still further powers. If we are prepared to abdicate our independence and leave to the Government the power to make treaties practically on their own terms, they may send delegates to Washington, as delegates have been sent to Washington before, and negotiate a treaty without any need to come to us for confirmation. Suppose that when the delegates went to Washington they were asked what their powers were. They could reply: We have absolute powers; here is the resolution passed in the House of Commons. I can imagine representatives of the United States learning of such a thing. They would think it very strange that any Parliament should give such treaty-making powers to its representatives. If this Parliament votes, as I am a little afraid they will vote, to give the Government such powers as this, I do not know what will be thought of us.

I have another objection to this resolution. Not only is it arbitrary, indefinite and dangerous, but it is deceptive as well. When the Government placed it before this Parliament it was pretended to us and to the country that it was a proposal to give preferential trade to Great Britain. And I must say that that seemed a very good stroke of policy at the time, and a great many people in the country were carried away with the idea. In this Jubilee year, it was thought a good thing for Canada to say to the mother country: We make you an offer of preferential trade. Some people have been very much surprised when I told them that Great Britain was not mentioned in this resolution at all. But Great Britain is not mentioned in it, though we are told that it is intended as an offer of preferential trade to Great Britain. That is why I call it a deceptive resolution. The Finance Minister was very positive at first in stating that Germany and Belgium were not included under this resolution and would not come in under the arrangement. But what does he say now? He says: Well, perhaps Germany and Belgium may come in under this arrangement; we do not claim to know all about it; we did claim a little while ago to know all about it; but we are afraid to claim that now, and Germany and Belgium may come in, so we will add another clause, "b":

That the Governor in Council may extend the benefit of such reciprocal tariff to any country which may be entitled thereto by virtue of any treaty with Her Majesty.

Now, the point I wish to make is this—that while the Finance Minister at first was positive that Germany and Belgium would not come in under this arrangement, he is not positive to-day. I come to the conclusion that if the Finance Minister says it is possible they may come in, he has found out that they can come in. The Government are letting themselves down easy. After a while it will be admitted that they must come in. This little clause "b" is put in to empower the Government to extend the benefit of this arrangement to Germany, Belgium and other countries. I am inclined to think that this was intended to humbug the people of the country. The Government were placed in an awkward position. On the one hand they had to please the manufacturers, and on the other hand, they had to please the farmers, particularly those farmers who are free traders. They did not alter the main tariff very much, but left that as it was under the National Policy. In the changes they have just made they have restored duties almost to what they were under the tariff of the late Government. In many cases they have restored complete protection. Now this would not do at all with their free trade followers, and what do they say? They say to the manufacturers: Look at our tariff, it is all right, we have made it all right for you. The Premier, in going through the country, said: We won't injure you, we are not going to injure the manufacturers of this country. And it was very laughable to hear the Minister of Public Works in this House on one occasion say: Why, we are not a lot of fools about this tariff. He meant to say: We are not going to destroy the industries of this country; people have said that we were going to be consistent and carry out our pledges, but we are not going to carry out our pledges at all. I suppose the man who carries out his pledges is a fool, after all, and so we are not going to be fools, we are not going to carry out the pledge that we made to the farmers in order to get into power, we are not going to be free trade in any respect, we are not going to take the duty off agricultural implements, or reduce it on manufactured goods, except in a slight measure. They said that to the manufacturers of the country and to the workingmen of this country. But what did they say to the farmers who were expecting free trade? They turned round and said to them: Well, that is all right, but by this preferential clause the duties will be reduced at once one-eighth on goods coming from Great Britain, and 25 per cent or one-fourth in the course of a year; and not only on goods coming from Great Britain, but we are able to make such arrangements that if any country in the world, if the United States desire to come in, they can come in. The Montreal "Witness" had a very strong article on this point in which it said: It will never do to give this preferential arrangement to foreigners like the Germans or Belgians and deny it to our fellow-kinsmen in the United States; and the "Witness" hoped that they would come in in a short time. And so they were able to say to all free traders in this House—when I say free traders, of course, I mean not actual free traders, but men who want the tariff reduced—they say to them: Well, we had to make this protective tariff in order to keep our promises to the manufacturers, promises which were made to them quietly, yet you will find out that after all we are going to keep our promises to you also by this preferential tariff, we are going to reduce the tariff after a while 25 per cent, and if you will only have a little patience you will find that, as has been said by some of the western members of this House, we are going to reduce the tariff by instalments until we get where the free traders want. So I say this resolution is deceptive on the face of it. It pretends, though not so strongly, to a preferential arrangement in favour of Great Britain, while actually it does not do so at all. Now, I go further, I object to this resolution not only for the reasons that I have mentioned, but because I hold it is injurious to the interests of this country: I hold it is most injurious to our manufacturing interests. And, Sir, I go further than that, I hold that anything that injures the manufacturers of this country injures the workingmen of this country, and not only injures the workingmen, but injures the farmers of this country. Why, it is very well to be voting money for cold storage to carry our produce to the workingmen of Great Britain; but, Sir, is it a consistent thing to be doing that, to be giving money for cold storage to carry these products to distant countries, and at the same time to be destroying the industries which employ workingmen who are a home market for our farmers? I maintain, whatever may be said to the contrary, that the best market is the home market. The farmer does not need any cold storage to get his butter, to get his eggs, to get his cheese to the workingmen of this country, he takes them to their doors almost without any trouble at all, and I maintain he gets better prices for them. His goods do not have to pass through two or three hands. So I maintain that this resolution is injurious because it will injure the manufacturing industries of this country, and in doing so, will injure the workingmen of this country. I agree with what has been said by the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson). I myself am not in favour of reducing the tariff to any country to the injury of our own workingmen. Why, Sir, they talk about loyalty. Well, Sir, I am loyal to Canada, and I hold that in being loyal to Canada I am loyal to the Empire. Is not Canada a part of the Empire? Are not the workingmen of this country a part of the Empire? Are we going to look upon ourselves as foreigners? Why, Sir, many of us are Englishmen, or Scotchmen, or Irishmen, we are part of the Empire. Many of our ancestors, and some of us ourselves, have come from England to this country—not to build up a foreign country, but to build up a greater England in this country. We are part of the Empire, and I hold that it is preposterous to talk about injuring one part of the Empire, injuring the workingmen of one part of the Empire, in order to benefit the workingmen of another part of the Empire. Sir, what with steamship communication and telegraph lines, the world is becoming gradually smaller. While not many years ago we might have looked on Great Britain as a long way off, the Empire to-day is being consolidated by fast Atlantic lines, by cables running under the ocean, and we are becoming not only one nation in name, but one nation in reality. So I hold that when I am loyal to Canada I am loyal to the Empire; I hold that Canada is not a mean part of the Empire. Why, Sir, it is absurd to talk about loyalty and then to turn around and say that we are going to injure the workingmen of this country in order to benefit the workingmen of Great Britain. I am loyal to Great Britain; I am proud of Great Britain, as we all are. I am proud of her history, and what she has done in the past. I am proud of her to-day. Her policy to-day is free trade because it suits her best; our policy is moderate protection because it suits us best; and I maintain that if the statesmen who rule Great Britain were in Canada to-day, they would be found alongside the Conservative party advocating moderate protection for a country situated as we are. I do not take any stock in theories, either of protection or of free trade. I look at these matters in a common-sense and business-like way. I want to do what is best to build up the country, and I hold that this resolution is injurious to our manufactures and I oppose it on that ground. But, Sir, if I am disposed to withhold these favours from Great Britain because we are part of the Empire, what should I say of the proposition that we should give this reduction to Germany, to Belgium, and to twenty other countries scattered over Europe? It seems to me that this is a most preposterous idea. And what are we going to get for it? Why, Sir, what could I say, suppose I were to vote for this resolution, what could I say to a lot of workingmen, suppose they were thrown out of employment by German goods coming into this country, when they ask me: Why did you do this? Well, I might have some excuse if I said I was doing it to favour Great Britain, although I think they would say there was not much loyalty about that after all. They would say I had no business to be loyal at their expense; and I think the Government has no business to trade on loyalty at the expense of the workingmen of this country. I think the workingmen would say that I had no business to be loyal at their expense; if I wanted to be loyal at my own expense, that is all right. But what could I say, what excuse could I give, for having voted for a resolution like this, which I hold would be injurious to the workingmen of this country, when goods came from Belgium, from Germany, or other countries? Sir, I maintain I would have no excuse at all, I would stand before these men ashamed of having voted for such a thing. And what are we getting for it? What are we getting from Germany? We are getting nothing, we are not going to get anything. Nobody asked us to do this, we act of our own free will. We say: We are quite willing to do this for you, we are willing to offer you this, but you need not give us anything at all. Why, Sir, it reminds me of the former efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite when they were on this side of the House. They talked about negotiating reciprocity treaties and gave the United States the impression that the Liberal party would grant more favourable terms than the Conservative party offered. It seems to me that they are very fond of giving away the benefit of our tariff protection. It may be that they look on this as one way of killing protection. Well, if they do, let them say so. But they don't do that, they do it on a pretense of loyalty. Well, Sir, I hold, and I repeat, that I will vote against this resolution because it is injurious. Now, I am going to turn from that resolution, which I condemn for the reasons that I have given, and I will consider for a moment the amendment which has been proposed. I propose to support this amendment because it agrees with my sentiments. I see the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) laughing. I suppose the hon. member thinks that I am going to support this amendment because I sit on this side of the House, but that is not the reason at all. If he has listened to what I have said, I am sure he would not think so about me at all. I am reasoning this matter out. Why, I have not heard any reasons given by hon. members on that side of the House. They are willing to go it blind, they are willing to follow their leader without hearing any reasons given. I am willing to accept reasons for what I do, and I am not only willing to take reasons, but I am willing to give reasons for what I do. I wish to look at this amendment and consider it. I am afraid some hon. gentlemen opposite have not even read it, and perhaps they do not think it worth reading simply because it was moved by the leader of the Opposition. I will read it for their benefit. It is as follows:—

That in the opinion of this House the reduction by 25 per cent of the duties upon all imports except wines, malt liquors, spirits, spirituous liquors, liquid medicines and articles containing alcohol; sugar, molasses and syrups of all kinds, the product of the sugar cane, or beet-root, tobacco, cigars and cigarettes in favour of any country whose tariff is or may be made on the whole as low as that of Schedule "D," is calculated to imperil the industrial interests of Canada and is in principle opposed to preferential trade of any kind with the mother country.

I agree with this amendment, because it agrees with what I have just been saying. I have been arguing that this section imperils the industrial interests of Canada. I do not think that proposition needs any argument in its support. What have we seen during the last two or three weeks? The tariff was brought down. Why was it not proceeded with? Because the Finance Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce were receiving delegations who stated that the new tariff imperilled their industrial interests. Did the Finance Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce tell those deputations to leave? No; they have been receiving them, and in the meanwhile the House has been waiting for the consideration of the tariff to be taken up. Those deputations represented that the tariff imperilled their interests. I want hon. gentlemen opposite to act as the Government did and not turn a deaf ear to our statements when we declare that this resolution is calculated to imperil the industrial interests of Canada. It is also stated that this resolution is opposed to preferential trade of any kind with the mother country. I wonder if hon. gentlemen opposite really hold that opinion. I will read it again.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

Mr. CRAIG. I am bound to have hon. gentlemen opposite educated; if they do not vote rightly, they cannot blame me. I do not want those hon. gentlemen at a later stage to say that they did not understand the resolution. It is in principle opposed to preferential trade with the mother country. I want to tell hon. gentlemen opposite something they do not know, apparently, although they should know it, because it appeared in the "Globe." The "Globe" said that if Germany or Belgium came in under the treaty that was an end to the preferential arrangement, and knocked it on the head. It has been proved beyond controversy by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) that Germany and Belgium will come in under the favoured-nation clause; and in that case the resolution is opposed to any kind of preferential arrangement with Great Britain. Hon. gentlemen opposite at first declared that their resolution would not apply to Germany and Belgium. But the Minister of Marine and Fisheries said last night that he was not certain on that point, that he could not pronounce on it ex cathedra, that perhaps it might be decided by a higher authority that Germany and Belgium may come in. What do we on this side of the House advocate? We advocate that before any measure of this kind is adopted, the Imperial Government should remove obstacles now existing and clear the way for a preferential arrangement with Great Britain. I now come to a portion of the amendment which all hon. members can support, namely:

That the desire for preferential trade with the United Kingdom is now general throughout Canada.

I need not argue that point. After the great professions of loyalty made by hon. gentlemen opposite they will not dispute the point, and the same feeling prevails on this side of the House. So members are united on this portion of the amendment, and if it were taken out of the rest of the amendment, no doubt they would all be prepared to vote for it. I am glad it is not necessary to educate hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to this portion of the amendment, and that the Empire can accept as the voice of this whole Parliament the declaration that the desire for preferential trade with Great Britain is now general in Canada. The amendment goes on to declare further :

That this House is of opinion that the Government of Canada should cause Her Majesty's Government to be advised that so soon as the difficulties in the way are removed the Parliament of Canada is ready to enter into a preferential trade arrangement with Great Britain and Ireland.

Is there any dispute about this? I think we are all agreed in regard to it. I am in favour of a real preferential arrangement; I am not in favour of a pretended preferential arrangement, for I am not in favour of shams of any kind. What is meant by a real preferential arrangement? It is reciprocity—we get something for what we give. Some people are so very loyal that they reproach hon. members on this side of the House for saying that we want to get something in return for what we grant. If we were acting as individuals we might be so generous as to give all we possess, but we are acting for the people of Canada, and the people do not desire to give to everybody concessions for which they receive nothing in return, concessions not asked for, and which are not going to benefit anyone except workingmen in England. I do not think that our people are called on by reason of their loyalty to make concessions in order to benefit some workingmen in Great Britain. Moreover, such concessions may not benefit those workingmen, because the increased profits might be taken by middlemen; indeed, from this reduction of 25 per cent in duties I am satisfied the consumers will not benefit. It will prove only sufficient to cripple some of our manufacturers, and yet not be sufficiently large when the result is distributed to amount to anything. I agree with this part of the amendment, and will support it—and because hon. gentlemen opposite agree with it, they will vote against it. The effect of the resolution as submitted will be this, that while pretending to give Great Britain a preferential tariff, it will open our markets to all the countries of the world at reduced rates of duty. I also object to take the tariff-making power out of the hands of this Parliament. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) should object to this power passing into the hands of the Government, and I am sure if it had been proposed by a Conservative Government no member would have talked longer and louder than that hon. gentleman in opposition to it. Then he would have appeared as the great defender of the rights of Parliament, and if Parliament had not granted it, he would not have had a word to say against that action. The hon. gentleman is now, however, perfectly satisfied to take the treaty-making power out of the hands of Parliament and place it in the hands of the Government. Well, Sir, it is astonishing what a difference it makes when hon. gentlemen move from one side of the House to the other.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CRAIG. I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite mean that ironical "Hear, hear" as a reproach to me, but I can tell them that my principles are just the same on this side of the House as when I was on the other side. I have done this session, what no gentleman on the other side of the House has had courage enough to do, for I have voted against my party when I thought they were wrong.

Mr. GIBSON. Hear, hear.

Mr. CRAIG. I would like to see the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) or the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) do that. It would be a treat to us to see either of those hon. gentlemen do so, but I am afraid we will have to wait a very long time before they give such an exhibition of independence as that.

Mr. GIBSON. Our Government is always right, you know.

Mr. CRAIG. Now, Sir, as I want to get through before six o'clock—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CRAIG. Well, Mr. Speaker, if hon. gentlemen opposite do not wish me to finish so soon, I shall not do so.

It being Six o'clock, the Committee rose for recess.

After Recess.

CALGARY AND EDMONTON RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 33) respecting the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company.—(Mr. Osler.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. OLIVER moved to add the following section to the Bill :—

Such route and plans shall provide for the establishment of a station for receiving and delivering freight and passengers within the present corporate limits of the town of Macleod.

Mr. TISDALE. When this Bill was under consideration the other evening, I stated that in its present form it evidenced a compromise agreed upon unanimously in the Railway Committee. The promoters of the Bill there contended that they should have the ordinary extension of time without any conditions whatever, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) contended in the line of his present amendment and as a compromise it was agreed by the Railway Committee that it should be left to the Government to decide upon a route whenever the company made the extension. Therefore, in opposing this amendment I am simply asking that the House carry out the Bill as passed unanimously by the Railway Committee. From what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) said the other night, he seemed to question the correctness of my understanding as to what took place in the committee, and I would ask the chairman of that committee (Mr. Sutherland) to say whether I am correct or not. It will be a surprise to me if that hon. gentleman does not say that my understanding is the correct one.

Mr. OLIVER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale) understands one thing and I understand another as to what took place in the Railway Committee, and there can be no object in our contradicting each other. I will repeat briefly the circumstances of this case for the information of hon. gentlemen who are not on the Railway Committee. The Calgary and Edmonton Railway was chartered to be constructed from the town of Calgary, south to the international boundary line. It was constructed for 100 miles of that distance until it reached the north bank of the Old Man's River, about two miles from the town of Macleod. That town has been in existence ever since the Government of Canada asserted its authority over the North-west Territories; it was established by the Mounted Police when they first went to that country, and has been a town ever since. The town site is the property of the Government, and the property owned by private individuals was sold to them by the Government on the understanding that it was to be a town site. At the present time the Government own the buildings occupied in the town by the Mounted Police, which have cost many thousands of dollars. This company had a charter to extend its line to the boundary, but, having reached the north bank of the Old Man's River, they ceased constructing, and their right to construct from that point to the boundary lapsed by process of time. They asked for a revival of the privilege to extend to the boundary. It was asked as a condition that they establish a station within the present town of Macleod. They refused to accept this condition, and said they did not want to build to the boundary, but only to connect with the proposed Crow's Nest Pass Railway. In order to do that, they would require to cross the Old Man's River and to pass either through or very near to the present town of Macleod. On behalf of the property owners of that town, the largest and most interested of whom is the Government of Canada, I ask that that company shall be required, when they make the extension, to establish a station within the town of Macleod. That is all that the people of the town of Macleod ask, and it is for this House now to say whether that is a reasonable request or not. Is it not reasonable that when a railway has necessarily to be constructed within a very short distance of an existing town, the company should be required to establish a station within that town for the convenience of the inhabitants, and for the convenience of the people of the country who do business there. It has been argued that it is not necessary to insert this provision in the Bill, but I claim to the contrary, because unless the provision is inserted, the people of Macleod would have no guarantee that a station will be established there. I admit that the Bill provides that the railway must run either through or in the vicinity of the town of Macleod, but that is of no benefit whatever to the business interests of that town. There must be a station within the boundaries of the town, or no benefit will accrue, and unless this Parliament provides that a station must be established there, the people who have their money invested in real estate in Macleod, will have no security on which to proceed with improvements, pending the establishment of a railroad station. If this were a new town it might be right not to consider this proposition, but Macleod is the oldest town in that part of the country, and I submit that in the interests of the seven or eight hundred people who are living there, and who have about half a million or three-quarters of a million dollars invested in buildings there, it is only fair that the assurance should be given them that the railway should erect a station in the town. It will not cost the Dominion of Canada one cent to secure, by this means, the permanent establishment and prosperity of Macleod. As to whether it would be an imposition upon the railway company to ask them to establish a railway station—not to deviate their line—but simply to establish a station at a certain point of their line where it would be of advantage to an important town, I shall give to the House a few facts as regards the relation of that company to the country, and as to the mutual obligations and advantages which exist and have been enjoyed.

The railway is 295 miles in length. It was built, I believe, at the instigation of the Government of Canada, with the sanction of the Parliament of Canada, as a colonization road, for the express purpose of opening up and developing the country, of giving the country interested railroad advantages; and for that reason it was heavily bonused. It received assistance in the shape of a land grant amounting to 1,888,000 acres for 295 miles, and money assistance to the amount of $80,000 a year for twenty years, which amounts to $1,190,198 of present value at 3 per cent. If the land is worth $1 an acre—and the company is allowed the right to select the land—their total grant in money and land amounts to $3,078,198 of cash value for the building of 295 miles of road, which at a fair estimate would not cost more than $10,000 a mile. In other words, they have received in cash value from this country $3,073,195 in order to enable them to build a road which at an outside estimate would not cost more, and did not cost more, than $2,950,000, leaving a difference of $128,000 in their favour. That is to say, the road would cost them absolutely nothing and give them $128,000 profit. Every shovelful of earth, and every pound of iron on it was paid for, and overpaid for, in cash or land by the people of this country. So that, if it is asserted that extraordinary obligations are being laid on this company by asking them to establish a single station at a certain point on their line, this country has given the company full consideration for any such trifling concession now asked from them. But beyond that, I find, on referring to the railway statistics published for the past year, that the company themselves estimate the cost of the road at $3,717,882, and upon this they have issued bonds for $5,458,940, a difference between their own statement of the cost of the road, and the amount of money they have borrowed in respect of the road and their lands of $1,741,068, upon the whole of which bonds interest is charged at 6 per cent, or $327,536 a year. This has to be met by the traffic of the road, or if not met, it will depreciate the credit of the country to that extent. I will not detain the committee at any length on this point. I will merely say that when the Calgary and Edmonton Company built the road, they built it out of the money provided by the people of Canada, and having done so, raised upon it $1,741,000 more than its total alleged cost, on which we have either to pay interest or have our credit injured to a greater extent than the actual value of the money. This scheme has depreciated the value of railway securities in north-western Canada by reason of the vast interest charges that have to be paid. It is for this House to say to what extent this company have a right to be considered above the interests of the settlers of the country and the town property which actually belongs to this country. If any interest is to be considered before another, it is certainly the interest of the people of the country, and the interest of this Government in protecting as far as possible the good faith of the country. All we ask with regard to this matter is that when these people make their extension, they shall be bound, not to any particular time for making it, but simply to establish a railway station in the town of Macleod, so that the interests of that town, and the interest of this Government in the town site, shall not be sacrificed. I am sorry to say it has been the practice of every railway company in the North-west to sacrifice the interests of town sites which existed before they began operations. Instead of employing their powers in building up the country, they have played the part of land pirates, using the powers granted to them by this House for the purpose of depreciating the actual value they found in the country before they went there.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I think the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) is perfectly right in his contention that the people who are asking for these powers from this House, should be compelled to build that road into Fort Macleod. I know something about these people, because they have a railroad built to the town in which I live, namely, the Regina, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway. There is an old saying that the burnt child dreads the fire, and we know, from the way in which they have acted in the past, that we have nothing to expect from them unless they are forced and tied down to do what is right in the interest of the settlers. When they built the road to Prince Albert, by way of Saskatoon, they passed by that town, and built a town site of their own, practically ruining Saskatoon; and when they reached Duck Lake, they went about a mile from the town, and compelled the people of Duck Lake to move to their town site. When they reached Prince Albert, a large and flourishing town which has been in existence for eighteen years, they would not come into the town and locate a station there until the property owners agreed to give them one-half of their property. It is a well-known fact that in a new country settlers must go in ahead of railways, and if there is no protection for the towns, people will not invest their money in them. When people go into a new country with capital, they want to invest their money in a town through which a railway is likely to run; and if they know that railway corporations are going to be allowed to steer clear of those towns which have been established and thus ruin them, they will not invest one dollar in the country. This is a matter which the Government should seriously consider, because if railway companies are to be allowed to give the towns which are established the go-by, you will never get a town built in the Territories until such time as the railway companies have located it. This company has no right to ask any concessions from the Government. The hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) is perfectly justified in the stand he has taken, and the same remarks made with regard to the Calgary and Edmonton Railroad all apply to the railway which runs into Prince Albert, and which was built by this company at the same time. That road cost them, by their own figures, $2,539,600, and they sold bonds to the extent of $3,109,840, leaving a clear balance of $1,269,000, besides an enormous land grant which they got from the country. Now, they have been running that road for the last five years, and I had occasion the other day to bring to the notice of the House and of the Government the manner in which they are running it. They do not keep section men on the road, and the line is simply grown up with weeds in the summer. The company will not spend a cent on it. The hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler), in the Railway Committee the other day, expressed a great deal of sympathy for the bondholders. That is all very well, but if he had expressed a little sympathy for them, when the companies were issuing the bonds, it would have been better for all parties interested. I may say, in connection with these roads, that a letter was published some time ago in the Toronto "Globe," written by Mr. Hugh Sutherland, of Winnipeg, a gentleman connected with the Hudson Bay Railway, which showed up all the transactions of this company, and that letter has never yet been replied to. If such a letter were written concerning any hon. gentleman in this House, he would take steps to have the matter righted or make some reply, but so far the company have been silent. Under the circumstances, my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) is doing nothing but his duty to his constituents in trying to protect them, because if this company are allowed a loop-hole they will take advantage of it. That has been our experience in the past, and we can see no reason to hope for anything better in the future.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 70) respecting the Great North-west Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Richardson.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MACDONELL (Selkirk) moved that the following clause be added to the Bill:—

The company shall, without delay, make application to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council for a grant of running rights for its railway over the Canadian Pacific Railway between Chater and Brandon, and shall bona fide and without delay prosecute such application to a hearing and result, and upon acquiring such running rights shall forthwith and in a bona fide manner proceed to effect, if possible, an arrangement with the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway Company for a connection at Brandon with the said railway, so that the trains of the company may, when required, be run over the Canadian Pacific Railway and over and upon the line of the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway at Brandon as aforesaid, and to this end shall co-operate with the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway Company in laying down tracks and sidings and in making other construction necessary for the purpose, and shall contribute such proportion of the outlay incident thereto as may be agreed upon between the company and the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway Company, or in case of a failure to come to an agreement with the last mentioned company such proportion as the Railway Committee of the Privy Council may adjudge and determine the company shall be bound by any terms which the Railway Committee of the Privy Council may impose upon it in granting such running rights over the Canadian Pacific Railway and in making such connections with the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway as aforesaid.

Mr. HAGGART. I desire to draw the attention of the committee to the extraordinary clause which is proposed to be added to that Bill. It is one to compel a railway to grant running rights over it to another railway, it is, in fact, an injunction to compel a company to make application to the Railway Committee. I ask your ruling, Mr. Chairman, as to whether this amendment is relevant to the Bill.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think that, according to our rules, the clause which it is proposed to move is relevant to the Bill. It may be an extraordinary clause, but that is for the committee to decide.

Mr. MACDONELL (Selkirk). I may say that the principle of this amendment was practically agreed to in committee, and the clause in question was drafted by the Minister of Railways, or by his law clerk.

Mr. TISDALE. Was this clause shown to the promoters?

Mr. MACDONELL (Selkirk). Not to my knowledge. They were in the Railway Committee.

Mr. LISTER. This is practically an agreement. I think the Minister of Railways ought to be here for the purpose of explaining.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The hon. gentleman will remember, when the point was brought up in the Railway Committee, that the Minister intimated that he proposed drafting just such a clause, and that he would do it in committee. I have no doubt that what my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Macdonell) says is absolutely correct, and that this is the clause which the Minister proposed to draft. It is only designed for the purpose of compelling the North-west Central Railway Company to connect and to exchange traffic with the Canadian Pacific Railway and with the Manitoba and Northern Pacific.

Mr. LISTER. Have these companies been notified?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is customary that an exchange of traffic should take place between these companies. Collusion may occur, and they may decline to request the Railway Committee of the Privy Council for such connection, and the design of this clause is to compel them, at least, to make application, so that the interests of the people in that country may be protected by securing an exchange of traffic.

Mr. MACDONELL (Selkirk). I believe it is designed to overcome a difficulty in the Railway Act. I understand the Act provides that the initiative in a case of this kind to compel an interchange of traffic must be taken by one of the railways interested. The purpose of this clause is to compel one of the railways interested to act under that clause.

Mr. LISTER moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, I had almost concluded my remarks, and I would have closed them in a few minutes. I was referring to the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition, and saying that I objected to the resolution moved by the Finance Minister because it proposed to take power with respect to tariff-making and with respect to the tariff itself out of the hands of Parliament. I look at this matter entirely as a business man. I do not profess to discuss the legal question, whether Germany and Belgium come within this resolution or not. That has been, I think, sufficiently argued, and to my mind it has been conclusively proved that those countries do come within the scope of this resolution. But I find we have to choose between two resolutions; hon. gentlemen opposite have to choose as well as I have, and I wish they would choose intelligently and without reference to party. I suppose that is a vain wish. One strong reason urged why this resolution should be adopted by the House has been that the London "Times" and some other English papers have endorsed it most heartily. I am not at all surprised that the London "Times" and other English papers have applauded the Government for taking this step. What is the result of this step, what does it mean? It means a large concession to English manufacturers, it means taking a large slice off our tariff on English goods. It would be very strange if the English papers did not applaud this resolution. I can imagine that all the papers in Canada, no matter what their party leanings, would applaud the action of the United States Government if they made material reductions in the duties on all goods going from Canada to that country. Would it prove that such a policy would be beneficial to the United States? It would no more prove that than the action of the London "Times" shows that this resolution now proposed is for the best interests of this country. Those newspapers are not thinking of Canada but of England, they are not representing Canadian but English thought. I am not at all surprised at their position, and instead of this being an argument in favour of the action taken by the Government, to my mind it is the very opposite. But we have to choose between two policies presented to the House. I have discussed both of them. I have found one is indefinite in terms, arbitrary in execution, dangerous to parliamentary freedom, deceptive in its provisions, injurious to Canadian industries. This seems a very strong indictment, and it might be thought that in using some of these terms I was copying the strong and sometimes eloquent language of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), but I hold that I have completely proved, and I make this statement without fear of contradiction by hon. gentlemen opposite, that these terms are applicable without any exaggeration to the resolution proposed to the House by hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not intend to repeat the argument; it suffices for me to state what this policy is. The other policy which is offered to the House for our choice is plain and business-like. There is no deception in its terms; it can be understood by all who read it, and I should be very glad if hon. gentlemen opposite would read it and learn what it means. More than that. There has been a claim made on behalf of the policy of the Government and of this resolution that they constitute evidence of the loyalty of hon. gentlemen opposite. I am glad to say that the Conservative party need no evidence of their loyalty. That has been proved—and I do not think that the party opposite has any need to make any demonstration as to their loyalty. All the Canadian people are loyal, no matter what their nationality may be. We have in this country two great nationalities, an English-speaking nationality and a French-speaking nationality, and it is a great source of pride to me that we are all loyal, and no one can reproach another for being disloyal. No party ever constituted here has been disloyal. Sometimes in party debate or in order to make a political point against an opponent a charge of disloyalty has been made; still when we sit down and consider the matter we are prepared to claim for all parties that we are all equally loyal to the Empire and loyal to our country. The policy embodied in the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition is a policy that is loyal to the Empire and loyal to Canada. It would tend to build up the Empire and it would tend also to build up Canada. I had hoped to live to see the day when this policy would have been a reality. I am afraid that the policy which will be adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite, the policy propounded by the Government, will tend to delay that time, so that I may not have the pleasure of seeing it. But that is a policy which would people our North-west. It has been admitted many a time not only by this side of the House but by the other side of the House that if it were possible to secure a true preferential trade arrangement with Great Britain, obtaining such concession as we thought desirable and receiving concession from Great Britain in return, it would be the best immigration policy that could be instituted. Then it would not be necessary to send agents to Great Britain and Ireland to induce farmers to come to our great North-west, but on account of the prosperity that would flow from such a policy, they would be anxious to go there and engage in raising produce, which would have a preference in the mother country. Not only would it build up our North-west, but it would build up our cities. A market would be found in the great North-west for our manufacturers, and while goods would come in from Great Britain at lower rates of duty, still at the same time we would have a large market for our manufactures in the North-west, and so we would be able to provide ample employment for our workmen, and in this way such a policy would tend to build up the whole country. That policy would indeed create a greater Britain. For myself I have no hesitation as to which policy I will choose, and I have given my reasons.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CRAIG. I hear some hon. members sigh, as though it were not strange that I should have no hesitation as to my choice. But I have given my reasons, and conclusive reasons, and I should be very glad if some hon. members opposite would endeavour to controvert the arguments I have offered and present some arguments to show that they are right in their action. I heard some legal arguments last night. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries endeavoured to show that Germany and Belgium did not come within the scope of this arrangement. But there have been no arguments offered to this House yet to show that this proposed policy of the Government is a policy which will tend to build up this country. On the contrary, Sir, I think I have shown that it is a policy which will be injurious to Canada. I pity hon. gentlemen opposite who have got themselves into painful positions and I feel that if the Government could retrace their steps and entirely blot out their action in this matter they would be very glad to do so. It is true that they have obtained a little temporary applause from the country, and have received the commendation of the London "Times" and other English papers. That, no doubt, is a great gratification to them, but when the people of the country thoroughly understand this question, the Government will find that instead of that being a help to them, it will be greatly to their disadvantage. I congratulate the Conservative party on their consistency with reference to preferential trade. They have now maintained the same position they did years ago, and they have continued to advocate preferential trade to the present hour. I am confident, Sir, that when the people of Canada understand the position of the Conservative party on this question, they will give them their cordial and warm support.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, the consideration of the new tariff which was to a certain extent shortened during the debate before going into committee, may, I presume, be now conducted with more particular application to certain of its provisions. The consideration of this resolution and the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition seems to afford an excellent opportunity of considering the tariff as a whole. It will be remembered that the Finance Minister, during the delivery of his Budget speech, continually reminded hon. members that they should not prejudge, nor come to any conclusion on the general tariff, but that they should wait until the preferential clauses were reached in order to form a true idea of its character. The result of his tariff construction justifies the appeal he made, and showed it to be extremely proper that this House and the country should master the operations of this preferential clause, in order to determine whether the Government had fulfilled its promises of going in the direction of free trade or of a revenue tariff. In itself, the main tariff proposals of the present Government do not seem at all objectionable from the standpoint of protection. On the whole, it seems to be a tariff prepared by a Government who had the protectionist idea paramount. In its rates, in its arrangement, and in its protective features, it is almost identical with the tariff of the late Liberal-Conservative Government. It will be recollected that the people of this country were most anxious to know whether or not this Government would make a substantial move in the direction of freer trade, would endeavour to carry out their promise of a tariff for revenue only, or would decide to preserve those industries which have grown up in Canada under the system of protection inaugurated by the Conservative Government. I say, Sir, that regarding the main schedule of the tariff, while it is to a certain extent objectionable to those who look upon it from a protectionist standpoint, yet on the whole, I do not think I speak unfairly when I describe it as a tariff which embodies the protectionist character in a great many of its provisions. It might be open to a member speaking from this side of the House to reproach the Government for not carrying out their policy denouncing protection, which they laid down at Ottawa in 1893. The Liberal party then described the many evils which they said protection caused to the country, and it might lie within one's power to hold the Government up to reprobation because it did not carry out the promises it made to the country. That course I shall not adopt. Looking at the general tariff, the people of this country might be disposed to believe that very small changes had been made, and that the present Government was going to continue the protective fiscal system of the former Government, and which the former Opposition condemned very strongly. In this new tariff almost every protective feature which characterized the old tariff is retained. We know very well that those in favour of freer trade or a tariff for revenue, believe that the system of specific duties is the most vicious principle in protection. But we find that the present Government, in the tariff which it has submitted, has held on to that feature of protection. We find that whereas the old tariff had about 192 instances of specific duties in order to give efficient protection to the country, this tariff of the Liberal Government contains 122 instances of specific duties. That is somewhat of a reduction, but when you remember that there are 428 items in the tariff, and that 122, or more than one-quarter of the items in the tariff proposed by a Liberal Government, pledged to abolish every feature of a protectionist character, retain the specific duties, it tends to show that the present Government was very largely influenced, either by the spirit of the last Government or by the spirit of protection, which is so much alive in the country that sufficient pressure has been brought to bear upon this Government to practically compel them to continue the policy of the Liberal-Conservative Government in this respect. But that is not the only feature of protection which characterizes this tariff. It goes a long way in the direction of maintaining the protective system, and the modifications of the tariff presented to the House yesterday by the Finance Minister showed very clearly that in almost every case where a protected industry had been attacked, those interested in the maintenance of that industry have been able, by presenting their claims to the Government, to so impress their views on the Government as to induce them to retrace the step they had taken, and to eliminate those features of the first draft which were injurious to the particular industry; and they are now protecting certain special industries as strongly as they can—might I say as strongly as they dare—and practically going in the teeth of the pledges they have given, and establishing and maintaining a system of protection in this country. It may not be for me, speaking from this side of the House, to condemn the Government for that, although they had framed a very strong indictment against the system of protection. The hon. Finance Minister, in introducing his tariff, after dwelling for a long time on the question of protection or freer trade, finally adopted, as the principle by which he was guided in offering this tariff to the country, the resolution passed by the Liberal party in convention in Ottawa in 1893. That resolution, referring to the tariff then in force, said:

That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now, upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service;

That the existing tariff, founded upon an unsound principle, and used as it has been by the Government, as a corrupting agency wherewith to keep themselves in office, has developed monopolies, trusts and combinations;

It has decreased the value of farm and other landed property;

It has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few;

It has checked immigration;

It has caused great loss of population;

It has impeded commerce;

It has discriminated against Great Britain;

In these, and in many other ways, it has occasioned great public and private injury, all of which evils must continue to grow in intensity as long as the present tariff system remains in force.

This is the language used by the hon. Finance Minister in introducing his tariff resolutions, and naturally, after hearing such language used as an introduction, one would conclude that he would have taken care to live up to the spirit set forth in this passage. He says, speaking in the name of the Liberal party:

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

Having introduced his tariff resolutions with this language, it might naturally be supposed that in them none of the more objectionable features of protection would have been allowed to remain. Is it credible that a Government placed in power by a party which held the notions expressed in the language I have read, would deliberately continue in operation a system which in their opinion was injuring every interest in the country, oppressing the masses, interfering with the course of commerce, and discriminating against Great Britain? Is it credible that a Government which believed that protection was impeding the growth of our trade with Great Britain would continue such a system in force? And more strange than all, after reading the reciprocal resolution of this tariff, it seems almost inconceivable that the men who attended that convention in Ottawa and the members of the present Government can be the same individuals—a Government who have presented to this House a tariff which in all its main features is practically the tariff of the late Government. It is a tariff which retains the principle of protection, and applies that principle in all directions. For instance, what is the meaning of the extensive changes made in the direction of fostering the interests of the farmers of the North-west—giving them free binder twine, free barbed wire, and other advantages? changes not to the extent hoped for by gentlemen from the North-west, but still in the direction of protection, because they contain the essential features of protection, which I take to be the protection of certain interests at the expense of the body politic. As soon as the persons interested in the various interests of the country began to realize how the new tariff affected their particular interests, the consequence naturally was that the Government, instead of being able to go on at once with the consideration of the tariff resolutions, have had to delay the matter for five weeks; for, if I am not mistaken, it will be five weeks to-morrow since these resolutions were first introduced by the Finance Minister, and during those five weeks what has been going on? Have the masses of the people been represented by delegations to the Ministers? Have the farmers, whose properties we are told have been injured by the system of protection, been represented here? There have been delegations enough, but whom have they represented? Exactly the very interests which presented their views to the Government throughout the country; the very classes whose interests have been built up by the system of protection. And they have been here for what purpose? Not for the purpose of reproaching the Government for their failure to go as far as they should in the direction of free trade or their failure to introduce a tariff for revenue only; but to ask the Government to rectify errors and faults in the tariff they had brought down, and they have been successful. The amendments to the tariff resolutions introduced by the Finance Minister yesterday show that in every instance those amendments are for the purpose of removing the burdens which were found to press too heavily upon the protected interests of the country. If it was possible to doubt that the first draft of the tariff was essentially protective in its character, the resolutions brought down yesterday prove that the influences at work to induce the Government to reconsider their conduct and to change the tariff, were altogether those of the protected manufacturers. From this side of the House we cannot find fault with the Government for that. We will leave that duty to their supporters, to those who placed them in power, if they see fit to reproach them for having failed to do away with the system of protection and to introduce a revenue tariff. We on this side of the House are only too glad to see this change of heart and purpose, because I believe the Opposition in this House, much more than any party success, are exceedingly anxious to see progress made in the direction of building up the industries of Canada; and far from reproaching the Government for the step they have taken in the direction of protection, we congratulate them upon that step. If the Government, in the larger and more complete knowledge which they must now have obtained of the great importance to Canada of those manufacturing industries which have been established under the influence of the National Policy, and of the general prosperity that is bound to flow from a greater diversity of those interests, had decided to go on in the direction of making more and more complete the protection to those interests, instead of proceeding, as they at one time threatened to do in the direction of a revenue tariff, we would have congratulated the Government on taking that course and have strengthened their hands.

But there is one objection to be taken by this side of the House to the changes that have been made. It is true that, to a certain extent, the Government have made good the defects of the first draft of their tariff; but I must say, looking at the matter from the standpoint of a representative of Nova Scotia, and particularly of that part of Nova Scotia in which the great coal and iron interests are paramount, I view with regret the manner in which the Government have thought fit to hamper those interests in order to benefit some industries in the province of Ontario. Instead of doing, as I hoped they would have done, instead of making safe these threatened industries in Ontario by increasing the duties and thus giving them sufficient protection against outside competition, the Government have gone in another direction, and to a great extent have assisted these industries by injuring ours. They have carried out, to a certain extent, the promise of the hon. First Minister that he would regard iron and the products of iron as raw material and make them free, and have assisted the carriage-makers of Gananoque, and the manufacturers of wire and other metal products in Ontario, by removing, to a great extent, the protection which the iron producing interests in Nova Scotia had hitherto enjoyed. I regret that the Government did not take care to assist these interests in Ontario in such a way as would not imperil interests of a more important character to the country as a whole, and this they could easily have done by an increase of the duties on the imports.

But while, on the whole, we cannot find very much fault with this tariff in its present shape, leaving out of sight the preferential clause, when we come to consider that clause, the aspect changes, and we are reminded of the advice given us by the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), when he asked us not to make up our minds hastily but to wait until we knew the character of the preferential clause. Those who are in favour of perpetuating the system of protection are brought by this clause face to face with the fact, that if that preferential schedule is fairly and honestly applied and brought into effect, as we believe on this side it will be, and the products of all the great manufacturing countries in the world, which enjoy the favoured-nation clause, admitted at the preferential rates, then a tremendous cut in the duties protecting Canadian industries is bound to take place. In the first year, 12½ per cent will be taken off these duties and in the second year 25 per cent. The consequence will be that in the course of twelve months we will have a reduction of 25 per cent in that system of protection which we have hitherto enjoyed, and which we have reason to know, from our experience of the past five years, is barely adequate to maintain our manufacturing industries in the position to which they have attained under the operation of the National Policy. Therefore, when we regard the fact that the main schedule must be considered as subject to a reduction of 25 per cent, every one in favour of maintaining the system of protection is compelled to put himself on record against the present tariff, as a whole, because we know that when this reduction of 25 per cent comes into effect the tariff will prove an absolute failure as far as protection to our industries is concerned. There are some features of this preferential clause which have provoked a good deal of discussion and will probably provoke a good deal more. This preferential clause is of a peculiar character and introduced into this House in a peculiar way. It does not contain any reference to Great Britain, and yet this resolution which contains no reference to Great Britain is impressed on the people of Canada and of Great Britain as well, under the side light thrown upon it by the Finance Minister as a tender of preferential trade to the mother country. It is in reality nothing of the kind, but very far from it, so far as I can gather from a careful consideration of the main tariff. None the less, that impression has been produced, and a great many members of the Opposition, who, if they looked at it merely as a question of protection or freer trade, would not hesitate for a moment to oppose the reduction of 25 per cent, are so hampered by the idea, which the hon. Finance Minister contrived to attach so artfully to this clause, that it is a preference given to the trade of Great Britain, that they are to a certain extent embarrassed and feel loath to place themselves in opposition to a tender of preferential treatment to our fellow-subjects in the motherland. But that is not a fair way of submitting this clause. It is not a tender of preferential trade to Great Britain, but, under the vague language used, it may apply to any or every country in the world. In this respect it strikes me that the Government are not acting ingeniously in this matter. Several members of the Government have told us, and their words have gone to the country, that this resolution is not intended to apply to Belgium and Germany or to any country but Great Britain. If that be the case, if it is not intended by the Government to allow this clause to apply to any other country but Great Britain, then the clause itself is deceptive and dishonest. If that were the intention of the Government, why did they draft the clause in such a way that it apparently applies to the whole world, instead of taking the more honest and more definite course of stating expressly that it was intended to apply to Great Britain alone. Why did they not say: This is a tender of preferential trade to Great Britain, and under it we propose to admit the manufactures and products of Great Britain at a reduction of 12½ per cent and 25 per cent on our main schedules. But the Government have not done that. If their intention were to confine the clause to Great Britain, they took a very roundabout course to arrive at what they might have accomplished directly without any danger of exposing the industries of Canada to competition with the products of the most highly organized labour and protective countries in the world. It is quite evident, from the clause introduced by the Minister of Finance in his amended resolutions, that this view has come home to the Government itself. It is evident by the wording of clause "B" that the Government have contemplated that, in all probability, the interpretation which will be put upon this clause by the British Government will be such that the home Government will require Canada to extend the same privileges to the other countries which enjoy the most-favoured-nation treatment. And that being the case, the Government, having, as is apparent by clause "B" which they have introduced, found themselves face to face with that contingency, it strikes me that the country may reasonably anticipate the result that will follow, and that the industries of Canada, instead of having to contend with the industries of Great Britain alone will have to contend with the industries of at least Germany, Belgium, France and some other twenty nations that have these treaties, in addition to the industries of Great Britain. Looking at it, then, from that standpoint—and I think that it is only fair in view of the confession made by the Government by introducing their clause "B"—it becomes more than ever incumbent upon those who are opposed to a relaxation of the system of protection, who are not willing to see our industries exposed to severe competition, who are very much averse to seeing these industries destroyed, to set themselves squarely in opposition to the tariff; because, if it comes into operation, favourable as may be the main schedule to many of the industries of the country as a whole, with the preferential clause in full operation, I think it is not open to doubt nearly all the industries built up in Canada by the National Policy will be destroyed. And if this be the result, a state of affairs will arise in this country that will not be one of progress. For, if the Government destroy these industries, what are they going to give us in place of them? The Government will do away with the completeness of the protection. The protective system is to be the nominal system, retaining, substantially, the form of the protection under the old tariff; but it is not a living tariff, and, while apparently and nominally protective, it is not really so. If the Government, by such a tariff, destroy the industries built up under the old tariff, what are they going to give us in exchange for them? Nothing. There can be no question that this country will go backward, and even if a change of Government takes place five years from the last election, the history of the five years will have been one of a stationary or worse, a retrograde condition of affairs. Such a state of affairs is not pleasant to contemplate, and I would hope that the sober second thought of the Government, by the time we meet again, will have induced them to reverse their policy and to go back to the main schedule and drop out of use this preferential clause.

Now, there is one feature of this preferential or reciprocal schedule, which has already been adverted to, that makes it a peculiar thing to deal with. Those of us who wish to see the protective system maintained, see ground for opposing it strongly and fairly. Still, there is no doubt that a certain amount of kudos has come to the Government, that they have acquired a certain amount of glory because they have by skillful use of words, imported into their tariff something which is not there at all, by reason of which they pose at this moment as very strong lovers and friends of Great Britain, anxious to develop preferential trade. In this, as in so many cases before, they have assumed the position that was for a long time and is still occupied by the Conservatives of this country. They are now strongly pro-British. It was not always so. Their faces were not always turned towards London and towards Downing Street, but their faces and their feet as well were turned towards Washington. They were seen in Washington, they were received kindly there, and rubbed shoulders with the prominent men there. One of them in fact was referred to as the senator from Ontario. But now they have given the cold shoulder, apparently, to Washington, and their hearts are set upon binding closer the bonds that unite us to our British cousins. While that is apparently a desirable change of heart, we have reason to suspect these gentlemen who have so suddenly made this right-about-face movement. When carefully looked into, this tariff, which they proclaimed to the world as intended to open up preferential trade with Great Britain—they claim that in this they have taken the first step without waiting for Great Britain; they are going to teach the mother of nations her duty, and they have received a great deal of credit for taking this attitude—does not go nearly as far in this direction as these gentlemen would imply. It has been pointed out by one of the speakers in this House, in reference to many of the articles in which our principal trade is with Great Britain, and in which we might look for an extended trade under this preferential clause, that in anticipation of the 12½ per cent reduction, these hon. gentlemen have made a 16½ per cent increase. They have increased duties of 25 per cent to 30 per cent and duties of 30 per cent to 35 per cent on the principal items with which Great Britain supplies us. This leaves the duty against the British manufacturers even higher than under the old tariff. So that, in this case, the kindness of the reciprocal schedule, which, while professing to extend its provisions to the old country alone, is deceptive.

But there is another matter in respect of which it will be seen that Great Britain is not the country which will profit most largely by the changes made. There are certain goods in which England can supply us with advantage, but there are other goods in which the United States practically control the market and will control it more and more in the future. And above all that is contained in the tariff and in the tariff resolution and in the speech by which they were introduced, is the offer of reciprocity to the United States which is intended to make our American cousins understand that there is no hostility felt for them, that the old liking for Washington and the people represented at Washington is still alive and active in the hearts of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Now, we will take one particular industry, and that, perhaps, the most important of all the great industries that have grown up in Canada under the operation of a protective system. I refer to that greatest of all, that foundation industry, the production of iron and steel. It was seen at once when the main tariff was introduced, that the protection upon iron and steel had been very largely reduced, and that a severe blow, perhaps a blow that would be fatal, had been given to the great iron producing industries in Nova Scotia. But what is the case now when we come to consider the amended resolutions brought down yesterday by the Finance Minister? What industries have been selected to be struck at now? Why, Sir, wherever an industry in Ontario required to be strengthened, that has been strengthened by striking another blow at this great iron producing interest in the province of Nova Scotia. On steel billets there was a duty of $5, that was first of all reduced to $4; and now, in order to help certain interests in the province of Ontario, that duty has been cut in two, and a reduction has been made from $4 to $2; 60 per cent has been taken away from the protection that these interests at one time enjoyed. Now, then, the Government having done all that they possibly can, or nearly all, to destroy these great iron and steel interests in Canada, what country is going to profit by that? Is it Great Britain, that country which we are told is the very apple of the eye of our friends opposite? No, that is not the country which will benefit. The country which is already largely driving Great Britain out of the markets of the world in the production of iron and steel, which has completely secured their own home market, and is now practically in charge of the market of Canada—that is the country which is going to get the advantage of this reduction. Having weakened Canada's interests in iron, there can be no question that the advantage which is going to accrue from that will not go to Great Britain, but will go to the United States. Now, I will read a few items taken from the tariff return for 1896, to show how the trade in metals and manufacturers of metals, has been proceeding in the past. Of bar iron, Great Britain sent us $52,000 worth; but the United States sent us $66,000 worth, in round numbers. Engines and parts of engines, Great Britain sent us not one dollar's worth; the United States sent $80,000 worth. In iron products Great Britain sent us $1,758; the United States $66,000. In hardware, Great Britain sent us $23,000; the United States sent us $261,000. In pig iron, Great Britain shipped to Canada $74,000 worth; the United States sent $332,000 worth. I may say that this list, which is an extensive one, shows from beginning to end exactly the same character, shows that the United States has already practically captured the market of Canada for those products, and that any advantage to result to any outside country from the operations of the tariff and the injury inflicted upon the Canadian products, is going to revert to the people of the United States. There are some other considerations in connection with this clause, but they have been dealt with already so fully, that it is not necessary perhaps for me to say any more about it. One point that has been very strongly objected to is in respect to this schedule. The Government practically takes away the power of Parliament to control treaties, and intrusts what is really a treaty-making power to a member of the Government—not even a member of the Government, for I regret to say that our hon. friend the Controller of Customs has not yet attained to a position which I had hoped to see him occupy before now; but one who is not even a member of the Government is intrusted with this treaty-making power. It has been well enforced by several speakers that this is not a move in the right direction. Ordinary treaty-making is one of the most sacred and solemn functions that devolves upon any Government; the making of a treaty is carried out with the greatest care, and every solemnity, to give it security. Yet here we have the people of Canada trusting this power to one individual—who in this case is a gentleman whom we all could trust with great satisfaction; but the character of the man who would for the time being occupy that position would not always perhaps inspire the same confidence. But the principle is the same, and you find the Parliament of Canada divesting itself of the power of controlling the making of what are practically treaties, and devolving it upon one gentleman who, during the long period that elapses between one session of Parliament and another, is practically in a position to do as he pleases in this most important matter. This certainly is objectionable; it must necessarily be objectionable to any person who regards with the care, the interest and the importance that we should attach to them, what are the functions of the Parliament of a free people. If Parliament have any duties at all, they are to control, and to keep within their own hands, the control over all the revenue-raising powers of the country. It was about these very questions of finances, of money, and of revenue, that the battle raged through many years which resulted in giving us responsible Government. It is entirely through our control of the finances of the country that we do in the end control an executive, and compel it to bow to the will of the people. And if those who represent the people here in Parliament divest themselves of that power and give it in this large-hearted and large-handed fashion into the hands of a single member of the Government to be used by him as he pleases during a long portion of the year, it would seem to me to show a lack of appreciation of their rights and privileges which is a dangerous symptom when it is found to exist among the representatives of the people. But I think there is another feature about this reciprocal schedule which we ought to oppose. As I have already said, this pill has been sweetened very much, it has been sugared off, I may say, by the idea that it is a concession to Great Britain, that it is the way in which we, in the most practical fashion, express our love of the Empire, our gratitude to the Empire, and our good will. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the people of the country, when they come to understand this matter, will be altogether delighted with the very generous manner in which the Government of Canada is really giving away the money and impairing the welfare of our Canadian people. It may be held perhaps, and it has been said indeed, that it smacks of disloyalty for a member of the Opposition in this House to oppose this reciprocal schedule. I do not think that it does anything of the kind, I do not think it involves the slightest change of front or change of plans, so far as the Opposition is concerned. Ever since the Government of Canada introduced the National Policy, it has been assailed on the very ground that it was attacking the interests of the mother country. That question was fought out and settled long ago. But practically the right we have of making our own fiscal arrangements, of providing for our own wants, of doing our own business, was asserted against last night, not on this side of the House, but by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who, in dealing with this matter, and with the interpretation of a treaty, argued that the power of dealing with these fiscal questions was entirely within the competence of this House. From the very moment the Conservative Government of Canada entered upon the course of building up our industries, and entered upon the protective system, from that moment we were open to the charge, and the charge was made against us, of antagonising British interests. Every one knows how dear to the British is their trade, how proud they are of extending their commerce, how they welcome any concession on the part of any country which will tend to still further extend that great commerce, which is the most distinguishing characteristic of the greatest of all Empires. But the people of Canada have never for one moment conceded that they are prepared, in order to please the British public or the British Government, or to gratify the desire of the people to see their commerce still more enlarged, to admit that it was proper on the part of the Government of Canada to adopt any measure that might injure the Dominion. To that extent we cannot go. We maintain that we best strengthen the Empire and the hands of the mother country when we build up this Dominion and strengthen the Government of Canada. It must be borne in mind that while there is a certain amount of generosity in making this large concession, it is really being made by people who cannot afford to make it. Does it not seem a very foolish act for a people so small and so much burdened, for this comparatively small population in occupation of an enormous area, with the responsibility of governing a country constituting one-fourth of the whole British Empire, to weaken its hands and impair its property in order to add to the already enormously great wealth of the great British people? I maintain that those upon whom the burden of this concession will fall, the poor men of the country, the workmen in factories, farmers on their farms, many of whom are eking out a livelihood, would say, if this question were submitted to them—while they might be exceedingly glad to do everything possible to establish and make greater the empire of Greater Britain—that they were not in a position, in view of their stringent circumstances, to assume greater burdens than they now bear in order to increase to a certain extent the output of the manufacturers of Great Britain, to add a few days' work for the benefit of those employed in the factories there, and to add an infinitesimal amount to the percentage of receipts of the workmen. These are the classes of people who suffer from this change, because if carried to its full extent, it means an injury to the protective system, and the workmen and farmers would not for one moment consent to any such arrangement as is now proposed by the Government if it were submitted to them. One further remark and I have done. There is a very significant feature about the discussion in the press, more particularly that resulting from the speech made by the Finance Minister. It does not appear to me that a preference for British trade is altogether inherent in the resolution; I believe the hon. gentleman produced that impression by the speech he delivered. No doubt it was received with a great burst of loyalty on that side of the House. How agreeable it was to hear hon. gentlemen opposite bursting forth into the inspiring strains of "God save the Queen." We were delighted to hear it. If there was one thing unpleasant and disagreeable to the people of Canada and to the Conservatives it was the fact that now and again some incident cropped up or came to light which made it possible to suspect that there was not that deep and strong love of British institutions possessed by the Liberals which was held by the Conservative party. It was always an unpleasant reflection to any good citizen to think that a part, and a large part of the people were not so intensely devoted to British institutions and to the Crown as were the Conservatives of Canada. I have always felt that the Liberals were just as loyal as the Conservatives, that it was only necessary to give them an opportunity and they would prove it. How history has repeated itself within a comparatively short time. I remember in 1867, when confederation had become an accomplished fact, there were in Nova Scotia a large number of anti-confederates. Finding themselves in Opposition they were not so outspokenly loyal as we might have wished, but I believe they were loyal at heart. In my town, one of the most disagreeable features on holidays was that some of the people would persist in flying, not the Union Jack, not the British flag, but the Stars and Stripes. Six or seven of these flags would invariably decorate the town on those occasions. When the Governor General passed through New Glasgow at that time he was welcomed by a rather profuse display of the stars and stripes. This circumstance would lead people to think that the people in that old country were not loyal. But all that was necessary to make them as loyal as any one could wish was to place them in power, and from the moment when the Government of Sir John Macdonald was defeated and Hon. Alexander Mackenzie succeeded him, we never had the mortification or pain of seeing one flag or one rag of that bunting flying in the good old county of Pictou. Our friends became as loyal as could be desired and as loyal as they are now, although when they were in Opposition they did at times allow themselves to be carried away by their own eloquence and made somewhat disloyal utterances. No sooner did they come into power last year under the present Liberal Premier than they are effusively loyal, and we are delighted to see it. It simply means that as soon as an opportunity is given they make haste to show that they are strongly and devotedly attached to British institutions. Let us congratulate them on this change of heart. I hope it may continue not only through good report, when they are basking in the sunshine of prosperity and power, but through evil report, when in the course of time they pass into the cold shades of Opposition, and that then they will carry with them the principles of attachment to the British Crown and British institutions and that they will be at heart as loyal as they are to-day. There is one little occurrence, not in this House, but in the press, that attracted my attention, and I may say elicited my regret, and that was the manner in which the greatest of all organs of public opinion in Great Britain received the announcement of this favour as regards trade matters which is to be extended to the mother country. I was not surprised that this journal welcomed the concessions made by the Finance Minister, but I was surprised, disappointed and pained when I found that the London "Times" was not contented with praising those who seemed to be acting in British interests, but went the length of condemning even by name the ex-Finance Minister, because he had questioned the propriety and wisdom of the change proposed by the Finance Minister. In that respect the "Times" spoke too hastily and without sufficient knowledge. Can it be possible that such a great organ of public opinion can condemn, practically unheard and on insufficient knowledge, a prominent member of a Government who, during eighteen years and under the stress of all difficulties, constantly worked for the maintaining and still further strengthening the connection between Canada and the mother country and for the purpose of extending trade between them. I am sure that as soon as time has given these organs of public opinion an opportunity to know more accurately the true state of affairs in this country, they will not, no matter how much they may praise and extol the members of the Government, be prepared without due reason and consideration to condemn a body of loyal men who, during all these years, practically during the long history of confederation, have been pillars of the party which has maintained the cause of British connection in this country.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I had some remarks to make on this matter, but as the House seems anxious to vote, I shall defer them to another time. I wish to say, as regards the preferential clauses of the tariff, that if there is nothing in them, then there is very little indeed in the changes proposed by the present Government which will benefit the farmers of this country. But, Sir, I have very great hope that some good will accrue to us from these preferential clauses, and I therefore heartily endorse the proposition of the Government in that respect, and intend to vote in favour of it.

Mr. McNEILL. I just wish to make one remark on this question. As hon. gentlemen seem anxious that a vote should be taken now, I shall not occupy the time of the committee by making a speech. I simply wish to say that as between this resolution and the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition, I have no hesitation whatever in supporting the amendment. But, as the amendment does not adequately express my views on this subject, I shall take the opportunity at a later stage of placing my views on record.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 42; nays, 76.

Mr. TAYLOR. I draw your attention, Mr. Chairman to the fact that the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Haley) and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) were not in the House when the question was put, and yet they voted.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Was the hon. member for Lisgar in the House when the question was read?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was not present when the question was read, but I thoroughly understood it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I heard it read in the first case.

Mr. BERGERON. That won't do.

Mr. FOSTER. Your memory would not carry you that far back.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Was the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Haley) in the House when the question was put?

Mr. HALEY. I was not, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 42; nays, 74.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall resolution 16 be adopted?

Mr. FOSTER. No, Mr. Chairman. As one member of this House who for the last five weeks has been groping in the dark, asking for light, and seeking information and finding it impossible to get it, I propose now before I vote on this resolution to ask the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) to give us an explanation of this 16th clause. I myself do not know what it means. I do not see that it sets up any standard, that it gives any definiteness or certainty, and I certainly do not want to vote for a thing which I do not fully understand. I do not occupy the happy position of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), who says he understands and knows all about it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall this resolution be adopted?

Mr. FOSTER. No, Mr. Chairman, I have asked a question and I expect an answer.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Those in favour of the resolution will say "aye."

Mr. FOSTER. Surely we have not been reduced to this pass in this House, that when a gentleman on the Opposition side, a gentleman who is a representative of a constituency and has been sent here to look after the affairs of his constituency and not to vote in the dark, asks a fair question of the gentleman who has a measure in charge, surely we have not been reduced to the pass that he is not to get an answer. If we have, I most certainly give warning to my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) that he will not get a vote at this present time.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I would be very sorry if the hon. gentleman took it in that way. I really thought he was asking the question in order to emphasize the position he had taken before. I did not think he was really in earnest.

Mr. FOSTER. I must say I am in dead earnest. I did not find English words strong enough to mark the ignorance I am labouring under in reference to this clause.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. It was the very fact that the hon. gentleman expressed himself as unable to understand the clause which led me to believe that he was not in earnest, and I cannot think yet that he is, for the clause reads so plainly. The particular part of the clause to which the hon. gentleman refers says:

That any question that may arise as to the countries entitled to the benefits of the reciprocal tariff, shall be decided by the Controller of Customs, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council.

I noticed, when the hon. gentleman was speaking that he emphasized the statement, as he has done on other occasions, that this power was placed wholly in the hands of a member of the Government who was not a member of the Cabinet. I suppose that if the Controller of Customs should happen to be a member of the Cabinet, the hon. gentleman's objection would be removed to a very great degree. But he need not fear so much from that, because the decision of the Controller is subject to the authority of the Governor in Council. He will notice that the question must first arise, and when it arises it will be my duty under the law to examine into it, to ascertain the facts that require to be known by the Government before an order is given for the admission of articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of the country in question. I had no difficulty whatever in determining, from what I know, from what the hon. gentleman knew, from what every one knew, that under the wording of the clause articles which were the growth, produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom would be admitted free into this country, and I so decided; and to-day goods are being admitted from that country at one-eighth reduction. The question has been asked me on behalf of other countries whether they are entitled to this reduction under the treaties which exist between them and the United Kingdom. I have not considered, nor do the Government consider, that these treaties bear upon this subject at all, and the parties have been so communicated with. If any Government make any representation on behalf of a country that it comes within the meaning of this section, then it will be my duty, as I understand it, to possess myself of full knowledge as to its tariff and the working of its tariff, and to decide as far as I am able whether on the whole the tariff of that country is as favourable to Canada as our reciprocal tariff would be to it. The question with reference to the treaties I do not discuss; that has been debated and is a legal question. I can only mention this fact, that while the hon. gentleman has constituted himself, as he has done by his speech this afternoon, if I understood it aright, a special agent, almost, to plead and argue, as far as was within his power, the right of Germany and Belgium to have their goods admitted under the reciprocal clause, I have not decided that they are entitled to that privilege. I have not decided that the tariffs of those countries are such as to warrant me in bringing them within the meaning of this section. The hon. gentleman has gone further. He has determined, if I understood him aright this afternoon, that the tariff of China would bring China—I do not know whether he mentioned Japan also—within the operation of the clause. And yet the hon. gentleman says that he does not understand the clause, that he is in the utmost ignorance about it. In the same breath he has told us that by this reciprocal clause we are destroying the industries of this country, because under it we are bringing in the products of Belgium and Germany and twenty other countries. Sir, the Government deny that; they say those countries will not come in; but they say there may be a possible doubt, and provision is made for that. If there be any strength in the argument that these countries come within the operation of this clause, the hon. gentleman has lent the aid of all his power and all his influence to have the goods of Germany and Belgium included. But the Government have not taken that position; and my duty will be—and I will endeavour to discharge it as honestly as I can—to ascertain whether, when applications are made on behalf of these countries, whether their tariffs warrant us in admitting them, and then the question will be dealt with by the Governor in Council in the manner I have indicated. If I have been the instrument in removing the dense cloud which the hon. gentleman says is on his brain, though I do not charge him with this, I shall be delighted to find that he is able on this question, as he is upon so many others, to exercise a very clear and very good judgment.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has succeeded in doing one thing. For several hours this afternoon I was cudgelling my brain to know why respectable, intelligent, well-trained gentlemen on the other side of the House had no answer to the splendid and convincing argument that was made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden).

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. There are laymen on that side of the House who know nothing about law; there are lawyers who are partisans above anything else; but there are also gentlemen on that side who are legal men, and well-trained, and I venture to say that they did not sneer when I made that statement, and that they believe much the same as I do with reference to the argument that was made by the hon. member for Halifax

Mr. PATERSON.

(Mr. Borden) to-day. I wondered why nothing was said. Well, Sir, the least said the soonest mended with reference to some causes. I said my hon. friend had made one thing clear; he made this clear to me and to all other members on this side, that discretion is the best part of valour for hon. gentlemen opposite. When he broke this rule of discretion, the discretion of silence, goaded by some remarks of my own, he furnished incontestable proof that the adage "the least said is the soonest mended," is particularly applicable to the advocacy by hon. gentlemen opposite of this measure. Did the hon. gentleman attempt to give us information? No, but he attempted to say that I had answered myself, and that I had declared this afternoon what might be done under that clause; but he said: I have not so decided. That is proof positive to me that the great "I" sitting yonder has different views as to the meaning of that tariff to what I have. But as my views do not count with the Government. I should like to know what my hon. friend's views are. I should like to know what he, the interpreter of the Government's policy, has to say with reference to this clause. The very fact that I was so wild in my statements, the fact that I intimated that China and Japan and Belgium and Germany might come in under this clause, should engage my hon. friend to give us something more definite than the "no, I have so decided." The hon. gentleman sounded his "no" very loudly, but I could not tell the direction in which to steer my little vessel from the sound of his horn.

An hon. MEMBER. It is a fog-horn.

Mr. FOSTER. We are still in the fog. My hon. friend skipped from the main section to sub-clause "A" to find what he ought to do, but it was an explanation of the main resolution that I wanted. If there is anything in the world which shows that this clause is one which we ought not to pass to-night, it is the assumption of my hon. friend repeated over and over again, that its application rests entirely with him. I have decided, he tells us, that Australia does not come in and that New South Wales come in, but not that Germany or any other country comes in. But my hon. friend is bound to decide, not by what his views and predilections are, but by a standard; and this House is entitled to know what that standard is. The hon. gentleman is in the position of a judge who takes the bench to try a case, but who declares beforehand that he has no precedents, no principles, no standard of law, and who decides, not upon the argument or the evidence or the law, but upon his own predilections. No canons of law, no precedents, none of the grounds on which justice is ordinarily administered, have any weight with the hon. gentleman, but he simply decides the matter according to his own predilections and says: I am to give the decision. My hon. friend will not find in the lowest walks of life, much less in legal or parliamentary circles, anyone attempting to bamboozle the people on the line he has adopted. He must give us his standard of judgment. Any one could easily see that, even under such an involved and vague clause, a free trade country could come in. But the question may become a little more difficult. On what ground was it he decided that Great Britain should come in? Was it on the ground that the tariff of Great Britain is, on an average, lower than the tariff of Canada as regards that reciprocal schedule? Will my hon. friend answer?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS.
When you get through.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to have the answer now. It is a very simple question. My hon. friend need not be afraid that he will put his foot in it again if he gets up. He must have come to his decision upon some grounds, and I ask him again.

Some hon. MEMBERS. I! I!

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, but I do not decide the question. There are big I's and little I's and some very small I's. But the hon. gentleman has decided the question, and I ask him his standard. He must have decided it upon some certain principle or he is not fit to be where he is and make a decision. Did he decide it on the principle that the tariff of Great Britain, on the whole, was favourable to Canada because the average of that tariff, as applied to Canadian products, going into Great Britain, was lower than the average of the Canadian tariff would be as applied to goods coming into Canada from Great Britain under that schedule. Was that the principle? Can my hon. friend not reply by a straight answer, yes or no. The hon. gentleman cannot answer because he knows the logical sequence. I will take it for granted that he did because I have to argue, since the hon. gentleman will not reply, upon what I must take for granted. I cannot find any Minister who will answer a simple question. Do the Ministers know themselves? No? What is the first duty of a Privy Councillor and a Minister if not to give his knowledge to those who have not such good grounds for knowing as he has. Did the hon. gentleman then make his decision on the ground that the tariff of Great Britain was lower than the tariff of Canada on goods under the reciprocal schedule? If he did, what principle naturally followed from such decision? It must follow that every country whose average tariff on the goods that come into it from our country is lower than the average tariff on goods coming into Canada from that country, under the reciprocal schedule, has a right to have its goods admitted into Canada under the one-eighth and one-quarter reduction. My hon. friend knows that that would be the logical consequence of his reply, if he had answered my question, and he takes refuge in an undignified silence, unworthy of a Cabinet Minister. It is an undignified and unworthy shuffling by a man who stands in a position given to him by his chief, and at the behest of the people, in which he is supposed to guide the legislation of Parliament and enlighten the benighted minds of members of Parliament. Yet, although occupying that position, he has not the courage to rise and answer the question I have put him. If he has, let him answer that simple question. Was that the principle upon which he proceeded or not? Admitting for argument sake that he did proceed on that principle, will he answer me another question? Is to-day the tariff of Belgium, on an average, lower than the tariff of Canada, taking into account the goods that Canada has to send to Belgium and those which Belgium would send to Canada under the schedule? My hon. friend should know. What has he been doing in his office, if he does not know. Has he put an article into his tariff which is to affect the law of this country without looking into the tariff conditions of the countries which are likely to come in under it? Has he sent out his invitations first before waiting to see whether his guests are desirable or not. Will he answer the question whether the Belgian tariff is lower than the Canadian tariff? Did he let Britain's goods in here because Britain's tariff was lower than Canada's? Was that the principle he established? If so, then he has to let Belgium's goods in. If Belgium's tariff is lower than ours—is it the hon. gentleman's opinion or is it not?—will he tell us? Will he tell us whether the tariff of Japan is lower on an average than the tariff of Canada as applied to those goods? If it is, if he has any principle, and if the principle is such as I have taken for granted it was, and he lets Great Britain in, will he not have to apply the same to Japan and allow the goods of Japan to come into this country at one-eighth and one-quarter reduction? Will he not have to allow the cheap labour of two or three cents a day to enter into competition with the labour of a country whose inhabitants, whose workmen are educated, who have a high scale of civilization and life to keep up, who have Christian families to support, and who cannot live on two cents a day. Will my hon. friend answer me another question? Is the tariff of Germany lower than the tariff of Canada on the average? If that is his principle, will he allow in German goods whether treaties exist or not on the lines of the principle of his tariff? Have the Chinese to-day a lower tariff than

Canada, and will their goods come in, and will that 400,000,000 of people who live cheaply, whose standard of civilization and expense of family life is nothing as compared with ours; will that immense mass of people be injected into Canada with their efficient labour, their untiring adaptation of themselves to manufacturing processes, which would place them as successful competitors with others in the industrial world. Will they be allowed to come in as well? They will, if that is the principle upon which my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) goes. But he says to himself: I sit here in state and I do not move this great eye of mine until somebody raises the question. Who is to raise the question; and my hon. friend unworthily, I think, tried to create a prejudice against me, as though I now appeared here in the role of the special agent of Belgium or Germany. He can try that on just as long as he likes. It is unworthy of the argument that we are conducting to-day. I am here, Sir, to carry out my duty as a legislator, and I intend to do it, and nothing of that kind will keep me from doing it. I am here in the interests of the Canadian labouring man.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad to see that for once I have evoked the approval of my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). I like to see him approve. I like to see his countenance lighten up with a benign smile and gradually broaden from side to side until he goes off in a great flash of jubilant delight. If I can say something more that will delight my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) I would like to do it.

But, Sir, I am here to-day in the interests of the Canadian workingmen, and I want to know in the interests of the Canadian workingmen, whether the labour of Germany, of Belgium, of South America, of China, and of Japan, is to be put in competition, by a reduction of one-fourth in the duties, with the work of the labouring men of Canada. There is where I stand, and I propose to get an answer to my question in the interests of the workingmen. Hon. members opposite who sit in silken seats, and who rustle in the trappings of office; new to them and all the more beautiful because of their novelty, what care they for the poor labouring men of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. And now I have touched the risible chords of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), and he agrees with me.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). How very angry you are.

Mr. FOSTER. Very sympathetic for the labouring men of Canada is the Minister of Public Works. What cares he, in office, with his private car and his coloured porter, riding away over the two spans of steel across the continent, eating like a bird. What cares he for the labouring men? And the Government sit in conclave, and they make a political tariff to spite their enemies and to help their friends.

Mr. FOSTER.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it denied? We will thresh that out when we come to discuss the items. And what care these gentlemen in office, that industry after industry has already closed up, and the workingman finds no work. What care they, Sir, that the lower labour of Belgium and Germany comes in here to compete with our labour in Canada. These gentlemen are oblivious to that. They do not know that it occurs, they do not know that it is imminent? The last three weeks of deputations, disturbing almost the midnight hours of the Minister of Finance—

Mr. GIBSON. You know all about it.

Mr. FOSTER. Do I not? The last three weeks of deputations to the Minister of Finance, breaking his sweetest dreams, having on the one side the worries of the past day and projected on the other side the worries of the coming day, have they not told him of industries that were threatened with extinction, and of workingmen that would go with less wage or with no wage at all. The Government have reconsidered their tariff and to some extent, the representations have been so strong and so cogent, that they have put a specific duty in the place of an ad valorem, and a higher ad valorem in the place of a lower. These workingmen through and through Canada are after all, the men whose cause has to be threshed out here and whose cause has to be canvassed and discussed here, and I stand in Parliament, not as the agent of Belgium or of Germany, but as the agent of the industries and the industrial workers of Canada.

Now, I ask my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) whether or not he will answer the question as to his policy. But he may say: You have been guessing at the policy. What else can a mortal man do? I cannot get him to say what the policy is, and then I must guess, and I guess that that probably is the standard, and that ought to be the standard. But suppose it is not, what other is the standard? Is the standard as to "advantage on the whole" to be something else than average of tariff? What else can it be? Surely not mere sentiment, surely not mere relationship, surely not mere predeliction. What is it that can be the standard, other than the cold facts as to the rates of duty, and the corresponding rates of duty and how they stand in proportion to each other? I will not insult my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) by attempting to argue, that there can be any other standards, than, taking the rates of duty, the tariffs of two countries, and comparing these to give the benefit of that clause to that country which can show that its average tariff is lower than or equal to the average tariff of Canada. Now, if my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) will tell us what his standard is I will sit down, and I will listen to him; yes, listen to him as those learners of old listened to the prophets and lawyers, sitting lowly at their feet and waiting for wisdom.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I did say that I would answer the question of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster). If I did not say so, I think the House would agree with me, that because of the manner in which he has spoken, and the terms he used I would be justified in not noticing the remarks he made. If I used the word "I"—

Mr. LISTER. He is insolent and impertinent.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman says that I am impertinent.

Mr. LISTER. And insolent.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask your protection, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is a thing unheard of in this House that an hon. gentleman should sit in his seat opposite with his hat on, and call one insolent, and call one impertinent. Am I to be insulted in that way?

Mr. LISTER. I take my hat off and I stand up, and I call you insolent and impertinent.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that those words be taken down.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. TAYLOR. Hon. gentlemen opposite will make no progress to-night if this is to be their conduct. I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I rule that the words should be taken down.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, I ask you to carry out the other constitutional practice.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. What are the words?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman said, with his hat on, and he said with his hat off, that I was both insolent and impertinent.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I find that according to the rules of debate, when some words have been ordered to be taken down, as in this case, the member who used those expressions has a right to withdraw them before appealing to the House.

Mr. LISTER. Under the rules of the House I withdraw the expression. If I was outside, I would not.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, being of slight build and of light weight, I rise to ask the protection of the Chair again. When a gentleman of the height and avoirdupois of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), with eyes full of fire, looks over at me and declares that if we were outside he would not take them back, but that he would still call me insolent and impertinent, I want to know if I can ask for your sphere of protection to be thrown around me outside of this Chamber.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think when an hon. member withdraws expressions complained of, they should be withdrawn unreservedly.

Mr. LISTER. I will promise, Mr. Chairman, that I won't say this to the hon. gentleman outside. Small as he is, small as the hon. gentleman is in every way, he need not be the least alarmed.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. I said, and I repeat again, that I did say to the hon. gentleman that I would attempt to reply to his speech; but if I had not said that I should have felt myself justified, from the tone of the debate and the words that he used, and his manner, in remaining silent, without wishing in the slightest degree to be discourteous. But I wish the hon. gentleman to understand that while I recognize his position in the House, and while he states that he thinks I emphasize the "I" and magnify my own importance, the members with whom I have been associated in this House for many years will not, I think, attribute that to me. I will, however, say this to him, that I have sufficient self-esteem and self-respect that I will not allow, so far as I am in the rights and privileges of the House—I will not allow a gentleman even of his standing in the House, to use towards me words that are insulting in their nature. Now, what has the hon. gentleman done? He simply repeated his question again and again. The hon. gentleman apparently was stung by what I pointed out to him, and which I again point out to him, and if I used the word "I" I was forced so to speak when called upon personally to do so. If I used it, I did not, at any rate, mean to emphasize it, for I did not feel that I was in an exalted position, and placed there by this resolution. I considered myself as a member of the Government having this duty imposed upon me by the law, if it becomes law, and I spoke of it in the personal sense in the discharge of my duty, because the duty devolved upon me personally. But I will endeavour now to say the Controller of Customs. The Controller of Customs finds that he is under the impression that if this section becomes law, and a question arises as to whether the products of a country may be admitted under the lower schedule than is contained in this Act, the Controller of Customs then will find it his duty to take the question into consideration and to judge by the standard which is set down in the law, as to whether the products of that country shall be admitted or not. The hon. gentleman asks me for the standard. He knows the standard is set for me in the law :

I understand it will be the duty of the Controller of Customs to examine that tariff, to examine it in its details. He would have to examine the course of trade between that country and Canada, and have regard to the products of that country, in a measure. He would look at the trade of that country, and at the subject in all its bearings, and, in the terms of the resolution, endeavour to arrive at a decision based upon the information that he had thus gained. He would report to the Governor in Council, to whose authority the Controller of Customs under this section is subject. The Governor in Council would then approve or disapprove of the action of the Controller of Customs. According as that decision might be, so would effect be given to the clause, or so would effect be given to the introduction of the products of that country, or so would admission under the minimum schedule of the products of that country be denied. I have endeavoured to answer the hon. gentleman, I think I have made it plain, and that he can now have no difficulty. I again allude to the fact that the hon. gentleman this afternoon declared, if I understood him aright, on another point, not bearing on the reciprocal tariff, but on the subject of the treaty, which is a legal question on which it is admitted there is doubt. He declared his opinion. It was the great "I" with him, in the face of the fact that members possessing legal and constitutional knowledge had declared their opinion in favour of our proposition, and while he knew that others, perhaps not taking as strong ground, thought there was a doubt ; but the hon. gentleman decided, and so announced his opinion, that under the operation of this section we must admit the products of Germany and of Belgium, and so far as it was in his power, and so far as his influence and his views may be able to mould, if they should be able to mould, to any degree, the action of those countries which will apply for admission under the most-favoured-nation treaties, he has lent all the aid of his power in order to bring about that result. The workmen of this country, to whom he has alluded, and the manufacturers of this country, whose cause he pretends to plead, whom he says we are ruining, will note the fact that so far as that hon. gentleman's words can have any weight on this question when it comes to be argued, all the influence of the ex-Finance Minister of Canada was given to strengthen the hands of those who were trying to gain admission to our markets under the preferential clause. When China and Japan ask for a remission under this clause, should they do so, they will be able to point to the fact that the ex-Finance Minister of Canada, in his place in Parliament, declared they were entitled under the operation of this tariff to secure the introduction of their goods under the preferential clause. I simply said this : While the ex-Finance Minister had decided that under the tariff Belgium and Germany and twenty countries might come in under the reciprocal clause, and that China and Japan might come in under that clause, the Controller of Customs had not so decided.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to ask the hon. Controller of Customs one question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. gentlemen might just as well keep quiet. I assure hon. gentlemen they will not facilitate business by interrupting me, and I will stand in my place until order is maintained. For fear I shall have too much prominence and greatness thrust on me, I wish to ask the Controller : Is it a fact that weeks ago Belgian and German consuls in Canada raised the question, and that they have taken the question raised here before the hon. gentleman's own department to their own governments, and through their own governments presumably to the Government of Great Britain ? If there were any moral turpitude about it, which I do not admit for one moment, the question seems to have been raised weeks before I made any inquiry in regard to it in this House.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. The subject was brought before me, as the hon. gentleman knows ; and I think I gave some papers to the leader of the Opposition or to the hon. gentleman himself. But he will remember the subject was not raised on the basis of the reciprocal tariff, but on the question of the treaty. I think that is the only way in which it has been brought up.

Mr. DAVIN. I want to ask the Controller of Customs a question. On both occasions when he replied to the ex-Finance Minister, the hon. gentleman made a point that in case Germany or China or Japan should ask for admission under this preferential or reciprocal clause it would be able to quote what the ex-Finance Minister has stated here. I wish to ask the Controller whether, under this clause, he would not have to judge by some rule of proportion, and that, having arrived at what the rule of proportion was, would he not be bound to act according to the dictates of justice under that rule? And then as a second question, I would ask, if he is bound so to act, how will the statements of the ex-Finance Minister weigh one way or the other? I should like the hon. Controller to answer these questions.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. If there be any doubt as the hon. gentleman admits there is a doubt in regard to this matter, why should those nations not use as an argument to strengthen their case, if need be, statements made by so distinguished a gentleman as the ex-Finance Minister, an hon. gentleman who, according to his own estimation of himself, is able to pronounce authoritatively on subjects of constitutional law, in regard to which doubt exists.

Mr. DAVIN. I am not surprised at the spectacle we have had here for the entire day. I am not surprised at the silence, which will surprise the country outside, because the position in this House is this, that we are face to face with a bewildered party and a distracted Government. The Controller of Customs, when replying to the ex-Finance Minister, pointed to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and said that the ex-Finance Minister was immodest to offer opinions when an hon. gentleman occupying a high legal position had spoken as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had spoken. What did the Minister of Marine and Fisheries say? He told us that if certain things took place, then the Government were in this proud position, and again, that if by and by certain other things took place the Government would be in a different position, and so the Government were in the proud position of being supported on the spike of an "if," as described by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and is in a state of most unstable equilibrium. So, I am not surprised at the spectacle we have had, because in the two speeches of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson), who has this matter under control, we have received no light whatever. My hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) very properly asked for light, but the Controller of Customs, who will be in the position of making treaties under this legislation, in reply made such a speech which I have often heard him make from a public platform, a speech full of vigour and energy, but with due respect to him, it was not that kind of statesmanlike utterance that would give us light and leading on a question like this. The only advocate we have had defending the Government was the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), and when I heard him last night balance himself and go from one thing to the other, I could not help but think of the Yankee who went into one of our courts and saw a man defending a prisoner; he asked who it was, and when told that it was a Queen's counsel: Well, he said, if that is a Queen's counsel I pity Her Majesty.

Mr. MCGREGOR. There are no Queen's counsel in the United States.

Mr. DAVIN. Did I say it was in the United States?

Mr. MCGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. DAVIN. I said a court of justice into which a Yankee went, and I suppose there are Yankees to be found in Canada. I listened to the speech of the Minister of Marine, and I listened to the masterly refutation of that speech by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden). Sir, there are distinguished lawyers on the other side of the House. There is my hon. friend (Mr. Lount) an able lawyer; there are other able lawyers on that side, and these gentlemen know well that the argument of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) is irrefutable. No doubt the reason that no member of the Government has spoken, is, because they are in this position before the country, that either a month ago they were incompetent, or were deceiving the people. An hon. gentleman reminds me that I should have referred to the other hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), who is also a distinguished lawyer. He, too, is silent. His colleague from Halifax (Mr. Borden) has made an able argument, and that argument stands like a great pillar unshaken and unimpaired. No man on the other side of the House has dared to answer it. This then is the position, either a month ago the Government were incompetent, or a month ago they were in for a fake policy.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Carried.

Mr. DAVIN. Carried. Nonsense. No, Mr. Chairman, it is not carried. There is no power on the other side of the House to carry it until I picture to hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches the miserable position into which they have descended. We have there a Government with a large majority that is afraid to show its hand. We have a Government with an immense majority that is afraid of its life to defend its own measure. Why, Sir, such a spectacle has never been known in parliamentary history. There never was a more important measure placed before this Parliament. It goes to the very root of our fiscal system. It raises international questions of the first importance, and yet we have not had an exposition of what the meaning of the added sub-clause "B" is, and how it will work. My hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) says he will decide. I suppose that in case certain questions come before him on behalf of Germany, or on behalf of Japan, or on behalf of France, or on behalf of Austria, and certain functionaries make a proposal, he will decide. But if there is a dispute between him and any particular country, is he going to law about it, and if he goes to law, is there not a prospect, not only that he will have to give back the money collected as duty on goods from these countries, but that these countries may have a claim for damages against this Government? This is a matter that may actually touch seriously the relationship between England and her chief colony, and yet hon. gentlemen in the Government, after having first placed before the country what they call a preferential clause in favour of England, come down here a month afterwards and take it all back, and have not a word to say in defence or in explanation of their conduct. Why is that? It is because they are ashamed of the position they occupy before the House of Commons to-day. When it goes across the Atlantic, as across the Atlantic it has gone; for it is known to-day in London that the Ministers of the Empire's first colony, a month ago made professions in regard to England that had no foundation whatever, and that they now have to go back on these professions. These hon. gentlemen came forward a month ago and they told us they did great things for Great Britain by arranging to allow her goods into this country, up to the 1st of January at a one-eighth reduction, and after that at a one-fourth reduction. They know now that they are allowing the products of twenty-two nations that have high protective tariffs to come in here on the same terms as the products of England. A fortiori if the Government were doing something for England a month ago, they are now doing a great deal more for those protective countries. Therefore, the tariff as it stands now, from the standpoint of this clause, is not a preferential tariff for England, but is a preferential tariff for the countries that compete with Great Britain.

Mr. ETHIER. Carried.

Mr. DAVIN. Not carried until I have said what I want to say, and not until this side of the House have offered their criticisms. If hon. gentlemen opposite will not defend their own work, they need not suppose for one minute that Her Majesty's loyal Opposition will be false to their duty and fail to criticise it.

I have to say now, speaking generally, for the part of the country whence I come, in regard to this tariff which has been brought down, I suppose, in its final form, I am sorry to find on analysing the changes that have been made, that these changes have been made, not in the interests of the farmer, not in the interests of the workingman, but in the interests of the manufacturers who have come to the Government and pleaded before them. The manufacturer came to the Government, but where was the farmer, and where was the workingman, and where were the professed friends of the farmer? When I look at the changes made in the tariff, I find no evidences whatever that the farmers of Canada were considered, or that any of the former clients of these gentlemen were considered. As a member of Parliament, and as a citizen of Canada, I am sorry to stand face to face here with such a tariff, and I am sorry to see the Parliament of Canada placed in the position, that we have a Government with some of the first men in the country, some of the men who come into this Parliament with great reputations, men who it was supposed would do great things; yet now, in this second session of this Parliament, when a great question like this is before Parliament, they are utterly unequal to the task of vindicating their dignity and their measures. I said that we were in face of a bewildered party and a distracted Government. I may add that we have a rattled Treasury bench and great places with little dignity.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I want to draw the attention of the Controller of Customs for a moment to this law, as I am inclined to think from the statements the hon. gentleman has made here to-night that he entirely misapprehends the nature of the Act, and the duties which devolve upon him under it. The hon. gentleman says that the duty devolves upon him of deciding what countries shall come under this law. Now, I want to draw his attention to the fact that he was bound to deal with this question a month ago, and that he has failed altogether in his duty in that respect. I want to show my hon. friend that under this law he was bound, as the officer of the Government specially charged with the duty, and the Government were bound to settle the question as to what countries could and what countries could not enter their goods under this law. The hon. gentleman informed the House that on the night these resolutions had passed, instructions had been given to the officers in his department throughout Canada to admit goods from Great Britain with the reduction of one-eighth. Now, I want to ask my hon. friend to read this clause over, and to ask himself the question whether he was not clearly bound to have informed the officers of the Customs Department throughout Canada at the same time on what terms they should admit the goods of other countries. There is not a word in this clause that says that any application shall be made to the Customs Department to know whether the goods of any country come within the terms of this clause or not; but there is an absolute declaration that every country that comes within the scope of this Act shall be treated in the same manner. If that be the case, then I say my hon. friend has failed entirely in his duty, that he did not a month ago, when this Act was put in operation, give instructions to his collectors as to what countries were in a position to have their goods admitted on the same terms. I venture to say that, in my judgment, there was a good deal of doubt and misapprehension as to what the scope of this law was. I have noticed in several of the English papers the declaration that only countries that admit the goods of Canada on the same terms as those on which they are admitted into Great Britain can have the advantage of this clause. The hon. gentleman does not place that construction upon it, but the very fact that English journals have made this statement shows that it is open to misconception. I draw my hon. friend's attention, further, to the fact that there is not a word in the clause that intimates the necessity of any person making application, except to go in the ordinary way to the custom-house and present his entry for admission and that the officers of his department were bound, from the hour this became law, to state to parties making entries, whether they came within the operation of this clause or not. Now, Sir, there is no difficulty in this matter. The hon. gentleman knows that Canada has taken part, as a member of the Customs Union of Europe and America. He knows that Canada has sent her representatives to the Customs Conference at Brussels, and that the Customs Union furnishes every Government that is in association with it with a statement of the tariffs of all the countries included in it. Therefore, I hold that the hon. gentleman has entirely failed in his duty in not dealing with this subject the moment it was determined by the Government to put this law upon the Statute-book. The question as to what countries could come in under this law was not a question to be raised by any person. That question is raised by every person who enters a customs office, and asks for the entry of his goods. He is not bound to furnish any information or make any plea or to establish any claim other than the right to come within the terms of this Act. There is no reference to England in this clause; why, then, was she admitted? Because, the hon. gentleman says, she comes within the law that is laid down here; and if without any application on the part of England the customs officers were instructed to admit goods from England, in the same way the hon. gentleman was bound to give information to his officers everywhere as to what other countries could come within the operation of the law. I am of opinion that that matter has escaped the attention of my hon. friend and I draw his attention to it at once as a very important matter, because he knows that it is of the utmost importance to a country to so administer its laws that no person shall be in a position to declare that he has not been dealt equal and even-handed justice.

Now, I want, before I sit down, to say one word, and only one, upon another remark which the hon. gentleman made, and which

I think was not worthy of him. When the hon. gentleman undertook to inflame the public mind in reference to my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) and other gentlemen who raised this question as to the true construction of the German and Belgian treaties, by representing them as being the advocates of Belgium, Germany or any other country, the hon. gentleman took a course that was unworthy of himself and unworthy of the Government of which he is a member. The hon. gentleman will not deny that it is of the first importance that laws enacted by this Parliament should be capable of being maintained and being carried out, and he knows, and will recognize, as every hon. gentleman on this side of the House knows and recognizes, that it is the duty of any member of this House, whether he sits on one side or on the other, to point out any matter in regard to which he supposes that an Act is being passed which is incapable of execution and is going to lead to trouble and difficulty. My hon. friend has said that there are high legal authorities who maintain that these Belgian and German treaties have no relation to this case, and do not apply to Canada. I defy the hon. gentleman to name one high authority in the world who has ventured to express such an opinion. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have not hesitated to give the authorities upon which they based their opinions. They gave the authority of Lord Knutsford, who was charged with the duty of administering the whole Colonial Empire of Great Britain, and who laid it down in the clearest and most emphatic terms that in the British colonies no preference could be given to British goods, that under the terms of the treaties made by England with Belgium and Germany the colonies were included, and that German and Belgian goods were entitled to receive entry in those colonies on precisely the same terms as the goods of Great Britain. As a matter of course, not only were German and Belgian goods entitled to enter on precisely the same terms as the goods of Great Britain, but all the countries enjoying the most-favoured-nation treatment with England are entitled, on like ground, to have their goods admitted to all the colonies on precisely the same terms as the goods of Great Britain. That I gave as one high authority, but I gave the hon. gentleman another. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, one of the most distinguished statesmen in the House of Commons of England, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, declared on the floor of Parliament, in the presence of the Crown officers of England and of the great lawyers of both the great parties, in the most emphatic terms precisely the same doctrine. He said that in no colony could the goods of Great Britain be received on more favourable terms than the goods of Belgium and Germany and all the other countries that had the most-favoured-nation treatment. Then, I showed that the great conference that sat in Ottawa, at which the representatives of all these great outlying portions of the Empire, had joined in an application to Great Britain to remove these Belgian and German treaties, which prevented the goods of the United Kingdom being received in any particular colony except on the same terms as the goods of Belgium and Germany and these other countries. I gave the hon. gentleman the fact that the Marquis of Ripon sent a despatch to the Governor General of Canada, and that only two years ago, in which the Marquis of Ripon declared in the most emphatic terms that having examined that question in the light of all the information obtainable, there was no doubt whatever that the goods of the United Kingdom could not be admitted into Canada or any other British territory except on the same terms as were granted to Belgium and Germany. I gave him more. I gave him the authority of probably the greatest lawyer in the Empire, Sir Charles Russell, now Lord Russell of Killowen, as a Crown officer, furnished to the Government and read on the floor of Parliament, that under the treaty made by Great Britain with Belgium and Germany, no colony could admit the goods of Great Britain on more favourable terms than those of Germany and Belgium and the other countries entitled to the most-favoured-nation treatment. Will the hon. gentleman tell me what authority he has to oppose to that long list of distinguished authorities, who, for the last ten years, have given this opinion on the floor of the Imperial Parliament. In the presence of the greatest jurists of the Empire, in the presence of men who would have speedily called attention to any defect in these declarations; and it passes my comprehension how any intelligent man can be found in this country, who will say, in the face of these exalted authorities, that he entertains a single doubt on the question. It is not as if it were a new question or one which had not been threshed out in the most thorough manner. My hon. friend knows that this Parliament passed a law to approve the treaty with France, and he knows that that law was not accepted by the Imperial Government, but that the Imperial Government called upon Canada to supplement that Act by another one declaring that although these privileges were given to France by virtue of the reciprocity treaty in return for privileges conferred by France, that treaty should not go into operation unless the Dominion Parliament passed a law to provide that similar goods from Belgium and other countries should be admitted on the same terms, and that law was passed two years ago by this Parliament. This question is one that does not admit of doubt, because, whether lawyers or laymen, we must look to the highest authorities of the Empire on a question of international law which turns upon an Imperial treaty. With these great authorities all on one side and nobody on the other, there is no room for doubt. Why, Sir, we spent sixteen years in imploring the British Government to remove these treaties. What for? If they had no bearing on a matter like this, what matter to us whether they existed or not. The hon. gentleman knows that the Dominion Parliament has been unanimous in imploring the British Government to remove those treaties because they prevented the adoption of a preferential policy between the mother country and the Dominion. It is too late now to say that any doubt exists, and if none does exist, I ask whether I am chargeable with attempting to advocate the cause of Belgium or Germany when I point out the position in which we are, when I point to the fact that the law which the Government asked us to pass would not receive the assent of the Governor General unless we made provision to admit the goods of these other countries. I pointed out that the instructions to the Governor General would compel him to reserve this Act, and the Government having found that out, got over the difficulty by putting in this clause which enables them to admit goods from Belgium and Germany and other countries enjoying the most-favoured-nation treatment, on the same basis as goods from Great Britain. Under these circumstances, it is not worthy of the hon. gentleman to attempt for a single moment to say that when I point out that which is known and recognized by the highest legal authorities in the Empire, I am advocating the claims of Belgium and Germany. Sir, the hon. gentleman read a speech of mine, and I thank him for having done so. I had no idea that I had made so good a speech until I heard my hon. friend give utterance to passages from it in the eloquent and sonorous manner with which we are so familiar. I thank him for having read that speech, because he will find in it the strongest arguments I could use before the Chambers of Commerce of the Empire, to endeavour to convince the Imperial Government of their duty to remove these Belgian and German treaties that stand in the way of preferential trade between England and Canada. The hon. gentleman will find, if he reads over what he has been good enough to place in "Hansard," this argument which I used on that occasion to the Chambers of Commerce, at which members of the Imperial Parliament were present. I pointed to the fact that although these treaties might be valuable to England, yet they were doubly important to Belgium and Germany. I pointed out that as Belgium and Germany send into England 50 per cent more of their products than England sent into Belgium and Germany, I felt sure, that if Her Majesty's Government took a firm stand and said to these two countries: You must eliminate this colonial clause which found its way into these treaties long ago, but which could not find a place in them under the present enlightened policy of Great Britain; you must remove this obstruction that prevents England and her colonies reciprocating with each other, or else we will be compelled to denounce the treaties; then I believed that this clause would have been eliminated. I said then and I say now, and I believe it, that if England should take that position, these treaties are so much more valuable to Belgium and Germany than they are to England, that the clause would be at once eliminated and the difficulty removed. In conjunction with the Parliament of Canada I used every argument in favour of that contention. On one occasion, at all events, this Parliament, by a unanimous vote, appealed to Her Majesty's Government asking for the elimination of these colonial clauses, or else that the treaties should be denounced. Under these circumstances it is too late for the hon. gentleman to insinuate that the members of the Opposition are discharging anything but a solemn duty, which they owe to Parliament and to Canada, in pointing out as they did to the Government the absolute necessity of changing this clause in order to make a legal and constitutional Act that would not infringe on any British treaty. I rose for the purpose of drawing the attention of the Government to the fact, that if they will carefully read that clause, they will find it is their imperative duty without a moment's delay, to determine to what countries this reduction in the general tariff should be extended, and to instruct their officers to carry out this clause which declares itself to be the law of the land.

Mr. IVES. I rise to ask the Minister of Finance one question. From reading these resolutions I have arrived at the conclusion that this matter is the subject of executive action, but I notice that executive action is provided for only in the direction of admitting other countries, from time to time, into the enjoyment of the reciprocal arrangements, while there seems to be no provision for withdrawing from that arrangement. Now, it is quite conceivable that the Controller of Customs in looking over the tariff of a third country, for instance New South Wales, might find that at the time at which he renders his decision, the tariff of New South Wales was, on the whole, as favourable to the admission of Canadian products as the tariff of Canada is to the admission of the products of New South Wales. But, New South Wales has a legislature which year after year modifies its tariff. Suppose New South Wales, after having been admitted to this privilege in Canada, were to largely increase her duties, were to, in fact, discriminate against Canada, will the Minister of Finance tell me what machinery he has provided for the withdrawal of the preferential arrangement which he may have given to New South Wales, or, for that matter, to any other country?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I think we might safely assume that any country that would come within the provisions of that clause would be sensible enough to desire to continue, and therefore, we need not be very much alarmed in reference to that. Nevertheless, the question of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ives) is a fair one. It is rather a legal question than otherwise. Speaking off-hand, my impression is that there is authority enough within the resolution to warrant us in cancelling such an Order in Council. However, I would not wish to speak very definitely on that point; it is a legal question, and I would much prefer that hon. gentlemen of the legal profession would answer it. If there is a doubt, it may be a matter worthy of consideration. I do not anticipate that any necessity for it would arise, but in matters of this sort it might be well that we should anticipate every possible state of circumstances, and whether or not this resolution does cover as much ground as I personally think it does, it is fairly open to discussion and to the judgment of legal gentlemen.

Mr. IVES. I have given that question what little consideration I was able to give it, and I do not find within the resolution any power of retracting the privilege. Of course, it could be done by Parliament at the succeeding session, but, in the meantime, I do not find any power for executive action in that direction, and I would suggest very seriously to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) and to his leader (Mr. Laurier) whether it would not be better, in drafting this to provide for executive action in the direction of withdrawing the preferential privilege, if it should be found necessary to do so.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If such a condition should arise it would only last for a few months, and it could undoubtedly be remedied at the ensuing session of Parliament.

Mr. TAYLOR. Is it the intention of the Prime Minister to sit after 12 o'clock? I wish to know as some other gentlemen as well as myself have remarks to make on this question. If it is his intention to sit after twelve we will go on, but if not, I beg leave to suggest that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The PRIME MINISTER. As it is a holiday we will have to adjourn.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries.—(Mr. Davies.)

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would the leader of the House state what business he will proceed with on Friday?

The PRIME MINISTER. We will continue these resolutions.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.15 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 28th May, 1897

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 118) respecting the Yukon Mining and Trading Transportation Company.—(Mr. Maxwell.)

Bill (No. 119) respecting La Compagnie Mutuelle et Générale Canadienne.—(Mr. Madore.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved:

That Government Orders have precedence after questions on Monday next, and on all Mondays to the end of the session.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest to my hon. friend that it would probably be better for him to consent to leave this over for another day. It will only be giving one more private day that I think the House ought to have. The leader of the Opposition is not present here to-day. That will leave next Monday to private members, and on Monday we can take into consideration the necessities of the Government for taking all the days after that. There are some few things that probably the House would like to get at on private members' day.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am anxious to meet the wishes of the House, of course. I would remind my hon. friend, however, that there is not much on the Order paper with regard to private members' business, and I think ample opportunity has been given to all members who have business, to proceed with it. I would remind my hon. friend that, for reasons which he knows, it will be my duty to leave at an early date for England, and the Government is very anxious to take advantage of every possible day that now remains to push their business to completion.

Mr. FOSTER. I entirely sympathize with the object of the Government. Personally, I would have very little objection, but it is a strenuous thing to take away, quite a long time before there is any possibility of Parliament adjourning, every opportunity for private members' work at all. I think my hon. friend would not go far astray if he would allow the House to have Monday; thereafter it would probably be best to give the Government every day. We are very anxious to see the Government get through their business: none of us wish to stay here any longer than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. CLANCY. I desire to call the attention of the First Minister to the fact that several motions are standing on the Order paper at the hon. gentleman's own request. He suggested a moment ago that we had had ample opportunity of clearing off the Order paper. The hon. gentleman will be able to remember that I have four or five motions standing there at the request of the Government, and I should like an opportunity of at least clearing them off the paper, if not for discussion.

The PRIME MINISTER. Perhaps it would please hon. gentlemen just as well if we gave Monday week, June 7, as private members' day.

Mr. FOSTER. I quite agree with that, and that would enable my hon. friend to be with the House next Monday.

Mr. McNEILL. I would venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that I sincerely hope that everything will be done that can reasonably be expected, in order to give effect to the desire of the country, and of the Government, and I believe of the overwhelming majority of the members of this House, to enable the hon. gentleman to go over to England in such a way as will mark to the people of England our desire that he should go there as our representative in this year. I believe that it will have a most excellent effect in the mother country, and I am sure that it would meet with the approval of the people of this country if Parliament were to make a special effort to allow the hon. gentleman to go in such a way as would mark, as I have said, the strong wish of the people of this country to recognize in a fitting manner what is this year going on on the other side of the ocean. For my part, I hope our friends on this side of the House will do all that in them lies to enable the hon. gentleman to go away in that marked manner.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. TYRWHITT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the acting Minister of Militia whether the return ordered in connection with the changes in the Royal Military College, Kingston, have been brought down. I am receiving communications daily from persons interested in that institution asking for information as to those changes, which will materially affect the institution, prejudicially or otherwise.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). To the best of my recollection, the changes made were published in several of the newspapers of the country. The gist of them lies in this, that the term was reduced from four years to three years, and that the expense to the parents was also considerably reduced, to something like one-third. It is estimated that whereas under the former arrangement the average cost of each pupil to the parents might be placed at $1,400, it would now be very little over $700, if over that amount at all. If there are any other points on which the hon. gentleman desires any information, I will give orders to have the details prepared and submitted to Parliament. It had escaped my recollection that the hon. gentleman had made a motion on the subject.

Mr. TYRWHITT. Am I to understand from what the acting Minister of Militia has said that the information published in the public press was official, or if not, whether it may be considered as official?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Substantially so.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I desire to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries when he will be able to lay certain returns ordered last session, to which I have already drawn his attention, on the Table of the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I am as much surprised as the hon. gentleman that they have not yet been brought down. I wrote a special letter to my deputy asking that they be prepared at once. I will attend to the matter.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. Minister kindly take a note of the additional papers ordered this session, so that they may be brought down in one return.

Mr. FOSTER. I should be very much pleased to know that other members of the Cabinet are surprised that returns have not been brought down as ordered, and especially one promised by the Prime Minister.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The hon. gentleman, I know, refers to a special return. It will be brought down at an early day, long before the Committee of Supply meets again.

Mr. DAVIN. I should like to inquire respecting the evidence in the case of the postmaster of Northfield, B.C.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I will bring it down to-day or Monday.

REPORT.

Annual report of the Postmaster General for the year ending 30th June, 1896.—(Mr. Mulock.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

On section 16,

Mr. FOSTER. Before I proceed to make any further remarks on this section, I wish to premise one word. I do not want hon. gentlemen opposite to think for a single moment that I or any hon. member on this side of the House are speaking on this section merely for the sake of wasting time or obstructing business. I am not sure when I say this that I will be credited as being sincere in that expression or not. I run that risk however, and take that contingency, but merely wish to preface my remarks by that statement. We on this side of the House believe, and our feeling will find sympathy on the other side of the House, and will find sympathy in the country most certainly, that the forcing of this clause through the House means such a change, and such a change for the worse in many important respects, that we should not be doing our duty as members of Parliament and not be performing what ought to be performed by an Opposition in a Parliament unless we called attention to the very utmost, the attention first of the Government and the members who support the Government, and next of this House and the country, to the extraordinary nature of this resolution which the Government has imported into this tariff. We protest against this as being in its most important subject matter something which ought not to have been placed in a resolution which is proposed as a part of the customs law. There are principles involved and methods of action and a policy outlined which should have asked and should have obtained for themselves independent thought and independent discussion in a measure devoted to themselves, where Parliament would not be hampered as Parliament is hampered to-day by considering these propositions in a customs law. But I am not going to dwell longer on that point. I am going to emphasize the points we have already presented. I am sorry the Controller of Customs is not present. I hope he will be present, for I do not think we can make much progress unless we have the Controller to explain what we want to know and to discuss what we are bound to discuss, and what we feel able to discuss, the details of this measure; and I do not think it is fair, nor do I think it is extremely courteous to proceed with the discussion without the responsible head of the Customs Department being in his seat. I also want to ask him and members of the Government to do us the courtesy to listen to what we say, and to stay in the House while we are saying it. We are not speaking for the fun of speaking, and it is a matter grave enough to entitle us to ask at least patient consideration and discussion, a reciprocal discussion engaged in by both sides of this House. However, I shall go on now to some of the points emphasized and will emphasize them again. I am aware I have stated them before, but they are so important I wish to state them again. First, as to the indefiniteness of this resolution. The leader of the House was not here when, on Thursday, hon. gentlemen on this side of the House tried to impress on members of the Government the exceedingly indefinite nature of the conditions, if we may call them conditions at all, outlined in this resolution. In fact it resolves itself simply into this: that the Controller of Customs and twelve men forming the Cabinet for the time being, simply sit down and make up their minds as to whether it would be wise to let a certain country, with its industries and products, into this country on the level of a one-eighth or a one-fourth reduction in the tariff rates. They are bound by no standard. They have not placed in that resolution, nor have they given us in any remarks they have made, the least idea as to what shall be the principles which shall guide them in arriving at their decisions. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in a chance expression which fell from him in the late hours of Wednesday night, made an admission. My hon. friend (Mr. Ives) raised this point: That although the Government had provided machinery by which this clause could be put into operation it provided no machinery by which the privilege could be withdrawn, if a country with which such an arrangement had been concluded, afterwards changed its tariff so as to make a generic difference in the conditions under which the reciprocal privilege was in the first place accorded. And, in reply to that, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance suggested, that possibly it could be done by Order in Council; he thought it could; but if it could not be done by Order in Council at least it would not hurt this country much to let it run along in the interim during the recess of Parliament. Just one point occurs to me in connection with that. If it would not hurt this country much, to allow an unequal condition imported by another country into this matter; to remain with the advantages which it had not paid for between the sessions of Parliament; it would not hurt this country much, if, in the case of every individual country with whom an arrangement was proposed to be made, Parliament were awaited to sanction that arrangement. But yet, they take away the power of Parliament on wide ranges of tariff items, while they are quite willing, if we take the saying of the Minister of Finance for it, to allow Canada to battle between the two sessions of Parliament with the unequal condition of things which may be imported by one of the countries to the bargain. The Minister of Finance suggested then, that by Order in Council you could do away with that preferential under-rate. Government surely has not gone so far as to ask to be allowed by Order in Council to raise duties upon articles. The Government is asking sufficient authority to reduce duties according to its own will and wish, by Order in Council; but the Minister of Finance gravely suggested to this Parliament, that if at any time it is thought well to withdraw the privilege from any nation, the consequent increase of 25 per cent in the duties could probably be done by Order in Council. Is that a foreshadowing that the Government is bound, not only to take from Parliament the right of lowering its duties in detail; but that as the next step agreed to by a subservient majority, we should be asked to give them the whole power of raising by Order in Council the tariff on articles that are imported into this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite laugh. Why should hon. gentlemen smile and think this such great fun.

Mr. TALBOT. We are laughing at the expression "subservient majority."

Mr. FOSTER. In the name of all that is constitutional in Government, dare a Liberal, or can a Liberal smile at the thought, that a Liberal Government suggests that we should give to a Cabinet council, the right to raise the duties and lower the duties on as extensive a scale as they like, and to do it simply by Order in Council. I cannot understand it. I fail to understand it, and I say, that the majority behind the Government will merit in history the title of subservient, if it so degrades the power of Parliament, as to take away from Parliament the right to say what the duties shall be, and what its revenues shall be, and what commercial treaties shall be in each individual instance made with countries with which Canada has trade relations. I am sorry, Sir, that it has fallen to the lot of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier), a Liberal of the old Liberal school, as he plumes himself upon being, to place into one single article of the tariff, three principles which are subversive of all the rights of Parliament and which principles have been contended for by Reformers and Liberals through four or five hundred years of British history. Well, Sir, we shall dismiss as utterly absurd, the idea, that even this Cabinet is going to raise the duties by Order in Council, after they have once lowered them by 25 per cent. The Minister of Finance cannot have thought of what he was saying, and could not have had the least glimmer of the principle underlying that suggestion, or he certainly would not have made it. I was speaking of the first thing that we object to, and I want the close attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) to this: Is it right that any Cabinet should have the power given it of simply, without basis or standard, being able to conclude commercial treaties with any country in the world, and every country in the world, involving an aggregate reduction in the revenue of the country from that trade of 25 per cent ultimately. Is it right that they should have the power to do that, without at least giving Parliament to understand what shall be the basis of their judgment when they come to the conclusion, and what shall be the standard of their judgment with reference to their arrangement with another country. Now, Sir, I tried to get from the Controller of Customs a single definite idea of what his standard was. How is he to judge? Take a concrete instance; take China, take Japan, take Germany, or take any country that you like; and suppose that the point is raised as to whether in the case of Germany—to argue out the concrete instance—Canada shall allow German goods to come into this country at an ultimate reduction of one-fourth of the present duties. There is the Controller of Customs sitting at the head of an important department; he is the first man to move. I do not know whether he has to report to Council by document, and give the Council something upon which they can deliberate so as to ultimately pass the Order in Council; but in some way or other he is to form his judgment as to whether he is to recommend to the Cabinet that they shall place Germany upon the favoured list, and give to German products a reduction of 25 per cent. Now, when he sits down to think that out, and to make his decision, and then to give his decision to the Government, what are the rules by which he limits himself? What are the bases upon which he is to make his deductions and come to his conclusion? Is he to say: "The Germans are of an old stock, somewhat nearly related to us; it would be rather a good thing on the ground of old and remote family relationship, that we should allow them to trade with us, and so promote the era of goodwill and the like of that." My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) smiles, because he sees that that would be utterly absurd. So it would be, but I submit this to my hon. friend, that as far as any conditions in the resolution before us restrain him, he can make up his mind on such a basis as that, and recommend to the Cabinet that Germany should be put on the favoured list. Or, does he say: "Now, Germany is a good country for us to look to as a future outlet for our trade; we may not expect very much there now; we may import from that country very much more than we may export to it; I do not know that we have any advantage at present, but the future, if we cultivate these people, may have great advantages for us in this trade; I think I will risk the chance anyway and recommend this to the Cabinet." Would that be satisfactory? Evidently not. Then, I ask you, in the light of those two considerations, which show the absurdity of having no conditions, what has the Controller of Customs to guide him when he looks into that matter? What is the wording of the resolution? "That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to are to that country," then he can make his decision, and can bring in that country. Now, what is the canon or rule by which he is to be guided as to whether those terms are as favourable on the whole or not? What is he going to do, what can he do, except simply this, if he is going to have any rule or consistency at all: compare the tariffs of the two countries on the products which are likely to be interchanged, and if he finds that the tariff of Germany, for instance, upon Canadian goods which are likely to be sent to Germany is no greater or is less than the Canadian tariff on goods which are likely to come from Germany into Canada, then he can say: I will recommend that German goods be allowed in at the eighth or fourth reduction."

Now, what this House wants to know, and what we could not get the Minister to say, is whether that is to be the rule that will guide him or not. Evidently you must have some rule; you cannot deal with nations except on a ground of strict and absolute justice, and in accordance with certain rules. You cannot, just by whim or caprice, say: "We will let in one country, and we will not let in another." Every commercial country in the world has a right to knock at the door of the Controller of Customs and say: "I want the rule on which you admit to your favours, and I will see whether or not I can conform to that rule." What other rule can be given? And if that consideration makes an arrangement with one country, say Germany, possible, it might make an arrangement with many other countries possible as well. Now, here is Parliament, and there is that resolution: we do not know to-day whether that is to be the rule that will guide or not; and we are asked to give this carte-blanche undefined power into the hands of the Government, under which if this power is given almost every great manufacturing country under the sun can apply to Canada, and can have its products placed on the basis of the 25 per cent reduction. Japan can, China can, Switzerland can—even if Switzerland does not, as we believe it does, come under the most-favoured-nation clause. And so you can take that clause, and the denial of my hon. friend the Prime Minister, that he is not going to let the “favoured-nation” treaty clauses have any force so far as the Canadian customs are concerned. Waive the treaty aside for a moment, and take the simple clause as it stands, and Belgium, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Japan and China—in fact, nine-tenths of the countries of the world can show you that their average tariff against goods coming from Canada is less than the average tariff of Canada against goods coming from those countries into Canada. So Parliament is face to face with this eventuality, that it is probably putting into the hands of this Government a power which may open Canada to the competition on that lower basis of almost every country in the world, if a comparison and average of tariffs is to be the rule upon which the Government are to make their ultimate decision. Now, what is fairer than for Parliament to ask that at least the Government shall take the House into their confidence, and explain exactly what the principle is upon which they shall base their action in making these arrangements with commercial countries? That is the first thing we urge. We ask the Government to give us and the country the basis upon which they propose to make up their minds; after the basis is given, it may be found to be such as would exclude a great deal of these contingent and possible arrangements, but the House ought certainly to know how wide the conditions are, and consequently how wide would be the possible scope of arrangements to be made with commercial countries. Now, am I insisting upon more than the right of the House when I insist upon having that explanation? Is the Opposition or any member of Parliament asking more than his fair right when he asks to have that point made clear before being called to vote on this question?

So much with reference to that. The next in point is the possible effect upon the industries of this country; and now I appeal to my hon. friend the leader of this Government. He himself, by word of mouth, and his followers all over this country, kept Liberal manufacturers in line by assuring them that the industries of this country would not be injuriously affected by the tariff that would be introduced. Now, I am not making a statement outside of the fact, and my hon. friend will not deny it.

Mr. FOSTER.

and my hon. friend's friends will not deny it. Well, Sir, with this indefiniteness in the clause of which I have just spoken, with the possible dropping down to a 25 per cent reduction, and with all these different countries injected into competition with Canadian labour and the industries of Canadians, I look with fear and trembling to the industrial interests of this country under such a competition as that. I unhesitatingly assert that Canadian industries cannot possibly maintain themselves under a competition as wide as is proposed by this resolution. I say that it cannot be done. In a country where capital costs so much more than in most of these countries, in a country where labour costs so much more, in a country where climatic conditions are harder for many of our textile and other industries by far than in many of these other countries which could compete with us—on all these and other considerations which might be stated, we declare that if, under the loose conditions which are laid down, the Government go so far as it is possible for them to go and grant this 25 per cent reduction, the industries of this country cannot be maintained in the face of that competition. Is it a light thing to disturb all the growing industries of the country, is it a light thing to disturb the young life and energy and capital and enterprise which have been at work for the last fifteen or twenty years building up these Canadian interests, in the midst of a commercial war in which every country in the world aroused its battalions against us with the exception of Great Britain alone? Is it right, is it fair, is it statesmanlike, to allow this young and growing industrial life and development to be hampered and shackled, if not totally destroyed, by the invoking of competition on the basis of a reduction of duties to the extent of 25 per cent in favour of these countries that may come in, if the standard is as I have said, and we have no word to the contrary from the Government. So that on behalf of the industries of Canada, which do not mean simply a few monopolists or a few capitalists, but which mean the working people of this country and the agricultural producers of this country, we on this side are opposed to this resolution, and we ask the Government to stay its hand in opening up the industrial life and production of Canada to a competition which seems to be so world-wide and in which the conditions of the parties are so unequal. That is the second point; we have had no answer to it at all. The Ministers have simply sat in their places, they have heard what we have urged, the only attempt at reply that has been made was made by one gentleman of the Ministry, who tried to make a legal argument, which was torn into utter shreds by the legal argument of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden).

Mr. McMULLEN. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. That I am willing to leave, not to my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), because he is not an unbiassed judge. The time was when I thought my hon. friend had a straight back and was thoroughly independent. That was when I used to hear him declare in favour of independence, in favour of the rights of Parliament, and I thought then, there stands a man who, if he only had a legal training, would make a distinguished judge. I said to myself: there is a man who, if he is ever successful in getting into the Cabinet, and he ought to be, for he works hard and is diligent, will steer that Cabinet clear of all the shoals which threaten the ship of state. But I have since changed my opinion. I would not allow a matter like this to be decided by my hon. friend from North Wellington, but I am willing to leave it to legal minds to say which of those two arguments is the stronger, and at least I am not going beyond the book when I say that in an argument on the vital question raised by this resolution, surely amongst some of the lawyers on the other side there should be one to meet our contention. Some of my hon. friends opposite have legal talents. Why, I see before me the late Premier of the province of New Brunswick (Mr. Blair), a lawyer in his own province of reputation and ability; I see before me the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Lount), a lawyer of standing and eminence; just behind is a lawyer from the city of Halifax (Mr. Russell), breathing that saline air and living upon that phosphoric essence which tends to make brains, but he too says nothing. None of these legal luminaries have anything to say. Not one of them has ventured to stand up to defend the legal position of the Government.

Mr. MCGREGOR. The Government was right.

Mr. FOSTER. Last but not least, there is an eminent man on the front benches, a lawyer as well, the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) to wit, who has not felt that in this matter he would like to cross swords in a legal argument on this constitutional point with my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden). Where are all these lawyers? If there is any class of men always ready to talk, it is that class. When they were on this side, how they did talk. But on that side they are still as mice and will remain so, so far as this legal argument is concerned. And my hon. friend who just interrupted me (Mr. McGregor)—if I could take out that hon. gentleman's heart, leaving him all his animation, and just lay it bare, I believe I could see imprinted on it this sentiment: Well, the Government have got us into a bad fix, but we have to put them through. No, Sir, we have not had a single member of the Government meet our arguments. We have not had one to quiet our fears, to remove our apprehensions. Not one of them has attempted to do it. Now, I leave that matter of the industries of the country with the simple remark, that if there is any one thing that hon. gentlemen cannot fool with, it is the business interests of this country. You may fool with political partisans, you may fool with the civil service, you may fool with a great many interests in this country, but the Government that fools with the great, broad business interests of this country, its industrial and productive life, will have to pay the reckoning, and regard for those interests is the one thing which every Government should have foremost in its view, in every measure they bring down. So much with regard to the business side of the question.

Now, as to the powers of Parliament, I am going to address myself to the leader of the Government, who is the man to whom every such argument ought to be addressed, because he is the keeper of the rights of Parliament, being at the head of a victorious majority and able to carry out whatever he pleases to propose. I ask my hon. friend if it is in accordance with the struggles or the traditions of Liberalism that he shall take power for the Cabinet to make commercial treaties of this wide kind, for it means that, and to disturb the finances of the country to the extent of a quarter of the revenue on imports from any country with whom this Government may choose to make an arrangement? Is it in accord with the principles of Liberalism to take this power from Parliament and relegate it to his Cabinet to arrange by Order in Council? I ask him if he thinks that is in accordance with the history, the struggles and the traditions of Liberalism in any English or constitutionally-governed country. That it is which we feel this Parliament is giving up—its right of supervision over the finances of the country. Let me put this consideration. What are we brought here for? For what does this Government ask us to come here once a year? Aside from all other things, the two most important are these: To fix what shall be the revenues of the country, first; then to say what, based upon that fixture of revenue, shall be the expenditures of the country, and whether they shall or shall not exceed the revenue. Can there be any denial that that is the most important function of Parliament? And now my appeal to Liberals is stronger even than to Liberal-Conservatives. Liberal-Conservatives say that a tariff is made with two objects in view, one to raise a revenue and the other to subserve the industrial life of the country by furnishing some protection adequate to preserve it. But Liberals have only one branch of that to stand upon. They declare that the only thing to be looked to in fixing the tariff of a country is the revenue to be obtained. Very well. Parliament is called together; it takes the whole field into survey; it declares that it is best to raise our revenues for the succeeding year by certain rates on certain articles; and until Parliament revises its opinion the revenues must be raised by certain rates of duty upon certain imports and gathered into the public chest in that way. After these rates are fixed, Parliament debates the estimates and decides what shall be voted, based upon the revenue fixed. So, the revenue fixed first, and the expenditure fixed next are arranged by Parliament, and are not to be disarranged until Parliament expresses its change of mind. That is why my hon. friend cannot expend a single dollar, except it has been voted by Parliament. There is only one exception to that, and that is in the extraordinary method of a Governor General's warrant, for which the conditions are laid down and in which some little elasticity is necessary in order that things of great moment shall not be allowed to lapse, be destroyed, be wasted, or be wanting for absolute emergencies.

Well, Sir, what is the proposition here? The proposition is that when Parliament has fixed a revenue after carefully looking over the advantages and disadvantages, when Parliament has fixed the rates of duty and then fixed the expenditures, a Cabinet of thirteen men shall have the power placed in its hands—it asks for it and proposes to get it through its majority—to diminish these revenues, so far as the imports go, by 25 per cent of the whole, which totally disarranges the financial basis, turns a surplus into a deficit or adds to a possible deficit many thousands of dollars, maybe many millions of dollars. Now, I say that no Finance Minister, no Parliament, can see its way clear and take its steps carefully and prudently under such conditions, such unknown and contingent conditions as these. This disarranges the whole basis of the finances of the country by giving up to the Cabinet what Parliament always keeps in its own hands and jealously guards.

But the other point is stronger still. In so unimportant matter as the French treaty—and let me say in what sense I use the word "unimportant." It was unimportant in the extremely small list of articles which were allowed, under that treaty, to come in at lower rates. I ask my hon. friend the leader of the Government (Mr. Laurier) whether he would, for a single moment, have agreed that before we went into the negotiations of that treaty, we should have carte-blanche from this Parliament to arrange a treaty with France and put it into operation without coming to Parliament and asking for its sanction? Would he have allowed that; would he have given it his sanction? Take the list of articles covered by the treaty. What does it include? Some kinds of fish, some kinds of nuts and fruits—a, comparatively speaking, unimportant range of articles. And yet, Sir, all the power the Government had—and rightly so—was to arrange a treaty and bring it dutifully to Parliament and ask Parliament whether it would accept it or whether it would not. But, under this clause, what do you ask the right to do? You ask the right—and you wish to get it—by which you can make a treaty with any large or small power over nearly the whole range of items of the tariff, limited only by the condition that your reduction shall not be greater than 25 per cent of the current rate. Take an instance. Government have gone down to Washington by delegation to make a treaty of reciprocity with the United States. They never asked us for, they never got—and it is right that they never should get—the authority to go down to Washington and negotiate a treaty and put it into operation without first asking the sanction of this Parliament. No one ever thought of asking that power; no one, I believe, in the olden times, would have been willing to grant that power. But what may happen now? Suppose that this power is granted. Then, as soon as this Parliament is prorogued you can send a delegation to Washington with instructions: Get free lumber, get free fish, get free access for this and that, and if you get these things you may promise a reduction of one-eighth and, ultimately, of one-quarter of our duties. That Congress exists through August and September, maybe through October and November. That arrangement might be made, Congress there might agree to it, and it might be put into operation in this country before Parliament could have a chance to say whether it was in favour of the arrangement or not, to the extent of 25 per cent reduction on the present rates. I ask you if this is a power which any Government ought to ask from Parliament, a power which any Parliament ought to give up? Now, there is no need of multiplying instances; but the Government could do the same with China, with Japan, with any country under the sun.

More, Sir, and this is the last point I propose to urge again, for it has been urged before, when you do what I have shown you have power to do, you exercise the right of making a commercial treaty, limited to a range of 25 per cent reduction, with any power, and that without reference to this Parliament and without reference to the Imperial Parliament. Has that power ever been given to any colony by Great Britain? Never. That power has not only not been given to any colony, but it never can be given to any colony so long as the Empire is an Empire, and the British Government is the Imperial Government and holds the power of empire in its hands. Sir, within the clauses of a Tariff Act, you bring into this Parliament the whole question of commercial treaties. You propose to get a power, in a clause of a Customs Act, which will enable you to make a commercial treaty with any country in the world without submitting the details of this treaty to this Parliament, and without any reference to the Imperial Parliament.

Is not that a power that never has been asked, never has been thought of being asked, in this Parliament? Never a Government sitting in the Parliament of Canada have proposed to do that sort of thing, or to ask that power. Britain has Imperial obligations. In the despatches with the Australian colonies, with Canada, with the other colonies, with Newfoundland, with the British West Indies, how often has it been brought out in the correspondence that Great Britain has obligations entered into under treaty with other powers, that oblige her to see that certain things are done, and that if the colony has the unrevised power of making a commercial treaty, it may bring Great Britain at once into collision with any of the great powers with whom she has made and is loyally carrying out a solemn, and an absolute, and a definite treaty. So that on all these grounds the Opposition oppose this; they think that it is prejudicial to the best interests of Canada, they think it is derogatory to the powers of Parliament, they think it bodes trouble, and asks for a status as regards Imperial powers which no colony has a right to ask for itself, or has a right to take upon itself. On these grounds, knowing well that this Parliament is anxious to get through, knowing well that we will be styled obstructors if we raise our voices again and again upon this clause, knowing well that we are troublesome when we ask for explanations or arguments to convince us why such an extraordinary set of powers should be given, we still think that it is our duty to press our objections, and to ask for this discussion, and to make our voices and our opinions as strongly felt before the country as we can, against demands which are derogatory to the independence of Parliament, and which are dangerous to give into the hands of any Government. I forgot one thing, I will mention it.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am surprised at that.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend does me great credit. I try to remember everything, but I often fail. I ask my hon. friend to put himself into the shoes of a business man, if he can do that now, for a single moment.

Mr. TALBOT. The shoes are too small.

Mr. FOSTER. There are some pretty strong business men in this country, and my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is modest enough to acknowledge at once, as any man in this Parliament will do, that his Government are not the peers of Canada's princely and successful business men in matters of business. Now let him put himself in the shoes of a business man. There is his capital, it is his all. A man does not find capital showered down from heaven upon him; he has to earn it, it is his stock in trade. He looks at the business conditions of a country, at its tariff conditions, and he makes his investment in an industry on the strength of those conditions. He finds here that there is a certain line of duties upon certain articles. On the strength of that, he puts in his half million dollars, he goes to manufacturing that line of articles, and he says: Now, to the extent of that tariff duty, I will have a compensating advantage, and on the strength of it I put my money in. It happens at the best that he is subject to contingency; Parliament may at any session revise its opinion and leave him in a position not as good as he was. But he trusts Parliament, because Parliament is made up of a large number of business men with interests from all over this Dominion, and many of them first-class business men. He trusts Parliament, and he puts in his money. But, Sir, where is he if, at any time after he puts his capital in and commences his work, the Cabinet, by the extraordinary power it may have, reduces the duty on the very article that he is manufacturing by 25 per cent of its rate, and lets German competition in upon him in that line? Where is he? His investment is not worth anything to him. I tell my hon. friend, and I want him to try to believe it if he can, that there is a long line of industries in this country which, under your present general tariff, may be kept in this country, but if you let Germany and Belgium into the competition you cannot keep them in this country. German labour, perseverance, attention to detail, untiring patience to suit the foreign market, whatever its foibles, makes the German and the Belgium competitor the most formidable competitor in this and in every other country of the world. Now what becomes of the stable condition which capital ought to have as far as it can have? But you say Parliament might change its mind. No, Parliament cannot change its mind, or won't change its mind without a full discussion of the subject, and without its being possible for the manufacturer to make known his side of the case before Parliament, and that is everything. As my hon. friend the Finance Minister knows, it is everything. There are industries in Canada to-day which would have been wiped out utterly if my hon. friend's first views as regards his tariff, had gone into law.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. FOSTER. "No," then why have the changes been made? Is the Finance Minister so fickle that he changes just for the sake of change? The Finance Minister changed because business men gave him facts and figures, and he did not dare to face them, and he raised the duty, or lowered the duty on the raw material, which is the same thing so far as principle is concerned. So that the reason why that has not been done with reference to those particular industries, is that the business men interested were advertised that the proposition was before the House. They came to the fountain head, they worked upon the Government, and they worked upon members, they made their case good, and they prevented the destruction. Your Cabinet of 13 sit in the Star Chamber, they deliberate amongst themselves, they go to work with this power in their hands, and they take that duty off, and the first thing the capitalist knows about it is when he finds goods from the competing countries coming in where they did not before, at a reduction of 25 per cent. The evil is done, there is no advertisement to the country, the mischief is all completed before the business man knows that it is even contemplated.

Mr. DAVIS. What about the consumer ?

Mr. FOSTER. I will tell my hon. friend what about the consumer. There is a certain class of agricultural implements—and I want him to listen—that are sold for something like $2.40 a dozen ; when they get to Winnipeg and are resold, they are about $4 a dozen, and when they get to his place of business and are sold by him, they are $6.60 a dozen. “ What about the consumer ? ” I had some experience of this solicitude for the consumer. I met men in Winnipeg, when I was on that commission looking into tariff conditions, who wept hot tears over the extraordinary prices that the poor farmer paid for coal oil ; but when the investigation got at what happened, we found out that the Petrolia men sent their oil in tanks at a charge of ten cents per gallon, that the charge of conveying it to Winnipeg did not add more than a few cents to that, but that this man put it into his great big can, and when he turned the spigot to let the gallon out for the poor consumer, he got a price a little more than double what it had cost him. Still he cried over the consumer. Now, Sir, that, I say, is the chief difficulty with reference to this matter of Star Chamber work, of Star Chamber change, of Cabinet change, if you don't like the other term. I say that once this is passed you will import a contingency, a doubt, and an uncertainty into the business which will make it impossible for prudent men to invest large capital in staple businesses, and will consequently derange for the worse the business and trade of this country. Now I have put carefully and honestly and with my best force what I believe to be some of the objections to this section—I have not stated half of them—and they are such as to merit the attention of the Government.

The PRIME MINISTER. I protest against the assertion, or rather the insinuation with which my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) prefaced his remarks, that the Ministers have shown scant courtesy towards the Opposition and have not always been in their seats to listen to the arguments offered from the other side of the House. So far as concerns myself, it is my regret that I have not been able during the last few days to be as often in my seat as I would have wished to be. If I were absent, it was not a matter of choice, because if the choice had rested with me, I would have preferred to be here ; but I was called away by other business. I may say, however, without being offensive I suppose, that the time of the House and the time of Ministers might be as well, and perhaps more profitably spent elsewhere than here listening to arguments which we have heard not once but over and over again. I have no objection at all that the Opposition should place their views on record—it is their right ; but I have this remark to offer, that it is hardly fair that the Government and Parliament should be called upon to answer arguments which have been answered not once but several times over.

I have listened with a good deal of interest to the speech of my hon. friend, and I may say that although he put his whole soul and heart into it, no very strong argument but simply a few words are required to show that the whole argument and objection set up have no foundation whatever. I take the very words of my hon. friend himself. He has put forward, as he stated, an absurd proposition against the resolution now before the House, and having put forward that absurd proposition he answered it, and he now wants hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to take those arguments as serious arguments and answer them. That is not a fair way of arguing. I am willing to take the position assumed by my hon. friend and meet him on every point. What was his first point ? It was that the clause itself—he did not go into the merits of the clause—might create serious complications, that it might open the door to the admission of the goods of more than one nation to our markets under this clause. He did not attack the resolution on its merits ; he did not say it was wise or unwise in its terms, but he attacked it on account of the consequences to which he said it might lead. The fear in his mind is, that under this resolution the markets of Canada will be opened not only to Great Britain, as at the present time they are, but that they may be opened to many other countries as well. My hon. friend has abandoned the argument which was set up the other day—that possibly the commercial treaties which Great Britain has with Belgium and Germany, might admit Belgian and German goods ; but the basis of the hon. gentleman's argument to-day was that one, two, four or five nations, including Japan and China, might on account of their low tariffs be entitled to the same advantage as is given to Great Britain. In regard to this point I may tell the hon. gentleman that the institution which he characterized in more or less happy language as a “ star chamber,” the Cabinet of Canada, had to take this matter into consideration. The hon. gentleman surely cannot suppose that we propose to place upon the Statute-book that law without looking in advance as to where it will lead us. We had to look around in the world as to see what countries would be admitted under this preferential tariff, and having looked over the world, from the one pole to the other, we saw only one nation in a position to take advantage of that tariff, and it was Great Britain. We have so acted, and having acted on that condition, it remains to be seen whether there is any other country occupying the same position. I do not see any other country occupying that position—possibly there are others, but I do not see them. That, however, is the position we take, and it is the position on which we are acting. The hon. gentleman—as he has done more than once this session and in previous sessions, and especially since the present Government came into office—has become very much afraid less, forsooth, Liberal principles might be deviated from. I may tell my hon. friend that on this ground he may hold his scull in peace. The Liberal party will look after the interests of the Liberal party, and when the hon. gentleman comes forward to look after the interests of the Liberal party, I suggest it will be well for the hon. gentleman and his friends to look after the interests of their own party.

Mr. MILLS. The Liberal-Conservative party look not only after the interests of their party, but also after the interests of the country.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman says the Liberal-Conservatives look after the interests of the country. The people did not think so on 23rd June. If they did look after the interests of the country, they showed poor judgment in their efforts. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) came to the conclusion that we were making a new departure from Liberal principles by giving to the Governor in Council power to make treaties. I say at once to my hon. friend that if we were giving the Governor in Council power to make treaties, it would indeed be a departure from Liberal principles. We do not recognize that, however, great the power of the Governor in Council may be, it would be in accordance with Liberal traditions, and still less with Liberal principles, that the Governor in Council should be possessed of powers which should be exclusively possessed by Parliament. I deny the hon. gentleman's proposition as a matter of fact. The hon. gentleman contends that section 16 of the tariff places in the hands of the Governor in Council power to make treaties. I take issue with him in toto, and I place myself in the judgment of this House, not only of hon. members on this side of the House but of hon. gentlemen opposite as well, and I call the attention of the House to the fact that the Governor in Council will have no power except the power which is on the Statute-book and which has remained there for more than a year and for more than one Parliament, as I shall show presently. My hon. friend shakes his head. He is a doubting Thomas, and I shall put his finger in the wound by-and-by. The Governor in Council is asking no special power in regard to discretion to be exercised, but it is simply applying the law which is already on the Statute-book. Here is the law such as it is at the present time, and in regard to this law and in regard to all such laws, it is for the Government to apply it, and we shall apply it. What is it? But before I proceed further, I wish to show to my hon. friend that the power we have taken to ourselves is not a new power. If I understood the argument as framed in the hon. gentleman's own mind, it is, that the Governor in Council is clothed with the power of determining whether such and such products of a country are as regards duty on an average on a similar level.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). It is a question of fact.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) says that this is a power which should not be vested in any Government, but let me call his attention to a section which was placed in the Statute-books of Canada when he sat upon this side of the House, and which was placed there with his concurrence and endorsement. Section 6 of the Customs Act of the late Conservative Government reads as follows:—

Any or all of the following articles,—that is to say:—animals of all kinds, green fruit, hay, straw, bran, seeds of all kinds, vegetables (including potatoes and other roots), plants, trees and shrubs, coal and coke, salt, hops, wheat, peas and beans, barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat and all other grain, flour of wheat and flour of rye, Indian meal and oatmeal and flour or meal of any other grain, butter, cheese, fish (salted or smoked), lard, tallow, meats (fresh, salted or smoked), and lumber, may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this Act, upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same under such proclamation when imported into Canada.

Now, Sir, here is the power vested in the Governor General in Council to issue a proclamation to reduce the rate of duty. It is not only a power given to the Governor in Council to make an article free of duty, but it is power to reduce the rate of duty, whenever, in the judgment of the Governor in Council a corresponding reduction has taken place in the duties on similar goods in the United States. I ask, Sir, what difference is there between this section in the Conservative Tariff Act, and the section we now propose in this tariff. Let me read the section which we are now discussing :

That when the customs tariff of any country—

Mr. FOSTER. "Any country."

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, any country.

Mr. TAYLOR. The other only applied to the United States.

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, then, if that is all the difference my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is perfectly welcome to that shade of difference, because it is only a shade. In the old Customs Act, the power was only given with reference to one country, and under the present Act the power is given, so that the privilege may be extended to more than one country. Where, I ask, is the difference between the two? This section which we are now considering reads :

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be entered for duty, or taken out of warehouse for consumption in Canada, at the reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff.

The same principle is laid down here as was laid down in the former Tariff Act. Here the principle is a little broader in its application than it was in the old Act, but the principle itself is exactly the same. And now let us see as to the modus operandi of carrying out this section. It is stated that the Governor in Council may issue a proclamation, and that means that the Cabinet may inform His Excellency. Here is the modus operandi as set forth in the resolution :

(a.) That any question that may arise as to the countries entitled to the benefits of the reciprocal tariff shall be decided by the Controller of Customs, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council.

We have, therefore, provided some better machinery in this resolution than was provided under the old. The machinery set forth in this resolution is more perfect than it was formerly, because, instead of saying that the reduction of duty may be made by the proclamation of the Governor in Council, we have provided that it shall be done upon the report of the Controller of Customs, but subject, of course, to the approval of the Governor in Council. That is all the difference there is. The principle is absolutely the same and in the face of such a Tariff Act as the late Act for which he (Mr. Foster) himself was responsible, I am surprised that my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) should raise such an objection as he and his friends have been insisting upon since this resolution has come before us. The hon. gentleman understands—at least I hope he now understands—the nature of the resolution that we have before us, but he wants to have the canon of construction on which the Controller of Customs is to use his report. Well, Sir, the canon of construction is to be found in the resolution itself. The Controller of Customs has only to take the resolution, and to see whether or not the tariff of a country is, on the whole, as favourable as ours is. That is all.

Mr. FOSTER. Give us a concrete instance, and show us how it will work out.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, I will give you a concrete instance. Suppose, for instance, in the language of the old tariff law, a reduction of 50 per cent or 10 per cent duty had been made in the United States. Then the Governor in Council would have to exercise his powers of arithmetic to see whether or not that would come to the level of our tariff. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) wants to have a concrete instance. There is one little difficulty why I cannot, in a sense, give him a concrete instance, and that is, that I do not know of any instance, with the exception I have given. I told him a moment ago that the only country in the world which is entitled to this is Great Britain, and possibly New South Wales. Then, with the exception of Great Britain, and possibly New South Wales, the Government of Canada is not aware of any country in the world which is entitled to the benefits of this reciprocal clause.

My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has also raised another point. He has told us that the question was raised by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) : If you apply this tariff, how are you going to repeal it if afterwards the country which you extend it were to change its tariff? Well, that is a very hypothetical case. But, let us take a suppositious case, and we will say, for example, that New South Wales might come under the terms of this preferential clause. Suppose New South Wales has a tariff which, on the whole, is as favourable to Canada as our reciprocal tariff is to them, then it would come under this tariff. But suppose that, later on, New South Wales should raise its tariff, my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) asks, and it is a fair question : How are you going to withdraw the privilege which you had already given to New South Wales ; should it be done by Act of Parliament, or by Order in Council? My opinion is that you have in the resolution itself the very condition which solves the difficulty. The resolution reads :

1. That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be imported direct into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein at the reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff.

Now, what would be the consequence? Suppose that to-morrow the Government came to the conclusion that New South Wales, under its existing tariff is entitled to this preferential tariff, and suppose that at some period after this, New South Wales raised her tariff so as to make it no longer on a level with this tariff, the condition works out automatically, and thereupon New South Wales would be no longer entitled to the benefit of this tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. It strikes me that in that case the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) is driven to this: Say that a certain article comes in from New South Wales and you make a provision by which it can be admitted, and the moment that arrangement is made, the tariff, as regards that article from New South Wales is, say, 20 per cent. Now, New South Wales goes to work and it puts a duty upon some article of Canadian import, then you say that our duty goes up because of the enactment of the legislature of New South Wales. No power on earth can raise our duty except our own Parliament.

The PRIME MINISTER. I say nothing of the kind. I say that the moment the tariff of New South Wales is changed, then the Controller of Customs has to see whether or not these articles are, on the whole, upon the same level as our own tariff, and if they are not, upon the whole, upon the same level as our own tariff, then they can be no longer entered under the reciprocal tariff. That is the condition of things. The provision works mechanically. The Controller of Customs has simply to make a report, that report is confirmed by the Governor in Council, and there the matter ends. Sir, I am surprised at one thing: I am surprised at the objection which has been raised by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to a tariff, which I do not hesitate to say has received the sanction not only of the people of Canada, but of the people of the whole British Empire. My hon. friend told us a moment ago that he was taking issue with us to-day. I take him at his word. There is no issue now existing between the Government and the Opposition on which I would have greater pleasure to go to the country than this issue, by which I claim we have lifted the politics of this country to a higher plane, and placed them on an Imperial basis; and I believe that, with the concurrence of the Canadian people—nay, with the concurrence of the British people as well—that policy is there to stay.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Chairman, in the eloquent and interesting last thirty seconds of the Prime Minister's speech, I think there was almost a confession that on these dry matters of fact he did not feel altogether happy, and that he would retire from the discussion with the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) by a draft upon that eloquence for which he is so famous. Now, one looking over the discussions which have taken place in this Parliament, will, I think, admit this much, that while the Liberal party have changed their position on many things, and have shown great celerity in doing so, there is nothing on which their change has been so remarkable as on the principle of parliamentary control. The appeal which the hon. gentleman has made to the statutory offer as affording a precedent for this extraordinary and unprecedented legislation, so far as British parliaments are concerned, will be found, when examined, to avail him not to the slightest extent. But I desire if permitted, to remind the committee of the position the Liberal party have taken on this question of parliamentary control, and the necessity and constitutional right of Parliament to be consulted at all times on all matters of public concern; and there is nothing on which they have exhibited more jealousy than on matters of fiscal concern. Hon. members will remember that in the last Parliament there were two questions on which this point was raised. In regard to the negotiations that took place between the executive of Canada and the province of Newfoundland concerning the question of the entrance of that province into the Dominion of Canada—a case to this extent not wholly on a par with the matter now under consideration, that it was obviously necessary for the Government to consult Parliament in the end—the late Government were embarrassed and harassed from day to day by the then leader of the Opposition, now the leader of the Government, and by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), his co-adjutor and ally in the House at that time. They claimed that they had a right to be informed of every movement, every proposition, and every counter-proposition, and that by any other course on the part of the Government this Parliament was being treated in an undignified and improper manner. Their language on that occasion is under my hand, and I will remind the Premier of it. Speaking in Parliament, even in a case where I say it was understood that it would be necessary to consult Parliament before any final action could be taken, or before any consequence could occur to this country, Mr. Mills, now a member of the Senate, said:

This House is entitled to know what these negotiations are, and we are entitled to know whether the propositions are of such a character that under no circumstances this House could, in the interests of the people of this country, for a moment entertain them.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, then sitting in Opposition, rebuked the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), then Finance Minister, for preserving secrecy at that stage in regard to those negotiations, and felt warranted in using towards him this language :

He should remember, Sir, that he is not simply a party leader talking party clap-trap, but he stands here as the representative of the committee of Government to tell his masters, this House—not alone his party behind him—to what responsibilities he is committing this country.

And again :

Who is this Committee of Council that arrogate to themselves the right to determine, before consultation with the people, what these terms shall be. My hon. friend the leader has put it in a nutshell. The leader of the House wants to submit the terms to us at a period when we cannot judge or modify one of them. We will have to take the terms as a whole, and either accept them holus bolus, or reject them holus bolus.

In that matter, in which the Government had a well known excuse for reticence for delay in laying information before the House, they were upbraided and charged with treating this House in an arrogant manner in not taking the House into full confidence, the reason being that the proposition which concerned this country in an important degree, when it should finally be submitted, had to be accepted as a whole or rejected as a whole. The arguments used in that case apply to this. The Prime Minister has to my mind placed this House in an embarrassing position. He has shown that this matter has not received at the hands of the executive that calm and careful examination which it should have received before being submitted to this House ; for in one breath he tells us, though every line of the resolution contradicts him, that the Government had looked abroad over the face of the globe, and, finding that only one country could take advantage of it, they came to the House with a proposition covering the whole globe ; and before taking his seat he had to admit that the investigation of every country on the globe was not very complete, for he said that most likely New South Wales would be in a position to take advantage of the terms of the resolution. These two important statements coming from the leader of the Government fill us all with alarm in regard to the lack of consideration which the Government are guilty of in connection with this most important and extraordinary proposition. Again I wish to remind hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches that so jealous were they of parliamentary control, that when it was proposed that the Governor in Council should take power by Order in Council to make regulations for the preservation of the fisheries, the Opposition of that day resisted that demand, claiming that it was interfering with the powers and rights and duties of this House.

When the hon. leader of the Government rose, he said he would meet the difficulties presented by the hon. member for York and deal with them seriatim and conclusively. Now, he did not tell us a very important matter. It is quite clear, from the reference he made to New South Wales—and if I am wrong in that I ask to be corrected—that the Government are not able now to state to this House what the average rate of duties is in the different countries in the globe to-day. Evidently they do not know the position of New South Wales. While they think that the average rate there will bring New South Wales within the terms of article 16, we must take it for granted, judging by the ambiguous statement of the First Minister, that he cannot now tell us what the average rate of duty is at the present moment in New South Wales. Neither can he tell what is the average rate of duty in Germany and Belgium and other continental countries. It is evident that these hon. gentlemen have not judged it necessary to make that careful and close examination which the business men of the country expected, and which they should have made, because it is certainly of vital importance that the business men of the country, the farmers, the merchants and men in all mercantile pursuits, should, before sharing responsibility with the Government in connection with the operation of a clause like this or a power such as is here claimed, know what the real position is, and what their chances are as regards possible competition from foreign countries. They should know, at any rate, from the Treasury benches how other countries, whether colonies or not, stand relatively with us in connection with our tariff.

But there is another obvious difficulty. If, for instance, the First Minister had told me what the average rate of customs duties was in New South Wales—and evidently he cannot do it, for I have asked him repeatedly—I would ask him if he can even tell us what the average rate of duty is in Canada to-day. Did he ever take sufficient pains to ascertain what the average rate of duties was under the tariff resolutions as first brought down, and if he did, what is the average rate of duty under the tariff resolutions as now brought down and before this House? There has been a very serious change. For instance, a case painfully comes to my mind at the moment. Under the first tariff, there was an opportunity for a great interest in the county I represent to live, at any rate, for a few years. Men who were experts in that business believed that they had an opportunity of eking out an existence under the first resolutions. But under the resolution now before the committee, I fear that, to a large extent, a very important industry, has been vitally affected, and these hon. gentlemen are in this unfortunate position, that they cannot tell us how, on the whole, the tariff now stands. They cannot tell us how, for instance, our average rate on articles that would probably come into this market were an opportunity afforded, from any other country in the world, would compare with the average rate of that country on an article we would be likely to send it, or how the selected list there would compare with the selected list here. And although I fear the Treasury benches are lapsing into that condition of indifference with which they have as a rule treated observations from this side during the consideration of this resolution, I must repeat that I have been unable to ascertain what interpretation the Government put on these words in the resolution "on the whole." Do they contemplate the average rate on selected lists in each country, or a tariff such as this, that while on certain articles in a foreign country, which do not particularly concern us, the duties were inordinately high and out of all comparison with the duties on similar articles in Canada, yet on articles that we do buy largely from it, the duties are lower. In the latter case, would the high duties on articles not concerning us be considered by the Government in their interpretation of these words, "on the whole"? This is to me an important consideration. It is a question we ought to ask, nay, that we are bound to ask, and I think the Government are in duty bound to give a clear statement of their opinion. Surely no member on the Treasury benches will contend that either the explanation from the Prime Minister or the Controller of Customs can be considered satisfactory on that point. Let any one of his friends in business, in or out of the House, take up this resolution:

When the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada, and so forth.

Let him put this question, whether that contemplates an average on the whole range of items in a foreign tariff, or a partial list possibly, and surely it is not a satisfactory answer to say: Why, it is clear, it means on the whole? What we want these hon. gentlemen to do, if they are able to do it, is to give us a more definite statement with regard to the meaning of those words, and we suggest, to show the object of our question the difficulties I have already mentioned, and which must be met sooner or later. Instead of having that interpretation after Parliament is over, in the office of the Controller of Customs, when the question arises, would it not be more fitting and more in keeping with a proper treatment by the executive of the people's interests, to have these definitions given here and now, and have these difficulties removed here and now, before the Government are embarrassed in any degree by their consideration.

Then, again, the hon. gentleman seems to think that my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster), in his indignation, and I think well-founded indignation, in fighting, not merely for parliamentary control, as it has been heretofore understood, but for the retention of good, sound principles of British legislation in regard to fiscal matters, overlooked the statute which the hon. gentleman considered was a precedent for the resolution now before the House. Let me put in contrast the statutory offer to which the hon. gentleman refers and the resolution which he claims is founded upon it. This is the statutory offer:

Any or all of the following things, that is to say:—green or dried apples, beans, buckwheat, peas, potatoes, rye, rye flour, hay, vegetables, specified in item 41, Schedule "A," of this Act, shall be free of duty when imported into Canada from the country of production upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that such country imposes no duty on the like product or products imported into it from Canada.

Now let me read the resolution which the hon. gentleman says is modelled upon that and warranted by it:

Resolution 16, now before this committee, reads:

16. That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be entered for duty, or taken out of warehouse for consumption in Canada, at the reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff set forth in Schedule "D."

(a.) That any question that may arise as to the countries entitled to the benefits of the reciprocal tariff shall be decided by the Controller of Customs, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council.

(b.) That the Governor in Council may extend the benefits of such reciprocal tariff to any country which may be entitled thereto by virtue of any treaty with Her Majesty.

I do not know that a stronger argument is required from me, to show that the hon. gentleman is not warranted in making the statement he did, than to leave these two clauses side by side. However, perhaps I may be permitted to call attention to the well-known history of the statutory offer. That offer was made practically by consent of this Parliament, at the unanimous desire of this Parliament, after the subject had been considered from year to year and over a great space of years. It applied to one country and one country only, between which and this country there had been a tariff contemplated by that eleventh section which I have read worked out into a treaty between these two countries. Thus the people had the experience of a free exchange of these articles; they knew exactly where to find them in the list, and whether they were free or at the present rate of duty. Having regard to all the people's experience then in actual exchange, having regard to the facts that these articles were known and determined, and named in the statute, how in the name of reason can one say that is a case which warrants us in clothing the Government under this resolution with such general, such wide powers, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) claimed, if I recollect aright, in the debate on the Budget, that it had in it germs for resurrecting his old policy of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States of America, and that possibly the goods of Germany and the goods of Belgium, would, under its operation, come into this country on favoured-nation treatment. This is a policy having the widest possible consequences to this country. Aye, Mr. Chairman, we must not forget what the Prime Minister said and what his colleagues said, that it is to be their policy not to make one fell swoop at the industries of the country, but to extinguish them gradually and to bring about free trade at a moderate rate. Under this very resolution, should conditions obtain, as in New South Wales, for instance, or in any other country, Canada would have to meet the most terrific competition under present conditions and present prices, that we ever had to meet in this country before. A resolution in terms so wide-reaching, a resolution so indefinite containing these embarrassing words to which I have referred, can in no sense be considered to be based upon or justified by the statutory offer, limited and definite in that section 11 of the Customs Act. Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) raised our hopes in regard to a canon of construction for resolution 16. He admitted that he should give a canon of construction; and, I confess, having listened to him attentively for a canon, I could not but notice that his "cannon" did not go off. So far as I was able to observe, the hon. gentleman left the "cannon" and retreated under a cover of eloquence to which I have already made reference. But the questions I have suggested require some canon of construction in order to have them answered, or answered satisfactorily. The hon. gentleman said, in closing his observations, that this tariff has been sanctioned practically by the whole Empire. The warrant for that, I suppose, is in the press references made by some of the London papers, based, as any one can see on examination, upon fallacious and erroneous information, and upon a misunderstanding of the Imperial treaties. I am not aware—the hon. gentleman may correct me if necessary, or if he will—that this tariff which, as amended, carries with it so many revolutionary changes, has been endorsed by any appreciable portion of the press in London or in any other part of the Empire. I do not think, therefore, that this tariff as it now stands, these resolutions before us, have received the approbation of any of our competitors, whether those under, or those beyond, the flag. Having touched upon that, I take the responsibility—though it may not be germane to the resolution or to the discussion which has incurred—of saying from my place in Parliament that I am not particularly pleased or charmed by the fact that legislation concerning the interests and industries of Canada should meet with such intense favour in any portion of the Empire, so long as that favour is based upon the belief that an opportunity is afforded for dangerous and disastrous competition with Canadian interests and Canadian labour; and I think I can say that not only as loyal to my own country, Canada, but as loyal to the Empire itself; for experience has shown that any policy that weakens Canada, that prostrates her labour and her industries, is a policy that, in the end, will react to the injury and detriment of every portion and parcel of the Empire to which we belong. It is, therefore, to the Canadian people that this Parliament must look for applause for their policy, and I am satisfied that no mercantile body in Canada that has looked into this resolution will regard the Opposition as unreasonable in pressing, as they have done, and as, I think, they will have to do so long as no explanation is given, for a clear and succinct definition and understanding of what the Government really mean by section 16 and in what way it will be administered by the Controller of Customs.

Before I take my seat, I should like to point out the very serious difference between the statutory offer and this resolution in another particular, and that is in the extraordinary power proposed to be vested in the Controller of Customs. But more than that. As I read this resolution, it seems to me automatic to this extent—that it is acted upon by the collector of customs even before any action is taken by the Controller of Customs. The main section, without the subsections, I think, is complete in itself and under it the collector of customs is first of all to settle what nation is to trade with Canada on that so-called preferential basis. It goes then from the lower officer to the higher, it goes then, forsooth, to the Controller of Customs. When any dispute arises between the collector of customs and the importer, the matter is to be decided by the Controller of Customs. That is an extraordinary departure, because, as we know now, the Controller of Customs is, strictly speaking, so far as his status goes, I think, not even a member of the Government. He is a parliamentary officer, given certain duties pointed out by the Customs Act and by the Act constituting his office. But I take it that, not being a member of the Council, and holding his office solely by virtue of that statute, he is not a member of the Government; whether he be so or not, he is not a Minister, he is not a member of the Cabinet, but he is to exercise these extraordinary powers. All these observations, of course, are made without any reference to the individual who now holds that office, but to the office itself, or to the ideas that surround the legislation that brought it into being. There are those considerations, among others, that make it necessary for us to persist, at any rate up to this time, and possibly longer, in pressing upon the Government not only the gravity of the step that they have taken, the departure from sound traditions and sound rules they are proposing to make, but to give us as the people's representatives, or as the representatives of a large body of people, at least—to give us their interpretation now at this stage, without shifting that liability and responsibility upon the shoulders of the Controller of Customs, or the collectors of customs at the different ports of Canada after this Parliament shall have risen.

Mr. FROST. I desire to make a few remarks on this preferential clause of the tariff, because it is said that it is going to affect very prejudicially the business interests of Canada. We are told by one of the speakers that the lowering of the duties one-eighth at the present time, and 25 per cent later on, will be the means of admitting manufactured goods from a great many countries throughout the world; that the whole of the goods that will come in under the present tariff will not be from Great Britain alone, but from China, Japan and South America, as well as those having favoured-nation treaties, such as Belgium and Germany. Now, it seems to me that the great objection which our friends in the Opposition have to this preferential tariff is not so much that these goods will come in from those countries, as it is the Liberal Government have been enabled at one stroke to bind closer the union between Canada and the mother country than has ever been attempted or accomplished by our friends opposite during the whole eighteen years they were in office. It is not possible that any goods coming in from China, or Japan, or South America can in any way affect the manufacturing industries of Canada, for we know very well that those countries are not manufacturing countries, there is nothing that we get from them along the line of manufactures that will interfere in any way with the industries of Canada. It has been said that the Government have had no care for the labouring men; the statement was made here on Wednesday night by the ex-Finance Minister.

Mr. PRIOR. Will the hon. gentleman kindly tell me if he said that we need not fear competition from either China or Japan?

Mr. FROST. Yes, we need not fear competition from either China or Japan. If you will look at the trade returns you will find very few goods such as we manufacture in this country, that we would get from those countries under the lower tariff, "and what we would get" would be a de-cidéd benefit to the consumers of Canada. Now, it has been said that this present Government had no care for the labouring men, and we saw one hon. gentleman pose as the particular guardian of the labouring classes of Canada, and we have heard another hon. gentleman ask, what does the Government at present in office care for the labouring man of Canada? Now, I have this to say, so far as the labouring men of Canada are concerned, that there never has been a more depressed condition existing among our manufacturing industries than during the existence of the so-called National Policy. We have seen thousands of men, workingmen, honest, upright men, driven out of this country through the action of the so-called National Policy. In 1894 we saw in one line of goods, and the seventh largest industry in Canada, the agricultural implement business, we saw the duties reduced from 35 per cent to 20 per cent, and it threw out of work one thousand men in that industry alone, and they either had to go into other lines and trades to make a living, or to leave the country altogether. We also saw, lately, a number of men on the Opposition side voting to reduce still further that duty, and send the remaining 4,000 men that are in that trade out of the country altogether. And still these gentlemen stand up and claim to be par excellence the defenders and supporters of the workingmen of Canada. Now, what will this preferential clause do for this country? It will simply do this, it will transfer, and that is the object of the clause, it will simply transfer our purchase of some twenty million dollars' worth of goods that we now get from the United States over to Great Britain, we will bring those goods into this country from Great Britain, and consequently increase the tonnage of our ports; and if the work is to be given out of this country, it will be given to our kith and kin in the mother country rather than to the people of the United States. This will be the main thing that the preferential clause of the tariff will effect. It has been said that every dollar's worth of goods that will be brought in under preferential clause will displace one dollar's worth of goods in Canada. But hon. gentlemen opposite know very well that we import over two-thirds of our manufactured goods to-day from the United States, as against one-third from Great Britain. Now, if we are ever to show that we prefer British trade to American trade, something must be done to bring that trade to our shores, and for this reason this preferential clause has been introduced, and at one stroke this Government has accomplished more by that clause than has ever been accomplished before in the history of this country towards binding together the Empire of which we all are so proud, particularly in this jubilee year, when we are celebrating the sixtieth anniversary of the reign of Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen. Now, it has been said that other countries will have the same right to come in and get the same favours. But this cannot be possible in view of the fact that we are an autonomous country, that at confederation we were allowed the privilege of making just such tariffs as we chose to make, and that we have a perfect right to make, under all the rules and all the advice which we can possibly get from all the authorities upon the subject, both here and in Great Britain. It has been pointed out that our industries cannot maintain themselves against the foreign competition which will take place. In one breath we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that we have simply copied their tariff, that we have stolen their clothes, and that consequently our tariff is strongly protective in its character and in its principle; then, in another breath we are told by our friends opposite that we are destroying this country through the tariff which has been brought down by the present Government. Now, either one or the other of these positions must be wrong, and I take it for granted that our Government, proceeding along the straight lines of constitutional practice, have been endeavouring to bring their tariff to a point where it will be on a purely revenue basis. We have to consider the condition of many industries which have been brought into being during the past eighteen years, and the Government, in taking hold of the tariff, had to pay a certain amount of attention to those industries. But, looking at the tariff as a whole, looking at the reductions that have been made all along the line of raw material, looking at many things that have been put on the free list. I can fairly say, as a manufacturer, that the Government have done their duty, not only by the manufacturers of the country, but by the consuming classes, which, after all said and done, constituting, as they do, 75 or 80 per cent of the people, was the great desideratum, and for that reason I think this tariff will go down to history as one of the best tariffs that Canada has ever seen.

Mr. BENNETT. I desire to ask the hon. gentleman a question. In view of the reduced duty on iron, at what price is the firm to which the hon. gentleman belongs listing binders?

Mr. FROST. We are not discussing the details of local business at this time. I do not propose to come to this Parliament and take up the time of the House by discussing such a question, even if the hon. gentleman desires it.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman is taking me altogether wrongly.

Mr. FROST. I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that one of his own leaders stated that a business man puts his money into one industry on the basis of the tariff duty, trusting that Parliament will allow that duty to remain and not be removed. How did that hon. gentleman deal with the duty on agricultural implements, to which reference has just been made. The hon. gentleman who interrupted me was one of those who supported the ex-Finance Minister in making a reduction when there was neither reason, rhyme nor necessity for it. I do not wish, however, to enter into that matter, but to deal with the question as it affects the general interests of the country. It has been stated time and again that the leader of the Government went through the country telling the manufacturers who supported his own party that they were all right, and this statement has been made in the House to-day. So far as this is concerned, speaking for myself, I never obtained any knowledge and never had one word with the leader of the Government as to what would be done in regard to the line of goods that I manufacture, and I do not believe there are Liberal manufacturers in Canada who have heard one word from that hon. gentleman or from any other member of the Government in regard to this matter. The Liberal party has always stood for a revenue tariff, and it is no part or parcel of the Liberal policy to destroy any interest in the country; but the policy of the party, as I understand it, has been to allow industries to thrive, so long as they can thrive under a reasonable tariff that will enable these industries to grow naturally. We have had some industries that were propagated and forced by a tariff framed especially for them. And these industries are those which have been giving this country trouble and are to-day causing depression in business, and it is in respect to them that the labouring men and workingmen are being thrown out of employment to a much greater extent than is the case in regard to other classes of industry to-day. Industries built up naturally under a revenue tariff, prior to days of the National Policy, are not being destroyed, and the labouring men are not suffering from them; but those industries that were propagated like hothouse plants, have caused all the trouble, and have injured many industries that were natural industries to this country. We know a number of such hothouse industries, but we need not go into them. The ex-Finance Minister stated that no government can fool with the business interests of the country. That is true. Our business interests are paramount, and in that term I include not only manufacturing industries, but all other industries, such as agriculture and mining; and, as regards these industries as a whole, I say that the present Government has brought down a tariff which, taken in connection with its other policy, constitutes a good, true and National Policy combined. Their agricultural policy could not be improved, and in future we will not be troubled with depressed agriculturists, nor with farmers finding fault with this and that duty because the bulk of the duty was levied on raw material, or leaving our manufacturers who have been conducting natural industries, strained, as they have been. The policy, taken as a whole, from beginning to end, is one that commends itself to every business man in the country; it is one that commends itself to every farmer, and every farmer is recognizing the fact that he is going to have an opportunity of securing for his products, at the very lowest transportation rates, the best market in the world. This of itself will increase and revive our manufacturing industries, and I affirm that there will be such a revival of business under these natural conditions as has never been seen under the eighteen years of the National Policy, and cannot fail to bring about an era of prosperity never known before. Judging from my knowledge of business, I believe the policy of the Government will bring this result about. As the ex-Finance Minister stated, there can be no fooling with business interests. The Government are not fooling with them, but are very carefully handling them. Raw materials have either been reduced in duty or admitted free, and I can tell the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), that agricultural implements will be cheaper when manufacturers derive the full benefit of this policy. When a question is asked, and a Minister does not at once stand up and answer it, hon. gentlemen opposite declare that a reply cannot be made. It is, of course, necessary to wait until the effects of the tariff are felt, and I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to have patience and wait for a year and see what are the effects of this policy and of the preferential tariff. As regards the preferential tariff, I do not understand the legal points connected with it, and I am not able to argue it from a legal standpoint, but I believe, under the preferential tariff, greater favours are yet to come from Greater Britain to this country that will more than repay all the benefits which British manufacturers will obtain in our markets. More than that, I believe it will transfer from the United States to England an amount of business which will more than counteract the disparity that now exists between the trade of Great Britain and the United States with Canada. A large quantity of manufactured goods has been coming from the United States of late. A few years ago, the largest amount came from Great Britain, but now the largest quantity comes from the United States; and, if this preferential tariff shall bring us closer to our kith and kin in Great Britain and be the means of welding us together as an empire—and this is, after all, what I believe is the greatest fear entertained in the hearts of the Opposition, that a Liberal Government may be able, in spite of the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite have always declared themselves to be the party of loyalty, to bring about this result—Canada will be esteemed still more highly for its demonstration of loyalty and good-will. To-day, as the hon. the Premier has said, this preferential tariff of ours is being eulogized from one end of the Empire to the other. That is what is troubling our friends of the Opposition, more than any legal point as to whether it can be carried out, or as to whether it conflicts with favoured-nation treaties or not. However, I suppose that the Opposition is bound to find fault with this Government at all hazards. They have been finding fault from the very beginning. Last session they made a fight about Governor General's warrants, and now they are fighting against this tariff, but their efforts will come to nothing in the end. The tariff will become law, and the result of it will be that business will revive throughout the length and breadth of the land; indeed business has already revived, bank stocks have increased, and the people of Canada are looking with renewed confidence to the welfare and prosperity of their country. Our friends in the Opposition had better recognize first at last, that this tariff is here to stay. The people of the country have already realized that the Liberal party is the party of loyalty, the party of progress, the party of the true National Policy, and the party that can rule Canada in accordance with constitutional and parliamentary practices. But I suppose that the force of habit drives the Opposition into complaining of everything. They remind me of the man who, when going into a church heard the minister give out the first lines of the hymn "Strike the loud resounding lyre," and the man, thinking that the remark was somewhat personal, ducked his head from the force of habit. No matter how good or how perfect any policy proposed by the Government may be, the force of habit leads the Opposition to oppose it. I must say, Sir, in conclusion, that the business interests of this country have been well looked after by the present Government, and while the manufacturers have been treated fairly, the consuming classes throughout the length and breadth of this land have not been forgotten. As a result of this tariff an era of prosperity and contentment has dawned upon Canada.

It being Six o'clock, the Committee rose for recess.

After Recess.

GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 70) respecting the Great North-west Central Railway Company.—Mr. Richardson.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MACDONELL (Selkirk). I might explain that since last meeting of the committee an agreement has been reached between the parties interested as to the amendment to be substituted for the one proposed last evening. I, therefore, beg leave to move to add the following section to the Bill:—

The company is hereby empowered to extend the main line of the railway from the point of commencement named in its act of incorporation, to a point on the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway, at or near Brandon, as if such last mentioned point had been named in the said Act as the point of commencement of the railway instead of a point on the Canadian Pacific Railway, provided that the company shall make and so prosecute the necessary applications to the railway committee of the Privy Council for power to cross the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to effect a junction and interchange of traffic with the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway, that the extension and junction hereby authorized may be completed within the time named in this Act for the completion of the next twenty miles of the present chartered line of the said Great North-west Central Railway.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 86) respecting La Banque du Peuple.—(Mr. Préfontaine.)

AMERICAN BANK NOTE COMPANY.

Mr. BELCOURT moved third reading of Bill (No. 68) respecting the American Bank Note Company.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Before that Bill is read the third time, I desire to discuss the nature of it and the proposition it represents. It seems to me that this company, which it is proposed to bring into Canada, is the creature of the Government, and that the circumstances attending its proposed introduction into this country are such as to merit considerable attention. The proposition practically to subsidize this foreign company in connection with a business which has already assumed very great importance in Canada, is interesting at this particular time, because, unless I am altogether wrong in my information, it would be absolutely impossible for such a state of things to happen across the border. None of the citizens of this country, even were the Government of the United States favourably inclined, could hope to enjoy such favours and such aid in the carrying on of a business by Canadian capital in that country as by this Bill it is proposed to concede to this United States corporation. The intention of this company is not merely to execute in the city of Ottawa the contract which it has the good fortune to have been given by the special favour of the Government of this country, but to seek general powers to carry on its business of general engraving, printing and lithographing in all its departments, &c., in Ottawa and elsewhere in Canada. No one objects, of course, to the introduction of foreign capital into this country; no one objects to treating in the most generous way capitalists from any part of the world who are ready to embark in enterprises here; but the objection to the proposal before this House—and it seems to me a forcible and serious objection—is that it is proposed to encourage the introduction of this business and this capital into this country at the cost and to the detriment of Canadian capital, Canadian interests and Canadian labour.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Does the Bill say that?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Bill does not say that, but the Government says that. The Bill represents here the policy of the Government. Without this Bill being adopted, the unfortunate and mistaken policy of the Government could not very well be carried out; and this is an opportunity afforded to the House to consider whether we should act under the circumstances in such a spirit towards this foreign corporation. The circumstances have been already mentioned to the House, but they are to some extent so involved, they cover such an amount of correspondence and so many transactions and incidents, that it is impossible for me, without referring at some length to the correspondence and to the facts that have led up to the introduction of this Bill, to put properly before the House my idea of the mistaken and very detrimental policy the Government have adopted in this matter. We know that the British American Bank Note Company, which we may distinguish as the Burland Company, had heretofore enjoyed the business of this character required by the Government. It is not necessary for me to go into all the facts and figures to show the expenditures that became necessary on the part of that company to put themselves into a position to carry out a contract which had been entered into with them by the Canadian Government. Suffice it for me to say that in addition to their carrying out, and from all the Government say, satisfactorily carrying out a very heavy contract, involving the employment of skilled labour of the highest class, this company, not long ago, by order of the Government, under the terms of the existing contract, had to go to the further expense of erecting a magnificent structure in the city of Ottawa. That in a sense gave them no claims, under the terms of the contract, to special consideration. So far as my recollection of the contract goes, it was one of the original conditions of the bargain that if they were required to go to this extraordinary expense, and to transfer their business from the city of Montreal to the capital of Canada, they were bound to do so. But, knowing as we do the difference between the city of Ottawa and the city of Montreal, so far as a business of this kind is concerned, in relation to private business, there is no comparison between the advantages to be enjoyed in Montreal as opposed to those in Ottawa; and I say that without any disparagement of this wonderfully growing and thriving community. But while under the contract the Burland Company had no right to special consideration, no one acquainted with that phase of the transaction will deny that they were entitled at least to fair-play, and were warranted in relying upon this; that when fresh competition became necessary between them and another firm, whether foreign or domestic, no concessions or favours would be shown by the Government to their competitors which would be denied to them. But I complain that extraordinary concessions were granted to a foreign competitor as against the Canadian company, who had done their work not only satisfactorily but at a constantly diminishing cost to the Government and without any complaint being recorded against them in any particular; and, under the circumstances, it seems to me that we should have even more detailed and exact explanations how it came about that they were not treated, I do not say generously, but in that fair manner which they had every reason to expect. I may be wrong, but I am told that so extensive is this business, in the first place, that the dies, rollers, plates, machinery and plant cost no less than $400,000, and that it cost the Burland Company some $50,000 to provide special equipment for the carrying out of this work. Now, the history of the transaction—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Does the hon. gentleman propose to discuss the history of the contract with the American Bank Note Company?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not like to interfere with the line of the hon. gentleman's argument, but this is an application to grant letters of incorporation to a company. I fail to see what the contract in question has to do with the question whether or not Parliament will incorporate this company.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am not disputing the fact; nor is it ever necessary, in order to obtain the ear of this House, to claim that a Bill proposed to be read a third time, to give corporate rights and privileges to a body of people in this country or to a corporation outside of it, is without the power of Parliament. In this case I admit that the Bill, so far as I have examined it, is within the powers of this Parliament, and that if no reason can be shown why these privileges should not be conferred, wholly outside of the legal difficulties, then, of course, the Bill would be read the third time. But I state, at the outset of my observations, that this Bill is before us simply because this foreign corporation which is now knocking at our doors, has been given by the executive, and not by Parliament, special privileges and favours, and because further favours are contemplated to be given it as against our own Canadian interests and industries. The hon. gentleman knows that this Bill is simply here in connection with the contract for which the Government is responsible. He will be the last man to deny that the subject should receive the fullest possible discussion and consideration, and it is the consideration which I have given it which I desire to put before this House before the Bill is read a third time.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman has before him the blue-book dealing with the contract. That contract has been the subject of debate, and if the hon. gentleman proposes now to go into the merits or demerits of that contract, I submit that such discussion is quite outside the proposition that this Bill be now read the third time.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I quite appreciate the force of the hon. gentleman's objection. I could imagine, for instance, a member of this House saying, I disapprove altogether of the act of the Government as being contrary to the interests of the country and as granting to a foreign corporation favours of a most suspicious and extraordinary character, but, nevertheless, this is simply a Bill to enable that corporation to do business in Canada, and that has nothing to do with the special privileges granted it. That argument might prevail, but it is only an argument and one opposed to the position I take. I would be, for instance, inclined to vote against granting this additional privilege to this company, in order to mark in the strongest way open to me my disapproval of bringing this subsidized competitor into our own country. And in order to strengthen that position, I cannot do better than refer to the very documents which the Government have placed before us, to show how this thing came about, and I think that a reference to these documents will prove to any impartial mind that the point I have submitted is well founded.

Mr. SPEAKER. I suppose a question of order has been raised, and I am inclined to think that the hon. gentleman who has the floor has the right to adduce before the House any circumstances which he thinks sufficient to influence its judgment and prevent the passage of this Bill; but in doing so, he must be careful not to refer to a previous debate. He can, of course, refer to documents laid on the Table.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have been in Parliament sufficiently long to know that is one of the elementary rules of debate, and I have no desire to refer to a previous debate. Nor would it be very becoming in me to do so, since I had not the good fortune to be present. But I desire to refer to the documents submitted to the House bearing on this very question, and which are the only information we have regarding this American Bank Note Company, what it was, how it comes before us, and why it is knocking at these doors and asking for these privileges. All that information is in this blue-book, and I can quite understand why the hon. Postmaster General does not desire that the facts contained therein should be continually dwelt upon. I quite understand why he should desire that that part of the consideration should be suppressed—I am not, however, imputing any motives—and I propose to show that the facts which I intend laying before the House—and which, perhaps, have been laid before it before, in my own way are very good reasons why we should mark with the strongest condemnation this whole transaction, from beginning to end. The irregularities in connection with the handling of these tenders, the irregularities and unfairness in the treatment of the old company, the extraordinary favours shown this American corporation, certainly deserve the gravest attention and consideration; and I think the country cannot be reminded too often of the facts as they appear in the official blue-books, before the last stage of the chapter is reached.

In this report of the Deputy Finance Minister (Mr. Courtney) there is evidence which at once puts the old company on the very best footing and furnishes a complete reply to the charge that it was a selfish, greedy combination and monopoly, and deserved the introduction of another competitor. On the 31st August, 1896, Mr. Courtney, the Deputy Finance Minister, reviewed the history of the bank note contract from 1868, giving the various figures and terms under the different contracts, and he concludes by saying :

It will be seen from the above that substantial reductions in the rates charged were effected; on the other hand, the power given by former contracts to the Minister of Finance, the Postmaster General and the Minister of Inland Revenue to make yearly revision of the rates for the supplies to their respective departments, was taken away. The post office and inland revenue rates were made schedules to the contract.

On page 55 of this blue-book, I find from the president of the company the statement—and I do not know that it is denied—in a communication which he addressed to the Minister of Finance :

The British American Bank Note Company was established to retain this work in Canada, large capital was invested by its citizens, and the best of protection was afforded, and for years past, I make bold to say, that the Finance Department and the banks of the Dominion have had the note circulation of the country supplied them at least 30 per cent less than the current rate for such work from New York.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

That is an important feature which appears through a great deal of this correspondence—that this foreign company have given, on the face of the contract, and in their correspondence, figures which seem to be in many senses most deceptive, at first glance, and without the calculation of an actuary, and which give rise to extraordinary suspicion as to the reasons that enabled them, in this connection, to make such an extraordinary departure from the prices which they usually charge.

In order—

Says Mr. Burland—

—In order to prevent such a calamity to the commercial interests of the country and to protect the large capital already invested, we, the British American Bank Note Company, are prepared to accept the terms of the tender submitted by the American Bank Note Company, and thereby preserve, if possible, the bank note business of the Dominion, which has been performed by us for the last thirty-five years in a satisfactory manner.

I refer to that in connection with a statement, which I think is one of importance, and that is that, so far, I am not aware that the Government has announced at any time that there was dissatisfaction in connection with the work done by this company.

Now, an important phase of the subject hinges upon the clause that was in the old (Burland) company's contract. At page 4 of this blue-book, is clause 6 of this contract which provides :

That all possible measures of precaution shall be taken by the company for the protection of the work and the security of the Government in the premises and to ensure the safety of the plates, dies and rolls, and all impressions taken therefrom, and all paper and other material used in connection therewith, whether in a complete or incomplete state, and the Minister of Finance of Canada for the time being may at any time during the continuance of this contract appoint any one or more officers of the Government, or properly qualified persons not in the service of the Government, to examine or supervise the premises occupied by the company, or the work done or being done by them under or by virtue of this agreement, and every facility shall be afforded by the company for any and every such examination or supervision.

The wisdom of that provision must be obvious to those who have looked into this question. The opportunities for counterfeiting, and the extraordinary feats of counterfeiting, a practice it has been found utterly impossible to stamp out, make it most necessary that the Government, in order to protect the currency, to protect the notes of the country, shall have under their immediate supervision the performance of the work from its beginning to its very end. And the old company, in that connection, had to go to very great expense in introducing that expert labour, which, by the way, I find that their competitors, their successful competitors under this Government were wholly ignorant of and which they ventured to deny in an official communication to the Minister of Finance. It is in connection with that clause in the contract, the necessity for which is evidenced by all the contracts with the Government from the beginning down to the present, that the extraordinary phase of this question becomes apparent. Take, for instance, a few other references in that connection, as given to us in explaining this matter. I turn to page 14 of the blue-book, and, in connection with the "terms and conditions of tenders for engraving, &c., Dominion notes, postal and inland revenue supplies," it seems clear that when the Minister of Finance started the work for new tenders, he recognized what I venture to say the business men of the country recognize, the gravity of that clause and the importance of that condition to the Government. Condition 7 of the specification reads :

All work under the contract—

"All work," Mr. Speaker.

—shall be done at the city of Ottawa, in such building or buildings as are approved of by the Government of Canada, such building or buildings to be fire-proof and to contain all necessary fire-proof vaults to ensure the safety of the work, and the contractor shall not do or permit to be done in such building or buildings any work other than the work under the contract, except the work of engraving and preparing bank notes for the several chartered banks of Canada. No contract shall be entered into with any tenderer until he has satisfied the said Government of Canada that he has, or will have by the time he begins work under the contract, a proper building or buildings in Ottawa in which to carry on the work under the contract.

Clause 15 of the specifications taken in this connection reads :

No plates,—

I have already called attention to the words "All work" in the section I have just read, and this is as if to make it impossible that there shall be any uncertainty. This clause says :

No plates, rolls or dies shall be used in connection with the work to be done under the contract, or any part thereof, unless approved of on behalf of Her Majesty by the Minister at the head of the department by which such work is ordered, and all plates, dies and rolls not so approved of shall be destroyed or dealt with by the contractor in such manner as such Minister shall direct.

Let me just interject here that it is quite clear that such a supervision as is contemplated by the two clauses I have read, cannot be exercised when the dies are in the city of New York, cannot be exercised when the important part of the work is being managed or handled not only outside of the city of Ottawa, but in a foreign country, and beyond the jurisdiction of the Government of Canada.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Do not many of the leading banks of Canada get their bank bills printed there ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am not dealing with that. The hon. gentleman may use as an argument against me, the contract of some bank, some leading bank. I am saying that the policy of this country, which has obtained from 1867 to 1897, has been to regard it as of the most vital importance to the conditions connected with the making of the bank notes of the Dominion must be such as to allow of additional precautions being taken, precautions not taken elsewhere. But, adverting for a moment to the interruption of the Postmaster General, let me remind him that, whether this was a wise precaution or not, whether it was a precaution taken by the banks of Canada or not, that in no way concerns the point of my argument, because, as I shall develop it, it will be made clear that this, whether an important point or not, was a clause in the specifications, was a clause in all the old contracts, and that every tenderer was led to believe, that as the British American Bank Note Company was bound to believe, that it would be insisted upon to the letter ; and there can be no doubt that that belief affected their calculation as to the figures they should offer for doing the work on these terms. And, Mr. Speaker, there is another clause bearing upon this, clause 16, which reads as follows :—

All plates, dies and rolls specially used in connection with the said work, or any part thereof, and which are paid for by the Government of Canada, shall be reserved for the exclusive use of the said Government of Canada, as well as all plates from which the said work or any part thereof shall be printed, and shall be the property of the said Government, and the contractor shall, on demand, deliver to the Minister of Finance of Canada for the time being, or as he may direct, all said plates, dies and rolls, the contractor holding them after they have been prepared and paid for as aforesaid merely as the bailee of the Government of Canada, and the contractor shall agree that all designs or patterns made for the use of the Government in respect of the Government work shall not be used or duplicated by him for any one but the Government.

In this, also, it is apparent that the Government deem it necessary to take every possible precaution for the purpose I have mentioned ; and I have yet to learn that the Government of any country of importance in the world allows or would for a moment tolerate that a part of the machinery in connection with the manufacture of its notes and bills should be out of the jurisdiction, and, of course, beyond the supervision of the Government. For this clause, as you will see, contemplates that the Government, at a moment's notice—even without a moment's notice—can go into the building of the bank note company and lay its hands upon all the dies, acting in this matter promptly and immediately. That, under conceivable circumstances, is a most important and valuable privilege to be enjoyed by the Government. It is wholly denied them here, it is wholly lost sight of as the sequence will show. Then there is clause 19 :

The contractor shall take all possible measures of precaution, to the satisfaction of the Minister of Finance, for the protection of the work and the security of the Government in the premises, and to ensure the safety of the plates, dies and rolls, and all impressions taken therefrom, and all paper and other material used in connection therewith, whether in a complete or incomplete state.

To that clause the observations that I have made in connection with clause 16, equally apply. Now, I have referred to some of the documents in their sequence, not in the order of the paging in this book, but I think that the order in which I am taking these references will make the matter as clear as it possibly can be made from the references before me. That was on page 15. I turn now to page 22 to show the manner in which the possible competitors in the United Kingdom were advised in connection with this contract. They had read these specifications, they understood how the tender contemplated a complete and absolute transference of the whole business, from beginning to end, to the city of Ottawa. They had no reason to expect that any of these clauses would be departed from, and as business men in putting in their tenders, they expected to be fairly and justly dealt with, and they of course would have to be prepared for that clause and the different clauses to which I have referred. On page 22 we find from the High Commissioner's office a letter from Mr. Colmer explaining to the Minister of Finance how this matter was affecting firms in England capable of tendering. He cabled :

Tenders for engraving. Firms point restrictions clause 7 manufacture Canada. Also state tenders impossible without specimens mentioned clause 14.

I now beg to acknowledge your reply of the 7th instant, for which I was much obliged :

"Tenders for engraving. Canada cannot abandon condition requiring manufacture at Ottawa. If responsible parties wish to tender, we will send specimens."

There was a proper tender, and it was maintained consistently with all the tenderers on the part of the Finance Department on the 11th of November, 1896. There was a reference to these conclusions that is easily understood, and there is an answer: You will be held to every clause, every line of the clause, and every letter in the clause; the manufacture at Ottawa, that is all the work, would be insisted upon by the Government. Consequently the English tenderers, or those in a position to tender, were out of the way. Now, there is another reference to this that I wish to advert to. I find, for instance, that Mr. Freeland, representing the United States company, was specially favoured in many things. There is evidence of courtesy, to say the least, on the part of the Minister of Finance with Mr. Freeland that is wanting between Mr. Burland and the Minister of Finance. That may have been explained, the reason for it is not apparent on the face of these papers. Mr. Freeland and the Minister of Finance apparently were in verbal communication as well as in immediate correspondence, letters were addressed to him and not to the deputy, although the deputy appears on the scene after Mr. Freeland has secured his concessions. There is in that matter a departure from the rules of departmental correspondence not explained so far as I know. But during all this critical time, all this time when Mr. Freeland was free, and when the Finance Minister was free, there are communications, both verbal and in writing, going on between those two parties. After Mr. Freeland's rights are secured, formal correspondence is carried on by direction with the Deputy Minister of Finance, and as I say all that cordial relation explainable in itself, becomes remarkable when we find it was entirely denied to the fellow-citizens of the Minister of Finance, to the old and faithful contractor. On page 45, the Minister of Finance writes to the representative of Mr. Freeland on the 14th of December, 1896, referring in the first place to a conversation which he had. From another telegram it appears that the Minister of Finance was in New York on the 6th of November, and on the 14th of December, while these matters were still under consideration, the Minister of Finance refers to the conversation and what he understood him to say. Then he goes on, and this is the beginning of the extraordinary actions of the Government in relation to this foreign tender. The Minister of Finance, recognizing, I have no doubt at the time, the importance of the provisions to which I have referred, and that are found in all the contracts on this subject and are contained in the specification, he calls Mr. Freeland's attention in the following manner to the paragraph. First of all, he takes from the tender of the American Bank Note Company a clause that vitiated that tender as a regular tender, destroyed its character as a tender, and in that clause there was a complete and radical departure from the terms of the specifications. So that it cannot be fairly argued that Mr. Burland was brushed aside, or that no correspondence or friendly relations were had with him by way of discussion because his tender was not satisfactory, when we find, as the history will show, that correspondence went on and cordial relations went on with one of the parties who had put in an incomplete and a irregular tender. This is the first friendly advice to this gentleman at a time when the only regular tender in the possession of the Government was from the British North America Bank Note Company :

I desire to call your attention to the following paragraph in your tender :—

"The American Bank Note Company understands, and makes it part of this tender, that it is not required by the specifications hereto attached to manufacture bank-note and other papers, steel rolls, steel plates, the dies and other tools of the trade, inks, colours, &c., in the city of Ottawa, but that such supplies necessary to a faithful fulfilment of the contract may be obtained elsewhere.

There can be no doubt about the correctness of my position that this destroyed that document as a tender. The Minister of Finance was of that opinion, so far as this correspondence goes he is of that opinion still, because, as references will show, the future transactions simply ended in a variation of the specimens, a variation and a change of the conditions, and a variation acceptable to the successful tendered; while all that time the Burland Company was denied any of the information that was being given, was not allowed to be privy to any of these negotiations, and never had the slightest reason to assume for a moment that they might have put in a tender such as this. The American Company assume to be entitled to special favours and to receive the special attention of the responsible Minister after sending in such tender. The Minister of Finance, after quoting this paragraph from the tender, said :

I think it would be well for you to offer some explanation of this clause. Our specifications were not intended to prevent the importation of paper, ink, colours, &c., or the ordinary tools of the engraving trade. Nor were they intended to prevent the importation of steel rolls or steel plates, where such rolls or plates are of a plain character, without any engraving impression or other such work.

The only point in which your condition seems to conflict with the terms of our specifications is in respect of the dies. If you attach importance to the making of these outside of the Dominion of Canada, I shall be obliged if you will furnish me with fuller information on the subject.

Mark that. If you, the representatives of a foreign corporation endeavouring to get a foothold in this country and shut out those engaged in this industry, by securing the advantage of a subsidy from Canada, attach importance to the making of these dies elsewhere, then fuller information will be furnished. Again, the Finance Minister said :

Our chief purpose in requiring the work of this contract to be done in Ottawa is, that it may be performed by workmen in an establishment coming immediately under the supervision of this department, with a view to the greatest possible security against loss or fraud. I shall be pleased to receive any information you may be able to furnish as to the circumstances which, in your judgment, require these dies to be made abroad.

I took advantage of an invitation from Mr. Burland to make a complete inspection of his establishment at Ottawa, and the inspection was of a most instructive and interesting character. Nothing could be made more clear than the opportunities offered for fraud in connection with dies. They are small pieces of material, they can be put in the pocket, and any one connected with the trade is aware of the great opportunity for fraud that will prevail in New York as compared with their manufacture in a building under the shadow of the Parliament buildings here, fraud to which the company might be a party or fraud by any of its servants and against the company. On page 51 there is a further utterance of importance. In the recommendation that the Finance Minister made to the Governor in Council I do not think there was as full and complete information placed before his colleagues as should have been submitted. Any one reading the report of the Minister to the Governor in Council would come to this conclusion, if he read the records of the transaction to which I called particular attention. For instance, it would appear from the memorandum of the Finance Minister that a great concession had been obtained from the American Company. He said :

Correspondence being had with the American Bank Note Company, the company consented to the withdrawal of the stamped envelopes from the contract.

If my information be correct, the company would have been great fools if they had not consented to withdraw that part of the contract. The special plant required would have cost $6,000, and all the profits would have been $1,750 for the five years. That estimate may be right or wrong; but this I think is an admitted fact by the trade, that the demand for those stamped envelopes was so small that there was nothing but loss to be contemplated on the part of the company in carrying out that particular part of the bargain. Nevertheless it appears that the Minister of Finance thought he was obtaining a concession from the company. So I hold that the Governor in Council was not fully advised in that particular. The Minister goes on to say :

The company also submitted rates for the stamps in question if required in large quantities, and explanations were made with reference to the condition above quoted which are satisfactory to the undersigned in view of the large saving effected if the offer of the company is accepted.

The undersigned has the honour to recommend, in view of such saving, that he be authorized to accept the tender of the American Bank Note Company, provided that the details of the contract can be arranged with the company to his satisfaction.

It is true the Minister of Finance called attention in this cursory way to the departure from the specification and the irregularity of the tender. He says :

The prices given by the American Bank Note Company for certain of the inland revenue stamps, while small, taking into consideration the quantity required as stated in the schedule to the terms and conditions, would be very great if any large quantity of such stamps should be required, and the tender of the company also contained the following condition :—

He recites the condition, which I have quoted more than once this evening. He goes on then to say, not that this is a departure at all from the tender, but that correspondence having been had with the American Bank Note Company, they consented to the withdrawal of the stamped envelopes from the contract. No attention was called to the fact that in every contract made by the Government the greatest possible care had been taken and the greatest wisdom shown in having the whole work and business performed under the supervision of the department and in the Dominion of Canada. We find that after correspondence, an indenture was entered into on March 9, 1897. Clause 2 reads :

That the original dies of portraits, vignettes, lathe-work, borders and other patterns or designs, and the matrix dies used in connection with any work under this agreement may be engraved at the establishment of the contractors in the city of New York, in the state of New York, one of the United States of America, which dies, on being so engraved, shall be forthwith taken to the city of Ottawa, in the province of Ontario, in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hour for Private Bills having expired, the Committee of Ways and Means will now resume its sitting.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CLANCY. I did not take part in this debate before because I indulged the hope, as did many hon. members on both sides of the House, that some modifications would be made in the resolutions now before the committee in order that hon. members on both sides might meet on a common ground on so important a question as the one now under discussion. I shall not devote any time to a discussion of the question in its wider sense, as to the effect of the tariff generally, but I shall confine myself entirely to the effects of the resolution now before the House ; but before doing so I shall have to give attention for a few moments to some of the observations made by the hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Frost) before recess. The hon. member (Mr. Frost) said that the manufacturers, of course including himself, were entirely satisfied with the new tariff, but I am afraid that the hon. gentleman was speaking entirely for his own case, and with reference to articles exclusively in his own line of manufacture. I am inclined to think that he took some liberties when he undertook to speak for the manufacturers generally of this country, and to say they were all satisfied and had no ground of complaint. I can quite understand that the hon. gentleman himself is satisfied, because I am sure he knows a good thing when he gets it. It will be present to the mind of every hon. gentleman in this House that the class of manufacturing in which he is engaged has received additional protection, and is in a better position than it was before.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Mr. TISDALE. What does he make ?

Mr. CLANCY. He is engaged in the manufacturing of farming implements. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Frost) has had a very substantial addition to his protection, but that increase in his protection was at the expense of the consumers of this country—not exclusively the farmers, but others as well. It will be conceded that by reason of the reduction of duties on iron, there has been a loss of revenue to the extent of about $200,000, and that must be made up in some way, and paid by the people of this country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Frost) said further, that there was neither rhyme nor reason in the reduction that was formerly made in the tariff on that class of goods. But that statement conflicts with his argument used on former occasions and repeated to-night, that the National Policy had driven thousands of men out of the country. If the allegations of he and his friends be true, they were driven out because of combines, and combines were said to be encouraged and perpetuated by the system of high protection. I leave the hon. gentleman to settle that question with himself and with his friends. Why, the Liberals are now claiming that there has been a substantial reduction under the new tariff is difficult to understand, but I congratulate the hon. gentleman (Mr. Frost) in knowing that he has been well protected. No doubt he himself is satisfied, but I object to his speaking for any other class. He told us that the agriculturists of the country were fairly dealt with and were satisfied, but the hon. gentleman has no doubt been paying more attention to his own business than the farmers, and he knows more about it than he does about agricultural matters. It is a very easy thing for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Frost) to make a bald statement of that kind, but it is entirely another matter for him to give proof of it.

I must confess, Mr. Chairman, that, like my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster), I am still in the dark as to the meaning of the resolution now before the House, and I shall have to ask for further information. The hon. the First Minister said this afternoon, in a very feeble attempt to throw light upon the question, that the Government were not disposed to answer arguments that had already been answered, and he said further, that the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) did not attack the resolution upon its merits, but upon its consequences. Now, Sir, the merits of this resolution must depend upon and be gauged by its consequences, and if it has a bad effect upon the fiscal policy of the country, then the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) has a perfect right to point that out to the Government. The power asked by the Government to make treaties and to change the whole fiscal system of Canada at the mere will and wish of the Controller of Customs, is a very serious matter, and is well worthy the careful consideration of this House. When the First Minister was making an attempt at argument this afternoon—and I confess it would be paying it a compliment to say it was an argument—his proposition was, that the Government were not making treaties but were simply carrying out the law, and in support of the course of the Government as set forth in this resolution he quoted the statutory offer of the United States which was in the old tariff Act. Well, Sir, any powers that Parliament may grant to Government of such an extraordinary character as are sought for in this resolution, are opposed to the principles of parliamentary government, whether they be great or small. Of course if it is granted in small matters, the evils are not so far-reaching; but in any case the principle is bad and should be avoided. The First Minister seemed to forget that in the statutory offer which he quoted the articles were limited to those mentioned in the statute, and while the principle might be the same, yet under this resolution now proposed by the Government, the articles are entirely unlimited, and it is possible that great wrong might be inflicted upon Canada. If the hon. the First Minister or the Controller of Customs are willing to rest their case upon the fact that this Parliament has powers of a most limited character beyond which it is impossible to go to the extent of one line or one letter, that they on the other hand are justified in asking Parliament now to grant them powers which are absolutely unlimited. Parliament is asked to give up, not part of its powers, but absolutely every power it possesses into the hands of the Ministry of the day, for the purpose of dealing with this reciprocal tariff. I appeal to hon. gentlemen on that side of the House and ask them if the cases are parallel, if the consequences are the same, or if they are to be offset one against the other. If hon. gentlemen rest their case on that ground, I think I may be excused if I say that they are destitute of argument.

There is another feature of the question to which I now desire to call the attention of the Controller of Customs, and with regard to which I will ask him a question to which I hope he will do me the honour of giving an answer. I desire to ask him a question, not for the purpose of prolonging this debate, but for the purpose of getting light on what seems to me to be a very important matter. It is true, the hon. the First Minister told us to-day that he thought the time of Ministers might be better occu-pled than in answering questions and arguments that had already been answered. But I do not think this question has yet been answered, and we had the evidence of one of the hon. gentleman's followers this afternoon that he was still in the dark. The First Minister said this afternoon that the Government had carefully considered the whole question, before placing this resolution on the Table, and had come to the conclusion that it applied to but one country, with the bare possibility of another country being included. Having done that, they placed before the House and the country—what? Why, a resolution intended to open the doors, not to England alone, but to every other country in the world which brought itself within the conditions of the resolution. The hon. Controller of Customs probably from a little heat of temper—I will not say from provocation, because sometimes we feel strongly over matters, not because they are untrue, but because they really contain within them the sting of truth—said the other evening to the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster)—and I would like to know now whether he still adheres to the proposition he then laid down, or is now prepared to modify it, and take a different view:

The workmen of this country, to whom he has alluded, and the manufacturers of this country, whose cause he pretends to plead, whom he says we are ruining, will note the fact that so far as that hon. gentleman's words can have any weight on this question when it comes to be argued, all the influence of the ex-Finance Minister of Canada was given to strengthen the hands of those who were trying to gain admission to our markets under the preferential clause. When China and Japan ask for a remission under this clause, should they do so, they will be able to point to the fact that the ex-Finance Minister of Canada, in his place in Parliament, declared they were entitled, under the operation of this tariff, to secure the introduction of their goods under the preferential clause.

If that means anything, it means that the hon. gentleman was shrinking from the consequences of his own resolution. It means that he was first inviting every country in the world, if it changed its tariff to bring it within the meaning of the resolution, to take him at his word, and come in. If they were entitled to come within the terms of the resolution, and if he refused to admit them, he would be doing them an injustice. If the hon. gentleman invited the whole world to come in, let me ask him if it was an improper thing on the part of the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) to say to China, "The Government of Canada have made an offer to you, and I think you have a right to come in." Would that be an improper thing on the hon. gentleman's part, or has the hon. gentleman himself come to the conclusion that it would be a dangerous thing if to-morrow he found that China and Japan came within the terms of the resolution, and could come in? There seems no way out of the difficulty, except to assume that when hon. gentlemen opposite are brought face to face with the consequences of carrying out that resolution, they shrink from those consequences, and are ready to say very unpleasant things against hon. gentlemen who are following precisely in the line the hon. Controller of Customs himself proposed.

There is another question which I wish to ask the hon. gentleman. The resolution has been read often, but the hon. gentleman will permit me to read it once more :

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be entered for duty, or taken out of warehouse for consumption in Canada, at the reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff set forth in Schedule D.

Take the case of England. The products of one country may be its growth, or they may be partly its growth and partly its manufacture. These products are exported to England. I will give the hon. Controller of Customs an instance in the class of goods which he is engaged in manufacturing. The hon. gentleman knows that a certain class of biscuits are largely imported from England. The wheat is grown in the United States, the flour is manufactured in the United States, it is exported to England and is there manufactured into biscuits, which are exported to Canada. The hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Frost) this evening said very boastfully that the consequences of a policy of this kind would be that England would be the road by which the products of the United States would reach Canada; they would go from the United States to England in a partly finished condition, and would finally be imported into Canada. Now, England does not produce raw material. England imports raw material, some of it in a raw state, some of it in a greatly advanced stage of manufacture, and I desire to ask whether the meaning of this resolution is that no matter in how advanced a state of manufacture material may be brought into England, it may come into this country under the preferential clause. Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to answer me that question?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). We shall have to be guided by the law—articles of growth, produce or manufacture of the country.

Mr. CLANCY. I have pointed to a case in which an article might be the growth of the United States and have been in part manufactured in the United States and then have been sent to England and finished there, and from England sent to Canada.

Mr. CLANCY.

Would such a case come within the clause, or does the hon. gentleman intend to place any limit? The reason I ask is this: Goods may be made in part in Germany, and England may be made the back-door through which the manufactures of Germany and France and every other country may be sent to Canada. Business men will be shrewd enough to take advantage of a clause open to a construction of that kind, and the consequence will be that any country in the world may send its goods to England in an advanced stage of manufacture, have them finished in England, and stamped as English goods, and then send them into Canada at the reduced rate. I ask the hon. Minister again if he proposes to put any limit to meet such cases?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Regulations will have to be made under which these goods will be imported, and the exporter will have to conform to those regulations. The hon. gentleman is supposing a case. He thinks the goods will be partly manufactured in the United States and then completed in England and stamped in England and then shipped to Canada. I do not expect that at all, nor do I think the hon. gentleman expects it.

Mr. CLANCY. I will leave out the trade mark, if the hon. gentleman puts any stress upon that. The question is simple enough. Will Belgium and Germany and France be free to have their goods finished in England and then admitted into Canada on the same terms as English goods? The hon. gentleman must see what a strong incentive there will be for foreign manufacturers to adopt that expedient, and I ask him, in all fairness, whether he thinks regulations can be made to meet it. If the resolution simply said, "goods the growth of the country," one could understand it; or if the resolution drew the line at such goods as were brought into England and manufactured there, one could understand that. But when it may include all the stages of manufacture and when the last stage might simply be a little lever to bring the goods within the clause, then the case is surrounded with a great deal of difficulty. But there is another difficulty. I fear the hon. gentleman's regulations will not be sufficient.

Mr. FOSTER. He cannot make any regulations that the law does not authorize.

Mr. CLANCY. No, that reminds me that the hon. gentleman has not asked power to make regulations, and the resolutions are bound, if applied, to give rise to many serious difficulties. Now, I desire to ask the hon. gentleman's attention to another phase of the case. Suppose China and Japan were to ask for admission under this clause, they would be able to point out that the goods imported by Canada from these countries were charged at a higher average rate than those which these countries imported from Canada, and what reply would the hon. gentleman have to make. Now, we are not making the exchange of similar kinds of goods. It would not be at all a difficult matter if we were making the exchange of similar kinds of goods, as was proposed by the statutory offer to the United States, but the difficulty is that we are exchanging our goods for goods that are entirely dissimilar and not produced in Canada, as a rule, and what are we to consider? The hon. gentleman says we are to consider their tariff as a whole. But we are not concerned with the tariff of China or Belgium or France or Germany affecting classes of goods not produced in Canada. We are not concerned, for instance, in the manufacture or the growth of silks, and when the hon. gentleman uses the words "on the whole," I take it he means the whole of the goods exported from Canada to the particular country in question and to the whole of the goods imported from that country into Canada, and that he is bound to see whether the duties are uniformly the same or whether the one tariff is, on the whole, as low as the other. If the hon. gentleman takes that view, China and Japan will clearly come in, because no doubt the duties imposed by China and Japan are very much lower than those imposed by us. But so far we have no explanation beyond the broad statement "upon the whole." Three-fourths, perhaps nine-tenths, of the tariff of Japan and China, does not concern us in the least. What do we export? Probably half a dozen classes of goods. Our exports are largely confined to the mines, fisheries, agriculture and the forests, and beyond these we are not greatly concerned about the tariff of any country. We export lumber and flour and so on, so that we have not had, up to this moment, an explanation of what the hon. gentleman means by the words, "on the whole." We do not know whether he means the whole tariff of any country or that part of the tariff which embraces the goods exported by Canada and the goods imported from the country applying the rates that are charged on both sides. The committee are yet in the dark as to that, and the country must be in the dark, except for the broad statement that hon. gentlemen opposite have made with regard to it.

There is just one other point I wish to refer to. It has already been referred to by other speakers, but I think it cannot be emphasized too strongly. If there is anything the business men of this country desire—and I don't care what their calling in life may be—if there is anything needed more than another for the prosperity and advancement of the country, it is that the people may have some security in the fiscal policy, that there may be some permanency, so that capital may not be discouraged. It is therefore most undesirable that there should be any power for change of our fiscal policy other than the power which necessarily exists in Parliament to change from time to time. But, under this resolution our fiscal policy may be changed by hon. gentlemen opposite exercising the powers which they are now asking from Parliament. But, more than that, it may be that our whole condition will be changed through the action of other countries, under the proposals that are made by the Government. Suppose that half a dozen countries at once lower their tariff and thus become entitled to come in under this preferential clause, what would be the consequence to our business men? The consequence would be that our whole business industries in Canada would be imperilled, and that by changes of tariff policy in foreign countries against which we would have given up our right to protect ourselves. I have no difficulty whatever in voting against the resolution before this House. We on this side cannot hope to convince hon. gentlemen opposite. When these hon. gentlemen wilfully close their eyes and their ears it is not easy for us to make them see or hear. But there is a court to which we must appeal later on, and we are willing to abide that time. But, while we feel that we are being strengthened before the people by this extraordinary action of the Government, I am sure we shall be glad, for the sake of the country, to have the Government retrace its steps. But we know what courage is necessary for a man of a party to admit that he or it has made a mistake. If hon. gentlemen opposite feel that it is too late now that they are committed to their policy and must go on with it, we can well afford to wait for the verdict of the people, who will decide with rectitude and sound judgment and with an appreciation of their own public interest. Hon. gentlemen must face a larger division, in which members cannot be whipped into line, as we have seen the majority whipped into line, in this House, and the result, I believe, will be to administer a deserved and sound rebuke not only to the Government for asking such dangerous powers, but to the majority behind them for giving them such power. We find a majority composed of men calling themselves Liberals giving these extraordinary powers to the executive for the first time not only in the history of this Parliament, but in the history of parliamentary institutions under British rule. Hon. gentlemen opposite must go back to the people and say: We did not care if we violated principle; we were quite willing to trust to the honesty and judgment of our leaders and thought that instead of sitting in Parliament and keeping control of legislation, even in so serious a matter as the fiscal policy of Canada, we preferred to hand it over to the executive. I have put this point particularly to these gentlemen calling themselves independent members. I see here the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers). He is a farmer like myself, and, no doubt, deeply interested in the class to which we both belong. I ask him, as an independent member of this House, whether, before coming to this Parliament, before becoming enslaved with his present associations, he would have proposed to the people such a proceeding as this. He finds it difficult, no doubt, to assert its independence; he may be told that he can get more out of supporting the Government—I do not say that such a proposition was made, but I am sure he will agree with me that the associations of everyday life, the attempts of friends to reason with him against his reason, tend to overcome a man. I believe, however, he will give an honest judgment; and I would like to ask him, as an independent member of the House, if he thinks that in this session of the first Parliament he ever sat in he should commit himself to a new rule of such an extraordinary character as that which is proposed by the Government. This must appear a most extraordinary thing even to the most ardent member of this House, a most extraordinary thing for any gentleman to commit himself to, however strong may be his party associations. If there is one thing for which the people have struggled harder than for any others, it is for the assertion of their own independence against the executive power. There was a time when there was a struggle between the people and the Crown because the Crown controlled the executive power. We never had parliamentary freedom until we struck off one after another the shackles from the people of this country. Why, Sir, give a party power, and they will always use it. Hon. gentlemen may now be prepared to ask any power from their followers. If this resolution is passed the Government would be perfectly consistent in saying: Give us power to carry on the affairs of this country for the next five years, and you gentlemen go home. I think one is almost as consistent as the other, in practice one principle is quite as sound as the other. I hope yet that hon. gentlemen opposite will modify this resolution and not ask Parliament to assent to it in its present shape. No party advantage can be weighed against it. I am not going to charge hon. gentlemen opposite with any desire to injure the country; but we owe a greater duty to our country than to our party. I still hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will insist upon their leaders withdrawing this proposition so extraordinary in itself, so unheard of in Canada, and I hope it will be unheard of in the future.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to say a few words on this matter, and would have done so sooner were it not that my natural diffidence restrained me. But I feel it my duty to say something, although I am only able to do so in a very imperfect manner. I wish that the duty of discussing this question from a farmer's standpoint had fallen upon some one more able and with greater parliamentary experience. I am proud to say that I represent in my feeble way the agriculturists of this country; I am glad to say that I belong to the Patrons of Industry whose principles are embodied in the planks of the platform which have been read in this House, and which over 200,000 farmers of this country have subscribed to. No other movement was ever started in this country that took such a hold upon the farmers as the organization known as the Patrons of Industry, and the platform which was submitted to them. It is true also that the party press on both sides of politics left the organization alone, or did not criticise it severely; in fact they hardly ever alluded to it. It took them by surprise, so to speak, and the party politicians seldom assailed the principles laid down in that platform. My hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Clancy) asked me some question about the stand I was taking in this matter. Well, Sir, one of the planks in our platform is reciprocal trade on fair and equal terms between Canada and the world. That is the ninth plank of the platform. That was put before the farmers of this country, and they accepted it with hardly a dissenting voice. I think the hon. gentleman himself subscribed to that platform; though I may be wrong. I represent the county of Frontenac, which was at one time as strong a Conservative county as there was in the whole province. It has been represented by Conservatives for years. The Patron organization started in my county, and it came into my neighbourhood, in fact, by my solicitation. In my neighbourhood we had always been strong Conservatives, and when the platform was laid before our meeting one of the strongest Conservatives in the county read over the platform and said: Yes, that is a good thing, that is right. The chairman of the Conservative Association in my county asked me one day about the Patrons; I gave him a little history of the matter and showed him the platform. He read it over and said: It is a good thing, the best thing that ever came into our country, and I will help it along all I can. The farmers know what is best for this country, and what is best in their own interests, and it is only party bigotry and party strife that prevent them from voting in favour of their own interests. There is no class of the community who are as true patriots as the farmers. When the National Policy was inaugurated, times were dull and business was at a low ebb; and the farmers, being loyal to their country, accepted the National Policy for a time and were willing to give it a fair trial. I myself subscribed to it, stood by it, and fought for it, hoping that good results would come from it. But we never supposed that the National Policy was going to be maintained for so long a time, we supposed it was established to give our manufacturing industries a foothold, and so we stood by it for seventeen or eighteen years, and gave it a fair trial. I, like many other farmers, looked into the matter and found that we were not realizing from it the results that we expected, and naturally we dropped it. I did not wait until the last minute to break away from it, but I told my Conservative friends, when we met in convention, that the National Policy was not producing the good we expected from it, that our interests were not considered as they should have been in framing the National Policy in the first place, and that it had had its day, and we must now have something better in the interests of the farmer, that in fact we must look out for number 1. Now I may ask: What has the National Policy done for the farmers? We have been told that it has done great things for us. Well, I fail to see it in any way. For a little while it did good for the manufacturing industries, it helped to give them a foothold in this country, and we farmers, in a loyal and patriotic spirit, supported it on that ground. But the time came when we wanted a change. We know from sad experience that the agricultural interests of Canada are in a depressed condition. I have been looking over the statistics for Ontario for 1895, and I see there are about ninety loan companies registered, who have made returns to the Ontario Government. I am sorry we have not similar returns from the other provinces, no doubt they would show a still worse state of affairs. These ninety loan companies have over $100,000,000 on mortgages in Ontario alone, and private parties, it is said, hold twice as much. Over 6,000,000 of mortgaged lands for sale, over 2,000,000 on which compulsory proceedings have been taken. I am sorry to have to say this; I would rather these facts should be kept out of the press, for I dislike to raise the cry of blue ruin. But these facts are plain to all who desire to know them. But that is not the worst of it. We find that there are over $11,000,000 held on chattel mortgages in Ontario alone, and over half the number is on the farmers. Every one knows that when a man is obliged to mortgage his chattels, he is reduced to pretty low ebb. Not all the farmers are in that condition, I am pleased to say. I will give you a few cases by counties, counties, I am surprised to find, which still send Conservatives to represent them in Parliament. The county of Northumberland and Durham has 557 chattel mortgages, amounting to $212,358. Simcoe has 724 chattel mortgages, amounting to $263,660. Grey, Norfolk, Kent have over 200,000. Is it any wonder the farmers cry out for a change.

Mr. CLANCY. Is the hon. gentleman anxious to spread over the country chattel mortgages of the farmers?

Mr. ROGERS. I am sorry this should be done. When, however, we ask for freer trade relations we cannot shut our eyes to all the facts, and yet I do not like to cry,

"blue ruin." We must look at matters in their proper light. We all know how the value of land has decreased, and that there must be some cause for it. We do not think this preferential trade arrangement is just what it should be; we feel that the tariff changes are not what we wish, what we ask for and what we hope for; but we feel there is something in the preferential clause for the farmers. Throughout the whole of this discussion it has struck me forcibly that the agricultural interest has hardly been mentioned, that all attention has been given to the manufacturing and commercial interests, as if this country depended on them alone. What a mite they are in comparison with the farming interest. Are not our farmers the great manufacturers? What is the value of manufactured exports? Only eight or nine millions, and part of which is product, hides, grain, woollen, &c. The farmers who, I say, are the real manufacturers, export products to the value of sixty millions. I have not a word to say against the labouring men or the manufacturer, but I feel for myself and for my brother farmers. Even if we obtain special legislation for the farmers, cannot we truly say what cannot be said for any other class that when we prosper all the other classes must and do prosper. It is no use trying to fight against nature—the agriculturist must take first place in this country. If we made this a cheap country to live in, if we filled it up with a few millions more people, then we might look after manufacturing interests. It is not easy to make this a great manufacturing country when there are only five millions of consumers. These manufactures cannot have any material effect on the market. I should like any hon. member to show me how manufactures confer advantage to any extent by increasing the price on our home market. Our wheat, oats, barley, cheese, butter and other agricultural products are regulated as to price by the prices prevailing in other countries. As regards corn, I have of late become a convert to free corn, but to hold it as a whip over the heads of the Americans and let them, in return do something for us in barley, hay, &c., although I believe on the whole it would be better for our farmers to obtain cheaper feed of any kind, because the farmers of this country, especially in Ontario, cannot make money growing grain to sell but must feed more. When the Government brought in their policy of free corn, who asked them to do it? The farmers having been asking for this concession for years, and we cannot blame the Government for acceding to this request. But, I repeat, that I should like them to hold it in hand to make the Americans come to time; they may not think it best to do so, but that is my opinion of the matter. Now, who is the true labouring man? It is the farmer, who is assisted by his wife and family. They are the true toilers, but they have never had that consideration which they deserve. It is often said that there is no work for the poor man, that there are so many men out of employment. Did any one ever hear of a farmer saying there was no work to be done on his farm? It is an acknowledged fact that farming does not pay unless a man has help within his own family, for he cannot afford to pay help. But it is never said that there is no work for the farmer. When it is necessary for the rising generation from nine or ten years of age to work from daylight to dark it is rather a poor state of affairs, and agricultural interests cannot be truly prospering so long as that is the case. Men have often said to me that they could make higher wages in other callings. I know that to be the case, and have told them to take the higher wages when they could get them; but, at the same time I have felt that there was something radically wrong when I could not pay them equal wages. The National Policy kept wages high as regards mechanics and labourers in towns and cities, and farmers could not pay such high wages, and very few men were employed for that reason. It is said that the manufacturer has to compete with the cheap labour of foreign countries as regards all manufactured articles. Have not the farmers to compete with the cheap labour of India, the Argentine Republic and other countries with their manufactured articles. A man who has invested $20,000 in farm property has to be the leader of his men and has to work early and late to keep that capital. It will be no disadvantage to the farmers if they are able to buy goods a little cheaper, for there are a million and a half of them, and they have to compete with all other foreign countries. This question has been somewhat overlooked in the past, and I have felt indignant since I came to this House that so little has been said of the farming interests and so little consideration given them. All the discussion has been respecting the welfare of our manufacturing industries. They should be able to stand with 15, 20, or 25 per cent duties, which I say is still in some instances too high, and they should be able to live with less duties. So, I say, it is quite proper if we can get manufactured goods at reduced rates because the farmers constitute the great majority of the people. We should be considered, and we are not considered. The whole life of this country depends upon the farming community, and it is they who have made Canada what it is to-day. Suppose for an instant that the farmers were to hold up their hands and not work for six months, why, the prosperity of Canada would flatten out like a pancake. But in past years the Government has been grinding down the farmers, making it a dearer country to live in, and making it harder for the farmer and his family to eke out an existence. I am sorry to say that there are not more members in this House who have a fellow feeling with the toiling masses of Canada, and who know their wants; if there were more gentlemen of that description, there would be quite a different story to tell in Canada to-day. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) referred to the Germans as being an economical prudent and cheap living people. That may be all true, but I wonder if there are in the world to-day, a more intelligent and frugal people than are our Canadian farmers. Why, if they were not, bad as their lot is, it would be much worse to-day. We have to compete with cheap labour and with foreign markets, and our living expenses have necessarily to be cut down. It is true that our exports have increased during the last seven or eight years, but it was not the National Policy that did that. It was the fact that we worked harder, worked longer hours, and to some extent improved our style of farming to suit the foreign market to get the wherewithal to meet our increased demands. If the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) were in his seat to-night, I would have referred to the very unpleasant remarks which he made, and which I suppose if I characterized as ungentlemanly, I would be ruled out of order as I was before. I will defer my references to him until he is in the House. I have received letters from different parts of the country resenting the manner in which the Patron representatives have been spoken of here by certain gentlemen. The farmers of the country resent such language and they feel it as strongly as if the slur had been cast upon themselves. These attacks on the farmers' representatives will come home to roost on the men who made them. I regret that the honourable profession of the law should have in its ranks men who would use such language towards the farmers of this country. I am sorry that an Ontario member used the language, for it is in strong contrast with the courtesy of language and demeanour of hon. gentlemen who come from the provinces by the sea. I may say also that our late representative from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) would not stoop to use the language which has been used here. So far as I am myself concerned, I care nothing, for it falls on me like water on a duck's back, but the farmers of this country will resent the sneering manner in which they have been referred to. I cannot argue as to the legal point of this resolution which the House is discussing, but I do believe there is some good in the resolution, and I am willing to give it a fair trial. I know, at all events, that it will not make our condition any worse than it is now. The farmers of this country need have no fear because they will be able to buy English goods or any other at a lower price than at present, and our object is, and the necessities of our condition compels us, to buy as cheap as we can and to sell as dear as possible.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) is here now.

Mr. ROGERS. He came in in the wrong time, and I am very sorry he was not here a few minutes ago, but I will refer to him again.

Mr. BENNETT. I very much regret that I was not in the Chamber sooner, so that the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) might have done himself the honour of pouring out some of his vials of wrath on my devoted head.

Mr. ROGERS. I would not think it worth my while.

Mr. BENNETT. I have only to say, that if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) has anything to state in reference to myself, he has the opportunity of doing so at any time. Had it not been for the nature of his remarks the other night, I would not have made the pointed reference to him that I did, but as regards what I did say, I have nothing whatever to take back. I saw standing in the corridor a trunk with the hon. gentleman's name painted on it, and I have been assured by several hon. gentlemen that they also saw it. Whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) has taken the trunk or not, I do not know, and much less do I care. I regret, however, that the hon. gentleman is under instructions to sit down to-night.

Mr. ROGERS. Wait until you sit down.

Mr. BENNETT. My remarks were not directed against the Patron order. Nothing of the kind. My remarks were simply directed against the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) and those associated with him in this House, and if it is not the opinion of the Patrons throughout the country that they are a lot of humbugs—I hope that is a parliamentary term—then I cannot interpret rightly the expressions which I have heard from Patron sources. Now, Sir, I do not propose to say anything further about the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers), but if at any time he wishes to throw anything across the floor of this House at me, although I may not be able to retaliate in kind, because my goods are not of such a trivial character as the hon. gentleman's, perhaps I may nevertheless be able to give him a Roland for his Oliver.

Now, Sir, in continuing the debate on this question, I feel that it is of vast importance to the country as a whole. It is true, as the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) has stated that hon. gentlemen in the Government seem to attach but little importance to the resolution before us, but it must be patent to them that the whole of the business of Canada is deeply agitated by this proposed measure of the Government. I must confess I am disappointed in the measure. At the first, when it was introduced, I assumed, and did honestly think, that it was only done in a spirit of bravado, and that when the hon. gentlemen became satisfied, as they are now apparently, that their position was not tenable, the resolution with regard to preferential trade would be withdrawn, the matter would go no further, and no harm would be done. But the hon. gentlemen have admitted frankly, by the introduction of subsection "B," that they do anticipate that the resolution is open to all who come within the terms of the treaties of some thirty years ago, and, as a consequence, if the Act ever does go into force, it will not be restricted to Great Britain, but will be extended to all those countries that come within the terms of those treaties. I listened the other night to the laboured argument of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), who at one moment appeared to convince himself that the tariff was a British preferential tariff, and then, in the next breath, that it was open to the whole world—putting up one man of straw after another, and then knocking them down. It has been patent to the House and the country that the legal gentlemen on the Government side of the House have not put themselves on record on this question, knowing that the day must arrive when it will have to be decided, and they are fearful to place on record opinions which afterwards will have to go by the board, as that of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will have to go as a legal opinion.

But I rose for the purpose of making some reference to a matter which concerns the riding I represent to a great extent; that is, the policy of this Government with regard to lumber. There was a time in the history of this country, within the last ten years, when the lumber question was a most perplexing one, by reason of the fact that the American Government had given a broad and comprehensive measure of trade in lumber between this country and the United States. However, since the American Government have announced that their policy is not as it was some years ago, but propose to place an import duty of $2 a thousand on lumber, it behooves the Canadian Government to take some steps by way of retaliation to endeavour to balance matters between this country and the United States in that respect. At the outset I wish to call the attention of the Minister to the fact that to-day there are being imported into the western parts of Ontario from the United States millions of feet of lumber, from Saginaw, Bay City, and other points on Lake Huron, while it is a matter of regret that the Canadian trade will be forced, if the Dingley Bill goes into effect, to pay $2 a thousand on all the lumber passing from this country into the United States. But it is to be remembered that Canada holds the vantage point to-day in dealing with the American Government, in having the power to impose an export duty. There was a time when the state of Michigan was practically one vast forest, and afforded an unlimited amount of white pine lumber for the United States market. But that day has gone by, and for the last ten years from 250 to 400 million feet of pine logs per year have passed from Canada to the United States. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) will probably dispute that statement, though I think he will admit that the quantity exported to the United States has been as high as 275 million feet in a single year. There is this difficulty at arriving at the proper quantity, that as no export duties were charged on white pine logs going out of this country, no close watch was kept upon them; but any hon. gentleman observing the customs ports on the shores of the Georgian Bay, will find that in nearly every case the quantity of logs entered as being towed over by any of the different tugs is uniformly the same, whereas, as a matter of fact, many of these tugs have a towing capacity three or four times as great as the smaller ones. It is also notorious, as the records of the Customs Department will prove, that the people exporting these logs have been caught from time to time in the act of making wrong returns, and, therefore, there is no proper means of arriving at the true quantity exported.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I wish to call attention to the fact that my hon. friend is not speaking to the resolution before the House. The question is on resolution 16, the reciprocal tariff.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman should confine himself to discussing resolution 16, which is the reciprocal tariff question.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a very wide clause—"that when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada." Lumber is one of the products of Canada, and my hon. friend is framing an argument in regard to that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand that the hon. gentleman is making an argument, not concerning the clause in question, but concerning protection or the National Policy. I think he should confine himself as much as possible to the discussion of the item itself.

Mr. WILSON. Was not this reservation made when the resolutions were allowed to go through, that we could discuss them in committee?

The PRIME MINISTER. Not on this clause.

Mr. MARTIN. I thought that was understood between the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. BENNETT.

Mr. WILSON. I understood the leader of the Opposition to say that he had made that kind of an arrangement with the leader of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. What arrangement?

Mr. WILSON. That we might discuss the whole question on the resolutions, with the same liberty as if the Speaker were in the Chair.

The PRIME MINISTER. If the Speaker were in the Chair, we should not have this privilege now. My hon. friend is mistaken; he has not properly understood the agreement.

Mr. HUGHES. What was the agreement?

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not know of any agreement at all.

Mr. HUGHES. The agreement was made across the House, that the resolutions should be allowed to go through, and that in committee there would be great latitude allowed in debating these items.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend is quite in error. There was no such agreement as that. There is no doubt that in the general discussion there should be some latitude, but if you take the items up clause by clause, you can never get through the business if you have a general discussion on each of them.

Mr. BENNETT. If you decide, Mr. Chairman, accordingly, I shall have to reserve my remarks on lumber until the lumber schedule is reached. Therefore, I must go back to the subject that is worn almost threadbare, and, at the risk of provoking some of the legal gentlemen on the other side of the House to give their legal opinions, I must deal with the question of the preferential tariff from the legal point of view. It was argued the other night by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, with a great deal of force, that the resolution now before us is strictly within the rights of the Parliament of Canada to pass, and the first position he took was that what is known as the German Zollverein treaty was not binding on Canada. It is true that the hon. gentleman was rather rash because after he had quoted his opinion and given his views, he was rather withered by the argument of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) to which no hon. gentleman on that side has had the temerity up to the present to reply. Even when the first Minister himself this afternoon discussed the matter, not a word did he utter in answer to the argument adduced by the hon. member for Halifax. It is true that the wealth of opinion is on the one side at the present time. After the Australian conference was held here and correspondence was had with the Imperial Government, there was a consensus of opinion that there was no right on the part of Canada to make a preferential treaty of which Great Britain alone should have the benefit, there was an acquiescence on both sides of this House in that particular, and until the introduction of this Bill, no word was heard in support of such a contention. The fact that no hon. gentleman opposite has seen fit to give his legal endorsement of the views taken by the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Davies) is of itself evidence that hon. gentlemen opposite are not at all strong in their position, and if they have felt at any time stronger in their position, they have certainly admitted most frankly, by the insertion of clause "B," that the ground they first took has slid from under their feet and they have now substituted this clause :

That the Governor in Council may extend the benefits of such reciprocal tariff to any country which may be entitled thereto by virtue of any treaty with Her Majesty.

So that the ground which these hon. gentlemen took at the outset that the treaty was a preferential treaty with Great Britain alone has altogether passed away from view, and now they frankly admit, by the insertion of clause "B," that the anticipated instructions from the home Government which will force them to grant to all these other countries the preference that they at first said they were granting to Great Britain alone.

Mr. FOSTER. When the arrangement with regard to this debate was mentioned by my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier), I thought that my memory did not serve me wrong. There was an arrangement come to, which it will be found on page 1684 of "Hansard:"

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I move the first resolution pro forma, and without any intention of keeping the House longer.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Very well.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. With that understanding, I now move that the committee do rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask the Prime Minister to adopt the usual course under those circumstances, of allowing the same latitude of discussion of the resolutions in committee as there would be on the general question. A number of hon. gentlemen who were anxious to speak, have deferred their remarks in order to let the House go into committee to-night.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). That has always been understood.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would be sorry to go back on any understanding come to, but I submit to my hon. friend that I understood that when we went into committee that a general discussion would take place, and that that should limit the discussion. But if on every particular clause we go back to the general discussion, we will never finish. We are now at the sixteenth clause and there are 400 altogether. Does my hon. friend expect that on every item there will be a general discussion?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman cannot fix a limit to the agreement he made without limits, and besides that has been the rule in tariff discussions. You may try to limit discussion as much as you like, but the House will only give up when they have said all they want to say on the tariff. When the hon. leader of the Opposition asked my hon. friend to adopt the usual course of allowing the same latitude of discussion of the resolutions in committee as would be allowed on the general question, my hon. friend replied: "That has always been understood."

The PRIME MINISTER. I always understood it, certainly.

Mr. DAVIN. I think the hon. leader of the Government has misstated the agreement. The agreement was that on any item of the tariff there may be a general discussion, but the way the Prime Minister puts it is that on every item of the tariff there should be a general discussion.

The PRIME MINISTER. I did not say "should." I understood the agreement to be that when we resumed in committee, the general discussion should go on, with the same range as if the debate were being re-opened and the Speaker in the Chair; but I did not understand that after we had passed sixteen items, a general discussion still might be had on every additional item until the 400 were exhausted. We are now on the sixteenth resolution regarding the reciprocal tariff, and the discussion so far has been confined to this question, but now at the eleventh hour an attempt is made to make the discussion general. I would be the last man to attempt to curtail the privileges of any member, but I submit, in all fairness, that if every resolution is to be opened to a general discussion, the debate will be endless.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has said just sufficient to make the position of my hon. friend perfectly sound. The hon. gentleman said he had given his consent to have a general freedom of discussion but he supposed that was to take place on one resolution and not on more. On what resolution has any general discussion taken place?

The PRIME MINISTER. When we went into committee.

Mr. FOSTER. No, that was merely a pro forma resolution, and no member of the committee took part in any general discussion until we came to clause 15. The clause we are on is the only one on which there is any desire for general discussion, and let the general discussion, consented to, have its way on this clause.

Mr. TAYLOR. I want to draw the hon. Premier's attention to the fact that he is not dealing fairly with hon. gentlemen on this side. If he wanted to raise an objection, he should have raised it earlier when the hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Frost) was travelling from Genesis to Exodus, and the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) travelled all the way from Genesis to Revelations.

The PRIME MINISTER. I was not in the House at the time when these hon. gentlemen took such a wide circuit. If my hon. friend understood, when we came to an agreement, that on every resolution of the tariff the privilege should be given of a general debate, I must say that if I had so understood the agreement I would have objected to it. If, as is very often the case, one resolution was reserved upon which to have a general discussion, that is the way I understood it, and that is the way I want it carried out.

Mr. FOSTER. Take this resolution you have now.

The PRIME MINISTER. Do you want to have the general debate on this resolution?

Mr. FOSTER. Even take the limitation laid down by my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier), take the restricted meaning he attaches to this, and we see that he means that there should be freedom of discussion upon one resolution. There is no resolution we have reached yet that one would be justified in starting a general discussion upon. We have not strained the discussion upon this resolution. An amendment was moved; and other amendments will be moved. We are still on this clause, and I think the hon. gentleman should not try to cut off the debate.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not wish to seek an unfair advantage. If hon. gentlemen wish to have the general discussion, which, it was admitted should take place, upon this item, I would not object.

Mr. WALLACE. I would object to having a general discussion restricted to this particular resolution. You must have an opportunity for a general discussion as the items call for. One item in the tariff is so closely connected with many other items, that you cannot confine yourself to the discussion of one item.

Mr. FOSTER. These are simply the resolutions.

Mr. WALLACE. But the Prime Minister says there are 400 items in the tariff and you could not have a discussion upon each one.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is the interpretation I put upon it.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. WALLACE. I think it should be left to the good sense of the House. I do not think anybody wants to talk for talk's sake except our friend from Frontenac (Mr. Rogers), who has recited the Postmaster General's campaign speech. I think the tendency of the House has been to confine the discussion to the real business before it. But the Prime Minister must recognize that he is in the hands of the House; because, when we are in committee, if we wished, we could move that the committee rise and then discuss many matters upon that motion.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I believe there are precedents for that course.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, Mr. Chairman, I hardly know what stage we have arrived at, but I submit that, apart from the legal phase of the question, there is a great deal to be said upon this question as a whole; and, after I have dealt with one or two matters in the speech of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), then, perhaps, even apart from the lumber industry, there may be matters which I may feel it my duty to discuss.

The next ground I understood the hon. gentleman was to take was that the treaty made by Great Britain was not binding inasmuch as it was made prior to the confederation of the provinces. However, that was so completely disposed of by the little said in favour of it by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the much said against it by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) that nothing further need be said. The third ground was that, the treaty did not bind Canada by reason of the fact that, there had never been any legislation passed in Canada acquiescing or assenting to it. That also went down with the other dead ducks that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries set up. So, I am quite of opinion that the gentlemen of the legal profession on the other side of the House saw that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries' position was not sufficiently strong for them to attempt to back him up, notwithstanding that there are among them lawyers of very great eminence, with whose names the daily press toys in connection with the vacancies or expected vacancies with the Superior Courts of the several provinces. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries was the only gentleman who took the legal side; no other lawyer on that side has seen fit to stand up and endorse the position taken by him. Even the hon. the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) did not breathe fire on this subject. He may feel that he is here in a glass house, as you may say. He stands here under peculiar circumstances. On the Remedial Bill he has given a pledge which he says he is willing to act upon when that is demanded, and perhaps, he does not feel justified in wading into deep water and giving a legal opinion, which may, as I fear it would, rise up in judgment against him. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is not a prospective judge. I believe he cares more for the larger arena of politics. Anything he may say will not prejudice his standing or his claims for the ermine. It was argued here that this was simply an offer of preference to Great Britain, and the hon. gentleman's press all over the country took the cue from the announcement of the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) on this point. It was never dreamed by hon. gentlemen opposite that this would extend to the world as a whole. I believe the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) is not far from the truth when he divines the fact that the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) was the gentleman who framed this whole project, and that he had an ulterior view in mind, and that was that when the whole question came out to be threshed out on its merits, when it came to be viewed on its legal standpoint, the ground would have to be shifted, and the hon. gentlemen would find themselves in exactly the same position as they find themselves to-day. Acquiescing, by the introduction of this clause, in the idea that the preference is not to Great Britain, hon. gentlemen opposite can hardly deny that it throws markets open at low rates of duty to nearly the whole world. It cannot be denied that when some days ago, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke after the tariff was announced he spoke in an exultant strain and referred to the fact that perhaps it would not be a bad thing for Canada if under this very treaty which has been made by Great Britain, German goods and goods of other continental countries should be brought in, and the hon. gentleman seemed to think that this would be the legal interpretation of the treaty. And, always going back to his old love—because he had always favoured reciprocity with the United States—he pointed out that, while there might be reason at the present time why the United States would not come in under this preferential policy, it was not outside the bounds of possibility that some time the United States might come in. To-day the position is admitted. Nobody pretends that Great Britain alone has the preference under this policy. And so we are brought face to face with the fact that the industries created in this country under the protective tariff must submit to the competition of the countries of the old world, and that means that the artisan of Canada may no longer expect the fair rate of wages he has been accustomed to in the past. His labour must not be brought down to the same price as that of a labourer of Belgium and Germany. I have seen it stated, and I believe the authority was a good one—the statement was in a speech by President Mc-Kinley when he introduced his famous McKinley Bill as reported in the Congressional Record, that the wages of a Belgian were only about half that of an American citizen, those of the German were about the same, and that those of the British citizen were much lower than those of the American citizen. So it may be fairly argued that these would compare proportionately with the wages that are paid in Canada. Now, the hon. gentleman a short month ago announced a tariff policy for this country. After eighteen years of telling the people that they knew exactly what the country wanted, what did they do? When they came into power last year, after all their professions, they took nearly a year to look about what tariff changes the country wanted. Well, Sir, they were not satisfied with that. Time after time they had denounced the policy of the Conservative Administration in going about the country and getting the views and wishes of the people in reference to the manufacturing industries; and after these gentlemen had incubated on a tariff policy, so weak were they in their own opinions, in their own esteem, of their own ability to deal with the tariff question, that they started on a tour, going from one end of the Dominion to another, to ask these same people whom they had been telling for years that they knew exactly what they wanted—they went about asking these same people their wishes and their views. Now, it can not be even said to their credit that they actually took into account what the people did tell them, because one month ago they brought down their policy, and they were not even then prepared to stand by it, for the policy they brought down a month ago is so substantially changed and altered that they have introduced a second set of tariff announcements, in which there are the most wonderful changes. This afternoon one of the supporters had the temerity to rise—he did not take the advice of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) to sit still and keep quiet—but rose to his feet, and the burden of his song was that the Conservative Administration in past years had tampered with the tariff, to the great detriment of particular interests. The hon. gentleman at that time was referring to the agricultural implement industry. Now, what has this Government done? If there was an interest in the country that they always declaimed upon, it was the agricultural implement industry; and even those innocent and lamb-like Patrons used to speak about the same matter—and when I refer again to the Patrons, I hope I shall not be accused of saying anything, as I was the other night, in a brow-beating spirit; it is rather from a persuasive point of view that I now address my Patron friends. I address them with the idea that they may even yet, at this last hour—because there has been repentance even at a late hour—that they may turn from the error of their ways and assert their independence. We have biblical lore for this, because we are told that those whom you love you should chasten; and it is my great love for the Patrons that induces me to endeavour to chasten them; it is only done in that spirit and with that idea. Now, where was the agricultural implement industry of this country? There was never an hon. gentleman on the Liberal side of the House who, if he had an opportunity, did not point to this industry. He said: Look at the manufacturers of this country engaged in that enterprise; look at the Massey people. From little they have risen to affluence and wealth. Look at Mr. Massey dying worth five million dollars, and all that money was wrung out of whose pockets? Out of the pockets of the farmers of this country. But what have the hon. gentlemen done to-day? They have not only kept the tariff exactly where it was, at 20 per cent, but, as if to add insult to injury to the farmers—because they must be presuming on the credulity and ignorance of the farmers—they have reduced the duty on the raw material of iron, which enters largely into the manufacture of those same implements. No wonder the hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Frost) felt safe in his position. He is a manufacturer of agricultural implements, and that hon. gentleman has had a preference given to him on the raw material, and he has the assurance that the duty is to be preserved and retained, because, I suppose, he does not fear any protests from the Patrons, and, furthermore, that if the Patrons did protest, he knows full well their protestations would go unheeded, because the Patrons in this House seem to be only the tail end of the whole organization, and unable to wag the body, so the tail must, as a consequence, wag with the body. As a result, the hon. member for North Leeds feels firm in his position and perfectly secure that he is to have the same high rate of duty—a high rate of duty, as they contended it was—kept on, while he is to have the preference on the raw material. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not only that interest as affecting the farmers, that these gentlemen, after all, are ignoring to-day. Take another industry, that of woollens. There is an industry that under this very treaty must be affected and to the very great detriment of the Canadian manufacturer, and, in turn, to the Canadian farmer. Hon. gentlemen must know that there is hardly a woollen industry in this country running as it was in the past year, and in the past ten or fifteen years. They must know this, and if inquiry has not been made, inquiry should be made, for it would show that there is not a woollen mill in this country running on full time, and that many of their hands are idle and walking about the streets. To-day, the Minister received a deputation from the city of Montreal in reference to the cotton duty. And yet these hon. gentlemen propose, if they are honest in their desire to place this law on the Statute-book, to place these industries in this country in competition with the greater and the older industries in the old world. Well, all I can say is, that, as hon. gentlemen, having taken such a long time, as they have spent a whole year in looking at the tariff and making the changes they have made, it would be better for the interests of the whole country that they should withdraw the Bill that is now before the House. What the country wants to-day is freedom from agitation, what the country wants to-day is rest and a chance to brace up its shattered energies, that have been so greatly depressed since the hon. gentlemen opposite took hold of the tariff. Now, it may be that hon. gentlemen opposite do not realize what interests they may be interfering with to-day; it may be that they expect that, after all said and done, their first Tariff Bill introduced will be the Bill that will go on the Statute-book, and that, consequently, the only trade with which we will have to compete will be the trade of the old world. But, in view of all the legal arguments that have been adduced in this House, in view of the fact that they have admitted, silently, that the contention is right, and that if this treaty goes into force, it will give full play to the whole world, then I say it is a matter of much greater interest and much deeper concern. I know that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who oppose these tariff resolutions, are at once charged, as the Controller of Customs, the other night, charged the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), with building up a case in favour of those other countries. Well, all I can say is, that surely the Controller of Customs, who affects so much disdain for opinions coming from this side, will not be guided merely by the fact that the hon. member for York has made some statements relative to his views of what countries will have the right and the privilege of coming in under this tariff resolution. I believe that the time has been reached in Canada, not only by the Conservative party, but also by the Liberal party, when they believe that any Government in this country, having regard to the great vested interests of the manufacturers, should not act in the manner that they are acting to-day. I call to witness this fact, that a man who is eminent in business circles in this country, a gentleman to whom I have already referred in this House in the person of Senator Cox, a man who is held as high in respect and esteem by the people of Canada as any Minister in the Cabinet from the province of Ontario, gave a fair expression of opinion in the Senate at the opening of this House, when he had the honour of seconding the Address. The hon. gentleman then, at the risk of offending his friends, stated frankly that he did not believe they were going to carry that policy out; that those statements were very well for the country, for the platform and for the public press, but after men had won at the polls, the time arrived when they were bound to take a business-like view of the whole situation and deal with it accordingly.

I regret that the first Minister saw fit to seek to curtail the remarks I intended to make in respect to the lumber duties, and I cannot see what is to be gained by that course, for I can assure the hon. gentleman that the matter is one of such importance that before the session closes I shall find it necessary, even if it causes annoyance to some individuals, to make some very strong and pertinent remarks on the question. I must say that of all matters touched on in the tariff this is one of the highest importance, and the hon. gentlemen cannot show me any interest that is affected so largely and vitally as the lumber interest of this country. I ask the First Minister if he would take comfort if to-day we saw passing down the Ottawa millions of feet of saw-logs, at the same time our mills were standing idle and the labouring men were walking in our streets. The people of the whole city would stand in this square and would remonstrate with the Government for allowing such a policy to prevail. Yet what is the First Minister and this Government doing to-day? They are standing aside, and are seeing our lumber interests harassed and heckled, while an import duty is placed against our lumber, practically leading the people of the United States to bring their lumber into Ontario, and we are asked to admit it free of duty. That is what the hon. gentleman is doing, and he cannot deny it; and if the member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) were present, he would bear out this statement, that a large firm of which he was the solicitor in Sarnia, and which failed about a year ago, had as its largest creditor American manufacturers of lumber who had sold lumber to this firm and brought into this country. What sense was there in allowing the Canadian manufacturers to be driven out of the American market by a hostile duty of $2 per thousand on lumber, while at the same time the hon. gentleman and his Government by the present policy permit all American lumber that can be towed across Lake Huron to be dumped into western Ontario, and thus reduce the price of lumber produced in this country. If the Government had not had representations made to them by the lumbermen, there might be an excuse for their action, but they have had representations made to them. These have been published in the public press, hon. gentlemen have had deputations of lumbermen come here and asked that at least they should be placed on the same basis and footing as American manufacturers. To-day in Toronto, I am informed by credible authority, that all planks used for the sidewalks of the city are American lumber; and yet if a Canadian wants to sell a board in the United States, he is met with a hostile duty of $2 per thousand feet. There is no reason why such a condition should exist, and they must know this is the case; and before the consideration of this tariff is concluded, I hope that not only will there be the imposition of an export duty on logs, but at all events the adoption of the common-sense policy of meeting the American hostile duty with an equivalent duty, so long as they maintain their hostile duty of $2 per thousand on our lumber. As regards the export duty, I have stated that from 200,000,000 to 400,000,000 feet of pine pass from Canada to Michigan. Pulp wood is also of great importance, but I will not deal with it at the present time. If the people of the United States have come to see that they must have our Canadian white pine saw-logs, is it not time for the Government to take cognizance of what they are doing? The Americans come over here, and by their actions, which speak louder than their words, they say: We in Michigan have sawn up our supply, and we must have your white pine logs. They come over here and pay high prices, and take over to that country millions of feet. What is the result? Thousands of Canadians have been forced to follow the lumber interest to the other side of the line in order to obtain the employment there afforded them. Surely the Ministers remember receiving deputations. These included men who are cutting lumber on the shores of the Georgian Bay to-day, and these manufacturers of pine lumber came here and said: there is a duty of $2 per thousand on lumber going into the United States, and there should be an import duty of the same amount on lumber coming here; further, we ask you in the interest of the trade, also to place an export duty on logs. Then you would have the satisfaction of securing one of two results—you would either compel the United States to take off the $2 of duty on lumber, or you would conserve and keep in Canada for some years large quantities of our logs, and the result would be to promote the general interests of Canada in the long run. A few years ago that was a matter of great importance, and to-day it is a matter of even greater importance, because each year the quantity of our pine becomes more limited. But the reason that existed three, four, or five years ago against an export duty does not prevail to-day. Then the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) argued in this House, I admit with considerable force and good reason to back him up, in this sense: To-day we are having the free lumber market of the United States, and if there is an export duty on logs to be imposed, the result must be the imposition of a protective duty by the Americans to the amount of $2 or $3 per thousand. I am free to admit that under those circumstances it was a matter of deep interest and importance for the late Administration to weigh well whether they should impose an export duty or not, as the result would have been the imposition of a high import duty on our lumber. But the time has passed for taking this ground. We have to-day a hostile duty of $2 per thousand against us ; and the manufacturers of lumber in this country are asking for definite action to be taken. I read in this House a little while ago the minutes of a meeting held in Toronto, which was attended by Mr. Thompson, Mr. H. H. Cook, Mr. Shepherd, and other gentlemen, the largest operators on the north shore of Georgian Bay, who agreed that although the United States might increase the duty, that would be better than the position in which the matter stands to-day. There can be only one interest that hon. gentlemen are acceding to, and one interest whose wishes they are gratifying. That interest is the interest of the Michigan lumbering man, who like a good American, I suppose, wants to keep his own labour in his own country, and so long as he can find a Canadian Government practising such a shallow policy as is being practised to-day, he will take the Canadian logs across from this country, manufacture them in his own, and live up to the motto of "the United States for the people of the United States."

Then there may be another interest. There may be in the interest of the Canadian operator in saw logs, who not having a mill of his own, and knowing the requirements of the American people for saw-logs, is prepared to sell them on the other side. Against the American interest the Canadian Government should not weigh for a moment. The interests of the Canadian people generally should be paramount and should prevail, as against the interests of a few men who are engaged in selling white pine logs on the other side, and who are very few and whose labourers are very few as compared with the great saw-milling interests of all Canada. I do urge the Government, in the name of Canadian labourers, in the name of Canadian interests all round, to place an export duty on logs, and to meet the wishes of, not only the labouring classes on the north shore, but to meet the wishes of those very lumbermen themselves, who to-day are desirous of shipping their lumber to the states, and who are precluded by the high duty from doing so.

There are selfish interests in this, and I have no doubt it has been urged upon the Government on behalf of the Ottawa lumbermen, that they would prefer to pay $2 on white lumber, rather than to pay $2 plus the extra duty. I call the attention of the Ministry to the fact, that the Ottawa valley is not by any means the whole of Canada, and after all, the lumbering interests in this part of the country will only be affected to a like extent as the interests of the lumbermen on the north shores of the Georgian Bay. As has been before stated, and as is known to hon. gentleman, and as the press of the country will prove, men who are manufacturing lumber on the north shore, men who have large limits on the north shore, are asking the Government to place this prohibition by way of export duty upon logs, even at the risk of raising the import duty on their lumber into the United States. If the Government fail to accede to the just claims of the people on the north shore of the Georgian Bay, they are at the same time refusing to accede to the wish that is expressed by every man who has the interests of Canada as a whole at heart, and who wishes to see Canadian resources preserved as they should be, for Canadian labourers who are anxious to work in this country.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to offer a few remarks to the House to-night on one branch of the subject dwelt upon by my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), namely, that pertaining to the lumber question. The time may be somewhat inopportune for dealing with this question, but as the subject has been broached, no better time, perhaps no other time, will offer for reference to the matter. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) has often addressed the House of Commons on this subject. His views are well known, and I am free to confess that his views upon the subject are always presented forcibly. So far as his aspirations are concerned, I sympathize with him most fully. I would be glad to see all the lumber grown in Canada manufactured in this country. No Canadian would desire to have the manufacturing industries of this country injured by the deportation of raw material to be manufactured in another country, if we could manage the business ourselves. It is simply for the reason, that circumstances connected with this export trade render it inadvisable to take the course suggested by the hon. gentleman, that I have at times in this House opposed the imposition of an export duty. I must say, of course, that I believe that upon principle export duties are wrong. I believe that the founders of the American constitution never displayed their prescience more strikingly, then when they adopted as a constitutional provision, the prohibition of the imposition of all export duties. I see no reason for the imposition of an export duty upon sawlogs, that will not equally apply to an export duty upon wool, or an export duty upon wheat, or an export duty upon barley, or an export duty upon any raw material exported from the country and which is capable of being completed into a manufactured product here. We can spin wool into clothing, we can manufacture wheat into flour, we can make barley into malt and beer ; but we are glad to dispose of all these raw products, supplying ourselves with such woollen goods and such flour as we need, and selling the balance for export. It adds to the wealth of the country for us to do so, and I know from experience that in the region of country where the export of sawlogs is carried on, that export has had a most beneficial effect upon the lumbering industry. Upon the north shore of the Georgian Bay, after the McKinley Bill made the offer that the American duties would be placed at $1, if the export duties were removed, and after that offer was accepted by the Canadian Government; I know by experience that the results was the enhancing of the value of timber limits to the extent of, two-fold, and in some cases four-fold the price these limits were worth before the adoption of that policy. The last sale by the Government of Ontario of timber land, of a fraction over 600 square miles, commanded bonuses of $2,300,000. Some of the bonuses paid for these lands amounted to about $17,000 per square mile, and the effect of the policy was clearly beneficial to the lumber interests of Ontario, and has been beneficial all along.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) refers to the underestimating of sawlogs exported. Well, I do not know that I would claim that the statistics given in the Trade and Navigation Returns are strictly accurate. However, while exporters may not give an accurate estimate possibly, of every raft that is sent out, yet their clearances at the end of the season correspond with the amount of Crown dues they pay, and correspond with the total amount of logs that are cut, so that in the bulk, their clearances are correct, while in detailing raft after raft they may not have been strictly so. I think then that these statistics are fairly accurate; that is, the total of them at the close of the season. They may be somewhat under the mark, but if they are it is due to the fact that the measurement of the log is somewhat under the mark by "camp scale."

I quite agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) with reference to bringing in American lumber. I think the Government ought to take power to deal with the question by Order in Council. Of course I do not think it is proper to take any action in putting on a duty while lumber is free, and I would predicate no action upon the assumption as to what the United States Legislature may do with regard to the tariff. But I think it would be well for the Government to take power, in the event of our lumber being put on the $2 list, to put the same duty on American lumber. That would be strictly fair and I am quite in favour of it being done.

My hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) expresses a hope that before this tariff is completed in this House, the Government will put an export duty on sawlogs. Well, if that export duty would produce the effect that my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) anticipates, I would join with him in that wish as heartily as I do in the wish to have lumber put on the dutiable list, if the Americans do the same with our lumber. But unfortunately, the effect, in the case of an export duty on logs would be quite the reverse. We are deprecating the placing upon the dutiable list in the United States of lumber and shingles and the other products of the forest. Unfortunately the matter is in this position. While we, look with dissatisfaction and disfavour upon the probable imposition of a $2 duty, we certainly could derive no satisfaction from the certainty of having that $2 increased by the amount of the export duty we might impose upon logs. It would be simply aggravating the treatment we deprecate to put on an export duty, if the Americans are in the position to add the amount of that export duty to the amount of the import duty imposed on lumber sent by us into the United States. That is the difficulty. If our hands were free to impose an export duty without that action bringing back upon us like a boomerang evil consequences, I would say go on; but under the circumstances we must dismiss sentimentality, and look at this question from a practical standpoint, carefully weighing what the consequences of our action will be, and must govern ourselves like sensible business men.

Mr. CLANCY. Is the hon. gentleman's doctrine not that the consumer pays the duty? In that case, he would be quite wrong in his argument.

Mr. CHARLTON. My position is that a $2 duty is distasteful to Canadians, and a $4 duty would be worse—that if we put an export duty of $2 on logs, the effect of that is to double the American duty on lumber, and if we did not like it in the first instance, we would like it still less in the second. My hon. friend from East Simcoe says he is in favour of putting on this duty because it will bring Americans to their senses. I certainly wish it would. I certainly wish we were in a position to bring the Americans to their senses and dictate terms to them; it would be a very enviable position to be in. But unfortunately we are not in that position. Unfortunately, our lumber trade with the United States bears relatively an exceedingly small proportion to the total lumber trade of that country. We exported last year to the United States in round numbers some $7,500,000 worth of sawn lumber. The saw-mill products of the United States for the year 1896 was $403,667,000, and the product for 1896 may be safely estimated at $450,000,000, or in board measurement, about 40,000,000,000 feet. So that our export of lumber to the United States for 1896 equalled about one and one-half per cent the production of that country. That trade, although considerable in itself, is so small compared with the enormous amount of their total lumber trade that whatever course we could take would produce no sensible impression upon it, and we are not in a position to dictate terms to the United States or bring them to their senses. I am sorry it is so, but unquestionably that is the fact.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the hon. gentleman say $450,000,000 is the value of the lumber itself, and not its value when made into various articles ?

Mr. CHARLTON. That is the report. By the census returns of 1890, the value was $403,000,000, and the estimate for 1896 may be placed at $50,000,000 higher. That is, all the lumber of the western, southern and other states, both soft and hard. My hon. friend can realize that our exports of lumber, amounting to less than $8,000,000 a year, as compared with this vast production, do not cut a very imposing figure.

Mr. TISDALE. Does the hon. gentleman remember the quantity of lumber—the number of feet ?

Mr. CHARLTON. The returns do not give the number of feet ; they only give the values. An attempt has been made to impress the Government here, as well as the local government at Toronto, with the necessity of imposing an export duty ; and I presume that to-night is the first occasion when any attempt has been made to controvert the statements made by gentlemen who have visited this House, and have held interviews with members of Parliament and members of the Government, and have sought to influence public sentiment by communications in the press, and by various other methods. This work was entered upon most systematically and persistently by the owners of pulp mills at Sault Ste Marie. They employed a gentleman to champion their cause, who I think spent most of the time during the session of the local House at Toronto, and who has certainly been here some length of time ; and they sent circulars to all the township councils, all the town councils, and all the city councils in Ontario, asking them to memorialize the Government on behalf of an export duty on pulp wood. I may say parenthetically that this concern is a purely American concern, its owners being Philadelphians, and they were engaged in instructing the Canadians what course they should take to promote, not a Canadian interest, but an American interest at the Sault. The effect of the imposition of an export duty on pulp wood for the time being would have been to make raw material more expensive to the owners of American pulp mills, and temporarily to benefit the pulp mill industry in Canada ; but its effect would also have been to place the whole list of forest products, which by the Wilson Bill were on the free list, back on the dutiable list, as is provided for by the McKinley Bill. Twelve sections of the Wilson Bill, from sections 672 to 683 are required to enumerate the forest products which by that Bill are placed on the free list, and the final proviso in connection with these items is as follows :—

Provided, that all of the articles mentioned in paragraphs 672 to 683, inclusive, when imported from any country which lays an export duty or imposes discriminating stumpage dues on any of them, shall be subject to the duties existing prior to the passage of this Act.

The result would have been, had our Sault Ste. Marie friends succeeded that they would have got not only an export duty imposed on pulp wood, but that all the classes of lumber enumerated in the paragraphs of the Wilson Bill would have been removed from the free list and restored to the dutiable list. These men were like Artemus Ward, who was willing to put down the rebellion if it required him to sacrifice all his wife's relations to do it ; they proposed to get the advantage of an export duty on pulp wood if it ruined all the lumbermen in this country. If they had waited until the American tariff had been consummated and was on the Statute-book, and if it had not made reference to this pulp wood matter, and their scheme could have been carried out, it would have been a successful one, although it would have cost the ruin of the lumbermen of this country ; but by going about the country proclaiming their intentions, they attracted the attention of Congress, and Congress decided to treat pulp and pulp wood in the same manner as other forest products. On this matter, I find in the Dingley Bill, as reported to the United States Senate by the Finance Committee of that body :

Mechanically ground wood pulp, seven and one-half cents per one hundred pounds, dry weight ; chemical wood pulp, unbleached, one-sixth of one cent per pound, dry weight ; bleached, one-fourth of one cent per pound, dry weight : Provided, that if any country or dependency shall impose an export duty on pulp wood, the amount of such export duty shall be added, as an additional duty, to the duties herein imposed upon wood pulp, when imported from such country or dependency.

And so our friends are now in this position that after all their agitation about an export duty on pulp wood, there is in the American tariff, if it becomes law as reported to the Senate, a provision which places them in the same position as the lumbermen, and renders the imposition of an export duty on pulp wood an act of suicide on their part, so that they are likely to cease their agitation in favour of the consummation of that project.

With regard to the quantity of pulp wood exported and the extent to which American mills depend upon Canada for their supply, the calculations of these men were entirely misleading. They represented that our export was 600,000 cords per annum. The truth is it is $600,000 per annum or 193,000 cords, so that the misstatement only lacked two-thirds of the truth.

I have here in my hand a statement made by Lockwood's Paper Trade Directory of the United States, in which I find that the consumption of pulp wood in the United States last year amounted to 1,518,000 cords, of which 193,000 cords was from Canada, and that we furnish the United States 14½ per cent of the pulp wood consumed in that country. If then the portion we furnish that country is so small, surely it is the height of absurdity to contend that the Americans are depending upon us for their pulp wood and that an export duty would put them at our mercy. There is a very large amount of pulp wood in almost all the northern states, and the supply for the mills is ample for many years to come. We would be therefore standing in our own light if we were to adopt the policy that would deprive a portion of our people of the privilege of exporting this article. Upon whom would the consequences of the duty fall? The object of the pulp mill owners in Canada in pressing for this policy is to secure advantage for themselves. In what way would they profit by it? They would shut out the competing buyer. They would shut out a competitor who buys a 193,000 cords, and our farmers would be compelled to transact all their business with the Canadian pulp mills and take such prices as the Canadian mill owners chose to give them.

Who would be most affected by a drop in prices? Sixty per cent of the pulp wood in Canada is furnished by small farmers who cut the wood in clearing the land, haul it to the railways, and get from $2 to $3.50 per cord for this wood which would be entirely useless for them otherwise. Instead of making a profitable income from the sale of this wood, these men would be compelled to burn it. I am told that farmers in various parts of Quebec and up the Ottawa Valley, in reach of railways, in these hard pinching times, are making payments on their lands by the sale of pulp wood. The poplar that grows upon lands that have been lumbered over makes a growth large enough for pulp wood in ten or fifteen years. The spruce in swamps or on low-lying lands is a source of income to them, and the imposition of a duty would be an unjustifiable hardship, imposed without any possibility of securing any result that would accrue to our benefit in any way whatever. We have enormous quantities of the material and if we can sell the wood and make it a source of revenue, that is much better than burning it.

So far as the relative positions of manufacturers here and in the United States is concerned, I do not think that our mill owners have much to complain of. The Senate Bill as reported imposes a duty of 7½ cents per hundred pounds on wood pulp, but our millers get their wood cheaper, they are nearer the source of supply, they get cheaper labour, and the cost of transportation of the manufactured pulp is less than the transportation of the wood required to make the pulp. So that our mills are at no disadvantage. They overcome the duty of 7½ cents per 100 pounds by the compensating advantages of cheaper raw material, cheaper labour, and reduced cost of freight on the manufactured products, as compared with the cost of freight on the raw material. So much for the question of duty upon wood pulp.

Now, whatever may be done with the question of an export duty on logs, whatever it may be opportune to do later on—and I do not pretend to indicate what course the Government ought to take when the time comes to act—clearly, while the American tariff is pending, it would be premature and mischievous to impose an export duty on logs. The instant effect would be to place lumber now going into the American market, free of duty, upon the dutiable list of $2 per thousand feet and we had much better wait until the $2 duty is actually imposed before deciding on any line of action whatever. In the meantime let us keep quiet and watch the proceedings in Congress, keep free lumber as long as we can, and when deprived of it then consider what is to be done if the Americans retain the provision of the Dingley Bill regarding export duties, the advisability of our imposing an export duty and by that act increase the import duty on our lumber going to the United States to a corresponding extent can then be considered. But that is a question for subsequent consideration, which we are not facing now. We might consider profitably, so far as the Americans are concerned, what interests are likely to be injured and what are likely to be benefited by any action we may take with reference to export duty.

There is a very influential interest in Michigan that is opposed to the lumber duty, but believing it would be useless to fight for free lumber, they took their stand on a compromise for one dollar duty. They sent a delegation to Washington, kept a committee room open there, incurred a large amount of expense and made a vigorous fight, and actually when the Dingley Bill was reported from the Ways and Means Committee, the vote stood 8 for $1 on lumber and 3 for $2 on lumber. But, it is said, at the earnest instance of Mr. Dingley that the committee would abstain from discrediting him before the country, the committee consented to the $2 duty believing that in the Senate lumber would be placed at $1 per thousand. The American lumbermen who are labouring for $1 duty, and who would prefer free lumber, are the men who will be injured by an export duty. The export duty will simply be a blow struck at our own friends. The men who would be benefited by it are those who are clamouring for a duty of $2 a thousand feet on lumber. They would like a higher import duty on it, if they could get it, and are fighting to the death the reduction of $1 per thousand. If we adopt the policy which will result in adding to the $2 of the American Government the export duty of the Canadian Government, whatever it may be, we are playing into the hands of our enemies who are labouring might and main for the adoption of a policy which will be injurious to us, and which will injure those who have stood loyally by us as friends in this matter.

And with regard to the export duty as an abstract principle, perhaps it would be well enough for us to take a look at that question from the American standpoint, if only for the purpose of impressing upon our minds the view that the American is likely to take of the matter. We look at the question from one side, and the American looks at it from another, and whether he is right or wrong, it may be well for us to ascertain what his views are and why he holds those views. It is hardly necessary to say that the fact that the American constitution prohibits the imposition of an export duty of any kind whatever is an indication that the general sentiment of the American people disapproves of an export duty. They look with disfavour upon such a duty, and they regard an export duty upon logs with disfavour for the reason, among others, that they believe the principle to be wrong, and for the reason that they are incapable of retaliating upon us in kind, because their constitution prohibits it. Now, we have imported logs from the United States, as well as exported logs to the United States, and it may surprise some of the members of this House to be informed that up to the year 1890 our import of logs from the United States largely surpassed our export of logs to that country.

Mr. BENNETT. That would include New Brunswick.

Mr. CHARLTON. Of course, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) remarks, that takes in the amount imported into New Brunswick. Without this New Brunswick trade, the export and import of logs up to 1890 was about even. The import trade into New Brunswick is essentially the same as the import trade into Rat Portage or any other place in Canada. Of course, owing to the geographical position, the northern half of Maine is dependent upon the St. John River for an outlet. But Canada gets the handling of all this timber. Our objection to logs being taken to the United States is, that we lose the profit of sawing them. But, in the case of the import to New Brunswick, the gain of the saw-mill and more than that comes into Canada. The trees are cut by Canadians, hauled to the water and rafted down by Canadians, and sawn in St. John by Canadian labour. Thus, this is a most profitable and most desirable trade for Canada, and the Americans, in making up their minds on this question, take this trade into consideration. I would like to give the relative import and export from 1885 to 1890. I cannot give the statistics prior to 1885. The Secretary of the

Mr. CHARLTON.

Fredericton Boom Company was good enough to furnish me figures showing the logs handled by that company from 1885 to 1890, and this winter he gave me a subsequent statement covering the figures from 1891 to 1896. I will not read these figures in detail, but will give the summary. The logs exported to the United States, as appears from the Trade and Navigation Returns, from 1885 to 1890, amounted to $2,567,000. The logs imported from the United States, as appears by the Trade and Navigation Returns, amounted to $2,329,000. So that the exports to the United States exceeded our imports from the United States during that period by about $200,000. But the New Brunswick trade during the same period, from 1885 to 1890, amounted to $4,845,000; and the total of our imports to New Brunswick and imports, as per Trade and Navigation Returns, was $7,174,100, or, in other words, we imported from the United States from 1885 to 1890, $4,607,000 in excess of our exports to the United States. Now these are facts that the Americans are aware of, and they take them into consideration. During all the years from confederation to 1885, our imports of logs from the United States were not less in any one year than four times as much as our exports. Now, the American naturally asks: If we have exported to Canada four times as many logs as we have imported from Canada, and our constitution prevents us from interfering in the trade by export duty, what excuse is there for you to impose an export duty? Since 1890 the condition of the trade has been somewhat changed. As my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) is aware and will tell the House, the export of logs to the United States has largely increased. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, from 1890 to 1896 we exported logs to the United States to the value of $10,059,000. We imported logs from the United States, as shown by the Trade and Navigation Returns to the amount of $2,248,000. Well, our imports of logs by the River St. John for the period is $4,113,000. That is, the exports were $10,000,000, in round numbers, and the total imports were $6,361,000 leaving an excess of $3,388,000 of exports over imports. But, if we put the two periods together, from 1885 to 1896, we find that our imports of logs exceeded our exports to the United States by $919,000. Now, with these facts before us, it is evident that the position of matters is a little different from what is generally supposed, and we can see that when the American Congressman takes this question into consideration, he comes to the conclusion that the export duty is an unjustifiable impost and that he is justified in heading off this policy on the part of our Government by indirect means, inasmuch as the constitution of the United States does not permit him to take the direct measure we are talking about taking in connection with the matter. Therefore, this proviso with regard to export duty which is attached to the lumber schedule, is resorted to for the purpose of reaching indirectly the result that the constitution prevents him from reaching directly. That is the view of the case taken by the American. Whether it is sound or unsound, whether its conclusion is justifiable or the reverse, it is one that satisfies him and is plausible, and is the one he acts upon. And we are in this position—whether he is right or wrong, if a proviso is inserted in his tariff that the amount of the export duty imposed on logs shall be added to the export duty, and we put on an export duty, we put larger burdens, upon lumber, and, therefore, increase the trouble of which we complain in connection with the imposition of the import duty, and we enhance the protection of the American lumber interest that seeks the duty of $2 per thousand. This is the unfortunate position we are in; this is the reason it is, in my opinion, impolitic and inadvisable to impose an export duty, for the reason that the consequences react upon our own heads. If we could do this, if we could impose an export duty and no consequences result from it except such consequences as might fall upon the Americans and upon the holder of standing pine in Canada who wanted to make the best use of it he could, the case would be different. But the trouble is that you cannot move in the matter without disastrous consequences to the entire lumber interest, so I say we had better leave it alone.

Mr. CLANCY. Is the hon. gentleman taking into consideration the limited lumber supply in Canada or merely the principle of export duties?

Mr. CHARLTON. I may tell my hon. friend from Bothwell that I am not particularly nervous about the lumber supply in Canada; I think we have considerable lumber left yet. We have over 100,000 square miles of territory in Ontario that has not been brought under license, and we have a large amount in Quebec. The growth of our lumber export trade has been very moderate indeed. I have the returns here. I will not weary the House with them to-night, but they show that from 1887 to 1896 the increase in the exports of sawn lumber was about $200,000 a year, and that demonstrates the absurdity, the utter fallacy of the American contention, that the competition of Canadian lumber men has been the cause of the depression of prices in the United States, which is due to an entirely different cause. The lumber policy we are pursuing is a Conservative one. We have not adopted that wasteful policy that was adopted in the United States where the timber lands of the different states were surveyed and sold without reservation, the timber passing into the hands of private speculators at $1.25 an acre, and these men getting hold of the timber, it is to their interest to realize as soon as possible, and the result has been waste and destruction, and the rapid diminution of the forests and lumber resources of the country. In Canada on the contrary the Government brings into the market from time to time such quantities of timber lands as, in the estimation of the Government, the wants of the trade require, and holds back the enormous resources to be handled in future years, and at the rate that the Ontario Government has brought these timber lands into the market, the reserve behind will last for 150 years before it is all brought into market.

Mr. CLANCY. I am sure the hon. gentleman has not much data for the quantity of lumber in the province of Ontario. The truth is the Commissioner of Crown Lands was unable to give any accurate statement.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not know that I am able to give an accurate statement to the hon. gentleman, but I imagine I know about as much about it as he does himself. While I would not venture to say how much timber there is to the acre in those enormous reserves of forest land, yet it is quite evident that there is an enormous amount of timber, and that the policy of the Government being Conservative with regard to bringing that timber to market, will husband that great resource of the province for generations to come, while the United States are upon the verge of having their own reserve in that direction exhausted. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I need to detain the committee much longer with reference to this question. But unless it might be asserted that my statement with regard to the provision under the Dingley Bill is not well founded, I will read the proviso adopted by the sub-Finance Committee of the Senate with regard to the export duties. The proviso is as follows:—

Provided, that if any country or dependency shall impose an export duty upon saw-logs, round unmanufactured timber, stave bolts, shingle bolts or heading bolts, the amount of such export duty shall be added, as an additional duty, to the duties imposed upon the articles mentioned in this paragraph, when imported from such country or dependency.

And the articles mentioned in the paragraph cover all kinds of lumber, and all kinds of forest products. The proviso is not quite as sweeping as the proviso in the Wilson Bill. Under the Wilson Bill an export duty could hardly be put upon a telegraph pole, a railroad tie, a hop pole, or a broom-stick without the entire list of forest products, being put upon the dutiable list. But we are not proposing to put an export duty upon anything but sawlogs, and that will carry the consequence of adding that export duty to the import duty put by the Americans upon our own lumber. If we put an export duty upon pulp wood under the provision I read a few moments ago, that will carry the condition of adding that export duty to the duty on wood pulp. Now, with regard to pulp wood, the Americans are by no means dependent upon us for this article at present, as is shown by the fact that we supplied them last year with but 14½ per cent of the amount that they used. There are enormous quantities of spruce in Maine, in New Hampshire, in portions of Vermont, in Northern New York, and the Adirondack region; and there are sources of supply for wood pulp in the Southern States, that are not yet touched, great forests of spruce, and enormous quantities of poplar. It is said there is a supply of wood for pulp in the States of Oregon and Washington sufficient to last the United States for 100 years. So that we need not flatter ourselves with the conclusion that we can control this matter because we have the exclusive source of supply. We do not. The time may come when they will be dependent upon us for it. We have enormous quantities of this wood, but that time has not come now. So far as the effect of imposing an export duty upon pulp wood would be concerned, its immediate effect under the Bill as it now stands, would be to enhance the duty upon wood pulp made by our mills, and to take from hundreds, yes, thousands of small farmers the source of revenue they derive from cutting this wood, into pulp wood in the course of clearing their lands, which wood would be rendered valueless by the imposition of this duty of $2 a cord. With regard to the export duty upon sawlogs, I fully sympathize with my hon. friend as to the desirability of having lumber cut upon our own side, and would be willing to co-operate in any measure that was practical and was calculated to secure that end. Yet under the circumstances the imposition of an export duty would not have that effect, but would on the contrary impede the export of lumber from this country to a very great extent by adding to the $2 duty, and enhancing the difficulty of getting it into the American market by adding the export duty to the import duty. Under all these considerations we are placed in such a position that whatever might be our desire, whatever we might do if we were able to do it without evil consequences falling upon our own heads, under the circumstances as they exist, it would be suicidal for us to impose an export duty either upon sawlogs or upon pulp wood, for the reason that our own manufacturing industries would be the first to suffer in consequence of that act upon the part of the Government.

Mr. TAYLOR. I move that the committee rise and report progress. The hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace) would have moved it if he had remained, but he was tired out. He says he wants to speak on Monday.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. CHARLTON.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.15 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 31st May, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

QUEBEC RAILWAY BRIDGE COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether the hon. member for Québec West is a director of the Quebec Railway Bridge Company?

Mr. DOBELL. I am not a director in the Quebec Railway Bridge Company.

VOLUNTEERS OF 1866.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

Whether the Government have come to a decision as to what recognition and recompense in the shape of a land grant or otherwise they have concluded to confer on the volunteers of 1866, and if not yet decided, is it the intention of the Government to recognize their services in any way, and when?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The volunteers of 1866 are anxious to obtain recognition in the shape of a medal granted for that special service, and the Government have recommended that application to the favourable consideration of Her Majesty.

REVENUE COLLECTIONS AT MONTREAL.

Mr. DAVIN (for Mr. Bergeron) asked :

1. Who are the solicitors employed in matters connected with the revenue, in Montreal?
2. What sums have been paid, by way of disbursements, to such solicitors, since the 23rd June, 1896?
3. What sums have been paid to the said solicitors, as fees, since 23rd June, 1896?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). 1. Lomer Gouin and J. M. Ferguson. 2. $82.85 to Mr. Lomer Gouin. An advance of $100 has been made to Mr. Ferguson in re case of "Finlayson & Grant." but for which no account of disbursements yet received. 3. $220 in fees to Mr. Lomer Gouin. $70 in fees to Mr. J. M. Ferguson.

WHARFAGE DUES AT TIGNISH, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked :

What is the amount of wharfage dues collected and paid at Tignish, during the season of 1896? Who is the harbour master at Tignish?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The amount of wharfage dues collected and paid was $71.05. There is no harbour-master at that port; Mr. George Conroy is the wharfinger.

C.P.R.—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATORY FREIGHT RATES AT FORT WILLIAM.

Mr. JAMESON asked :

1. Is the Government aware that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is imposing a discriminatory rate of 10 cents per 100 pounds on freight arriving at Fort William by other than vessels of the C.P.R. and Beatty Line?
2. Is such discrimination being exercised with the sanction of the Government, and if so, when was such sanction granted?
3. Does the Government intend to take any steps to prevent the Canadian Pacific Railway Company from discriminating against individuals or localities in the manner above mentioned?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Government has not been made aware that any discriminatory rate has been imposed on freight arriving at Fort William by vessels other than the Canadian Pacific Railway and Beatty lines. No information on the subject has reached the Government. If facts to the purport and effect of the question are brought to the knowledge of the Government, I shall feel it my duty to look into the matter and give it my attention.

MARINE AND FISHERIES—INSPECTOR McNAB.

Mr. BOSTOCK asked :

1. Was Fishery Inspector McNab instructed by the Department of Marine and Fisheries to make a trip to Ashcroft in the spring of 1896?
2. If so, what were his instructions?
3. If he was not instructed by the department, why did he make a trip to Ashcroft at that time?
4. Who paid the expenses of the trip?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The answer to the first question is, yes. The answer to the second question is, he was instructed to report as to the cost of removing obstructions on the Bonaparte River. The answer to the third question is covered by the answer to question No. 1; and to the fourth question the answer is, that the expenses were paid by the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

KINGSTON POSTMASTER.

Mr. MILLS (for Mr. Taylor) asked :

1. If in the statutes relating to the superannuation of members of the Civil Service, it is provided that the superannuation of every civil servant shall be preceded by an inquiry, by the Treasury Board, whether his superannuation will result in benefit to the service, and is therefore in the public interest, and that no civil servant shall be superannuated unless the Treasury Board reports that he is eligible within the meaning of the Act, and that such superannuation will be in the public interest?
2. If so, was the case of Mr. James Shannon, ex-postmaster at Kingston, preceded by an inquiry by the Treasury Board before his superannuation?
3. If so, did it report that his superannuation would be a benefit to the service and in the public interest?
4. Did the Government appoint Mr. Alexander Gunn, ex-M.P.; an inexperienced man in post office affairs, as Mr. Shannon's successor in the public interest?
5. Is the date of Mr. Gunn's birth, as given in the "Parliamentary Companion" for 1885, at which time Mr. Gunn was a member of this House, correct in stating that he was born the 5th October, 1828, thus making him 68 years and 8 months of age at the time of his appointment?
6. Does the Civil Service Act not prohibit the appointment of permanent officers if such appointee is more than 45 years of age?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The answer to the first question is, there are such provisions in the Civil Service Superannuation Act. The answer to the second question is, yes. The answer to the third question is, the Treasury Board reported as follows, following the provisions of subsection of section 5 of the Civil Service Superannuation Act:—The board finding that Mr. Shannon is eligible within the meaning of the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and that his retirement would be in the public interest. The answer to the fourth question is, the Government decline to answer this question, as it contains matter of controversy, and is therefore not in order. I did not consider that the whole question should be ruled out because of this. The answer to the fifth question is, the information in the "Parliamentary Companion" on that question is probably correct. The answer to the sixth question is, there is no limit of age for appointments to the outside service.

INDIAN DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to news that has come from the Saskatchewan. It seems that an Indian, called "Almighty Voice," has killed three citizens, one a civilian and the others a constable and a corporal of the Mounted Police.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not think that the killing of three men by an Indian is a laughing matter. I must say, that a manifestation of levity like that on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite is a little uncalled for. As this is the latest news we have, and as it sounds alarming, because we gather from the telegram in the newspapers, that Almighty Voice is being reinforced by young men from the reserves, and that the Mounted Police are going out from Regina and elsewhere, I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he has any more recent information.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I have all the information obtained so far, and it seems to be incomplete. I may say, in advance, that Almighty Voice has been killed in the attempt to capture him. This is the information that has been supplied by the Commissioner of Mounted Police:

On Thursday of last week, an Indian named Almighty Voice, who had previously shot and killed a sergeant of the Mounted Police, shot from ambush a settler named Venne, wounding him in the shoulder. Venne was brought to Duck Lake, and the police at once started in pursuit of the Indian. On Friday morning, they located him with other Indians in a bunch of timber, but the Indians had the advantage of the position, and in an attempt to capture them the following casualties occurred: Constable Kerr and a volunteer named Gundry were shot dead; Inspector Allan's arm was shattered by a bullet about two inches below the shoulder, and Sergeant Raven was shot in the groin, Corporal Hockin receiving wounds from which he died the same evening. One Indian was known to have been killed. A field gun was sent for to shell the Indians out of the timber, with the result that two Indians were killed, one of them being Almighty Voice. No further trouble expected. We have not been able to get authentic information as to the circumstances which led up to the shooting of Venne by Almighty Voice, but it is believed that he and Corporal Bowridge of the Mounted Police came suddenly on Almighty Voice, when the latter ran into the woods and shot from ambush.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. WALLACE. Before section 16 is voted on, I would like to make a few remarks with reference to it, and also some general remarks on the question of the new tariff, because this is the only opportunity that has been afforded us to discuss tariff No. 2, which within the past few days has been submitted to the House by the Finance Minister. There are some portions of this clause 16 which deserve the most serious consideration of this House, and the first feature for consideration is the proposed reduction of 25 per cent on the present tariff in favour of England. I assume, Sir, that that reduction of 25 per cent is only a prelude to further reductions. If those reductions are right and proper, and if they are to be made for many countries, then the Government are adopting a free trade policy in that regard. For myself, I regard it with a great deal of apprehension, because I believe the future prosperity of this country is unalterably bound up in a protective policy, and that, by reducing the protection 25 per cent—one-eighth now, and another eighth in a year—you are going to destroy very many Canadian industries. Now, we have not been given the information with regard to this question to which this House is entitled. The Controller of Customs or the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Trade and Commerce should have furnished this House full and exhaustive information—all the information they have—as to the countries which will come in under this preferential tariff. There is no excuse for their not having that information and presenting it to this House. There is an International Customs Union, with headquarters in Belgium, from which every change made in the tariff of any country is at once sent to the Department of Trade and Commerce or the Department of Customs at Ottawa; so that the Government are supplied with the exact tariff of every country right up to date. There they have the means of knowing and informing this House, what the members of this House have no means otherwise of knowing, what countries to-day are permitting Canadian goods to be brought in on the terms called for in this resolution:

When the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to are to the countries to which it may apply.

We are told that the tariff of Great Britain comes within the meaning of this resolution, and that instructions have been given that British goods should be admitted now at one-eighth reduction from the regular tariff, and later at one-fourth reduction. But I contend that there are other countries entitled to the same consideration, and they were entitled to it from the date this Act came into force, that is, the 23rd of last April, and the Government are negligent in their duty in not having provided for them. The result will be that those who have been importing goods from those countries will be applying to the Government for a return of the portion of the duty that should not have been charged. What becomes, then, of the statement that this preferential duty was for the special advantage of Great Britain? Because we have the clause amended by providing that "the Governor in Council may extend the benefits of such reciprocal tariff to any country which may be entitled thereto by virtue of any treaty with Her Majesty." This, I assume, applies directly to Belgium and Germany. We were told—and I was pleased to know it at the time—that Great Britain was the only country to which this reciprocal tariff applied—that the treaties to which reference has been made did not apply to Canada. Now we find the Government taking a new position. The Minister of Finance and other members of the Government were positive in their statements that the preferential tariff applied only to Great Britain, and did not apply to Belgium and Germany. If that was the case then, the conditions have not changed since; or, if they have, the Government have not enlightened the House what the changes are which have induced them to add this clause "B," authorizing the Governor in Council to extend it to other countries. It cannot be that they had not, when they brought down the tariff, all the information they have to-day. It may be that the members of the Opposition have been enlightening them on some of these points. In my opinion, the proposal is exceedingly objectionable. While I am in favour of preferential trade with Great Britain, and would go a very long way to secure it, I still consider that it should be brought about with the greatest care—not by a horizontal reduction of the tariff on all items with the exception of a few, such as sugar, liquors and tobacco, but by a careful selection of certain articles on which, in the circumstances of our case, we could afford to make some reduction without destroying Canadian industries. But this resolution does not propose that; it makes an even sweep of reductions. And what will be the effect? That those industries which to-day require 30 per cent protection in order to live, will have 22½ per cent protection, which will destroy them—destroy the capital invested in them and deprive our Canadian people of the labour they afford. For that reason, I think this proposal is a most objectionable one. Now, there are other countries besides Belgium and Germany to which this resolution will apply. There is no doubt, from information I have, that both China and Japan, and most likely Switzerland as well, will be entitled to this preferential reduction of 25 per cent. If so, we are opening the doors still wider. We are destroying that preference in favour of Great Britain which the Government started out with and we are doing more than that; we are putting Canadian workmen very largely in competition with the labourers of these countries, where the people live on the smallest pay. The inevitable result will be that our Canadian industries will not be able to stand against that competition. The tariff as it formerly was, gave no more protection than was absolutely required in order to sustain Canadian industries, with a few exceptions. Of course, the changed circumstances of a few years may enable certain industries to get along with a smaller amount of protection, but taking it on the whole, the tariff was reduced three years ago to a point where it would not bear further reduction without ruin and loss to many industries. I shall point out some of those reductions which, I think, are very injurious to the best interests of Canada; but before doing that, I must say that I cannot congratulate the Government on dealing with the tariff in a businesslike manner. They came here to Parliament on the 25th of March and kept the House kicking its heels for four weeks or more without bringing down their tariff, and the reason they gave was that they wanted to make a perfect tariff, a tariff that would require no further changes, but which, when submitted to the House, would at once receive its approval. It was to be a tariff which, after the most careful and cautious consideration and balancing of all its interests, had received the approval of the Government, and which the House would fall in love with as soon as submitted and adopt almost without a dissentient voice. Well, they brought down their tariff, and four weeks later they brought down another tariff—not at all the same one that we got on the 25th of April, but a tariff with hundreds of changes in it. At any rate, I counted ninety-three items that were turned upside-down more or less, generally a good deal more than less, and in some of the items two or three changes were made, so that the changes would be at least 200 in number—changes in the rates of duty, in the classification of the items, changes of a most important character. I remember, when we made our changes in our tariff three years ago, how we were criticised by hon. gentlemen opposite, how we were twitted with not knowing our own minds, with being tossed to and fro, with having no settled policy. But what do we find to-day? We find item after item in the tariff first brought down by these hon. gentlemen changed in the one submitted the other day. They have added new items, they have made extraordinary changes in some of the old ones, and minor changes in others, and have gone back practically, in many instances, to the tariff which they attempted to reform in the first instance.

Take the question of coal dust, which first occurs to me. It is item 174:

Bituminous slack coal, such as will pass through a half-inch screen, subject to regulations to be made by the Controller of Customs, 20 per cent ad valorem.

Let me now refer to the item of coal dust, as it appears in their first tariff of the 23rd of April. I should judge by that item that the gentleman who had devised it was a Nova Scotian, because it looks very like a Nova Scotian item. What did it mean? There are over 200,000 tons of coal dust imported into this country. As the tariff then stood, 95 per cent of that coal would have to pay a duty of 60 cents per ton. What would that amount to? This coal is valued at 25 cents per ton in the Trade and Navigation Returns, although it can be got at 20 cents, and this duty of 60 cents per ton on an article that costs 25 cents per ton, meant simply a duty of 240 per cent on the value of the coal dust. Moreover, that coal dust is the raw material of the manufacturers, it is, indeed, used solely by them; and I submit to this House whether it was an evidence of business capacity on the part of these gentlemen, that, after the most careful consideration, they should have submitted a proposal to tax that coal dust or slack, which we import to the extent of 200,000 tons, and which is used exclusively by the manufacturers, at the rate of 240 per cent on its value. I am glad to see that these hon. gentlemen have made some change in that, but am not quite sure what effect the change will have. As it now stands the item reads:

Bituminous slack coal, such as will pass through a half-inch screen, subject to regulations to be made by the Controller of Customs, 20 per cent ad valorem.

I assume that that is going back to the tariff just as they found it before they began tinkering with it.

Here is another item that they have been tinkering with. We had a large industry in manufacturing nuts and bolts built up in this country. There were pretty large importations as well, but there were big industries built up also. What did the Government do? They changed the duty. Under the old duty, there was $21,576 collected on the amount of those articles imported into this country. The Government reduced that so that the duty collected would be $16,215. That was under their tariff No. 1. The other day their tariff No.

2 came down, and under that tariff there will be collected on the same importations $20,517, or they brought back the tariff to almost the identical figures at which it stood before they attempted to touch it. What happened with regard to that industry? They put it into a state of unrest, they caused the establishments to shut down, they destroyed the industry for a time, and now, when they see the wrong they did by their tariff tinkering, they come back to the old figures, or pretty nearly the old figures, of the late Government's policy. That is an illustration of the evils caused by those gentlemen proposing to reform the tariff without knowing exactly what they are going to do.

Then there were bridges and structural work. This was a large industry, and the other day I heard that the Peterboro' works were shut down. Then the Government became alarmed and decided to change their tariff. The tariff of the late Government gave a protection of 35½ per cent, this they reduced by their first tariff to 30 per cent, which was just sufficient reduction to destroy that industry, because the raw material which these men use in the construction of their bridges costs a good deal. When the Government saw the havoc they had made, they retraced their steps and raised the duty to 35 per cent. It was 35½ under the tariff of 1894, and now they make it 35 per cent, or a reduction of just one-half of one per cent, an infinitesimal reduction, but the point is this, that they first reduced the duty sufficiently to destroy the bridge manufacturing industry, and when they found that out, they had to come down with a new tariff and practically admit that they had made a mistake, that they had not examined into the matter, and they had to change their tariff and give sufficient protection to this great industry.

With reference to yarns, the same story has to be told. They first struck down the duty on the low-priced yarns, used by the carpet manufacturers, from 5 cents a pound and 20 per cent ad valorem to 15 per cent. The inevitable result of that must be that every one of these yarn factories, from one end of the Dominion to the other, must shut down. Then the Government saw the error of their way again, and now they come to Parliament and say that they made some sort of clerical error or mistake. There was no mistake about it. They had only seen one side of the question. I presume that they had been interviewed by the carpet manufacturers and had no idea of the immense importance of the manufactories of yarn for these carpets, because the manufacture of yarn is the greater portion of the manufacture of the carpet. They propose now, instead of a duty of 15 per cent, a duty of 30 per cent; that is, they propose exactly to double the duty they announced on the 23rd of April. Now, let me refer to the worsted yarn and these finer qualities of yarn which have to be imported, which are not made in this country and probably will not be made in this country, which are used for the manufacture of hosiery. There was a combined specific and ad valorem duty on hosiery. But the Government have abolished the specific duty of 10 cents a dozen, and the result will be—I have the information from the manufacturers themselves who are not speaking in a threatening way, but simply stating their case—in the first instance to reduce the wages of the mechanics about 25 per cent, and then, if the competition of the pauper labour of Europe is as strong as is feared, to compel the shutting down of the industry altogether. And what is all this for? It is no benefit to the Canadian people that the change should be made, because the articles are made here at a marvellously low price and of better quality than those that will come in when the specific duty is abolished. The country will be flooded with a low and useless class of goods, though fair in appearance and pretty saleable. I say that this is a great mistake. Our Canadian hosiery factories have been making a splendid class of goods out of pure material, and this blow at their industry will be more than they can stand. Then, I take it for granted that they will have the competition of Germany and of Belgium as well as of Great Britain. Germany and Great Britain are the two great woollen manufacturing countries of Europe. This reduction of 25 per cent in the protection afforded to hosiery manufacturers, together with the increase of the duty on their raw material, is in marked contrast to the treatment meted out to other industries that I could name, to which the Government has given additional protection by lowering the duty on the raw material and increasing the duty on the finished product. I think, Sir, that this is most unfair. Some consideration should have been given to this industry, which has been struggling along, the men engaged in which have made the greatest efforts and have made very little profit out of the business. They have put in enormous capital, they employ a great many people, but they have not had adequate results, even under the old tariff; and, under this tariff, with a decrease of 25 per cent in their protection, and with higher duties on their raw material, they cannot succeed, they cannot go on with their business. As the Government have been reconsidering duties, as they have found that they are not perfect, as they made hundreds of changes in the first tariff, I trust they will make a few more and restore prosperity to these other industries that have been struck down by this tariff.

There is another article to which I would call attention, of which I spoke in some remarks I made to the House a short time ago—I refer to rice. I stated then that they had put a duty of 75 cents per hundred pounds on an article of raw material for manufacturers, the cost of which article was 81 cents per hundred pounds, a duty of 91 per cent. That was wholly unjustifiable. If they had given a protection commensurate with this high duty on raw material, their course might have been justified so far as the industry is concerned, though it would be hard to justify it so far as concerns the people who use this necessary of life. How does this arrangement of duties work? It takes 156 pounds of the paddy, or uncleaned rice, to make 100 pounds of the manufactured article, the cleaned rice. The duty on the uncleaned rice is  $\frac{3}{4}$  cents per pound, or \$1.17 on 156 pounds. The duty on the cleaned rice is \$1.25 per 100 pounds, less one-eighth to Great Britain, which would leave it at \$1.09. Thus, with a duty of \$1.17 on the raw material and \$1.09 on the manufactured article, we find not only that they have no protection but that they are 8 cents per 100 pounds worse off than they would be under free trade.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). That calculation is made upon the assumption that the by-product or waste is worth nothing at all. But it must be remembered that the greater part of this fifty-six pounds is sold at from  $1\frac{1}{2}$  to 2 cents per pound, and the balance at  $\frac{1}{2}$  cent per pound, which brings to the manufacturer a large profit, outside of the sale of cleaned rice. The hon. gentleman's calculation amounts to nothing at all unless he can go thoroughly into the case and show the effect all the way through.

Mr. MILLS. Where is the question?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The question is, how does the hon. gentleman explain that?

Mr. WALLACE. I will try and explain it to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald, Huron). I see he has given the matter a little consideration, and so have I. He says that the refuse sells for  $1\frac{1}{2}$  to 2 cents per pound. If he will turn to the Trade and Navigation Returns, he will find that the highest price it sells for is 1 cent per pound, which does not pay the cost of the freight and the cost of the uncleaned rice.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). But there is freight on the other as well.

Mr. WALLACE. But it is not on the other as well, for this reason, that the freight on the unclean rice must be paid from the East Indies, while if the hon. gentleman will turn to the Trade and Navigation Returns he will find that all the rice, except that which comes from China to supply British Columbia, that is, all the clean rice imported to supply the eastern portion of the country, or about three-quarters of the whole import, comes from Great Britain, and the freight is not one-quarter as much as from the East Indies. So the freight on the raw material is about four times as much as on the cleaned rice. But the hon. gentleman says that the broken rice and rice meal sell for from 1½ to 2 cents per pound. If he will turn to the Trade and Navigation Returns he will find that they sell for 1 cent per pound.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Not at all.

Mr. WALLACE. I refer the hon. gentleman to the returns.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Mr. Ross, who is a manufacturer of rice in Montreal told me, sitting right beside me here, that they were receiving from 1½ to 2 cents per pound for "chips," and ½ cent for meal.

Mr. WALLACE. I have a statement which directly contradicts that, and I have the Trade and Navigation Returns which also contradict it. If the hon. gentleman will turn up the exports, he will find that there is a demand in Canada for only a very small portion of that rice flour, they have to export the chief part of it, and the export price is exactly 1 cent per pound; that is the sworn price of the exports at the customs. Now what more do we find about this rice question? I said that in another year there will only be one-eighth taken off, so that the protection on the rice imported from Great Britain—and the most of it is imported from Great Britain, you may say the whole of it that comes to eastern Canada—when one-fourth of the duty is taken off, the duty will be then, per hundred pounds of rice 93¾ cents, and the duty on the raw material to manufacture that 100 pounds of rice, is $1.17, or 23¼ cents per 100 pounds against the Canadian manufacturer. But what more? The Canadian rice cleaned here at home, without all the disadvantages of an ocean voyage, is a much more desirable and more healthy article than the rice coming in vessels across the ocean, cleaned in some other country. Now I have here a statement of Mr. Lock-erby, one of the leading wholesale grocers of Montreal who, in an interview that he gave to a Montreal paper the other day, said:

Another point that should be borne in mind is, that we do not get as good an article when we import cleaned rice as when it is cleaned here. There are several reasons for this. When "paddy" is imported, it is shipped from Japan or other places in direct vessels and reaches the mills in good condition. With cleaned rice from Europe it is different. The shippers want the freight to be as small as possible, and take the cheapest means of shipping. Very often the cleaned rice comes in a mixed cargo on "tramp" steamers, and should there be any alkaloids among the cargo, the rice is bound to suffer.

Then he speaks of damage to bags and loss by contamination with other articles in the vessel, whereas a vessel of uncleaned rice takes a whole cargo of rice, there is no other commodity with it, and it is therefore uncontaminated by any other substance. But the point I make is this, that instead of giving a protection to the Canadian manufacturer, the Government discriminates against him to the extent of 23¼ cents per 100 pounds. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald) says the refuse is worth something. Well, suppose it is, that does not affect the question. The refuse has to be exported from the country because I find in the Trade and Navigation returns: Rice meal exported from Canada, 1,785,000 pounds, price $17,891, or exactly 1 cent a pound. That proves what I said before, that the value of that rice meal is exactly 1 cent a pound, and not one and a half cents, or two cents, as the hon. gentleman stated. But more than that. There is no market in this country for this rice meal, or else they would not export the million and three-quarter pounds that they have to send out of the country, and for which they have to take the price that is going. Now, for that 100 pounds they pay 81 cents in the East Indies, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns. They pay for freight more than 30 per cent per 100 pounds, they take it nearly half way around the world, it costs them more than the dollar they get for it, so that there is no profit in that whatever. But I am speaking merely of the duty, I am speaking of the Government's course towards this industry, and showing that 23¼ cents per 100 pounds is the discrimination against the Canadian industry, and that has had the effect of utterly destroying the industry, and of shutting down that Canadian mill. But they say: Oh, you will get more revenue. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not know about that. This telegram is just put into my hands:

Victoria, B.C.

New rice tariff utter ruination to me. Equals a duty of 72 per cent ad valorem.

That is the result in British Columbia, the same result is destroying the industry that has taken place in Montreal. Now who gets the benefit, or what benefit is there? The Finance Minister may tell us that there will be a larger revenue. Well, before this duty was put on, rice was sold at six pounds for 25 cents in the stores in Ontario, to-day you can only get five pounds for 25 cents. If you take the whole of the importations into this country of cleaned rice, over fifteen million pounds, the five-sixths of a cent per pound higher price to the consumer, as compared with last year, means $125,000 that the consumer has to pay more than he did before. Sir, I have calculated what would be the additional amount of revenue you can possibly get, and it is only between $60,000 and $70,000, or you tax the people $125,000 more, but you only get one-half of it back in revenue, and you have the additional satisfaction of destroying these two Canadian industries. That is the net result with regard to the rice duty. I referred a moment ago to an interview had with Mr. Lockerby. I presume he is not interested, as he is speaking as a wholesale grocer. I know him very well as one of the leading wholesale grocers of this country, and he figures out here a very large increase in the cost of rice to the Canadian consumer by the change in the duties, and he also states, what we all know, that the article is not so clean, nor so satisfactory, nor so healthy as the article that was produced in Canada and furnished in clean sacks to the consumers all over this country.

Now, there is another industry that I was going to refer to, and although it is only in its infancy, it is a growing one, and promises to be an important one in this country. I refer to the manufacture of cream separators. Some years ago when creamery separators were being introduced into this country, the Government of that day admitted free the steel bowls for cream separators used in all the creameries, because they were not made in this country and were being more extensively used day by day; as a matter of fact they were not made in any other country but Denmark; they were not made in Great Britain, they were not made in the United States, they were made only in Denmark. The Government put a duty of 30 per cent on cream separators, but they made free the steel bowl for the cream separator, which is a very fine piece of mechanism, and an important and intricate piece of work. Well, Sir, what has happened now? We see that the Government have made not only cream bowls for the separators free, but the separators themselves. Now, I would like to ask the Government what justification they had to wipe out a Canadian industry, and wipe out that duty entirely? The same argument would apply to wiping out protection on that industry as would apply to wiping out protection on any other Canadian industry. But the Government have taken off the duty in face of the fact that to-day there are two Canadian factories making these articles—the Waterloo Manufacturing Company, and the John Abell Manufacturing Company, of Toronto. The latter company is doing what no other manufacturing industry in the world is doing outside of Denmark: they are making the steel separator bowls, and they have a fair claim for a duty, not only on the separators themselves, but also on the bowls. They were made duty free because these articles were not manufactured in this country; but following the protective policy adopted by this country, if it be followed by the present Government, we shall have to place a duty on the steel bowls for separators and restore the duty of 30 per cent, or whatever may be equitable, on separators themselves. It would be a great injustice to enterprising business men and manufacturers of Canada that after a line of business has become established and a factory is making both separators and the steel bowls, the duty should be taken off the one, the duty having formerly been taken off the other for the reason that the article was not made in this country. Now, the bowls are made here, the manufacturer has a fair and equitable claim to protection at the hands of the Government. There are a number of other articles to which attention might properly be called; but while I do not wish to weary the House, I cannot take my seat without referring to another item in the tariff, which I think is the most extraordinary item I ever saw in any tariff—I refer to item 433. Under the old tariff of 1894 and the tariff of 1897 there is the following provision: travellers' baggage free, under regulations prescribed by the Controller of Customs. Now, the Government has added to this provision the following words: "And any article by mail or express valued at not more than 50 cents for the whole importation." This means that all articles brought into this country from any foreign country which are not of greater value than 50 cents will come in duty free under this regulation. I observe it states "under regulations prescribed by the Controller of Customs;" but I presume it was meant to apply to passengers' baggage. Do these words apply to passengers' baggage, or to articles coming in by mail and express?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). It applies to other articles.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the phrase "under regulations prescribed by the Controller of Customs" apply to passengers' baggage, or to other articles?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. To the whole.

Mr. WALLACE. Not by the construction of the sentence. It says "passengers' baggage," and then there is a semi-colon.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. The department has rules as to what is contraband; but the words there have reference to the whole covered by the item.

Mr. WALLACE. So no matter what regulations the Controller of Customs may make, he cannot provide regulations by which articles less in value than 50 cents shall not come in duty free. That will be the will of Parliament. He may make regulations as to the package and the examinations of the package, but he cannot make any law that will prevent the importation of any article which may be of less value than this sum. What will be the effect of that clause? Take cigarettes. The importation last year was 4,500 pounds, of the value of \$10,297, on which the duty amount ed to \$11,770; but the duty under the new tariff will be \$16,370 on an article that cost \$11,000. The average price per pound excise duty paid, of these cigarettes will be \$2.24. Suppose you bring in 50 cents worth of cigarettes, that will be equivalent to two-ninths of a pound, or  $3\frac{1}{2}$  ounces. The price here would be \$5.80—that is the price and the duty. The cost of the two-ninths of a pound would be under our new tariff \$1.29; so that by sending to the United States you would get them for 74 cents less than you could get them in Canada, less postage. The postage on a package of merchandise is 1 cent per ounce. There would be  $3\frac{1}{2}$  ounces, or including the package, 5 ounces, and the postage would therefore be 5 cents, which would have to be deducted, and this would leave 74 cents profit by not buying cigarettes in Canada but sending to American dealers for them. This rule will apply to everything, and it will inflict the most gross injustice on the mercantile community of Canada. I believe there is no class of the community that has done more for the development of the country and more for the interests of the people than the merchants. They have gone out into the new settlements in advance of civilization and settlement; they have helped the poor whenever they could do so. Some say that our merchants have acquired great wealth; but the statement that at least 90 per cent of our merchants have failed in business would disprove the assertion that they have been bleeding our people or living on them. They have been enterprising, and they have acted practically as bankers for a large portion of the community, more especially those residing in the newer portions of the Dominion. What effect will this clause have? On every class of goods of which the package does not exceed in value 50 cents, and there are hundreds of small articles imported here from other countries, any one who sends for small quantities will make money by the operation. The first effect will be that price lists from the United States will be sent into Canada, coming in free of duty under the 50 cents value clause; and so soon as the merchants and manufacturers of the United States discover this clause in the tariff, as they will do within a very few days, they will flood this country with price lists and pamphlets. This clause will apply to hundreds of articles, to some of which I will refer. I have referred to the question of cigarettes and have shown that packages of cigarettes can be brought in under this clause and I have shown that profit will be made by purchasing them in the United States. The effect of this clause will be to destroy the cigarette industry here, for it will be impossible to make cigarettes in this country or to import them in the regular way. The man who brings in large quantities of merchandise, we make him pay 25 or 35 per cent

duty, but you say to the man who buys from him: You can get in your articles duty free; all you have to do is to get price lists from the sellers in the United States, and at the expense of a one cent post card, you can order a dozen cigars or a pound of tobacco, or a package of cigarettes, and you can get them in free of duty. This provision will destroy the Canadian merchants. Complaint has been made in the past that these departmental stores have been injuring the general mercantile trade of the country, but the effect of this will be to shut up the departmental stores and to cripple every other store in Canada. Take the case of cigars. The average price of the imported cigar is $4 a hundred, and you can send for a dozen cigars to the United States, which would cost 50 cents. Under the tariff now before the House the duty on these would be 65 cents, but by paying five cents postage you can have your dozen cigars in here at a cost of 55 cents, instead of buying them in this country at a cost of $1.15. Will the merchants of this country be able to sell their cigars under such conditions as these? I do not think so. Tobacco is another instance in point. The excise duty on tobacco in the United States is 6 cents per pound, but in Canada under the present law, it will be 39 cents per pound. T. & B. tobacco was 60 cents a pound before this 14 cents a pound duty was added, and today I suppose the price would be over 75 cents. Mr. Tuckett, I am told, has a large manufacturing establishment in the United States, and he makes there the same quality of T. & B. which is made in Canada, and which has such a high reputation. If you send a postal card to Mr. Tuckett in the United States to send you a pound package of tobacco to Canada, then, as Mr. Tuckett does not have to pay the excise duty, you get it 39 cents a pound cheaper than you can buy it here for, and from that you have to deduct 16 cents for postage. The Canadian postal law requires 1 cent an ounce, or 16 cents a pound for parcel post, but there is another law which says that you may send samples for 4 cents per pound, or a quarter of a cent per ounce, and I defy Mr. Controller of Customs and Mr. Postmaster General, both, to prevent these goods from coming in here at one-quarter of a cent an ounce, or 4 cents a pound, instead of the 16 cents per pound parcel post. At any rate, it does not make much difference to us, because it is American stamps that will be used. More than that, we are inviting United States merchants to do their business here, without one cent accruing to the Canadian Government, because we take the American stamp on the package and we deliver that package to any part of Canada without further cost. We are therefore making the departments of Government the agents to destroy the business of the Canadian merchants, and of the Canadian manufacturers as well. That is the result of this proposal—the most outrageous proposal that I ever heard of, and one which I should like to hear the Controller of Customs or Minister of Finance try to justify. There are a hundred other articles similarly situated. Suppose a lady wants a silk handkerchief, and they say ladies are fond of bargains. She sends 50 cents to the States for a handkerchief, and as the package will not weigh more than three ounces, she will not pay more than 3 cents postage on it. The duty of 17½ cents is saved, and if you deduct the 3 cent postage, the lady saves 14½ cents on a single pocket handkerchief. Item 352 of the tariff is full of articles that will come in here without paying any duty whatever. You make the wholesale merchant and the retail importer pay 30 or 35 per cent duty, but you invite the consumer to import those goods from foreign countries without paying any duty whatever. This article 352 of the tariff says :

352. Embroideries, laces, braids, fringes, cords, elastic, round or flat ; garter elastic, tassels and bracelets, n.o.p. ; braids, chains, cords or other manufactures of hair, n.e.s. ; handkerchiefs of all kinds ; lace collars and all similar lace goods ; lace nets and nettings of cotton, linen, silk, or other material ; shams, curtains, when made up, trimmed or untrimmed ; regalia, badges and belts of all kinds, n.o.p. ; linen, silk and cotton clothing, and all other articles made up by the seamstress from linen or cotton fabrics, n.o.p. ; corsets of all kinds, corset clasps, busks, blanks and steels, and corset wires, tipped or untipped, thirty-five per cent ad valorem.

Why, Mr. Chairman, this country will be flooded with price lists from England and price lists from the United States and other countries, inviting the Canadian people to buy their goods in these countries. They will say : The merchant in Canada has to pay 35 per cent duty on these articles, but we will send them to you absolutely free of duty, you will have no express or freight charges to pay, but just a little postage fee, for we can send them as samples at 4 cents per pound, or 1 cent for four ounces. These goods will be delivered in Canada, and so our Post Office Department will make itself—without any consideration whatever—the agent of these foreign merchants, for the destruction of the Canadian wholesale and the Canadian retail merchants. This proposal to make these articles free of duty is so outrageous that it cannot be defended. The only defence offered is that it is too much trouble for our officials to examine these packages. Well, what are these officers for ? There are plenty of them in the country to do the work, and I do not see that the Government propose to reduce the staff because they are letting these articles in free of duty. This proposal to admit every article valued under 50 cents absolutely free of duty when coming by mail or express, will be ruinous to the Canadian mercantile community. There are numerous articles the price of which is not more than 50 cents. I will give an example. Ladies' blouses can be bought for 50 cents, and pretty good ones too. They weigh 7½ ounces with collars, cuffs and all complete. The postage under the sample post—and you cannot prevent them from coming in under that—will be 2 cents for the 7½ ounces. That makes the cost of the blouse 52 cents. The duty on that article is 35 per cent, and so 17½ cents duty is saved at the expense of 2 cents for postage, or 15½ cents is saved on the purchase of a single blouse. But, Mr. Chairman, many people send to different parts of this country for their goods. They have to pay the return postage or express upon them ; but when they send to the States or to England, the postage is no more or is even less in some cases ; so that it costs them less to buy abroad than to buy in Canada. Take regalias and badges. I know myself that there is a tremendous business done in the States in the supply of regalias. One firm in New Jersey supplies almost every society in Canada. What will they do under this provision ? They will say : " Send us the names of your parties, and we will send them a 50-cent or a 30-cent or a 25-cent badge direct, and pay no duty whatever." That will be the effect. This American company, I know, came over here and did business, and it was necessary to fine them $2,400, I think, for breaking the law ; but now they will not be breaking the law, but they will be carrying out the law which is put on the Statute-book by the Finance Minister. They will be supplying goods to this country, and this country will not be getting one cent of revenue so long as they send small 50-cent packages. There are a hundred articles in the same position—flowers, dress buttons, combs, collars, cuffs, men's shirts, socks and stockings ; all these things can be imported from other countries without any duty being paid upon them. How is the Canadian retailer to compete with other countries, when the importer has to pay both freight and a high rate of duty, while the consumer gets his goods under this proposal without paying any duty at all ? I think the Government will reconsider that clause, because if they do not, they will get into a lot of trouble over it. Now, I have nothing further to say to the House at present, only to express my regret that the Government, while they have held out a kindly hand to some classes of manufacturers, have not seen fit to do it to all who require it. They have struck down a number of Canadian industries without benefiting the country to any extent ; and I would ask the Government, who have expressed their wish to make changes if changes shall be shown to be necessary, to make other changes that will make this tariff one that will protect our Canadian industries to some extent, and help to build up this Canada of ours.

Mr. BEATTIE. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to this debate on clause 16 for the past two or three days with considerable interest, and while I have heard many important points discussed, there are many other points of great importance to the business men and manufacturers of this country which I consider have not been touched upon by any previous speaker. No member of the Government has as yet given any explanation of clause 16 showing that in the opinion of any business man it can be made to work satisfactorily to the people of this country; and I state here that no member of the Government can give a satisfactory explanation of how this clause will work. That is why they remain silent. To my mind there are many difficulties in the way of carrying out this clause—difficulties that cannot be overcome, difficulties that will arouse suspicion and distrust in the mind of every business man in this country. This clause will open the door to the committal of glaring frauds upon the revenue and upon the business men of this country—frauds which I assert cannot be detected by any custom-house appraiser in the Dominion of Canada to-day. Let us see how this preferential clause is to be carried out, and if I make any mistake, I trust that some member of the Government will put me right as I proceed. Every member of this House must know that the great warehouses of London, Manchester, Birmingham, Sheffield, Nottingham, Leeds, Bradford, Glasgow, Belfast, and others I could mention, are filled with the manufactures of the world, so that, instead of being called warehouses of Great Britain, they might well be called warehouses of the world; and I will venture here to state that 75 per cent of the merchants of the world cannot tell the difference between many British-made goods and foreign-made goods of the same class. I am referring to dry goods more especially, but I can prove it with regard to other classes as well. I find that many members of this House are under the impression that no foreign goods can enter Great Britain unless they are stamped on the fabric with the name of the country in which they are made. That is not so. I grant that there is a law in Great Britain requiring a ticket to be placed on the goods to designate the country in which they were manufactured; but remove that ticket, and I will defy any custom-house appraiser in the Dominion of Canada to tell me the country where many of those goods were produced. I know that we have in Canada the best class of business men, perhaps, to be found outside of Great Britain; but let us suppose that a package of goods arrives to-day in this country, and they are being passed through one of our custom-houses as of British manufacture. I would like to ask the Controller of Customs how he is going to detect or determine whether those goods are British-made or foreign-made. I know that he will tell me that he will compel the British exporter to certify on the invoice that the goods are of British manufacture. Is that all the safeguard the business men of this country are to have against fraud? If it is, I thank heaven that I am out of business, because it is no protection from fraud at all. While I believe our British and Canadian merchants to be the best and most honest in the world, it cannot be denied that there are many men in this country, as in all countries, who will take advantage of any expedient to make money, especially where protection is impossible. For example, take German-made serge. I will place a piece of German-made serge and a piece of British-made serge on that table and defy the Controller of Customs to produce any man in the Customs Department who can tell the difference between the two. If he says he can, I will tell him he does not know what he is talking about. Take dress goods. We all know that there is not a greater competitor of England than Germany to-day. The German manufacturer copies the British and the British copies the German, and there are many goods in the dress goods line which cannot be detected as German or British except by an expert engaged in the business from morning to night, and that class of men we have not in this country. Take the German hosiery trade. There is German hosiery made to-day which cannot be detected from English; and although it may seem strange, it was only a short while ago that I saw German hosiery made to imitate the Canadian manufacture, and a Canadian manufacturer told me that he himself could hardly tell the difference between the two. The point I wish to make is this, that when different goods are placed in stock in British warehouses, there is no man except an expert who can tell the foreign from many of English manufacture, and I myself, on many occasions, have been very much confused to tell which is which. The ordinary clerk is not allowed to know where the goods have come from, and in many cases he is not allowed to know even the prices paid. The British merchant is very clever in doing business, perhaps the best in the world. Does the Controller of Customs mean to tell me that he has any appraisers in his department who could detect a German velvet from an English velvet, or a German sealette from an English sealette. The latter is a class of goods made to imitate real sealskin, and I venture to state that there is not a man in this country who could detect a German sealette from an English sealette. Then, take the manufactures of silk. We know that in Germany black silks are made largely and in Zurich, Switzerland, as well as in England. I defy the hon. Controller of Customs to produce any customs appraiser in his department who can tell the German or the Swiss from the English manufacture. If he says he can, I would tell him he does not know what he is talking about. If all this is to be left to the honesty of every little tin-pot merchant in Great Britain, what is to become of honest business men? All that is required of the English merchant is to certify that the goods are of British manufacture; and if he does, who is to say they are not? I hold that it cannot be discovered whether the goods are of foreign or British manufacture. If this clause be adopted, I would advise the hon. Controller to send over to England at once and engage all the expert buyers in Great Britain and place one in every custom-house in the Dominion. If he does not do this, he will have the greatest frauds committed, not only on the revenue, but on the honest business men of this country, and committed without fear of detection. If what I have said is true—and of that I have no doubt—we can never have preferential trade in Canada so long as Great Britain admits the products of Europe free into her ports, because we will be subjected to the greatest frauds on our revenue. There is another class of trade I had almost forgotten, and that is the lace trade. The foundation lace is made in Nottingham, and thence shipped to Switzerland, where it receives the embroidery and other work placed upon it. The article is half made in England and half in Switzerland. How does the Controller propose to enter that goods? The only way I can see is this, the hon. Finance Minister will have to adopt a new clause, which I should call the half-and-half clause, because the goods are half English and half Swiss. There is still another article, and it is one that comes from a country on which the Government are bestowing a great deal of attention, but, I am sorry to say, the people of that country do not appear to appreciate the kindness of the Government. I refer to Ireland and the Irish linen trade. Perhaps hon. gentlemen are not aware that a large amount of the linen called Irish which comes into this country is really foreign linen produced in Germany and Belgium and sold by merchants as Irish linen, many of them not knowing the difference. Then, there is another case in which frauds may be committed to a large extent of the revenue. There is a class in England called the packers who do a considerable trade. Many Canadian importers buy in England small amounts of goods in different warehouses and then send the packages to London, Manchester and Glasgow into packing establishments, where the goods are all packed together in one package and invoiced, and the packers will very often invoice them according to instructions. Are the business men of this country to be subjected to a practice of that kind on the part of men, whom I would be sorry to call dishonest, but irresponsible men, who will invoice the goods, if instructed so to do, as being the products of England, whether they are the products of England or not? In this way, a great many goods may be brought into this country and passed as the products of England, which are not the products of England at all, and I hope the Controller of Customs will consider this.

I shall not weary the House any longer except with one more remark. I have heard the question of loyalty thrown across from the Government side to this side frequently during this debate, would it not be well to leave the question of loyalty out of the question? It is not many years ago since some hon. gentlemen who sit on the Government side to-day expressed on the floor of the House the opinion that had they been on the banks of the Saskatchewan, they would have taken up their rifles and shot down the volunteers who went to quell the rebellion. I was on the banks of the Saskatchewan just looking for such characters, but they did not dare to put in an appearance, and I regret that any man who would venture to give utterance to such a sentiment should go to England to represent Canada at the Jubilee of Queen Victoria. Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I can call this clause nothing else but a clause of false pretenses, a clause calculated to blind and mislead the merchants and the people of this country.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to ask the leader of the Government (Mr. Laurier) if he will bring down the papers in regard to the decision come to to admit British goods under this clause. The process, as laid down in the hon. gentleman's own tariff clause, is, first, an investigation by the Controller of Customs, then a report by the Controller of Customs to the Council, then a decision of the Council, which, I suppose, of course, can only be given by an Order in Council. I do not imagine that, in a matter of so great importance, the Controller of Customs would make a decision without having thoroughly gone into the matter, nor do I think that the Council would decide upon his report unless his report were laid before them pro forma. It must be so, because the Controller of Customs is not, up to the present time, a member of the Cabinet. He must, therefore, have reported and given the ground of his recommendation that the tariff of Great Britain was such as compared with ours that their goods could be admitted under preferential rates at once. He may have made—I suppose he must have made—a similar report with reference to New South Wales, and in these reports he must certainly have laid down the principles upon which he proceeded and which were to guide him in making his recommendations with reference to the different countries to the Government. Now, if we had these papers, the report of the Controller of Customs, and the Order in Council upon that report, we would at least have something to guide us as to what is the mode of action, the principles by which the Government are to be guided when they admit other countries under this reciprocal arrangement; and I think it is but fair that the Government should bring down these papers and lay them on the Table of the House, so that the members of the committee may have them before they are called upon to vote on this resolution. I have striven with the greatest pertinacity to get an explanation of the procedure from the Controller of Customs or the Prime Minister. But neither has met the question; both have shot right past it, and have given us nothing but words and generalities. If we had the actual report of the Controller of Customs to Council, and the decision of the Council in its Order in Council, which, I suppose, must have been passed, that would enlighten the committee more than anything that we have heard from the Minister.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I must at least give partial credit to my hon. friend (Mr. Foster). I will say he has been speaking—I will not say anything else—with pertinacity. If it will be more satisfactory for him to have the information in the form of the Order in Council with regard to British goods, it will afford me pleasure to gratify him to that extent, and I will undertake to have it to-morrow.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, it is quite evident that the clause now under consideration cannot be endorsed by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, who for years back, have stood up on the floor of Parliament and advocated the policy of protection, the only policy, they held, which could promote the various interests of the country. I venture to say that it was a genuine surprise to the country to see the way in which the hon. gentlemen have reversed their political policy, since coming into power. I remember very well, and I am sure it is also within the recollection of this House, how my hon. friend, the Prime Minister, when he was leader of the Opposition, advocated a policy of reciprocity with the United States, and at that time we all heard it stated from the lips of the hon. gentleman: that the first and last plank of the platform upon which he stood was the advocacy of Canadian interests, before everything else. I remember that, speaking about unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, my hon. friend said: I am of opinion that it would be conducive to the interests of Canada that we should enter into a treaty of reciprocity with the great Republic to the south of the line; and I truly believe that such a policy would promote our interests, and should the interests of Great Britain be injured thereby, well, so much the worse for British interests. First of all, he said, I advocate Canadian interests, and therefore I am in favour of Canada entering into a reciprocity treaty with the United States. Now, this preferential clause throws altogether into the background the former professions and the old political platform of the hon. Prime Minister and of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Were the policy and action of the hon. gentlemen to be sized up by that noted writer of the last century who was wont, when describing the statesmen of his time, to contrast their qualities with those of representatives of the animal kingdom, and even of the vegetable and mineral kingdoms, surely he would not have compared the hon. gentlemen with the elephant, which is looked upon as the prototype of good sense and prudence, which qualities should characterize the course of real statesmen; but I rather think he would have described the Government as a wild and carnivorous beast, because, the very first thing they did, after coming into power, was to turn out of office a great many civil servants, and to persecute them in various ways, instead of turning their attention to the vital interests of the country which the Liberals, when in the Opposition, used to call upon the late Government to foster and protect. The second thing the Government did, was to trample under foot and to crush the constitution of the country, and the rights of the Manitoba minority. And their third action was an attempt at tearing to pieces the commercial treaties entered into by the mother country, so far as Canada may be concerned.

The hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has established, so as to leave no room for doubt, that the Dominion of Canada was bound by these treaties, and the Prime Minister, finally did hearken to reason. That is the reason why we now have this contingent clause which will allow the hon. gentleman, should the Imperial authorities so determine, to modify the tariff so as to admit goods from countries enjoying, under the treaties, the most-favoured-nation treatment, on the same basis as goods from Great Britain. Clause 16, now under consideration, is what the Government describe as a tender of preferential treatment to Great Britain. This is decidedly a preference given to the trade of the mother country: but, as stated by my hon. friends on this side of the House, it must apply to all the nations having entered into commercial treaties with England. Now, this clause, while giving a preference to the trade of foreign countries, is also bound, in the opinion of the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, if carried out, to interfere with the manufacturing industries and the farming interests of the country. The Government ought not to disturb the growing industries of this country, because the moderate protection which they are now enjoying is barely adequate to maintain them against foreign competition. In a young country like Canada, growing industries require protection against outside competition with the products of the most highly organized labour and protective countries in the world. But if we cannot boast of being a great nation, my hon. friend, the Prime Minister, will bear me out when I say that we have one of the largest countries in the world, and that it should be our ambition to add materially to the sum of our national wealth and to increase our population. The manufacturing industries and agricultural development are two important factors which go hand in hand in the march of the country, along the pathway of material development. Those two wealth-producers, as I said, should both together put the shoulder to the wheel; because both manufacturers and soil-tillers are conjointly responsible for the growth and prosperity of the country; and let me tell the hon. gentlemen opposite, that unless they bring about such conditions, the country, instead of going ahead, will be going backwards. I need not here invoke the authority of writers on political economy, of the last century, because, during the last hundred years, the world has gone ahead and all civilized nations have made rapid strides along the pathway of progress in all directions. It was during the last hundred years that industry made such wonderful progress in Great Britain, in France, in Belgium, in Holland and in Germany. In order well to realize the economic conditions of our country, so as not to blunder in tariff matters, we should form our opinions as to the best financial and fiscal policy on which to build up our national prosperity, from other sources than the writings of Cobden and other English economists who advocated free-trade as the best economic system, but from the modern writers, who have laid down doctrines more in harmony with the present trade conditions, which have undergone such wonderful changes during the present century, owing to the great improvements brought about by the development of modern sciences.

On these several grounds, I hold that the tariff now under consideration by this House will disturb our national industries and check the general prosperity of the country. If not a free trade measure, I think this tariff bears at least the stamp of free trade and has a tendency in that direction. I am afraid that the free trade doctrine of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) will in the long run prevail and be carried out by the hon. gentlemen opposite, when, under the proposed tariff, they will have to give entrance into Canada to the products of foreign countries which will come into competition with the output of our own industries and the productions of our soil, thus hampering if not totally destroying our manufacturing and agricultural interests. Such is not the view I take of a preferential tariff. I, for one, object to the Government granting to the mother country a preferential tariff, without at the same time securing reciprocal advantages. I would view with favour such a tariff, on the condition that we were also given a better position and better terms for our products in the British markets. To my mind, a preferential tariff should be one allowing colonial products preferential treatment in the illimitable markets of the mother country. While Great Britain asks her colonies freer admission and preferential treatment for the products of her immense manufactures, I am of opinion that she should also be prepared to meet us half way and say: We are prepared to give your products a preference in our markets, as an offset for the trade privileges you grant us. What I press upon the Government is not to set up a prohibition tariff, practically shutting out of our markets foreign goods similar to those from the mother country, but a tariff adequate to protect all our manufacturing industries and our agricultural interests as well, such, for instance, as the manufacturing interests of the great city of Montreal, those of Toronto, and of St. Hyacinthe, all of which have sprung up and grown up under the fostering influence of the National Policy inaugurated by the late Government. And then, should they choose to give the mother country certain advantages, by granting her products a better position and better terms in our markets, I see no objection to their entering into such reciprocal arrangements, provided that our tariff, even with this reduction, be high enough to protect our Canadian industries. Thus, for instance, the rates of the main schedule could be raised 25 per cent on the manufactures and products coming into the country, over those imported from England. I would not object to such a preferential tariff, even with this dropping down to a 25 per cent reduction, provided as I said, that it afforded an adequate protection to our Canadian industries against competition from the mother country. While giving to the mother country this preference which would entail a loss of revenue, and supposing, as a matter of course that owing to our being unable to manufacture all the products required or in sufficient quantity for our home consumption, we had to import into the country some goods manufactured abroad, still I say, our home industries would suffer, if they were not sufficiently protected against that competition. While granting this preference to the products of the mother country, we must by all means keep up a protective tariff, in order to allow our national industries to grow up and prosper. But how are they to grow up and develop if we do not afford them adequate protection? In order the better to illustrate my meaning, let me give a concrete instance: take a general 25 per cent tariff, which you raise to a 32 per cent tariff, and then you give a preference to Great Britain and the other countries prepared to grant to Canada reciprocal terms, by reducing the duties to 25 per cent on all goods coming from those countries, and by so doing, you protect our own industries against competition with the products of Great Britain and other countries. Now, in order to obtain these preferential terms in our market, the British Government should be prepared to consider the propriety of imposing duties upon certain products, so as to give the colonies preferential treatment in the English market, as an equivalent for the preference given by the colonies to the trade of the mother country. The better to elucidate my meaning, suppose that our dairy products were admitted in England on a preferential basis, that would give our butter and our cheese an advantage over similar products coming from foreign countries, thus creating a kind of monopoly in favour of British colonies so far as they would be given the preference, as regards those sources of food supply, over foreign countries. Were Great Britain to put an impost upon the breadstuffs, the meats imported from foreign countries, the colonies would benefit therefrom and be given a better position in the English market as a consideration for the preferential treatment granted to the mother country, in so far as we would be enabled thereby to export to Great Britain a larger quantity of our home products. We would thus be given a preference over the products of the United States and even those of the other portions of the Empire where the trade of the metropolis was not treated on a preferential basis. Were this clause to carry, the Dominion would thereby be deprived of the advantages we could claim as a return for the sacrifices made in favour of British trade, and which we could secure, should Great Britain impose duties upon breadstuffs, dairy products and meats coming from foreign countries. How, I ask, is the hon. Prime Minister, how is the Government going to obtain from the British Government these advantages for Canada, when they admit English goods under this preferential clause, and when they have to extend the same preference to the countries enjoying under the treaties the most-favoured-nation treatment? This preference given to British trade is, in my opinion unfair to our Canadian industries in so much as our tariff, as it now stands, does not afford more than an adequate protection to all our manufacturing interests. I hold that this clause is unjust, because it is proposed to make a reduction of 25 per cent in favour of Great Britain. I submit that the tariff, as it stands now, or rather the tariff submitted to the House, will not afford an adequate protection to our home industries against the keen competition of British manufacturers. It is a well known fact that the English people is, in an economic sense, the best equipped of all nations, having at their disposal an enormous working capital invested in numberless manufactures, and the service of a large fleet for the transportation of the products of those manufactures and to subserve the wants of a globe encircling trade. How dare we hope, with infant industries still growing up, enter into successful competition with British industry, when the American people, with grown-up and powerful industries, nearly three-quarters of a century old, still have to protect themselves against British competition? American industry has to protect itself against British industry, although the Americans possess a vast accumulation of capital, a most modern equipment, having also immense natural resources at their disposal, and skilled labour in the several branches of their manufacturing industries; still they are satisfied that they are not yet able to enter into competition with either the English, the Germans or the Belgians. How dare the hon. gentlemen opposite pretend Canada to be strong enough to enter into successful competition with older nations, after fifteen or sixteen years of protective policy? How dare they expose Canadian industry to foreign competition and what arguments can they invoke to satisfy our manufacturers that our industry is strong enough to stand successfully the assaults of foreign trade and keep its vantage ground against competition, whatever it may be? None at all. The hon. gentlemen are dumb and they have not undertaken to contradict one single argument brought forward by the hon. gentlemen on this side against clause 16 of the tariff. The Government are silent, on the ground that they have long ago answered the arguments brought forward by the hon. leader of the Opposition and his followers.

Mr. Chairman, modern economists divide nations into two classes, with regard to the economic system which is best appropriated to them. Free trade countries, they hold, are either those which have a preponderant industrial production, or which have a preponderant natural production. The protective nations are those in course of a very high industrial development, and those where industrial and farming interests grow apace. I think Canada comes under the last standard, as protection is perfectly well adapted to our environment. If we want capital to flow into the country and seek investment here let us endeavour to develop our manufacturing interests on a par with agriculture and the development of the natural resources of the soil. Without industry, our country will always remain poor and backward in the development of the natural resources of our boundless territory. Without a prosperous industry, we shall never have enough capital to develop our immense natural resources which are still in a latent state, such are the mineral wealth hidden either in the bowels of the earth or in the bosom of our mountains, and our immense plains which are awaiting the arrival of settlers to yield their latent wealth of luxuriant crops. The same may be said of our immense forest wealth; of the forests which adorn a large portion of British North America and will long continue to be one of the great sources of revenue for this Dominion of ours. Therefore, ours is the protective type, by reason of our extensive natural resources, and on account of the facilities which motive power affords us for the building up of our national industries. We have, in this country, abundant motive power under either form, as revealed by modern discoveries. I mean water and steam. We have immense water powers formed by rivers issuing from our mountains. We have, moreover, coal deposits at several points of the country. We have large water courses which allow us to transport fuel into all our industrial centres. We have a railway system built with a view to developing our industry and the trade of the country. With a view to a successful operation of our railway system, it is of vital importance that coal, iron and all our raw materials should be protected; it is necessary for our industries to be given a sufficient sum of protection, so as to enable our own or foreign capitalists to maintain them in this country. In addition to the conditions I have just described, there is, according to modern economists, another condition which largely conduces to industrial success, that is the different races and peoples inhabiting a country. Canadians are the offspring of two great nations which have created European industry, and have made of France and England two countries where industry has reached the highest development. Canadians are the descendants of two great races which have made modern civilization what it now is. Why, I ask, Mr. Chairman, should we allow those valuable intellectual and physical qualities inherited both from the Anglo-Saxon and the French races, to slumber as it were and lie idle, for want of proper food to stimulate the latent energies of our people? Why should the Government not allow our people, through a liberal tariff, to devote themselves to industry, the more so as they have all the necessary qualifications to make industrial operations a success? Why, I ask again, should the Government not foster and stimulate that genius which is, to such a degree, a characteristic of our people, that all things considered, we may on good grounds hope soon to reach the high degree of industrial wealth and growth that other nations, as England, France, Belgium, the United States of America are now enjoying. To my mind, Sir, the Government would be altogether wrong were they to neglect giving their attention to these matters, to adhere to their free-trade doctrine, a very questionable panacea, to be applied only to nations having reached a high industrial state. The Government, I hope, do not pretend to say that our people lack energy and spirit of enterprise to the point of comparing them to the people of Turkey, Spain, Italy and of the South American Republics. For, it is a well-known fact, that those people lack the energy and the necessary qualities to develop large industries. As far as the carrying out of those industries is concerned, I maintain that the hon. gentlemen are making an egregious mistake in presenting such a tariff, which is calculated to hamper, injure, and even ruthlessly destroy our home industries. Should it long remain in force, the energy of our people would be impaired and diminished. It would, in the long run, affect the natural activity of our people for industry, and would tend to place our people in a state of deplorable inferiority to their neighbours. The people of the United States, like our people, are descendants of the Anglo-Saxon; they are the offspring of the inhabitants of Great Britain and France. Now, the United States, peopled with the descendants of those two great races, have become, thanks to the protection granted to the industries of their country, a great industrial nation, which has accumulated an enormous capital, which has enabled them to increase their industrial population and export their products throughout the different countries of the globe. Such is the history of the development of our neighbours' resources and natural wealth. Why, then, I ask, with the same natural resources, could not our people create industries on a large scale, the more so as we have at our disposal motive power in abundance, with a population able to pursue industrial occupations like people of other countries? Wherefore, I ask, should our Government not try, through the tariff, artificially, if you like, to stimulate the energy of our people and enable them to implant here industries which will create wealth and prosperity, by developing our resources and inducing immigrants to come and settle down in our midst? The Government of the day pretend to have an immigration policy; but, I say, if the industries of the country are imperilled through our tariff, the farming industry will also be jeopardized and immigrants will not stay here. Without home industries and developing the resources of the soil, you cannot create wealth in this country. Modern economists state that the Turks, notwithstanding the natural resources at their disposal, will never be an industrial nation, owing to their having no natural genius for the creation of a national industry on a large scale. But it is quite the reverse with the Canadian people. Why, I ask, do Canadians go abroad and settle down in the United States of America, and especially in the New England States? Is it with a view to developing the natural resources of the soil that they leave the country and a more fertile soil than that of the neighbouring Republic? No, Mr. Chairman; but for the most part, our fellow-countrymen, either from Ontario, Quebec, or from the Maritime provinces, go to the United States to indulge in their natural propensities, as our race is fond, before everything else, of industrial progress. Our fellow-countrymen become industrial workmen in the New England States.

I have often heard from the hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were on this side of the House, an objection raised against the system of protection in force in Canada, and it is this: that the protective system fostered monopolies, and those monopolies constituted a public danger, and a great wrong against the consumers, and that a small class of individuals grew rich at the expense of the great masses of the people. Let the hon. gentlemen who now sit on the Treasury benches remember that monopolies do not spring up from a moderately protective tariff granted to industries in a young country like ours, but that a reasonable system of protection, very far from breeding monopolies, contributes to the building up of industries on a large scale, and those industries, owing to mutual competition, and to the fact of being protected against foreign competition, are forced to lower their prices. When they receive a fair protection, manufacturers dare not create monopolies, for, in so doing, they would provoke the establishment of other industrial establishments. In raising their tariff, monopolists would incur the risk of competition from similar goods imported from abroad. What creates monopolies is not a protective tariff but a prohibitive tariff. Now, I for one, and my hon. friends on this side as well, are not in favour of a prohibitive tariff. There is a marked difference between a reasonable and well reasoned protective tariff and a prohibitive tariff, like the one set up in the states under the McKinley Bill. The tariff, which is going to be passed in the United States Congress, as regards a great many items, is a prohibitive tariff. Undoubtedly, too high imports may breed monopolies, which constitute a public danger, not only because consumers have to pay more for the products they need, but because they retard industrial progress. But a reasonable protection, and a reasoned one, like that established by the Conservative Government, cannot breed monopolies. Now, can monopolies exist under free trade? They can exist even under free trade, for this reason: as manufacturers cannot manufacture and enter into competition with each other without ruining themselves, they are apt to combine to fix a higher price than that established in foreign countries, which are large exporters and in that case, they generally come to an understanding and set up a price which injures the interests of consumers. Therefore, it is better for national industries to have a reasonable and reasoned protection. Now, if we allow our industries to be exposed to foreign competition, and run the risk of receiving the death blow from British competition which will beyond a doubt, take place, the tariff, as carried out after the dropping off of 25 per cent, will prove the ruin of our industries, which will be unable to stand the competition of English goods allowed at preferential rates into our markets. And further, our capital invested in industries on a large scale in course of development will not only be lost, but, we will then surely fall a prey to the monopolists of the mother country. I hate monopolists, whether they come from the mother country or from Canada. I detest them just as cordially, when they hail from the United States of America, as they prove just as merciless to the consumers as Canadian monopolists themselves. When they are outside of our reach, they are quite independent from the citizens of this country; as they operate in a foreign country and no portion of the capital they accumulate through their monopolies can be of any benefit either to the Canadian people or the Government. For one sure thing is that should any monopolists develop their industries, they will do so in their own country and not in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I find the language of the Prime Minister quite different from what it was, when he entered upon his political career.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). (Translation). He has improved with experience.

Mr. DUPONT (Translation). I do not think so. As I said, when the hon. Prime Minister entered upon his political career, he one day, repeated the famous sentence of the Hon. Louis Joseph Papineau: Let no Canadian buy any goods from Great Britain. At the time I am speaking of, the hon. Prime Minister impressed upon his fellow-countrymen in the Quebec legislature the necessity of organizing and endeavouring to create a national industry. Now, with a view to inducing his fellow members and fellow-countrymen to create such an industry, he brought forward, in support of his case, the very same arguments I have just quoted.

Mr. LANGELIER (Translation). Did the Conservative party walk in the footsteps of Papineau, when they set up the National Policy?

Mr. DUPONT (Translation). The Conservative party first looked into the development of industrial life in the various countries of the world and then they were satisfied that, if it were not proper, as Papineau contended, to abstain buying goods from the mother country, they were in duty bound at least to give to the Canadian industries sufficient protection to enable them being implanted in the country, developing and prospering so as to compete successfully with foreign manufacturers. That was our policy. The hon. Prime Minister told us a little while ago that he had profited by experience. Such is not the opinion many fellow-countrymen of his entertain about him; and they are beginning to think that the pleasures of power have unmanned him and weakened his patriotism. Many are asking themselves whether the hon. leader of the House and his colleagues, when advocating free trade as the only system under which our national industries could thrive and develop, have not been misled in their judgment, and whether they have not merely been prompted by the ambition of crossing over to the other side of this House and sitting on the Treasury benches. I deplore the fact of my hon. friend the Prime Minister and his colleagues from the province of Quebec, going through such an evolution in their political opinions, as regards the customs tariff; for I am a firm believer in the National Policy. I am afraid that when the policy of the Government is put to the test, should the tariff be put into force without any amendment, it will be found that the hon. gentlemen have made a sad mistake in the selection of the best means of securing a sum of public prosperity superior as they thought, to that enjoyed by the people under the Conservative rule.

It being Six o'clock, the Committee rose for recess.

After Recess.

On the order,

Further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Belcourt for third reading of Bill (No. 68) respecting the American Bank Note Company.

Mr. FOSTER. I trust, Mr. Speaker, you will allow me to call the attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Belcourt) to the fact that the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) had commenced a speech on this Bill which he had not the good fortune to finish when the time for private Bills expired on Friday evening. I suppose my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) would not be so hard-hearted as to break off the hon. gentleman in the middle of his speech. I wish to make an appeal to the hon. gentleman's good nature to leave this Bill over until the hon. member for Pictou returns. He is in Toronto to-day and is unable to be here. I can assure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Belcourt) that it will not have the effect of blocking his Bill—that is not the intention.

Mr. BELCOURT. I understand that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) himself intends to make a speech—

Mr. FOSTER. I do not intend to make a speech, but I may have some remarks covering five or ten minutes.

Mr. BELCOURT. Call them "remarks." But if they prove as lengthy as those of the other night, I think they might well be called "speech." The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) spoke for an hour. If the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) are to be so lengthy they will deserve the name of a speech. I cannot, as I understand the position, agree to let the Bill stand over. This is the second time it has stood over at the request of hon. gentlemen on the other side. There cannot be any objection to the Bill in itself—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Belcourt) is making a mistake, if he will allow me to say so. The request that is made is certainly a proper one. An hon. gentleman is in the midst of a speech on this subject, but is not able to be present this evening. He will be here to-morrow. There is no intention on the part of any one to obstruct the Bill, but the measure is one that, I think, should be open to full discussion; and I would suggest to my hon. friend (Mr. Belcourt) that it is not likely he will advance the measure he has in hand, by forcing it on under present circumstances.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I would say to my hon. friend (Mr. Belcourt) that, with the assurances on the other side—

Mr. BELCOURT. I did not understand that—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There can be no doubt about it; my hon. friend has the assurance of the leader of the Opposition and his colleague that there is no intention to block the Bill. And, even though postponed this evening, it will retain its place on the Order paper.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. gentlemen will see that this is an important matter, in connection with the contract.

Order allowed to stand.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

On section 16,

Mr. FOSTER. Still in the pursuit of information. I think it was on Friday when this same clause was up, and I tried to get from the Controller of Customs what the meaning of this section was, and having plied him with questions to which he said he would answer, I waited patiently for his reply, in which I expected a complete elucidation of what is certainly as obscure as anything that the English language could possibly contain. I have no hesitation at all in saying that it is the next thing to disgraceful that any Government should make a proposition to this House, and ask the whole House to consent to it, putting an abnormal and extraordinary power in its hands without vouchsafing to this House one single glimmer of light as to the method or mode by which that clause is going to be put into operation. I state again, as I stated before, that that clause is as indefinite as it can well be, and to no two minds would it probably carry the same meaning. It is capable of any definition that a Government may choose to give it, and they cannot be criticised upon their definition of it simply because the words may mean almost anything. Now, what I asked the Controller of Customs was this, What is the meaning of these words, "on the whole"? How is he going to decide when the question comes up as to the country to which it is proposed to give the minimum tariff? The clause reads:

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to are to the country to which it may apply,—

And then it goes on. Now, I asked the Controller of Customs if, as I supposed, this was the only clear and honest way in which that could be applied, namely, that you were to take the articles which were dealt in by both countries, you were to take the average tariff upon these, and if the average tariff of the foreign country was equal to or less than the average tariff of Canada upon goods which would come from that country, then the decision was to be based upon that clear ground, that then "on the whole" that tariff would be as favourable to Canada as Canada's tariff to that country; and I asked him whether or not that was his interpretation, and paused for an answer. The hon. gentleman said that he would answer me when he rose to reply, that he would explain it all, and here is his explanation:

I will endeavour now to explain it. The Controller of Customs finds that he is under the impression that, if this section becomes law, and a question arises as to whether the products of a country may be admitted under the lower schedule that is contained in this Act, the Controller of Customs will then find it his duty to take the question into consideration—

That is very plain.

—and to judge by the standard which is set down in the law.

But that is the very thing I asked him, what the standard was that was set down in the law, but he vouchsafed no answer, no explanation, not a word, as to what he understands that standard to be.

But it will be his duty to take the question into consideration and to judge by the standard which is set down in the law, as to whether the products of that country should be admitted or not.

Now, we knew just as much after he had made that statement as we knew before, that is, we knew nothing; or we knew that the hon. Controller of Customs either knew nothing as to what the standard would be, or that if he knew, he did not propose to enlighten the House in reference to it. He simply did, in a little varied way, what the Prime Minister did on Friday, read from the words of the clause and say that that was its own explanation. Nearly every one who has heard this discussion knows that the clause does not explain itself at all. The simple straightforward question put to the Controller of Customs was this: Do you understand that when you are deciding as between two countries, that you are to take the average of the tariff of the two countries on the goods which are likely to be interchanged, or which are being interchanged, between the two countries, that you will compare them, and that if you find the tariff of the foreign country is equal to or less than the Canadian tariff, you will make your decision from that basis. Any one can understand the question; the hon. gentleman understood it, the hon. gentleman said he would answer it, the hon. gentleman did not answer it; he simply read to me the terms of the clause, and said that he would take the standard that was set down in the law. Now, I submit this is not fair treatment—not to me, I am only one member of this House—but it is not fair treatment to the House, and it is not fair treatment to the business interests of this country. The business interests of this country wish to know what is the standard by which the Controller of Customs is going to judge, when he allows a foreign country to enter into competition with the industries and labour of this country at 25 per cent less than the regular rates. Is it presumptuous that the business interests should know that? Is it presumptuous that a member of Parliament should ask that an answer be given to that? Is it not fair, and honest, and right, that the Government should give that answer? Now, the Controller of Customs promised to give that answer, and he did not give an answer. He gave what I have read, he read simply the original words in the original clause, which convey any meaning that any person may wish to take out of them. The hon. gentleman goes on a little further and says :

I understand it will be the duty of the Controller of Customs to examine that tariff, to examine it in its details. I would examine the course of trade between that country and Canada, and I would have regard to the products of that country, in a measure, I would look at the trade of that country ; I would look at the subject in all its bearings, and I would, in the terms of the resolution, endeavour to arrive at a decision based upon the information that I had thus gained.

I say that when I asked for the standard, I received no explanation. The hon. gentleman explained neither his own meaning nor the meaning of the Government, and there has not been given by even one member of the Government the least glimmer of an idea as to what that standard is to be. The hon. gentleman further said :

I would report to the Governor in Council, to whose authority the Controller of Customs under this section is subject.

I have asked to-day that the report on which the Controller decided that Great Britain and New South Wales should have entry into this country under the reduction be brought down—I have asked that the report and the Order in Council founded on it should be laid before the House, and those papers should be laid before the House. It may be possible from the report which the Controller made, according to what he says is the procedure, and on which report the Order in Council is founded, to find a statement in black and white as to what is to be the basis on which each single case is to be decided. But so far we have nothing in the least to illuminate or throw the least light on the matter. It is in such a position that the Controller of Customs and the Government can simply decide at their will, what countries shall come in at their own whim and caprice and predilection ; but there is no rule and no standard laid down which is to guide them, and which is to be a guarantee to the country that in the determination of this question a rule which is reliable and definite shall be carried out. I want to try and prevail on the good humour and good sense of the hon. Controller of Customs again to-night. I ask him if he will again tell me whether or not his understanding and the Government interpretation of the case, is, that if for instance he is conducting an inquiry as regards a country, we will say Japan, he will take the tariffs of the two countries, that he will take the products of Canada which go into Japan and the products of Japan which come into Canada, that he will strike the average on those, and if the average of the duties imposed by Japan is equal to or less than that of Canada, then he will consider that the ground and basis on which Japan shall be entitled to the reduction. Would the hon. gentleman consider that to be the interpretation of his ruling ? Or would he take the average of the whole range of goods in Japan and the average of the whole in Canada, and striking the average of each, would he allow Japan to come in under that resolution, provided that on the whole average the Japan tariff was equal to or less than the average of the Canadian tariff ? That is a plain and I think a clearly-put question, and I should like the hon. gentleman to give me information on that point.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). If the hon. gentleman is waiting for my reply. I may say that I do not think I could give the information better than by the answer he has just read, and which I gave the other day. The hon. gentleman is asking the same question.

Mr. FOSTER. I am asking the same question, because I got no reply to my former question. Now I ask the Prime Minister, what is his view as to that, and if he is not bound now, as head of the Government, to explain this clause to the House ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). My view is the view of the Controller of Customs.

Mr. FOSTER. The very same view. They simply read like school boys the words they have placed there.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) does not understand it a bit more than I do.

Mr. McMULLEN. I tell you I do.

Mr. FOSTER. But in the present mood they have great confidence in the Government, individually and collectively. The Prime Minister cannot or will not explain to the House and the country what is the meaning of that clause. His view is exactly the same as the view of the Controller of Customs, and neither of those Ministers attempts to explain the clause. Was ever such a thing heard of in the Parliament before, when a measure was brought before Parliament by a Government ? Ever since constitutional government was the rule, has it not been the bounden duty of the Government to explain its measure before the House is asked to vote upon it ? Has any Government ever before in this House come down and simply out of fear or something that is not even as high as fear, refused to give the House or committee the explanations required, and confined themselves to reading over, just like school boys, the ipsissima verba of the resolution they have submitted. Why, Sir, it never was known in parliamentary history in a country where responsible government existed, that any government ever showed such weakness as to prepare a clause which may have a multiplicity of meanings, and when they come down and submit it for the House to vote on, for the Government to take refuge in silence and persistently refuse to explain the clause. That is the position of this Government to-day. There they stand—no, there they sit, and find refuge in ignoble silence. The Minister of Finance will not take to his feet, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will not stand on his legs, the Minister of Public Works smiles and keeps discreet silence, only two hon. gentlemen do anything, and they rise and pleasantly bow to each other and say your sentiments are my sentiments and my sentiments are your sentiments; and those sentiments they declare to be the ipsissima verba of the resolution. Is the hon. leader of the Government going to put his supporters behind him in a position of sitting silent, refusing to cast a single glimmer of light by way of explaining this clause, when the House wants to know the Government's meaning in regard to it before being asked to vote it through? Hon. gentlemen behind the ministerial seats must be proud of their Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, I knew they would be. With that unbounded faith, with that illimitable confidence they possess, as displayed by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), they show unbounded faith in the Ministers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. They come here to have confidence in the Ministers. Their expectations are from the Ministers, and they must have confidence in them or their expectations will never be realized. But is there not a member behind the Government to-day who has independence enough to rise in his seat and call upon the Government to explain its measure? I have now said all I propose to say in regard to the matter. We cannot force explanations from hon. gentlemen opposite; they take the responsibility of refusing to give explanations. They place themselves upon the records of this House and give themselves to history as the first Government in this country that has refused to explain its measures either through unwillingness or inability to explain. I propose, as I cannot get their meaning, to move an amendment. I move that after the words "are" in the second line of the clause there be inserted the following words:—

Taking into consideration the average tariff rates of this country on the principal products to be interchanged.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have great pleasure in seconding that amendment, and as I am anxious that as little time as possible should be lost, I shall state my reasons briefly. I am certain that every gentleman on the Treasury benches will admit, that in reference to the tariff of the country it is very undesirable to put any law upon the Statute-book which is not easily intelligible to the masses of the people. This resolution No. 16 as brought down by the Government, is now in operation, because, under the practice of this House, as soon as a tariff resolution is tabled it becomes law. I call the attention of the Controller of Customs to the fact that this law is now as much in operation as it is possible it can be at any time, because it does not say, that on some future occasion after some decisions have been arrived at it shall become law, but it says:

Mr. FOSTER.

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be entered for duty—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. "May then."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Minister of Finance does not propose to say that "may" does not mean "shall."

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It means "shall" after the Controller decides.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Consequently, I ask the members of the Government, how was it that the night that this resolution was put upon the Table of the House, instructions were issued to all the collectors in Canada to admit the goods of Great Britain at a reduction of one-eighth. It was for one reason and one reason only, and that was because of the declaration contained in this resolution which at that moment became law, that when the tariff of any country bore a particular relation to the tariff of Canada, that moment the goods of that country were entitled to a reduction of one-eighth; and as there could be no question that that applied to England, which does not meet our goods with a tariff at all, the Government said at once, that it would go into operation in favour of England. That resolution became operative the moment it was laid on the Table, and I hold that every country whose tariff bears the relation to our tariff that this resolution contemplates, is entitled to have its goods entered on precisely the same terms that the Controller of Customs instructed his officers to enter goods from Great Britain. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) had within his knowledge the condition of all the tariffs, and therefore, when the Minister of Finance tabled this resolution which then became law, he (Mr. Paterson) was in a position to give such instructions as in his judgment were necessary to his collectors throughout Canada to carry out the law; and when the tariff of any country was of the kind described in this resolution, he had power to instruct them, that they should admit the goods of that country at this reduction of one-eighth. That is a position which I think hon. gentlemen opposite will admit, is fair and legitimate, because the word, "when," is used and there is no postponing the question for future consideration. I do not intend to elaborate this question further than to again hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will recognize as fully as I do, in justice to the commercial interests of this country, the necessity of removing any possible doubt that could exist. I share the doubt which my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has so emphatically stated to the House, and I, too, am unable to judge what construction the Government give to this clause. It is a matter of vital importance; it is a matter that affects every customs entry of goods from every country that trades with Canada, and yet I am unable to understand what the Government mean by the words:

Which admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff.

After the closest study of this amendment moved by my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), I believe that it embodies practically what the Government intend to carry out, and if it does, it makes the clause more distinct. The amendment is one which the Government may fully accept, because it is calculated to make plainer a matter which is now very hazy. It also renders the clause intelligible, as it should be, to every one who has business with the custom-houses of Canada. The insertion of the words proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Foster):

Taking into consideration the average tariff rates of this country upon the principal products to be interchanged, will make this clause 16 clear, and should be adopted by the Government. Under this amendment the rule to be applied would be: That on the articles that Canada sends into that other country, and on the articles that we receive from that other country, their tariff on the average shall be as favourable to us as our tariff is favourable to them. That amendment will make the clause more easily understood by the masses of the people upon whom this clause bears, and if we are correct in arriving at the conclusion that the amendment expresses the intention of the Government, then the Government may fairly accept it. The Government must admit, that it is most undesirable—and the principle is recognized by all countries and by all Parliaments—it is most undesirable that a tariff law should not be stated in plain and distinct terms, as far as it is possible to do so. It is also very desirable that Parliament itself should know what it is passing upon. I have no doubt that the Governor General in Council, in carrying this clause out, would discharge their duty in what they believed to be the most fair and just manner, but hon. gentlemen opposite will agree with me, that it is against the interests of parliamentary government to throw upon the Governor General in Council the making of a tariff, and to do away with the sanction of Parliament to changes in her fiscal system. I have much pleasure in commending the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) to the Government, in the sincere hope that they will be good enough to accept it.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Mr. Chairman, it is quite evident from the remarks which have fallen from the ex-Minister of Finance and from the leader of the Opposition, that it is not possible to satisfy them. They will not be satisfied. No matter what we explain, or whether we explain or not, they will not exercise their own intelligence or their own judgment. Why, Sir, they complain of everything; they complain even that we are carrying on this Government after constitutional methods. We have my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) complaining, that there are five members of the Government now present in the House, that three of them would not speak, that two spoke, and that one of them spoke to say that the sentiments of the other were his sentiments. So they are. The sentiments of my hon. friend the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson), who spoke on this question, are my sentiments. The views which I have expressed are the views of the Controller of Customs, and they are also the views of the members of the Government who are here to-day. They are the views of all the Government. I know that it is the true constitutional method that there should be unanimity of feeling and sentiment in the Government. But, Sir, that was not the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. They endeavoured to carry on the Government without a unanimity of feeling amongst themselves. They endeavoured, and indeed they succeeded for some time—though the people put a short stop to that work as soon as they had the opportunity—in carrying the Government through a motley of conflicting sentiments and views. At one time we saw seven members of the Government bolt because they did not agree with their leader—and certainly their leader did not agree with them; but they came back again without agreeing any more than they had done before. On another occasion, we saw two of them voting for a motion of censure and the others voting against it. But they did not resign. We do not carry on the Government in that way. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance has endeavoured, in speech after speech, to convey to the House the impression that he is the very reverse of what we know him to be. We know him to be a man of bright intellect. This is no compliment to him; it is only a truth that we all know, especially those who have been long associated with him. But in speech after speech he has endeavoured to make us believe that he is not the bright man we know him to be, but an obtuse man who could not understand plain words of the English language. Here is a section as intelligible as anything that has ever been put before a Parliament, and he has pretended that he does not understand it—that it would almost require a surgical operation to put it into his head. If he would exercise his intellectual powers, however, I think he would conclude that “on the whole” meant “on the whole,” and he has shown us by his amendment that he understands fully what is meant. Here is the language of the section that he wants to have explained to him :

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to—

Then, in such a condition of things, that country will be entitled to come in under the minimum tariff. My hon. friend pretends that he does not understand that. He cannot understand a tariff which has perhaps a little higher duty on one article and a little less duty on another, but which is on the whole on the same level as ours. But he could understand it if we would accept his amendment. What does he move? “Taking into consideration the average tariff rates of this country upon the particular products to be interchanged.” That is to say, my hon. friend could understand it if we would amend this tariff by stating that when the tariff of a country upon the articles we sell to it was on the whole on a level with our tariff on the articles they sell to us. He understands this limited operation, but he cannot understand the higher operation of making a comparison not on a few articles, but on all articles. My hon. friend does not do himself justice. He minimizes his own intellect. If he can make a comparison between certain articles, I ask him simply to extend the operation and make this comparison not only with regard to the articles which we exchange, but with regard to the articles which are to be found in the tariff of this country, and in the tariff of another country. Let me in conclusion repeat to my hon. friend what I had the pleasure of telling him the other day, that we have already gone into this operation; we have looked over the whole globe, and we have found only one country whose tariff, so far as we know, is on a level with ours, and not only on a level, but far more favourable than ours; and therefore we believe our minimum tariff, for the present applies to Great Britain, and to no other country.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend has arisen in connection with this, probably the most important clause in the whole tariff, as the leader of the Government, voicing the explanatory power of the Government on this important matter, and I do not think he rose to the full height of the occasion when he left the matter of business entirely, to throw a taunt to this side of the House about bolting, or disagreements in the Government, or matters of that kind. Does my hon. friend think that was a statesman's answer to the question before the House? That was a sort of fine dust which was thrown to cloud the eyes of hon. gentlemen behind him, but a kind of dust which had no part or lot with the tariff question before us—nothing more to do with it than would a discussion on the archeology of Egypt or Greece. I simply call attention to that to show the way in which the Prime Minister meets arguments in reference to business matters coming before the House. Then, my hon. friend gave me credit for being sometimes keen enough intellectually to see things, and said he would not attribute to me obtuseness in this matter. My hon. friend did me too much credit. I cannot see their meaning through this clause, though I have tried to.

Mr. McMULLEN. You cannot see through our policy either.

Mr. FOSTER. No. My hon. friend has done his party a pretty hard service in that remark. His assertion is as true as anything can be; and I think he might extend it, and say that neither I nor any other mortal man in Canada can see through their policy, it is a creature of such change, and such constant change, of so many kinds of patchwork welded into one, where performance and promise are so widely separated from each other, where pledges are so constantly broken, and where the remnants of a once sturdy independence, supposed to exist in my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), lie scattered about in ruinous confusion.

And so my hon. friend tries to get out of an explanation by saying that I am wilfully confusing the question. No, I am not; I am anxiously wanting to know, for the information of the House and the business interests of the country, just what the view of the Government is with reference to that matter. Have we got anything? I think we have. I think the hon. First Minister made one very important admission, whether he meant to make it or not. He objects to my amendment because he says my amendment limits the application of the clause to articles which may be interchanged between two countries, and restricts the comparison of tariffs to those articles, whereas the Government propose to take the tariffs in gross and to give any country which has an equal or less tariff than Canada's on the whole the benefit of this reduction. That admission is a very important one. That clears the ground, and if we take that as the view of the Government, then my reasoning the other day was correct, that China can come in, that Japan can come in, that every country almost in the world, outside of the most-favoured-nation treaty countries, may come in. For I say if we take the tariff of the Dominion on all articles that we import, the average tariff of these other countries is far and away below the average tariff of Canada upon all goods imported into Canada, so that if that is the gloss my hon. friend puts upon it, if that is to be the method of interpretation to which he pledges the Government, and the Controller of Customs says he will carry that out, then we will have the rule laid down, as explained by the hon. First Minister, that he will take, not simply a part of the articles, but all the articles, and the average tariff upon all those articles of imports in the two countries will rule. Well, that may be the wish or meaning of the Government, but I say that nothing more unfair to Canada in the shape of an agreement could be made than to take that as the rule. Why, three-fourths of the articles which might be on the Japanese tariff might be articles that we would never have any chance of putting into Japan. Nine-tenths of the articles which are on our list of goods that may be imported into Canada might not be articles which come from Japan at all. It is one thing to have a rule, but the justice and righteousness of that rule is another thing, and that would be a most ruinous rule applied to Canada, which would let in, as this rule undoubtedly does, every country in the world outside of the most-favoured-nation treaty countries, which are high tariff countries mostly, and these come in under the most-favoured-nation treaty clause, provision for which has been made by my hon. friend the leader of the Government. At any rate, we have the interpretation at last, the Government is going to take the average of the whole tariff. If they are going to do that, the business men of the country will know to what an unfair pressure they are to be subjected because under that rule, to which the Prime Minister has given his authority, all of these countries can throw their cheap labour products into this country and can do it at 25 per cent reduction over countries which are differently situated.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We have reached a very important stage. After weeks of debate we, for the first time, have had from the Government benches an attempt to construe this clause. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been pressed, they have been implored, in the strongest terms possible, to state to the House what their own view of the meaning of this clause is. Did they do it before? Read the answer which the hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) gave the other night, and say whether you will find in it any such statement as has just been given by the leader of the Government. You will find nothing of the kind. You will find now, for the first time, a new, distinct interpretation given to this clause that I do not believe any member of this House entertained down to the moment the First Minister gave it to the House. Certainly, the Controller of Customs had no such view as has been given by the First Minister. The hon. Controller, the other night, explained that he was going to take the whole gross trade and everything bearing upon it, in order to arrive at a judgment. Here are the words of the clause, which shows the very reverse of what the First Minister has stated:

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada—

This is the statement of the clause, but is not the statement of the First Minister. His statement is that we are to take the tariff as a whole, not limited to the products of Canada—for instance, the tariff of the United States as a whole and the tariff of Canada as a whole, and we are then to decide whether that country comes within the terms of this clause or not. I do not believe there is a member of the hon. gentleman's Administration who has agreed with him or entertains the opinion he has just given as to the meaning of this clause. I say so, because the opinion the First Minister has given is in opposition to all the statements that, during the whole of this discussion, have been elicited by members on the Treasury benches. Why, the hon. Minister told the House that he thought it was quite possible that arrangements would be made under this clause with the United States, which would bring them within its meaning. Does the hon. gentleman not remember that? Does he not remember that the United States was declared by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as one of the countries which, under the arrangement that could be made under this clause, might be brought within the meaning of this clause—that is the reciprocal trade arrangement put into operation? But the First Minister has given a statement directly opposed to every statement made by hon. gentlemen opposite, which proves to the House and the people that the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches either do not understand the subject or are afraid and unwilling to give a fair and candid avowal of the views they entertain as to what this clause means. That is the position, and it is upon this position that the attempt is made to force this clause through the committee, leaving the people of this country—aye, Sir, and the people of the countries that have trade relations with Canada—subject not to a plain intelligible statute, such as should mark the administration of the customs law of every country, but subject to the decision of a Government no two members of which, it appears, agree upon what this clause means or how it shall be interpreted. We have two definitions, utterly diametrically opposed. Read what the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) said in answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), and put that alongside the statement which has just come from the First Minister of this Government, who has declared to the House that it is not at all a question how the products of Canada are treated in any other country, though that is what the clause says. I seconded the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) because, after the most careful study I could give it and what little information we could glean from the statement of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, I assumed, honestly and candidly, that this was what was intended to be meant, and I believe that I arrived at the same conclusion that hon. gentlemen on both sides had arrived at after a long discussion as to what the true meaning of that clause was. But all this is swept away. That amendment, it appears, has no bearing because, though it gives what appears to be a fair interpretation of the clause according to what the Controller of Customs has said, the First Minister has given a definition diametrically opposed to the words of the clause, a meaning which has never been given by any gentleman on the Treasury benches, or in the House on either side as a possible explanation of what the clause might mean. According to the statement of the First Minister the course must be to take the tariff of Canada and the tariff of the United States, or Japan, or any other country and see which is the highest. If the hon. the First Minister is correct, my hon. friend the Controller of Customs need not have kept this House in suspense a single moment, he need not have kept one of his officials throughout Canada in suspense for a single moment; for all he had to do was to look at these tariffs and a cursory glance would show him whether the tariff of this or that or any other country was higher than ours on the whole. According to the First Minister his direction would be to take, for instance the United States tariff. That tariff would be found higher than Canada's tariff, and so that country could not have the benefit of the reciprocal clause. But the tariff of China or the tariff of Turkey would probably show different results. I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite are aware that Turkey is the only country in the world, except Great Britain, that carries out the policy of free trade, and certainly, Turkey must be admitted according to the interpretation of the First Minister, because it is a completely free trade country. Turkey carpets, of course, will at once be admitted with this cut of one-eighth, under the direction of the Controller of Customs. It passes belief that in the nineteenth century, in an intelligent deliberative assembly, like this Parliament of Canada, after discussing this question day after day and week after week, we should only now learn an entirely new construction of this clause, and a construction which, I do not hesitate to say, any one who understands the English language will be obliged to admit is a construction diametrically opposed to the words of the clause, because the clause says that this is a question of duties imposed upon the goods of Canada and not a question of general tariff. I feel that if ever there was a question before this Parliament or before any deliberative assembly in the world in which Parliament and people were entitled to a fair, candid avowal of what was meant by the Government, that is the position in relation to this question we are now discussing. And yet, Sir, having discussed this question day after day, having done our best to draw from the Government some intelligent and intelligible statement of what these words mean, we are now told by the highest authority in the Government, the First Minister himself, that, so far from agreeing, as he has just declared he did, with the Controller of Customs, his views are as diametrically opposed to those of the Controller of Customs as day is opposed to night. It is not creditable to the Government; it is not respectful to Parliament; it is not what Parliament has a right to expect from gentlemen charged with the administration of public affairs, to deal with a question of such vital importance in a manner which certainly is calculated, even after this clause is passed, to leave everybody in this House and everybody out of it entirely in the dark as to what the meaning of the clause is.

Mr CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. SPROULE. One of the most difficult things in life is to secure agreement in the interpretation of law. The ablest jurists frequently disagree as to the interpretation of certain clauses. Even though at the time those clauses were passed it was thought that they were made quite plain, it is often found they are subject to two meanings or to a variety of meanings. Now in statutes of this kind, where it is a matter of such importance, not only to individual interests but to the great interests of the country, that there should be a clear interpretation, it appears to me that if it is possible to use English words that will convey one clear meaning and one only, it surely is right that we should adopt those words in a case of this kind. It is quite clear that there is a diversity of opinion as to the interpretation of this clause. The fact that the greatest minds of this House disagree as to this interpretation is a proof of that; and it seems to me that the Government should be particular at all times, but especially at this time, knowing that there is a diversity of opinion with regard to this interpretation, to amend the clause in such a way that there should be no two opinions with regard to it. I think it is quite possible to use a form of English words that will convey but one meaning in this section. I think it is quite possible to use a variety of phraseology in the English language that will be much plainer than the form used in this case. Were I charged with the duty of ascertaining whether any country has a right to share in the benefits that are offered in this clause, I would naturally ask myself two or more questions.

What would be the first? Well, the first difficulty that appeals to my mind is this, does it mean the average rate of duty upon all goods imported into each country on the dutiable and free list both, is it the average rate of duty according to the value of the goods in the country from which they are imported, including both goods on the free list and goods on the dutiable list? Then, if the average rate of that duty is as low upon the goods exported from Canada as it is on the goods imported from that country into Canada, I would naturally say that that country was entitled to the benefit of this favoured-nation clause. But then I look at it from another direction, and it appeals to me in this way: That it would be equally correct to ask the question and equally appropriate—is it the average rate of duty imposed upon all dutiable goods only? Because upon a portion of goods there is no duty imposed. Now, if we take the average rate of duty upon all imported goods, both dutiable and free, it will necessarily be much lower than if you confine it to the dutiable goods. But you might with equal propriety ask the question: Will this be confined to dutiable goods? Then, if we ascertain that the rate of duty imposed upon dutiable goods going into that country is as low as the rate of duty imposed by our tariff on goods from said country, then would that country be entitled to take advantage of this clause? But we might go further and ask, will it be confined to a limited number of articles only that we exchange with that country on the lines of a reciprocity treaty? Suppose we import from a certain country certain lines of goods, and we find that the rate of duty upon those lines of goods is  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, then, if we take the goods exported from Canada into that country that are dutiable in that country, and if the average rate of duty in that country upon those particular lines is lower than  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, then is that country entitled to that favoured-nation clause? I think we might reasonably ask that question. Now, when it is so plain that these questions may, with propriety, be asked, that there may be three different individuals, each one of whom believes that this is the only proper test for the solution of that question, I say when it is so plain that there is that diversity of opinion and each one might ask the question with equal propriety, does it not behoove the Government to change the language of that clause so as to make it plain, and to make it comprehensible to all? At the very time when we are making the law, if it is shown that the interpretation of that law is obscure and difficult to be understood, now is the time when it should be made plain. We know that many laws are made that create a great deal of trouble afterwards. We know about the Streams Bill law, we know about many other laws that are carried from court to court to get a proper interpretation, until they reach the highest court in the land, and yet judges disagree as to what is the proper interpretation, and as to what was the mind of Parliament at the time the laws were passed. But the question is raised here at the very time when we are making the law; therefore, I say this is the proper time that we should change the law so that there may be no two opinions regarding it. Now, if we can find in the English language words that will make the meaning clear, then I see no reason why we should not, at this time, make the meaning clear. Now, it seems to me that the amendment proposed by the ex-Finance Minister is plainer than the original clause, it reaches the pith of the question, it reaches the kernel, it gives a better interpretation, one that will be better understood by both the exporter and the importer, and that will be more readily understood by the common people. Why should we not, therefore, adopt it? It is not in any way derogatory to the intelligence of the Government that they should accept an amendment that seems to be plainer than the clause they have proposed to the House. I think it is their duty to do so. They ought to be glad that an hon. member of this House has proposed language that will make the clause plainer and more acceptable to the people than the language in which the clause is framed at present, and which, to my mind, to say the least of it, is very ambiguous. I think the Government should adopt this amendment, and let the people know exactly what the clause means, so that it may be read and understood by all alike.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Before this resolution becomes law, I desire to say just a few words with regard to it. In the first place, I do not think that the Government has given that attention to the practical operation of this resolution which it demands. Any person who has had anything to do with the administration of the custom laws of the country, knows very well that there is always enough confusion, enough misunderstanding, in the interpretation of that law itself, without this Parliament adding to it by the enactment of any such law as is embraced in this clause. The 16th clause now before the House is, to my mind, nothing more nor less than an invitation to all the nations of the world whose tariff is, on an average, equal to or below our tariff, or which admits the products of this country on the whole at a rate as favourable as this country to admit the goods of that particular country under the lower tariff. And it is a law in this sense that as soon as it is tabled, it becomes such an invitation, and becomes such a law. Sir, there can be no doubt as to that. Just as soon as this resolution was laid upon the Table of this House, then there was an invitation to all the nations of the world that their products might come into this country on the terms mentioned, or on whatever might be the proper construction of that resolution at the time that it was tabled. Now, if I am right in that contention—and I thoroughly endorse the position taken by the leader of the Government in that behalf—then I wish to point out to the Controller of Customs that if the interpretation put by the leader of the Opposition upon this 16th resolution is correct, that is, that it became law just as soon as it was tabled, then, just as soon as a consignment arrives at any port in this Dominion from any of the countries that have been named, and where it is claimed there is a tariff as low or as favourable to the admission of the products of this country as their's is to the admission of our products, then the collector of the port must take that consignment and must make that entry on the lower basis. And if any question arises as to whether the understanding of the collector is right in that particular, if any question arises as to the admission of that particular consignment under the lower scale, then it becomes the duty of the Controller of Customs to look at subsection "A" of clause 16, which reads :

That any question that may arise as to the countries entitled to the benefits of the reciprocal tariff shall be decided by the Controller of Customs, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council.

In other words, just so soon as any consignment is made at any port of entry in this country, the question will arise, will then be forced upon the collector and upon the Controller of Customs, to interpret the treaty, or, to interpret the tariff of the country from which that consignment comes. There is not a doubt in my mind as to that. The Controller of Customs stated in his place the other night :

It will be my duty—and I will endeavour to discharge the duty as honestly as I can, to ascertain, when applications are made on behalf of those countries, whether their tariffs warrant us in admitting them, and then the question will be dealt with by the Governor in Council in the manner in which I have indicated.

I submit to the Controller of Customs and to the Government, that he cannot wait, he ought not to wait, until application is made through the counsels, or the regular channels by means of which an application would be made for the admission of the products of any particular country into this country under this clause. But I submit further, and warn the Government and the House that if this clause becomes law it will certainly become the cause of endless confusion at ports of entry, if my interpretation be correct. We have at the present time in the administration of the Department of Customs sufficient difficulties, and if this clause is to pass without any explanation upon the part of the Government which is to my mind satisfactory, then we shall have a state of uncertainty created in this country as to what particular nations have the right to come in under the wide meaning of the resolution. Is not this an important matter? I can conceive of no resolution or no law that could be enacted by this Parliament so wide in its meaning which possesses so much importance to the commercial interests as resolution No. 16 which we are now asked to vote on; and I do not hesitate to say that if the followers of the Government swallow this without further explanations than they have received, the meagre information in explanation of it, hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches will have behind them more bolters than ever existed in any Government either here or elsewhere.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is all clear now.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). It is not all clear—it is as clear as mud. It is not clear in any sense, and if I am to take the remarks of the First Minister and compare them with the Controller and other hon. members, it will be found that the hon. leader made confusion worse confounded. I throw out this suggestion as to the very serious difficulty that may arise at ports of entry, as I do not wish to prolong the debate in committee.

Mr. Taylor and Mr. Russell rose together.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has the floor.

Mr. TAYLOR. As the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) is a legal gentleman, and as we desire to obtain some reasons as to why this clause should pass, I will give way and follow him. I should like to hear something said from that side of the House from the legal point of view.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would like to vote intelligently on the amendment which the hon. member for York, N.B., has proposed. I was prepared to vote on the original resolution which I thought I perfectly understood. Now, however, we have an amendment introduced by the ex-Finance Minister, and before voting on that amendment I should like the hon. gentleman to explain it, because it is not entirely clear. I do not know how the hon. gentleman intends the average to be made up, and I should like an explanation from the hon. gentleman as to the way in which he proposes that the section, if it should be amended in the direction suggested by him, should be administered. Suppose the hon. gentleman's amendment became the resolution, and suppose we were asked the question by some foreign country whether it could or not come under the reciprocity tariff, and suppose that the condition of trade was such that we imported from that foreign country almost exclusively some one article on which our tariff rate was very low, but exported to it almost exclusively some one article on which its tariff rate was very high. Yet, notwithstanding all this, suppose that there were other articles on both sides exchanged in such manner that the average rate on the articles, leaving out the element of quantity, was exactly the same—I want to know whether we should be obliged to admit the goods of that foreign country under our low rate or not. The words of this amendment do not state whether the quantities are to be taken into account or not. I consider that the expression “average tariff rates” is a very dangerous term to use. Does it mean the average of the rates on the various articles as shown in the book or the average amount of duty collected on the respective quantities of goods? The amendment presents a very different kind of question to that embodied in the original resolution presented by the Finance Minister. I do not like to vote on the amendment until the ex-Finance Minister has cleared the matter up. It seems to me that he has left it in a very ambiguous form, and the resolution submitted to the House was much clearer and better as it stood. There is a Latin maxim, which I will refrain from quoting, as it is said I am in the habit of quoting Latin, which is to the effect that excessive refinement in the definitions in legal enactments is dangerous. In my opinion it would be very much to be preferred to leave it to the Government to decide each case as it arises on a fair and equitable construction of the clause, leaving the Finance Minister or the Controller of Customs and the Governor in Council to adopt such a decision in each particular case as seems most fairly to carry out the obvious meaning of the clause in view of all the circumstances of the case as I think would have been done under the resolution as introduced. It is far better to leave these matters in the hands of the Controller of Customs, after hearing the arguments pro and con. It would be far better in the actual working out of the tariff resolutions, and of this resolution more especially, that if any importer thinks he has a right to claim the benefit of the clause, he should have the opportunity of arguing his case before the Controller of Customs, who after giving a full hearing to the application should decide it then rather than do so behind the back of the applicant or before his argument was heard.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) is entitled to an answer. I would not follow the bad example given by hon. gentlemen opposite in asking any hon. gentleman to vote for an amendment of mine until he had at least my explanation of it, whether that satisfied him or not. So I intend to give the hon. gentleman as clear an answer as I can with respect to this amendment. But that will not let my hon. friend out of the trouble. There are three points now before this House. One is the resolution itself, which is as indefinite as it well can be. My hon. friend likes the quality of indefiniteness. It is a good thing in some respects, but with respect to tariff clauses the contention made by my hon. friend from Brockville (Mr. Wood) is one which will commend itself to business men in this House and out of it, namely, that with respect to tariff clauses the very object sought to be avoided is indefiniteness, and what is desired is definiteness. The basis of all trouble in administering tariff laws in a country lies in the indefiniteness which, despite the best efforts that can be made to secure clearness and brevity of expression, will creep into the law and will cause it to become the subject of argument and litigation. My hon. friend has no difficulty in regard to a general clause, which makes no attempt at definiteness and which possesses no conditions of certainty. He was willing to vote for that without any information at all. But my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) cannot vote for the resolution now. Why did he not think to ask for information from the leader of the Government as well as from myself.

Mr. RUSSELL. Is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) asking me a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. The reason was, because I was perfectly satisfied with the terms of the resolution as explained by the leader of the Government; but I was not satisfied with the terms of the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), and I certainly could not be expected to ask the leader of the Government to explain an amendment moved by the ex-Minister of Finance.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Russell) cannot get out of it so easily as that. My hon. friend (Mr. Russell) was perfectly satisfied with the text without the gloss; he had the gloss supplied when the leader of the Government declared that what was to be taken into consideration was the average of the whole tariff.

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly. I am like the old gentleman who was reading the Book of Job. He understood the text perfectly, but he had not yet been able to understand the explanatory comments.

Mr. FOSTER. I will not carry out the likeness between my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) and that good old patriarch of ancient times, but there are some striking points of resemblance between my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) and that gentleman.

Mr. RUSSELL. Allow me for a moment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. Before my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) fires off any more questions, we had better get through with these, and then I am willing to answer any more he may wish to ask. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) was perfectly willing to take the resolution without any explanation. It suited him because of its delightful indefiniteness, and he thought in a matter of this kind you should not tie yourself down to definiteness. When the leader of the Government spoke in that unfortunate moment—shall we call it of weakness—he declared he could not take my amendment; and why? Because my amendment confined itself to products which are interchanged between the two countries, and was too narrow, but that what he should take would be the whole of the goods which formed the basis of the trade of the two countries, and take the average tariff upon that whole line of goods forming the articles of trade of the two countries. Now, the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Russell), when he saw that delightful indefiniteness taking to itself wings and flying away under this very palpable and definite limitation, he still found no difficulties. He could vote for the resolution because it was indefinite and he could vote for it still because it was limited by the very definite restrictions which the Prime Minister put upon it. But, when an unfortunate member of the Opposition attempts to put a little restrictive clause on, then all the inquisitiveness of my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) comes out at once, and he cannot contain himself in silence any longer. Well, Sir, I am going to give you the best answer I can with reference to the question he asks me, and then I am going to ask him (Mr. Russell) to tell this House in general, and myself in particular, what he thinks is the meaning of this clause as it stands. I am sure my hon. friend will not keep that intelligence from me when I am so generous as to tell him my views in reference to my amendment. Now, I admit that whatever restrictions you put upon the clause, it will not be devoid of all difficulty. The clause itself is open to every difficulty. Try to make it as definite as you can, you will still have some difficulties left, but the object of this House ought to be to limit indefiniteness as much as possible. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) must take my amendment in connection with the whole clause, because it is meant to be inserted in and read as part of the whole clause. The clause, with the amendment, will read :

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are, taking into consideration the average tariff rates of this country—

That is, "of the any country" referred to above

—taking into consideration the average tariff rates of this country upon the principal products to be interchanged, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be entered for duty at the reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff.

Now, I think that is pretty fully explanatory of itself. It seems to me that it would not be just to take the whole range of tariff articles in each country, because a smaller or a greater number of articles in the commercial catalogue of each country might be articles which they did not interchange and which there was not the remotest chance they would ever interchange. It did not seem to me, therefore, to be fair to take the tariff on articles which could not possibly be the basis of any favourable or unfavourable trade between the two countries, and that, when you came down to the consideration of the tariffs, you should confine your consideration to average tariff so far as you allow that to make up one of the bases of your judgment; but that you should confine that to articles in the two countries which are either at the time interchanged, or in respect to which there was a fair prospect in the mind of the Government that there might be an interchange. My hon. friend (Mr. Russell) raises the difficulty that some of these articles might be imported to a very small extent, having in the one case a very small tariff duty, and in the other case a very high tariff duty, and he says that incongruity might exist in that respect and injustice be done to the country if that were taken as a basis. My hon. friend has listened to the reading of the amendment, and taking the amendment in connection with the resolution it comes as far as I can bring it, to what is the best possible basis that you can go upon. Is it free from all difficulty and trouble? No, I do not say that it is. I say that limit it as far as you possibly can, you will have indefiniteness, but that the amendment brings it down to the most reasonable basis that I think we can get, namely: the average tariff upon the range of articles that are interchanged or interchangeable between the two countries.

Mr. RUSSELL. Nobody that has listened to the explanation can fail to see that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has absolutely missed the point of my question. He has not at all addressed himself to the point of the question.

Mr. MCGREGOR. He does not understand you.

Mr. RUSSELL. Oh, yes; he understands. I will repeat the hypothetical case. Suppose that we send abroad a very large amount of articles of a particular character which bear a very high rate in the foreign tariff, and we import a very large quantity of articles which, under our tariff, bear a very low rate of duty; yet, if you take the whole list of the principle articles which are exchanged, and you find that the average duties are precisely the same, is it not the logical consequence of the hon. gentleman's amendment that we should be obliged to admit all the goods of such a country at the rates laid down in our reciprocal tariff, and still be obliged to send our goods to that country under its tariff, paying enormously high duties? In other words, the point of my question was whether the hon. gentleman, in making up his average, was going to take into account the quantities of the goods exchanged, or only the tariff rates. It seems to me that it is absolutely necessary to say something in his amendment about the quantities as well as the tariff rates on the principal articles exchanged, and until that is done, I do not feel at all bound to vote for his amendment in place of the resolution, which appears to me to be more plain, reasonable and practicable.

Mr. FOSTER. Will not the hon. gentleman be good enough to answer my question?

Mr. RUSSELL. I did not know the hon. gentleman asked any question.

Mr. FOSTER. I asked two. I asked the hon. gentleman if he would give his legal mind to an explanation of what is meant by clause 16, and if he would also apply his legal mind to state what he thinks of the justice of the hon. Prime Minister's illustration.

Mr. RUSSELL. In regard to that, I may say that I am unable to hear what takes place on the front benches on this side of the House as well as on the other side, and I did not hear the Prime Minister's explanation, but I have no doubt that it was given with his usual lucidity and correctness. Speaking about indefiniteness and the desirability of having clauses in a tariff law which are definite and precise, I have been reading some of the expressions used in the tariff laws which were placed on the Statute-book of this country by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House; and though perhaps a little far afield of this narrow point which we are now discussing, yet it may be interesting to the House to learn the kind of legislation which these hon. gentlemen when in power placed on the Statute-book or left there for eighteen years. I notice that they were not at all as sensitive about giving the Governor in Council power when on this side of the House as they have suddenly become since, being transferred to the other side. Then they gave enormous powers to the Governor in Council. I am not arguing that they gave any undue powers, because the Governor in Council is simply a committee of this House which can be made or unmade by the voice of this House. This House gives the breath of life to the Governor in Council, and there can be no action of the Governor in Council which does not depend absolutely on the voice of this House. Therefore, I am not as sensitive as the hon. gentleman now is, but never was before, as to the impropriety of giving powers to the Governor in Council. But when he comes to talk of the indefiniteness of the powers given, I ask his attention to these powers which were given to the Governor in Council by the customs law which existed prior to this session of Parliament:

For transferring to the list of goods which may be imported into Canada free of duty, any or all articles (whether natural products or products of manufactures) used as materials in Canadian manufactures.

I would like to know how any manufacturer, in competing with any rival manufacturer, would know whether at any date any of his materials were to be taxed or untaxed, or admitted at higher or lower rates of duties.

And any such materials transferred to the free list by such Order in Council shall be free of duty of customs for the time therein appointed for that purpose.

It seems to me that there is as much indefiniteness in that as in any of the resolutions before the House. But that was not enough to suit them. They took other powers still. They provided this:

The Governor in Council may interpret,—

That is what he is to do under this resolution. All he can do is to interpret the meaning of this clause which is placed on the Statute-book by this House of Commons. But, under the law of hon. gentlemen opposite, look what he could do:

—interpret, limit or extend the meaning of the conditions upon which it is provided in any Act imposing duties of customs, that any article may be imported free of duty for special purposes, or for particular objects or interests.

What special purposes? What particular objects or interests? Sir, if I had the inordinate analytical powers of the ex-Minister of Finance, his power of finding mare's nests and bugbears, how I could ring the changes on this, how I could excite this House and this country with the idea that the foundations were crumbling beneath us, that the Governor in Council was assuming all the prerogatives of the House of Commons, that the House of Commons was denuding itself of its powers, that the constitution was in danger, that we were erecting a Star Chamber, and all the other exaggerated and shocking terrors which the ex-Minister of Finance and his able co-adjutor the hon. leader of the Opposition with his complete mastery of the superlative, has been able to conjure up.

And may make regulations either for declaring or defining what cases shall come within the conditions of such Act—

Now, listen; is not this perfectly terrifying?

—and to what objects or interests of an analogous nature the same shall apply and extend; and may direct the payment or non-payment of duty in any such case, or the remission thereof by way of drawback, if such duty has been paid.

Why, these are perfectly shocking things. I wonder that when these "monstrous propositions" were offered, somebody on our side of the House, gifted with the capacity of alarming this country with the latent possibilities of danger which were lurking in such provisions, did not rise and protest. And we have been labouring under these things for eighteen years, unconscious of the concealed dynamite that they contained. The hon. gentlemen made one remark comparing my case, which is that of every hon. member on this side of the House, with the case of Job. What a prodigious amount of patience we have been compelled to exercise while hon. gentlemen opposite have been ringing the changes on this proposition so continuously, and repeating the same things over and over again. I counted as many as ten times that one speaker said the same thing. No wonder that the poor old patriarch, if he suffered as much from his advisers as we have suffered from ours on the other side of the House, turned upon them in scorn with the exclamation, "Verily ye are the people; wisdom will die with you."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I just rise to give the House a gleam of light which has visited me while my hon. friend has been speaking. I did not know why the Government had reduced the duty on patent medicines, but I find now that there is a reason. Hon. gentlemen opposite are somewhat selfish. They are all troubled as Job was, and they are going to get their medicines cheaper.

Mr. TAYLOR. When I gave way to the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), I expected that he would reply to the argument made by the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) as to how this resolution affected the preferential treaties made by England with other countries. I fully expected that the hon. gentleman had risen for that purpose; but I listened in vain for a word from him in contradiction to the statements made by the hon. senior member for Halifax. This House has waited patiently, day after day, to hear some legal gentleman on that side of the House rise to refute the arguments made by the legal gentlemen on this side of the House; but not one has attempted to do so, except the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), who spoke first and gave his interpretation of this clause in its bearings upon those treaties. We have heard something from some of the business men on that side of the House, and I purpose saying a few words from the point of view of a layman or business man, particularly as the hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Frost) has spoken on the subject, and also the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers). Both these gentlemen reside in constituencies adjoining mine, in which there are electors who vote for each of us, and no doubt these gentlemen will send copies of their speeches to some of the electors living in my constituency. I purpose dealing with them for a few moments, and shall then proceed to deal with the question before the House. The hon. member for North Leeds made this statement:

In 1894, we saw in one line of goods, and the seventh largest industry in Canada, the agricultural implement business, the duties reduced from 35 to 20 per cent, and it threw out of work one thousand men in that industry alone, who either had to go into other lines and trades to make a living, or leave the country altogether.

There you have the statement of the hon. member for North Leeds, that in 1894 the Government then in power, because it reduced the duties on agricultural implements from 35 to 20 per cent, drove a thousand workingmen out of the country to seek a living elsewhere. I would ask my hon. friends to apply that same argument to the reductions of duties in the tariff brought down by this Government, and would ask him if in consequence of those reductions foreign goods are not going to come in here and drive out our workingmen.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Do not be afraid.

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. friend is an importer and not a manufacturer. He wants to import foreign goods and make his profit out of them, and he is not particularly interested in the workingmen.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I have a good many more men working for me than you have.

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. friend made a practice the other night, when I was speaking, of interrupting me. If he purposes speaking on this question, he will have the opportunity when I get through. He will then have the opportunity of speaking for the workingmen of Hamilton and explaining to them how this tariff is going to satisfy them.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). They are perfectly satisfied.

Mr. TAYLOR. They are better satisfied under the second edition of the tariff, and we may get a third edition to-morrow which will satisfy them still more. But it is not the free trade revenue tariff which my hon. friend advocated when running his election. It is practically the old National Policy tariff we have to-day.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). My hon. friend is very much mistaken when he says I advocated anything at any election. My constituents elected me without my saying a word to them.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then my hon. friend was sent down here by his electorate not to advocate any policy, not even the policy of the Reform party, but simply to act on his own good judgment, confident that he would look after their interests. The hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Frost) said also:

If you will look at the Trade Returns, you will find very few goods such as we manufacture in this country, that you will get from those countries under the lower tariff, would be a decided benefit to the consumers of Canada.

There we have another argument from the hon. gentleman in contradiction to the one he uttered a few moments afterwards, when he said the lowering of the tariff by the Government of 1894 drove a thousand workingmen out of the country. Then if this tariff does admit foreign goods the consumer will get the benefit if the workingmen are driven out. I shall not pursue his remarks further but just refer to the statement of my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Rogers). He said :

When this National Policy was inaugurated, times were dull and business at a low ebb.

When was that? That was in 1878 when our hon. friends opposite were in power and after they had been running the country for several years on a revenue tariff. Then, he continued :

The farmer paid as high as 12 per cent for his money.

What does he pay to-day? But in these times when the country is at a low ebb owing to its having been run by the gentlemen now in power on a revenue tariff at 17½ per cent.

I will now just occupy a few moments with the resolution before us. Resolution No. 16 reads as follows:—

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be entered for duty, or taken out of warehouse for consumption in Canada, at the reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff set forth in Schedule "D."

When these resolutions were tabled, hon. gentlemen opposite came down with a great flourish of trumpets and called this a preferential tariff, but to-night we do not hear the word "preferential" used. They now call it "reciprocal," it is open to the world, although the First Minister said, when these resolutions were introduced, that he had looked over the whole world, and saw that England was the only country that could take advantage of them. But to-night he comes down with a different statement and gives an interpretation that has never been given before. He says that the Government will take the Canadian tariff, as a whole, and the tariff of a foreign country as a whole. If the average of the Canadian tariff is to-day 19 per cent, then, when we come to compare that with other tariffs, the question will not be one for the Controller to settle or the Governor in Council, but for the courts to settle. It will be for the courts to settle whether the tariff of a foreign country is as low on the whole as ours is or not. What are the tariffs of foreign countries? The hon. leader of the Opposition pointed to the tariff of Turkey which is a free tariff. Will not the manufactures of Turkey come into Canada and compete with the manufactures of Canadian labour, and what about China and Japan and Belgium and Germany? Leaving aside the question whether treaties made by England with foreign countries affect us or not, we will have to come down to the legal question whether the tariff of a foreign country is as low as the Canadian tariff. The hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) made a statement the other night to the effect that what had been said by the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) with regard to foreign countries coming in under this reciprocal tariff would be taken by these countries and pointed to as proof that they were entitled to come in. What does that argument amount to? If the law says they are allowed to come in, they will come in, regardless of the arguments of the ex-Finance Minister, regardless of the arguments of the Premier of this country. And if foreign countries do come in, as they will if this becomes law, if their tariff is lower than ours, what will become of the labouring men of Canada? If the labouring man of Canada is compelled to compete with labour that can be secured in some of these foreign countries at from 10 to 15 cents per day what is to become of him? The hon. member for North Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost) said that the Prime Minister made no promise to him or to any manufacturer in this country as to what would be done with regard to the tariff if he came into power. I accept the hon. member's statement that the Prime Minister did not promise him anything. But I know he came to Gananoque and made a solemn promise to Mr. R. R. Johnston, foreman of one of the establishments there—

An hon. MEMBER. Question.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will state the question. I tell the Prime Minister to his face that he made a solemn promise to Mr. R. R. Johnston and to his brother-in-law Mr. C. K. Wright, who was with him at the time—and these gentlemen will make a statement of the facts. They said they had always been Liberals and had always supported the Liberal party, but could not do so in this election on account of the policy of the party in favour of a revenue tariff, which would interfere with their industry. And the Prime Minister said to them: Stand by your party, and if we are successful I will guarantee you that the tariff on your industry will not be interfered with. Consequently these two young men stood by their party, but now they find their wages cut from 10 to 25 per cent owing to reductions in the tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. TAYLOR. If hon. gentlemen want to get the question carried to-night, I hope that there will be no more interruption. I can talk until 12 o'clock if necessary, and will if my hon. friends interrupt me.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, it is not carried; you do not know that it will be carried. I see that this resolution exempts certain goods. It specifies, "The reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff set forth in schedule "D." And schedule "D" says:

Provided, however, that these reductions will not apply to the following articles, but such articles shall in all cases be subject to the duties mentioned in Schedule "A," namely:—Wines, malt liquors, spirits, spirituous liquors, liquid medicines, and articles containing alcohol; sugar, molasses and syrups of all kinds, the product of the sugar-cane or beet-root; tobacco, cigars and cigarettes.

Now, I would ask my hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) why he wants to create in this country a monopoly of the whisky distillers, the brewers, the sugar refiners, and the tobacco manufacturers. He will allow every industry in the country to be slaughtered by foreign competition, but he will not allow whisky or beer or tobacco or sugar to be interfered with. He exempts them by this clause.

Mr. SPROULE. He regards these as the necessaries of life.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, and he puts a tax on the poor man's whisky and tobacco, but he lets the rich man's champagne free. I think, Mr. Chairman, all the words of the resolution after the word "that," should be struck out and the following inserted. If the Government will do this, hon. gentlemen on this side will say that the Government stands up for the interests of the country:

All articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of Canada, or all articles that Canada can grow, produce or manufacture, and which are required for the use of the population of Canada, should be grown, produced and manufactured in Canada. That the tariff should be made more defensive than it is at present, so that in times of depression in other countries which grow, produce and manufacture similar articles, or in countries that can employ labour at from 25 cents per day and upwards to grow, produce and manufacture such articles, cannot import them into Canada to compete with the labour of Canada, whether it be on the farm, in the factory, workshop or the private home of the labourer, or whether such labourer be the skilled artisan or the sewing girl, the lumberman, the miner, fisherman, sailor, railway man, merchant, manufacturer or farmer, and that on such articles required for the use of the people of Canada and which cannot be grown, produced or manufactured in Canada, the tariff be made at as low a rate of duty as the required revenue of the country will permit.

And that, so soon as the treaty objections are removed, preferential rates of duty should be given to England and her colonies on such articles as they produce, provided England gives the products of Canada preferred rates by charging a duty to foreign countries on such articles as Canada and the other British colonies can supply.

If the Government will introduce that amendment and put it in place of this resolution, it is true it might be gall and wormwood to some hon. gentlemen who have been crying for free trade—yet they stand with the Government and support them in maintaining practically the old tariff. My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) said in his speech the other day, though he votes with the Government, that he did not think they did right in taking the duty off corn, that they should have held it as a whip over the Yankees so as to get lower duties on some other products of the farm, barley or something else. Still, he has faith that this resolution, whatever it means, will work out for the benefit of the farmer, and therefore he is prepared to support it. He says that, this Government has not done much yet for the farmers. What have they done? They adopted the farmers' tariff as they found it, except that they have put corn on the free list and that is not quite satisfactory to my hon. friend from Frontenac, but he is willing to go it blind and support this party hoping that some good will come of it all. If this resolution goes into effect, and is to be interpreted as the Prime Minister says, by taking an average of our tariff and of the tariff of any foreign country and admitting at preferential rates the goods of these countries that are on the average as low as ours, labourers will be few and far between in this country. We have China and Japan with cheap labour, adopting modern machinery and preparing to make every article made in the country; and we have a line of steamers going from Vancouver to these countries; and my hon. friend from British Columbia (Mr. Prior) who, perhaps, will speak before this debate is over, will tell you what these countries are doing in getting ready to make goods for this market. If their goods come in under a 25 per cent reduction, what will be the effect upon the farmers and workingmen of this country? My hon. friend from Frontenac knows what the city of Kingston is as compared with what it was from 1873 to 1878, when the farmers of Frontenac used to bring their goods to Kingston and then to Gananoque. But see what population has grown up under the National Policy, making a home market for his constituents, though he says that the National Policy has done him no good. Well, I believe that if this tariff goes into effect, three-fourths of the constituents that he represents will say to him next time, We don't want you to go down there to represent us, and we will send a man there who will support a tariff that will protect not only the farmers, but every article that can be made in this country, thus employing labour at home, because the labourers are the farmers' best customers.

Mr. DAVIN. I was glad to-night to hear the Prime Minister on this subject, and also to hear the hon. and learned gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Russell). Now this last hon. member, in a clever speech, emphasized the need of a clear interpretation of this clause; and although he rose to ask a reasonable question from the ex-Finance Minister as to the meaning of his amendment, he sat down refusing to give an interpretation of the meaning of the 16th clause. Sir, it is a pity that the hon. and learned gentleman did not do that, because he is an able man, and he has great power of exposition, but still he shrank from attempting to explain what seems to be unexplainable. For this clause might be described as tuberculated, it is a chameleon, it presents one character to one observer and another character to another observer. We have had two or three debates upon this clause, and we have had attempts from the followers of the Government to interpret the clause, and every man of them has given a different interpretation. The Prime Minister sticks to the position that it only means preference for England. He has looked abroad over the whole world, and he does not see a country to which it can apply except England. Well, if he has looked over the whole world and examined their tariffs, it would not be unbecoming in him to give the House the results of his examination. Then we had one of the Patron followers of the hon. gentleman, who told us that he supported this clause because it was the embodiment of the 9th plank of the Patron platform, which meant reciprocity with the entire world. Now, my hon. friend from Halifax gave us no bad piece of debating, but still he could not escape from the habit of a lifetime, it was after all a piece of special pleading. He quoted sections 245 and 248 of the Customs Act. Can he point to a single feature in either section which gives the Governor General in Council anything that is not a strictly executive act to do? Everything in these two clauses is strictly executive. But what we complain of is that this clause in the tariff gives the Controller of Customs legislative power.

Mr. RUSSELL. I did not say that everything contained in the clause I cited was executive. I think when the Governor General in Council would be interpreting a clause they would be performing an executive function, which would be very much like a judicial function. But when they are extending and limiting the meaning, and applying the clauses to analogous cases, they are certainly performing legislative functions.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman's explanation does not seem to me to take one whit from the proposition that I laid down. Clause 245 provides that the Governor General in Council may make regulations for slaughtering cattle and grinding corn in bond—that is executive; coasting trade and inland navigation—that is executive; appointing officers to ports of entry—that is executive.

Mr. RUSSELL. In section 248 you will find legislative functions.

Mr. DAVIN. At this moment I am in the same position as the hon. gentleman himself. He said he wanted to vote intelligently on this section, and that is my desire. I take section 248:

The Governor General in Council may interpret, limit or extend the meaning of the conditions upon which it is provided in any Act imposing duties of Customs, that any article may be imported free of duty for special purposes, or for particular objects or interests.

Will my hon. friend maintain that that is legislative? That is strictly executive, because it gives power under exceptional circumstances to the Governor General in Council to depart from a law that has been made and defined by this House.

And may make regulations either for declaring or defining what cases shall come within the conditions of such Act, and to what objects or interests of an analogous nature the same shall apply and extend, and may direct the payment or non-payment of duty in any such case, or the remission thereof by way of drawback, if such duty has been paid.

That provides that when this House has legislated and declares what its tariff shall be, afterwards, in special cases, in order to meet exceptions that must arise in the administration of any law, then the Governor in Council may deal with those exceptions. That is not legislative, that is making no general law. My hon. friend said he wanted to quote a maxim of law, and I expect the maxim of law that he wanted to quote was the Latin maxim which says, that is certain which can be rendered certain. Now, may I ask if this clause can be rendered certain? Here is a clause that we are asked to pass, and hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House have given to us various interpretations, therefore, will any man say that this is a clause that can be rendered certain? What we mainly object to is that it gives power to the Controller of Customs to legislate for Canada. Now the Prime Minister the other night, in reply to the member for York, took the statutory declaration that we are all familiar with, and said that contained the same principle as this clause. I was surprised to hear that proposition laid down by the Prime Minister. Now, what is that statutory declaration? Every article is there defined, it mentions one article after another, and states that if at any time the United States will admit such articles free, or admit them at a lower rate of duty, Canada will do the same. But here is an undefined power given to the Controller of Customs and the Governor in Council, that leaves the people of Canada and this House completely at sea as to what shall be in the future the tariff of this country. Why, Sir, the Prime Minister tells us at this hour of the day, after that clause has been before the country for so long a time, that even now he has looked all the world over, and that it can apply only to England. Although when the clause was first tabled here we had an hon. member, not the highest authority as a statesman, but a very high authority on financial questions, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, tell us that it did not apply to England alone, but applied to other countries as well. So we are fairly in a position to ask hon. gentlemen to give us that interpretation which will enable us to vote intelligently on this question. I am in the same position, I repeat, as my hon. friend who spoke last. My desire is to vote intelligently, and desiring to vote intelligently, I am very anxious that we should obtain something clearer than we have yet obtained from hon. gentlemen opposite; or, to quote a remark that fell from the hon. and learned member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), the commentary has placed us in a more confused position than when we had only the text. The hon. gentleman has given us no enlightenment, while the Prime Minister has told the committee that this clause applied to the whole tariff of a country. The clause reads as follows:—

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff. * * * *

That is susceptible of this interpretation; the products of Canada on terms which on the whole tariff, or on the whole dutiable goods; or on the whole of the goods imported from Canada are as favourable. Here are three interpretations. Yet hon. gentlemen tell us they have the patience of Job to listen to hon. members on this side of the House when criticising this clause, when the way we have been treated is this, that from the moment the resolution was tabled, although we have heard some rhetoric and had speeches delivered by some of the first men in the Liberal party, not a member until the Prime Minister rose, attempted to define the clause. Hon. members on this side of the House may be excused, great as is our admiration of the Prime Minister, if we have not the unbounded faith, shall I say, the boundless credulity of the hon. member for Halifax? The hon. gentleman declared that although he had not heard the Prime Minister, he was quite certain the hon. gentleman was correct, that his speech would be full of meaty exposition and delivered with the usual lucidity of the Prime Minister; but we, whose 'raison d'être' is to criticise the tariff, may be excused for not having boundless faith in the speech of the Prime Minister. Then there is the question whether taking the goods of another country, the clause means the whole of the dutiable goods, or the whole of the goods imported. The Prime Minister tells us to-night that it is on the whole goods. If it is on the whole goods of a country that should seek reciprocal favours from Canada, then all the criticism passed on the clause by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) is perfectly justified, for if there ever was a clause that could not be rendered certain, it is this clause now under consideration.

Certum est quod certum reddi potest.

We have had the interpretation of a statesman and the speech of the hon. and learned member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), and neither has helped us.

I ask the attention of the committee to one or two points in connection with this clause. In looking at the speeches delivered on Friday evening, and turning to column 3,083 of "Hansard," I find the committee was told by the Prime Minister, referring to the remarks made by the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace):

He did not attack the resolution on its merits; he did not say it was wise or unwise in its terms, but he attacked it on account of the consequences to which he said it might lead.

If an hon. member wants to attack a resolution on its merits, he cannot do it in a more pointed way than by showing the disastrous results to which it must lead. My hon. friend, therefore, must have discussed the resolution on its merits. But my hon. friend has discussed it to-day in its details, and has come to the conclusion that its terms are unwise. Let me quote from column 3,122 of "Hansard," where a statement is made to which I have already referred. This was made by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers). He said:

My hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Clancy) asked me some question about the stand I was taking in this matter. Well, Sir, one of the planks in our platform is reciprocal trade on fair and equal terms between Canada and the world. That is the ninth plank of the platform.

That hon. gentleman proceeded to say that this is the reason why he supports this clause, although we are told again and again that it only gives a preferential tariff to England. When we find hon. gentlemen taking such different views of this chameleon-like clause, I think I may be permitted to quote a chestnut, which is sometimes better than a fresh story. An old farmer and his son on a dark night went to look for the family cow, which it was thought had wandered along the banks of a river.

The old man took one side and the son the other side of the river. The old man cried out I have found the tracks of the cow. The son cried out he had found the tracks of the cow. The father then said: My son, let us return, because on this dark night it is no use hunting for a cow that makes tracks on both sides of the river. Why should hon. gentlemen opposite ask this committee to vote for a clause which can make tracks on two sides, and puzzle so many people? My hon. friend behind me (Mr. Clancy) asked the Controller of Customs a question, and it was a pertinent question, and I wish to call attention to the answer given by the Controller. My hon. friend asked respecting goods coming into this country that did not have their origin in Britain. He put a similar case to that presented by the hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Frost). That gentleman indicated, as I understand him, and I think his reported speech will bear me out, that goods would be imported under this particular clause that were manufactured in the United States, sent across the Atlantic by reason of cheap freight rates, and then brought here from England. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) said:

The hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Frost) this evening said very boastfully that the consequences of a policy of this kind would be that England would be the road by which the products of the United States would reach Canada; they would go from the United States to England in a partly finished condition, and would finally be imported into Canada. Now, England does not produce raw material. England imports raw material, some of it in a raw state, some of it in a greatly advanced stage of manufacture, and I desire to ask whether the meaning of this resolution is that no matter in how advanced a state of manufacture material may be brought into England, it may come into this country under the preferential clause. Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to answer me that question?

This is what the Controller of Customs said in reply:

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). We shall have to be guided by the law—articles of growth, produce or manufacture of the country.

Mr. CLANCY. I have pointed to a case in which an article might be the growth of the United States and have been in part manufactured in the United States and then have been sent to England and finished there, and from England sent to Canada. Would such a case come within the clause, or does the hon. gentleman intend to place any limit? The reason I ask is this: Goods may be made in part in Germany, and England may be made the back-door through which the manufactures of Germany and France and every other country may be sent to Canada. Business men will be shrewd enough to take advantage of a clause open to a construction of that kind, and the consequence will be that any country in the world may send its goods to England in an advanced stage of manufacture, have them finished in England, and stamped as English goods, and then send them into Canada at the reduced rate. I ask the hon. Minister again if he proposes to put any limit to meet such cases?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Regulations will have to be made under which these goods will be imported, and the exporter will have to conform to those regulations. The hon. gentleman is supposing a case. He thinks the goods will be partly manufactured in the United States and then completed in England and stamped in England and then shipped to Canada. I do not expect that at all, nor do I think the hon. gentleman expects it.

Now, the Controller of Customs will see that he did not answer my hon. friend's question, and the same point was raised to-day by my hon. friend from London (Mr. Beattie). I wish to ask the Controller of Customs will he, or has he already, made arrangement in respect to goods partly or wholly the manufacture of Germany, but coming to us as British exports? What will he do in a case like that, or what has he done already?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). As I understand, under the law, any goods that are the bona fide manufacture of Great Britain will be admitted. If goods come in under a colourable pretext, steps will be taken to keep them out.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend (Mr. Beattie) pointed out how difficult that would be. He took the case of Irish linen which, it seems—and it is a very Irish thing to happen—is manufactured in Germany and sent here. What would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) do in regard to these so-called Irish linens, that are manufactured in Germany and sent over to England, and through England to Canada?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. I will have to take steps as I told the hon. gentleman just now. I will have to make regulations and use what means we have in order to do it.

Mr. DAVIN. Has my hon. friend given instructions to the customs officers in this matter?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. As definite instructions as will be given have not yet been given. There will be more definite instructions when the Tariff Bill becomes law.

Mr. DAVIN. But the tariff is law now. I just rose for the purpose of contributing my small quota to the elucidation of this clause. In fact, I would not have spoken were it not for the remarks of my hon. and learned friend from Halifax (Mr. Russell) which very much interested me; it was bright, it was specious, but it was fallacious, as I have shown. Now, Mr. Chairman, I cannot help feeling that after all we are still in the same fog as to what is the exact significance of this clause. Hon. gentlemen opposite are under a complete misapprehension, if they think they are acting on the same principle as the statutory offer in the statutory clause. That is definite; this is indefinite, and the definite and indefinite are as opposite as black and white, and you cannot say that the same principle is behind a clause which provides definitely for what shall be done, and behind a clause which leaves everything vague and indefinite. We are wandering in the fog; we are going into a financial Serbonian bog if we follow in the line marked out for us by the Government.

Amendment (Mr. Foster) negatived.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The question is now on the main motion.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the main motion passes I desire to emphasize the position of gentlemen on this side of the House by moving another amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend audibly smiles, but probably there are considerations which are grave enough to make even him smile less audibly at the principle which is involved. That principle with reference to which I move the amendment is, the handing over virtually to a member of the Government, and by Order in Council—if even an Order in Council is to be used—the power of making what are the full equivalents of commercial treaties with any country in the world. It is provided here—and there is no distinction of countries—that when any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to, then, through the machinery which is provided—which, according to the explanation of the Controller of Customs, is by way of report of the Controller of Customs to Council, and an Order in Council—then the goods of that country may be admitted into this country at a reduction in the ultimate of 25 per cent. That I say is virtually the power of making commercial treaties with any country, in the world within the limits of a reduction of 25 per cent on the duties in the general tariff of Canada. That is not limited to any country with which Great Britain may have most-favoured-nation treaties at all. But by Order in Council commercial arrangements partaking of the nature of a treaty could be made with any country with which Great Britain might have treaties involving obligations of an Imperial nature. I am not going to make an extended argument on this point. I am simply going to say this much, that when the Prime Minister the other day endeavoured to destroy the force of my argument by citing the statutory clause with reference to the United States, he did not destroy it—he strengthened it. There is no rule but has its exceptions. Government is not a matter simply of cast-iron rules; and every principle, which is acknowledged and acted upon by Parliament and Government, has occasionally to meet with exigencies and contingencies requiring that principle to be relaxed. But a slight relaxation, or even a large relaxation on definite and unknown grounds, is a triumphant vindication of the general principle, and is not at all to be argued from as derogatory to the principle. With reference to that statutory offer, does not my hon. friend know, in the first place, that Parliament was dealing with a condition of circumstances which had actually been tried in a treaty extending from 1854 to 1866; that it was with reference to a country with which we had had an experimental treaty, in which every product was definitely mentioned and had been discussed in this Parliament over and over again; and a treaty which this House was willing and anxious should be put into operation again at any time on the same lines? How different that is from handing over to the Government the power to negotiate a commercial treaty with China, with Japan, with any country in the wide world, the details and the conditions of trade with which this Parliament has never had experience of, and has never set itself even seriously to consider. So I say on that ground the argument adduced by my hon. friend is not good at all, that because the statutory offer was passed, and could be put into operation by an Order in Council, therefore the making of an entirely new commercial treaty with an entirely new country was a thing which ought to be taken from Parliament and handed over in the gross to a committee of Parliament consisting of the Cabinet of the country for the time being. I instance this case. Even when we were making a most limited commercial treaty with France, involving but a few articles, and not of the greatest importance, either by way of trade or revenue, the Government did not think of asking to be empowered to negotiate and put in force a treaty with France on terms which it might think favourable to Canada. The power which the Government asked, and which Parliament gave, was simply the power to negotiate, and afterwards to bring the results of the negotiations before the House and submit them in their detailed form to the arbitrament of Parliament. I have stated also that on several occasions delegations went to Washington to arrange if possible for a limited trade with the United States; but no Government ever asking or thought of asking from any Parliament, and certainly no Parliament would have granted, the power to go to Washington to arrange even the best commercial treaty we could get for Canada, and to put it in force, without asking the assent of Parliament to its details. But much farther afield are the Government going at the present time—a Liberal Government, and Liberals are being asked to support them in their request—in asking, without giving details, without specifications of articles, and with nothing to report, that they should be authorized to arrange a drop of 25 per cent in existing duties with any and every country under the sun, without asking the assent of this Parliament to the details in any particular. They are asking Parliament to give up that most sacred and most prized right that Parliament has possessed since it has had an existence—to abnegate that function which is not only a proper but a safe function to be left in the hands of Parliament. With these few remarks, in trying to give briefly the arguments which have been more fully stated at other times, I desire to move this amendment :

That after the word "may" in the fifth line, these words be inserted : "after Parliament has given its sanction thereto."

The object and purport of that is that if the Government, in the interim, after examination, thought it would be advantageous to allow China, Japan, the South American States, or any other country in the world to have access to this country for its trade at the reduction of 25 per cent on existing rates, they should make their investigations and make the tentative arrangement, but should come to this Parliament and ask Parliament to sanction the details. Is that more than Parliament should ask? Is it anything that Parliament ought not to ask? Is it anything that any Government ought to refuse to give to a constitutionally-formed Parliament such as this?

THE MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think that those who listened to the hon. Prime Minister a few days ago when he instanced the case of the standing offer as part of the National Policy of 1879, will have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that as a matter of principle there is no possible difference between that offer and the offer which is made in the resolution now before the House. In matters of constitutional government and principle there are no questions of degree. The question of principle is the same, and if the principle of constitutional government is violated by this resolution, then I shall be prepared to show that it was violated in a much larger degree by the resolution which hon. gentlemen opposite incorporated in the tariff Bill of 1879, and which is commonly called the standing offer. When my hon. friend says that we are proposing to take power to change the duties and make them higher or lower at will, he is of course exceeding the limits of discussion, because my hon. friend is well aware that the power of the Government in this matter is strictly limited. It is limited in this respect, that by the general tariff it is not proposed that this or any Government shall, by executive action, have power to raise the duties beyond the limits fixed in that tariff, and the rates of duty we may apply under the reciprocal tariff are also clearly fixed, so that the power which it is proposed by this resolution to give the Government is simply a power confined between the two limits, namely, not to raise beyond the duties in the general tariff, and not to reduce lower than the rates fixed in the reciprocal tariff. My hon. friend said we opened the doors to an abuse of power. He repeated with emphasis what he said in a previous discussion. In that discussion he used these words :

Well, Sir, what is the proposition here? The proposition is that when Parliament has fixed a revenue after carefully looking over the advantages and disadvantages, when Parliament has fixed the rates of duty and then fixed the expenditures, a Cabinet of thirteen men shall have the power placed in its hands—it asks for it and proposes to get it through its majority—to diminish these revenues so far as the imports go, by 25 per cent of the whole, which totally disarranges the financial basis, turns a surplus into a deficit or adds to a possible deficit many thousands of dollars, may be many millions of dollars. Now, I say that no Finance Minister, no Parliament, can see its way clear and take its steps carefully and prudently under such conditions, such unknown and contingent conditions as these. This disarranges the whole basis of the finances of the country by giving up to the Cabinet what Parliament always keeps in its own hands and jealously guards.

Let us make a comparison between the possible effect, for it is only a possible effect, of the resolution as it now stands, and the possible effect of the standing offer in the tariff of 1879, if we were proposing that standing offer to-day, taking in both cases, as the basis of comparison, the trade of last year. The hon. gentleman talks about the uncertainty of this matter. Well, if there are uncertainties—and I think there are not so many as the hon. gentleman imagines—there are also some certainties. In the first place, it is certain that this proposal is intended to extend the preferential rate to Great Britain. There can be no doubt about that. That was announced in the Budget speech and carried out in every custom-house in Canada the following morning and is being carried out to-day. There is another certainty in the matter. It is certain that this does not extend to the United States. Nobody pretends to say that it does. Unquestionably if the United States were to change their tariff and reduce it to the level of ours, they would come under the operation of this clause, but no sane person imagines they are going to do that right away.

I find that in 1895-96 our total imports for home consumption amounted to $110,587,480. If we deduct the imports from Great Britain, $32,979,042, and the imports from the United States, $58,574,024, we have left $19,033,714 as our total imports from all other countries except the United States and Great Britain—that is from all countries to which these possible uncertainties might apply. We find also that upon this $19,000,000 worth of imports from the world at large, exclusive of Great Britain and the United States, there was collected a duty amounting to $5,092,530. Now, what is the uncertainty that we could possibly have to confront between this date and the next meeting of Parliament? The full one-quarter cannot be taken off before the next meeting of Parliament but only one-eighth of the duty, so that if we can imagine it possible that this policy is all wrong and rash, Parliament, which will be in session in a few months, will then have the opportunity of preventing the Government from pursuing this rash and dangerous course, if it be such. Therefore, all that we have to deal with at present is what may happen between now and the next meeting of Parliament. I am assuming that every country in the world, except the United States—Great Britain, of course having now the advantage of the resolution—should come in and avail itself of it. If the worst that the hon. gentleman mentions can happen, or the best, as he may consider it, what will we then have to face? We would be dealing with countries which last year only sent us $19,000,000 worth of goods on which the duty amounted to a little over $5,000,000. Divide that by one-eighth, and you will find that the utmost that could possibly happen, if all the countries of the world were to take advantage of that clause, would be to diminish the duties between now and the next session of Parliament, which we might otherwise receive, by the amount of $636,566. That is the worst or the best, as the hon. gentlemen may consider it, that could happen if every country in the world should come in and place itself within the operation of that resolution.

Let us now see what would be the effect of the standing offer of 1879 of hon. gentlemen opposite, if we had embodied that in our tariff instead of the resolution which they call in question. I have here a list of the goods embraced in that standing offer, and I find that on these goods which we imported last year from the United States, there was paid a duty amounting to $1,722,757, so that if we were to incorporate the standing offer of hon. gentlemen opposite in our tariff to-day, we would be giving the Executive Government the power of throwing away that amount of duties, whereas the utmost we could lose, if this resolution should be availed of by every country in the world, would be only $600,000. Therefore, if this proposition be one which strikes at the foundation of parliamentary government, which opens the door widely to a disarrangement of our fiscal system, which gives up parliamentary control to this enormous degree, which allows us to face the possibility of a large increase in our deficit or a large diminution of our surplus as the case may be, all these horrible possibilities which the hon. gentleman points out would be increased threefold, if we adopted instead the standing offer which the hon. gentleman placed in the resolutions of 1879. All these alarming possibilities which the hon. gentleman points out would be multiplied three-fold, if, instead of this proposition, we had before us the standing offer which he placed in the statutes in 1879.

That, Sir, was the only point I rose to make, but since I am on my feet, I would like to add a statement which, I think, will not be without interest, a statement of the value of our trade with these countries of which we have heard so much—the countries that have favoured-nation treaties with Great Britain. I have here a statement showing the imports from every country—there are twenty of them—with which Great Britain has a treaty containing a most favoured-nation clause. It will be interesting to see the great dangers we are opening ourselves to by admitting goods coming from these countries. First, there is the Argentine Republic. We actually imported from that country last year $936 worth of goods. True, we did not get much duty, for they were all free goods. I find that there is a favoured-nation treaty with Austria-Hungary. From that country we imported $203,713 worth of goods the duty collected upon which was $58,306.88. Belgium comes next, and it is one of the countries with which we have a most-favoured-nation treaty. The amount of imports was $920,758, the duty collected being $192,457.64. Then there is Bolivia. Think of the terrible thing that would come upon us if we were to open our markets to Bolivia, which did not send anything. Chili, Colombia, Costa Rica, Liberia, Madagascar, Morocco, the Sandwich Islands and Tunis, every one of which has a most-favoured-nation treaty with England, did not send a penny's-worth of goods to the Dominion of Canada. And yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is trying to scare the country with talk of the vast volume of trade that would overwhelm our industries—

Mr. LISTER. Slaughtering the working-man.

The FINANCE MINISTER. Exactly. There are some other of these most-favoured-nations with which we did some business, but I think you will find that outside of France, Germany and Belgium, there is not much to alarm the House, and I do not think hon. gentlemen are much alarmed about that difficulty. Denmark sent to us $12,905 worth of goods, the duty upon which amounted to $420. From France our importations were large, amounting to $2,810,942, and the duty $1,020,804.74. Our total imports from Germany were $5,931,459; duties, $1,329,186.36. Persia sent us $515 worth of goods, the duties on which amounted to $162.94. How alarmed we should be at the prospect of the goods of Persia coming in. Russia sent us $15,974 worth of goods, upon which we collected $259.50. Our imports from Sweden and Norway amounted to $45,150, the duties upon which were $7,658.86. From Venezuela we imported $266,927 worth of goods, the duties upon which amounted to $212. From all the countries having most-favoured-nation treatment with England, including Germany, Belgium and France, which are the only countries with which we have considerable trade among the nations mentioned, the total imports were $10,209,279, or less than one-tenth of the total imports of the Dominion. And on these we collected $2,609,478. I think I have shown very clearly that the volume of trade we have with these countries is not a very alarming one, and if we should open the doors to the whole of them there would not be much cause for alarm. But the principal point I rose to make was that, so far as the volume of trade was concerned, so far as our financial state is concerned, so far as the possibility of increasing a deficit or diminishing a surplus is concerned, which are the very points my hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) touched upon, this resolution is almost harmless, as compared with the standing offer under the National Policy, which involved a possible loss of revenue of $3 for every $1 under this proposal.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The House is to be very much congratulated that at last some members of the Government have found their voices and have ventured to offer a few observations. But it is only necessary to listen to the statement just made by the Minister of Finance to find that he has entirely evaded the argument that is before the House. What is the question that my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has put before the House? The question he has put before the House, the very serious question whether this House is to delegate legislative powers to the Governor in Council, whether this House is to put into the hands of the Governor in Council the powers to put duties up or put duties down, and, in addition to that, the power of making treaties. Now, I may say, in the first place, that my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), who has just taken his seat, has entirely misinterpreted the scope of the argument from this side of the House. The question is not how far the revenue would be endangered, it is not how far the arrangements that the Government make with reference to the revenues of the country are to be affected, but it is the cardinal question whether Parliament is to make the tariff or whether the Government is to make the tariff. The question is whether treaties with foreign countries are to be initiated and ratified by the Governor General in Council without let or hindrance, without this House being taken in the confidence of the Government at all. Now, Sir, take the question of treaties. We stand to-day in an altogether different position from that in which we stood a few years ago. I dare say that hon. gentlemen remember that when Sir Alexander Galt, as High Commissioner for Canada, was instructed to place himself in communication with the Imperial Government with a view to negotiating better trade relations between Canada and Spain, the Government of Canada applied to Her Majesty's Government to have Sir Alexander Galt, representing Canada in these negotiations placed on the footing of a plenipotentiary. This was refused. Hon. gentlemen will find in the archives a point-blank refusal to this request, made, as lately as 1881, by the Government of Canada to the Imperial Government to clothe the Canadian representative with the powers of a plenipotentiary. They said they had no objection to Canada naming a commissioner, and they would be glad that that commissioner should give all the information in his power to the ambassador of the United Kingdom or whoever was charged with the negotiations, but they absolutely refused the request of the Canadian Government that the nominee of Canada should be appointed a plenipotentiary for the purpose of protecting Canadian interests. Hon. members are aware that, subsequently, when I was High Commissioner for Canada, I raised that question with Her Majesty's Government, and the matter was thoroughly discussed. I was able so to bring to bear upon Her Majesty's Government the vital importance, in the position that Canada had attained, of the representative of the Canadian Government being clothed on such occasions with full plenipotentiary powers, that the policy was entirely changed; Her Majesty's Government receded from the position they had taken in 1881, and I was appointed, a plenipotentiary, in conjunction with Sir Clare Ford, the ambassador of the British Government at the court of Spain, to negotiate a treaty in reference to Canada. Hon. gentlemen will find in the despatches that are under their hands, that not only was the point conceded, not only was I clothed with full plenipotentiary powers, but that the instructions given by the Foreign Office to Sir Clare Ford and myself jointly as joint plenipotentiaries, contained the statement that the negotiation of the treaty would rest upon the Canadian plenipotentiary, though it would be signed by Her Majesty's Ambassador. Therefore, the position has been conceded to Canada that in matters in which her trade interests are concerned, the Queen appoints the nominee of the Canadian Government, clothes him with all the powers of a plenipotentiary and unites him with the ambassador, as I was united, on a subsequent occasion, by the Foreign Office, with the Marquis of Dufferin, then plenipotentiary at Paris, and clothed with plenipotentiary powers, to present the views of Canada and obtain such arrangements as the Canadian Government desired. That, I mention in passing, as a most important step in which the position of Canada was not only conceded, but in which the representative of the Government of Canada finds himself clothed with the fullest plenipotentiary powers to negotiate a treaty in which the trade of Canada is interested, and is backed and sustained by all the influence of Her Majesty's ambassador to that foreign country, and is backed and sustained by all the influence of the Foreign Office and of the power of England. I say that is a position that, in my judgment, is most important and valuable to Canada. Now, what ground is there for the step this resolution proposes, that is, to clothe the Governor General in Council with this power, irrespective of Parliament, without any knowledge or information on the part of Parliament as to what will be done with power to negotiate a treaty with a foreign country? I say that no case has been made out for such an abnormal and extraordinary procedure on the part of Canada which, after all, is a dependency of the British Crown. But my hon. friend the Finance Minister has entirely failed, I think, to grasp the force of the argument that has been presented on this question, namely, that under this resolution the Governor in Council not only makes treaties, but actually legislates and may make and alter the tariff of the country from time to time without reference to Parliament. Now what is his answer? Why, he produces an argument which only requires to be stated to show how entirely illusory it is. But the hon. gentleman has lost sight of the whole point of the case. He brings forward the statutory offer which has been placed upon the Statute-book, not by the Governor in Council, but by the Parliament of Canada. Even if the hon. gentleman was to state what he proposes to do, and asked permission of the House to do it, that would still be an entirely different thing to the statutory offer. That is the point upon which we have joined issue on the two sides of the House. That statutory offer has no reference to the question whether it affects the revenue or whether it does not. It is an Act of the Parliament of Canada, deliberately put upon the Statute-book, in the full knowledge of all its bearings and all its effects. The hon. gentleman knows that it was embodied in the reciprocity treaty which formerly existed between Canada and the United States. Parliament had the fullest information, it was possessed of all the details, and it declared that the Governor in Council should have power to make what arrangement they, in their judgment, might think desirable with the United States of America. But it confined the Government of Canada to doing that which Parliament had specifically authorized in all its details. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that there is any parity of reasoning between the two cases, that the statutory offer had any bearing upon the question of giving the Governor in Council power to make treaties and unmake them, and to make such arrangements without the knowledge of Parliament, and without requiring the assent of Parliament to those arrangements? I say the two subjects are entirely different. I will not take up the time of the House by going into the question of preferential trade, which the hon. gentleman knows has been already completely disposed of by the clause which he has subsequently brought down, providing that the difficulty in reference to treaties shall be obviated by the Governor in Council, having power to carry out the wishes and the requirements of, and to implement the obligations incurred by, the Imperial Government on that question. But I wish now, Sir, to thank my hon. friend the First Minister for the high compliment he paid to the National Policy. Now, it must not be forgotten that for eighteen long years hon. gentlemen opposite have been denouncing the National Policy of Canada, which gave protection to Canadian industries, as a foul wrong done to the people of this country. For eighteen long years the hon. gentlemen opposite have denounced that policy in terms the most unmeasured that were ever applied to any Act upon the Statute-book of any country. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows that the Minister of Finance declared to the House that in the general tariff that he was going to submit for the adoption of this Parliament, he had adopted without any substantial alteration, the National Policy, that is to say, that he had adopted in all its entirety the National Policy as the general tariff for Canada, that policy which for eighteen years he and his party had denounced as everything that was bad. What was the objection of hon. gentlemen to that National Policy? Was it not its high protective character? Was it not that it adopted the principle of protection in its strongest and, in their judgment, its most objectionable features? If there was any ground for their denunciations it was to be found in its high protective character. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman has paid us that greatest of all compliments, a compliment of imitation, and he has adopted the National Policy so long denounced, as the general tariff of Canada. Now, what does the first Minister say to-night? Why, the policy that he adopts, the tariff that he is going to contrast with the tariffs of all other countries throughout the world, is the general tariff which the Finance Minister tells us is substantially ours. He says that, after looking all over the world, having studied this question in all its bearings, the only tariff he can find that is as favourable and as moderate as ours, is the tariff of Great Britain; consequently, he is not able to find any other country in the world that is entitled to the remissions that this clause proposes. He first lays down the cardinal principle that he is to make a comparison between the tariffs of all these different countries and the tariff of Canada, and he says that, having looked over the whole world, he cannot find a tariff low enough to entitle them to the benefit of this clause except the tariff of England. Sir, I tender my most hearty thanks to my hon. friend for having, at this late hour, vindicated so completely, by his comparison, the moderate character of the protective tariff that the Liberal-Conservative party and Government had adopted. I want to draw the attention of my hon. friend to this fact, that in giving us the trade of the various countries in the world with Canada, he takes last year, he takes a year when Canadian industries were protected. He does not tell you what it will be under the free trade policy, that he proposes to introduce by the cut of one-eighth at first, and afterwards one-quarter of the general tariff, which would probably change these figures most materially. The hon. gentleman will not deny it; he claims, and he prides himself on the fact, that under this preferential tariff, as he calls it, the mother country will reap great advantage. How? By the enormous quantity of goods that will be brought here from Great Britain. When the exports from Belgium, France and Germany and other countries come in, the hon. gentleman will see that all the figures to which he has directed the attention of the House will prove to be utterly fallacious. But I intend to draw the attention of the hon. the Finance Minister and of the First Minister to an important fact which they do not seem to have taken into consideration in proposing the arrangements contained in this clause. I hold in my hand a despatch sent by the Imperial Government to the Governor General of Canada, dated June 28th, 1895, which hon. gentlemen will observe is of tolerably recent date. Are we to pay any respect to such a communication; is there any deference due to the Imperial Government; is the Governor General expected to treat it with contempt, is there any deference due to a communication from the Colonial Office containing the sentiments of Her Majesty's Government of this country and the position in which we stand? Does the hon. gentleman pretend that a despatch to the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for the Colonies, giving the views of Her Majesty's Government on a question of this kind, is to be treated with contempt, or is to have some little respect paid to it? What does this despatch say? It has a direct and complete bearing on this question. My hon. friend will not deny that under this proposed clause, a preferential rate is to be established—that he has established a preferential rate already. The hon. gentleman has boasted that this has been done by the hon. the Minister of Customs, whom

I am happy to be able to congratulate on the coming event that will make him, I am glad to say, a full Minister of Customs. I recognize in that action by the First Minister and his Cabinet the adoption of a policy which was inaugurated by their predecessors, as one that having first tried the system of controllers, the Government have felt it necessary to take the further step and clothe the controllers with full power as Cabinet Ministers. If there ever was a time when it was necessary that the Controller of Customs should have a seat in the Cabinet, it was when this clause had to be carried into effect. But that is aside from the question. This tariff is now law and is in operation, and the hon. the Controller establishes different rates of duties. Did not the hon. Minister of Finance say that England and England alone was at this moment receiving the one-eighth reduction?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The hon. gentleman is commencing to read a despatch from which he formerly quoted, and on which the views of this Government have been stated. This matter is not new.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If there ever was a senseless interruption it was that just made by the hon. gentleman. He only interrupts for the sake of interrupting. It is a too important question.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman should be careful of his words. I have always endeavoured to treat him with courtesy, and the hon. gentleman has no right to make such a remark.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I fail to see where I interrupted him.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman stated a question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I stated that the hon. gentleman had admitted that this was a preferential tariff.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I stated it was not so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I also stated that the hon. gentleman had put it into operation.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That tariff.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me that a tariff that admits the goods of one country at one rate and denies that privilege to another country, is not preferential legislation? The hon. gentleman has lost sight of this fact, and the issue is uncontradicted. I say this is a differential tariff or it is nothing; this clause means a differential tariff or it means nothing. It proposes to clothe the Governor in Council with power to make half a dozen differential treaties with other countries, if in the judgment of the Government and according to the interpretation of the Controller of Customs such countries are entitled to receive the advantages of this clause. That is the position. So, if there ever was a tariff which conveyed on its face that it was a differential tariff, it is this that is called a reciprocal tariff, because hon. gentlemen are aware that the First Minister has declared emphatically that Belgium cannot have the advantage of it, that Germany cannot claim the advantage of it, and that looking over the whole world he found that only England could come under it. Yet the hon. gentleman denies that this is a preferential tariff. The question does not admit of discussion for a moment. Without doubt it is a preferential tariff, and comes within the terms of the despatch of the Marquis of Ripon; and one of two things must happen: either the Government will have to instruct the Governor General as the representative of the Sovereign, to disregard the solemn injunction of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in a despatch written to him for his guidance; or this clause cannot be law if it retains its differential character. What does the Marquis of Ripon say in his despatch, dated as late as June 28th, 1895? I wish to call the attention of the First Minister to this point; I hold it to be a very serious matter, although the hon. gentleman may not do so. I do not want to see a declaration of independence in this Diamond Jubilee year—it is the last thing the people of Canada want—and I invite attention to the serious nature of this clause. The Marquis of Ripon wrote:

While, however, Parliament has thus removed all legislative restrictions on the colonies, so far as Imperial legislation is concerned, it will be necessary, in order that Her Majesty's Government may be in a position to give effect to their responsibility for the international obligations of the Empire, and for the protection of its general interests, that any Bill passed by a colonial legislature providing for the imposition of differential duties, should be reserved for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure, so as to allow full opportunity for its consideration from these points of view.

For this reason, and in order to prevent inconvenience, it will be desirable, if such duties are included in a general Tariff Bill, that a proviso should be added that they are not to come into force until Her Majesty's pleasure has been signified.

Has the hon. gentleman complied with this formal instruction from Her Majesty's Government, that if this Government provided for differential duties, it should be in a special clause, and with a proviso added that it is not to come into operation until Her Majesty's pleasure has been signified. Even the Governor General's assent to it is directed to be withheld, and further than that, the Bill itself is to contain the provision that it cannot come into operation until Her Majesty's pleasure has been signified; that is, until the Imperial Government have had an opportunity of passing deliberately upon that Act, and saying whether it should receive Her Majesty's sanction or not. An illustration is given as follows:

I may here point out, that any Act such as that passed by the Legislature of New Zealand in 1870,—

Mark this. That Act of 1870 in New Zealand did the very same thing that this clause proposes to do, and it is here dealt with by the Secretary of State for the Colonies:

I may here point out, that any Act such as that passed by the Legislature of New Zealand in 1870, which proposed to enable the Governor of the colony in council to suspend or modify any of the duties imposed by the Customs Duties Acts of the colony, in accordance with any intercolonial agreement, besides being open to grave objection on constitutional grounds, * * * and unless, therefore, the articles to which the powers should apply, and the extent to which the remission might be granted, were specified, Her Majesty's Government would have grave doubts as to the propriety of advising Her Majesty to assent to such an Act.

Can anything be stronger than that?

They trust, therefore, that the colonial legislature—

Mark, Sir, he passed from His Excellency the Governor General. The Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Imperial Government itself, pass to a still higher tribunal than that of the representative of the Queen; they make an appeal to the colonial legislatures, they make an appeal to the Parliament of Canada, and they said:

They trust, therefore, that the colonial legislatures will not seek to divest themselves in any measure of their power to fix the amount of their taxation, nor to confer upon the executive a power the exercise of which without the fullest deliberation might inadvertently give rise to serious complications, not only with other colonies, but with foreign powers.

Now, Sir, I want the members of the Government to tell me, if they realize where they are. Do they realize that at this moment they have done that which the Governor General of Canada has been instructed by the Imperial Government they should not do? Do the hon. gentlemen realize the fact, that having passed a discriminating tariff, having boasted that they put a discriminating tariff into operation already, they are told that if any colonial legislature while it recognizes its fealty to the Crown, does such a thing as that, it must do it in a separate Bill, and it must connect it with the proviso that it shall not come into operation until Her Majesty's pleasure has been known—not merely the assent of the Governor General but Her Majesty's pleasure. Sir, this Government has done neither of those things. In defiance of the positive, clear and emphatic instructions from the Crown itself, as expressed by the Rt. Hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies in a despatch to the Governor General of Canada, they have done that in every particular, and they are asking this House to do that which the Marquis of Ripon, a long tried statesman of immense experience, has implored the legislature of Canada not to do.

These gentlemen on the Treasury benches are asking their followers behind them, and they are asking this House, to do that which Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies has implored them not to do, because it might lead to serious complications not only with other colonies but with foreign powers. Under these circumstances, I feel that this legislation has been of a hasty and ill-considered character. I do not believe that the Government recognized the tremendous responsibility they were assuming in adopting a policy directly at variance with the instructions from Her Majesty's Government, and directly at variance with the principle which lie at the very foundation of British parliamentary government. That principle is: that Parliament should retain its own grasp and control over the action of the Government in regard to the imposition or removal of taxation.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I cannot attempt to follow the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) in his closing argument, if I might so designate it, because I consider it is not pertinent to the amendment which is now before the House. It seems to me that as the seconder of the previous amendment that was put to the House and voted down, he had committed himself practically to this clause which he now says is unconstitutional. The hon. gentleman proposes now to amend it in another particular, while in his closing remarks he takes the ground that we have no right to pass it at all. Perhaps I may be allowed just one word of reference to the amendment which was previously moved. He professes to not feel pleased with the wording of the resolution, and he undertook by his amendment to make it, as he thought, clear. He will pardon me if I say, that instead of doing that, he simply restricted the reading of the resolution in one particular. The resolution as it stands now gives the power that he asked, for he only asked that a certain subject be taken into consideration. The clause as it stands gives power to take the whole situation into consideration, and now the hon. gentleman proposes a second amendment which he thinks is important, namely, that this reciprocity clause if proposed to be applied to any country should not be applied until the ensuing session of Parliament. As the Minister of Finance has clearly pointed out, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) has attempted by his words in the House and throughout the country, to create alarm, as if the power that was being taken here might be of the very greatest detriment to the country. The Minister of Finance has pointed out, that if the countries which the hon. gentleman has mentioned, were to come within the operation of this clause, the result that would follow could not be of such vital importance as the hon. gentleman represented. The Minister of Finance showed very plainly, that there was no necessity for the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) to lash himself into fury, as he announced himself as being the champion of the workingman, and the manufacturers that were to be crushed. There was no necessity at all for that, in the light of the figures which the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) gave him (Mr. Foster) as to the trade of all other countries, outside of Great Britain and the United States, with Canada. I simply rose, however, to mention that the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) in looking at any possible evil results that might follow gave the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) more of the argument than he needed to do, because the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) took the total imports of the country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) who made this amendment knows that as far as the trade of Belgium and Germany are concerned—and these are two countries he harped very much upon—and two countries, that as he stated, if he were in the position of Controller of Customs, would to-day be in the enjoyment of this reciprocal clause. The present Controller of Customs has not so decided, and consequently they are not within its operation. But if the hon. gentleman had the power, and brought them within its operation, how serious would it be during the next nine months—and it will be only nine months before Parliament meets again, I trust. Hon. gentlemen opposite speak of this clause in the same light as treaties; treaties that are formally made, treaties that have periods to run, treaties that may be denounced. This is a tariff Act that we are passing here. But, Sir, let us look at the trade of Belgium and Germany, and let us look at them, not in the light of the total trade, for we are not wholly concerned with that. The hon. gentleman knows that under schedule "D," which forms the reciprocal tariff, the article of sugar is excluded from its operation. Let us take the trade we have with Germany, the country he spoke so much about. The total imports of this country from Germany under the tariff of the hon. gentleman was $5,931,459. But out of that there is an import of $2,043,882 worth of sugar that will not be interfered with by this at all. In addition to that there is admitted from Germany under the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite, not at one-eighth reduction, but free, $813,214 worth. Put these two amounts together, and you have $2,857,096 out of $5,931,459 worth of goods that do not come within these provisions at all.

Mr. BEATTIE. Does not the hon. gentleman know, as Controller of Customs, that the amount he gives as coming from Germany is not half the amount that actually comes—that double that amount of German goods comes in through England as English goods? The hon. gentleman only gives the figures of what comes direct from Germany.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Then the hon. gentleman gives us to understand that under their tariff German goods came in through England?

Mr. BEATTIE. Certainly, and they paid the same duty as English goods.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Then, with respect to Belgium, our total imports under the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite were $920,758, of which there was $390,990 worth of sugar, and free goods to the value of $84,065, a total of $475,055 out of a total import of $920,758. So, if the hon. gentleman were in the position of Controller of Customs, and were to do what he says he would do, and what the present Controller of Customs has not done—bring Germany and Belgium within the operation of this provision—instead of the dire results which he says would flow from this to the workmen and manufacturers of Canada, I think he will see, in the light of these figures, that he has been attempting to raise a false alarm. There are other countries which have not treaty arrangements with Great Britain, but which the hon. gentleman has declared he would, if he had the decision, bring under the reciprocal tariff—for instance, China and Japan; and that would mean the competition of the cheap labour of those countries against the workmen and the manufacturers of Canada, whose friend and champion he is. Though the present Controller of Customs does not take the view of the hon. gentleman that these countries come in under the reciprocal tariff, let us see, if he were Controller of Customs and had his way, what the effect would be during the next nine months before Parliament would meet again. Our total imports from China under the hon. gentleman's tariff were $1,027,757, of which $688,879 came in, not at one-eighth reduction, but absolutely free, and $338,878 of dutiable goods; and if you admit these at one-eighth reduction, the hon. gentleman says the workmen and manufacturers of Canada will all be ruined. Take Japan. The total imports from Japan are $1,643,661; but out of that $1,383,672 are admitted, not at one-eighth reduction, but absolutely free under the hon. gentleman's tariff, while dutiable goods are admitted only to the amount of $259,989, and if these are admitted at one-eighth reduction, he says, you are going to ruin the manufacturers and workmen of Canada. All these, together do not amount to 5 per cent of the dutiable goods coming into this country. I do not want to say anything more. I simply want to point out that when the hon. gentleman offers his amendment, which he says is vital to the interests of this country, if the Controller of Customs took the course which he says he would be bound to take, and gave these countries the benefit of the one-eighth reduction, the dire results he predicts could not follow before Parliament would have an opportunity to pass its judgment upon the matter. He must remember that the imports of dutiable goods from Belgium and Germany which come into competition with the manufactures of this country are wholly insignificant, and that even should there be one-eighth reduction of duty—and it would be only one-eighth until Parliament met, and long after Parliament met—there would still be 30¼ per cent on all the manufactured goods coming from those countries. I think that if the hon. gentleman is not able to carry the amendment he offers, he will find that the dire results he predicts will not flow from the clause, as brought down to the House.

Mr. SPROULE moved that the Committee rise and report progress.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.10 a.m. (Tuesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 1st June, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Bill (No. 36) respecting the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

INDIAN TROUBLE IN NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the House to a matter which was referred to yesterday by the hon. member from Western Assinibola (Mr. Davin) in connection with the Saskatchewan. I allude to the trouble which occurred in connection with the Indian named "Almighty Voice." Sir, the newspapers have already made altogether too much of this affair; in fact, they have made a mountain out of a mole hill. Their reports are exaggerated, and have given a wrong impression as to the state of affairs in that district, and in the North-west Territories generally. As a matter of fact this Indian has been an outlaw from justice and he has been in company with another Indian much in the same plight. The Mounted Police have been looking for those two Indians for some time, and of course they made a desperate stand knowing that their lives were at stake. But the whole trouble has been confined to these two. There is no truth whatever in the statements that the Indians are restless. The Indians are not restless, and I have received a telegram this morning confirming my statement in this regard. The newspapers also tried to make out that the half-breeds refused to assist the authorities, but this also was not a correct statement. There are no more peaceable or peace-loving people in all Canada than the half-breeds of the Saskatchewan, and if it were necessary for them to turn out to assist the civil or military power, they would do so. As a matter of fact they did turn out, and thirty half-breeds from Batoche went to the seat of trouble, and were led by a half-breed. There were also volunteers from the town of Prince Albert led by a distinguished half-breed, Mr. McKay, a Queen's Counsel living in that town. The reason I call the attention of the House to these exaggerated reports in the newspapers, is, that such reports are calculated to have a bad effect on immigration into that country.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is hardly in order at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. DAVIS. I will make a motion to adjourn the House. I was going on to say, Mr. Speaker, that such exaggerated reports as I refer to give intending immigrants a bad impression of the country, and they also have the effect of deterring capitalists from investing in enterprises in our North-west Territories. For that reason I thought it my duty, as representing the district of Saskatchewan, to bring this matter before the House and to offer such denial as I could. I am very sorry indeed, Sir, that so many valuable lives have been lost in connection with this affair. It has at least proved one thing, and that is, the efficiency of the North-west Mounted Police. It is shown that they are always ready for emergencies, and that no danger can deter them from discharging their duty. I am also extremely sorry that Mr. Grundy, a very respectable citizen of my constituency has been killed in this affair. His death is all the more to be regretted from the fact that he has left a widow and a large family. I hope the Government will take the matter into their consideration and will do something for the widow and children. I beg leave to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion negatived.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PRIOR. I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in regard to an Act that was passed in 1895, entitled an Act to encourage silver lead smelting. I am informed by the owners of some of the smelters at present at work in British Columbia, that up to the present time, they have not been able to obtain any money on account of this Act from the Government. They inform me that it was owing to this Act having been passed and assented to, and their thinking that this money would be paid, that they succeeded in some measure in getting the capital to put these smelters up. Up to the present time the Government have taken no action on the Act, and the smelting men do not know whether they may look forward to be paid for the ore they have already smelted, or whether they will get anything by the Act in the future. I understand that they have not been able to get any definite information one way or the other from the Government as to what their policy is in regard to this Act. It is a large sum of money to be paid out for the benefit of the mining industry, but when divided among the smelters already working in British Columbia, it does not come to very much for each. But they wish to have some definite information as to what the policy of the Government is in regard to this Act.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. gentleman will know that as a requisite to any payments being made, certain regulations need to be framed. These regulations have been framed, but they have not been entirely considered by the Government, owing largely to the extreme pressure of work. Also, one or two questions arose as to the construction of the Act, as to which information has been asked from the Department of Justice. As soon as we have a little leisure to attend to the matter, I hope to give the hon. gentleman a definite answer.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to ask the hon. Minister a question that relates really to the Department of Agriculture, but I have been waiting day after day, and every time the Orders of the Day are called, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is not in his place. Perhaps one of the Ministers will take note of the question I ask. Early in the session the House passed an order to have brought down certain correspondence and petitions respecting quarantine in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. The hon. Minister several times told me that he would bring the papers down the next day, but they have never been brought down, and the session is passing away.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. FOSTER. Before my hon. friend continues, I wish to ask whether the papers with reference to the admission of Great Britain to the one-eighth reduction are ready to be placed on the Table of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I will send for them immediately.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Chairman, when you left the Chair last night, I was about to direct the attention of the House for a few moments to the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) and the hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson). The hon. member for Halifax endeavoured to show the House that there was no difference between the provision contained in subsection "b" of clause 16 of these resolutions, and the clause of the customs law of 1879 that provided upon certain conditions for the admission of goods from the United States into Canada at a different rate of duty from what was imposed by the general law. He said there was no difference between the offer of the tariff of 1879 and this one. To my mind there is a very great difference. The first difference is this, that the offer in the Act of 1879 applied to only one country, and it referred to certain specified articles that were set forth in the resolution. I have it under my hand, and it reads as follows:—

Any or all of the following articles, that is to say:—Animals of all kinds, green fruit, hay, straw, bran, seeds of all kinds, vegetables (including potatoes and other roots), plants, trees and shrubs, coal and coke, salt, hops, wheat, peas and beans, barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat and all other grain, flour of wheat and flour of rye, Indian meal and oatmeal, and flour or meal of any other grain, butter, cheese, fish salted or smoked, lard, tallow, meats (fresh, salted or smoked), and lumber may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this Act, upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same under such proclamation when imported into Canada.

This was specific and definite. It related to a number of articles that were included in the old reciprocity treaty, and as to which Canada knew the advantages that would accrue to this country if they were admitted into the United States free of duty. It was definite in regard to the amount, because we knew the exact rate of duty at which they must be admitted. Our goods must be admitted to the United States at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on goods from the United States coming into Canada. But this clause of section 16 does not provide that each article from Canada shall be admitted into the other country at as low a rate of duty as that at which Canada would admit a similar article from that country. It might be desirable that some articles coming from the other country should be kept out or charged a higher rate of duty, while it might be reasonable to admit others at a moderate rate of duty. As I have said, the provision in the law of 1879 was specific and definite. It enumerated the articles, and provided that none of these articles should be admitted into Canada at a low rate of duty unless the same line of articles were admitted into the United States at an equally low rate. But this clause 16 makes no such provision. The other resolution was confined to one country while this resolution provides for the admission of goods from every country. The other admitted certain specified articles, while this one covers the whole tariff schedule with very few exceptions. The other was in the nature of a limited reciprocity, and we knew what would be the effect of it if it were carried out; but the present proposal is one that no person can know the effects of. There is that very wide difference between the provisions of the customs law of 1879 and the provisions of the proposed customs law of today. Then, again, the hon. Controller of Customs, replying to the arguments of the leader of the Opposition, attempted to prove that the resolution before the House would not do the country so much harm, even if we brought this portion of the schedule into operation, because inside of nine months Parliament must meet again and could then review the legislation. But that does not affect the point in dispute. What is in question is not whether the evil will continue long or short, but the principle involved. It is the right of the executive to bind Parliament to any agreement which they may make affecting our trade relations with other countries without the authority or consent of Parliament. It has never been recognized heretofore, neither in the British nor in any colonial Parliament, that a Governor in Council had the right to bind Parliament in advance to any agreement of this nature before submitting that agreement to Parliament for its sanction, and this proceeding is a departure from that constitutional practice and one we should look upon with a great deal of suspicion. I have here Anson's "Law of the Constitution," and in that work I find that Mr. Anson dissents from any such proposition. Speaking of it, he lays down this doctrine:

No one but the Crown can bind the community by treaty, but can the Crown invariably do so without the co-operation of Parliament? This much appears to be certain, that where a treaty involves either a charge on the people or a change in the law of the land, it may be made, but cannot be carried into effect without the sanction of Parliament.

Now, that is exactly what we are asked to do. The Government are asking us to give them the power to carry a treaty into effect—because this proposition is equivalent to a treaty—without the sanction of Parliament. We on this side hold that such a proposition should not be carried into effect without the sanction of Parliament, because Parliament should retain the power to ascertain, before it goes into effect, whether it would be wise to allow such a provision to become law. Take the reciprocity treaty of 1854, and I find the same principle laid down in that treaty. Article 13 of that treaty provides :

That treaty shall take effect as soon as the laws required to carry it into operation shall have been passed by the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain and by the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada, on the one hand, and by the Congress of the United States on the other.

That article 13 refers to that part of the treaty which would have similar effect to this proposition, provided we should adopt it, and provided the Governor in Council should exercise the authority which we are asked to give the executive under this clause. It is therefore plainly laid down in the treaty of 1854, as it was also laid down in the proposed treaty of 1874, that neither treaty shall come into operation until sanctioned by Parliament. In the treaty of 1872, which is set out in the sessional papers of that year, I find the same provision :

The foregoing Articles 18 to 25, inclusive, and Article 30 of this treaty shall take effect as soon as the laws required to carry them into operation shall have been passed by the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain, by the Parliament of Canada, and by the Legislature of Prince Edward Island on the one hand, and by the Congress of the United States on the other.

Thus, in every case the treaty must be submitted, first, to the Imperial Parliament, secondly, to the Dominion Parliament, and thirdly, to the Parliament of the province. The proposed treaty of 1872 also provided that Parliament should sanction it before it became law. In the treaty of 1888, I find almost the same words :

This treaty shall be ratified by Her Britannic Majesty, having received the assent of the Parliament of Canada and of the Legislature of Newfoundland, and by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible.

Now, we contend that this clause before the House is equivalent to a draft treaty. It constitutes an agreement that will affect our trade relations with other countries, and therefore, if we should adopt it, we would be violating the well-understood principle of parliamentary government that Parliament should always control the act of the executive before Parliament can be committed to such acts. If we were to allow this clause to become law, we would be violating that principle. The doctrine advanced by the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) is a sound one, namely, that the Governor in Council may, after Parliament has given its sanction thereto, give effect to this clause. This clause proposes to allow the executive to exercise power which is equivalent to the treaty-making power. It proposes to put in the hands of the executive the power to put in force, without the previous sanction of Parliament, what is equivalent to a treaty, and, therefore, I maintain that the amendment is a sound one, that this House should accept it, and that the Government should embody it as part of the resolution.

Mr. CLANCY. I am sorry the hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) is not in his place, but in his absence perhaps the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) will reply to the question I desire to put. I wish to call his attention to the fact that we are every day importing goods that must have been exported to England by foreign countries before being re-exported to Canada. I desire to ask the hon. gentleman if any express instructions have been given to the collectors of customs throughout Canada by which goods coming direct from England, but which were previously sent into England from foreign countries, are to be prevented coming in at the lower rate. Let me call the hon. gentleman's attention to the case of Germany and France. Large quantities of goods manufactured in these countries and brought into England cannot be distinguished from those which are solely manufactured in England and entitled to the rebate of duties. Take, for instance, cork manufactures of all descriptions, which are imported very largely from France to England and then exported direct from England to Canada. Take, also, cotton manufactures, immense quantities of which are exported from France to England, and in England become confounded with English goods, so that Canadian authorities cannot have any definite knowledge as to the extent to which these goods are mixed up with English goods, and sold as such by the English houses. There is a long list of such articles, with which I shall not trouble the House.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLANCY. I fear that the hon. gentleman who interrupts me neither cares nor knows very much about the existing condition of affairs. I ask the question because it seems to me a very important one.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I am sorry my hon. colleague the Controller of Customs is not in his place because he could better answer the question. He has given some instruction, a copy of which I am sure he would be pleased to lay before the House. At the beginning, no doubt, there will be some difficulty in identifyng the particular goods, but after this clause is in operation some time, the regulations will be of such a character that the difficulties will be largely, if not wholly, avoided. My hon. friend will see that the point that he makes—and I grant you that difficulties might arise—is a point that he could make against any preferential tariff that we might adopt. If we had adopted the amendment moved by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) declaring in favour of a preferential tariff on certain concessions being secured, the same difficulties would arise that my hon. friend anticipates under this tariff; and therefore, we are much in the same position as if the policy which, I presume, he favours, were adopted. I confess that such difficulties will arise. I shall not be surprised if, in the beginning, it is necessary to give a somewhat liberal interpretation to the clause as respects goods imported from England, which may be in part of foreign origin; but, after the matter has been in operation some time, I anticipate that the regulations of the Customs Department will be such that goods merely passing through England will be identified, so that the true intent of the clause may be carried out with respect to British goods without admitting the foreign goods which, as the hon. gentleman points out, might possibly be imported as British goods.

Mr. CLANCY. I quite recognize the difficulties in any system of preferential trade; but the hon. Minister must see that the difficulties are greatly multiplied under this system. Those difficulties are serious under any condition of preferential trade, but the consequences to arise from the present system are much more serious, in fact the hon. Minister must see the difficulties will be almost insuperable. England has no defensive lines; goods from all countries are entered there upon the same terms. The manufacture of many countries may be combined in articles that may be entered as a single manufacture. So that, the hon. gentleman will see, how—I was going to say—utterly impossible it will be to make the distinction which he now seeks to make. The difficulties seem almost an answer to the hon. gentleman's question as to whether preferential trade can be adopted or not, considering the principal points involved. The first of these is the possible diminution of the revenue in consequence of goods coming in by way of England rather than direct from other countries. It is apparent to everybody that trade will flow in the channels of least resistance—resistance by tariff or otherwise. Therefore, the possibility of a large quantity of goods being imported into Canada by way of Great Britain rather than direct, may affect the revenues of the country to some extent. But a more disadvantageous effect will be the uncertainty of trade. If, from considerations of freight, goods were imported, say by some of the American steamships, and if this were not counted as direct importation, the case would be surrounded with great difficulties. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) will see that then the question of freights will arise and there will be disadvantage in preventing importation by the cheapest lines. Then there is the question of goods coming into competition with the Canadian products. The more I consider this question, the greater seem the difficulties that confront us; and I think they are so great that the hon. Minister might well withdraw his resolution and give time to think the matter over to see how it will work out, because it is impossible to forecast it at present, with anything like certainty. The proposal is a wholly experimental one, and if the difficulties are to be overcome, this can only be done by the exercise of the greatest care. I still hope that the hon. Minister will not proceed with the resolution but will give further time for the consideration of the difficulties involved.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am glad that my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) has admitted that the objection he has taken will apply quite as fully to any preferential tariff that we might have, either in the form of the resolution now before us or of that which finds greater favour with gentlemen opposite. I admit that there are difficulties; but I do not think that in a matter of so great importance as the matter of preferential trade, even from the point of view of hon. gentlemen opposite, we should withdraw from the step we have taken merely because there will be some difficulties in the custom-house. The resolution for which my hon. friend voted declares that there is a general desire for preferential trade. According to his present statement, the difficulties in the way are so great that, in his opinion, this general desire cannot be carried out. I admit the fairness of the hon. gentleman's criticism, but I think it will be found that he rather magnifies the difficulties. In the matter of freights I think there will be no difficulty in determining that goods imported from Great Britain under a bill of lading through to Canada, even though they come by the way of a foreign port, are British imports within the meaning of the clause. I do not think that the clause must be interpreted to mean that the goods must be shipped direct to a Canadian port. We have not done that hitherto in the case of those clauses of the law in which the term "direct importation" is used. The other difficulty, I admit, might arise, and we must meet it as best we can, with every desire to confine the privilege for the present, and until the ultimate result is known, to British goods, but with the full knowledge that it is understood that some goods of not purely British origin may possibly come in. But I do not think that that will happen to a large extent, and I hope that, after a time, it will not happen at all.

Mr. CRAIG. Before the vote is taken, I desire to say a few words. I do not intend to detain the committee very long, and during the few minutes I shall occupy, I will confine myself strictly to the amendment before the Chair moved by the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) yesterday. That amendment reads :

That after the word "may," in the fifth line, these words be inserted : "after Parliament has given its sanction thereto."

I think that this amendment is a most proper one. In thinking over this resolution it seemed to me that one of the strongest objections to it was that it took the power of making treaties out of the hands of Parliament and handed it over to the Government. I think it will be admitted by all who consider this question apart from party bias that, in making any treaty or in reducing the tariff reciprocally with any other country, Parliament ought to be consulted, and consulted on every occasion. After all, Parliament represents the people. The Government is a committee of Parliament appointed to discharge certain duties a great many of which are executive. But the Government is not supposed to make laws, it is not supposed to execute treaties with other governments without consulting Parliament. Parliament is the supreme power, and I hold that Parliament should retain this power in its own hands. There is one great advantage in Parliament retaining this power in its own hands and not allowing any Government to make a treaty without bringing it before Parliament, and that is that such a course insures full discussion. Under this arrangement the Government might make a reciprocity treaty with the United States, France, Germany, or some other country which would not be acceptable to the country as a whole, or even to their party as a whole ; but, after all, it would be done, completed, without discussion and without any chance for those who opposed the arrangement to say anything about it until it was all over. I hold that it would be in the interest of the Government, and still more in the interest of Parliament and of this country that the power should not be conceded to any Government of making a treaty with any foreign nation without submitting that treaty to Parliament for discussion and without giving Parliament an opportunity of pronouncing upon it. Now, Sir, I do not think this has ever been done before ; I think the method which is proposed by this resolution now before the committee, is a complete innovation. The French treaty has been referred to in this House. We all admit that when that treaty was negotiated, it did not take effect until this Parliament had pronounced upon it, and it would have been considered an outrage on this Parliament and on the people of Canada if that treaty had gone into operation without Parliament having an opportunity of discussing its provisions and pronouncing upon it. Although this was a treaty made between France and Canada, yet it did not really become a treaty until Parliament pronounced upon it, and had had an opportunity of rejecting or approving it. Now, if we commit this power to the Government by this resolution, they can make a treaty just as effective as the French treaty, they can make a treaty reducing the tariff of Canada in return for reciprocal reductions by another country, and we have nothing to do about it, Parliament is not consulted at all. Now, I submit whether that is not asking a most extraordinary power on behalf of the Government. I was not in the House when the Premier spoke, but I notice that he made the point that practically the same thing has been done by the former Government when they put in the tariff a list of articles which were to be treated as reciprocal products if the United States made them free, then we would make them free too. But I hold that is an entirely different thing, Parliament pronounced upon that, Parliament agreed to those articles being mentioned ; but in this case we agree to nothing in particular, nothing specific ; but we agree to say to the Government : You are perfectly at liberty to go and make a treaty with any country on the face of this globe, on certain conditions which we do not know, which are most indefinite ; that is to say, you can make reciprocal arrangements, you can reduce our tariff if they reduce theirs in certain lines, in lines which might be opposed by Parliament if the matter was submitted to them, but which Parliament will have no opportunity of pronouncing upon. Then we have heard a great deal about reciprocity treaties with the United States. But how were they brought about ? Why, commissioners went to Washington to meet commissioners of the United States Government, and they sat down and talked these matters over. But suppose they made an arrangement, suppose they made a treaty, the treaty was not binding on either country until it was ratified by the Congress of the United States and by the Parliament of this country. Now, in this case we propose to do away with that entirely. I do not know whether hon. members opposite look at it as I do ; but looking at this matter without reference to party at all, thinking over it carefully, it does seem to me that we are entirely giving up our powers to the Government of the day, that we are virtually saying to them, if we pass that resolution : You have a free hand to go and make a reciprocity treaty. Without consulting Parliament they can go to the United States and make a reciprocity treaty with that country. I would like to hear whether hon. gentlemen opposite deny that statement. I would like to hear whether that is not the case, because, as I have said, this resolution gives the Government that power distinctly. I might not have been surprised if the Conservative party, sometimes called the Tory party, had talked in this way, had talked about taking away the rights of Parliament. But what must we think when we find the Liberal party, the party who have called themselves in the past the defenders of the rights of the people, and who have arrogated to themselves that position far more than the Conservative party have ever done—when we find them asking this Parliament to give them this power of making treaties, to hand it entirely over to them without consulting Parliament. I do not intend to detain this committee any longer on this question, but I would like to hear whether my view of the case is not correct, that if this resolution is passed by this Parliament, the Government will then have the power to go to Washington, for instance, and negotiate a reciprocity treaty without submitting it to Parliament. Now, if that is not the case, I would like to hear hon. gentlemen opposite set me right.

Mr. BELL (Addington). I desire to say a few words upon the amendment that is now before the committee, without intending to detain the committee but a very short time. I look upon the present discussion as one of the most important discussions that has taken place since Parliament assembled. We are discussing the fiscal and trade policy of this country, and the propriety of handing that over entirely to the Government. Now, I rise particularly in order to gather information. I think we cannot give the ex-Finance Minister too much praise for the amendment that he has moved. First of all, the Government have been very slow in bringing down their policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite have always told us that they were opposed to the policy of the late Government, opposed to the policy of protection; and I have not time to consider all the strong adjectives that they used against that policy. We were assured that when the Liberal party came into power they were ready with a policy that would be in the interests of this country. The Government has now been in power for nearly a year, and we are yet almost entirely in the dark with regard to what the trade and fiscal policy of this Government is. Now, I am anxious to understand this clause, to know what it means; because when I go into my county I shall be asked what it means and I want to be in a position to explain it. I feel that the object of this discussion, on the Opposition side of the House, at least, is to elicit information on this most important clause. The ex-Finance Minister made an able speech asking for information, we have asked for information time and again and the only answer we have received is summed up in these words: We are here and you are there. Now, we want to know a little more about the legislation that is proposed than a mere statement of that fact. When the ex-Finance Minister moved the first amendment yesterday, I was glad to see it had the effect of bringing the Prime Minister to his feet; he got out from that hiding-place where he is known to have rested on many occasions before. He made a statement, but there was not very much information in it. I am glad the ex-Finance Minister moved another amendment that brought out the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs—or the would-be Minister of Customs, I suppose I should say, for he is now only in the pin feather state; but I presume before Parliament rises he will be a full-fledged Minister. Now, I am sure that no man can charge the ex-Finance Minister, in discussing either the tariff resolutions or the amendments, with looking at them from a partisan standpoint. I am sure no hon. gentleman in this House could stand up and discuss this question in a more statesman-like and honest manner than he did, and when he asked for information, he got very little indeed from the Government. Now, the resolution in this tariff which particularly interests me at this moment is number 16, which reads:

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole,—

And so forth. Now, this is what we are talking about, and on which a great deal has been said. I have listened very attentively while hon. gentlemen have quoted paragraphs from the London "Times" and other British papers, giving the opinions on this question held by the people in Great Britain; and I also listened with a great deal of pleasure when the resolutions were brought down, particularly this clause regarding preferential trade with Great Britain. Now, Mr. Chairman, anything that connects Canada with Great Britain more closely, whether by means of trade relations or otherwise, always has my support and my strong approval. Well, we are not sure that this resolution is going to give us preferential trade with Great Britain, that is to say, something that Great Britain is not going to enjoy exclusively, and that we are not giving the same favours to other countries. Now, since these resolutions were introduced there seems to have been a change in front. It is now called differential trade; and as I have been recently reading in regard to this question, I should like to quote from some of the papers of the United States to show the way in which the people there view this great question. The New York "Post" says as follows:—

Some of the superficial features of the Canadian Tariff Bill and certain of the catchwords thrown out by the Canadian Minister of Finance in his Budget speech are regarded by a part of the American press as declarations of tariff war against the United States. American journals and politicians who take that view are victims of a clever illusion, which was intended, not for them, but for a large section of the Canadian and British public. When the changes in the tariff are carefully examined, they will be found in their sum total to be at least as pro-American as pro-British. In presenting the new Bill to the country, however, the Government deemed it expedient to give it an anti-American squint. Hence in his Budget speech Mr. Fielding spoke meaningfully about dealing with those nations that would deal with Canada, and christened his minimum tariff a preferential arrangement in favour of Great Britain. The pro-British, anti-American aspects thus suggested were at once seized on, not only in Canada, but also in Great Britain and the United States. In the heat of the enthusiasm with which the so-called "British policy" was received in the mother country, Rudyard Kipling struck off his piece of frost-work, "Our Lady of the Snows."

That poem has been referred to in the House by a hon. member possessing a literary mind and who has often entertained the House with his classical references, I refer to the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who, however, has thrown a different light on that poem. The "Post" proceeds to say further:

It has also—and the Government thanks it not for this—helped to spread in the United States the British interpretation. There, too, the Canadian tariff is represented as an Imperial development, as so much new mortar for cementing the colony and the mother country into one solid political whole.

If it has that object and tendency, I should like to know in what way it is going to be enforced, for I should like to have preferential trade with Great Britain myself. Further on the "Post" says—(and this is an American paper):

It is also taken as a blow to commercial intercourse with the United States. Thus, a false impression, calculated to make the Administration prodigiously popular at home and in the mother country, may work the Dominion mischief with its neighbour. Mr. Laurier would be the first man to deprecate such a result as this. Anxious as he is to beguile the Imperialists into the idea that his tariff is more partial to Great Britain than to any other country, he is still more anxious that the United States should recognize that he has sacrificed more to it than to any other country.

That is the opinion of the New York "Post." At this stage of the debate, while there is a field here for lengthy remarks, I do not propose to offer them, as I am quite as anxious as any hon. member to proceed to consider these resolutions; but I think it is asking Parliament too much to place in the hands of the Controller of Customs, upon whose opinion confirmed by the Governor in Council, the control of the whole fiscal policy of this Dominion. I do not consider we can afford at this stage of our history to introduce such despotism as prevails in Russia. I think the amendment of the ex-Minister of Finance is in the right direction and that no such power should be given without the express sanction of Parliament, and I have therefore pleasure in supporting the amendment.

Amendment negatived.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Before the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) proceeds, I should like to present the Order in Council of which I have spoken.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The question is now on the adoption of section 16.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a little difficult and not exactly as it should be that this important information has been kept from us until the very moment when a vote is to be taken. But at the risk of attacking a document, which I have not yet been able to read through, I am going to ask the attention of the committee to it, and in that way the committee may with me analyse it and ascertain upon what rule the Government has acted in the one case in which it has acted, so that we may judge from that the rule on which the Government propose to act in every case in which it has to act hereafter. What I find here is an extract from a report of the Committee of the hon. the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency on 11th May, 1897. The committee will see that 11th May, 1897, was twenty days after the first resolutions were brought down, and that consequently after the whole load had been carted away, the horse was brought out and harnessed, and put into the vehicle.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce submits the annexed memorandum from the Controller of Customs, having reference to the tariff resolution making provision for a reciprocal tariff, stating that he, the Controller of Customs, has decided that the customs tariff of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland is such as entitles articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of that country to the benefits of the reciprocal tariff, subject to the limitations mentioned in Schedule "D," and has so directed all collectors of customs, and recommending that his action be approved.

The Committee advise the adoption of the recommendation of the Controller of Customs.

I think that gives the committee food for thought, and I want the committee to follow me while I direct its attention to what is involved in this the only case we have, and consequently the only standard we have to guide us as to future action on the part of the Government. The Governor in Council under this section is to approve the action of the Controller of Customs. Ordinarily we could understand by that phrase that the Governor in Council has to have certain statements and facts placed before him, and on that basis of fact and reasoning the Governor in Council comes to the discussion of the question and decides ultimately that question. That must be the case where the question is to be decided—if that is the rule to be adopted at all—upon the recommendation of a man who is outside of the Cabinet, just as much as my hon. friend sitting by my side (Mr. Davin) is outside of the Cabinet, and cannot give his reasons by word of mouth to the Council, and consequently in the way of conversation to convince them as to certain facts and certain things. The Controller of Customs himself has led the House to believe, that a contrary mode of procedure would be carried out—I would like to have the attention of the Controller of Customs for a moment. The Controller of Customs, in explaining the modus operandi, gave this House to believe that he was going to go into the subject, to study the course of trade, the tariffs, and all these questions; he was going to lay those before Council, and Council was then to make up its mind, and an Order in Council would be passed before any definite action took place.

Now, Sir, the papers laid on the Table of the House show what? Simply this: That a man entirely outside of the Cabinet, sits in his chair, comes to a conclusion, writes down the fact that he has decided to allow such a country in under one-eighth and a one-fourth reduction, and sends that decision of his over to Council, taking care before he sends it over to advise the collectors of customs throughout Canada to carry out his decision—the decision of the Controller of Customs who is outside of the Cabinet and has no place in the Cabinet. The Cabinet, as a deliberative body meets together, to do what? To discuss a set of facts placed before them by the Controller of Customs? No, Sir, but simply to register the previously made decision of the Controller of Customs, a decision which has been already made operative under the law by the orders that have been sent to every collector of customs. That means, that the only man who is to decide as to what country is to come in under this clause, and when it is to come in, is the Controller of Customs, that all he has to do is simply to decide; he need not give a fact, or a figure, or an argument to Council; and it means that what Council has to do is simply to register this decision of the Controller of Customs.

Now, Sir, that is the pass that parliamentary government has come to in this country. One man arbitrarily makes his decision on arbitrary grounds, communicates that arbitrary decision to the Governor in Council, and the Council without a scrap of information, without a single presentment of the circumstances or facts in the case as regards tariff, or trade, or conditions; simply by its order ratifies the decision of the arbitrary judge, coming to his conclusion from arbitrary reasons. There we have the procedure of the Government? Well, Sir, what may take place after this? The Controller of Customs having declined to tell this House upon what grounds he is going in any case to make up his decision, he may sit alone in his office and arbitrarily make up his mind that the United States of America has a right to be admitted under this clause 16, because of certain advantages that would come to this country in the course of trade between the two. All he would have to do is to simply decide, send that decision over to Council, and the thirteen men sitting as a Cabinet, are simply to register the decision thus arbitrarily given by the Controller of Customs. They do not ask for a single fact, for any information, for statistics of the course of trade, or anything of the kind to be placed before them; they abnegate their duty of reasoning and coming to a conclusion from a state of facts set before them; they abnegate their position as such a body, and they simply sit there in order to register the opinion of the Controller of Customs. Now, Sir, there is nothing else disclosed in these papers. What has the Controller of Customs sent over to the Cabinet? He sent over simply this? He recited the fact that on the 22nd day of April—and he recites this fact on the 11th day of May, more than half a month after the thing had become law; twenty days after the law had been in operation, carried out on his decision and at his arbitrary order given to the collectors of customs all through the Dominion—on the 11th day of May he recites these strong and cogent reasons; these lucid circumstances and facts, upon which the Cabinet has to make up its mind:

That, on the 22nd day of April, the Minister of Finance submitted to the House of Commons certain resolutions for the revision of the customs tariff. That, as has been the practice, without any special statutory authority to give effect to the tariff changes, from the time the tariff resolutions are laid on the Table, subject to amendment, until the Tariff Bill is finally assented to. That, in accordance with such practice, he has given instructions to all collectors of customs to act upon the said tariff resolutions at once. That one of the said tariff resolutions makes provision for a reciprocal tariff on the following terms.

Then he cites the provision, and he cites schedule "D," and he says:

That the undersigned has decided that the customs tariff of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland is such as entitles articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of that country, to the benefits of the reciprocal tariff, subject to the limitations mentioned in the said Schedule "D," and has so directed the collectors of customs.

The Controller of Customs submits his action twenty days after he had taken it on these matters for the approval of His Excellency the Governor General in Council. There is not a shred of a reason given, not a single column of statistics, not a single sentence as to the course of trade, nothing of the kind upon which a body of men could reason and make up their minds. The Controller of Customs simply takes it as a matter of course that he should decide, and he sends over his decision, and he asks the Government in Cabinet assembled, to register his decision. Now, Sir, if he can do that in the case of England which was not specifically mentioned in those resolutions, he can do it—and must, I suppose, do it because this is the procedure he has set down for himself—in reference to any other country which he makes up his mind will come under the purview of this resolution. He looks at another country, he makes a decision, he sends his decision over to the Cabinet. That is, the Controller of Customs actually has the power under this procedure (which is the only comment of actuality we have upon the tariff clause) the Controller of Customs is the man who actually makes the commercial treaty with any country, makes it independent of Parliament, makes it independent of the Imperial authority, and simply sends it over to the Government for their registration and sanction.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am quite amazed to notice the manner in which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has endeavoured for several days to belabour the House with a repetition of useless arguments. However, he has only succeeded in convincing those who have listened to him, that he is trying in every possible shape and way to mystify public opinion with regard to this clause. He says that the Controller of Customs is the only individual who has to decide what country shall be entitled to its benefits. Well, Sir, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) reads the two lines that refer to the action of the Controller, he will see that the clause states distinctly “under the authority of the Governor in Council.” I wonder why the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) makes repeated attempts to show that the manner in which this clause has been drawn up, and the action of the Government under it, are such as to demonstrate that the Government have been virtually incapable in this matter. It is an amazing thing to me that the hon. gentleman should make these repeated attempts day after day. It looks to me as if he were disposed in every shape and way to belittle the effort the Government have made to show the mother country that we are anxious and earnest that better and closer trade relations should exist between us. He knows perfectly well that that is the entire object of this clause. He knows, also, that our laws are not like the laws of the Medes and Persians, but that they can be changed. He knows that Parliament will be again called together in a few months, and that any amendment which is necessary to keep this clause within the limit intended can easily be made. I would suggest that my hon. friend should take a lesson from the example set him by the distinguished leader he used to honour—a man, I admit, of great ability—Sir John Macdonald. When he came to this House to lead the Opposition when the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was called to administer the affairs of this country, what was his course? Was it a continued, daily expression of bitterness, animosity, disappointment and ill-feeling? Did he from day to day carry on a continuous fusillade such as we have had from the other side of this House? No. He said: “Gentlemen, you have been accorded the confidence of this country; we are going to give you every assistance to carry on the Government; go on, we are going to help you to perform your duty.” Is that the action of the ex-Finance Minister? No. From the day he has come here to discharge his duties as a member of this House, he has displayed the utmost bitterness and wickedness, determined, if possible, to frustrate legislation, and prevent the passage of the Government measures, keeping us sitting here day after day and repeating the same thing day after day. Surely the hon. gentleman will come to the conclusion that we have had enough of this sort of thing. He professes that he does not understand this clause. It is very convenient for hon. gentlemen opposite, when they do not want to understand a thing, to say they do not understand it. Prior to the 23rd of June last they declared that they could not understand the policy of the Liberal party; but the people of this country understood it right well, and when they came to vote, they recorded their votes with that understanding, and it is going to be given effect to by the measures which this Government have introduced and intend to carry through. The hon. ex-Finance Minister should try to possess his soul in patience. He has been relegated to the seat he occupies by the pronounced verdict of the people of this country, and he should cultivate a little patience and a little respect for the people, who have declared that the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier and the men he has around him shall have a fair opportunity of handling the affairs of this country. He should be willing to give them that chance. I would just like him to take the example set him by his honoured leader, and say, “Go on, gentlemen; you have the confidence of the country, we will give you all the assistance we can,” instead of carrying on the bitter, nagging fusillade he has done for many days.

Mr. BENNETT. That the session is not going to come to a close suddenly is proven by the breaking into the debate of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). He has certainly practised self-denial to an enormous extent; but this afternoon he has given proof, I think, that as soon as the First Minister leaves the country and his restraint over the hon. gentleman is removed, we may expect to hear a great deal more of him. This afternoon he has given us a little preliminary canter. He exercises himself very much as to what the conduct of the Opposition should be in this House. He has pointed to the fact that when Sir John Macdonald led the Opposition, they kept very quiet in this House. The hon. gentleman must remember that at that time the Government kept very quiet too. They kept so quiet, indeed, that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce described themselves as being simply so many flies on the wheel, and the flies did not go off with the revolutions of the wheel. They were perfectly peaceable. Who ever heard the Mackenzie Government introducing legislation on the trade question? The farmers of the country memorialized, not by thousands, but by tens and hundreds of thousands. The artisans went about the streets begging and praying for work, and whenever they came up, cheerless their faces were, they were met by the answer of the then Finance Minister: "We are simply flies on the wheel; what can we do?" Contrast with that the position of these gentlemen to-day. If they had only continued to be flies on the wheel, the factories would not be closed that are being closed in this country to-day. If they had continued to be flies on the wheel, they would not have had deputation after deputation coming here to protest against the raids and invasions they are making upon the tariff of the country. And, further, if they had continued in that position of acquiescence in regard to the past policy of the country, which has been of so much good to it, they would not have been making the spectacle of themselves that we have seen during the past few weeks. They came down to the House a few weeks ago with a tariff which they said was the result of a year's incubation; and afterwards they came forward—I do not know whether because of the influence of the hon. member for North Wellington—and said: "It is true we did submit a tariff, but we do not know whether the changes we made are improvements or not; put the old ones back, and we will give you newer and better ones." One part of their tariff particularly agitated them, and is agitating them to-day; that is, the resolution which is at present under discussion. When they first boasted, with a flourish of trumpets, that it was a preferential policy, the Minister of Trade and Commerce shook his head in a cunning way and said, "No, it is not preferential at all, for it brings in Germany;" and with a most significant and knowing wink, he added, "Perhaps the United States will come in too." Now, where are these hon. gentlemen to-day? After bringing in their resolutions, they said, "It is true we put in black and white certain statements of fact, but now we see that it is necessary to take a different attitude," and a most vital change is made. It is said here:

That any question that may arise as to the countries entitled to the benefits of the reciprocal tariff, shall be decided by the Controller of Customs, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council.

And further:

Mr. BENNETT.

That the Governor in Council may extend the benefits of such reciprocal tariff to any country which may be entitled thereto by virtue of any treaty with Her Majesty.

Now, it is to the latter clause, the clause "B," that I beg to call the attention of the House. That was a clause which found no place at all in the first resolution, and it was inserted in the amended resolutions because these hon. gentlemen had to admit that they were not free from doubt and found themselves in a hole and a hole of pretty large proportions. This debate has done a great deal of good. It has certainly cleared the air to a great extent because for at least a couple of weeks these hon. Ministers sat dumb on the Treasury benches, and when the question was asked, what is the meaning of the phrase, "on the whole," the only answer they would give was, it means "on the whole." Last night, however, the hon. First Minister did make a statement, and he made one that will certainly be hailed by business men with a good deal of interest. So that there may be no mistake as to what he said, I shall quote his own words. Referring to the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) he said:

I ask him simply to extend the operations and make this comparison, not only with regard to the articles which we exchange, but with regard to the articles which are to be found in the tariff of this country and in the tariff of another country.

We must presume from that, that if the aggregate tariff of any country, say Germany, is the same as or lower than the aggregate tariff of Canada, then Germany comes in under this clause. It is a pity the hon. gentlemen had not arrived at this conclusion a week ago, for then they might have had a couple of clerks comparing the tariffs of the two countries, calculating the average tariff for each, and then, if the average rate of the German tariff was the same as or came under that of Canada, they might have announced to the House, not only that Great Britain comes in under this clause, but Germany as well. There are, to my mind, very serious consequences to the business interests of the country going to result from the operation of this tariff. I am sorry that the hon. Controller of Customs is not in his place or the Finance Minister, but perhaps the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, whose department is akin to that of customs, will favour the House with a reply on this point. Assuming, for the sake of argument that a man imports $10,000 worth of silks upon which the duty would be $4,350; he would, under the present tariff, be entitled to a rebate of one-eighth, which would amount to about $437.50. Should, however, it turn out that this tariff does not come into force at all, will the importer be called upon to repay that extra $437.50? And if he has sold his goods, in the meantime, and afterwards the Government decide that the clause cannot come into force and he is not entitled to the rebate, will the importer be recouped for the loss he has made in selling his goods under the impression that he would be entitled to that reduction. To follow the matter a little further, assuming that a man purchases the same quality of goods and the same amount from the German seller, and after having bought them from the German seller the Controller of Customs has decided that Germany comes within the purview of this treaty, will the Government than be prepared to hand over to the purchaser of German goods the $437 on the ground that Germany was entitled to the benefit of this rebate just as Great Britain was? There must be a great many business men who are looking with the deepest interest to the working out of this tariff. It is true that hon. gentlemen opposite shout "hear, hear" in the most cheerful acquiescent way, and when I hear them express their cheerful acquiescence, I am reminded that in the last Parliament we, then on the Government side were continually being twitted with agreeing to everything proposed by the Government, because so many members supporting the Government held positions or promises of positions, and were therefore disposed to vote anything through. I do not know how many gentlemen over there may be about to take positions under the Government, but if the newspaper reports are true, there is going to be an awful lot of them provided for, and judging by their anxious expectant looks and by the cheerful way in which they acquiesce in everything, it is evident that the newspaper reports are not very far wrong. Whether that be the case or not, one thing is certain, and that is that hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to regard this matter with the serious and sober earnestness that the business men of the country do. In conclusion, I can only say to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that the occasion amply justifies the use by us of that classic phrase of the hon. gentleman, which I have heard him repeat, on actual counting, 999 times during the last session of the late Government, and then gave up the calculation, "Let hon. gentlemen opposite possess their soul in patience," the Opposition have a duty to perform and that duty has been forced upon them by the Government of the day. If the Government of the day had been prepared to do what the Mackenzie Government did on coming into power—carry out the line of policy on which they appealed to the country—they would not meet with the opposition they do. But so long as they propose to place on the statute-books perfect riddles in the shape of legislation, perfect marvels of the art, "how not to do it," which they cannot stand up and defend, they must expect to be brought to task by the Opposition. Why, they cannot even determine the question from a legal standpoint. While they all admit that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) made a valiant legal argument, not one of them has had the temerity to stand up and say that the hon. Minister was right. There is not a business man on this side who has stated his conviction that the hon. Minister was right. Even the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who is a shrewd business man and a strong partisan, although he talked for an hour the other night on the trade question, was singularly silent on the effect this much-talked-of clause would have. And last night when that eminent constitutional authority, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) rose to break a lance in its behalf, he confined his endeavours to the attempt to make a merry jest, and failed to endorse by a single word the legal opinion of the hon. Minister of Marine. That hon. gentleman, however, is to be congratulated on this, that if there has not been any approval on that side of the House of the stand he took, neither has there been a dissenting voice. Let me say to the hon. member for North Wellington that if he can prevail on his hon. friends to withdraw their legislation on the tariff and do exactly what the Mackenzie Government did, parade themselves as flies on the wheel, they will have a very short session indeed.

Mr. CLANCY. I desire to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to the fact that in the report which he has laid on the Table, I am unable to find any instructions given to the collectors of customs. He intimated a moment ago that when this report would be laid upon the Table, it would be found to contain the instructions given the collectors of customs, but if he will read it, he will find that the instructions given are exactly what is stated in the resolution itself. Surely we are not now to be told that after this tariff has been in operation for more than a month, no instructions have been given the collectors of customs on a question which the hon. gentleman admits is so difficult. I am sorry that the hon. Controller of Customs is not here and I am equally disappointed that no definite instructions have been given beyond what are contained in the report of the Controller of Customs, and in that report there are absolutely no definite instructions whatever. The only instructions given to the collectors of customs is that they are to be guided by the articles coming in under schedule "G." There are, of course, the excepted items of tobacco, liquor, cigars and sugar. They were perfectly plain and, standing by themselves, they have absolutely no relation to the broader question affecting the very difficult duties that I attempted a moment ago to point out were required from the collectors of customs, and I think that the House and the country will hear with great disappointment if it can only be said that the collectors of customs take practically the resolution that has been before the House for more than a month, and that this is all the instructions that they have to go upon in this most intricate and difficult matter. If the Finance Minister can assure the committee that other instructions have been given to the collectors of customs, I am sure that statement will be received with great satisfaction.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). If my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) means to ask if any instructions were given at variance with the Order in Council, I can assure him that none were given. I regret that he did not put the question again while my hon. friend the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) was in his place. No doubt, the instructions were given by the Controller of Customs, in the first place, to apply this reciprocal tariff to Great Britain only. One hon. gentleman who spoke the other day assumed that collectors of customs were to decide that point for themselves. But instructions were given by the Controller of Customs that the reciprocal tariff was to be applied to Great Britain only. If a request had been made for the exact words of the instructions, no doubt the Controller of Customs would have brought the instructions down. No doubt they are exceedingly brief. I believe they were not included in the papers brought down. If it is of interest I will ask the Controller of Customs to lay before the House a copy of these instructions.

Mr. SPROULE. This illustrates one of the things which Parliament, unfortunately, has the right to complain of—that while we are dealing with important questions upon which the Government could give us information, they withhold that information until the time is passed when it could be of use. When the question was under discussion how the Controller of Customs was to determine whether a given nation was entitled to come in under the favoured-nation clause of this tariff or not, I think we ought to have had something showing the principle upon which he dealt with the case. No principle is set forth in the Order in Council that has been brought down. That Order in Council leaves us as much in the dark as ever. But we have the information that twenty days after the Budget speech was made the Order in Council was with reference to Great Britain passed. Now it seems to me that an important and interesting problem is involved here. If it took the Cabinet twenty days to determine that a country which levied no duty against Canadian goods should come in under the favoured-nation clause, how long will it take them to decide the case of a country that levies a duty on 2,000 lines of our goods. I imagine it would take two years or more. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) complained of the discussion of this matter by the members of the Opposition; he said we were mystifying this question. If any hon. gentleman of this House has given the House the benefit of his views so often as to be open to the charge of mystifying questions, it is the hon. member for North Wellington. He objected to what he called the "fusilade against us," as though he himself were a member of the Government. Was there ever a member who continued a greater fusilade against the Government than the hon. member for North Wellington when in Opposition? He was not contented with speaking nine hundred and ninety-nine times in a session of Parliament, but went above the thousand and was just as anxious to speak then as when he commenced. He did not think that it was a "continuous fusilade," and objected very much if any one suggested that he was doing anything but his duty. Yet this hon. gentleman complains when hon. members of the Opposition try to elicit information in order that they may decide intelligently upon the subject under discussion. We hoped that when this Order in Council was brought down, it would give us some information, information which we had the right to expect before we dealt with the question under consideration last night. We were trying to ascertain the principle upon which the Government decided whether a country should or should not come under this favoured-nation clause of the tariff. And why did we seek that information? Because we feared that the question might be decided in a manner which might be much against the interest of Canada. Suppose the question came before the Controller of Customs to determine as to the case of any country, the United States or any other. Would he say, for instance: We will take these articles: Wheat, with a duty of say, 15 cents a bushel; oats, 7½ cents per bushel; pease, 10 cents a bushel; barley, 15 cents a bushel; cattle, 20 per cent; horses, 20 per cent; eggs, 5 cents per dozen; fowl, 5 per cent and butter 4 cents per pound, and ascertain not whether the same articles are allowed in at the same rate of duty, but whether I can find any nine articles on this or any other line that are admitted at the same or a lower rate of duty, and upon this I will decide whether this country shall or shall not be admitted under the favoured-nation clause? We were afraid that the Controller of Customs might decide in this way against Canada's interests, in other words that a country might come in under this clause, even while retaining the high duty upon articles which Canada would be interested in sending there, simply because it allowed low rates of duty on articles that Canada cared little about, as to whether they were admitted free or at a high rate of duty. It was for this reason that we wished some information as to the principle upon which these questions were to be decided. We had no information upon the matter whatever. The only answer we had from members of the Government was simply a reiteration of the words of the resolution that if "upon the whole" it was found that a country had a tariff as favourable as that of Canada, that country should be admitted. We had the right to expect that the Order in Council in regard to Great Britain would have set forth the principle. But does it do so? Not at all. If it is in this way that the Controller of Customs determines with regard to any other country that it shall come in under the favoured-nation clause of this tariff, I am sure he will not satisfy the Canadian people, and is likely to do them great injury. The Government should have given us more information long before this, and to that information we are entitled before we decide whether we shall pass this clause or not. If the Government refuse to give that information, they will be treating Parliament as it should not be treated, they will be treating the people's representatives with contempt and not with the consideration that they are entitled at the hands of the Government.

Mr. BEATTIE. I would not have spoken on this subject but for the remarks of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). The hon. member for North Wellington is an old merchant, and should be able to give us some points on this question. He sat in his seat and heard the Minister of Finance telling the House that there would be great difficulties in the way of carrying out this clause; but when the hon. member for North Wellington got up, he evaded that question altogether. Now, I will venture to say that that hon. gentleman himself cannot say that this clause can be carried out satisfactorily. He knows perfectly well that there is not a custom-house appraiser in this country that will take upon himself to decide whether the goods imported into this country are of German or of English manufacture. The Minister of Finance, I think it was, stated last night that five million dollars' worth of goods were imported into this country from Germany. Now, we know perfectly well that there are ten or twelve million dollars' worth of goods coming into this country of German manufacture; but the balance over the five millions come in through the back-door of England, they come to this country through British warehouses. Now, will the member for North Wellington pretend to tell me that he can distinguish goods manufactured in Germany from those manufactured in Great Britain? I will tell him he cannot. The Minister of Finance says that they don't intend to leave the matter in the hands of the custom-house appraiser. Now, if the custom-house appraiser is not going to be able to tell us whether these goods are of German or of British manufacture, who is? Is the gentleman who examines the invoices, able to tell us? Certainly not. Then I say there is nothing in this clause to protect the honest business man from fraud. I think the business men of this country, and the members of this House have a right to know and should know, before this clause passes, in what way or in what manner the business men of Canada are to be protected from fraud. I speak as an old business man, representing, perhaps, the fifth largest business centre in this Dominion, and I say that I cannot see how the Canadian manufacturer is to be protected. I sympathize with the Minister of Finance. I know where the difficulty is, perhaps, just as well as he does, or as any other member of the Government does. If I were a custom-house appraiser, I do not think I could detect but a very few lines of goods of German manufacture from those of British manufacture—not only German goods, but Belgian and Swiss goods also. It has been stated that there are only some nineteen million dollars' worth of goods coming into this country from the different foreign countries of Europe. The Minister of Finance knows that is a mistake. I grant he is right if we take only those goods coming directly from those countries; but he knows perfectly well that double that amount of goods come in from Europe through England. England is the merchant of the world; her ships go to all the ports of the world and bring the merchandise of those countries into Great Britain. No doubt, the hon. Finance Minister is, perhaps, as well posted on the subject as I am, and he must know that the English merchant can go to any of those countries he mentioned last night, and will buy ten times as many of those goods as any merchant in this country dare to buy, yes, fifty times as much. He will buy them at a low price and carry them home to England, because the freight is a small matter, and he sells them to the Canadian merchant at a price much less than the Canadian merchant can purchase the quantities he requires from those countries himself. Now, I do not wish to take up the time of the House any longer, but I speak because I think this matter should be put clearly before the House, and before the business men of the country. The Government should tell us how Canadian manufacturers are going to be protected. It is not abuse we want from the hon. member for North Wellington, but it is information that we are asking on behalf of the business interests of Canada, and that I think we ought to get.

Mr. CRAIG. I resent the imputation made by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that the Opposition are wasting the time of the House. If I wished to say anything about wasting time, I might point out the fact that practically no Government measures have been brought down at all this session, or pushed through. We have had the Franchise Bill brought down, and that was dropped for this session. We had the Superannuation Bill, and after we talked about that, it was also dropped. Then we waited for about three weeks, and nothing at all was brought forward. Instead of wasting the time of the House, I think we have been doing the very opposite on this side of the House; and if the session has been prolonged at all, it has not been by the Opposition, but by the Government themselves. I am not going to find fault with the Government, and say they have been wasting time, as we are charged with doing; because they tell us that they have been listening to deputations from all over the country who said that the tariff, as first brought down, was injurious to their business interests. I am glad the Government did listen to them, did not turn a deaf ear to them in that matter. But we are not wasting time in discussing this resolution. I hold that this resolution is one of the most important parts of the tariff, and if we are going to spend time at all on any part of the tariff, I hold we should spend it in discussing this resolution. I cannot understand how hon. members opposite can support this resolution. I have looked at it from many points of view; and I propose to read, in a little while, part of an article from the Montreal "Witness," which I know hon. gentlemen opposite will listen to attentively, and no doubt they will believe it sooner than they will believe anything that I say. But I wish again to repudiate the idea that we are wasting time in opposing this resolution. In doing so, I maintain that we are defending the industries of this country against the assaults made upon them by this resolution. I believe myself, as I have already said, that this resolution was introduced mainly as a sop to the free traders of this country, because the general tariff is a protective tariff, without doubt. I maintain it is a protective tariff in its main features, and the "Witness" in this article admits that. But there is no doubt that this resolution is put in as a sop to the free traders. They wanted something, and they have got this, and I am afraid of it for that reason. It pretends to give a preference to Great Britain, but there is nothing preferential to Great Britain in it at all. It makes no pretense of being preferential to Great Britain, on the face of it. The speech of the Finance Minister pretended it was, but this resolution itself does not pretend that; and we must admit, after hearing all this discussion, that this resolution is not at all giving a preference to Great Britain. I say that we are defending the industries of this country, and in doing that we are defending the workingmen of this country. It is all very well to talk about loyalty, but I do not want to be loyal at the expense of Canada, I do not want to be loyal to Great Britain as one part of the Empire, at the expense of this part of the Empire. I want to be loyal to Canada, and

Mr. CRAIG.

I maintain, as I have said before, that in building up Canada, in defending the industries and the workingmen of this country, we are building up the Empire, and we are showing our loyalty to the Empire. It is very well to make a pretense of loyalty, but I maintain that Englishmen themselves, if they thought this resolution was going to injure the interests of Canada, would say that we were very foolish to carry our loyalty so far as that. They would not want us to do it. Now, I am going to make a statement which I would like to hear denied by some members on the opposite side of the House, if they can possibly do so. The statement I make is this, that no country ever placed such power in the hands of one man as is proposed to be placed in the hands of the Controller of Customs by this resolution. Now, will that be denied by any hon. gentleman opposite? If that will not be denied, I hold it is a startling statement, a startling proposition. I say that no country has ever placed such great power in the hands of one man as this resolution, if carried, will place in the hands of the Controller of Customs. I go further, and I say that the Finance Minister, or the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that none of the members of the Cabinet can point to any country which has placed such legislation as this on its Statute-book. If they can, I would like to hear it, I would like to hear what they have to say about that. I do not believe that any country would be so foolish. I cannot imagine the United States doing that, I cannot imagine them passing such legislation as this, and committing such great power to the hands of one man, as the Government and their followers propose to commit to the hands of the Controller of Customs. Now, I am going to read a selection from the Montreal "Witness," which I think is a paper accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite; and I should be very glad if they would listen to this, not for my sake, but for the sake of the Montreal "Witness":

Another thing which has, perhaps, given a false impression of the real motive of the tariff, is the great talk that has been made about the preference given to Great Britain, until the critics have felt themselves justified in speaking as though any reduction to any other country was treason against the principle of the tariff. The first principle of the tariff is reduction of protective duties towards all countries alike. It is only a secondary principle which reserves that reduction as towards protectionist countries until reciprocal reductions can be obtained. Though it might rob us of some chance for chaffering over equivalents, it would be wholly in accord with the great principle of the tariff and a positive and great advantage to Canada, if her duties were reduced toward Germany and Belgium. We should view with no distress at all the necessity that would compel this, or even if, as Sir Charles Tupper a little wildly says, it were extended to all Europe.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. CRAIG. I am glad hon. gentlemen opposite agree with those sentiments. I thought they did so, and I was waiting for some expression of approval from them.

There is one remark reported of Mr. Davies which we take to be either a slip of the tongue or of the pen of the reporter, where he is made to say that until Germany and Belgium offer a preferential rate such as is offered by Canada, those countries cannot obtain the advantage of those concessions. To this we object altogether.

I am reading this portion of the article to show how very difficult it is for people to agree as to the meaning of this resolution. I have not heard two hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House agree in their views regarding it. We have heard very little from hon. gentlemen opposite, but what we have heard sufficiently shows the difficulty that prevails. Now we find the "Witness," a paper with very strong leanings towards the Liberals, but which claims to be independent, endeavouring to show that the resolution has a different meaning altogether. It says :

We can never ask for a preferential rate from those countries. All that was said by the resolution was, that we should have as favourable rates from them as we were giving them. It was, we think, implied in Mr. Fielding's speeches, that they must give us concessions in actual return for what we are now offering. This is different from the principle of the resolution, as equivalent concessions might be more or less than enough to bring another country's tariff to as favourable a rate of figures as ours, but it is very different, on the other hand, from demanding preferential concessions.

The "Witness" objects to a statement which they understood the Minister of Marine to make, that a country must offer preferential rates to Canada in order to obtain the benefit of the reductions offered. But they also object to a remark made by the Finance Minister, that such countries must make us concessions for the advantages we offer. The "Witness" takes the ground, which is the common-sense ground, that if the tariff of any other country is on the average the same or lower than our tariff, that country should have the right to come under this preferential rate. That is the ground taken by the "Witness"—I do not know what ground is taken by hon. gentlemen opposite. The "Witness" continues :

In fact, except accidentally, there is nothing preferential in the tariff at all. It offers to all equally liberal countries our lower rate and to all less liberal our higher rate. The talk of preference has been a happy stage effect, very well adapted to this year of loyalty.

I agree with a good deal stated by the "Witness," although it does lean strongly to the other side of the House. I think this preferential idea as regards Great Britain has been very well worked into this resolution and comes at a very fortunate time for hon. gentlemen opposite, this being the Diamond Jubilee year. We on this side of the House are in favour of a true preferential arrangement. I am very much amused by some of the newspapers which talk about the huckstering policy of the Opposition. Why, we have no huckstering policy. We make a fair proposition. We say we are anxious to have preferential trade with Great Britain, but we want it to be true preferential trade and not preferential trade spread over the whole globe, and one which in a short time would admit here the goods of every country in the world and destroy all the industries of Canada. But we desire, when a preferential trade arrangement with Great Britain is entered into, that they shall secure advantages and we shall secure advantages as well. I hold that we must look first to Canadian interests, and if while doing so we can at the same time secure extended trade with Great Britain, then we should do so ; but if in order to extend our trade with and show our loyalty to England we are to be called upon to destroy the interests of our workmen and of our farmers, I am at all times prepared to vote against the adoption of such a policy.

Mr. SPROULE. I should like to obtain some information as to what has been done in regard to this Order in Council. In the report it is stated :

The undersigned, Controller of Customs, has the honour to report as follows :—

That, on Thursday, the 22nd of April instant, the Minister of Finance submitted to the House of Commons certain resolutions for the revision of the customs tariff ;

That it has been the practice, without any special statutory authority, to give effect to tariff changes from the time the tariff resolutions are laid on the Table, subject to amendment until the Tariff Bill is finally assented to ;

That, in accordance with such practice, he has given instructions to all collectors of customs to act upon the said tariff resolutions at once.

One of the tariff resolutions is the preferential clause. The Controller goes on to say :

That any question that may arise as to the countries entitled to the benefit of the reciprocal tariff, shall be decided by the Controller of Customs, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council.

Only a few days afterwards we saw in the Montreal newspapers that the Belgian consul had told an importer that Belgium goods were entitled to come in under the most-favoured-nation clause, and that he should pay duty under protest. So the question has arisen in regard to Belgium. A few days afterwards the same question was raised by the German consul with respect to Germany. But I do not find a word said here by the Controller in regard to these matters. He says :

That the undersigned has decided that the customs tariff of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland is such as entitles articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of that country, to the benefits of the reciprocal tariff, subject to the limitation mentioned in section "D," and has so directed all collectors of customs.

In his report the Controller reports with respect to one country, although he has to decide with respect to every question that may arise. These questions have arisen. I want to ask the Finance Minister if the Government has considered these questions, and whether the Controller of Customs has decided if Germany and Belgium are entitled to send their goods here under the reciprocal clause.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The Controller of Customs has decided that Great Britain was entitled, and no other country was entitled, to the reciprocal tariff. If the Controller of Customs decided anything further and prepared a report thereon, then it would be necessary to pass an Order in Council; but the Controller has not considered it necessary—and the members of the Government agree with the Controller—to do anything beyond that report.

Mr. FOSTER. As soon as a decision has been given by the Controller of Customs, must the Governor in Council pass an Order in Council based on the Controller's report?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We have certainly no intention to carry out such view. I did not express it.

Mr. SPROULE. The Controller states that the United Kingdom is entitled to the benefit of the reciprocal tariff, but he does not refer to any other country. The Order on which the Governor in Council acted makes no reference to any other country except the United Kingdom. Whether any other country has claimed the right to come under the reciprocal tariff does not appear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Controller of Customs has already laid before the House, or has read a letter from the Belgian consul on this subject; at all events, the fact that the Belgian consul has already made such application is already publicly known. If the Controller of Customs had decided that Belgium or any other country was entitled to the benefit of the reciprocal tariff, the Controller would have reported to Council to consider it as it might please. Not having so decided, Council has not been called upon to take any formal action on the point.

Mr. SPROULE. Then, if he has not decided he has not considered the question at all. I assume of course, that if the hon. gentleman has had it under consideration he would make some kind of a report, whether that country had or had not the right. As there is no mention of it here, I take it for granted that he has not considered it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I cannot help what my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) takes for granted.

Mr. WALLACE. Furthermore, the Prime Minister and the Controller of Customs have made statements to this House, and which statements are diametrically opposite. For instance, the Prime Minister makes the statement:

We had to look around all the world to see what countries could be admitted under this preferential tariff, and, having looked over the world, from the one pole to the other, we saw only one nation in the position to take advantage of this tariff, and it was Great Britain.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the Prime Minister gave any such minute investigation, or that he looked into the tariff's and trade conditions of every country in the world from pole to pole. I hardly think he did that. But the Controller of Customs on the contrary, tells us another story, and his story as given in his own words is:

You have noticed that the question must first arise, and, when it arises, it will be my duty then, under the law, to examine into it, to ascertain the facts that require to be known by the Government before an order is given for the admission of articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of the country in question.

The Controller of Customs here says, that they have not investigated the matter at all, that they have not looked into the circumstances of every country from one pole to the other, but that as soon as any country makes a claim he will investigate it.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. Minister admits that a claim has been made.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, for this one country, but the Controller of Customs was speaking generally of all the countries in the world which the Prime Minister referred to, and the Controller of Customs contradicts the Prime Minister and says that the Prime Minister is off his eggs. The Controller of Customs said furthermore:

If any government makes a representation, then it would be my duty, as I understand it, to possess myself of full knowledge as to the tariff and the working of its tariff.

It would appear then, that the Controller does not know it now, and that he yet has to take into consideration whether any other country shall come under this tariff or not. Mr. Chairman, we would like the Controller of Customs to be in his seat in the House now. It is not respectful to this House; it is not respectful to the gentlemen who are discussing this question, that the Controller of Customs is continually absent from his seat in this House when this matter is being discussed. We have rights in this House, and we have duties to perform here, and the members of the Government have duties to the members of this House as well. I say, Sir, that I have looked on from day to day and have experienced the feeling that the Government—certain members of it at any rate—are not courteous as they should be to the members of this House, and are not ready here to defend their policy which is being criticised. More particularly is this a grievance when the Government do not seem to have any settled policy on the matter. What did the Prime Minister tell us but yesterday. Here are his words :

The sentiments of my hon. friend the Controller of Customs, who spoke on this subject, are my sentiments.

Well, now, the sentiments of the Controller of Customs as I have read them to the House are entirely different sentiments from those of the Prime Minister. I need not repeat the further remarks of the Prime Minister where he told us that he looked at the tariff of every country in the world from pole to pole, he not only took in the geography, but he studied their conditions and made a careful investigation of all these matters before he made this tariff proposal. I believe it was the duty of the Government to do that before they submitted this measure to the House, but it is quite evident—even if we had not the statement of the Controller of Customs—that they had not done so. When they submitted this resolution to the House on the 24th of April, they should have previously made all the investigations necessary, and prevented the members of this House from taking a leap in the dark. They should have considered the effect of this preferential tariff upon the business of the country; they should have weighed the advantages and disadvantages that would accrue to Canada. They should have studied the interests of Canada, not the interests of other countries, and they should have considered well whether the adoption of it would be beneficial to Canada or not. We are legislating for Canada here; we should consider what is to the welfare of Canada, and not what is to the welfare or advantage of other countries. The Controller of Customs has repeatedly told us, that he does not know what the effect of this preferential tariff is going to be, but as soon as some country makes an application to be admitted under the minimum rate then he will decide. I imagine the desperate position in which such conduct on the part of the Government places this country. They have made an arrangement for the reduction of the tariff in favour of any country which may comply with certain conditions, but the Government cannot tell us what countries to-day comply with these conditions, and the Controller of Customs coolly tells us, that he is ignorant as to what the result will be, and that he does not care to make any inquiry until some country makes a claim, when he will sit down and investigate, and recommend to Council. On the other hand the Premier tells us that all this work has been done already, and thus, we see how unanimous in their sentiments and their views are the members of this Government.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It may be an evidence of my obtuseness, but I fail to discover that remarkable conflict referred to by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) between the utterances of the Prime Minister and the utterances of the Controller of Customs. Undoubtedly it did become necessary, at the beginning of this matter, to take a general look at the tariffs of the world, with a view of ascertaining what countries would come under this proposal, and in that general view—which was not a very exhaustive and minute one I do not mind confiding to my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace), and the Prime Minister did not say it was—in that general view, we had no difficulty in discovering that one country came within the arrangement and should receive the benefit immediately. That country was Great Britain. If any other country afterwards claimed the privilege, then, as stated by the Controller of Customs, the justice of the claim of that country will be inquired into. My chief object in rising was to say, that my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) is not justified in assuming that the absence of the Controller of Customs is intended in the way of discourtesy, nor is it a neglect of duty. I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) did not intend his remarks to mean this. I know that the Controller of Customs has been employed every moment of his time in the discharge of urgent duties in connection with his department, and I know that he has been called out of this House two or three times this afternoon by urgent business. True, we may say that a Minister should remain in his seat, but it is not always easy for a Minister to do so. The other night there were complaints from the opposite side of the House about the absence of Ministers from their seats. On that occasion I myself was absent for a few moments, but I was absent at the instance of a gentleman of the Opposition who wished to speak to me on public business. I certainly did not mean any discourtesy to gentlemen on the Opposition benches when I left my seat for that purpose. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the Controller of Customs only left the House because urgent public duties called him away. He was here to-day, and he will be here again before this sitting closes. I would not have the idea go abroad that he has shown the slightest discourtesy to any hon. members, or that he was absent without cause.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. Minister tell us how many and what countries have applied for the advantages of this favoured-nation clause?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Speaking from memory, I think the only formal application has come from the Belgian consul; but I will not be positive.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the Minister be good enough to inform us how the collectors of customs can decide? If, for instance, the Belgian consul said to an importer: "You have a right to have these advantages for your goods," how is a collector of customs to decide when he has no specified instructions beyond those contained in that Order in Council?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend is labouring under the delusion that it is the business of the collectors of customs at the several ports to determine this question. It is not their business. The business of the collectors of customs at the several ports is to carry out the directions of the head of the department; and until they receive such directions, they will not give any country the privileges of that clause.

Mr. SPROULE. That is why I am asking. They are expected to act under instructions, and is it possible they have not been given any instructions up to this time?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have already stated that instructions have been given to them to extend this privilege to the trade of Great Britain, and not beyond that.

Mr. SPROULE. Suppose I am bringing goods from Germany?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The answer you will get will be that that you will have to pay the higher duty. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem anxious that German goods should have the privilege of the lower duty. We are excluding German goods from that privilege. Whatever the ultimate decision may be, that is the present decision of the Controller of Customs, and it has been concurred in by Council.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken if he attributes to me the desire to have German goods admitted at the lower rate. I only select that case as an illustration of what might apply to any other country in the world. In the absence of instructions on this point, the Government are only making confusion for the importer. How is he to import goods? The rate of duty he pays enables him to decide at what profit he shall sell the goods he imports. If he thinks he can import at the lower scale of duty, upon that he may be deceived, and may afterwards have to pay the higher rate; and if he pays the higher rate, and afterwards gets the reduction, how is he to get it? The Controller of Customs has not determined. The hon. Finance Minister says that he has decided that England shall get this privilege and no other country; but these instructions do not say a word about no other country.

Mr. TAYLOR. Perhaps I misunderstood the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who is at the head of the Department of Finance as well as at the head of the Department of Customs; but I thought I heard him say to the Minister of Finance a few moments ago, "Don't answer him." I hope I did not hear him correctly, because I think we are entitled to receive answers to respectful questions and I think the question submitted by my hon. friend was one that demanded an answer. I propose asking one now, and I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce will not forbid it being answered. I see that the Controller of Customs is now in his seat, and I will ask it of him. I want to know if a number of importers of foreign goods paid the customs duties demanded by the collectors at the different ports, and paid them under protest, claiming the right to have the preferential duty; and if so, what countries the goods came from?

Mr. SPROULE.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I cannot answer that question off-hand. I will ask for the information from my department, and give it to the hon. gentleman later.

Mr. TAYLOR. Is the hon. gentleman aware that some entries have been made and protests filed at the same time?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. I do not know.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was rather unfair to this side of the House, when, a few moments ago, he charged us with desiring to have the goods of Germany brought into this country at the lower rate of duty. Speaking for myself, I am opposed to goods coming from Germany to this country at the lower rate of duty; in fact, I am opposed to goods from that or any other country coming to this country at a cut of 25 per cent on the regular tariff, because I believe it is not in the interest of this country that that should be done. Now, I am glad that this question has been so thoroughly ventilated. I believe a great deal of good will come out of this discussion. It will make more apparent the unreasonable nature of the proposition the Government are making. I do not desire to raise again the constitutional question, which was so ably discussed by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), and my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden), who the other day delivered a speech which no hon. member on the other side of the House dared or attempted to answer. The constitutional question, I think, is effectively settled, and we may leave it as settled. With regard to the question of the preferential tariff, it is certainly a far-reaching question. I cannot see at all that this provision is confined to England. To my mind, it extends to almost every country in the world, because, as has been so well said by my hon. friend from London (Mr. Beattie), even if other countries are not entitled under treaties to send goods to Canada at the lower rate of duty, there is no doubt that the goods of those countries will find their way into Canada through the back-door of England. German manufacturers will be careful to see that that is done. They will see that an arrangement is made by which the Canadian purchasers of their goods will get them in at the lower rate of duty, simply by passing them through England. We know that the mercantile marine of England extends over the whole world. The trade of England having connections with almost every country on the face of the globe, it is reasonable to believe that England will become to a greater extent the distributor of the commerce of the world, so far as Canada is concerned; and if we admit at the lower rate of duty goods from Great Britain, and not from any other country, we must expect that a largely increased quantity of our imports will come from foreign countries through Great Britain. While we now import $19,000,000 from other countries than Great Britain and the United States, we must expect that that amount will be greatly reduced, and the greater amount of our imports will come in at the lower rate of duty prescribed by the tariff. Take, for instance, cotton manufactures: we imported in 1896 $3,366,500 worth from Great Britain, $115,517 from Germany, $24,764 from Switzerland, and $55,271 from France. Now, I am quite sure that there is no hon. member in this House who will believe, for one moment, that we only consumed in this country, in the year 1896, $55,271 worth of cotton goods imported from France or $24,764 worth imported from Switzerland. I am quite sure that the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie) is correct in his contention that manufactured goods from these countries find their way into Great Britain and are thence shipped to Canada. This practice will be increased under the preferential clause, and the result will be that our imports direct from France and Germany will be reduced while our imports from Great Britain will be increased. I do not believe that this is in the interests of Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite might as well make a clean sweep and reduce our tariff generally on goods from these countries by one-eighth or one-quarter, because that will be the practical effect. On this side, however, we do not believe that this is an opportune time to reduce the tariff to the extent to which the Government propose to reduce it. Though in the case of a few articles the appraisers may be able to determine from what country they originally came, in the great majority they will not be able to arrive at any such conclusion. In the article of tea, for instance, which we import from Great Britain as well as from China and Japan, there will be no difficulty in determining whether it ought to come in or not at the low rate of duty, if a duty were at all imposed on tea, because tea is not produced in England; but in the case of manufactured articles, no regulations can be made by the Controller of Customs which will enable the appraiser to determine beyond doubt, in every instance, whether they are entitled to come in at the lower rate or should be charged the higher rate. Take the article of silks. We imported silks from Great Britain to the amount of $1,901,627 in 1896, from France, $126,000, from Germany, $108,000, and from Switzerland, $133,000. Now, I am quite sure this does not at all represent fairly the manufactures of these different countries which are purchased by our merchants and dealers. There can be no doubt that, as in cotton goods, a large amount of silks find their way into this country from Great Britain, which are the manufacture of foreign countries, and there can be equally no doubt that under this clause a still larger amount of these foreign manufactured goods will be brought into this country from Great Britain in order to benefit by the reduced rates, and I certainly do not think that the hon. Minister of Finance intended that foreign silks should be given the benefit of the minimum tariff when other articles of more common use have to pay the higher tariff. Then take the articles of spices, there can be no difficulty in determining whether spices should come in at the lower or higher rate of duty because spices are not produced in Great Britain but in the East Indies. Cinnamon, ginger and other spices imported direct from the East Indies should be charged the higher rate, but when sent to England and thence exported to Canada, as manufactured articles, they would come in at the lower rate, so that we would have the manufactured article coming in at the lower rate and the raw material coming in at the higher rate. The whole thing seems to be so confusing, that I would be glad to see the clause wiped out completely. Let the Government take another year to consider this question and see if some better system cannot be arrived at and have the trade of our country better protected than seems possible under the present arrangement. I have said that I am not in favour of giving a preference to Great Britain. I may qualify my statement by saying that I would be glad to support, at any time, a reasonable preferential trade with Great Britain. Such was the policy of the Conservative party, but we never proposed a policy that is all give and no get. I do not believe in a policy of giving everything and getting nothing, and if Great Britain is not going to give us something in return for what we are giving them, I am opposed to preferential trade on that basis. We have gone down on our knees, year after year, and begged Great Britain to admit our live stock into the English markets, but each time met with an absolute refusal, and after that refusal we now propose to give the manufactured products of England admission into our market at reduced rates. I see nothing fair in a proposition of that kind. Whilst we are willing to make concessions to Great Britain, she ought to be willing to give something in return. It is unfair to our labouring men that they should be thrust out of employment merely for the sake of giving the artisans and workmen of Great Britain something to do. I had a communication from a manufacturer, a few days ago, who told me that he would be forced by this tariff to cut down his business one-half, which simply means that one-half of his workmen would be driven to seek employment elsewhere. I ask the hon. Minister of Finance how he expects our working classes to enjoy this Jubilee year with such a prospect staring them in the face. How can he expect those men, who are thrown out of work by the operation of his tariff, to sing "God Save the Queen" on the 22nd of June and cheer for Her Majesty? Are they not just as much entitled to have a Jubilee year as the artisans and workmen of Great Britain? I hope the hon. gentleman will reconsider this resolution and see if he cannot do something for our working classes.

I think it is a mistake to place this great power in the hands of one man. It is a great mistake, indeed, that the Controller of Customs should be entrusted with such absolute power. It is a great mistake to give him the power of determining, at his own sweet will, whether or not any particular country is entitled to this preferential trade. Or even if that power is vested in the Governor in Council, it is too absolute and wide a power to put in the hands of the thirteen or fourteen men who sit on the Treasury benches. I do not think, for one moment, that this Parliament should surrender the trust that has been placed in it and give up its right to determine what the tariff of the country should be, by leaving that determination completely in the hands of the Governor in Council. I am therefore in favour of striking out the latter part of the resolution altogether, and of leaving to Parliament the duty of deciding definitely and exclusively what our tariff should be. If we go back to the days of Magna Charta, we will find that, from that time down, the struggle in the old land has ever been to obtain power for the people over the Crown; and in this country, that same fight went on for years, but it remained for the Liberal party to propose an entirely different policy. In the province of Ontario, which has been ruled by the Liberal party for the last twenty-five years we find the same thing prevailing. By Order in Council the Government there have the power to sell our timber lands, which are the most valuable asset the province has. The provincial government never think of consulting the local legislature as to whether it is right or not to sell these lands, but they decide for themselves by Order in Council. The effect of it is that we are over-governed by Order in Council. There should be less of it, in my opinion, and Parliament should exercise greater control. It would appear that the Minister of Justice (Sir Oliver Mowat) who was the ruling spirit in the legislature of Ontario, is exercising control of this Parliament, that he is bringing into this Parliament the principles by which he ruled in that legislature, and he is going to introduce here even in a more extended way than he did there the system of governing by Orders in Council. I trust that we shall not adopt this plan, that the principle of governing the country by the opinion of one man or by the will of the Government will be abandoned, and that our good old practice will be continued of leaving Parliament to say how the people of this country shall be governed, what taxes they should pay and how those taxes shall be levied and collected. I trust that this resolution will not receive the sanction of the House. I trust that the good sense of the Government will show them that a mistake has been made and will show them the propriety of not pressing forward this proposal. I trust that Parliament will have an opportunity at least of saying what shall be the taxes imposed on the people of the country and that we shall continue to legislate in the interests of the people.

Mr. CLANCY. The statement made by the First Minister (Mr. Laurier) yesterday, is as follows:—

Let me, in conclusion, repeat to my hon. friend what I had the pleasure of telling him the other day, that we have already gone into this operation; we have looked over the whole globe, and we have found only one country whose tariff, so far as we know, is on a level with ours, and not only on a level, but far more favourable than ours; and therefore we believe our minimum tariff for the present applies to Great Britain, and to no other country.

In view of that statement I desire to ask the Minister of Finance if he will lay these conclusions on the Table. They are very important. I am sure the Government must have done something more than merely look over the matter, that they must have acted, in so important a matter, upon some definite information, they must have condensed all the information that would guide them on so important a question. I ask the Finance Minister now if he will lay that information on the Table because it is very important to the committee. I desire also to ask the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) if he will also lay on the Table the instructions given to the collectors of customs. It has been stated in the hon. gentleman's absence this afternoon, that definite instructions other than what appear in his report to Council have been given for the guidance of the collectors of customs throughout the country. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he will lay these instructions on the Table.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I have pleasure in laying on the Table now what the hon. gentleman has asked for from me.

Mr. CLANCY. The Minister of Finance has not said if he would consent to furnish the papers I ask for.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am afraid I have had some difficulty in understanding what it was that my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) desired to have me to lay on the Table. I do not think I understood him very clearly. I admit that it was my own fault, but I cannot do what he asks without understanding better what it is.

Mr. CLANCY. If the House will bear with me for a moment, and if I can claim the hon. Minister's attention, I will endeavour to make it clear. The First Minister said that after a complete investigation, after looking over the trade affairs of the world—at least if this was not distinctly stated, it was clearly implied—the Government had come to the conclusion that the only country in the world whose goods were entitled to come into Canada at the preferential rate was Great Britain. I ask the hon. Minister if he will lay these conclusions on the Table. If there are no confusions it is well that the committee should know that fact, and the conclusion we must draw from this is that the Government made no investigation. I am sure that the hon. Minister is ready with an answer, but it is necessary that we should have these papers.

It being Six o'clock, the Committee rose for recess.

After Recess.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) At the risk of wasting a little more time, I will trouble the House with a very few remarks. It was not my intention to inflict a speech on the House, nor would I do so were it not that I see the debate is not likely to close for some little time. With reference to the preferential clause which is more directly under discussion, I wish to say that in my estimation it is not preferential. My idea of preferential trade is a trade that will give a preference to the manufacturers of England in our markets. This goes further, and gives a preference not only to England, but to other countries, and in that respect goes a step further than my idea of preferential trade, and it therefore ceases to be preferential so far as England is concerned. Now, we are giving this preference to England and not getting anything in exchange. I do not find so much fault with that, because if there is anything that I feel inclined to favour more than another, it is the idea of preferential trade between England and her colonies, and between the colonies of England. I think, further, that this preferential clause is taking too much power from the representatives of the people and putting it into the hands of the Controller of Customs and in that respect it is much to be condemned. It would seem, notwithstanding what has been said to the contrary, that the position that has been taken by the Controller up to this time indicates that he is the sole judge in this matter; and that the action that has been taken with respect to the preferential clause up to the present time has been taken altogether by the Controller, and without the sanction of the Government, because, if I understand rightly, his report was not submitted to the Government until action was taken on it. Now, a great deal has been said about this matter of preferential trade. But, so far as I can find out, there is very little in it in favour of trade with England. As an instance of that, I will give the case of an importer of goods that has come under my own observation. An invoice of English goods amounting to $281, was imported since this tariff came into operation. The duty on that invoice, at 35 per cent amounted to $98.35. Take one-eighth off as coming from England, which was $12.29 leaves the total duty under this new tariff, at $86.06. Now, applying the old tariff to that same invoice, the case would stand as follows:—Value, $281; duty under the old tariff, at 25 per cent, $70.25; 199 pounds of cloth at 5 cents a pound, $9.95. Add duty of $70.25, and you have $80.20, showing a balance of $5.86 more under the operation of the new tariff than would have been paid under the old tariff. This shows that instead of being a free-trade tariff, and as carrying out the policy enunciated by the Government while in Opposition, it is taxing the people of this country to the tune of $5.86 more on that invoice than the National Policy would have done. Now, the point in this new tariff to which I find fault more especially as regards the province of Prince Edward Island from which I come, is the abolition of the duty on corn. This is a matter, no doubt, that affects all sections of Canada, but there is no section that the repeal of the duty on corn affects so much as Prince Edward Island. We find that a large quantity of corn is grown in Canada, something like twelve or fourteen million bushels, yet we find that the people in the province of Ontario in which the most of that corn is grown, are opposed to taking the duty off. Not only that, but, in my opinion, the removal of the duty has been altogether in the interest of a few rich individual farmers, and this remark possibly applies more to Ontario than to any other part of the country. Now, Sir, I do not come here to assist in legislating altogether in the interests of the rich farmers, who are able to take care of themselves ; but I come here to legislate, and to do what I can, in the interest of the poorer classes of the people, more particularly the people that really require our attention, and for whom we should do everything we can. Now, we all know very well that last fall the price of oats had gone down so low that it would not pay any man to raise them. The price was as low as 20 or 22 cents a bushel, which is, of course, below the cost of production. Now, it is ridiculous to suppose that a poor farmer can grow oats at such prices as that, and go to the expense of marketing them, and then import corn from the United States or elsewhere to feed his stock. It is entirely out of the question. I contend that the effect of the duty being removed from corn will further depreciate the price at present obtained for oats in the Dominion of Canada, it will so depreciate the prices that it will be utterly impossible for the farmers of this country to grow oats in face of the immense quantities of corn that is imported from the United States. We find that the United States has put a duty on wool grown by the farmers of this country, and I suppose that in response to that action, this fatherly Government of ours has taken the duty off corn. It is a queer way to retaliate on them by punishing us, but that seems to be the fact of the case. The effect of the present tariff, if I understand it properly, will prevent the small mills of this country from utilizing our home-grown wool, and it will be, under the circumstances, next to impossible for our farmers to find a market for wool. But this Government, in face of the Americans putting a heavy duty of 12 cents a pound on wool, turn around and take the duty off corn. For my part, speaking for the farmers, I cannot see how it is possible that they can appreciate legislation of that kind. Then, again, while the Government take the duty off corn in the interest, as they say, of free trade, I must say that I am glad to see, on the other hand, that they show their protectionist proclivities by leaving the duty on pork. Now, we know very well that last fall as was stated by a gentleman in this House, if I mistake not, that when the tariff commission was on its rounds it was interviewed by the pork packers of this country. They wanted to find out what the Government were likely to do with respect to the protection on pork, in order that they might regulate their prices accordingly. But the tariff commission could not see its way to give any information to the pork packers in order that the farmers of this country might get better prices for their pork, and that a proper basis might be arranged by the packers on which to pay them for their pork. The commission could not give them any information with respect to the duty on pork, while at the same time the Finance Minister and other members of the Cabinet and the leader of the Government could give large corporations, the large coal corporations of this country, a tip with respect to the duty on coal, while the farmer must be left out in the cold without any consideration. The consequence was that the price of pork never went so low in this country, because the pork packers had to guard themselves against the possible removal of the duty under the so-called free trade policy of the Government, and therefore had to pay a price that would protect them, providing the protection was taken off pork altogether. The result was that 3 or 4 cents a pound was the price paid in my province for pork that would have commanded a much higher price had it been known that protection was likely to be left on by the Government. One reform promised by my hon. friend the present leader of the Government in 1883 was that if he were elected to power, he would remove the duty on pork. I am glad to say he has not carried these free trade principles to such an extent as to remove that duty, and that the protection given to pork by the Liberal-Conservative party has been retained at the same rate as it was levied under the late Government. We were told by our opponents that the National Policy was "the robbery of the many for the enrichment of the few." I suppose on that principle the protection on pork has been retained for the benefit of certain classes of people, and that the Government have thereby placed themselves in the category of robbers. We were told that the "National Policy was the robbery of the many for the enrichment of the few." The Government have retained the protection on pork, at which I feel very much pleased ; but they have stultified themselves and placed themselves in a very awkward position in view of their previous statements. Another change that is going to be detrimental to some of the interests of this country is the removal of the iron duties. If there was any duty or protection that interested the people of the lower provinces it was covered by the iron duties. What was their effect ? Their effect was to give employment to a very large number of people, who became large consumers of the farm produce of Prince Edward Island, and the small towns built around the iron centres also became large consumers of our farm produce, and we thus possessed the very best market that our people could desire, namely, a home market within easy reach. If those iron industries should be shut down under the present tariff, which is more than probable, this home market will disappear, and we will be thrown back into the position occupied by us in 1878, when the present party was in power. If there was one cry we had to face during the last election campaign more than another, it was the injury done to the farmers by the excessive protection placed on farm machinery, it being asserted that every farmer had to pay an excessive price for his thresher or self-binder, even in spite of the fact that the late Government lowered the duties from 35 to 25 per cent before they went out of power. Since the elections, however, hon. gentlemen opposite, instead of removing the duties which the Conservative party left on agricultural implements such as I have named when they went out of power, have given this industry increased protection by reducing the duty on iron used in manufacturing these machines, and have left the duty on the machines as it was before. Another accusation we can fairly bring against the Government in connection with their new tariff is that they appear to have sought to punish the poor man while allowing the more wealthy classes to go free. We can all look on tobacco as a luxury, but it is one of the poor man's luxuries. The duty comes home to every poor man; he takes as much solace out of his pipe of tobacco as the more wealthy man does in drinking costly wines. It is a source of comfort to him, and the Government have made a mistake in increasing the duties to such a large extent. It will undoubtedly lead to increased smuggling. Not only so, but tobacco was one of the few articles manufactured in Prince Edward Island. Two small factories established there have been gradually increasing their trade; they manufacture a good article at a reasonable price, and it is appreciated by the people of the island as a whole. I saw in the newspapers the other day that these factories were about to close down under the new tariff; and this is another example of the effect of the tariff on the island. Then again there is the poor man's grog. We only wish the poor man would not drink any spirits, but unfortunately such is not the case; and when the Government were altering the duties on wines and liquors, they should not have placed increased duties on the poor man's grog without increasing the duties on the rich man's wines. We were told by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that "the protective policy was deliberate and organized robbery." The Liberal-Conservatives never believed that such was the fact. It remained for the present Government to carry out a system which they themselves called "deliberate and organized robbery." They also said it was "a villainous system." We believed it was a system necessary for the purpose of building up the manufactures of this country. While hon. gentlemen opposite believed it was a villainous system, they still continue it. We were also told that the tariff would be altered so as to eliminate every vestige of protection. Yet we find they are continuing protection to almost the same extent as before, and in some articles to a greater extent. We were told also by the hon. member for South Oxford that the Liberal-Conservative party of that time were in league with "scoundrels great and scoundrels small" to rob the people of this country under the system of protection. These gentlemen still continue this system of protection. We did not believe that we were either scoundrels great or scoundrels small, or that we were robbing the people of this country by protecting our young industries, and if hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches believed their own utterances, then they are the very people who are in league with scoundrels great and scoundrels small to carry out what they believe to be "this villainous protective system." On the 26th April, 1897, the Toronto "Globe," the organ of the Liberal party wrote as follows:—

If we give our market to the manufacturers of the United States and allow American goods to come in at the flood, many of our factories must be swept away in the deluge, and widespread commercial disaster would be the result.

Why, Sir, you would imagine that this was the utterance of a Liberal-Conservative National Policy newspaper. It seems, that the party which denounced protection from one end of Canada to the other, and got into power on that cry, are now compelled to continue the system that they have for years past decried. The "Globe" continued:

To reduce our tariff to a free trade basis in the face of the high tariff of the United States and the low freight charges across the border into Canada, would be to doom even the most deserving of Canadian industries to decay, and to send our young men in ever increasing droves to the United States. We assert as strongly as ever the advantage of free trade with the neighbouring countries, but we must consider self-preservation, and we must have national self-respect.

After eighteen years of denunciation of this system by the Liberal party, we to-day find their newspaper organ writing in favour of the very principles they have denounced.

Now, Sir, if there was one thing more than another which the present Government when in Opposition promised, it was that they would confer great benefits upon the farmers of Canada. Can hon. gentlemen opposite tell me what their tariff has done for the farmers? Does it give them an increased market for a bushel of oats, or does it compensate them in any way for the duty that has been taken off corn?

Mr. COWAN. Do you raise corn down there in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) I think the hon. gentleman must be corned. Does the present tariff give the farmer an increased market for a pound of butter, does it give him an increased market for his cheese, does it give him an increased market for his beef or his pork? No, Sir, it does not; and the Liberal party have failed to fulfil any one of the promises they have made to the agriculturists of Canada. Not only that, Sir, but the Government by the present tariff, are doing all they can to destroy the farmers' home market by allowing corn in free to take the place of the coarse grains produced in this country. I remember that the leader of the Government, during the ante-election canvass, spoke of protection as slavery. Well, then, he and his friends are in favour of slavery, because they have continued protection in nearly every item of the tariff as they found it when they came into power.

My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) then stated, that the system of protection was "a system accursed of God and man"; and yet, Sir, he sits there as complacently as you please, continuing this accursed system. Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not believe what he was saying at that time—I doubt very much whether he always believes what he is saying, but I will not chide him with that failing on this occasion. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) also said, that "protection was the bane and curse of Canada," yet he continues protection, and therefore according to his own view he perpetuates the bane and curse of Canada. The hon. gentleman also told us, "that every dollar of protection must be taken off." Has he carried out that promise? Most decidedly not. We were also told that "for every dollar that went into the treasury two dollars went into the pockets of the manufacturers." If such is the case, it is an extraordinary thing if the people of the country continue to have faith in men who would continue a system, which they believe that for every dollar it puts in the public treasury, puts two dollars into the pockets of our manufacturers. protection was denounced by hon. gentlemen opposite as "legalized robbery," and yet they continue this system of legalized robbery. They talked a great deal about the oil robbery, and that more than anything else was used as an election cry in our province. The hon. the Minister of Marine (Mr. Davies) placed the protective duty on oil at 170 per cent, and we find that when he comes into power he continues that robbery, by only taking off one-sixth of the duty. Now, Sir, I shall refer for a moment to some of the planks of the Liberal platform as promulgated at the Ottawa Liberal convention. One of the planks was, that protection had decreased the value of farm products. But these gentlemen in power continue to depreciate farm property by continuing the system of protection. Protection was denounced in the Ottawa convention, because "it oppressed the masses for the enrichment of the few," and yet a Liberal Government continues the system. So I might take every plank in their Ottawa platform, and make the same remarks concerning it. The coal and iron industries were obnoxious forms of protection to the Liberals in opposition, and yet in power they continue the duty on coal. Well, Sir, from my point of view, that is a very proper thing for the Government to do. It was one of the principles upon which the National Policy was founded, and it should be continued with every other feature of that National Policy.

The Minister of Finance told us in his Budget speech that protection had been shorn of its enormities. For my part, I cannot see where it has been shorn to any great extent. In some things such as coloured cottons, the protection has been increased; on mowing machines and other farming implements the protection has also been increased. This is what they call shearing protection of its enormities. But I do not see how they could shear it of its enormities, for, according to the principles laid down by them, the whole system of itself was such an enormity that, if they were true to their principles, they should have wiped it out altogether. But fortunately for the country they have not done so.

Now, Sir, if I remember rightly, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) said that he had nothing against the Patrons of this country; and in this connection, I might refer for a few moments to the Patron platform. According to that platform, "no member of Parliament should receive a pass," but has that been carried out? We know it has not. "Government House should be abolished," but Government House is still to the fore. "The Mounted Police should be abolished," but fortunately for the country, we have still got them. "The Military College was to be abolished." We have that still, and we are likely to have it continued. "Railway subsidies were to be abolished," yet I expect to find my hon. Patron friends voting for railway subsidies before the close of this Parliament.

Now, I will just refer for a little to the matter of tweeds. There is a large quantity of tweeds made in the smaller mills of this country. These tweeds are the cloth which the farming population of this country use. Their own domestic wool is used in its manufacture. The effect of the present tariff will be, I fear, to do away with these small mills, and in that way do away with the manufacture of these cloths and the home market for our wool; and as a consequence, the employment which is given to our own people in and about these mills will be to a greater or less extent wiped out.

The Liberal party, from one end of the country to the other, denounced the system of giving bounties; yet we find them going back on their principles in this respect also, for they favour giving bounties for the production of iron. Another thing that was denounced by the Liberal party from one end of the country to the other previous to the last election was the system of specific duties; and yet we find them bringing down a tariff and doing away with some of these specific duties, and afterwards bringing down a second tariff and going back to that system. For my part, I cannot see on what principle they can, as a free trade party, put a duty of 15 or 20 per cent on one article and a duty of 30 or 35 per cent on another. If they were true to their principles of free trade, I think they would make their tariff as nearly level as possible, putting the same duty on one article as on another. But on what principle they can put 35 per cent on blankets, 25 per cent on boots and shoes, and 15 per cent on something else, I cannot for the life of me see. It only goes to show that they have thrown their principles to the winds, and are adopting the principles of the Liberal-Conservative party, which they have been denouncing for the last eighteen years.

Now, I must say again, with respect to the preferential clauses at present before the House, that I am sorry that they are not in a strict sense preferential clauses. If they were, I would, even if I stood alone, so far as my party is concerned, be very much pleased to support them.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding all I have heard for the last couple of days, I still venture to express myself in favour of the tariff resolutions now before this House. My reason for this approval is that I consider this a Canadian tariff. It is a tariff made in the interests of the Canadian people, and constructed with a view to the welfare of all the existing and varied industries of the country. I see in this tariff protection against countries that will only deal with Canada in a grudging or unfriendly way. Moreover, I see in the preferential schedule of this tariff a kind of invitation extended to the countries of the world that wish to deal with us on fair and friendly terms. They are told in these resolutions that Canada is ready to reciprocate with any country that wants to trade with us. Hon. gentlemen who have spoken before me have alluded to this tariff according to the way in which it affected their respective callings; and I think the House will bear with me for a moment or two while I refer to it from the standpoint of the agriculturists. The agriculturists of Canada are a producing people. We produce a large quantity every year for export, and what we export has to meet in competition the surplus products of all the nations of the world. With this state of things, it is very hard for a Government to frame a tariff that is going to give protection to the agriculturist. What they can do, however, is to lessen his burdens by cheapening the articles he has to buy; and I think the resolutions before us have had that object in view in very many cases. While we have to export a surplus to other countries, the quantity we have to export has a great deal to do with regulating the prices of the whole products of our farms. Therefore, any one can easily see how difficult it is to give the farmer protection on what he has to sell. I am fully aware that, under existing circumstances, our revenue has to be raised by excise and customs duties. I know that in making changes of this kind, it is very difficult to avoid striking individual and private interests, but I believe that the Government have succeeded fairly well in treating all classes justly, though some individuals may suffer. Speaking from a farmer's standpoint, we, the farmers of this country, do not want to shirk our duty and obligation to contribute our fair share to the revenue of the country, but what we do ask is that every other interest should equally contribute its share. We do not forget that the merchant and the manufacturer and the labourer are all equally necessary to the prosperity of this country as the farmers, and equally entitled to consideration, but we do ask that the agricultural class should also receive consideration in the framing of the tariff. I think that they have received greater consideration in the tariff before us than in any tariff that has been before the country for the last eighteen years. I heard the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) prophesy the other evening that all countries in the world would come in under the preferential clause of this tariff. He said that twenty-two of them can come in now, and that the United States would come in before the year was at an end. If the hon. gentleman's prophesy should prove true, this country will rejoice in the wisdom of a Government that was able to frame a tariff which brought about reciprocal trade with the United States inside of one year. That is what our farmers have been wanting for many years. For years they have been desiring freer trade relations with Great Britain and the United States, and if the prophecy of the hon. member for East Durham should be accomplished, think that this tariff will have accomplished a great deal. I do not think any one can deny that it is to the benefit of our people to have open markets as much as they can. I know that it would not require much to convince me that reciprocal trade with the United States would be a benefit to the farmers of this country. We have now as free trade with England as it is possible to have, and by this resolution we offer Great Britain something in return. This resolution also holds out the invitation to every other country in the world that wishes to take advantage of it, to come in and trade on friendly terms with Canada, and I only hope the United States will avail themselves of our invitation. The hon. gentleman who spoke before me (Mr. Macdonald, P.E.I.) declaimed against the introduction of free corn. Well, Mr. Chairman, that may be a rather difficult question. I have heard a great many people say that free corn would be very beneficial to our farmers, and I have heard others express the contrary opinion. It is a debatable question, but if free corn should not prove a good thing, there is nothing to prevent our removing corn later from the free list. Another thing to which that hon. gentleman called our attention, was the fact that the duty on agricultural implements had not been lowered. With respect to this, I might just say that a revenue has to be raised in this country to meet the expenses of administration, and so long as the manufacturers of Canada give to our consumers agricultural implements at the same rates as the American manufacturers sell them to the farmers of the United States, the farmers of this country have nothing to complain of. At present I know that agricultural implements are sold in Canada as cheaply as they are in the United States, and I am quite satisfied that if the Government should see that a monopoly was formed among our manufactories in order to charge our consumers more than fair prices for those goods, they will see that the tariff is lowered. So long, however, as the Canadian manufactories of agricultural implements sell to the Canadian consumers at the same prices as these implements command in the open markets, I do not think that any complaint will come from our farmers.

I had no intention of taking up the time of the House for more than a few moments on this question. Judging by the different positions which hon. gentlemen of the Opposition take on this question, it is very difficult to tell what kind of a policy would satisfy them. Some of them condemn this policy because there is too much free trade in it; and the same people who condemn it on that ground will, before they are half through their remarks, condemn it likewise because there is too much protection in it. These hon. gentlemen talk about consistency; I only see one point in which they are consistent, and that is they are consistent in their inconsistency. Reading between the lines, I say that this is not a free trade policy nor is it a protective policy, but it is what the Liberal party went to the country on—a revenue policy, based, not on the principle of protection, but on the principle of a tariff for revenue. Notwithstanding all the fault that has been found with these tariff resolutions, I am convinced that the people of this country are quite satisfied with the policy of the Government, and that if the Government were to go to the country on this policy to-morrow, the people would sustain it by a larger majority than they did on the 23rd June last.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not at all suppose, after all that has been said in reference to this resolution, that I shall be able to say anything at all that is new, but I feel that it would be improper for me not, on this occasion to put my views on record and state why it is that I am unable to support the resolution which, in some respects, commands my sympathy. I had fondly hoped, Mr. Chairman, even when it seemed almost hopeless to hope, that it might be possible to frame a resolution which would command the support of both parties in this House, and which could be sent, in this Jubilee year of the Queen, as a message conveying the united voice of Canada to the people in the mother country. Unfortunately, however, it would seem that that cannot be. It cannot be, not, I am sure, because there is any difference of opinion among members on either side of the House as to what our duty is with regard to the mother country—that country which has sheltered us and protected us and given us our safety—but because there seems to be fundamental differences—difference in principles as to trade policy—between the parties on either side of the House. For my own part, I am, so far as Canada is concerned, a protectionist. I am not going to argue that question now. My views on that subject are thoroughly well known in this House. I will simply repeat, what I have so often called the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to, this proposition that no country in the world, no country of which we have any historic record, has ever succeeded in building up its industries without having had recourse to the policy of protection. I say that if any country could have done so, circumstanced as we are, we would be one of the very last countries to be able to do so, for we lie under the shadow of the great producing country to the south. That being my view, I am unable to support this resolution, for many reasons. And of these reasons, I will state shortly three or four.

In the first place, I am unable to support this resolution because, by the terms of it, I say it must, and the Government admit that it may, let in in competition with our industries the gigantic producing agencies of many of the greatest and most famous producing countries in the world, at a reduction of 25 per cent upon a tariff which is lower, according to the estimate of the Government, than the tariff of last year. That to me is a fatal objection, on the face of it, to this resolution. Then, in connection with that, I would say that there is this other objection, in my mind, to the resolution—that the Government themselves seem scarcely to be aware of the scope and extent of the policy to which they have committed themselves. When, some time ago, I asked my hon. friend the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) whether he considered the tariff of Germany as favourable, on the whole, to Canada as the tariff of Canada—our schedule "D"—was to Germany, and when I repeated the same question as to Belgium, the hon. gentleman said in reply, that he had not yet decided. And when, later on in this debate, my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) referred to that matter, called the hon. Controller of Customs's attention to the subject and again asked him his views in regard to it the Controller of Customs said he would take these objections up one by one as they arose, and he would then feel it to be his duty fully to inform himself—I took down his words at the time—as to whether or not the tariff of a particular country was as favourable to us, on the whole, as our schedule “D” was to that country. Now I venture to say that my hon. friend the Controller of Customs and the Government ought fully to have informed themselves in regard to this matter before they made this proposition to the House. And I, as a private member of the House, even, would feel that if, under these circumstances, I were to support a resolution of the full scope of which I was not informed, I should be taking a most perilous leap in the dark. Then what does my hon. friend the Finance Minister say in regard to this? In the most interesting speech which he made to us in introducing the budget, he told us that he would consider it a very improper thing if he were to take any rash step in regard to this matter. He said :

But, Sir, we are dealing with more than the protected interests of the manufacturers. The evil of protection, like most other evils, is wide-reaching in its influences, and it has become so blended and interwoven with the business of Canada that if we should attempt to strike it down to-day, we should do harm not only to the protected interests, which have no claim upon us, but to other interests which are not directly connected with the protected interests. It would be folly not to remember that we are dealing not with the protected manufacturers only, but that the interests of labour have to be considered, as well as the interests of capital. We have to remember that the trade of the country is so permeated by this system that, in the matter of banking alone, there are vast interests associated with this question. I hesitate not to say that if we should to-day, by some rash step, do that which some hon. gentlemen say we are bound to do, but which intelligent men know we are not bound to do, and would not do, we should not only break down the manufacturing interests of the country, but we would deal a blow to other interests of a wider and more serious character.

Then he goes on to say :

I wish to say, and to emphasize the fact, that it has never been the policy of the Liberal party, as declared by any member of the Liberal party occupying a responsible position, if they came into power, to destroy at one movement all the manufacturing industries, or to so change the policy as to place them in peril.

Now, I wish to ask hon. members of this House, whether it was or was not a rash step on the part of the Government, and whether it was not something which might place the interests of the country in peril when they placed this resolution on the Table and proposed a policy of the full scope of which they had not fully informed themselves. I think it was a very rash step and one which I certainly could not endorse and support, however much I might sympathize, in certain respects, with the course the Government have followed. And I contend that the amendment which has been introduced to this resolution makes the policy of the Government still more indefensible than it was before. For by the amendment they take power to themselves not to withdraw from the position which this resolution would place them in, if it turned out that the treaties stand in the way, but they take power to themselves to let in all the treaty nations—not upon reciprocal terms, not upon the terms of the resolution, but without asking any reciprocity in return. The proposal is to take power to let these nations in in a body, no matter how hostile their tariffs may be to this country, and so to discriminate still more than the resolution itself does against our own fellow-colonists in other parts of the Empire. From that point of view also, it will be impossible for me to support this resolution. Then, Sir, from another point of view, one that touches me very nearly, I find that I could not support this resolution, however much I might desire, from some points of view to do so. I think that the reduction in the tariff on all lines of goods, even to England alone, to the extent of 25 per cent, is dangerous to the industries of this country. I would view such a step with very great misgiving unless we had some corresponding advantage given to us in the markets of the United Kingdom. I feel that if I were to support this resolution, I would be striking a dangerous blow at the interests of this country, and even for my own native land, England, I could not betray Canada. Canada is the land in which I have spent twenty-five of the happiest years of my life, it is the land which has sent me here to represent her interests, it is the land that has put its trust in me for fifteen years; and if I were to betray her, I would betray my trust as a member of this House. Therefore, if that terrible alternative were placed before me that I were called upon to decide as between the interests of Canada and the interests of my own mother country, England, I should as a member of this House be obliged to decide in favour of Canada. But, Mr. Chairman, fortunately, so long as the Empire endures, no such invidious choice can be presented to me to make; because, as I have said from my place in this House before, so I repeat here to-night, if we view this question from the broadest standpoint and from the highest point of view, we shall find that the interests of Canada and the interests of the mother country are so closely and inextricably woven together, that it is impossible to check the progress of Canada without striking a blow at the best interests of England. Sir, it is impossible to divorce the interests of the mother country from those of the great free, self-governing, prosperous, victorious communities to which she has given birth, and which it may be said, I think, without exaggeration, cling to her with a fervid loyalty. And Canada, from the vastness of her resources, and from the geographical position which she occupies, must become probably the most potent factor in the bringing about of that imperial greatness and splendour which the mother country herself must so greatly share, and which will enable her to endure, as no other country has ever heretofore endured, the weight and wear of the centuries. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, anything that cramps and stunts the development of Canada, to that extent injures the best interests of the mother country. Our first duty, our most immediate duty, not only as Canadians, but as loyal subjects of the mother country and of the Empire, is to build up in the closest possible connection with the mother country, the industries of this portion of the Empire which is committed to our care; and in doing so, we shall be building up, as I have already said, in the surest and most stable manner possible, the interests of the mother country herself. Let me assume for a moment that the United States of America had remained still a portion of the Empire, and that their trade policy had been handed over to the tender mercies of the Manchester school; does any one suppose that the school of gentlemen comprising Mr. John Bright, great and liberal as he was, who was the man to rise up in the House of Commons and object to Canada exercising her right to frame her own tariff, and not very long ago, too, and who spoke also of the mother country having little interest in countries that were 3,000 miles away—does any one suppose that that school represented by that gentleman, if they had had their own sweet will in connection with the United States, would have allowed the industries of the United States to be built up as they have been under a policy of protection, so that they are to-day among the most magnificent and gigantic industries in the world? Would the United States have developed as they have developed under such conditions as these? Surely not. And what would be the advantage to the mother country to-day if the United States, with all the vast resources which she has developed, were of the Empire? So it is with Canada. Our duty is to build up our industries and thus to strengthen the Empire, remembering always that while we in this indirect way benefit the Empire, yet we ought on every possible occasion so to shape our policy as to assist her directly as well as indirectly. My objection then, as I have said, is this, that by allowing goods of the mother country to come into this country at a reduction of 25 per cent, without obtaining any corresponding privilege in the markets of the mother country, we shall imperil the building up of the interests of this country which is so important in the interests of the mother country herself. But while I consider that to reduce the duty levied against the mother country to the extent of 25 per cent would be perilous without getting some corresponding advantage, I am not prepared to say that we should not reduce our duties at all unless we have some corresponding privileges granted us by the mother country. I venture to think that there are few members in this House who are not prepared to concede that we owe to the mother country something more than we owe to foreign nations. I think there are not many members of this House who will not be prepared to concede that while we may owe nothing to her for her tariff arrangement—for those arrangements have been made by her from the point of view of her own interests—yet that we do owe something to her for the protection that she affords us, for the fact that the armies of England, and the navies of England, are as much at the service of the citizens of Ottawa as they are at the service of the citizens of London, and for the fact that we have her consular service, and her diplomatic service, and the highest court of the Empire provided for us, absolutely free of charge. Therefore I say we ought to be prepared to make some concession to her without asking anything in return, and the resolution which I shall move in a few minutes contemplates that fact, and announces that principle. Now, Sir, I feel that in proposing such a resolution, I am exposing myself for the first time in fifteen years to a charge of inconsistency. I admit that when, in 1892, I proposed a resolution in this House in favour of preferential trade with England, it did not contemplate the reduction of the duties in favour of England, without asking something in return; it did not contemplate to any extent such reduction of those duties. But, I agree with the hon. the Finance Minister when he said that the world moves. I feel that we have made great advances in the past five years along the path of imperial unity. We had the resolution of 1892, to which I referred; we had the great colonial conference following upon it two years later; and two years subsequent to that, we had a resolution moved in this House and unanimously carried, pledging this House of Commons to support the mother country in case the integrity or the honour of the Empire were imperilled. The effect produced by that resolution in the mother country was, I may say, extraordinary. The "National Review" of the next month, spoke of it in this way:

This great manifestation of loyalty, attachment and determination on the part of our fellow-subjects in Canada has created an extraordinary effect upon Englishmen, to whom it has brought home in the most vivid manner possible the oneness of the common Empire. The attitude of Canada, Australia, the Cape, New Zealand and Natal opens up a splendid field for statesmanship, and we cannot believe that our Ministers, either here or in the colonies, will be unworthy of it.

Following almost immediately upon this manifestation of loyalty here in this House and in the other colonies, we had the epoch-marking speech of the Colonial Secretary; and I want hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially those on the Treasury benches, to do me the honour to listen for a moment to the statement I am about to make, for it is only contained in a word or two. That speech was a frank avowal on the part of Mr. Chamberlain that he personally would view with favour a policy which would differentiate in the English market in favour of British goods against foreigners. That is the policy which Mr. Chamberlain enunciated in that speech, and I shall have a word to say in regard to it a little later on. Then in addition to Mr. Chamberlain's speech, we have had the extraordinary manifestation of enthusiasm which has taken place in the mother country lately arising from the course pursued by the present Government of Canada; and I desire to offer my humble congratulations to the Government for having succeeded in evoking that strong Imperial sentiment at home. In view of these facts, it has seemed to me that while it might have been improper, and in my judgment would have been improper, in 1892 to make a proposal to reduce the duties in favour of England unless we got something in return—because I thought, if we did so, we would place a weapon in the hands of the Cobdenites by which they could attack the great Imperial policy of preferential trade within the Empire—while that might have been a dangerous experiment to try in 1892, so great progress has been made, the Imperial sentiment, which after all is the vital force of the Empire, has become so much stronger since then, that I believe we may safely do now what we could not safely do then.

I now come to the last but one of the objections which I have to urge against this resolution, and which has obliged me to oppose it, and that objection is, that the resolution is in principle absolutely opposed to preferential trade of any kind with the mother country. The hon. Finance Minister has spoken of preferential trade. I wish to say with all respect to that hon. gentleman that preferential trade within the Empire has a certain well-defined acceptation. It was invented, if I may make use of the word, by those who had for years been advocating a certain policy, and was used by them for the purpose of expressing what that policy was. It is a technical term in Imperial politics; it has one meaning and one meaning only, and it is a meaning which the people of this country perfectly well understand. It does not mean the making of a reciprocity treaty with every nation in the world which agrees to enter into reciprocal terms with us, but it means preferential trade within the Empire as against the outside world, it means a preference in the British markets for British goods against foreign goods. This is what the people understand it to mean; and when the hon. Finance Minister uses the term in any other way he, unintentionally, I am sure, confuses and misleads the public mind on this question. This proposal for reciprocal trade with all the rest of the world is not, the Government say, a fair exposition of the policy they have pursued. They say: we have done more than that; we have given a preference to England; there is to-day and has been for some time past an actual discrimination in Canada in favour of English goods. And they say, we should get credit for that. Well, I give them credit for it; in my humble way, I give them my meed of praise for it. But, Mr. Chairman, this is a question too great, too serious and too deep with me for trifling of any kind. I cannot consent to delude myself with regard to this question; and I ask myself, what is the prospective value to the Empire of this preferential trade existing now? How long will it endure? May it not disappear in a month? Is it not the result of a mere accident at the present moment? Is it not dependent upon the accident that no other country has yet demanded from the Controller of Customs that he should decide whether or not it has the right to enter its goods under this reciprocal clause? If countries do come forward, and if those countries are admitted, as many of those best-informed on this side of the House maintain, they must be admitted, what becomes of this preference to British goods? It vanishes into thin air—it is gone. It is not such a preference as I can accept for one moment, in face of the principle laid down in the resolution itself, which is a principle directly opposed to preferential trade within the Empire. Therefore, from that point of view, on the ground that this resolution is in principle opposed to preferential trade of any kind with the mother country; whether it be a preferential trade asking for a 'quid pro quo,' or whether it be a preferential trade without asking for a 'quid pro quo'; on that ground I must object to this resolution.

Then my last objection to the course pursued by the Government is this: that by the course they have pursued—even supposing this were a preference for the United Kingdom alone—by the course they have pursued, they have, as the leader of the Opposition has said, weakened the hands of those in the mother country who are desirous of giving preferential trade to the colonies in the markets of England, as against the outside world. Any one who will take the trouble to look at the remarks Lord Salisbury has made from time to time, in which he has pointed out how helpless England is in endeavouring to arrange reciprocal terms of trade with foreign countries, just because she has given away all she has to give; will see the force of the objection that I make to the policy which the Government has pursued. Now, I wish to say most respectfully to the Government, that they have rushed into this question of preferential trade, as they call it, without having properly considered the question, without having properly studied the question, without having had faith in the policy, and they have rushed into it in such a way as to place themselves in antagonism to the policy that has been laid down by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in his Budget speech, told us distinctly, that he had no faith in preferential trade as it has always heretofore been understood. He told us, that when we made an offer to England it was coupled with conditions which could not be accepted by England, that we asked England to put a duty upon her imports which she would not impose. But if my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) had looked into this question a little more deeply, he would have found that Mr. Chamberlain himself has laid down in the strongest possible way, the principles of this very policy which my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) used to laugh at, and which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance; I suppose because of the ancient laughter of my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) has considered a policy very little to be valued. Just let me read to the Finance Minister, what Mr. Chamberlain has said in regard to this matter. In his famous speech of the 25th of March, 1896, Mr. Chamberlain points out that a proposition had been made by the colonies for the purpose of establishing a commercial union within the Empire, and he says :

Such a proposition is one that, at any rate, ought to receive respectful consideration.

He quotes the resolution of the colonial conference, and he says :

The principal resolution, principal at all events in regard to its importance, which was passed at this conference, was the following :—

“That this conference records its belief in the advisability of a customs arrangement between Great Britain and her colonies by which trade within the Empire may be placed on a more favourable footing than that which is carried on with foreign countries.”

And he goes on to deal with the matter, and he himself makes a proposal. Before he comes to that proposal he does not say that the proposal that the colonies have made is one that is altogether ridiculous in principle—although the proposal that he specially refers to, he has misapprehended. It was a proposal that I made in this House in 1896 with regard to raising a revenue for defensive purposes, and Mr. Chamberlain does not seem to have realized that at all. But, he says, even that proposal of a small tariff against all the world is one that ought to receive careful consideration. He also says, that the colonies ought to “better their offer,” and then he goes on to make his own proposal :

My fourth proposition is : That a true Zollverein for the Empire, that a free trade established throughout the Empire, although it would involve—

I call the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to this :

—although it would involve the imposition of duties against foreign countries, and would be in that respect a derogation from the high principles of free trade and from the practice of the United Kingdom up to the present time, would still be a proper subject for discussion, and might probably lead to a satisfactory arrangement, if the colonies, on their part, were willing to consider it.

So that you see, Mr. Chamberlain accepts the principle of protection against the outside world. He speaks in that sentence of free trade within the Empire, but he modifies the proposal later on by referring to duties levied for the purpose of revenue only. He accepts the principle of the policy of protection against all the world, with a revenue tariff inside the Empire. I say, Sir, that the proposal which is brought down by the Government here, and which is placed before this House for its acceptance, is in principle diametrically opposed to the principle which has been laid down by the Right Hon. the Colonial Secretary.

My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) told us the other day, that the Government had solved the difficulty. Well, if the difficulty was so easily solved as that, it would not be a very great difficulty. The difficulty which my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) has solved is simply this : that he has reduced duties in favour of any country which will give us reciprocal trade terms, and he says, that if the favoured-nation treaties are denounced, that that will give a preferential trade to England. In the first place, I must say to my hon. friend (Mr. Davies), that it will not give a preferential trade to England, because other countries can come in under the resolution, and in the next place I say, that if the difficulty had only consisted in the reducing of duties in favour of the mother country, it would be a very simple problem that had to be solved. The difficulty does not lie there at all. The difficulty lies in this : that we have got to bring the views of free traders and the views of protectionists within the Empire, near enough to one another to enable us to frame a policy that will be accepted by both. I do not see where, the proposition of my hon. friends opposite, in any degree comes near to the solution of that very great difficulty.

My own belief is, as I said here in 1896, that the line of least resistance is to be found in Mr. Hoffmeyer's proposal, which is a proposal that the Empire should impose a moderate duty against all foreign countries upon all lines of goods, with some few exceptions, and that the proceeds of that duty should go for purposes of Imperial defence and inter-communication. That is a proposition which might well be accepted by free traders in England, because the duty would be merely for revenue purposes; and so soon as that duty was imposed, it would imply preferential trade in the markets of England for the colonies. However, I do not wish to elaborate that proposition. I do not wish to weary this committee at this late stage of the debate. I have to thank hon. members extremely for their great kindness in having listened to me so far; and I would only like, in conclusion, to say one other word, and that is this, that it does seem to me we are at the present time engaged in one of the very gravest and most important works that any Parliament could lay its hands to. It seems to me that at the present time we are liable to do great good or to do great harm. If we, standing on these latter years of this nineteenth century, look back down the long vista of the ages, we shall see it strewn with the mouldering wrecks of empire—empires which one by one have risen and flourished, and faded and withered away. They have borne within them the taint of an inevitable decay; and, as the centuries rolled upon them, they sank into decrepitude and death. But Mr. Chairman, man never before saw such an Empire as ours. In the vast fertile regions that own the sceptre of the Queen, and that are peopled by the overflow of the parent state, there exist the conditions of an almost perennial youth, such as no Empire has ever before possessed. The Empire of England at the end of a thousand years is still young. It is so young that we are not able in any degree commensurately to anticipate the majestic proportions which it will eventually assume. All the world round there are British hearts yearning, and there are British minds planning, for a means to draw these great self-governing, kindred communities of ours more closely together. All the world round there are also jealous eyes and hostile hearts watching and hoping that we shall fail in our efforts; and there are not wanting those who, if a favourable opportunity offered, would very gladly strike a blow at our Imperial power before it is completely organized. It seems to me, therefore, that the question for us to consider is whether we are worthy of the occasion, whether we are worthy of the trust that has been placed upon us, whether we are prepared to lay aside party considerations, and join together for the purpose of sustaining and maintaining and developing the Empire to which we are all so proud to belong. That seems to me to be the question; and whether we can agree on this resolution or not, I do hope, at all events, that in the future we shall endeavour to view these great Imperial questions from a plane somewhat higher than that which is occupied by mere party discussions; because, after all, where is the member of this House, or where is the Canadian or the British born subject of the Queen to be found who, for the sake of a poor, paltry party advantage would risk the future of his race?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would venture to move this resolution, but before doing so, lest I should in any way have misrepresented the position of the Government, I would like to ask my hon. friend the Finance Minister a question, which I hope he will kindly answer, and that is, whether the Government are or are not in favour of preferential trade with the mother country, in the sense of giving her better terms in our markets than we accord to foreign nations.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I think the best answer I can give my hon. friend is to say that that is exactly what we are doing at the present moment.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman might, I think, treat the question a little more gravely. I have already explained that the preference which is accorded to the mother country in our markets at the present moment is a preference which is not a preference in principle at all; but it is simply an accidental preference, which may be swept away at any moment that any country shows that its tariff is as favourable to us as our Schedule "D" is to that country. I asked my hon. friend a grave question with reference to a very grave matter. I asked him whether, on principle, the Government were prepared to accord to the mother country better treatment in our markets than they would accord to foreign countries—whether they were in favour of discriminating in the markets of Canada in favour of the mother country, as against the foreigner, all things otherwise being equal.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. How can my hon. friend gravely—as he has used the word—ask the question, when that is exactly what the Government are doing at the present moment. And if it shall prove in the end that we are not able to give that preference to the products of the mother country, it will not be through any act of ours; it will be through the interpretation placed on those treaties by Her Majesty's Government; and if Her Majesty's Government say that we cannot have preferential trade with the mother country, my hon. friend, as a loyal Britisher, will, I suppose, say that Her Majesty's Government are the best judges of that matter. So far as the Government can deal with that matter, we desire to have preferential trade with the mother country, and we have it at this moment.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not want to be importunate in any way, but my hon. friend has really misapprehended my question altogether. I say: all other things being equal, we are not giving the mother country a preference. We are giving to the mother country a preference, because we say she alone fulfils the conditions of this offer which you make to the whole world, but what I want to know is, whether you will make a better offer to her than to any other country in the world.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I really think the hon. gentleman will find that I cannot answer his question more fully than I have.

Mr. McNEILL. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement, and am glad to find that I have not misrepresented, in any degree, the position of the Government. The hon. gentleman refuses to say that he will make a better offer to England than to any other country in the world.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am saying that we are doing it now.

Mr. McNEILL. Does the hon. gentleman say that he is making a better offer to the mother country than to the other countries?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I say that we are now admitting the goods of the mother country on better terms than those of any other country.

Mr. McNEILL. But I am speaking of the offer.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. On this side we prefer to deal with the substance rather than with the shadow.

Mr. McNEILL. I beg to move:

That all the words in the resolution after the word "that" be struck out, and the following substituted in lieu thereof:—

That in the opinion of this House it is advisable that a customs arrangement be effected between the United Kingdom and her colonies by which trade within the Empire may be placed on a more favourable footing than that which is carried on with foreign countries; that while it regards a reduction in duties of 25 per cent, without any compensating advantages in the markets of the United Kingdom, as greater than the industries of Canada can at present safely endure, yet, as an initial step in the direction of a commercial union of the Empire and in recognition of the many benefits conferred upon Canada, this House will make an appreciable and unconditional reduction in the duties it levies on goods the produce of the United Kingdom only, so soon as the Government and Parliament of the United Kingdom are prepared to take advantage of such reduction.

Mr. KENDRY. I do not propose to occupy the time of the House at any length, but cannot allow so important a question as this, one of the most important that has ever come before this country, to pass without expressing, as briefly as possible, my views on the subject. We have before us tariff resolutions, the meaning of which I doubt whether any hon. member of this House fully understands. The most important part of the resolution before us is that giving power to the Controller of Customs to make at any time tariff arrangements with any other country. This is certainly a very extraordinary power to put in the hands of the administrator of any department, and one the carrying out of which may affect this country very materially. It will affect this country in this way. Take any business man who contemplates investing his capital in any Canadian industry, he has to do so, facing the possibility of the Controller of Customs at any day giving such effect to this clause as will compel this intending manufacturer to close down his establishment. It is evident therefore that a proposition involving such a serious contingency as this is one which we are bound to consider very carefully before giving it a place in our statutes. I do not know of any other Government which arrogates to itself such power except perhaps the government of the United States. The President of the United States, I believe, has power at any time to alter any part of the tariff at short notice, and certainly it seems that those hon. gentlemen opposite, in framing this proposition, have copied from the United States. Throughout this discussion, what do we find? We find that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, who advocate this proposal of preferential trade very strongly, do so from a personal point of view. One in particular, the hon. member for North Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost) declared that he favoured it because he preferred it to the National Policy. And why did he prefer it to the National Policy? Because it does not affect his own particular industry. In that industry he has no competition from England, and he has taken the resolution as applying solely to British goods, and so long as it is confined to British goods and is not applied to the United States whose manufacturers are his competitors, he is prepared to support it. That is the statement he made in this House, and that statement shows that those gentlemen opposite who are supporting the resolution are actuated solely from the selfish point of view of their own particular interests. But what we want in this country is that our tariff legislation should be in the interests of all concerned and not legislation which is suitable only to particular interests. There can be no disguising the fact that a great many manufacturing industries in this country will be injuriously affected, and affected very materially, by this preference, even if it be restricted to England, and for my part I am in favour of consulting first our own interests, even if that should involve our discriminating against England. We are sent to this House to legislate in our own interests and not in the interests of any other country ; and while I am as loyal as any other man in this House, I am loyal to Canada first before any other country. If we want to build this country up, we have got to build it up on the policy of looking, in the first place, to the interests of our own country. The representatives of other countries look after the interests of their own country ; and I am here to speak in the interests of Canada. So far as the tariff is concerned, I would not make any concessions to any country, I do not care what it is. I will look after our own interests first. It is not my intention to go into the details of the preferential clause, but I wish to call the attention of the Government to one or two points. Suppose, as the Finance Minister says, Germany and Belgium might come in, what would be the effect upon our labouring classes ? There can be no question that from one end of the country to the other they will have their wages reduced. Why ? Simply because we cannot otherwise compete with these countries, because these countries have cheaper labour. We know very well that it does not cost the labouring classes there so much to live, because they do not live so well as our people and the people of the United States. I have had some experience in this matter, having visited some of these places. I know exactly how the labouring people there live. I have interested myself in manufacturing in this country, and I do not want to see the labouring classes of this country reduced to the same position as those of Germany and Belgium. Canada is one of the best countries in the world and I think we should protect our own people. My hon. friend from South Victoria (Mr. McHugh) expressed himself as quite satisfied with this tariff. I can tell him that the farmers come nearly thirty miles to the town of Peterborough to sell their grain, because it is a manufacturing town.

An hon. MEMBER. A home market.

Mr. KENDRY. It is a home market—exactly. And what we want to do in this country is to build up the towns. That is in the interest of the farmer as well as the workingman. It is something in which we can all work together. If this preferential clause is carried, its effect will be to stop 50 per cent of the machinery in important lines in this country. It is one of the most important questions we have ever had brought before this country. Other items in the tariff also are very important. For instance, there is the proposal to abolish the duty on corn. I have talked to a number of farmers in the vicinity of my home, and I find nearly all opposed to free corn, because they grow a great deal of coarse grain, oats, &c., and they say that this will kill their market for that class of grain. Of course, it will be a benefit to some gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House who are feeders of cattle ; but I think that the farmers of this country will not thank the Government for this change. It has also been brought out in the public press that the effect of free corn will be to reduce the quality of our pork. At present the quality of our pork is such that it commands 1¼ cents per pound more than the American pork in the English market. I have a word of comment on what was said by the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost). He said :

We have ten thousands of men, workingmen, honest, upright men driven out of this country through the action of the so-called National Policy. In 1894 we saw in one line of goods and in the seventh largest industry in Canada, the agricultural implement business, we saw the duties reduced from 35 per cent to 20 per cent, which threw out of work one thousand men in that industry alone, and they had either to go into another line of trade to make a living or leave the country altogether.

Thus we see that the hon. gentleman says that the lowering of a duty from 35 per cent to 20 per cent had driven a thousand men in one industry alone out of the country. But the hon. gentleman said that he favoured a preferential tariff, that it was the best thing that this Government had done. According to the hon. gentleman's own reasoning, if the preferential tariff cuts off 25 per cent of the duties, the effect must be to throw thousands and thousands out of work. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should speak both ways on this question. The tariff question has two sides for the hon. gentleman, and the side that suits him is the side that suits his pocket. I am a protectionist, and I do not wish to disguise that fact. My hon. friend from South Victoria is also a protectionist, as he advocated the duty on agricultural machinery. I am in favour of that, as I have always been. The hon. gentleman says that this tariff should be imposed because we must have revenue. But why should not the same apply to everything ?

Mr. McHUGH. I would advocate protection to the hon. gentleman's industry if they would sell at the same prices that foreign producers sell to our consumers.

Mr. KENDRY. I can tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. McHugh) that in the industry in which I am engaged—though there is some shoddy coming into the country, and I except that—we sell our goods as cheaply as any concern in any country. But I want to call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact, that we are paying our labourers to-day $2 where they only pay $1, and we make a better article. Now, if this hon. gentleman wishes to compete with them, he wants us to get our labour down 50 per cent.

Mr. McHUGH. No.

Mr. KENDRY. Well, that is exactly his argument.

Mr. McHUGH. What protection has the labourer against foreign labour coming in ?

Mr. KENDRY. I say he has this protection, that when he comes to this country we give him $2, where he only gets $1 in the old country. I think that is good protection.

Mr. ROGERS. How can a farmer pay a labourer $2 a day ?

Mr. KENDRY. I see the hon. gentleman wants to get a trunk full of stationery. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see what the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) says in reference to the farmers—I have in my hand the report of his speech :

Have not the farmers to compete with the cheap labour of India, of the Argentine Republic and of other countries? How can we expect to do it, when at the same time farming does not pay unless the family are employed on the farm?

Now, the hon. gentleman's argument is this, that labour is paid higher in this country than it is paid in the Argentine Republic. I take him on his own argument, and I must say that we protect the farmer's wheat in this country. Suppose we bring our wheat from the Argentine Republic, will that not lower the price of wheat in this country? And so with pork, and beef, and corn, and everything in that line. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish again to remind the Government that they will find out later on, if this preferential clause goes into effect, giving 25 per cent advantage to the mother country, that it will have the effect of closing up nearly 50 per cent of the manufactories in this country, and I must oppose the resolution for that among other reasons.

Mr. McCLURE. I do not wish to encourage any further discussion of this question, but at the same time I do feel like giving hon. gentlemen opposite this much encouragement by saying that there was a time when I entertained some slight doubt as to whether I could conscientiously support the resolutions proposed by the Government. I have not been worrying myself as to the reasons the Government had for bringing these resolutions down, I felt it my duty as a member of this House not to worry myself about the reasons that induced the Government to come to this conclusion, but as a private member of the House, I desired to look conscientiously at these resolutions, and to see if I could justify myself in voting for them. I confess, that while I had made up my mind to vote for the resolutions, when I heard the hon. leader of the Opposition and several of his followers so emphatically and positively assert such strong opposition to them, I did begin, as a new member of this House, to be a little shaky in regard to the exact meaning of these resolutions. In the first place the leader of the Opposition started with the rather startling proposition that this clause was unconstitutional. Well, that was rather a sweeping assertion, and I did not desire that my first vote in this Parliament should be cast in favour of anything unconstitutional. I did not want to get into trouble. I have no doubt that the feeling that most pervades the mind of a new member of this House, is the fear that he will do something in violation of some rule, or trample on some particular section of the constitution and get himself into trouble; and I thought perhaps I was approaching the verge of some such terrible disaster as that. But when I followed the hon. gentleman and found that he was simply making a sweeping assertion unsupported by any arguments that appealed to my reason, I began to feel a little more comfortable. I recalled to my mind a statement that I read some years ago when I used to indulge in reading light literature. In reading the appendix to one of Lytton's novels where he gives directions how to be your own rogue, he says that when you meet a man in argument and he gets the better of you, and you can find no reason on earth to overcome him, you simply appeal to the laws of nature. If he presumes to doubt that those are the laws of nature, or to express any doubt as to whether you are a good expounder of the laws of nature, simply lay your hand upon your heart, look up, and impressively say: I feel it here. So I observed that the hon. gentleman, finding that there was no other argument to urge against this resolution, boldly asserted that it was unconstitutional, and left it there.

An hon. MEMBER. Where did he put his hand ?

Mr. McCLURE. I do not know where he put his hand, but I know where he has been accustomed to put his hand. I also noticed in addition that while the leader of the Opposition asserted that this was unconstitutional, none of his followers took up that line of argument. His first lieutenant, when he followed, did not assert that those resolutions were unconstitutional, but he took the ground that they were going to admit the products, not only of Great Britain, but of all these countries that had favoured-nation treaties with Great Britain. Well, again I began to be frightened. Then we had that followed up by what we have been repeatedly told was an unanswerable legal argument by the hon. gentleman for Halifax (Mr. Borden). Now, I do not presume for a moment to discuss legal questions with the hon. gentleman for Halifax; I have no doubt that the argument that hon. gentleman presented was as clear, as lucid, and as emphatic an argument as could be presented upon that side of the question by any hon. gentleman among the Opposition, for I know his ability, and know what he is capable of doing. I am not going to argue the legal question, but I simply call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to this fact, that no speaker has addressed himself to that phase of the question but has admitted that we in Canada have to-day the right to regulate our own tariff. Time and again hon. gentlemen opposite have admitted it. They did not need to admit it. It cost some blood years ago to establish that doctrine on this continent, and time and time again it has been acknowledged in peaceful documents since that day. We have the right to regulate our tariff. In that view, in what position do we stand? In this year of grace 1896—

Some hon. MEMBERS. 1897.

Mr. McCLURE. 1896 was an important year to hon. gentleman on the Opposition side of the House, and I beg their pardon for accidentally referring to it. In this year of grace 1897, we have had a further experience of our right to regulate our own tariff. Yet we are told when the Government come down with the tariff and say that on certain articles we will place a certain duty, the leader of the Opposition and all his supporters rise and say, you cannot do it. Why? Because in years gone by, when Canada was little more than a scattered settlement on the edge of a vast wilderness, somebody in the old country entered into a treaty between England and a foreign country, and according to the terms of that treaty we cannot make such a tariff as we would like to frame. That may not be a strictly legal answer to hon. gentlemen opposite; that may not be the line of argument on which the Government proceeded, and I may be told I am preaching disloyalty. I may be told, where is your loyal proposition, then? I am not concerned as to whether this resolution is one of acknowledged loyalty or not, I am concerned whether the resolution is in the interest of the country and whether we are bound by this treaty, but I am not going to argue these points. To me it seems utterly inconsistent with the proposition that Canada has the right to regulate its own tariff, to argue that when we undertake to do so, we are bound by a treaty made in 1865, in the making of which we have no voice and in regard to which we have no interest. But hon. gentlemen opposite very soon abandoned that attack on the resolution, and took refuge in the assertion, which one hon. member after another has repeated and reiterated,—we cannot understand the resolution. That seems to be the chief argument they have to present against it—that they do not understand it, and they have tried their hand at framing amendments which they thought would make it plain, but hon. gentlemen only succeeded in confusing it. Again they shifted their ground, and divided into two factions. One body accused the Government of adopting a policy of protection, and charged the present Government with inconsistency. They said that while hon. members on the Government side preached that protection was a false doctrine and advocated free trade, when they came into power they adopted the National Policy. The next body rise and bemoan the fact that the Government should strike down the protection given to our industries, that they should jeopardise their existence by leaving them open to the competition of the pauper labour of Europe and they declare that our industries will die in consequence. Both those arguments are presented. I fail to understand what hon. members of the Opposition mean. I do not think, however, I should worry myself as to what they mean. I only say this: I came to this House understanding that this Government came into power pledged not to give the country absolute free trade, although if they had done so they would have had my support—and I warn hon. gentlemen opposite that although we do not have a free trade Government there is growing to-day a party that has faith in the principles of free trade—but being called on to adopt a policy to meet the country's needs, I believe that the Government to-day although not giving the country a free trade policy is giving the people what they promised; they are striking the first blow at protection and are heading the country in the direction of an era which will give us a policy of free trade. I do not for one moment say that this tariff is an ideal tariff, that it is a tariff I should like to see adopted here. And why is it not? If to-day there is such a strong element of protection in the policy propounded, who is to blame for it? Who introduced the policy of protection, that tied and shackled our industries until to-day we do not stand in the proud position we occupied in 1878 when Canada stood free with hands untied as regards its tariff policy; but to-day, as an hon. gentleman whose name must be remembered, said, "we stand with our hands tied and our future compromised," and if the Government is charged to-day with inconsistency for not having given free trade to the country it is because our hands are tied and our future compromised by eighteen years of the rankest kind of protection, diverted from the original policy of protecting our native industries into a gigantic scheme of corruption for keeping a certain political party in power. Then hon. gentlemen, as a last resort, finding none of these attacks availed, say—they fear this resolution because it gives too much power to the Government. Such a declaration coming from hon. gentlemen that proposed and carried out the National Policy, is amazing. Those hon. gentlemen have undertaken to speak in the name of the business men of the country. They have no right to speak in the name of the business men of Canada. The business men rejected those hon. gentlemen in 1896, and I believe one reason was because of the arbitrary and extreme way in which they as a Government exercised their control of the tariff. If there was one feature of the National Policy worse than another it was the power it placed in the hands of the executive to interpret the tariff law so as to give favours here and there when it suited the Government. There never was a tariff in this country that placed such enormous powers in the hands of the executive and its officers as the National Policy introduced by hon. gentlemen opposite. Some examples were pointed out last night, and I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to point in this resolution to anything like the power placed in the hands of the Government compared with that exercised by the late Government for purposes which they knew so well how to exercise in their own interests. So after all these attacks I have to thank hon. gentlemen opposite that they have convinced me, notwithstanding all their ability, all their zeal for party advantage, for the workingmen and for the down-trodden and suffering manufacturer, that their objections are groundless and have taken away any doubt I entertained in respect to the soundness of this resolution, so that I have now no fear of trampling on the constitution or ruining any one in this country.

Mr. GANONG. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat had no need whatever to tell the House that he had not changed his mind in regard to the tariff policy, for, if I mistake not, it was the National Policy that elected him.

Mr. McCLURE. No.

Mr. GANONG. It was the duty on coal that gave the hon. gentleman a seat in this House to-day. There is no hon. gentleman sitting opposite who believes that the hon. gentlemen would have been elected in June last on a straight trade policy. I do not propose, however, to deal with this matter at present; but I desire to ask the Controller of Customs a question to which I hope he will give a reply. It is an inquiry that is quite pertinent in connection with the resolution we are discussing, and it is in regard to the granite business. Some of our Canadian granite men have been importing what is known as Quincy granite, and what they want to know is: Whether that Quincy granite can be shipped from the city of Boston to Aberdeen, there to be finished and polished, and sent back into Canada under the preferential clause. Will the Controller of Customs please answer that?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I think it would be better if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ganong) would call around at my office and we will discuss that.

Mr. GANONG. We can scarcely expect anything more definite than that from the hon. gentleman. We have been for days trying to get these hon. gentlemen on the

Mr. McCLURE.

Treasury benches to give us information on these points, but they are all of the same artful-dodger class.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. We are considering the preferential tariff just now, and, when we reach the granite item, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ganong) will allow us, we will discuss it fully.

Mr. GANONG. We will also discuss it on this item, for it is quite pertinent to the question before the House. I simply ask if under these conditions granite will come under the preferential clause. It is business and it is the business of the Government to tell us. I shall not say, Mr. Chairman, like some other hon. gentlemen, that I do not purpose taking up much of your time; you apparently have lots of it; but, as the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has referred to matters away back in the Mackenzie Administration, I shall also have to speak of them in connection with the matter I am now discussing. The granite business was started under the Mackenzie Government in 1873. I may say that there is a history to the granite business, and it differs from the general industries of this country, because of the fact that it is the history, to some extent, of the Liberal party. It is not written, as it has been in many instances, in broken promises and repudiated policies, but it is written on the face of those grand old granite hills of the county of Charlotte. Now, Sir, I have been perfectly frank in stating that this industry was started under the Mackenzie Administration, but the year that saw the demise of the Mackenzie Administration also saw the death of that granite business. It may have been a strange coincidence, but it is nevertheless the fact, that the day that marked the death of that Government also marked the death of this industry. It is not only in the mountain passes of the west that the failure of that Liberal Government is marked in broken promises to carry out the contract with British Columbia, but it is also marked in the mountains of the east. Monuments are frequently erected which are worthy of consideration, and some of these monuments have inscriptions upon them for the benefit of friends that follow. I believe that the Liberal party might write on its monuments, both in the east and in the west, such an inscription as can be found on a certain tombstone in a graveyard in eastern Canada, and which reads in this fashion:

Awake, asleep, at home, abroad,
Protected still we are by God.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. GANONG. I have noted, as one of the results of this preferential tariff, or whatever else you may call it, a certain lot of parrot-like cries in this House, and I wonder if they are the product of this clause. They seem to come from the back benches you-der, and occasionally we hear one from this corner of the House down here.

Mr. TALBOT. Carried.

Mr. GANONG. There he goes again. Now, Sir, as regards the trade policy, I believe that in no province of Canada were the issues fought out so squarely last June as in the province I have the honour to represent. We did not have so many outside questions down there, as they had in the other provinces. We were led to believe that the Liberal party were going to carry on the contest on the same old lines as since 1878, and that they were at liberty to use any old policy that was available, so long as they could get into power. That the Liberal party did, while the Conservative party carried out the campaign on the principles of the grand old National Policy. As an evidence of this, allow me to read you from the principal organ of the Liberal party in my province, with all due apology to the hon. member from the city of St. John (Mr. Ellis). The St. John "Daily Telegraph" stated, on June 10th, 1896 :

The trade issue must ever be the principal one in Canada with parties constituted as they are, no matter how much it may be obscured for a time by other questions.

There is no uncertain sound in that, and it was on that policy that the elections were carried on in New Brunswick, with the result, as you see, that in almost every county where the trade question came to the surface, a Liberal-Conservative was elected. That applies to every constituency except the city and county of St. John, where a side issue intervened, and on which side issue, no doubt, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) could give us some information, if he were so inclined. In that constituency the side issue succeeded in defeating the Conservative candidates. Now, Sir, I wish to call your attention to a few New Brunswick counties that lie immediately along the American border, and, if there are any counties in this country where we can get an idea of the relative positions, it is in these counties. In the county of Victoria, you will note that the people still have confidence in their former member, the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan). In the county of Carleton, we find that the people were tired of chasing Will-o'-the-wisp doctrines, and they sent another Conservative here, in the person of the Hon. F. H. Hale. When we come to the grand old county of Charlotte, we find that the National Policy also prevailed. In that county we had quite a spirited campaign, and we had the Liberal doctrines preached, not only by hirelings from St. John and other districts, but we had one imported from the city of Boston to help them out. That gentleman travelled over the county, particularly amongst the fishermen, and he could so readily tap his lachrymal glands that his tears almost washed the soil from the face of the somewhat barren rocks. But, strange to say, on the evening of election day, the 23rd of June, that gentleman did not go to a free trade country. He skipped to the United States under a 40 per cent tariff, and he has not been heard from since. We had also the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) down there. He came into the county in the daytime, I believe, but he left in the middle of the night. He talked free trade for everything but granite, for he was in a granite town. But the opinion prevails there very strongly that he was sent out of the county rather hurriedly. There was a time in the past records of that county when the hon. member had some little difficulty with the late member for that county, and there was a feeling down there that his talk was not sufficiently in favour of the late member to induce them to agree very well; and as a consequence, the hon. member for King's left by night for St. John, not waiting for a train that was to come in in a very few hours. We had free trade advocates also along the shores of the islands. But when we got to the manufacturing town of Milltown, we had another hireling at $10 a night to come down and tell the mill people that they need not be afraid, that they would be looked after. From a letter I received yesterday, I think the present Government are looking after them—in a rather unfortunate manner, however. But strange to say, there was one honest Liberal at that meeting in the person of the late Hon. A. H. Gillmor, the gentleman who was left out in the cold by his party. The gentleman who was brought there gave an elaborate discourse, telling the people practically about the beauties of the National Policy. True to his principles, Mr. Gillmor repudiated every word of it, saying that if the Government adopted such a policy he would resign the next day. Such were the policies we had to contend with in the county of Charlotte; but, after all, there was no difficulty. When we came to nomination day, what did we have? For six weeks we had this canvass of free trade; and why should not Mr. Gillmor talk free trade? Had he not come from the very feet of the prophet of reform? What did his chieftain say to him? We have it in his chieftain's own words, and he (Mr. Gillmor) knew whereof he was talking. His chieftain had said to him: "Our ideal is free trade. I propose that we shall follow England's example; we shall give you free trade." That was the talk that he had come down there with, because he had been educated in this school of reform. But, Sir, there came a date after the first of June when even the late member for Charlotte began to waver, for his chief organ published a letter which the hon. leader of the present Government had written to a Mr. Bertram, and one clause in that letter reads thus :

Whether a policy of absolute free trade would or would not be injurious to the manufacturing industries of this country, is a question I will not stop to discuss here. There is no occasion for such a discussion, as the intention of the Liberal party is not, and never was, to establish free trade in this country.

When the late member for Charlotte began to put that statement beside the education he had received here in Ottawa just a few weeks before, it made him rather shy, and he scarcely knew what to do. In his extremity, what did he do? He telegraphed to his chieftain to come down and reconcile his statements. But his chieftain was wiser than he; he did not come down. He had been up in the county of Victoria, and he concluded, from his experience there, that he had seen quite enough of New Brunswick for that trip. He knew that no French domination cry would take in the county of Charlotte. But when nomination day came, our friend the late candidate, the Hon. A. H. Gillmor, was just like the members on the other side of the House. When questioned as to what he would do, he simply said he proposed to follow Mr. Laurier. It did not make any difference what the policy was, he was going to swallow the dose.

There have been a few remarks made in regard to the speech of the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost). I must say I was surprised to hear that hon. member make the statement he did, and I would like to call his attention to it. He states:

We have seen thousands of men, workingmen, honest, upright men, driven out of this country through the action of the so-called National Policy.

That is the first statement that I have ever seen made just in that way. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can justify it. I claim that there has never been a man who has left Canada through the effect of the National Policy, and there is not a man on the Government benches to-day who can prove it. I take issue with the hon. gentleman in regard to that. What is the principle or purpose of the National Policy? He seems to have lost sight of that entirely. It is simply to conserve Canadian markets for Canadian products, made by citizens of Canada who are fed on food produced in Canada and clothed in the fabrics of Canadian factories, paying Canadian taxes. That is the principle of the National Policy; if the application of that principle was not right, these gentlemen have no right to claim that the principle was wrong. It was not the National Policy that drove people out of the country. I am not willing even to accept the statement that the National Policy drove them out because the duties were reduced from 35 to 20 per cent. The hon. gentleman looks as happy as any man on the Government benches; in fact, I think he should look happier, but there is one clause in these resolutions which may set him squirming some day. They have virtually told him that while he had protection enough under the old policy, they are going to give him a little more. Can it be that they mean, some time before the next election, to put that patent Fielding thumbscrew upon him, and make him disgorge something of what he has taken from the farmers, according to the statements made before the election? It would be a sad thing to see. It would even be a sad thing to see the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) putting that thumbscrew on the senior member of the firm of William Paterson & Son. There are a good many of these hon. gentlemen who may be forced to feel that thumbscrew before that time. The hon. gentleman also made the statement that this tariff would change $20,000,000 of imports from the United States into imports from Great Britain. He was not quite so wary as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) because that hon. gentleman did not make so broad a statement. He had examined the figures, and what did he touch? He barely touched the cotton industry, and he said that he was much mistaken in the British if they did not look a little more closely after that particular branch. I think that if the hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Frost) would examine the goods that are imported from the United States, he would somewhat change his opinion. We imported from the United States goods amounting to $58,544,000, of which $29,472,000 were free, and the hon. gentleman will scarcely say that any of those free goods are likely to come from Great Britain. Of the balance $29,000,000 which are dutiable, $20,000,000 consisted of the following goods: Coal, cotton, lumber, grease, tobacco, animals, hides, broom corn, fruit, hams, seeds, hops, cotton wastes, and other lines which we could not possibly import from Great Britain, leaving at the most $9,000,000 that might be imported from the mother country. But the difficulty with the hon. gentleman was that he just reversed the figures. Instead of saying that at the outside only $9,000,000 of these dutiable goods which we get from the United States could be imported from Great Britain, he said that $20,000,000 might be imported from that country. But at the most there cannot be over $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 worth of these goods that Great Britain can send us, and the reason of that hon. gentlemen can readily understand. The manufacturers of wood are all imported from the United States as Great Britain cannot produce those, and besides that the conditions of the United States and Canada are so completely identical and the habits and methods of our people so completely alike that the classes of goods made in the United States are more desirable and will be purchased by our citizens in preference to the manufactures of Great Britain.

An hon. gentleman a short time since, asked what it was had driven our people out of the country. Well, there are some conditions that I believe the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has not considered. There is no trade policy that can apply to Canada satisfactorily that does not take into full account the conditions in the country to the south of us. I care not what the Government may be, they must take into consideration that condition. In their old policy hon. gentlemen opposite said that we had lost our population under the National Policy, that our farmers had gone away from us. We admit that they have gone, and regret it, but where have they gone? To a free trade country? No, Sir, to the United States. Why have they gone to the United States? Not because the conditions of farmers are any better there than in Canada. Certainly not, because not five per cent of our people who have left Canada for the United States have engaged in the farming industry. They have simply gone because the conditions of trade and the rates of wages are more favourable there than in Canada, and to-day you will find our people in the industrial centres of the United States, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. If then the conditions with regard to farming are no better in the United States than in Canada, what have you to offer those people, under this new policy to induce them to come back and farm in Canada? Not one single advantage. Neither have you anything in your financial policy to tempt them to return, because, from the best evidence we have, the probability is a higher rate of taxation will prevail here than has ever prevailed in this country in the past. It is true that the United States, in the past thirty years, have received by far the greater portion of the immigration to this continent, and it may be pertinent to look to some of the causes of that great influx into that country. There are two principal causes. The first is, perhaps, that in Europe the socialistic element of discontents, made perhaps so to a great extent by the enforced military service on the continent, and more particularly by the low scale of living and low rates of wages, have the idea that the United States is a country where they can have their own sweet will; and judging from the police records and criminal statistics of that country, there is not much question but that they have attempted to exercise their own proclivities in that sense. I do not think that Canada wants any of that class of immigrants, but there is a better class which through published reports and statistics have been led to believe the United States is a better country to live in, simply because the rates of wages there are higher than in continental countries. Behind that, too, is the fact that they know the constitution of that country is founded on the great charter given to the English people many years ago. We have not anything to induce these people to come to this country commensurate with the inducements held out to them by the United States. Our rates of wages are lower, and until they rise to the level or very nearly the level of the wages in the United States, we cannot look for much immigration to our country, and neither can we expect to keep our own people from going to the United States. In fact we have the evidence of this right here before us from the father of discord in political and religious matters in this country, the Hon. Thos. Greenway, of Manitoba. That hon. gentleman, in a recent interview, said:

The Hon. Thomas Greenway, Premier of Manitoba, was interviewed in Chicago recently, and is thus reported in the "Canadian American": "While in the United States the free grant lands are practically exhausted—as is proved by the overwhelming rush when any reservation is opened—there is lying across the border, in Manitoba, any quantity of free land, and also lands in settled portions at $4 and $5 an acre. When the Red Deer Reservation in Northern Minnesota was opened, not long ago, there was a rush of ten men for every lot, and yet, if they had only known it, about 50 miles north there lay across the border, in Manitoba, as fine land as the sun ever shone on for $4 or $5 an acre by purchase, besides much more, free to settlers, further north."

It is not any inducement which this Government holds out that Mr. Greenway looks to, but simply the fact that the United States are so filled to-day that they cannot accommodate any further immigration, and Mr. Greenway expects to get the surplus into Manitoba and the North-west.

As regards this question of preferential trade I agree with some of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this side that the Conservatives are a unit on the question of protection. We have stood during the past eighteen or twenty years on that ground, and to-day we are as firm upon it as we ever were. We can love our English and our Scotch artisans better than those of continental nations without question; but when it comes to Canadian artisans, then we say that the Canadian who does not love his own country and his own people better than other countries and other people is not a good Canadian citizen. We require in this country a continuance of the judicious tariff legislation which has in the past retained so many of our artisans, even under conditions so difficult, considering the intense competition we have had to the south of us. We have to consider the United States, because they are competitors with us not only for immigration, but in every product that we have in this country. We want immigration of a class such as will build up our country on a sound basis. If we are to have goods made by English, Scotch or German artisans, let us have them manufactured by Englishmen, Scotchmen and Germans, living in Canadian homes, eating Canadian food, wearing Canadian fabrics and paying Canadian taxes. It is time our Parliament got upon a higher plane than that of mere politics, a national plane more fully recognizing protection to our labourers as the basis of our national life. That is the one thing that has tended to bring us credit, to establish greater confidence in us abroad and greater confidence among our people at home—that confidence which underlies the whole scheme of industrial development, and the attainment of a higher civilization.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I am informed that the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Ganong) addressed some remarks to me as representing King's County.

Mr. SPROULE. You are right.

Mr. DOMVILLE. My hon. friend whom we have so often heard in committee and who seems to take command of the forces over there, says I am right. It must be so if he says so, for he occupies so much of his time telling this House and this country what they should do, that he could hardly be mistaken. Possibly, if he had to listen to himself as often as we do, less would be heard from him. I do not know why my hon. friend from Charlotte should criticise me in King's County. We all know King's County. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) knows it. The hon. gentleman says I fled from King's County. I never left King's County, but I stood by the county as I intend to stand by it and to hold King's against all comers as long as the breath of life is in me. I know the people there and understand their ideas. A great many gentlemen come there and claim on the platform that they are sons of King's, but they never came from King's.

Mr. LISTER. To whom do you refer?

Mr. DOMVILLE. It is not necessary for me to say to whom I refer, because the hon. gentleman whom I refer to knows it. He stood on the platform and said that he was a son of King's and he never was a son of King's. King's repudiated him, and will continue to do so. And, notwithstanding what the hon. member for Charlotte may say, King's County and New Brunswick will stand up in support of a Government that is loyal to the British Crown, loyal not only in words or in sentiment, but loyal in deed, ready at all times to stand by British ideas and British institutions. I have been surprised to see what my hon. friend from Charlotte says about the Americans. He lives on the American border, and it is hard to say which side they live on when they trade. There is a river flowing down there between the two countries, as you know, Mr. Chairman. The stream is rapid and goods coming down land sometimes on one side and sometimes on the other. You will find that the people live in Calais and they live in St. Stephen and they are people of the same origin, and they are apt to forget even their obligations to their country as they carry their goods from side to side as their own interests direct. The hon. member for Charlotte should be glad that we make the tariff as we do, because great changes would be injurious to friends of his if not to himself. They have made a great deal of money out of the tariff, and I have no doubt that that will continue. My hon. friend from Charlotte did come from King's County, but he left King's County for King's County's good, or if not that, he left it for his own. I am glad and proud to know that he has prospered in Charlotte, though he did not prosper in King's. He points out that our young men go to the States to prosper. Why should they not? Great Britain raises a hardy race of sons, and they go all over the world, and wherever they go they make their mark and make their influence felt in foreign countries. But, because we bring down a tariff that will build up Canada, the hon. gentleman finds fault. I did not intend to say a word had not the hon. gentleman referred to me, but now that I am on my feet I may say that, in my opinion, the tariff is one that will benefit Canada. In our elections we asked the people to return us in order that we might introduce a tariff that would lead in the direction of free trade. Was there any man idiotic enough to think that we would have free trade at once, that we would take duties off at one swoop, that we would do away with revenue, and that so far as concerns the heavy burdens of expenditure laid upon the country by hon. gentlemen opposite through their reckless expenditure, we would raise that out of the wind? No, we told the people that we were going to inaugurate a policy that would lead in the direction of free trade, and assimilate our conditions to those of England, a country that has under a policy of what we call free trade, raising her revenue from a few articles, and is able to control the world, to take her fleet up the Dardanelles, and to restrain the Sultan, to take her army up the Nile and control the Malidi, to control India and to control the world. And I have always felt that after the Government was able to get time to regulate the affairs of the country, and get rid of the abuses which have grown up under their predecessors, they will give us a British policy. I was amused to hear my hon. friend from Charlotte criticise the Government and its policy. Does he mean to stand up and instruct men who have had vast experience, men who have been twenty or thirty years legislating in these halls—he with his limited experience? True, he has had success in Charlotte County. I wish I had been able to put sugar together and make what he has made out of it. Had I been able to do so I would not have called down his censure, but I would have been able to sweeten the world. Hon. gentlemen opposite criticise, but their criticism is simply a wail that they are no longer in power. They cannot realize that they have been driven out by the people; they cannot realize that Canada is with the present Government, be it Liberal or Conservative. Be it Liberal or Conservative, what difference does it make? But it marks this fact, that the people have decided, that the sovereign will of this country has been pronounced, for a change of Government. They were tired of the past Administration, they are tired of the gentlemen who are getting up here to-day and bewailing the acts of this Government, and posing as statesmen. The people are tired of them. The people denounce them. Look at Nova Scotia; look at Quebec the other day; and so it will follow in New Brunswick. My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) went down to Charlotte, and he told them that he was going to carry the county. At his meeting he would not even allow me to reply; he claimed I was an intruder, and quoted the saying that I was an unbidden guest at the feast. I asked him to allow me to speak under the blue canopy of heaven. When he was done, I asked in vain for the privilege to hire that hall and to speak, if there were only three remained to hear me; but he objected, and said that I should not speak, that it was his night, it was his occasion, it was his opportunity, and nobody should reply to him, nobody should be there to correct all the mis-statements that he made, which he knew were incorrect; and he did not dare to allow anybody to set the people right. Now to-night he sits there, and I will read him just a little piece of poetry which may be applicable. I take it from the "Globe." The picture, perhaps, is not quite as well drawn as it might be.

Mr. FOSTER. Not artistic.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Well, they could not make it artistic. They would need Hogarth's lines of beauty to make it artistic:

I represent the workin' man; I'm toll's unhappy son,

'Oo's lost 'is job an' seeks in vain to find another one;

My trade was cuttin' Cab'nit ice—

A well-paid job as I thought nice—

But since that fatal day in June I ain't a-cuttin' none.

Now, they have cut no ice so far. But the unhappy position they are in is this: They forget that there is a reading public; they forget that Great Britain, that we all love and revere, is watching us; they forget that the British press condemns them. When my hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Ganong) talked about Canada for Canadians, I would have him understand that there is no such nation as Canada; there is the British nation, the British Empire, and Canada is an integral portion of that Empire, just as much as India is, or Ceylon, or the Cape of Good Hope. England won't thank them for throwing all these ideas out about Canada for Canadians. England is willing to defend us to the last drop of her blood; England lends us her money; England has produced the finest statesmen in the world, the finest sailors and the finest soldiers. England has produced the Irishmen my hon. friend speaks of, and the Scotchmen and the Englishmen. England will continue to produce them, and to send them here. I do think that when these remarks of these hon. gentlemen—although, perhaps, the press will not take the trouble to cable them over to England; they have cabled them over so often that the story has become threadbare—but I do believe that, if they should ever reach England, English statesmen will look on the utterances of these hon. gentlemen with any respect. England has discredited them. England has placed a star on their breasts, England has given them titles, and what thanks have they given England for these? They have simply got up here and opposed the Governor General. I saw the "Sun" newspaper, which my hon. friend for York was editor of for a time. It was his organ, it gave his name as editor, and what does it say? It finds fault with us in this House because we did not pitch into the Governor General and the vote for the Governor General's house at Rideau. Why should we? They left us embarrassed with it; they built the Government House—or if they did not build it, they repaired it. They have placed the necessity for it on the Government of this country. I voted for it, it is true, because I would vote for anything that is right in the way of paying legitimate expenses. It is time enough when we get a new Governor General to make a new bargain with him, if we choose; but for us to repudiate the bills of to-day, which hon. gentlemen opposite placed upon this country—it is not our duty so to do. I will tell my hon. friend about his Government House business. He pointed out, as a temperance leader, when he addressed our people, that his whole heart, his whole life, was bound up in that great temperance cause, that he would die for it. The hon. gentleman will not drink rum himself, but he knows that it gave him his election, he knows the value of it well; and the whole country knows that the rum was bailed out by the gallon for him, and what I say I can prove. I showed, on the hustings platform, that all this expenditure for champagne glasses and wine glasses, and decanters, labelled brandy, and gin, and rum, he should have paid for himself. I pointed out at that time that the expense should have never been incurred. They said, if this country is to be charged with decanters, and wine glasses, and labels marked brandy, and gin, and rum, and there is no liquor in them, what is the charge for? Where is the charge for the liquor they drank? Because they did not buy wine glasses and decanters for nothing. But he was very ingenious in explaining it. He tried to explain to the people that they were gum bottles, moisteners, so charged in the public accounts, but the people would not credit it. I pointed out to my hon. friend, and I pointed out to the meeting, that it was under the head of moisteners. Now, my hon. friend represented strongly that it was not moisteners, but I think the people believed it was.

Mr. KAULBACH. It was only the spirit of the resolution.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Well, my hon. friend can go down to his constituents and talk that way. What we have got before us to-day is a change of Administration, and it was time it came. It does not make any difference who got in or who got out, so long as the floor was swept. That floor was swept completely. There is no use of my hon. friend discussing what I did, or what anybody else did, we are only here for the time being; we are making history, and some are making very poor history, because they will find that, as the ball rolls and the wheel goes round, Canada will not stand still. The working classes that my hon. friend pretends to champion, have no confidence in him. They have no confidence in him in New Brunswick. Take the result in Queens county. My hon. friend went from pillar to post, and he was left literally without a corporal's guard.

Mr. COWAN. Did they know him in York?

Mr. DOMVILLE. They knew him in York, but I am afraid they will know him no more in York. As I was saying, as the ball rolls round and the wheel goes round, so will my hon. friend go from York to find another constituency, and I think he is correct, because New Brunswick at the next election will make a good showing for itself. The tariff, perhaps, is not all that we should like. There is no question that you cannot serve every interest in this Dominion at the same time and in the same way, according to what they would wish. But do hon. gentlemen opposite think that we are so stupid, or that the people are so blind as to be deceived when a herring is drawn across the track in order to raise ill-feeling and animosity? No, Sir, the people are not stupid, the people know we have got to get out of the difficulty that we are in. They are hopeful to-day. I was down to my county, the great old county of King's, the other day, which the member for York used to represent, and there I found they were perfectly satisfied with the efforts we were making. We told them what we had done about the duties. We said: We have taken a step in the right direction; there is so much off coal oil; more will follow. We are not going to ruin Ontario by at once shutting up her industries. We talked about spirits and alcohol, which my hon. friend from York is so much interested in, and I showed them that we had put 15 cents a gallon on that, and they said it was a step in the right direction, unless we took it off altogether.

What do they want? Do they want to get into power? That is impossible. They do not realize that there is a race to be run; they have had eighteen years of solid comfort. They do not realize that to-day they are unable to send people over the Intercolonial Railway with free passes to the tune of several thousands in number. They do not realize that they cannot have returning officers at their back, that they cannot make up the lists and carry out the elections as they please. They are gone for some time. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) has got to eat the bitter fruit. The hon. gentleman has played a hand that never was played in this country before. He has spoken in this House for the whole of Canada; he has imagined there was no wealth except what was in his pocket. With what result? He is a lone man to-day, taking up the time of the House and costing the country a great deal of money while entering protests. The other day he took up an item of $50, and said: We must know for what these $50 are intended before we can go into this extravagance. He dwelt on this $50 item, and yet not long ago the hon. gentleman and his colleagues were using the Intercolonial Railway to the tune of thousands of dollars to convey voters to the polls. Will the hon. gentleman deny it? No; because the proof is not very far off, if it is necessary to produce it. At all events, let hon. gentlemen opposite be patriotic. Let them remember they are out of office to-day by the will of the people, and the people have a say in this country. They are not bound to one man, but they desire the country to be managed in their interests. They placed the Government in power, believing that they will introduce a policy which will in the long run be beneficial. Let hon. gentlemen opposite give the Government a fair trial. Let them try to keep quiet and not seek to turn out the Government at once; let them show they are statesmen and willing to wait, and allow this party to show what it can do, and if this party fails to carry out its policy and its principles and commits errors and mistakes, to use no strong words, such as were committed by hon. gentlemen opposite, then the people will be prepared to declare that the party in power have not fulfilled their promises, have not done their duty, and there are no hon. members on this side of the House who will then be prepared to endorse the Government for a single hour. But we have faith that the Government will fulfil their pledges. Did hon. gentlemen opposite ever want free trade? I will go back to 1878, before the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) came to this country. Why was the National Policy introduced at that time? It was because it was necessary to protect the trade of Canada against the United States: it was because we said, if you will not allow our people to play in your yard, we will not allow yours to play in ours. We desire free trade at the present time, but we have been met with hostility on the part of the United States. We could not throw down our barriers and allow American goods freely to come in, but we have to meet them with a measure of justice; and to-day we have to secure two objects: one is to keep together the trade we have and prevent American goods entering our market except on fair terms; and the next is to deal generously with the mother country. The press of England to-day is congratulating Canada that under the present Premier we have shown our willingness to approach the trade question in a spirit of generosity and give preferential terms to Great Britain. Do hon. gentlemen opposite find fault with provisions to allow English goods to come in under preferential rates? If our conditions were such as to permit it, I would be willing to allow all English goods to come in free of duty and allow England to have our market. I believe in our farmers, I believe in my friends the Patrons, and if our farmers could get agricultural implements cheaper, they would be able to produce cheaper, and we would become a shipping country; but if our tariff conditions make productions dearer here than elsewhere our farmers are handicapped. The common market for Canada is England. Canada, the United States and the rest of the world ship to England, which redistributes our products. If we could produce cheaply here, we would be able to give employment to the sons of our farmers and keep them in the country; but if we are going to place this country in the hands of combines, if we are going to allow the money interests to control our industries, then we are not adopting free trade or protection, but we are simply allowing certain men, as was allowed by the late Government, which fostered them—excuse the pun—to control the production, and our people become simply hewers of wood and drawers of water. We must assure the world by this tariff that we are in dead earnest. We want to let England and the rest of the world see that Canada is the leading colony of the Empire, that the people are not Canadians at one time and British at another as it suits them, that we are not asking the British fleet or army to protect us and at the same time telling Great Britain that we will not trade with her. Hon. members on this side of the House have listened with a great deal of patience to hon. gentlemen opposite; they have repeated the same speeches night after night and have told the same old stories. But what does Canada care about them? The people turned them down with their thumbs.

Notwithstanding the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) and the hon. member for Cape Breton, Canada will show that she will stand up for the British Empire. I do not know that there is much use in discussing the matter because it is a dead horse, and there is no necessity for whipping a dead horse. My hon. friend opposite (Mr. Foster) tried to whip up the dead horse in King's, but it was a complete failure. My hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Ganong) has gone further, but I remember when I went down to his old homestead and bought plums for $8 a bushel, which were never delivered. That was election time, and it was all right. I have got a plum myself now, and I do not require them. I do trust that when hon. gentlemen opposite stop to remember the manner which they have inflicted us with their incessant talk, they will give us a rest and let the business of the House proceed. I remember that my old friend Sir John Macdonald compared a gentleman who spoke a great deal in the House to a windmill run by water power. There are windmills all over the country, and in this House to-day, and they go around and around with the wind all the time, but the wind bloweth where it listeth. It affects no one except the continual crank and jar of the wheel going round on its chain. It lifts so much water out of the well, and that is the end of the water. So it is with the speeches of my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster), and these other gentlemen over there. They amount to nothing, and they might as well stop and give the country a chance to rest. If hon. gentlemen opposite think they are strong enough to prevent the business going on let them take a vote, and see where they are. All their talking cuts no ice in the country, and the people of the country only ask: Are they rational men in Parliament that they sit day in and day out discussing all kinds of fly resolutions which are voted down and amount to nothing. Cannot we come down to some rational reasoning on the matter.

Mr. McCLEARY. We give it up.

Mr. DOMVILLE. My hon. friend says that he will give it up.

Mr. McCLEARY. The rational part of it.

Mr. DOMVILLE. But my hon. friend here reminds me that the Conservative party have got no rations now.

Mr. McCLEARY. Your rations are coming.

Mr. DOMVILLE. We are going to England, and we will have rations there, and good rations too. My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) is like Davie Crockett's coon; he came down before he was shot at. We do not take any stock in him, however. This side of the House will carry out what it proposes until they are relieved from office by the sovereign will of the people of Canada, and when our friends go into Opposition, I hope they will not go into it complaining about everything and preaching disloyalty to the Crown of England and disloyalty to the British Government as these gentlemen over there do. These gentlemen opposite are out of office now, and they are crying and whining over it, and are afraid that they will never get into power again. I had the honour of being defeated five times by my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Foster), but I took my medicine like a man, and did not whine about it, and I am here to-day representing the county of King's. I am sorry that he and his colleagues preach disloyalty to the British Crown and Queen Victoria in this the greatest year of the great Victorian age, an age that has never existed before. Victoria's armies have been successful all over the world, and England's policy has been successful, and the only party unsuccessful this year are my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) and his colleagues, who are now finding fault with loyalty to the British Government.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not intend to discuss this question at any length for it has been threshed out over and over again, and many members of the House as well as myself are sick of it. I again take exception to some remarks that were made to this House at the expense of the Patrons. When the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Kendry) was speaking to-night he said that the manufacturers in Canada paid $2 to their labourers for every dollar paid by the German manufacturers, and I asked him the simple question, if he thought the farmers of Canada could afford to pay that $2 when one was paid by other countries? He answered back something about: Did you get a leather trunk. That was a nice intelligent answer for him to give to a fair question. It was exceedingly nice to come from a man who calls himself a gentleman, representing, as I am sorry to say he does, many, good, sturdy farmers. It is an answer that will sound well in his constituency, and he will hear of it, if from nobody else, from me in his constituency. The other night also, the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett)—and I am sorry he is not in his seat to-night, spoke of this trunk business. I hope I would be above referring moreover to anything on the floor of the House so small and contemptible as this was, if it had not been introduced by others. It was talked of throughout the country, and I am not ashamed to say that it was, even if it was called peanut politics.

An hon. MEMBER. Or doughnuts.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, or doughnuts, if you like. It does not trouble me in the least. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) also made a very nice laugh for his friends when he said that Frontenac was represented by a haycock and a doughnut. It was a nice thing to say. I am sure he feels proud of it to-day. I am sure the sturdy Orangemen he claims to be the leader of, many of whom are farmers, would not thank him for that remark, and he will hear of it. I was not the first to refer to the trunk business in this House. When asked, I said, I was not going to say anything about it—I would leave that to others. But I was pleased to see that the Government dealt with that matter and abolished it altogether. After I had denied the statement of the hon. member for East Simcoe with regard to the trunk, he threw back the nasty sneer that I had gone back on my principles in regard to that as well as in regard to other things in the Patron platform. I beg to say that I have not gone back on my principles as laid down in that platform. I take my own interpretation of the principles of that platform, not that of any one else. Some went further than I did; but I do not go by what individual members say in the country. I came here to follow my own judgment in carrying out the principles of that platform. I deny that I have betrayed those principles, and I believe my constituents in the county of Frontenac do not think I have. When I denied the hon. gentleman's statement on the floor of this House, some of the papers rather unpleasantly alluded to me as threshing the air with my hands. If I did, I was only following the example set me by others, notably, the ex-Finance Minister. They also said that I was ordered to sit down by the party whip, that the party whip was lashed over us, and that we had to follow the leaders of the Government. I assure you that the leaders of the Government never approached us as to what we should do on any subject, directly or indirectly. The hon. member for East Simcoe said he would watch the Public Accounts to see whether I took a trunk or not. He was not satisfied with that, but I understand he went around inquiring whether I did take it, and sent somebody sneaking around to see if there was a trunk for me in the cellar or in the back rooms. Contemptible actions. He said he saw my name printed on the end of a trunk, and would corroborate that statement by three or four other members. I defy him or any other member of this House to say so now. This is only one instance; but any other time there is any sneer or slur cast against me, hon. gentlemen opposite need not expect me to take it; I will not take it. When I consider whence it comes, it does not hurt a bit. But when any contemptuous remarks are made about me or about the cause of the Patrons, you may depend upon it that I will defend myself. I did not intend to refer to this, for I did expect something better from hon. gentlemen opposite than this small talk.

Mr. OSLEK. Lest I should have to return to West Toronto and be pointed at with scorn as the only member of this House who had not spoken on this question, I would just like to say a word or two very briefly. I want to give the Government credit wherever I can in their trade resolutions. I will assume that they meant to give preferential trade to Great Britain. If they do that, I will support them first, last, and always. I believe that was their intention when they drew up these resolutions. They have been mistaken, however, and I would like to see them, as men and as Canadians, in this Jubilee year, come out and say: "We made a mistake; we will give preferential trade to Great Britain and her colonies, and only to Great Britain and her colonies. I am a National Policy man, first, last, and altogether. I believe the National Policy has built up Canada, so that during the last five or six years of hard times the world over, Canada has held her own against all the other nations of the earth—held her own as no other nation has done—held her own as against the rich and prosperous and more numerous people to the south of us. Who will say to-day, looking over this vast continent, that Canada is not in a better and more prosperous state than any other part of this continent. I believe in the National Policy. At the same time, I believe in a preferential trade policy that will bind all parts of this Empire together as against all the world. I am entirely against any preferential trade policy that will admit other nations on the same terms as the different parts of the British Empire. I am not proposing to go into the question of free trade or protection, or to take up the time of the House except on this one point. I do not believe that any one reading these resolutions, which assume to give preferential trade to Great Britain, can say that they do give preferential trade to Great Britain. If the Government say that they will only give preferential trade to Great Britain and her colonies, and not merely make it a catchword and let in other nations on the same terms, and that at the beck and will of one member of the Government—if they say they will admit goods from Great Britain and her colonies on better terms than goods coming from other nations, I will support them first and last on that point. I give them credit for meaning to give preferential trade to Great Britain and her colonies when they brought in their resolution, and I believe it is not yet too late to change it. I am not speaking of something that is new, but shall merely quote what I stated as my views in my retiring address to the Board of Trade of Toronto in January last. I concluded that address by saying:

I believe that our true interest is to cultivate the closest business relations with Great Britain and our sister colonies, and I, for one, would not hesitate to take the first step in this direction by admitting all goods coming from England, or any of the colonies, on more favourable terms than goods coming from any other country.

I am entirely in accord with what I then said, and I support the amendment offered by the hon. member for North Bruce, because I believe it covers what we all desire, preferential trade with Great Britain; and on the other hand, I believe that the resolutions of the Government do not meet that desire for preferential trade about which we all talk so strongly.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 33; Nays, 67.

Resolution agreed to on same division.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.15 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 2nd June, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE PATENT ACT.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 120) further to amend the Patent Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to carry out the abolition of the office of Patent Commissioner, which was created by an Act some years ago, and which, I believe, in the interest of economy and efficiency in the patent branch of my department, I can dispense with.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY PASSENGER TICKETS.

Mr. BEATTIE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 121) respecting the sale of railway passenger tickets. He said: This Bill is to bring the sale of steamboat and ferry-boat tickets under the same restrictions as are applied to railway tickets, to prevent scalpers dealing in those tickets to the detriment of the companies.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BRITISH COLUMBIA SOUTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. McINNES asked:

1. When was the Act intituled "British Columbia Southern Railway Aid Amendment Act, 1896," and passed by the Legislature of British Columbia in the 59th year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, received by the Governor General, in compliance with section 56 of the British North America Act?

2. When does the time within which the Governor General in Council can disallow the said Act expire?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I am sorry that I cannot give a precise answer to my hon. friend's question. The time for disallowing the Act will expire some time in July.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LAND GRANT.

Mr. McMULLEN (for Mr. Lister) asked :

If investigation has taken place, what is the conclusion reached?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). A report was made on this subject in the month of February last, but it has been mislaid. The inspector will be asked to furnish a copy of it.

Mr. McINNES.

3. What are the names of the tenderers and what is the amount of each tender?

2. Was he dismissed from his position as such postmaster? If so, when, and who succeeded him?

3. Were any complaints made against him? What was the nature of the complaints, and who was the complainant?

4. Was any investigation held on such complaints? Who investigated? Was any report made thereon, and what was the effect of such report?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say : 1. Mrs. M. D'Amour was postmistress of Ste. Philomène up to 28th June, 1892. 2. The office was made vacant about the date mentioned owing to the non-residence of the postmistress. Mr. J. B. Loiselie, the present postmaster, succeeded her in the office. 3. There were no complaints against the postmistress. 4. Information having reached the department (through Mr. J. Lessard, of Montreal) that the postmistress had removed from Ste. Philomène, inquiry was made by the post office inspector at Montreal, who found such to be the case. The office was accordingly made vacant.

MAIL ROUTE, ANNAPOLIS COUNTY.

Mr. MILLS asked :

Has the Postmaster General received the following petition :—

To the Postmaster General of the Dominion of Canada.

In the matter of the mail route between Bridgetown, in the county of Annapolis, and Dalhousie West, in the said county.

The petition of the undersigned, ratepayers and electors of Dalhousie West, in the county of Annapolis and province of Nova Scotia, humbly sheweth :—

I. Her Majesty's mail is at present delivered to your petitioners once per week by a courier starting from Bridgetown and reaching Dalhousie West via the Morse Road and returning to Bridgetown via the Thorne and Morse Roads.

II. That under the present system of delivering the said mail your petitioners receive their mail in time to send any replies back to the post office at Bridgetown (from which there is a daily mail communication with the rest of the province, or at least with the principal parts thereof) by the courier the same day that the mail is delivered to your petitioners.

III. That if the said mail route were reversed and the courier start from Dalhousie West and go to Bridgetown and return, the replies to any letters that your petitioners might receive in any mail could not be posted until one week after the receipt of such letters, and this delay would tend to very materially hinder the transaction of business.

IV. That in the opinion of your petitioners the best interests of the people of Dalhousie West require that there be no change in the said mail route as at present established.

Your petitioners therefore pray that the mail route between Bridgetown and Dalhousie West may be allowed to remain as it is at the present time and that the proposed change, viz.:—to start from Dalhousie West—be not effected.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

Dated at Dalhousie West, in the county of Annapolis, this eighteenth day of May, in the year one thousand eight hundred and ninety seven.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that the petition mentioned was received on the 29th ulto., and the question as to which is the most desirable starting point for the mail service between Bridgetown and Dalhousie West will have the consideration of the department.

POSTMASTERSHIP OF FORT ERIE.

Mr. McCLEARY asked :

1. Has Isaac White been dismissed from the postmastership of Fort Erie?

2. If so, were charges made against him, and what were the nature of such?

3. If charges were made, by whom were they laid, and was there an investigation into the truthfulness of same held?

4. Has a successor to Mr. White been appointed? If so, who is he, and on whose recommendation was he appointed?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say : 1. Mr. Isaac White voluntarily resigned the postmastership of Fort Erie on the 18th July, 1894, but his successor has only recently been appointed. 2. There were no charges of mismanagement against Mr. White. 3. Same answer as to No. 2. 4. Mr. William M. Baldwin has been appointed to succeed Mr. White, on recommendation of Mr. James A. Lowell, of Niagara Falls south.

QUARANTINE IN MANITOBA AND THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN. Did the hon. Minister of Marine call the attention of the hon. Minister of Agriculture to the question I put yesterday as to when certain correspondence and petitions respecting quarantine in Manitoba and the North-west Territories will be brought down?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I did both in writing and orally.

THE JUBILEE CONTINGENT.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw attention to a very important matter. I have direct information from Quebec concerning the character of the Jubilee regiment. It is most desirable—I think the House is agreed on that—that any representation made in England by Canada during the Jubilee should reflect on us the highest credit. I am told, however, by an eye-witness on whom I can place the greatest reliance, that the regiment to be sent across, is not of such a character. I am sure that this is unknown to the acting Minister of Militia (Sir Richard Cartwright), because I am certain that he is most anxious that his department should excel in whatever it does with regard to the display that Canada will make during the Jubilee in England. What has been done with regard to the Mounted Police shows that the Government is anxious that everything which can reflect credit on Canada should be done. Let me quote the language used by the Quebec "Chronicle" with regard to the regiment we are about to send over, which is language that could not be used unless the circumstances called for criticism and for action on the part of the acting Minister of Militia. There is no time to be lost, and therefore I feel compelled, though most unwilling to obtrude myself upon the House, to call the attention of the hon. Minister to this criticism. It is headed "The Jubilee Regiment," and is as follows:—

The first appearance of the Jubilee Regiment on parade on Sunday last, as hinted in yesterday's "Chronicle," evoked considerable adverse comment. It includes a number of men to whom it is no disrespect whatever to say that they should never have been selected for the purpose. The regiment ought to be the possible representation of Canadian manhood. Those members of it who do not enter into this category are, of course, not responsible for the fact, but the commanding officers who selected them are far from blameless. Either their corps must be most miserable ones as a whole, or favouritism would seem to have decided the choice of the men, for it is hard to imagine many of them as anything like the best possible representatives of their regiments. A number of them are of poor physique, others have a miserable unmilitary carriage, and a good few would stand quite a lot of brushing up and tidying. If to all this, poor marching and ill-fitting uniforms are added, the result can be imagined. In short, our proposed picked Jubilee contingent, intended to do Canada credit, will fall far short of its object, if some marked improvement is not at once visible. This criticism is made in no carping spirit, but for the best interests of all concerned, and it is to be hoped that some better showing may soon be made, for Quebec is a military city, and a soldier's faults are soon noticed here. Our representatives will rub shoulders with the best troops of the Empire, and will need to be at their best. A large proportion of them are undoubtedly men to whom not the slightest exception can be taken and who would do credit to any country. But the crazy-quilt, patch-work appearance of the detachment is painfully apparent on parade, and it is hard to say how the matter can now be remedied.

Having called the attention of the acting Minister of Militia to this, I need not read the whole article, but simply point out that the sizing up of the men, according to the information I have received, has been bungled. That is a mistake which can be remedied, because it is not yet too late, and it should be remedied. I have been speaking to some of the military men, and am very sorry that some of my military friends have not brought this matter before the House, because it would have been more pleasing to me had they done so. We are all jealous, however, whether military men or not, of our reputation, and anxious that Canada should make a display of her soldiers which will do us credit on this occasion. We know that the Canadian people are a people of splendid physique; we know that our men are all men of their inches. The average of Canadian manhood is tall and well built, and therefore if very short men have been picked from some of the corps, a very regrettable mistake has been made. Although these short men may make very good fighters, still they are not fit for a pageant of this kind, and every man with the eye of a soldier knows what a bad impression is made by a corps in which there are some men who are six feet or over high, and others only five feet six or seven inches. The sizing up of a regiment can only be done by revising the drafting of the men, and I am told that the majority of the men drafted are all that could be desired. The drilling is bad at present, but that of course may be remedied by a little energetic practice, and so far as the uniforms are concerned, if they are ragged, they can be easily replaced by better ones. But you cannot make elephants out of mosquitoes or men out of mice, and if some of the men are too small to form part of a Jubilee regiment, the only thing to be done is to re-draft a portion of the little regiment. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I am sorry to hear such an account of the Jubilee regiment from my hon. friend, but I may tell him that I was informed, no later than yesterday or the day before, by the officer in charge, the Adjutant General. Col. Aylmer, that he was extremely pleased and well satisfied with the appearance of the Jubilee regiment. He had just returned from Quebec after inspecting them, and I think, that in all probability the Adjutant General is better posted than the newspaper correspondent to whom the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) referred. As a matter of course, the units from the various corps were selected by the officers in command. It was impossible, I think, to do otherwise than place the selection in the hands of these gentlemen. I am aware that the selection of a number of men from different regiments some twenty or thirty in all, is likely, to some extent, to result in a lack of uniform appearance; but I may say that that was done at the instigation of Her Majesty's authorities. I mean the Horse Guards, who thought that the force of Canada would be better represented by a number of units, as they call them, from the several regiments than by choosing a larger number of men from a few corps. However, I will cause further inquiry to be made into the matter, and I think it will be found, that, possibly, with one or two exceptions the physique of the force is much better than the correspondent the hon. gentleman refers to believed it to be.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I should be very sorry indeed if the report which my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) submitted to the House turned out to be correct. We, as Canadians, must all feel anxious that Canada should be represented in the best manner possible on this memorable occasion. When I remarked I met a commanding officer from Quebec who was present on the occasion of the church parade on Sunday, and I can tell the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) who is now in charge of the department, that this gentleman, whom I regard as an expert—belonging to the permanent force—spoke very highly of the physique of the contingent and very highly also of their drill. It was merely by accident that this gentleman mentioned this to me. I hope that what he told me will turn out to be correct and that Canada will be represented, as we would all wish to have her represented, by men who will be a credit to our militia force, as that force has proved itself to be on all occasions when its services were required, a credit to the Dominion.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

I.C.R.—NEW TIME TABLE.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) to the great injustice committed against the ridings below Quebec by the new time table for the Intercolonial Railway, which has just been issued, and which, I believe, is to take effect in a few days. I have just received a note from the Deputy Minister stating that the first train to arrive in Quebec is at four o'clock in the afternoon. The result of this will be that persons having business in Quebec with the bank, with the courts, &c., will have to start a day in advance of their engagements. This first train to arrive is the through express from Halifax, and the exact time of its arrival is 4.05 in the afternoon. The next train is at 9.45 in the evening. This means that those living below Quebec and having business in that city must lose a day on the road. I think it is quite sufficient to lay the facts before the Minister to cause him to order the cancellation of this time table, as it is perfectly ridiculous to have such a service as that proposed. I do not lay the blame on the Government nor on the Minister himself, but I put the blame on the officials of the department, who do not accept information given to them to guide them in making up these time tables.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Choquette) seems to be going into a discussion such as is not allowed on the Orders of the Day being called.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I do not, under the circumstances, care to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The adjournment cannot be moved again.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I desire only to lay this matter before the Minister. I trust that he will cancel this time table.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I shall be very happy to look into the matter with a view of remedying any grievance that there may be. I will look into it at once.

Mr. LANGELIER. I think the best arrangement would be to go back to the time table in existence before, as no better arrangement could be made, in my opinion. The train from Halifax used to arrive just about the time the Grand Trunk train was leaving for Montreal. I understand that under the proposed arrangement the train arrives at four o'clock in the afternoon, which will be awkward to those who wish to continue their journey to Montreal. I trust that the old arrangement will be continued.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. We are not satisfied below Quebec, with the old time table; there must be a local express stopping at every station and arriving at Quebec about nine or ten o'clock in the forenoon, the through Halifax express to arrive in the afternoon or evening.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the Controller of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) when the return of the number of persons dismissed from the department and the number of appointments made since the 1st of July, 1896, will be brought down. The order for this return was passed about five or six weeks ago. Two weeks ago I asked the hon. First Minister (Mr. Laurier), in the absence of the Controller of Inland Revenue, when the information would be brought down and I understood him to say that he would communicate with the Controller and that the return would be hastened forward. I believe it would not take an officer of the department more than an hour to obtain the information required. I think I am entitled to this information, and I think the House is entitled to it, before the discussion of the Estimates proceeds. I cannot understand why this delay has taken place.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). I hold in my hand the return asked for by my hon. friend (Mr. Wood, Brockville), but the different names and the different heads are not properly arranged. Before I lay it on the Table, I would like to have it revised, and it will be laid on the Table tomorrow.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I would like to ask for information with regard to a similar return moved for respecting the Department of Customs.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). In the absence of the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson), I can only say that I will call that hon. gentleman's attention to the matter, and I have no doubt that the return will be laid on the Table as soon as possible.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to call the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) to several orders of the House for returns respecting the dismissal of certain postmasters. I refer to the postmasters at Hopefield, Little Sands, Kinross and Stanley Bridge, in Prince Edward Island. I should think that these returns would not involve a great deal of labour on the part of the officials of the department, and I trust they will be laid on the Table at an early day.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Would the hon. gentleman have the kindness to send me over a memorandum of the Orders? I could not hear what he said.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The Senate have adopted an Address to Her Majesty the Queen in connection with her Diamond Jubilee, to which they have asked the concurrence of this House, and I am sure the concurrence will be cheerfully given. The Address of the Senate, which is now submitted to the House, reads as follows:—

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty :

Most Gracious Sovereign :

We, Your Majesty's loyal and dutiful subjects, the Senate and <sup>of Canada</sup> of Canada in Parliament assembled, beg to offer our sincere congratulations on the happy completion of the sixtieth year of your auspicious reign.

When, on the memorable occasion of Your Majesty's Golden Jubilee, the representatives of your loyal Canadian people joined those of other parts of the Empire in expressing their heartfelt pleasure that by the grace of God the nation had for half a century enjoyed the inestimable benefit of Your Majesty's constitutional and beneficent rule, they stated their earnest hope that Your Majesty might be spared for many more years to reign over your loyal subjects.

A decade has since passed, and to-day we contemplate with renewed satisfaction the fact that Your Majesty is still the head of the State. Not only have none of your illustrious predecessors sat on the throne of our country for so extended a period, but in the history of the nations of the world few monarchs have ruled so long, and none have been so universally honoured and revered.

Looking back across the sixty years which have elapsed since Your Majesty ascended the throne, it is impossible not to be impressed with the immense strides which during that period have been made by the civilized world in all that constitutes the moral, intellectual and physical well-being of mankind. The Gospel of our Divine Teacher has been preached in the remotest corners of the earth; temperance in all things has become more than at any previous period an accepted rule of human conduct; more adequate provision has been made for suffering humanity; the administration of justice has been placed upon a more humane and otherwise satisfactory basis; great advances have been made in science and the arts; and the literature of the Victorian era surpasses that of any former period in breadth of thought and general excellence, as well as in volume and popular appreciation. By the establishment of railway and steamship communication, the inauguration of an improved postal system, the invention of the electric telegraph and telephone, as well as the general utilization of electric power, and by an infinite number of other agencies, the comfort and convenience of the people have been immensely increased. During the same period the Empire has been enlarged, and its scattered members brought into more intimate fellowship with one another and with the motherland. Your Majesty's colonies in North America have, but with one exception, been gradually consolidated into a united Dominion, the people of which have been, and, we believe, will continue to be, amongst the most loyal of the races and peoples owing fealty to the British Crown.

We trust that we, and Your Majesty's subjects in other parts of the Empire, may continue for many years to come to enjoy the benefit of your gracious and peaceful rule; and we earnestly pray that He who is the Supreme King of Kings, may endow Your Majesty with every blessing in what remains to you of this life, and with everlasting felicity in the life to come.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House will appreciate the language of this Address. It seems to me to convey in very felicitous terms what are known to be some of the splendours of what will be known in future ages as the Victorian era. It has been our privilege, and I may say a privilege which will be more and more appreciated as time rolls on, to live under what is certainly one of the most brilliant reigns in all history, certainly the most glorious of British history. In many respects the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria resembles, and in other respects excels, the reign of Louis XIV. of France. In the number of years the reign of Her Majesty approaches, though it does not yet equal, the reign of Louis XVI. In many respects it equals and in some other respects it surpasses the reign of the French monarch in the development of the arts, and in literature it may perhaps be truly said that it is equal if not superior to the reign of Louis XIV.; whereas in the application of the arts and sciences to the comfort of mankind, and to the benefit of the human race, it surpasses not only the reign of Louis XIV., but all other periods known to history. It was the misfortune of Louis XIV. that his reign was cursed by war, whereas the long reign of Her Majesty has been comparatively free from that mighty scourge. Wars have been few, happily for the British people and for mankind at large. But it is gratifying to British subjects of all origins to remember that in the wars which took place, the old renown of the British arms for pluck, endurance and valour, has been maintained at the highest pitch. But above all this there has been the personality of the sovereign herself. The personality of the sovereign herself has been high in everything that has tended to cultivate and adorn her reign. Of what we know of her private life, we know that in all those domestic virtues which above all appeal to the human heart, she has been a model to the humblest of her subjects; and in public life, though she has been a constitutional sovereign in every sense of the term, yet it is known that on more than one occasion she has exerted a personal influence in unravelling difficulties, and in carrying the nation successfully through troubled periods. Perhaps one of her chief glories, perhaps the chiefest of all her glories, is that in so far as she has been a sovereign she has been in every sense a model constitutional sovereign. For us Canadians, one thing which we cannot forget is that under her reign we have obtained the inestimable benefit of responsible government. It is as dutiful subjects that we approach her on this occasion, and not as sycophants; but it is our pride to give her upon this occasion the allegiance, the willing allegiance, of free men. It is in this spirit, Mr. Speaker, that I move, seconded by Sir Charles Tupper, that the House do concur in the Address of the Senate to Our Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, congratulating her upon the completion of the sixtieth year of her illustrious and auspicious reign, by filling up the blank with the words "House of Commons."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It gives me very great pleasure to have an opportunity of seconding this Address to Her Majesty from the Parliament of Canada. After the eloquent words to which we have all just listened with such pleasure from the First Minister, no poor words of mine are required to commend this Address to the hearty approval of the House of Commons. But I may, at the outset, take the opportunity of expressing the satisfaction I feel that this tribute of the Parliament of Canada will be laid at the foot of the Throne by one so well calculated in every way to represent this Dominion. The hon. mover of this Address has already stated that the Victorian era will be one that will shed lustre on the world. He has referred to the fact that as a woman, as a wife, as a mother, Her Gracious Majesty has presented an object of admiration and a model for the women of every country and of every clime on the globe. The condition of the court over which Her Majesty has presided has never in the history, certainly of this Empire, been excelled, or I may say, equalled. In everything that has tended to elevate the tone of public sentiment, Her Majesty has contributed in no slight degree. As a sovereign, Her Majesty, although administering a system of parliamentary government which, during her reign, has reached probably the highest point that parliamentary government has ever attained in any country, has yet by her great ability, by her devotion to her public duties, exercised a most potent influence on the administration of the affairs of the Empire, and, as has already been mentioned, we have every reason to believe that on more than one occasion, the influence Her Majesty has acquired with the Ministers of all parties has been such as to determine the fate of the nation towards peace rather than towards war.

The great achievement of Her Majesty's reign, so far as we are concerned, is the fulness with which the great principle of self-government has been conferred upon the autonomous colonies. The House need not be reminded that when Her Majesty ascended the Throne a rebellion prevailed in the old province of Canada, a struggle caused by the determination of the people to obtain that power and influence in the control of their own affairs which they felt they were entitled to achieve. That result has not only been obtained, but, under the beneficent reign of Her Majesty that fulness of self-government has been given to the outlying portions of the Empire, to the autonomous colonies, which has resulted in bringing about a condition, not only of complete and thorough devotion to the Crown and to British institutions, but has secured the happiness, prosperity and well-being of all those great portions of the Empire. Reference has been made, and properly made, in this Address to the confederation of this Dominion, and the following words have been used:

Your Majesty's colonies in North America have, with but one exception, been gradually consolidated into a united Dominion, the people of which have been, and, we believe, will continue to be, amongst the most loyal of the races and peoples owing fealty to the British Crown.

We all not only concur in that sentiment, but I think we will, one and all, agree that there will be no exaggeration in stating this, that not only is this a united Dominion, but it is a Dominion which at this moment is as happy and as prosperous as is to be found in any portion of the world. I trust that Her Majesty may still live to see a great confederation, not only of Australasia, but of South Africa, and that those great outlying portions of the Empire being consolidated as the Dominion of Canada has been, will not only be equally happy and equally prosperous, but in their progress and prosperity will become still more capable of strengthening the hands of the Imperial state and increasing the greatness of the Empire. In that prayer for the long life and happiness of Her Majesty we will be joined, not only by the peoples of all climes, by the peoples of all races and colours, of all sections of the British Empire, but every good man and woman throughout the world will wish long life and happiness to Her Majesty the Queen.

Motion unanimously agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER moved :

That an Address be voted to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying him to transmit the joint Address of both Houses to Her Majesty in such a manner as His Excellency may see fit, in order that the same may be laid at the foot of the Throne ; and the said Address was ordered to be engrossed, and to be communicated to the Senate for their concurrence.

Motion agreed to. (The hon. members of the House joined in the singing of "God Save the Queen.")

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

On section 17,

17. That whenever the Governor in Council has reason to believe that as respects any article of commerce there exists any trust, combination, association or agreement of any kind among the manufacturers of such article, or the dealers therein, or any number of them, to enhance the price of such article or in any other way to unduly promote the advantage of such manufacturers or dealers at the expense of the consumers, the Governor in Council may commission or empower any judge of the Supreme Court or Exchequer Court of Canada, or of any Supreme Court or High Court in any province of Canada, to inquire in a summary way into and report to the Governor in Council whether such trust, combination, association or agreement exists ; with power to such judge to compel the attendance of witnesses and examine the same under oath, to require the production of books and papers, and with such other necessary powers as may be conferred upon him by the Governor in Council for the purposes of such inquiry, and if such judge reports that such trust, combination, association or agreement exists, and if it appears to the Governor in Council that such disadvantage to the consumers is facilitated by the customs duty imposed on a like article when imported, then the Governor in Council may place such article on the free list, or so reduce the duty upon it, as to give to the public the benefit of reasonable competition in such article.

The Governor in Council may make such regulations as may be deemed advisable for the effectual conduct of such inquiry.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I regret that so soon we have to return to the less pleasant but more prosaic duty of this committee. After the very long time that has been occupied in discussing clause 16, I propose to occupy the attention of hon. gentlemen only for as short a time as is necessary to state the ground upon which I think this resolution 17 ought not to be adopted. In the first place, I cannot understand why such a clause as is now before the House should have found its way into a revenue Bill. It certainly is not a means of raising a revenue, and as we are in Committee of Ways and Means, I cannot see the propriety of this clause. In the next place, I wish to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that this legislation is, in my judgment, of the most vicious character that it is possible to put in a revenue Bill or anywhere else. No person in this House is unwilling to support the Government in carrying out any measure that is found necessary in order to protect the country against the illegal combination of manufacturers, or of persons engaged in business, for the purpose of unduly increasing the price of articles to the detriment of the general public. I am quite sure that any such law proposed by the Government in a separate measure, however stringent it might be, would not fail to obtain the hearty support of this side of the House. But, Sir, the proposal now made is a proposal which is calculated to give undue and improper powers to the Government of the day, whoever they may be, in dealing with the industries of this country. Under this clause, all that the Government require to do, in order to terrorize any manufacturer in this country is to give him a hint that they propose to deal with him under this law. It is, therefore, a power that ought not to be given by this House to a Government. It is true that this resolution has been slightly improved since it was first introduced a month ago, by importing a judge into it ; but, if hon. gentlemen opposite wish to have this matter dealt with by a judicial tribunal, why do they not bring in a stringent Bill against combinations, and place it in the power of any person to charge those engaged in industries in Canada with a violation of such a law, and bring them into the courts to answer for their conduct. Why do the Government not take the same course in this as in regard to anything else which is contrary to the public interest and in violation of the well-understood rules of government.

Sir, the very fact of bringing a judge into this clause, instead of improving it, has opened another and a very grave objection. One of the fundamental principles of our constitution is that the judiciary of the country shall be placed beyond the control or influence of the Government of the day. But here you have the Government for the time being selecting a judge for the purpose of carrying out an object of their own, you have the Government preparing the rules under which that judge shall conduct his investigation, and you have him not conducting that investigation in the exercise of his judicial authority and position, but you place upon that judge the duty of simply making a report to the Government, upon which they are to take action. That opens the door, I think, to great partiality. It opens the door to the Government for the selection of gentlemen to discharge those judicial duties who will naturally suppose that they will not render themselves unacceptable to the Government for the legitimate promotion which they have a right to expect if they meet to some extent the views of the Government. I will not enter upon that. I only require to allude to it to show that the bringing of judicial authority into this measure, in the mode in which it is done, without giving that authority power to deal with the question judicially, is to render the act even more objectionable than it was before. There is a third and last objection which I will state in a very few words and then take my seat, that is, that this Bill on its face does what no law on the Statute-book of any country in the world does. I challenge hon. gentlemen to show me a law anywhere in the world which on its face proposes to sacrifice the innocent with the guilty. What is the punishment which this clause proposes to inflict on any person coming within its terms? It states what it is. The mode of punishment devised here is a mode of punishment which it is impossible to apply to the guilty without involving the innocent. I am engaged in business, carrying on a manufacturing industry, complying with all the requirements of the law, and conducting my business in a manner thoroughly unobjectionable. My neighbour, who is carrying on the same kind of business, chooses to enter into a combine with three or four other persons, and violates the spirit of this law. What is the punishment? Why, Sir, I am to be punished with the man who is guilty of violating the law. I need not use any argument to show that this law is opposed to every principle of justice, fair-play and proper dealing in a matter of this kind. I propose, therefore, to move, seconded by Mr. Foster:

That all the words after "that" be left out, and the following substituted therefor:—That while this House is prepared to support a stringent measure for effectively preventing illegal combination with a view to unduly enhance prices contrary to the public interest, it is of opinion that such legislation should not be included in a Tariff Bill nor leave the industries of the country in a position to be interfered with at the caprice of the Government without the judgment of a superior court of law.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that one need say very much in answer to the observations of the hon. leader of the Opposition. To the first question—why put this in a revenue Bill?—I have to answer, this tariff Bill, while undoubtedly a revenue Bill in its main purpose, is not entirely so, because we have to recognize the fact that we have had a protective system for many years, and that even with the amendments we are now making, the element of protection will still remain in the tariff to a considerable extent. We may regret that it is so; but I frankly confess that we are not in a position entirely to eradicate that which we believe to be an evil system. One of the evils of the protective system is that it inevitably leads to the formation of combines; and I am unable to see how, by any other procedure than this, we can effectually reach them. There is nothing so likely to prevent the formation of combines in our country as the recognition of the fact, by manufacturers and others who may engage in forming combines for unduly enhancing the prices of commodities, that the duty on like articles imported into the country can be removed by Order in Council. I believe that to be the most useful agent we can have to prevent the formation of combines. I venture to say that if you attempt to reach combines by the ordinary procedure of law, without any other penalty than that enforceable by the courts of law, you will have great difficulty in reaching them. The efforts made in other countries to reach combines in that way have not been very successful. But if we have upon our Statute-book the power to remove the duty by which combines are made possible, we shall in all probability have no combines in the future. Ample evidence has been given of that by the combines that have existed in the past. The hon. leader of the Opposition says that by this provision we punish the innocent and the guilty together. Under the conditions described, however, I do not think it would be possible for these combines to get into operation. If a number of persons outside of the combine were selling their goods in fair and open competition, the combine would fall to pieces very soon. The combine is only successful when it can bring everybody in. If a dozen people are manufacturing goods, and eleven of them form a combine, they will soon crowd out the twelfth; but if half a dozen remain outside of the combine, it is not at all dangerous, because it has to face this reasonable and free competition. I believe that the clause as it originally stood was in the interest of the people of Canada. It has been received with great satisfaction by public opinion, not only in Canada, but outside of Canada.

In this clause I believe we have devised a means which is likely to be more effective than any other to prevent the evils of combination. If there was any ground in the position taken by the hon. gentleman that the Government were going to deal with this as a party question rather than as a judicial matter, we have removed that ground by providing that it shall be a judge and not the Government that will determine whether a combine exists or not. I do not think it is a provision likely to be acted on very frequently. There are some laws which are valuable by reason of what they prevent rather than what they punish; and I venture to say that the effect of this law will be to prevent the formation of combines such as have existed in the past; and we know that there are combines now existing in Canada. But my expectation is that under this law combines will soon dissolve, and that we shall have fair and legitimate competition, which the people are entitled to have.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I propose to offer a very few remarks in answer to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. It appears to me that the resolution now submitted to the committee is an extraordinary one, to say the least. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House should not run away with the idea that we in any way favour combines or agreements of an unlawful nature. We simply differ with hon. gentlemen opposite as to the means for putting down combines in restraint of trade or for unduly enhancing the prices of the necessities of life. We all agree that combines are detrimental to the public welfare, and should be prevented. The rule which is well laid down is that the legislator, when legislating on a subject of this kind, must have due regard, not only for the liberty of the subject, but for the liberty which is necessary to the legitimate expansion of trade and commerce. The difficulty is so great that no legislative enactment has ever been made in England, even in the Criminal Law, except as regards the increasing of wages by conspiracy. In the United States, in several states of the union, there are laws against combinations, as the House, and especially the lawyers in the House know. But this subject is one of so much difficulty that the decisions under these laws have greatly varied. Our Criminal Code has a provision, which, in my humble opinion, is ample for the protection of the public against unlawful combinations, and for the preventing of any combines or unlawful agreements whatever for the purpose of unduly increasing the price of the necessities of life. Article 520 of our Criminal Code reads as follows:—

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding $4,000 and not less than $200, or to two years' imprisonment, and, if a corporation, is liable to a penalty not exceeding $10,000 and not less than $1,000, who

conspires, combines, agrees or arranges with any other person, or with any railway, steamship, steamboat or transportation company, unlawfully—

(a) To unduly limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce; or

(b) To restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any such article or commodity; or

(c) To unduly prevent, limit or lessen the manufacture or production of any such article or commodity, or to unreasonably enhance the price thereof; or

(d) To unduly prevent or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation or supply of any such article or commodity, or in the price of insurance upon person or property.

It will be seen from the reading of this section that it entirely covers the ground. It provides against the combination by any persons who conspire in any manner whatever to unlawfully enhance the price of the commodities of life. Now, a combination or an agreement among traders or manufacturers is either lawful or unlawful. If lawful, of course no legislation can affect it. But if unlawful, then, to my mind, the Criminal Code is ample in its provisions to prevent it or punish those who violate the law. It seems to me that it is impolitic, it is wrong, it is contrary to sound principles of government, to punish or to impose a penalty upon any man without following the ordinary rules of procedure or the ordinary rules of law. In the present case, what happens? Just let the committee look at the penalty which is imposed upon any one against whom a report of the kind contemplated in the section before us may be made. The section reads:

If it appears to the Governor in Council that such trust, combination, association or agreement exists, and if it appears to the Governor in Council that such disadvantage to the consumers is facilitated by the customs duty imposed on a like article when imported, then the Governor in Council may place such article on the free list, or so reduce the duty upon it as to give to the public the benefit of reasonable competition in such article.

That provides that, to all intents and purposes, a commercial establishment may be completely ruined or, at all events, suffer immense injury through the reducing of a duty or the abolition of it under this section. This is certainly worse than any penalty which the criminal law imposes on a party found guilty. But what is the procedure which would be followed under the criminal law where a party is accused of any such combination? In the first place, the accused is surrounded by all the safeguards which the criminal procedure gives him. He is not simply brought before the court and liable to be condemned on mere suspicion, as may be the case under this section. But he has this safeguard, which is a great one, in the first instance: he is entitled to a preliminary investigation, and as the lawyers especially in the House know, the court which holds this preliminary investigation is not an open court. In a matter of this kind, I take it that the magistrate presiding would not make his court an open court.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Is the hon. gentleman arguing on the assumption that the reference provided for in this section would not be a reference; the proceedings of which would be open?

Mr. CASGRAIN. I shall come to that in a moment. I say that there is danger if the investigation be private and probably more danger if it be public. There are a great many instances in the books which treat on this question, under the criminal law of the United States, of persons having been brought before the criminal courts, under sections which very much resemble this in the law of the United States, and having been punished, and in all such cases, the accused has had, first of all, the safeguard of this preliminary investigation. He cannot be brought at once before the petty jury, but must be first given a preliminary investigation, and then his case must be passed upon by the grand jury. It then comes before the petty jury, which is the palladium of the liberties of the subject in this country, and no punishment can be meted out to him before he is found guilty after having been given the opportunity of making a full defence before the petty jury. But under this section, no such procedure is provided for. At the end of the section, I find the subsection which reads:

The Governor in Council may make such regulations as may be deemed advisable for the effectual conduct of such inquiry.

It seems to me that in an important matter of this kind, affecting the rights of the subject, the procedure should be regulated, not by Order in Council, but by some law passed by this House after a full and critical examination by all the members of this House. This is not a political question but one involving the loss of property and, in a great many instances, the complete ruin of business men. And therefore I say that no procedure should be enacted by mere Order in Council, but should be enacted by this House, and by no other authority, and then only after the most exhaustive and critical inquiry and discussion.

Then we find that, under this section, the question may be referred to any judge of the Supreme Court or of the Exchequer Court of Canada or of any supreme or high court in any province of Canada, to inquire into it in a summary way and report to the Governor in Council. There are thus no such safeguards provided as should be provided in a case of such extreme gravity and as are provided by our Criminal Code. A judge is empowered to pass on it in a summary way. He is empowered to send for witnesses and for the books and papers of the accused, so that the innermost secrets of the business of the accused may be exposed to the world, if this inquiry is to be made a public inquiry. Even though he be innocent, even though his case may have been brought before the court on the simple suspicion that a combination or unlawful agreement exists, his business may be ruined. I asked the Government whether the accused will have the right to call witnesses in his own behalf and to set up a complete defence. Will he have the right to employ a lawyer or counsel to defend him? Surely he should be entitled to a complete defence. He would be entitled to that in a simple case of assault, and when his whole business career is at stake, when his whole fortune is at stake, when all his business transactions are to be made the subject of a critical examination, surely he ought to be at liberty to make the fullest defence possible.

I asked the question a moment ago whether or not this investigation was to be public or private. If it is to be private, I say that is wrong. You will be imposing on a judge in the first place a very onerous duty, a duty which no judge in this country will care to take upon himself, a responsibility which he will be certainly very loath to shoulder, and I say it is detrimental to the administration of justice in this country to have our judges giving opinions upon matters which are semi-political or which certainly will become semi-political. If this investigation is to be private, then the judge will not be subjected to the critical eye of the public. It will be a star chamber inquiry, and we will have the press of this country and the public opinion of this country—on one side of politics at least—declaring, in every case, that the judge was biassed, and that he gave his decision, not on strict legal grounds, not on matters of fact, but to a certain extent on political bias or on other motives which should not influence the judiciary.

But should the investigation be public, there would again be the greatest danger to the citizen who, on simple suspicion, was brought before the tribunal. Suppose the accused is not guilty; suppose there was some mistake, suppose that he has been subjected to some political persecution. We are all human. Even if this very good Government could not commit any such offence, perhaps some other Government which we may have in the future might bring such person up before this court and persecute him in this way. And suppose that the judge makes a report that there is no such unlawful combination as is supposed to exist. Still, the ruin of this man will be almost complete. Not only will he have been subjected to great annoyance and expense, but he will have had all his business transactions laid before the world, his books and papers exposed to the public gaze and his most confidential matters made known to his rivals. Now, this is a state of things unheard of under the constitution under which we live; nothing has ever appeared in our Statute-books which equals this. I take it, therefore, that this procedure should be surrounded with the utmost care and prudence, that it should not be left to the Governor in Council to work out these rules but, if this procedure is to be adopted, it must be after it has passed the critical judgment of this House.

Now, there is another objection that I have to this proposal. Suppose that the judge reports that the manufacturer who has been brought before the tribunal is really guilty of the unlawful combination of which he is accused. The report of the Governor in Council will be made against him, their report will go forth to the world, and the duty will be lowered or abolished altogether. This will mean that this man will be punished, and punished very harshly, punished far more severely than he would be if prosecuted and found guilty under the Criminal Code by a jury of his countrymen. But not only will he be punished by the provisions of the resolution now before the committee, but he will be liable to be punished twice, an unheard of thing under British law. Not only will he be liable to be punished in the manner described in section 17, but, when this report is made to the Governor in Council, he will be liable to be brought up before any court of criminal jurisdiction by any informer in the country, and be punished a second time under article 520. What can he expect, after this report has gone forth and he has been branded as a combiner, guilty of entering into an unlawful agreement to enhance the prices of commodities in this country? He will not be able to get a fair trial. Juries in this country are more or less swayed by political bias, and if this man is brought up in a criminal court, the jury having before it the judgment of the other court and the report of the Governor in Council, naturally certain of them will not wish to reverse the judgment of the judge and of these thirteen men of the Cabinet. Beyond the objection raised by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) there are these objections which, I think, should caution the Government against putting on the Statute-book such an unusual procedure as that contained in the proposition before the House.

Mr. BRITTON. It is hardly necessary to speak about combines, as to their being against the best commercial interests of the country, or how they have flourished on the other side of the line and what efforts have been made from time to time to break them up and obtain redress for their wrongful exercise of power. Those of us who have read the newspapers of late have had an opportunity to see something of the working of these trusts, particularly in the trial that has just taken place of Mr. Havemeyer and Mr. Searles, which have lately been concluded. No one on this side of the House and, it seems to me, no one on either side can properly object, if this resolution does no harm to any innocent person in the community, to pass this or some similar resolution directed against combinations or trusts or associations that are, to a greater or less extent, a menace to the commercial interests of the country. I rise to submit, however, that there is more force in the objection that was raised first by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) a night or two ago, and to-day by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), with regard to publishing some one who is innocent, than gentlemen on this side with whom I have conversed seem to think. I would suggest—I do not wish to move it as an amendment to the amendment, nor would I move it as a substantive amendment to the resolution after this one is disposed of, if it is disposed of—that something should be done to guard against this possibility. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) says there is no danger, because, if there is a combination of this kind, in order to have that association effective, nearly everybody must be in it. That is quite true. But when the hon. Minister says “nearly everybody,” my objection, it seems to me, is sustained. If there is one person who is not in the combination, if there are a few—and it is not going very far that there may be at least a few scattered over the country—they will be injured the same as the others by the Government putting the articles in respect to which a combine has been made, on the free list, or reducing the duty. Something ought to be done, it seems to me, to safeguard the persons, even though they may be very few, who may be in that position. Therefore, I would suggest that these words, or some others of similar import, should be added to the resolution:

And may, if necessary, to prevent loss to any person not connected with the trust, combination, association, or agreement, compensate such person to an extent not to exceed the loss on property on hand occasioned by the reduction of the duty.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BRITTON. Now, that would cover an objection of that kind, but I can anticipate the objection that hon. gentlemen opposite may raise—that this is giving an additional power to the Governor in Council, and that they have enough power already. Well, I can only say that if so much as has already been left to them, is not likely to work harm, probably an investigation into a matter of this kind, where it only concerns, at the most, a very few persons in the community is hardly likely to lead to substantial injury. Those gentlemen opposite who object so much to the exercise of power by the Governor in Council, can hardly be serious to-day and on the discussion on these tariff resolutions. I cannot add anything to what was said by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) on that point the other night. If the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) had heard the speech made by the member for Halifax probably he would not have spoken at so great a length when he challenged the House to name an instance in which the Governor in Council ever had any such power as was proposed to be given to them by one of the resolutions we have disposed of. But I should not take up the time of the committee this afternoon by reading the sections of the Act that the member for Halifax referred to, I will only mention them by number, and if the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to look at the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 32, section 9, 62, 68, 87, 88, 92, 100, 102, 103, 108, 111, 112, 131, he will then be prepared perhaps to come down to section 245 which my hon. friend read, and which so fully illustrated the power that then was possessed and is still possessed under that Act, by the Governor in Council, and I do not think that he will stand appalled by the additional power that I suggest should be given to the Governor in Council to prevent an injustice being done to some innocent persons who may be affected by the use of the machinery this resolution gives to break up a combine.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Who will determine the amount of compensation to be given? Will the inquiry have to be made before some judge?

Mr. BRITTON. No, I said the Governor in Council.

Mr. CASGRAIN. How do you find out?

Mr. BRITTON. In this way: Here is a duty on a particular article, and when the existence of a trust is established, that duty is removed. It is removed either altogether by having that article put upon the free list, or it is removed in part, accordingly as the Governor in Council may think proper. Here is a man who has innocently procured a quantity of that article that is affected; he is not connected with the trust or association in any way, but under that clause—because that is the only way that any injustice can be done to an individual, the only way there can be a loss to an innocent person—the property owned by him is lowered in value by the removal of the duty, therefore compensation can only be given to the extent of the loss he suffers by reason of the duty on that article being either removed altogether or reduced. So it seems to me to be a perfectly simple matter, and this removes the objection of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. CASGRAIN. What about the future profits that he could have made?

Mr. BRITTON. Oh, well, we won't deal with those, because they are speculative.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Then that will only be part compensation.

Mr. BRITTON. I do not think that you can deal with speculative profits. This is only the actual loss the man has sustained, and to the extent of that actual loss, the man should be compensated, and with that exception I think the resolution is all right.

Mr. SPROULE. I rise to a point of order. I wish to ask your ruling, Mr. Chairman, whether that amendment is an admissible one, because if I understand it, it effects a change in the revenue.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. No amendment has been moved except that by the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. CRAIG. I was surprised at the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) referring to my objection to those matters, when he has himself taken one of the strongest objections which, I think, can be taken to this clause. I may say in answer to the commentary which he made on my objections to the former resolution, that I think myself the powers given to the previous Government by the Act, were too great. The reason I object to this resolution, and the reason I objected to the previous one, is and was that the Government are constantly arrogating to themselves too great powers, taking powers away from Parliament, and I object seriously to that state of affairs. Now, Sir, I do not stand up here to discuss this question as a lawyer, but I wish to state my views upon it as a business man, looking at this resolution in a common-sense way. I find that some times lawyers do not look at things in a common-sense way.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw, take it back.

Mr. CRAIG. They take meanings out of clauses which are not there, and they put meanings into them which were never intended to be in them, and twist them in all directions. But I intend to look at this as a business man, and, as I said, in a common-sense way if I can. Now, with reference to combines, I need not say that I am no defender of combines, and do not stand up here to defend them, that is, illegal combines. I think there are sometimes combines which are not illegal, and which do not do any harm at all, combines which do good to the public. I think there are combines sometimes which enable the cost of goods to be reduced to the public, and the public benefit by them. I suppose that kind we are not discussing here at all. I take issue with the Minister of Finance in the statement he made that a protective system necessarily produces combines. Well, now I would agree with him if he said that a high protective system produces combines, because I think it does. I think that has been the trouble in the United States where they have a very high protective system. But we have never had a high protective system in this country, our tariff has only been moderately protective. I might point the Minister of Finance to the state of affairs in England where there are a great many combines. In fact I may say that in this country we practically have no combines at all. I have not heard of them, and I do not think that the Government has heard of them either, although they act as if they had. Now, I wish to give briefly some reasons why I object to this resolution. My first reason is that it would place too much power in the hands of the Government, and I hold that the power in this resolution is too great a power to be entrusted to any Government. I have not so much faith in men and in human nature as some hon. gentlemen on the other side have. They seem quite willing to trust the Government in almost anything. I think it is one unfortunate result of the system of party government, that if a Government brings down a resolution, the followers of the Government seem to think that they have to support it whether it is right or not. I do not know whether they have studied this resolution, I do not know whether all the members on the other side of the House have read this resolution, or have carefully thought it out, or whether they are going to act independently on this question. I suppose they say: Oh, the Government have brought this down, and so it is all right. Now, I wish they would look at it in an independent manner, I wish they would study it carefully, and say what they think about it themselves. We have had only one hon. member who seems to look at it independently, the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), and he has very strong objections to this resolution. He agrees with the leader of the Opposition in the objection that he made to it to-day; and I think that if we had some other members getting up, who are not members of the Government, they might point out some other strong objection, and the result might be that the Government might blot this resolution altogether out of the Tariff Bill. I think it would be just as well if they did that. I see no necessity for this resolution, I do not think they see any necessity for it, they have not shown us any necessity for it, and the Finance Minister says he hopes there will be no necessity for it, that this is intended more as a preventive than anything else. Well, Sir, I object to this, because it entrusts too much power to the Government. Now, some hon. members on the other side act as if the Government were made up of angels. Well, Sir, I want to tell them that the Government is not made up of angels at all. The Government is made up of men, and men who are very liable to be tempted just as other men are. I know it is a theory that I have heard propounded in the country, that all the evil in the country belongs to the Conservative party, and all the virtues belong to the Liberal party. Well, Sir, in my experience I have found that is not the case. I have found that, take them all in all, they are pretty much alike, they are all very apt to be tempted when they are placed in face of temptation. I do not want them to be tempted. I do not want them to be placed in a position where they might yield to this temptation, and on that ground this resolution might lead to great abuses. If we give them this power we are surrendering the rights of Parliament, and I object to giving up the rights of Parliament. Suppose there were such a case as is contemplated by this resolution, would it not be better to wait until Parliament met before proceeding to deal with it? Parliament would meet within six months, and no great injury would be done to any one in the meanwhile. Then, why not wait and come down to Parliament and say: we find in certain lines of goods there are combines, and we propose to have the duties reduced or taken off. That would be a business-like way of acting. This is not a business-like way of proceeding, and it is conferring a power which should not be entrusted to any Government because it is liable to be greatly abused. I object to the resolution as regards the grounds stated for the Government taking action. We find it stated that the Government, "if they have reason to believe." Some men may come to the Government and tell them that certain rivals in business have a combine, and they may give the Government some slight reason for their belief, and the Government may be disposed to follow up the charge. But the resolution goes further, and says if there is "reason to believe that as respects any article of commerce there exists any trust, combination or agreement of any kind." It is getting down to a pretty fine point to say, "agreement of any kind" to enhance the price of the article in question. While I am opposed to combines on general principles, I believe there are combines for increasing the price of articles that are perfectly legitimate. This may appear to be a strange statement, yet it is a fact. Manufacturers, for example, may be cutting prices so that some of them will have to go under. They meet and say: we cannot go on in this way, it is impossible to continue, and we must come to some arrangement and agree not to sell under certain prices. No injustice was done, because the prices were already too low; yet those men would bring themselves directly under this clause, and if the Government were informed, they might see reason to believe that an agreement existed among those manufacturers to increase the prices of those articles. So I object to the grounds stated, which will give the Government reason for acting. What are the powers asked?

The Government ask for power, if they have reason to believe there is any agreement to enhance prices of manufactured articles, to appoint a judge to investigate the business. I think that is the most serious part of the whole resolution. What are to be the powers of the judge? He will have power to compel the attendance of witnesses, to force the manufacturers to produce all their books and papers; and it has already been well pointed out that it may prove most disastrous to business men. They do not want to produce their books and papers before a judge and before the public. It would be turning their business inside out when there might have been nothing wrong done, or when perhaps there might be a combine for raising prices to the rates that should prevail. This would prove a great hardship. The power to be conferred on the Government is altogether too great. We are told that the judge will report whether there is a combine or not. What standard is there on which the judge is to proceed to report whether or not a combine exists? How can he decide that it is a combine to the injury of the public? His judgment will be merely the expression of his opinion. The Government will have to decide, after receiving his report, as to the action to be taken, if any. I object to this resolution because I consider it arbitrary, and hon. gentlemen will agree with me when I point out why it is arbitrary. It does not say the Government "shall" do so and so under certain conditions, but that it "may" do so and so. If the Government have reason to believe there is a combine, they "may" appoint a judge. But they may not do so. They may favour some parties at the expense of others. If the judge reports there is a combine, the Government "may" reduce the duty or take it off. But they may not do so. In the resolution as first submitted the word used was "shall," but it is changed to "may," and that renders the resolution worse, because it leaves with the Government arbitrary power to do what they please, and the Government is composed of men who are human and are liable to have friends. I do not care whether the Government is Liberal or Conservative. We know how prejudiced we are in our party affiliations, and the Government is also liable to be prejudiced, and when its members possess arbitrary power which they can exercise or not, they are liable to use it in cases when they should not use it, and they are liable not to use it when they should use it. So I object to this resolution because it is arbitrary and because it opens the door for the persecution of certain men. The Government may think there is a combine, when practically there is no combine to the injury of the public; yet they may subject those manufacturers to very great inconvenience, to large expense in defending themselves when they are innocent, and in this way the resolution might lead to very great abuses being practiced. The hon. Finance Minister stated that a protective system leads to combines, and he led the House to believe that it was because the tariff policy is protective that this resolution was necessary, and that combines would not exist under a revenue tariff. Do the Government know of any combines existing to-day? We have heard much in the past about the cotton combine. I do not know that there is such a combine, although this was alleged by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in Opposition. What has the Government done with the cotton combine, if there was any? Have they reduced the duties or placed the articles on the free list? Perhaps when one-eighth or one-fourth is taken off the duties they will be no higher than they were under the late Government, but practically there is no reduction. That shows the inconsistency of the Government to-day. If the Government think there is a cotton combine—and I hope they do not think so—they have taken no action. I therefore infer that the Government do not think there is any combine to the injury of the public. This resolution is not only arbitrary, but it is tyrannical as well. It is following the lines of the Government of Russia instead of a Government like that of the British Empire.

It seems to be inaugurating a system of terrorism. I do not say that the Government will do this; but, if a certain number of manufacturers should have some arrangement amongst themselves, and if they should be supporters of the Conservative party, then it is open for any one to levy blackmail upon them. I do not say the Government will do so, but somebody may say: I will inform on you to the Government; and rather than have trouble they might be willing to come down with a consideration to the man who made the threat. The mode of procedure provided by this clause is further open to this objection; that it is entirely contrary to British principle. Under our British constitution every man is considered innocent until he is proven guilty, but here you lay down a procedure which is entirely the reverse of that. The Government say, they have reason to believe that certain manufacturers have entered into an arrangement, and thereupon at once they treat them as being guilty of crime, give a judge plenary powers, and drag the manufacturers, with their books and papers, before that judge. Their business is injured, the secrets of their trade are exposed to the public, a thing which is most obnoxious to business men, and if in the end they are found to be innocent they have no redress whatever. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) talked about an amendment to give compensation to parties who are not in the combine, when the duty was taken off. That, Sir, is a proposition which cannot be carried out. But, if this law does go into effect, I hold that there should be a provision to compensate those who have been treated after this fashion at the hands of the Government, and who have been found innocent. I repeat my contention, that this law is unjust, because it will punish the innocent with the guilty. The Minister of Finance told us that probably there would be nobody in the same line of business outside of the combine, but it is nevertheless, the fact that a great injury might be done to manufacturers who were charged with being in a combine, when they were not in a combine, and, when their prices were only fair prices. The amendment of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) would not cover the case at all. If a man's business should be entirely injured by the action of the Government in this respect, the granting to him of a comparatively small sum of money would not compensate him the depriving him of his means of livelihood. But, Sir, do not the Government see that by taking the duty off certain goods which might be manufactured by a combine of this kind, it would open the door to a combine in the United States to send their goods in here free of duty. You would abolish the combine in this country perhaps, but you would place the whole trade of Canada in these articles, under the control of combines in the United States where there is no doubt combines exist. Would that be any satisfaction to the people of Canada? I am afraid the Government do not value my advice as much as they ought to; but nevertheless, my advice is disinterested, and it sometimes might do them a little good. It is said that two heads are better than one, and I would give the Government this good advice: strike out this clause altogether. Perhaps they inserted it in the Tariff Bill to please some men in this country who have been crying out against combines; but surely the people of the country have sense enough to see that it is not a proper law, and surely the insertion of it for that purpose will not be of any service to the Government. So far as I know, I do not think we have any combine in Canada, but if combines should spring up under this protective tariff which the present Government is giving us, then let them come forward at the next session of Parliament and pass an Act to suppress these combines. If the Government show us that there are to-day combines existing in this country, then I might withdraw my objections to this clause; but as they have failed to do that it would be the part of wisdom for them to withdraw the section. I believe that the sense of the country is against allowing the Government to take too much power in their own hands. This clause gives them a very great deal of power which they can exercise without the consent of Parliament; which I hope they will not abuse if they insist on passing this law, but which, whether they abuse it or not they will be liable to be charged with abusing. As a disinterested friend, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to drop this clause and let us go on with the business. We want to get on with the business of Parliament, but we do not want resolutions inserted here which are absolutely unnecessary and which are dangerous to the good government of the country. If this Government really wishes to suppress combines, let them submit a stringent law and the Opposition will be ready to help them in passing it. I do not think that it is the business of this Parliament to constitute crimes to be punished in a special way. Why, even a man guilty of murder would not be dealt with in the manner in which it is proposed to deal with Canadian manufacturers under this clause. If the Government are in earnest in this matter, let them proceed by due process of law in the open light of day, and let the accused have the opportunity of defending themselves. Then, if they are found guilty, let them be punished by a penalty which shall be stated in the law—not the penalty of taking off the duty; but a penalty by fine, or by imprisonment if the Government should deem it wise to do so. Let the Government not go back to the principle of the dark ages which assumed at the outset that the accused was guilty. Let them adhere to British precedents, and let them not go to Russia for an example of how to conduct the business of this country. If this clause passes the House it will be nothing else but a piece of tyranny. I believe that the Government would act wisely if they would withdraw this resolution, and I believe that the friends whom they are seeking to please by the insertion of it, will, on consideration find that there is no good reason for placing it on the Statute-book.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I trust I will be pardoned for being a little suspicious of the gratuitous advice which my hon. friend (Mr. Craig) has tendered us to withdraw this resolution. He is seeking to put himself on record as being sincerely desirous of passing legislation for the purpose of effectively preventing illegal combines, but he himself is supporting a resolution which admits their existence, and which proposes to formulate a law for the purpose of controlling or suppressing them. What does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) mean by that kind of work? The hon. gentleman, like his colleagues, stands in this peculiar position: that while you are dealing theoretically with the question, they are with you and prepared to take the most stringent measures, but the moment you propose to deal practically and effectively with an evil they withdraw like an oyster into his shell, and refuse to have anything to do with it. The hon. gentleman declares, as a supporter of the resolution which his leader has moved, that at the present moment he is ready to support a measure to prevent illegal combinations to unduly enhance prices. Well, both sides of the House seem prepared to do that, and if so, what is the use of his asking proof that such combines exist in Canada, when he thus puts his desire on record to at once legislate to prevent these illegal combinations. Does not the hon. gentleman see the exhibition he has made of himself? Just for the purpose of talking against time, he uses an argument which is answered and condemned—

Mr. CRAIG. I rise to a point of order. I do not know that it is quite in order for the hon. Minister to say that I rose for the purpose of talking against time. I do not know whether he is doing that, but I can assure him that I was not doing it; and I want to say, with reference to my supporting this amendment for the suppression of combines, that it does not show that I admit that there are any now. I do not know that there are. I only say I choose that rather than the other.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will accept the hon. gentleman's assurance that he is not talking against time. I will accept his further assurance that he does not mean anything by this resolution which he is going to support.

Mr. CRAIG. I did not say so.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. However, I believe him to be a thoroughly honest man.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not mean privately, for I assume that we are all honest privately in our business relations. I mean politically. At all events, he impresses one with the idea that he desires to do the honest thing. Look at the position he is in to-day. He is not only championing the manufacturer—I do not object to that—he may be one of that class himself—

Mr. CRAIG. I am.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I trust he is a successful one; he has my best wishes in that regard. He is doing more; he is defending these trusts and combinations of manufacturers against the consumers. We do not hear a word said by these hon. gentlemen on behalf of the consumers; but the existence of combinations and trusts for the purpose of fleecing the consumers is defended, and the manufacturer who is engaged in this illegal and improper conduct is held up in the light of a martyr. Hon. gentlemen say, "Be careful what you are doing; see the punishment the poor fellow is getting. If you try him openly, you will expose his business to the world, and if you try him secretly, you will have a Star Chamber." So we can do nothing. The result of the hon. gentleman's argument is that while there are in the community a number of trusts and combinations for the purpose of fleecing the consumer, you must leave them severely alone lest you injure them in their pocket.

Mr. CRAIG. Will the hon. gentleman tell us where they are?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Surely, when the hon. gentleman proposes to take stringent measures to suppress them, that is the best evidence that they exist.

Mr. CASGRAIN. For my own information and the information of a great many members on this side of the House, I would ask the hon. gentleman to name some of the combinations which exist to-day.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not the judge to whom this matter of fact has been referred. I have heard several cases of combinations proved in this House within the last year or two. My hon. friend will recall the nail combine which existed some years ago, and the binder twine combine.

Mr. CASGRAIN. You have done away with that, because you have taken the duty completely off.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Thanks to us, we have destroyed one possibility of combination. But we proceed to go further and catch the others, and the hon. gentleman is anxious to prevent us. That is where we stand to-day. Now, I want, in all seriousness, to point out to my hon. friends that that vast number of people in this country known as consumers have a right to some consideration, and I respectfully submit that my hon. friends have not appreciated, or have not fairly expressed to the committee, what is the real meaning of the clause now before the House. I do not understand that clause to be framed for the purpose of punishing the offender either in person or in pocket. The object of the clause is rather that stated by the Finance Minister—to prevent the coming into existence of these combinations than to punish the offenders; and the mode which we have adopted to attain that object is one that ought to appeal—if not to the lawyers, upon whom the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) so severely animadverted—at least to the class of whom he says he is a member—the men of common sense. What does the clause seek to do? It says:

Whenever the Governor in Council has reason to believe that as respects any article of commerce there exists any trust, combination, association or agreement of any kind among the manufacturers of such article, or the dealers therein, or any number of them, to enhance the price of such article or in any other way to unduly promote the advantage of such manufacturers or dealers at the expense of the consumers,—

This fact must be prima facie proved to the Governor in Council before they make a motion at all. Then, what do they do? This clause does not say that they are to decide anything. This fact, which is prima facie proved to them, is referred by them for adjudication to a judge of one of the superior courts of the land. What better method could be adopted of ascertaining the fact than to refer it to a judge of the Supreme Court or the Exchequer Court of Canada, or to a judge of the superior courts of one of the provinces? And his duty will be to ascertain whether or not that fact, which appeared prima facie to be proved to the Governor in Council, really is an established fact.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In other words, whether a crime has been committed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In other words, whether there is a trust or combination between two or more manufacturers for the purpose of unduly enhancing prices to the consumer; in other words whether, taking advantage of the law, which was intended to give them certain advantages as home manufacturers they, instead of acting honestly under that law, combine to rob and fleece the consumers of the country. That is the fact to be ascertained by the judge, by calling witnesses, examining them under oath, and hearing both sides. A tribunal is utilized for this purpose such as British men are accustomed to appeal to. To a judge, a man above suspicion, who has neither the interests of the manufacturer nor the interests of the consumer to serve, but who stands midway between both, a man not politically biased in favour of one party or the other—to this impartial tribunal is referred for adjudication the fact, which has been prima facie proved in the first place to the Governor in Council; and only if and when he reports that such fact has been proved, does this section come into effective working. And what is the effective working of the section? Is there a fine or penalty imposed on the manufacturer? Is he haled to prison or otherwise punished, as you would imagine, to hear hon. gentlemen talk?

Mr. CASGRAIN. Worse.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend says we mean to do worse. We do mean to give the consumer a chance to live. We reduce the duties by which the illegal trust carries on its operations, so that there may be competition from abroad—that and nothing more. The honest manufacturer is not interfered with or disturbed. If a manufacturer is not in a trust, and by competition his prices are kept down to a fair and normal condition, the section does not go into operation at all. It is only when prices are unduly enhanced to the consumer; and if there is proper competition at home, they are not unduly enhanced. It is only when a state of things exists which hon. gentlemen on both sides unite in condemning that the section may be brought into operation; and it only may be brought into operation after the facts have been found before a tribunal in whom, heretofore, at least, the people of Canada have had the utmost confidence. But my hon. friend, with his lawyer-like sagacity, discovered that if such a terrible state of matters were disclosed, this doer of evil could be also subject to prosecution under the criminal law. Why should he not be? Will the hon. gentleman answer that? If he has knowingly transgressed the law, and that fact has been discovered by means of this reference, why should he not be punished? Is the manufacturer who legally enters a combination or trust for the purpose of fleecing the consumer to go unwhipped of justice? Is he alone, of all men, to stand above the law because of his money or the fact that he is a manufacturer? I trust not. And if the evil which the hon. gentleman anticipates should occur, I say that justice would be done and justice only.

Mr. DAVIES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not British justice.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, because he would not be punished unless he was guilty, and unless and until he is brought before a jury of his peers. In the first instance, the public wrong would be remedied, and in the next instance the private wrongdoer would be punished. Now, there are two things to be done—to remedy the public wrong and punish the private wrongdoer, and this section seeks to accomplish the one but does not concern itself with the other. The punishment to the wrongdoer would be meted after a fair and impartial trial before a jury of his peers. I do not know that anything more need be said on this matter than has been said by my hon. colleague the Finance Minister.

But the hon. gentleman says that the investigation would reveal business secrets. It appears to me that this class of men who enter into these illegal combinations for the purpose of unduly enhancing the prices of commodities are sought to be guarded and protected by hon. gentlemen opposite in every possible way. Suppose these men do enter into these illegal combinations and unduly enhance prices, is there any man of common sense in the House who would think it wrong to tear away the veil and let the public have a glimpse of the machinations and means by which they are fleeced by these people. Why, I think it is a public good and not a public wrong which would be effected by tearing away the veil and letting us see the secret machinations of these manufacturers. It does appear to me that this section is so hedged around and guarded that no wrong can be done, because before it can come into operation at all, a prima facie case must be made out to the satisfaction of the Governor General in Council. There must be a prima facie case established that there does exist a trust or combine which has for its object the unduly enhancing of the prices of commodities protected by our tariff. That fact being proved, the case is referred to a judge of the Supreme Court for investigation. The affirmative must be proved to him after a fair trial, after he has examined witnesses upon oath, and after a report to that effect has been made by him to the Governor in Council, they do not attempt to punish the man by fine or imprisonment, but they say to him: The duties behind which you shelter yourself and which were put in, not to enable you to fleece the consumers, but to raise revenue for the country, have been taken advantage of by you to unduly enhance prices and to prevent competition, and we will therefore lower the duties. We are told, however, that evil might possibly result to a manufacturer not in the trusts that he would also be punished, but that appears to me a contingency of a most remote kind, because if there are such manufacturers who sell their goods to the consumer at reasonable prices, the condition of affairs which would enable this section to be put in operation could not exist.

One more objection was raised by the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution, and that was the objection that the references to the judges, under this section, would place the judges in an invidious position. Why, how could you ever establish the existence of trusts unless you referred them to a judge for investigation? There is no other way of finding out. We do every day refer similar matters to the judges. We refer to them cases arising under the election law, involving political issues, and a much stronger objection would apply to such reference than to the reference under this clause. There are no politics in this. This is a fact, the existence of a combine, which is not a political issue, and which is a very proper matter to submit to a judge.

I would simply suggest to the hon. Prime Minister that in order to put the meaning of the section beyond doubt, the word "unduly" which is found in the fourth line should be repeated in the first part of the sentence as well as in the last, so that it would read "unduly enhances the price of such article or in any other way to unduly promote the advantage of such manufacturers."

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask the hon. Minister whether the Governor in Council has any discretion to delay or not the sentence, supposing the judge does report that there is an agreement or combine.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, I would say the Governor in Council has a very large discretion and I will show the hon. gentleman why I think so.

Mr. FOSTER. That is all I want.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I want not only to give my answer but the reason. Two facts must be established before the section can come into operation at all. The judge must report that a combination, association or agreement exists for the purpose of unduly enhancing prices, and then it must appear in addition to the Governor in Council that such disadvantage to the consumer is facilitated by the customs duty imposed. If that does appear, the Governor in Council may place such articles on the free list or reduce the duty sufficiently to overcome the existing evil.

Mr. FOSTER. Or the Governor in Council may do nothing.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is in the discretion of the Governor in Council to refuse to act at all. And I am quite sure if they did, their refusal would be the subject of proper criticism in the House when it next met. The facts would be brought before the House to pass upon. The best judgment I can form on the section is that it is a discretionary power vested in the Governor General in Council to act, and the extent is always discretionary.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Would the duties of the Governor General in Council be judicial or political?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Judicial.

Mr. WALLACE. One would imagine, on hearing the hon. Minister of Marine denouncing the combines, that he has great consideration for the poor consumer and that he was dead in earnest in all he was telling this House. Why, I remember when a combine Bill was before this House and when we were asking the assistance of members of this House to put the Bill through, the hon. Minister never raised his voice except in carping criticism and objections to the Bill.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I raised my voice to tell the hon. gentleman that the Bill he introduced was a perfect sham and could not be worked, and experience has shown that I was right.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, and the Minister of Justice of that day, the late Sir John Thompson, quite as high a legal authority as the hon. gentleman, stated in this House that it was a workable Bill.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I appeal to the logic of the facts.

Mr. WALLACE. The facts have nothing to do with it, because the Bill was mutilated when it went into the Senate. It had the same objectionable feature as this clause has. The Senate put in the word "unduly," and the proposition of the Minister of Marine is to put it in this clause three times, and thus completely emasculate this worthless proposition. We are told that this proposition takes effect when the prices are unduly enhanced to the consumer. Who is to decide when the prices are unduly enhanced to the consumer? Here is an article, say, that costs in England $1, the duty being 25 cents. If it were sold at $1.25 by the Canadian manufacturer the price would not be unduly enhanced. But this $1.25 might give an enormous profit to the Canadian manufacturer, and it might be a price to be maintained only by a combination to control the market for the manufacturers here. The statement made by the hon. Minister is entirely illusory. It will amount to nothing. Then, he tells us: We will examine into these combines. But suppose that examination takes place. A number of gentlemen in the House, or a number of gentlemen on the Treasury benches are in combines, gentlemen who are in the Government if not in the Cabinet. What becomes of the investigation then? Will these gentlemen sit in judgment on themselves and condemn themselves to imprisonment or to submit to the abolition of the duty on the articles in which they are interested? Not a bit of danger of it. I read here of a combine in biscuits, in confectionery. This combine, I am told, exists to-day, and is in full force.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). We have been told that there are no combines.

Mr. WALLACE. I have not heard that statement made.

An hon. MEMBER. The hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) said so.

Mr. WALLACE. If I heard him correctly, the hon. member (Mr. Craig) said that he did not know of any combines; he did not pretend to give an authoritative statement that no combines existed—for they do. I will tell you of one combine that raised the prices of a necessary of life in this country 50 per cent in one day, and that not many days ago. I speak of the combine of cotton thread manufactured in Great Britain. How are you going to reach that? And there are many combines of the same character. How about Crosse & Blackwell's goods? They compel the wholesale grocers to sell their goods at certain prices, and if they sell at other prices they are refused further supplies of the goods. Does the Bill make provision for such combines? You do not pass a law that will be applicable to every one that breaks it. You come to this House and get a law passed that can be held as a threat over the manufacturers of this country. You can find no other reason for it.

Mr. FOSTER. What about the biscuit combine?

Mr. WALLACE. I was led away from that. But it is nearly six o'clock, and we must soon get back to the biscuits. Here is the unanimous report of a committee of this House which took evidence on this subject.

Separate organizations exist in these products among a large number of the leading manufacturers in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. A number of manufacturers—but they are the smaller ones—are not members. The principal object is to maintain prices.

The Biscuit Association has been in existence about six years, and, although the prices of the ingredients used have in that time very materially decreased, the prices of biscuits have remained about the same.

Mr. FOSTER. And now the duty has been put up.

Mr. WALLACE. The duty on these goods has been put up, and the duty on the raw material has been lowered. I assume that the combination still exists. I know that it did a few months ago.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. And therefore we need this clause.

Mr. WALLACE. I can tell the hon. gentleman that this clause will not be put in operation against the biscuit and confectionery manufacturer, but it will be held as a weapon over the heads of other men. This report goes still further, and it has never been contradicted, for it cannot be.

It was found by comparison with the United States price-lists, that Canadian goods are, in some finer and fancier varieties, 20 to 30 per cent higher than goods of equal quality on the other side of the line.

Mr. FOSTER. That refers to buscuits.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

The Confectionery Association is of recent formation, and the usual result followed at once, viz., a rise in the prices.

The Minister of Finance said that under this law that he proposes, we should have no more combines. He said that it would prevent the formation of combines and that those which existed would speedily dissolve. Why, as I have pointed out, there are many of these that this proposed law does not touch and cannot touch. Take the first combination mentioned here, that of sugar refiners and grocers. The sworn evidence of Mr. Lightbound contains the statement that the sugar combination did not originate with the refiners but with the wholesale grocers. Then, the first item in the report mentions the case of the watch-case manufacturers in Canada. There was only one establishment in this line here at that time, and they were controlled by the watch-case combination in the United States, which would drive them out of business if they sold at prices that this combination did not approve. Then, take the coal combination.

Combinations exist among coal dealers in Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and London.

In Toronto a Coal Association has been in existence for some years, and in 1886 it was affiliated with the Toronto Board of Trade and designated as the coal section of this board.

In this coal section there are some 56 members, about half-a-dozen of whom are importers, and the others retailers, who get their supplies from the former at 75 cents per ton less than the price charged the consumer.

This combination is pronounced to be a most objectionable one. It is said that they have raised prices, that they have adopted stringent regulations for the government of the retailers, that they have done everything to curtail trade and raise prices to the consumer. But how can the law affect these men? What is the penalty here provided? The lowering or wiping out of the duty. But on anthracite coal, which is the chief item of this coal combination, there is no duty.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman will see if he looks at the resolution, that it is made applicable only to cases where the illegal combination to fleece consumers is facilitated by a customs duty on a like article when imported. If there is no duty, then in that case the section does not apply.

Mr. WALLACE. That is exactly what I say. We are told that this is to be a protection to the poor consumer for whom the hon. Minister weeps such copious tears. But it does not protect him at all. That is the very objection I have to it. Why not make a general law? We have a general law now, but it was emasculated in the Senate by putting in the word "unduly" that the hon. member is going to add to this clause.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Your amendment has the word "unduly" in it.

Mr. WALLACE. I have not submitted any amendment.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Your leader's amendment.

Mr. WALLACE. I don't know that I have any leader, either. I go somewhat on my own lines, and I find the occupation so congenial that I am not in a hurry to leave it.

It being Six o'clock, the Committee rose for recess.

After Recess.

THE AMERICAN BANK NOTE COMPANY'S CONTRACT.

The House resumed the further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Belcourt for third reading of Bill (No. 68) respecting the American Bank Note Company.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. When the hour for the consideration of Private Bills expired some nights ago, I was endeavouring to place before the House as succinctly as possible, and in the briefest space of time, such portions of the correspondence relating to the facts surrounding this company, which to my mind made it necessary for this Parliament to pause before it gave its approval to the third reading of this Bill. In continuation of the reference to the facts, I very much regret that it will be necessary for me to take up the time of the committee at any further length; but I cannot leave the argument which I deemed it proper to present to the House at the point where I left off the other night. In this blue-book to which I have already made reference, there is, at pages 38-39, a report of the Deputy Minister of Finance made before the contract was entered into with this United States company; and I call particular attention to this portion of the report where Mr. Courtney, the Deputy Minister of Finance, discusses the facts as presented by the tender. Referring to the difference in prices between the American Bank Note Company and the other tenderer, he says:

This difference is so great that the undersigned deems it desirable to make some remarks thereon, and while he is unable fully to understand the reasons for it, he considers it might arise from various causes. In the first place, the new tenderers—the American Bank Note Company—may possibly think that they would be able to make up the difference by the increased rates at which they tender for supplies that are not generally in demand. If the contract is awarded to them, this feature should be kept in mind and carefully guarded against. Further, a very great difference between theirs and the tender of the British American Bank Note Company arises in the price given for printing notes. Seeing there is such a manifest difference between the two tenderers on this item, the undersigned thinks some inquiries should be made through some expert, and he would suggest that the matter be submitted to the Queen's Printer, in order to ascertain whether the tender of the American Bank Note Company is one that could be carried out successfully, seeing they may have tendered at unremunerative prices in order to secure a foothold in the country.

I am not aware that the Queen's Printer was called upon in connection with that suggestion, and I am not aware, further, that that very serious point was investigated or inquired into, as the Deputy Minister of Finance seemed to think was advisable and necessary. But evidently the Deputy Minister of Finance had those suspicions which I have expressed in regard to the United States company, that the prices for the work to be done for the Government here, were altogether at variance with the prices ruling in the market where these tenderers had to confine their business. The Deputy Minister goes on to say :

In connection with the foregoing, the undersigned begs to point out, that at the time the present contract was entered into, full and explicit inquiries were made as to the rates of the American Bank Note Company, and also as to the charges made by the British American Bank Note Company to the chief monetary institutions in Canada ; and in one case the department was allowed access to the bills rendered for printing notes for the institution in question by the British American Company. The result of the inquiries proved that the rates charged to the Government for this class of work were in no sense larger than for the institution in question, and were not then higher than the rates quoted by the American Bank Note Company. The account rendered to the institution in question is now in the possession of this department. It can hardly be possible that since the present contract was entered into prices for the work have fallen to such an extent as the rates offered by the American Bank Note Company would lead one to believe. Indeed, from the tender of the present contractors it would appear that it was found necessary to raise the rates in some lines in the offer now submitted. Accordingly, it would appear that other reasons exist than those pointed out, inducing the American Bank Note Company to tender at rates so much lower than now paid. Before entering into a contract with this company, if it be intended to do so, the undersigned respectfully suggests that care should be taken, and a distinct understanding arrived at, that no safeguard observed by the present contractors in conducting the business, should be omitted in executing the work under the new contract.

I have shown by other references to this transaction, Mr. Speaker, that that very wise suggestion and recommendation of the Deputy Minister, even was not adhered to, but was departed from in a singular and important instance indeed, with respect to the very foundation of the work :

In this regard, the undersigned may state, that very great care is taken by the British American Bank Note Company for the custody and safe-keeping of our notes when in course of preparation.

Again the Deputy Minister of Finance says:

Should the Government decide to enter into an agreement with the American Bank Note Company, it would appear to be desirable to bear in mind also, that the institution is an alien corporation, all the officers who would, in all probability, conduct the business with the Government and carry out the orders, would probably come here from New York. In this connection,—

And I call particular attention to these lines of the report :

—In this connection, the undersigned has to call attention to the condition appended to their tender, that they are not to be required to manufacture bank-note and other papers, steel rolls, steel plates, the dies and other tools of their trade,

Sir CHARLES HIBBEHT TUPPER.

inks, colours, &c., at Ottawa, but may obtain elsewhere such supply necessary to a faithful fulfilment of their contract. This would appear to allow them to do a large portion of their work at New York, and is a feature of their offer which seems to require very careful consideration.

Again the Deputy Minister of Finance points out :

A contract with a new company would necessarily entail an immediate outlay for designs, rolls and dies necessary in the preparation of the new plates required. It would, in fact, entail all the expense attaching to the preparation of the new notes and stamps. This, of course, would be unnecessary, if the work remained in the hands of the present contractors, and this extra expense has not been taken into consideration in comparing the tenders.

Then leaving that report of the Deputy Minister of Finance, which does not seem to have been considered or treated with the care that I think it deserved, I find on page 40 that calculations were made by the officers suggested by the Deputy Minister of Finance, but made in another shape, I think, by Mr. Fitzgerald and Mr. Treadwell. These gentlemen say :

The calculations are based on figures given in Schedule "D" to the terms and conditions of tender of 19th October, 1896. In the calculation as to Dominion notes, the cost of designs, rolls or dies required in case of a new issue of notes, is not taken into account.

On page 47 there is a letter from Mr. Free-land in which he makes, I think, a wholly unsupported statement :

It being this company's intention to prepare the work in the highest style of the art, the limitation to the use of such talent as is procurable within the Dominion, would be detrimental to our intention. Such talent is not resident in Canada, nor obtainable in the market, while the portrait, vignette and lathe-work engravers of the parent establishment could be employed here with much greater efficiency, each in their several branches.

Ignoring the whole fact that there was in existence a British institution in this country, in this very city, under the shadow of Parliament itself, where such talent had been obtained and such experience gained as resulted in work that had elicited the statement from the Finance Minister himself, I believe, that there was no dissatisfaction with the work of the old contractors, I have already referred to the statement of the Deputy Minister of Finance detailing the steady reduction that had been made in prices during the time that the old contractors had been charged with carrying on that work. At page 54 there is a communication from Mr. Burland that I think should have the fullest publicity. In a letter dated January 13th, 1897, addressed to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Burland says :

1st. That ample capital has been invested at the request of the Government, to satisfactorily prepare all the work required by the Government.

2nd. That the contract has been awarded in violation of the terms and conditions of the specification.

3rd. That no notice was given that foreign tenders would have privileges not embodied in the specification.

4th. That the terms of the specification would be violated by giving the privilege to foreign competitors for a double period without equal rights to the local company.

5th. That the greatest injustice would be done local capital by allowing free duty to such foreign competitors without any allowance, in lieu thereof, to the local company.

6th. That all persons tendering against invested capital should show their ability by having suitable premises and machinery with which to do the work, the tenders of all parties would then be on equal terms.

I call attention to a letter from the Finance Minister to Mr. Burland, dated 15th January, 1897, where the hon. gentleman deals with Mr. Burland in this spirit :

You had an ample opportunity of tendering, and you did tender. If your tender had been the lowest, you would have received the contract, but unfortunately your tender was an excessively high one, the acceptance of which would have been a grave injustice to the public interests. The Government deemed it to be their duty to accept the lowest tender coming from capable and responsible parties. Acting upon this view, they have awarded the contract to parties whose tender was very much lower than yours.

I call attention to the fact that the Minister of Finance in that letter seems to have ignored altogether special considerations and special facts brought to his attention by the Deputy Minister of Finance, and to have utterly ignored and overlooked the fact that in the case of what he calls the excessively high tender, there was a strict and accurate compliance with the specification, and in connection with the foreign tender, to which he has been so indulgent, and in connection with which he has gone so far out of the way to meet the views of the foreign tenderer, that that was an irregular tender and was not in compliance with the specification but departed from the specification in most important particulars. In the petition to His Excellency the Governor General, the representative of the old company, the Canadian institution, makes the following, among other representations, and as some of the points that have struck me as important are perhaps more concisely than I have expressed them, I will read some paragraphs from that specification :—

4. That the notice for such tenders was a printed one, and comprised the specifications and the essential terms and conditions of the proposed contract which any tenderer would have to execute if his tender was accepted by the said Government.

8. That all your petitioners' work is done here at the said city of Ottawa, by Canadian artists and artisans employed here, in a special building erected here for that specific purpose and constructed to the satisfaction of the Government of Canada.

11. That your petitioners are also informed that it is contemplated to allow the dies, rolls and plates used in connection with this work to be brought into Canada free of duty. The value of the dies, rolls and plates belonging to your petitioners and used by them in carrying out the present contract, exceeds the sum of $50,000.

12. That, if the American Bank Note Company is awarded the new contract, and if it uses the inks for printing bank notes and the post card paper which it usually uses for like work in the United States, the difference in the price of material now supplied by your petitioners and what would be supplied by the American Bank Note Company, would be as follows :—

The figures are given, making a total amount of $15,495, or amounting in the five years to $77,475. The petitioner goes on and gives further analyses in the same direction. I will not trouble the House with reading further from the blue-book, for I have referred to those portions which fully bear out the points I have proved from the departmental reports and departmental statements.

Leaving the blue-book, I think the references I have given establish beyond question that in connection with this whole business of letting a contract in regard to this important national work, the British American Bank Note Company, the Canadian company, complied with all the conditions required ; that the American Bank Note Company, a foreign company, did not ; that other Canadian companies did not, and that the English companies were ruled out at the very outset by having put before them the fact that the condition as to manufacture of the dies, and so forth, in Ottawa, would be insisted upon ; and that, afterwards and subsequently, they having been ruled out, that condition was not insisted on, but a private arrangement was made with a foreign corporation, and to their satisfaction, that operated to the detriment of the home company. It follows from what I have said and what I know that we have given to aliens, to an alien corporation, privileges which were not extended either to English people or to Canadians or to the subjects of the Queen ; and now we are face to face with this Bill and we are asked to consent to its being read the third time. What do we see in that Bill, and what does the Bill represent? It asks this House to endorse in blank all the privileges enjoyed by this foreign corporation and to exercise them in the Dominion of Canada, and this House is got made aware in any shape or form as to what those privileges are. This House is not made aware of what the New York legislature thought, in the exercise of its discretion, proper to confer in the way of authority, power and privilege upon this corporation ; nevertheless, though their policy may possibly have no connection with these matters as regards the practice of our committees, we are asked, blindly and in the absence of the information needed, none of which appears on the face of the Bill itself, to say that the whole of the privileges and rights which this corporation was granted by the legislature of New York, shall extend to the boundaries of the Dominion and that this company shall enjoy those rights. That is a practice wholly at variance with the practice of this Parliament in regard to other corporation charters either in the mother country or in any of the provinces of this Dominion. When a company comes from any of the provinces to this Parliament it has always been the practice of our committees to investigate the powers conferred on it, and the practice of late has been to compel provincial companies, or companies holding charters obtained outside of this Parliament to ask practically for the re-enactment of all privileges they desire, and set them out on the face of the charter this Parliament is asked to grant. There is wisdom and common sense in that course, because the House is thus able to see exactly what is being done and what rights the company is seeking to acquire. But in this case, all these sound principles have been departed from, and Parliament is simply asked to confirm clauses of an Act that has met with the approval of the legislature of New York. We could not obtain any such legislation in any state of the union, we could not get any such legislation in any colony of the Empire, and it goes without saying that we could not get such legislation in the Parliament of the mother country. What kind of organization has this company? Are we to depend on the preamble of the Bill for the statement?

The Bill is an absolute blank regarding its organization; regarding the condition of its finances, and regarding the security that creditors in this country may have who in the future deal with that company. We are left in absolute ignorance as to its organization, as to its corporate powers, and I may say that it is not right that this Parliament should sanction such a thing as that. I have in my mind a few charters that were granted after some discussion, and after objections to them by a very leading authority at that time in this House. For instance, English corporations knocked at the doors of this Parliament and asked for recognition by Parliament of their corporate privileges, but in those cases very good care was taken that a copy of the articles of association of those English companies should be filed with the Secretary of State for Canada. No such provision is in this Bill and no such care has been taken in regard to it.

Now, to strengthen the objections I have been making, I would call attention to a Bill that came before this House, and which unfortunately was not very fully considered, except by the leader of the Opposition at that time, Mr. Edward Blake. I find that among other objection he made to the gift of these corporate powers to a foreign corporation—irrespective wholly of the provision that such powers as they enjoyed in the foreign country should be known to this Parliament before action was taken—I find the following observations of Mr. Blake in 1882, in regard to the New York and Ontario Furnace Company:—

There is no information as to the character of this company, the nature of its organization, what its corporate powers are, or who the incorporators are.

And again he says:

Now, it seems to me, first of all, that unless there is some overruling clause to the contrary, our legislation ought to be in the direction of creating ourselves the corporation to which we give the power.

Hon. gentlemen will see that I have been endeavouring to argue from that point of view, and I venture to say without fear of successful contradiction, that as a rule that has been the policy of our committees, and that they generally insist upon putting in an Act of incorporation, the powers of companies, whether foreign or from a provincial legislature, when they come to the federal authorities. Again, Mr. Blake said:

That is a good reason, from my point of view, for our incorporating the entity which we have just recognized, with the power of landing its cable on the shores, with certain other powers which it was necessary for them to have, and which they could only get by the joint legislative authority of two legislatures of independent jurisdiction.

He was dealing with that class of cases, in which as he points out, you must have reciprocal action by two legislative bodies in order that a common object should be effected. Mr. Blake said further:

That reasoning does not apply to this case at all. All that is wanting to be done by the New York and Ontario Furnace Company could be done by a corporation composed, if you will, of the same proprietors as the company in this country. They could buy, as they could acquire, personal property; they could mine and carry on business, and there is no difficulty in their completing the whole of their operations by virtue of a provincial or Canadian incorporation, as the case may be. That is the first difficulty I had in acceding to the third reading of this Bill, that, without a clause which would justify a course obviously inconvenient, we are simply recognizing a foreign entity and giving it powers.

Mr. Blake goes on to argue somewhat on the line which I have argued, but I find unfortunately, that that discussion was not prolonged, and that the Bill was read a third time without the objections which Mr. Blake urged having been answered by the leader of the other side of the House. Nevertheless, it seems to be an important consideration. Now, this foreign corporation, this American Bank Note Company, of whose directors this Parliament knows nothing; if they are not prepared to come before Parliament, as other foreign corporations do, and ask for full consideration and re-enactment of all the powers they require outside of our general Act; they of course, under the comity of nations would have, if we did not pass this Bill, certain rights and be permitted to carry on certain transactions in this country. If they wish to go further than the principle of the comity of nations permits them, it seems to me that they should comply with the practice that has prevailed in regard to corporations composed of British subjects, whether in Canada or in the mother country. I have in my hand (I don't propose to read from them very fully) two cases on somewhat similar lines, relating to Acts passed in 1891-92. In the case of British corporations when they came asking for recognition here, Parliament insisted on having the articles of their association, and the fullest information put within reach of the people of this country.

There has been no reason urged so far in the discussion of this Bill for extending these special favours and adopting this exceptional legislation in favour of this company. In order to show the peculiar favour extended to this company, I may point out that all the books of this foreign corporation—not such books as they keep in Canada and are in this building to be erected in Ottawa—but that in connection with any litigation that may arise in our courts, all their books are to be made a prima facie evidence on the part of that company. It seems to me there has not been that care given, or that it was intended, not to too closely observe these provisions which the company was asking from this Parliament. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, from all the reasons that I have put before the House, that the third reading of this Bill should not be approved by Parliament under existing circumstances. The reason for the Bill is one distasteful for me as a Canadian. The favours granted to this foreign corporation at the expense of our own Canadian industries, calls, I think, for our disapproval, and the exceptional legislation that is proposed—even if the company had merit outside of that—is contrary to the practice of this Parliament, and is establishing a dangerous precedent in connection with private Bill legislation.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I do not propose to continue the discussion which my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has raised, but after the lengthy and exhaustive speech which he has made, I think it but fair to tell the House, that this Bill was the subject-matter of a great deal of discussion in the Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee. Every line and every clause of this Bill was thoroughly discussed, and the Bill as amended and framed in that committee, was made, as we believe, in conformity with other Bills which we have previously passed. In some of his criticisms, the hon. gentleman has not been quite fair to the committee that reported the Bill, or to the Bill itself. There is no creation of a new corporation by the Bill now before the House. This Bill simply recognizes a corporate entity which exists and is brought into being in the state of New York. The articles of association of that company were before the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, and were examined by those who desired to do so; but it was not desired by the company that the powers which they derived from the New York legislature should be granted to them by this Parliament. They simply ask for one or two small but necessary powers. They ask, in the first place, that their corporate entity should be recognized. Every lawyer knows that by the comity of nations this company could do business of a certain kind in Canada, and sue and recover on business transactions which they might have here. But they ask:

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That their corporate powers should be recognized and confirmed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, that is where I think the hon. gentleman is wrong, and it was for the purpose of correcting that wrong that I rose. This Bill does not profess to recognize the corporate powers of the company as such. It professes to give them the power to do certain specified things, and certain specified things only. The preamble recites:

The said company desires to have its organization and corporate powers recognized and confirmed by the Parliament of Canada, so far as is necessary to carry out this Act.

And the enacting part of the Bill provides that the company:

Shall be entitled to all the powers, privileges and rights, as a corporation, necessary for the purpose of carrying on in the city of Ottawa, Ontario, and elsewhere in Canada, a general engraving, printing and lithographic business in all its departments, and of manufacturing such machinery as is required for its own use, and also of acquiring and holding such real and personal property as is from time to time required for the convenient and proper carrying on of its business.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I had the preamble and that clause before me, and I certainly hold a strong opinion that taking the two together we have by this Bill recognized and confirmed corporate powers of which we know nothing, including the organization and all the powers of the company.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman's construction. The words of the first section are very clear, very specific, and very limited. They simply confer upon this company such powers as are necessary to do the specific things mentioned here—to carry on a general engraving, printing and lithographic business, and to acquire and hold such real and personal property as is necessary for that purpose. Everybody knows that without that power they could not carry on their business here at all. They could not hold real estate, and the main object of the Bill is to enable them to hold real estate.

Mr. POWELL: Could they not do so under the Alien Corporations Act?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I understand that they could not do so in this city.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not directly.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, and the Bill is for the purpose of enabling them to do that, and to provide that the moment they cease to carry on their business they shall dispose of their real estate. We do not confirm them in the powers granted to them by the New York State legislature; we simply give them the necessary and limited powers specified in the first section. The powers mentioned in sections 2 and 3 are not powers given to the company, but declarations made in order to give any person power to sue the company. These sections merely declare the manner in which they shall be served with process; and the objection which my hon. friend raises against the third clause, he will see on a more critical reading of it, cannot be sustained, because it does not make the entries in the company's books prima facie evidence for them, but prima facie evidence against them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not at all.

Mr. POWELL. They are evidence for the company as well as against them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What does it say?

All books of the company kept by the officer specially charged with that duty shall be prima facie evidence of all facts purporting to be therein stated, in any suit or proceeding against the company or against any shareholder thereof.

It would be a monstrous perversion of this section, and contrary to all canons of construction, to declare that the section, which is for the purpose of making entries in the company's books evidence against the company should be considered as making them evidence for the company. I submit that the clause only means, and would be construed to mean, that a party bringing a suit against the company may tender their books as evidence against the company. It would be contrary to all rules of evidence that a firm or company could tender their books as evidence for themselves.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I know it is contrary to the rules of evidence, and that is one of the objections to it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The clause as drafted was modified in the committee, and, as it now stands, I think it means what I have stated.

Mr. POWELL. I think the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has hastened to that conclusion without weighing carefully the rules of construction. His statement of the rules of evidence is perfectly correct, but he is entirely astray as a matter of statutory construction. What is the meaning of the words, "against the company, or against any shareholder thereof?" These words qualify what immediately precedes them: "in any suit or proceeding." I am astonished at my learned friend arguing to the contrary. If these words are a qualifier of the words, "suit or proceeding," as they unquestionably are, let us look at the matter further and see how simple and natural the construction of the section is. "All books of the company shall be prima facie evidence of all facts purporting to be stated therein"—that is the declaration as to the respect in which they are to be prima facie evidence. In what cases? "In any suit or proceeding against the company." I do not think the case admits of doubt.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am sorry to differ from the hon. gentleman. The rule of evidence is perfectly plain.

Mr. POWELL. It is the rule of statutory construction we are at, not the rule of evidence.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We must read the section in the light of the rules of evidence. A judge construing it would say that the entries in the books of this corporation might be evidence against them, but could not be made evidence for them.

Mr. POWELL. My hon. friend knows that the declarations of a party, in writing or not in writing, are evidence against him. It requires no statutory declaration for that; the common law is equal to the emergency. Then, if by virtue of the common law, the entries in their books are evidence against the company, as they unquestionably are, what is the need of the section?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You will see that is evidence against them and against the shareholders. The evidence of the charter would not be evidence against the shareholders in the ordinary course of law.

Mr. MONK. Allow me to call the attention of the promoter of the Bill to a matter of detail. Representations have been made to me quite recently that the similarity between the name of this company and the company already doing business in Montreal is calculated to mislead, and, in fact, has already produced some confusion. One is called the "British Bank Note Company," and the other is called the "American Bank Note Company." Where there are two companies in the same field of operations, it seems to me only fair that their names should be made more distinct from each other, and I deem it my duty, in view of the representations made to me, to call the attention of the promoter of this Bill to this point. We have already in Canada insurance companies doing business under almost similar names, the one being the Phoenix Insurance Company of London, and the other being the Phoenix Insurance Company of the United States, and I know that in Montreal that similarity has often produced great confusion. I would suggest to the promoter the advisability of making some change in the name of this company so as to distinguish it more easily from the other.

Mr. BELCOURT. That point was very carefully considered by the Private Bills Committee. The instances which the hon. gentleman has just quoted were quoted in that committee and duly considered, and the committee did not think that any inconvenience would arise from the use of the name as it appears in this Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I have several objections to this Bill, and I propose to state them briefly. I am not going to argue the legal points, because that we will leave to the legal members of the House. I have an objection to the name, in the first place. I think it would be much better if a name had been given this company which would distinguish it beyond doubt from the company which has been doing business in Canada for so long. You may say that if you put the word "British" before the word "American" you make a very palpable distinction between the two. But it is no less a fact that, in the general run of business, it is very easy to confound the two, and that possibility might have been well avoided by changing the name of this company. I do not know whether this is the proper place to do that, but at a later stage I shall ask the promoter to consider that point. There are plenty of other names in the world, and it is not at all necessary that two rival companies should be so closely similar in name that there may be ground for confusing the two.

That is my first objection to the Bill. My second objection is this: Whatever the committee on this Bill knew, that committee's work is done. The matter is now before the House, and however able the committee may have been, and however fully they may have canvassed this measure, the House, when it is asked to consider the third reading ought to have all the information the committee had, if it desires. Now, what information has the promoter of the Bill given? We do not know in the least who the promoters of the company are. Why, powers are never given to a company to do business in Canada, whether by an Act of Parliament or under the General Companies' Act, without the promoters of the Bill being known. That is a matter which is always carefully considered, and very rightly so, because it is well that the standing of the promoters of the Bill should be known. It does not throw discredit on the bona fides of the gentlemen behind this Bill, and it was not a sufficient answer for the promoter to say that these men are all right, that they are good business men, that they have been carrying on business for a long time, and that you must not cast aspersions on them. All that may be true, but at the same time it is a wholesome rule of this House, and one which has always obtained in the chartering of these companies, whether by Act of Parliament or under the General Companies' Act, that the promoters should be known, and Parliament has the right to know their names and what is really the organization of this company.

My next objection is to the powers given this company. I am not a lawyer, but if there is anything in the English language more clear than another, it is that Parliament, when it passes this Bill to its third reading and the Bill becomes law, not only recognizes the corporate powers and organization of this unknown company—a company entirely unknown to us so far as we have had any information given us to-night—but also confirms these powers, in so far as the Parliament of Canada can confirm the powers of any company. What are those powers? There is nothing more jealously insisted upon than that in the competition of business in this country, all companies should be placed upon the same level. We may say that, so far as the powers are concerned of this company for their operations in Canada, these are limited in the succeeding sections. That may be true, but it may be also true that if this corporation has great and inordinate powers, as compared with the totality of the powers which are possessed by the Canadian company, the company, doing its greatest business in a foreign country and with only a branch of its business in this country, has, on the whole, much greater powers, and therefore much greater leverage in the competition. Now, I do not think that this Parliament should be asked to confirm the powers of a foreign company without having one scintilla of information vouchsafed to it. Surely we in this country ought to ask that if a foreign company is to be pitchforked into Canada in order to destroy, if possible, and certainly to compete most strongly with a business which has been long established in this country, we ought not to give it the advantage of greater powers. We ought to at least insist that that foreign company shall have its powers set out before this House, so that this House will know what it is doing. The House has a perfect right to restrict these powers so as to bring this company on a level with the Canadian company. That is my second objection.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has done what he has done because of an alleged saving about which we will have something more to say by-and-by. The debate, which we have already had to some extent upon this matter, went into the facts and circumstances of the awarding of the contract to this company. This seems to be a corollary of the awarding of that contract, and this Bill is introduced by a private member in order to carry out in their entirety the arrangements which were entered into with the Government, and for what purpose? That we should have a foreign company in this country to do the work which a Canadian company has satisfactorily done and was willing to continue doing at the same rates as this foreign company. Now, that makes, or ought to make, Parliament a little jealous of giving this company inordinate powers. Let us know what this company is and what these powers are. Has the promoter of the Bill granted the least information to the House in that respect? I have not heard him; he has not done so. These, then, are my principal objections to the Bill. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that it is unfair, if a contract has been awarded and if this company has been given the contract and if the House has, so far as it can do so without a formal motion approved of what has been done, we should not attempt to traverse that ground again by objecting to the incorporation of this company. I acknowledge the fairness of this argument. If the House is determined to support and approve the Government in giving the contract to a foreign company, it is not fair to attempt, by opposition carried out to its ultimate end of complete estoppel of the passage of this Bill, to subvert or destroy or hinder what Parliament wants carried out. But, at the same time, it is perfectly legitimate that we should give to that company only the powers that are given to Canadian companies. Even if it is necessary to go to the extent of doing that, they can do just as other corporations have to do in this country—apply to the Government under the Companies Act and get their letters of incorporation, and thus carry on their operations in conformity with the laws that Canadians have to conform to. But if the Government wish, through one of their supporters, to go outside of the Companies Act and get a special Act of Parliament, let them go through in the regular way that is followed by Canadians when requiring corporate powers. The plea I take is that we are now working in the dark, that Parliament ought not to be asked to work in the dark in this matter. We ought to know what this American company is, what powers and system of organization are to be given it and have the name changed so as not to cause confusion with that of an already existing Canadian company.

Mr. FOSTER.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We cannot change the name of this company. You are not, under this Bill, creating a new company.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You can do anything you please.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This company do not come here to ask for corporate powers. They simply ask you to recognize a name which neither you nor they can change unless you make a new corporation. To change the name of this company here would be to defeat the operation of the Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me ask my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) a question. We will say that these people are to have this contract. Is it necessary that they should have corporate power before they can carry on the work?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. FOSTER. They can do it without that?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They can do a certain work without it.

Mr. FOSTER. Then it would not be a complete estoppel of their work. What they ask for is corporate powers, is it not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well, then, why cannot they get them just as Canadians do. Let them come as John Smith and Timothy Jones and the others and make their application in the due order and receive the powers that we give Canadians under like circumstances. Let them get letters patent just as Canadians have to do. There is a way of doing these things. But it does seem to be carrying this thing very far indeed that, in the first place, you pitchfork them into Canada, a foreign corporation to do the work which we were prepared to do, and then take extraordinary measures, which are not taken in the case of Canadians, to give them the powers it is desired to give them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. All the arguments about "pitchforking" have nothing to do with the Bill. I will not discuss that phase of it. I am pointing out that this corporation has a name and a corporate entity under the laws of the state of New York. It asks for specific powers in Canada. The Bill proposes to give it three specific, limited powers, which are named in the Act. Anybody who wished to deal honestly with the Bill, and apart from the contract, will not object to that. The objection to the name is not tenable. You must refuse to give them corporate powers or else give them.

If you give these powers, it can only be under the name known to the law and specified in the article of associations as already existing under the laws of the state of New York. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) says that we do not know what the names of the promoters are. All that information was given to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, and before the committee passed on the preamble of the Bill, the articles of association were submitted, showing who the corporators and the promoters are, and what their powers are. They do not seek to have these extended corporate powers given in Canada, but only to have the power to hold real estate in Canada and carry on the business of engraving, lithographing and printing.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There surely cannot have—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has spoken.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries said a word beyond the rule, and I only wish to say another. A foreign corporation has no more rights here than foreigners individually. This company comes here and, as an hon. member of the House has pointed out, its name happens to conflict with that of a Canadian company. To be regular, they should do what a private individual from the United States would be required to do, what other corporations are doing every day, ask for a separate charter under a new name, the charter to cover the powers they require.

Mr. BENNETT. When the general discussion took place on the correspondence regarding this contract a week or two ago, I did not participate in it. But as the discussion on this Bill has grown very general, I desire to say a word. I must say that the hon. gentleman who has introduced the Bill cannot complain that he has not had ample time and opportunity for meeting the many objections that have been raised to the passage of this Bill.

Mr. BELCOURT. I did not complain of that.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman says he did not complain of that. But there has certainly been complaint on this side of the House and there certainly have been many strong and forcible objections offered to the Bill. It is well known that not only in this but in other countries many lawsuits arise by reason of the similarity of names taken by different incorporated companies. It does seem to me that the gentlemen who bring this American Bank Note Company into Canada, as they do, not for the purpose alone of carrying on this contract which they have executed—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hour for Private Bills having expired, the House will proceed to the Orders of the Day.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would like to call attention to the fact that there was an understanding that the Bill should be disposed of during this hour and would not be thrown over for another day.

Mr. FOSTER. No, my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) is not right in saying that it was limited to the succeeding hour. If he will look at "Hansard" he will see that he is mistaken.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It was understood that if the Bill was postponed until my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) came back, no attempt would be made to block the Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I confirm that statement. I myself stated that, so far as I was concerned, and I thought I could speak for my friends, there would be no attempt made to block the Bill, and I should be very sorry if any action of the kind were to take place. But I do not think that anything was said that would limit the discussion, or prevent the full discussion of the Bill, which, as I understand, is not blocking the Bill.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. WALLACE. When the Committee rose at six o'clock, I was alluding to the combination that was in existence with regard to biscuits and confectionery. I was saying that though there was evidence, and I have it before me now, that this combination had raised prices to the consumer, and raised them very largely on some varieties of goods, yet I thought that this Bill, so far as that combination existed, would not be very effective. But who are we to have in the first instance as judges? They say they call in the judges of the Superior Court. But the Council of the Government of Canada have to make an indictment before they can call in the judges to examine into any particular case. Well, Sir, the Government, before they call in the judges to make an investigation with regard to this biscuit factory, of course they appoint those whose particular duty it is to make this investigation, and they call in the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his two colleagues, the Minister of Finance and the Controller of Customs. These three gentlemen are a committee to find out and discover whether there is a case to present, whether there is an improper combination among the biscuit and confectionery manufacturers of this country. Now, Sir, just imagine these three gentlemen at work. I have no doubt the Minister of Trade and Commerce would give a righteous and unbiassed judgment, but how does the case stand with the other two? Could we expect from those gentlemen, whose interests, we are told, to some extent are bound up in this very item of manufacture—could we expect these gentlemen to condemn themselves and their friends to the penalty imposed by this clause of the Bill which provides that the duty should be entirely taken off, or reduced to a degree to bring the manufacturers to their senses, and then leave them open, after that investigation, to the criminal prosecution which might follow? Because the Combines Act is still in existence, and this Bill, as I assume, will not wipe out the provisions of the Bill enacted some years ago. So I say we might find that these gentlemen, instead of condemning the manufacturers of biscuits and confectionery, would perhaps give them an additional bonus, or give them more protection, would give them more protection even than they had before under this Bill. We find they are hard-working and industrious men, and they might require still further protection. Now, I say that in that regard the Bill would work no good, but incalculable evil. But what do we find in this Bill. Why, Sir, I imagine that I could write a little history of this clause in this Tariff Bill. Don't we know that Sir Oliver Mowat has been adopting in the province of Ontario, for the last twenty years or more, a system in regard to hotel licenses, that deprives the hotel-keepers of their freedom in this country, deprives them of their right and their independence. That is a fact known to every one in Ontario who has taken any interest in this question. And, Sir, I imagine that I see the fine Italian hand in this tariff of Sir Oliver Mowat.

Mr. McMULLEN. Your statement is not true.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; withdraw.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. member for North Wellington should withdraw that statement.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will correct it by saying that the statement is not correct, but I only do so because the rules require it.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, that is very good for the hon. member for North Wellington, because I did not make any statement at all; I said I imagined that I saw the fine Italian hand of Sir Oliver Mowat in this clause of the Bill. I was going to ask the hon. member for North Wellington how he knows that the hand of the late Premier of Ontario is not in this clause. He must have been a member of the Cabinet; he must know what took place in the Cabinet.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be allowed to set myself right. The hon. gentleman has misrepresented me in the statement which he has made, and I ask the right to correct it. The hon. member said that Sir Oliver Mowat had passed a

Mr. WALLACE.

License Act in Ontario that deprived the hotel-keepers of their franchise. I said that statement was not true, then I corrected it by saying that the hon. gentleman had made an incorrect statement, and I say so now.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman is wrong as usual. What I said about the hotel-keepers of Ontario was that Sir Oliver Mowat had deprived them of their independence, not of their franchise, that he had adopted a system of ballot which was not secret, by which the votes of these hotel-keepers could be known, and were known, and by that means the screws could be put on them and they were told: If you vote against Sir Oliver Mowat's Government, you know what to expect when license time comes around. And experience has shown hundreds of times that that threat was not a vain or empty boast, but was carried into effect when the time came round.

Mr. McMULLEN. No.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman says. No. Does he know what is occurring in every riding in the province of Ontario?

Mr. McMULLEN. Give a case.

Mr. WALLACE. I can give him a case in the west riding of York, lots of cases.

Mr. McMULLEN. No, you cannot.

Mr. WALLACE. I am not going to satisfy his curiosity just now. But I will give him two names, John Duck and Thomas Hastings, in the west riding of York. Does he contradict that; does he deny it? He don't know anything about it. I can give him twenty names, if it is necessary.

Mr. McMULLEN. In that case he is a Duck as well as yourself.

An hon. MEMBER. You are a canvas-back duck.

Mr. WALLACE. Now, I was proceeding to say that Sir Oliver Mowat, finding how exceedingly effective his tactics were in the counties of Ontario with regard to hotel-keepers, and how he could exercise improper influence, an influence that he was not justified in exercising against hotel-keepers, he now comes down to Ottawa and says: Gentlemen, I have got a bigger job on hand than that. This scheme against the hotel-keepers has worked like a charm. They dared not vote, or if they did vote, they had to vote the way our friends told them, else they got into trouble. Now here are the manufacturers in this country with tens of thousands of employees, and we can adopt the same method with regard to them if you will let me manipulate the matter. And here, Mr. Chairman, is the result—clause 17 of this Tariff Act, a clause that can answer no other purpose if it becomes the law of the land. It would be a most effective weapon to hold over the manufacturers of this country. Just imagine some Minister of the Crown, we will say the Postmaster General by way of illustration, visiting a constituency at a by-election, perhaps East Simcoe, and going to Orillia, where he might meet Mr. Tudhope, who is a large manufacturer of wagons and buggies. He might say to that gentleman: we are not going to interfere with your industry; we will give you, in fact, more protection. But when the Minister comes back to Parliament the Government forthwith brings down another tariff dealing with that industry. The Postmaster General may go back at the next general election and say to Mr. Tudhope, who is a large manufacturer: you are making a great row about the duties, stating that we are interfering with the protection you are enjoying; we hear, however, there is a combine in wagons and buggies, and we will make an investigation, the result of which may be that the duty will be wholly removed and we will deprive your industry of the whole protection it at present enjoys. That will be the inevitable result if that clause is adopted. Will it be tolerated in any free country that the whole of an industrial interest shall be held at the mercy of the Government of the day? This is an interference with the freedom of Canadian manufacturers. If the present combine law is not strong enough, then a Bill should be introduced which will make it more effective, and give the law power to punish all manufacturers who organize combines that are against the interests of the consumers. But hon. gentlemen opposite do not propose to look after the interests of the consumers, notwithstanding what was said a few moments ago by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies). In the course of his remarks the hon. gentleman stated that the combine Bill was a sham. Did the hon. gentleman propose a single amendment to make it effective and give it force when that Bill was introduced, or has any hon. gentleman opposite said one word in favour of any Bill to protect the rights of the consumers? There is not on the records any statement made by the hon. gentleman or his colleagues in favour of such a Bill. During his remarks I pointed out that there was a combination among thread manufacturers in Great Britain, that those companies had a central agency and that the agency had advanced prices 50 per cent in one day. This Bill will not interfere with combinations made in foreign countries, and it cannot interfere to any extent with combinations in this country of men other than manufacturers. These are the two great classes of combinations that work injury in Canada. This Bill will help them, it will not hurt them. I have already called attention to combinations among coal dealers and wholesale grocers. This Bill, I repeat, will not interfere with combinations of manufacturers in foreign countries, who bring their goods here; but it will tend to crush out the industries of this country, especially at election times, when hon. gentlemen opposite know that tens of thousands of men are employed by manufacturers and their interests are identical with those of their employers. This Bill proposes to take the whole subject out of the courts and place it in the hands of the Government, because the reference to a Supreme Court Judge is a mere pretense. The Government must in the first place, make out a prima facie case, they must make the investigation. They can hold this clause over the head of a manufacturer until an election is over; by this means they can exercise a species of terrorism over not only the manufacturers but their employees, whose bread and butter depends on obtaining employment. This course can be pursued until an election is over, and then either the Government or the judge can decide that there is no case. Another reason why this clause was inserted in the Tariff Bill was because hon. gentlemen opposite when in Opposition had made a loud outcry against monopolies and combines. Hon. gentlemen opposite brought down the tariff which was a curious muddle of protection, a little free trade and a little arrangement to destroy some of the industries of the country. They now say to the free traders, who are very much dissatisfied with the tariff, that by this clause now under consideration the Government will kill all monopolies. The ordinary elector is not aware that there is already such an Act in operation, and that the common law of the land also to a certain extent applies; and so the Government put in the tariff Act a provision that they allege, will kill all combines and monopolies and show that they are looking after the interests of the free traders in that regard. They think that will satisfy the farmers and be accepted as an instalment of free trade. That might be very well if they were dealing with people who were not intelligent, who were not able to read for themselves and follow public affairs; but the people will see that this clause has not a single redeeming feature, that it is an interference with the courts. This clause should form no part of the Tariff Bill, and there never was a Tariff Bill containing a clause so foreign to it as is clause 17. This subject should be dealt with on its merits and by itself; but that would not be doing what hon. gentlemen opposite desired to do. They are carrying out a lesson given them by Sir Oliver Mowat, derived from his experience in the Ontario legislature, and this clause is introduced for the purpose of intimidating the electors of the country. But I warn hon. gentlemen opposite that it will not work and will not accomplish the purpose desired. Again, the Minister of Marine stated his case in this way: suppose there is a combination on a certain class of manufactures, but that all the manufacturers of that class are not in the combine, then if their prices are right, where is there any grievance? But, he added, if their prices were inordinately high, then there would be a grievance and all those men would deserve to be punished. But who is to be the judge as to the price at which the manufacturer or producer is able to sell his goods? Was ever such a proposition heard of in a free country before, as that the Government should tell a manufacturer the price at which he should sell his goods? No man has the right, no Government has the right, no judge has the right to dictate the price at which a manufacturer shall sell his product. Who can tell the cost of putting together the raw material, of making sales, the amount of bad debts, the capital required, and what would be a legitimate profit on any article, except the manufacturer? Yet the Government propose, without looking into these matters, to decide them offhand. They are going to say that if the prices are too high they will abolish the protection given to that industry, destroy the capital engaged, drive the men out of employment and ruin the manufacturer's business. That is what the Minister told us; that he was going to decide this on his own knowledge, and if he does not decide it, who will? The judge cannot decide it; nobody can decide it except these men who are engaged in the business themselves. Competition in this country will regulate these prices, and competition from the outside will regulate the prices that should be paid, and if competition does not regulate, and if combines be formed, then let the laws of the land already on the statute-books deal with this question. I referred the other evening to the Canadian Iron Founders' Association, which had a combination at one time. The association was formed twenty years before, and it numbered eighteen firms. Outside of the association there are forty manufacturers of the same goods, some of whom are large manufacturers, but the majority are small firms and they make stoves for wood, stoves for coal, stoves for heating, stoves for cooking, and every class of stoves. Every one of these manufacturers makes an article of a somewhat different kind, and the Government may say that these eighteen men have made a combination of their prices, and then it is decided by this immaculate Government, which knows it all, that the prices are too high. They have no basis to guide them in that decision but, nevertheless, they decide that these manufacturers who are outside the combine, who have broken no law of the land, who are pursuing their business legitimately, this Government decides without a moment's notice, and on a Star Chamber proceeding, and they get notice that their industry is wiped out and that their protection of 30 per cent has ceased. The raw materials which they use are dutiable, and their machinery is dutiable, and everything is dutiable, except their product, and so the industry is wiped out.

Now, is that a power that this Parliament should give to any Government? I contend it is not. I contend that it would be a great wrong, and as the Government have already reconsidered ninety or one hundred clauses of their tariff, I trust they will consider a few more, and that they will bring in a tariff with clause No. 17 eliminated. It is to be hoped that they will leave out that clause, and so remove at least one blot from a tariff which is not a very creditable production for any Government.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to say a few words with regard to this clause, because I think that hon. gentlemen opposite have scarcely done justice either to themselves or to the clause, nor have they given such lucid explanations to the House as would enable hon. gentlemen to understand how far this clause can be successful in accomplishing what they aim at. At the outset, I may say, that we on this side of the House are as much opposed to trusts, combines, or monopolies as the members of the Government can possibly be, and we are as willing to fight them, and to fight them effectually, if possible, as any people of this country could be. But where we disagree from the Government is as to the remedy which they propose for accomplishing that end. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) told us in his opening remarks that the countries in which the protective principle prevailed were always the countries in which combines flourished most successfully. It is evident the Minister of Finance is not an extensive reader, or that he has given little attention to the subject, or else he would not make that statement in the Canadian House of Commons. If he takes up any authority on the subject, and there are many in the Library, it will be made plain to him that these combines, these trusts, and these monopolies were as flourishing in England for several hundred years as in any other country in the world. And, Sir, that remark applies not only to the time when England was under a protective system, but also to the period during which England has been, comparatively speaking, a free trade country, and to-day we find trusts and combines as prevalent in England as in any other period of history. We find men combined with regard to trade, controlling the buying and selling of goods, controlling the various lines of commerce, as effectually in England to-day as in any highly protective country. Perhaps I may be allowed to refer to some of the occasions on which the authorities in England have been called upon to deal with this question. In 1340 all the tin mines of England were monopolized by a German. A century later the King's Merchants were said to have the monopoly of the known resources of alum, and they had it under a combine. In 1505 King Henry VII. provided regulations for the trade of rope-making in the town of Bridgeport in the county of Dorsetshire. Again, in 1830, there was another provision limiting the manufacture of clothing to the inhabitants of Worcester, and there are a number of these in succession. In 1609 the king was obliged to revoke all monopolies by proclamation. In 1618, 1624 and 1639 he was obliged to deal with them again. In looking over this work which I hold in my hand, I find that in every age in the history of England, they have been troubled with monopolies, trusts or combines, to as large an extent as have the people of protection nations. In the United States these combines were more widespread in their evil effects than ever they could be in this country, and perhaps we may benefit from the experience of the United States in considering how they dealt with this matter. They tried the very remedy in the United States that is proposed by the 17th clause of this resolution; that is, to do away or reduce the duties on the various lines with reference to which a combine existed. This was proposed several years ago, and the only difference between the United States law and the law proposed here, is, that in the United States they made it a separate Bill, and did not connect it with a tariff resolution. But the people of the United States found that such a law was ineffectual, and it has been abandoned long since. Then, after several years' experience they fell back on another remedy. There was a committee of the House of Representatives appointed in 1888, which inquired into the working of trusts in the United States, and they concluded their report with the opinion that while a trust may be dangerous and should be watched by law, it did not necessarily imply monopoly; that combination has greater powers of good and evil than individuals, but that its power for the latter is lessened by the discoveries of the age, and, the committee held that the severest penalty should be prescribed and enforced against associations, the object of which may be monopoly or the enhancing of prices. In their wisdom they represented this to the House of Representatives, and the House of Representatives adopted their report, and passed, not one law, but several laws on the subject. As people found ways and means to evade the laws passed by them, they amended these laws and made it a punishable offence for individuals to put their business under a trust, or a combine, or in the shape of a monopoly. Now, then, Sir, the injustice perpetrated on the community by trusts and combines is such that we should anxiously make it our duty to do away with them as quickly as it is possible to do so.

But will this resolution, if passed, accomplish it? I say it will not. Suppose to-day you undertake to deal with a trust known as the Standard Oil Company, which I am told has got a footing in Canada, and whose influence is beginning to be felt here; how would this clause affect it? It is a foreign corporation. No oil could be brought into this country from abroad, either Russian or English oil, on account of the distance. The country would be under that gigantic monopoly, and it could not be reached by this resolution 17 at all, as it is a foreign corporation. There are other combinations which this does not reach. Men may agree to sell the lines of goods they are handling under one management, or under some arrangement by which they will all sell at one price, and that price far above what they should be sold at. This does not touch them in any way. As the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) said, it could only touch the manufacturers who are protected by a duty. But what is the proper remedy for these combinations? I say it is a law that will effectually punish those who form them, by fine or imprisonment, or both; that is the only way you can deal with them. I do not wonder that the Government have devised this means of satisfying a large part of the community who desire to see combines, trusts and monopolies dealt with; because I remember that one clause in the Patron platform was in favour of doing away with combines and monopolies, and when an amalgamation of the Patrons and Reformers took place, it was necessary for the Government to delude the Patrons with the idea that they were trying to accomplish that end. But they must be deluded in this case, because this provision will in no way accomplish it. Another reason why I object to this clause is that it is powerful for evil, but not powerful for good. It puts in the hands of a few men the power to harass or annoy or interfere with the operations of business men in the country. The result of this resolution, if passed, will be to put the traders and manufacturers of the country under the control of the Government to such an extent as to keep them in perpetual dread of being attacked under this law. It might be used as a means of levying on men political contributions or blackmail to any possible extent. I say no Government should have in their hands the power to intimidate or annoy any class of people, or to prevent them freely exercising the franchise, or to make the traders of the country feel that if at any moment they are not friendly to the powers that be, they will run a great danger of becoming the objects of an inquisitorial investigation that might ruin their business. However desirous the Government may be to restrain and control trusts and combines, this law cannot be effectual. What would it do in the case of the insurance combine which we have in the country to-day? What duty could it take off insurance? How could this law reach that combine? There is no way of doing so. If the Government desire, as they profess, to reach these combines and trusts, they should introduce and carry through a special law for that purpose. In the United States laws have been enacted putting it in the power of private individuals to institute actions against these combines and trusts. But it was found that that would not do, because if they failed to get a verdict, the party who instituted the action was liable for damages, and the combine struck back at him. Therefore it was found that the law had to be enforced by the state. Why did not the state enforce the law which was put on the Statute-book by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace)? Sir Oliver Mowat refused to enforce that law. He said private individuals should do it. Did he desire to suppress combines and trusts when he refused to enforce that law? I say he did not want to make it effectual; and to-day he is intelligent enough to know that the only way in which you can successfully strike at these combines and trusts is to make it a punishable offence, by fine or imprisonment, or both, for people to enter into such combines or trusts to the detriment of the country. If they enact and put in force such a law, then and not till then will these combinations be dealt with effectually. For these reasons I oppose this resolution. I hold it to be radically wrong, in the first place, because it is connected with the Supply Bill. It should not be there, but it should be an independent law, if it is to be of any value whatever. Then it should reach combines and trusts of every kind, whether of manufacturers, traders or importers, whether in insurance or in any other line of life, whether in selling or purchasing. It should be a law that would reach all alike and punish all alike. You are making this law applicable to certain classes, and not to other classes. For these reasons I oppose this clause. I think it would be very injurious, and of no value whatever.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to say a word or two before this debate goes further, to voice the objections to this clause in the light of some remarks that were made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), who thinks the question is of such little importance that he is taking a sound sleep now under the sound of my voice. However, I have no doubt he will wake up before long. I object to this legislation, in the first place, because of the nature of the tribunal in whose hands the prosecution and the final judgment and carrying out of the sentence is reposed. The prosecutor in this instance is what? The prosecutor is the combination of leaders of a political party, who exist to bring their party into power and to keep it in power by opposing all and sundry of the people of the country who are not of their political belief. Now, I say that the head of a party organization to wit, the Government, under the circumstances which exist in this country, is not the tribunal which should have the ultimate arbitrament of cases in which men are to be tried, where evidence of the most minute and technical character is to be brought, and where judgment in the way of affixing penalties is to be made. If there is, in the first place, to be confidence in the country that justice will be done, the very poorest way possible to induce that confidence is to make your tribunal the head of a party organization, I do not care whether you call that tribunal a government or anything else. What is it more than anything else which contributes to a feeling of security in life and property? It is that the judiciary of a country are removed as far as possible from sectarian strife and prejudice and partisan sentiment. It is that these men, so far removed from party strife and prejudice and resentments, are governed by a long array of precedents set by illustrious justices, and an accumulation of legal customs and enactments, so that when they come to the adjudication of any claims, they come to it as far removed from political influence as possible and governed by a long line of distinguished and weighty precedents and law by which alone they are guided. Now, if that be the proper judiciary to which to refer ordinary matters affecting life and property, how is it that when we come to treat of the great manufacturing and industrial interests of the country, in which millions of capital are invested and in which the employment of thousands and hundreds of thousands are at stake, you adopt an entirely different course and submit these questions to a partisan body. In the case of disputes between claimants, involving in many cases perhaps only a few hundred dollars, they have to be submitted to a court governed by precedents and by the law and free from any political influence, but when the interests of merchants and capitalists and of the workmen employed in our manufacturing establishments are at stake, you refuse to allow these to be adjudicated upon by these independent tribunals. I submit to the legal sense and to the common-sense and fair-mindedness of this House whether we can safely refer such matters to a body composed of men like, for instance, my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) who, whatever high estimate we may form of him in his private character, is in political matters a partisan of the most pronounced type, a man of the strongest political views, and an inveterate opponent of all wicked Tories. Does any one suppose that in a court composed of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues there can be any confidence in justice being done entirely uninfluenced by political partisanship? The moment you bring a man before such a partisan court his first consideration will be what political influence he can get to secure a decision in his favour. Why, !

recollect, not more than twelve months ago, a very high official in this country, representing the Queen, stated in a public document that he thought it would be quite well to leaven the judicial bench of Canada by the appointment of a few Liberals thereto so as to avoid the suspicions of having thereupon too great a number of Conservatives. Well, Sir, we are to-day asked to create a partisan court with respect to which every man who is hailed before it, if he is of the same political stripe, feels that he has thirteen judges in his favour and who, if he is on the opposite side, is convinced that he comes before thirteen judges who have every interest in pronouncing against him. That is not going to heighten the feeling on the part of the people that justice will be done. No more fatal blow could be dealt to the public feeling of security in justice being done than to establish a court of that kind.

I object to another thing. These gentlemen actually proposed, in the first place, that both the prosecutor and the court before which the facts were to be submitted were to be those same thirteen partisan men composing the Cabinet. They slept over that proposition however. There were some very strong remonstrances from some of their own friends, and they dragged in the judge—to do what? To help them to carry out the injustice they proposed to perpetrate. They dragged in a judge and a judge appointed ad hoc—one of their own friends if they like. And do you suppose that they would put in one of their former opponents? Is it not a vicious thing any way to make a tribunal which shall be prosecutor, in the first place, and which shall pronounce and carry out the judgment in the second place; and then get a judge appointed ad hoc; selected from their own party, and looking for preferment from that party. And appointed for what purpose? To pronounce judgment according to the law? In no sense, because they take care that the judge should not pronounce judgment. All he has to do is to take the rules of procedure that those thirteen partisans draw and direct and find out whether there is an agreement or not, and when he reports whether there is or not an agreement, that judge's work is done. Apply such a proceeding to the Supreme Court of Canada. Carry your case to that court from any other, have the whole matter sifted in the way of evidence by those judges and let those judges simply give their opinion and then say to them that they must shut their mouths and stay their hands. And a partisan thirteen, to wit, the Cabinet of this country, must say whether a judgment shall be given or a penalty enacted or not. Is that giving justice? But that is what they are doing. And they are taking refuge in silence, in ignoble silence, when arguments are brought to show that their course of proceeding does not tend to exalt the sentiment or comply with the rules of justice in this country. Then, when the judge appointed ad hoc shall have sifted the evidence and made report, according to the statement of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), the partisan thirteen may hold up that judgment in their hand and shake it in the face of the interest affected and say: Do as we want you to do, or we will put on the penalty; do as we want you to do, and we will not put on the penalty.

Mr. McMULLEN. That is what you do.

Mr. FOSTER. I hear my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). Oh, how the independent man has fallen! How limp has become the stiff backbone of fourteen months ago! To-day he is willing to sap the very foundations of justice—he, the power behind the throne, who made these speeches here, nine hundred and ninety-nine of them in a single session, and made those speeches in the country on the triumphant force of which his party was floated into power. He, the very builder of his party, must sit there, his strong, adamant backbone reduced to a jelly-like condition, repeating the parrot formula: I have great confidence in the Ministers. Now, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries acknowledged here to-day that it was simply discretionary with the Council of thirteen to carry out or refrain from carrying out the penalty. I object to that. If we are going to have a judge, if that judge sifts the evidence and comes to the conclusion that there is a crime, let him fix the penalty, and let that penalty follow certainly and unerringly upon the criminality. These thirteen men are there. Why? Because they have a majority of the votes in this House. How? Through a political propaganda. They will retain their places how long? As long as they can get the support of the majority in this House; that is, as long as their followers in the country will support them. Now, what will happen? Bring up your case; prosecute it before the ad hoc judge; get his decision that there is a crime. Then comes the question whether the crime is to be met with a penalty. The judge cannot inflict one; it is left for the thirteen to say whether the penalty shall or shall not be inflicted. If the industry that is attacked is a powerful influence in the constituency of my hon. friend from North Wellington, he or his party heelers will come down on the Government in time and say: Don't you carry out the penalty against these men; we will get their votes in the coming election if you use them right. Am I telling of something that is not done? Why, to-day that Cabinet of thirteen have not a peaceful hour in any day of their lives because of the pressure of the back benches to cause them to turn honest men out of office and put party heelers in their places.

They know it; they know it well. And what a tremendous enginery this will be, when the noble and unbiassed thirteen, kept in office by the votes of some hundred odd men who are kept in their places in this House by the ward and county workers. And the ward and county workers will come down in an avalanche of letters and deputations to these unbiassed thirteen and say: Just let that hang there until the elections are over. Will it be done? Of course it will be done.

Mr. MCGREGOR. He understands it.

Mr. FOSTER. I do understand it. Yes, and hon. gentlemen opposite understand it right well, and that is why this resolution is put there. Let us say a word about the penalty. Is it not an axiom that no man can question that if a wrong is committed the penalty must be laid upon the person who is adjudged guilty and upon him alone? What is the penalty in this case? It is one of the most absurd penalties I ever heard discussed. So absurd was it that the generally thick-and-thin supporter from Kingston, the hon. member (Mr. Britton) who spoke this afternoon, felt his conscience stirred so that he had to rise and declare that he agreed with the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) on this point and to ask: If you make the innocent suffer with the guilty in that penalty, at least compensate the innocent. That is something. We have made one break in the serried ranks. We have got the wise representative from Kingston, a legal man too rising and speaking from a long legal experience. An over-weighted man who has felt the burden of Government repression on his shoulders for weeks and weeks, at last feels he cannot remain under it longer and must roll it off. He rolled off the burden of subserviency and told the front benches:—You are putting on a wrongful penalty; I agree with the leader of the Opposition so far as this matter is concerned. And what is the penalty? A number of pork-packers in this country, we will say, in the carrying on of their business and engaging in competition with foreign producers, make a combine or agreement to raise the prices of pork to what they think a remunerative point. The prosecution starts. The unbiassed thirteen get their work in. They call on the ad hoc judge; he gets the evidence and reports that the pork-packers have raised the price of pork. There are the facts, and here are the judges assembled. What is the penalty? The penalty is that the duties are taken off pork and the pork-packers are dished. But when these unbiassed thirteen dished the pork-packers what else did they do? They dished every farmer from one end of the country to the other. What a lovely penalty that is? To punish half a dozen pork-packers you take the duty off pork and expose the farmers of this country to competition without any tariff protection, competition which the Government themselves declared is too strong. The first tariff they brought down declared free competition too strong for the farmers and so they put the duty on pork up two and three cents to give the farmers a chance. Beautiful even-handed justice! We often hear of justice being blind. This is justice swaddled completely and laid under the bench. Let us go further. Take the iron manufacture of this country. Why do hon. gentlemen opposite bring down a tariff which provides for certain duties upon iron? Is it for revenue purposes only? They know that it is not. They know that if they wished to raise revenue simply, they would put the duty just below the producing point in this country, so that all the iron would be imported. Instead of doing that, they have put the duty up so that they think there will be a countervailing advantage to preserve the immense iron industry of this country. Some of these iron men go to work and form an agreement, the prosecution starts, the ad hoc judge is brought in, he declares there is an agreement, the penalty is brought down, the iron duties are taken off. What happens? You have punished these few iron furnaces, haven't you? But what else have you done? You have destroyed an industry in Canada that the Government declared ought to be protected so that it might exist. A delightful penalty, an even-handed justice which, in order to punish the wrong-doer, goes to work and destroys one of the vital industries of the country. Take the cotton manufactures. Why did my hon. friend raise the duties on cotton? Did he not raise them? He cannot deny it. Why, he put a double process on, he raised them first and took a bit off afterwards, then he left what he declared to the cotton people was sufficient to protect them and the cotton industry in this country. The cotton men make a combine, some of them, half a dozen of them. They make this combine, the prosecutor goes to work, the ad hoc judge is brought in, his report is that there is an agreement, down comes the penalty, and off goes the complete duty on cotton. What is done? In order to punish a few cotton men who have made an agreement, the whole cotton industry of this country is destroyed, and millions of capital is left barren and waste, and thousands of men are left out of employment. Delightful justice, even-handed justice, most considerate justice at the hands of the immortal thirteen. In order to punish a few recalcitrant cotton manufacturers, you go to work and destroy a whole industry; you go to work and put thousands out of employment, and destroy what you have beforehand declared was a vital industry and ought to be kept. Worse still. The cotton manufacturers do not manufacture cotton for the fun of it. (Now, when that conversation is over I will try to get on.) I give fair warning to hon. gentlemen opposite that some time there will come a day when, if we are debating important questions and debating them fairly and honestly, and we are not treated with the courtesy of listening to our arguments and attempting to give us light where we need it, that there will be a very wholesome discipline which will be imposed on this House.

Mr. FOSTER.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, it will be done, and it ought to be done. Under the rule of the hon. gentlemen opposite, short as it has been, parliamentary government, parliamentary discussion, the very first element of parliamentary life, is rapidly being thrown out of gear in this House; and these hon. gentlemen begin to think that they have simply to put a resolution on the paper, and bring it down, then leave us to talk about it until we get exhausted, and then pass it by their votes. The time is coming when that will not be possible in this House. It would be well for the Government if they would just give a little heed to that.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We have heard it all about fourteen times already.

Mr. FOSTER. There are some men who can hear a truth fourteen times, and yet get not a glimmering idea of what it means the fourteenth time; and it is necessary that such obtuseness should be pierced, if it is possible.

Mr. CAMPBELL. You cannot pierce it.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid I cannot. I have no weapon strong enough or keen enough to get at the inside of what that hon. gentleman thinks is his brain. Now, let us take up the cotton manufacture again. You have had your attention called, you have had your ad hoc judge, you have had your judgment, you have punished the few cotton manufacturers, but you have destroyed the industry. What else have you done? As I was going on to say, the cotton men do not manufacture cotton simply for the fun of it, they manufacture it to sell. They don't keep it in stock any longer than they can, and when they manufacture their millions of pounds of cotton and put it into fabric, it passes out of their hands. Who holds it? The wholesale men hold it, the retail men hold it, the dealers the whole country through, hold these stocks of cotton. Let this Star Chamber get to work; let it take off the duty and punish two or three recalcitrant manufacturers, and where else does the penalty light? It lights in a reduction to the tune of 27½ per cent upon the whole stock of cotton fabrics in this country, held by innocent dealers, wholesale and retail. Is that a fair penalty? Is that equal-handed justice? Why, Sir, that is playing mad havoc with the industries of this country. Now, will hon. gentlemen opposite, if there is a penalty to be applied, will they apply the penalty where the wrong is committed, and upon those who have committed the wrong? I will mention again where it is unfair. Hon. gentlemen opposite, and the Finance Minister was one of them, argued that you could not have a combine unless all the people engaged in that industry were guilty and culpable alike. Can you not? For he said it can never come to the point where the ad hoc judge will be called in if there are manufacturers in that industry who are doing right and keeping their prices right. Now, do business men affirm that idea? Let me ask my hon. friend if this is not possible, if it is not the course of every true and real combination? There may be three-quarters, there may be one-quarter, but there is always a certain number of honest and smaller manufacturers who are actually forced to shut up by the dominant number who make up the combine, and who, by their wealth, and their power, and their capital, keep these smaller men under. Now, what are you going to do that will stop the competition? You have in this country four great manufacturers of rubber goods, we will say, and suppose that three of those form a combine and the fourth one fights the combine. But the fourth one is not able to fight the accumulated money and the accumulated organization of the other three; they force him to side with them or they force him to shut up. He may claim something for shutting up, and you say he ought not to receive it. But it may be just a choice between utter ruin to him and enough to keep starvation from him. Anyway, through this dominant influence he is forced into the position, not because he wishes it, but because of the dominant power of these three. Now, why should you punish that fourth man? He is in a position that he cannot compete with the other three, and so the combine exists, and you put your machinery on, and you get your judgment, and you put on the penalty, and you destroy that man's capital, that man's machinery, that man's industry, because the three stronger men forced him into a position against his own will. There you are putting the penalty upon the innocent man, the man who was not guilty, who was the victim of the force, of the better organization, of the dominant men in that industry who formed the combine. Do not hon. gentlemen see that, argue this as you will, this penalty of the taking off of duties upon whole lines of goods, is a penalty which strikes ninety-nine innocent persons for every one guilty person that it can possibly strike. So I protest against that penalty because it is not just, it is not right, and it is not a wise penalty so far as the business interests of this country are concerned.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not rise for the purpose of making a lengthy speech. I said what I had to say in support of the propostion now before the House in the afternoon; and I think I may fairly appeal to the House that the hon. gentleman and his followers have been compelled to take refuge in one single argument, and one single argument alone. The points now resolve themselves into one, which has been forcibly put by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat; and in passing I may remark that the hon. gentleman before he lectures hon. gentlemen opposite on this side of the House on their conduct while he was speaking, should be kind enough to address his voice with his face towards us, not with his back towards us.

Mr. FOSTER. I acknowledge the corn. I learned the bad habit from the Minister of Trade and Commerce and from the Minister of Finance.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Wherever the hon. gentlemen learned it, he had better in future avoid it. I will now call attention to the one point before the House—the grave consequences that may follow if the plan proposed in this resolution is adopted for the purpose of avoiding combines. That plan, the hon. gentleman says, embodies the fault that it will punish the innocent along with the guilty. That plan, he says, is so objectionable in this respect that that alone should condemn it.

Mr. FOSTER. Not alone.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I appeal to the history of the past if that is not the very plan the hon. gentleman adopted from time to time. I appeal to the history of this House for the last ten years that hon. gentlemen was in power if, when he found combines existing for the purpose of raising prices against the consumer, he did not, as Finance Minister, find it to be his duty to come to this House and ask that the duties be lowered in order to defeat the combines.

Mr. FOSTER. By the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We are not talking about the tribunal for the moment, we are talking about the plan. The hon. gentleman was contending that the plan adopted was unjust because it would punish the innocent along with the guilty. The hon. gentleman approved the very plan we now propose, and the only fault that can be found with it is that we copied it from him. In a speech his former leader delivered a year or two ago, what did he say with respect to these combines? He said:

Whenever the price of an article was inflated by means of trade combinations, it has either been put upon the free list or the duty lowered to a point which rendered the abuse of the protection impossible.

The innocent and the guilty suffered alike by the very policy carried into effect by the hon. gentleman, who thundered here so long to-night; and that plan which he denounced, and which is depicted in such clear language as I have read, is the very policy introduced into this resolution, almost in the terms of the resolution itself.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not wish to prolong the discussion, as it has been mainly engaged in by hon. members on this side of the House; but I cannot allow the impression to be conveyed that we are favourable to any extent whatever to trusts or combines. I am sure from what has been stated by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that we are just as much opposed to the existence of trusts and combines as are hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches or those who sit behind them. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has sought to make a point against the ex-Finance Minister with respect to the manner in which combines were treated during the regime of the previous Government. He has charged that it was the practice of the Government during long years, when it was found that by reason of the duties manufacturers inordinately advanced the prices of their articles to the consumer, to reduce the duties on such goods. But the hon. gentleman must bear this fact in mind, that it was not to a committee of thirteen members of this House that judgment was committed, but the whole question was submitted to the high court of Parliament, where justice may be expected and where favours are not extended. The Minister this afternoon while addressing the House stated that the existence of combines was admitted. On this question, whether combines exist in this country or not, there seems to be a difference of opinion among those on the Treasury benches. While one hon. gentleman asserts that there is abundant evidence that combines exist, another hon. member says that no such evidence can be found. The only illustration brought forward this afternoon was the old one of the alleged combine on binding twine. We have heard of that perhaps a hundred times, and it can be readily demonstrated that a combine has not existed for many years.

An hon. MEMBER. What about coal oil?

Mr. HENDERSON. In 1893 a factory for the manufacture of binding twine was in existence in Brantford. They sold 800 tons of twine, a very much larger quantity than they were able to produce. As they had put their twine on the market, they were compelled to fill their orders. They were only able to manufacture 380 tons; they secured from the Central Frison, Toronto, 186 tons, but they still required a certain quantity, and they bought from the Consumers' Cordage Company, which was called a combine, 234 tons. No hon. member would describe as a combine the Brantford company, which was organized by farmers, who subscribed the necessary capital on which no interest was paid, the object of the company being to manufacture binding twine and sell it at first cost to the farmers. No one will claim that there was any profit made out of the twine made by that company; no one will say that Sir Oliver Mowat allowed the twine manufactured at the Central Prison, Toronto, to be sold at an excessively high price; but notwithstanding these facts the Brantford company at the end of the year claimed to have made 15 per cent profit on its transactions. Where did they make the profit? Clearly on the twine they bought from the Consumer's Cordage Company, and evidently that company was able to make twine very much cheaper than either the Central Prison or the Brantford Company. There to my mind is a complete demonstration that no such combine existed even on that article, and there has been more said about the alleged combine on binding twine than on any other article manufactured. But while the Minister of Marine declared that the existence of combines is admitted, we have the Finance Minister, who is at the head of this department, with which we are dealing at the present time, stating, that he has no evidence before him at the present time to warrant him in taking action under this clause. Only a short time ago I asked the following question:—

1. Is the Government aware that there exists at the present time in Canada, any trust, combination, association or agreement of any kind among the manufacturers of any article of commerce, or the dealers therein, or any portion of them, to enhance the price of such article or in any other way to unduly promote the advantage of such manufacturers or dealers at the expense of the consumers, and where such disadvantage to the consumer is facilitated by the customs duty imposed on a like article when imported?

2. If so, in what manufactures do such trusts or combines exist?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to reduce the duties at once on any articles affected by any such existing trust or combine?

The Minister of Finance replied as follows:—

From general information obtained by them, the Government believe there are in Canada some associations of the character mentioned in the question, but the information in their possession is not sufficient to call for a reduction of the duties at present.

So after eighteen years of Conservative rule, after eighteen years of protection—and the Finance Minister declares that protection leads to combines—the Finance Minister is not able to discover in this country a single combine of such a character as could be dealt with under the clause which we are asked to enact at this time. What is the clause for, if it is not to be used for some political purpose. We do not object to a law to suppress combines, but what we on this side of the House object to, is the form in which this law is brought before the House. This resolution is unfair in many instances, and it is our duty to oppose it. Suppose for example a trust or an agreement is entered into amongst the dealers in an article; why should the manufacturers of that article be punished simply because the dealers have brought about a combine? The manufacturers may be perfectly honest, and they may sell their products at a fair value not unduly enhancing the price by reason of the protection which is given them, but because the dealers are guilty of combining to enhance the price the manufacturers who are carrying on a legitimate business, are to be punished and their industry ruined. Again, Sir, I object to this clause because I believe that it is impracticable and unworkable, and I object to it further, because it is carrying out the system of governing this country by Orders in Council, a system of which we have already a great deal too much in Canada. This clause is impracticable in many respects if it is intended to be given effect to, because its results would be altogether different from anything which the House would knowingly give its approval to. Let us for a moment apply it to a few articles. Take for instance tobacco. There are only a few tobacco manufacturers in this country, and there is no manufacturer in respect to which a combine could be more readily brought about. Now, do these gentlemen on the Treasury benches mean to tell us for a moment, if a combine should be found to exist among the tobacco manufacturers of this country, that the duty is to be removed from tobacco, that it is to be placed on the free list, that the revenue which is now derived from that article must be collected in some other way, and that innocent people must be called upon to make up the large revenue which is derived from that source. Again, suppose the distillers of this country should form a combine to enhance the price of spirituous liquors—and it is just as easy for them to combine as any one else—what are the Government going to do? Are they going to take the duty off whisky, and put whisky on the free list? No doubt some people would think that a boon, but it is a strange procedure that these gentlemen should seek powers to put whisky on the free list, when we are told that in a few days we are going to have a Bill placed before us to tax every man, woman, and child in this country $2 a year in order to make up the loss of revenue of $8,000,000, by reason of the enforcement of prohibition. It seems to me that this whole measure is so utterly impracticable, that it would be better that the Government should now withdraw this clause, let us go on with the tariff and get through the business of the House, and let us go home feeling that we have done something in the interests of the country.

Mr. TAYLOR. The argument advanced by the hon. the leader of the Opposition has not been answered by either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The hon. gentleman from Kingston (Mr. Britton) tried to answer it to some extent. He saw the force of the argument of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) but he failed to catch the exact meaning. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) took the suppositious case, that the Canadian manufacturer had a combine, and after selling their output to the merchants it was discovered by the Government that this combine existed. The manufacturers were tried by the judge and jury constituted by this resolution, and a decision was arrived at to take the duty off cotton, and the hon. gentleman held that the merchants who purchased their supplies before the duty was taken off, would be losers by this, and should be compensated. Now that was not the argument of the hon. the leader of the Opposition. He claimed that a number of manufacturers might go into a combine and that a number of others engaged in the industry might stay out of the combine, and that the innocent would be punished with the guilty, if this resolution were given effect to. I know of a combine existing in the United States to-day which includes some eleven manufacturers, and there are two or three in the same line of manufacture who are not in the combine. The members of the combine say that these three who stay out cannot affect the market much, because they produce a limited quantity, and so those in the combine go on and enhance the price of the goods. The same thing might very well happen in Canada. Some five or six manufacturers in a certain line might form a combination, and some two or three others might remain out. The members of the combine would say: We can manufacture to supply seven-eighths of the supply of the country, and we will allow these two or three to remain out and sell what they can. Now, if the Government decides there is a combination in this line, and after putting their judge and jury to work they find that these six or seven manufacturers combine together, they will at once remove the duty under the operation of this law. Then what becomes of the two or three honest fellows who did not join the combine? Their industry is ruined by the removal of the duty, and these are the men who should receive compensation. My hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton) did not bear in mind the case of these men, but he only spoke of merchants who purchased goods before the combine was struck at by this resolution. What can be the meaning of this resolution anyway? The Government bring down a tariff which they say is not for protection, but a tariff for revenue, and they put on a duty of from 20 to 35 per cent. Now, will the Minister of Finance tell me how any manufacturer in this country can unduly enhance the price of any article he produces, over and above the tariff which the Finance Minister says he put on for revenue purposes. If there is a duty of 25 per cent for revenue purposes upon certain lines of manufacture, and if the manufacturers of such articles undertake to combine to raise the price to more than the 25 per cent, why, then, the importers will get their goods from a foreign country, and thus prevent the manufacturers from unduly enhancing the value. Here is what the resolution says, and the idea of proposing such a thing to an intelligent Parliament is all humbug:

That whenever the Governor in Council has reason to believe, as respects any article of commerce, there exists any trust, combination, association or agreement of any kind among the manufacturers of such article, or the dealers therein.

Now, as regards that, it must be remembered that some articles are not produced in this country. Suppose the tea importers form a combination to unduly enhance the price of tea. How is the Finance Minister going to punish them? He cannot remove the duty on tea because there is no duty on it. What is the use of bringing down a law to this Parliament that is a fraud on the face of it?

The millers of this country have an association, and suppose they should decide to put up the price of flour that is made of wheat grown in this country, and which is protected by a duty of 12 cents per bushel. Where would be the Hon. Mr. Cummings, the gentleman who opposed my friend and colleague the Hon. Mr. Wood, the member for Brockville? Mr. Cummings is the president of that association and combination. Will my hon. friend say that he must break up that association by removing the duty from wheat and the duty from flour? Whom will that hit? It will not hit these millers very hard, but it will hit the farmers of this country, just as will the removal of the duty on pork. The effect will be the same in the case of the millers as in the case of the pork-packers. How are you going to punish the guilty without also punishing the innocent by this law? Speaking for myself, and I think I voice the feeling of every member on this side of the House, if the Government come down with a fair and honourable proposition to deal with combines, we will support it—that is, if combines exist under this revenue tariff. If it is a revenue tariff, there cannot be combinations formed under it, except up to the extent of the duty imposed; because as soon as the manufacturer of or dealer in any article increases its price beyond what the duty will permit him, imported goods will come in. But let them come down with any fair and honourable proposition. If the law that has been read by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) to-day is not strong enough, let them come down with a proposition that is strong enough, and every member on this side of the House will support it. But they will oppose, as long as they feel opposition to be necessary, the placing on the Statute-book of a proposition so infamous as this one. It is not an honest proposition, it does not bear honesty on its face, but it is simply a weapon in the hands of the Government to be held over the heads of the manufacturers of this country. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) a few moments ago contradicted the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and asked him to mention a hotel-keeper in the province of Ontario who had been interfered with. My hon. friend did not mention a name, because he did not remember one at the moment. I remember one case, and I will mention it. Some years ago, when I was a boarder at the Grand Union Hotel in this city, which was kept by the late John Graham, he was cautioned that if he took part in an election, he would lose his license. He did lose his license. The late Hon. Alexander MacKenzie was boarding there at the same time I was, and he was the first man to sign a petition asking Sir Oliver Mowat to restore the license which had been unjustly taken away. Let the hon. member for North Wellington refute that statement if he can. Every hotel-keeper in Ontario knows that the license law has been held as a club over the hotel-keepers of that province, and my hon. friends opposite want to smuggle into the tariff law this section, to hold it as a club over the manufacturers of this country. I say it is the duty of the Opposition to stay here not only this night, but this month or three months rather than permit such an infamous law as this to be placed on the Statute-book of this country.

Mr. CLANCY. I just wish to say one word, not for the purpose of continuing this debate, but in answer to what the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) seemed to think a complete reply to the hon. ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster). That hon. gentleman stated, as a justification for the position now taken by the Government, that it was precisely the plan adopted by the Conservative party when legislating on similar lines. It has been pointed out that that was with regard to legislation dealt with entirely by Parliament, and not relegated to the Ministry. If it be true that the Government are proceeding on the same lines, then I ask why introduce this legislation? If that was the object, was it not better for Parliament to deal with the matter than to place it in the hands of the Ministry? But the hon. gentleman said that he agreed with the Minister of Finance that this resolution was for the purpose of deterring and preventing combines rather than for the purpose of punishing those engaged in them. If it is to prevent them, then it would seem that they do not exist now, and if they do not exist what is the necessity for dealing with them? If combines do exist now, clearly they should be followed up. The hon. gentleman found one combine, which he said was in nails. Let us see how they deal with nails. The old duty on cut nails was three-quarters of a cent a pound. Hon. gentlemen brought down a new scale, imposing on them an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent, and taking off the three-quarters of a cent a pound. But the combines was staring them in the face, and they put back the duty to  $\frac{1}{2}$  a cent a pound. In the old tariff wire nails had a duty on them of one cent a pound. Hon. gentlemen opposite changed that to 35 per cent ad valorem, and then they changed it back to three-fifths of a cent a pound. I would like to ask how they can reconcile that action with the cry against combines. Did they not have it in their power, backed up by a strong majority, to wipe out that combine if it existed? And if it did not exist, their mouths are closed. The cry of hon. gentlemen opposite from one end of this country to the other was that the National Policy was the parent and the fruitful source of combines. If that be true, hon. gentlemen are bound not to ask for a measure of this kind, but to take the power before a single item of this tariff is passed, to make it impossible to combine. They gave the people to understand that the moment they came into power, they would, by removing every vestige of protective duties, put an end to combines. They see the difficulties of the arguments they used in the past. They must destroy every industry; but, failing in that, they seek to put into the hands of the Government of the day the right to be the accusers as well as the judges. The mere fact of an agreement having been entered into, even the goods have not been at all appreciably raised in price, will bring those who make the agreement within the power which hon. gentlemen are now seeking. I shall not enlarge upon the question. The contention on this side of the House seems so overwhelmingly and completely unanswerable that it is amazing to me that hon. gentlemen would continue to ask their followers to give them such powers. It seems almost incredible that they should persist. I admire the courage of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), who, I think with great difficulty, found himself this afternoon compelled to dissent from this proposition. I hope hon. gentlemen will not be put in the false position of being obliged to serve their party before they serve the country, by giving their assent to so monstrous a proposition as this.

Mr. BENNETT. I think the Opposition would be utterly wanting in their duty did they not prolong the discussion on this clause of the tariff, in view of the fact that they have succeeded in making at least one convert to-day in the person of the hon.

member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), and I hope, if only for the purpose of keeping the hon. gentleman's company, that before this debate closes some other hon. gentleman on that side of the House will come to his assistance. We are very much to be congratulated on the fact that the hon. member for Kingston has seen fit to announce to the House that he cannot support the Government on this question, because, with all due deference to other hon. gentlemen opposite, the hon. member for Kingston stands prominently on that side of the House. In view of the fact that he is a leading member of the Bar of the province of Ontario and that furthermore for the past few years he has been engaged in a quasi judicial position under the Government, in that quasi judicial position the hon. gentleman's mind doubtless became enlarged and widened very considerably, which fact no doubt it was caused him to break away from his party allegiance.

Discussing this whole question from its very inception, it must be seen that the clause is most unworkable. At the outset it provides that if there be any reason to believe that any article of commerce—and before leaving that point, let me say that it must be patent to the whole House that the greatest confusion must arise from that very term. Take the case of the lumbering industry. Two or three lumbermen in a particular section of the country, who know the requirements of that section, may agree among themselves to fix certain rates for certain kinds of lumber which they alone are in a position to sell. What would be the result of this agreement? It must be that the Government may decide to sweep away the duties upon lumber. Then take the case of the farmers. It is often a matter of complaint among them that in seeding time, some three or four of them, who have a certain amount of seed grain to offer, will raise the price. What will be the result? If during the seeding season, two or three farmers have a large quantity of seed grain to sell and combine to raise the price in excess of the ordinary market rate, immediately there would be a complaint from the other farmers that a combine has been established, and the Government would be forced to appoint judges in every part of the Dominion to inquire into such matters. There could be no restriction placed upon what may be included in the term "articles of commerce" and every industry and trade would be harassed by complaints brought before the Government under this clause.

It seems to me that the second clause will give rise to the greatest amount of trouble. That is the clause which provides that a judge shall inquire into the question whether a combine exists or not, and after that, what is certainly the strangest and most striking part of the whole proceedings, happens. Why, fancy, if one can, a judge in a criminal court presiding over the case of a man charged, we will say, with arson. He inquires into all the facts, and after he has done so, the case is taken out of his hands, and he has to send it to the Minister of Justice and ask him what he proposes to do in the premises. That is what these hon. gentlemen proposed. They do not say that the judge shall inquire into the facts and then adjudicate upon them, but all they empower the judge to do is to report the facts, and then this mighty tribunal of thirteen,—and the number is a fateful one; I hope they will not meet with other than political death during the year—is to decide what will be done with the alleged culprit. If political power is to be exercised, that will be a most opportune time to exercise it, and the very fact that hon. gentlemen opposite have remained silent—because the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), whom we have succeeded in convincing and taking out from the broad path to the narrow path, is the only man on that side who has endeavoured to say a word on the question—is pretty convincing that the resolution is one which they do not feel competent to defend. True, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) vigorously came to the rescue, and brought all his legal acumen to bear on the subject; and when he found himself light in his law, he made up for that by his vehemence. Well, while I congratulate himself on his vehemence, I cannot say that that is the proper way in which to address a legal argument. But he managed to arouse the enthusiasm of his followers, who apparently do not want any legal argument at all but simply violence of demonstration, and the hon. gentleman gives them all the vehemence they can desire on every possible occasion. The section then provides that the Governor in Council may, if they decide that a combine exists, place the article in question on the free list or so reduce the duty as to give the public the benefit of trade competition in it. Well, if there is a defective clause in the whole Bill, it is this one, because it does not meet the case that must be often met and is met to-day and has always been met in the past, and that is that in the very articles which are free of duty, trusts and combines are frequently formed.

But the Administration have been very indulgent. They first of all brought down their first tariff measure, and then, in the most generous way, said it was utterly improper and they withdrew it. It cannot be supposed that they withdrew it as a matter of volition on their own part, but simply because they were amenable to reason and argument; and when to-day we find an hon. gentleman on their own side declaring that this clause is wrong, surely we might, with some confidence, ask them to go a step further and withdraw it altogether. If they should do so, they would have ample opportunity between now and next session to still further improve their legislation.

The hon. Finance Minister said to-day that although he had searched the records of the protective policy for the last eighteen years, he had been utterly unable to find a single case of the existence of a combine.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I never said so.

Mr. BENNETT. Then the hon. gentleman was very much misunderstood on this side.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am sorry for that.

Mr. BENNETT. I can only say that I am surprised the hon. gentleman did not deny it before, because his statement had been referred to on this side several times without contradiction. I would now ask the hon. gentleman, who is so vigorously after the combines, whether he will tell us of any one case or the existence of a combine under the protective policy.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I believe that a number are in operation in this Dominion, but from and after the 23rd of June they ceased to meet, and I believe they are in a state of suspense at present; and if this resolution passes, they will not resume operations. I believe there is a combine in this Dominion to-day which not only seeks to keep up prices to the limit of the tariff but has absolutely paid money to Americans not to bring goods into the country.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman has not answered the question. If there are so many combines, if their name is legion, it should be all the more easy to mention one. I am sure the House will be pleased to hear the hon. gentleman name a single instance.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have named a case. I did not say they were legion, but I said there were a number, and my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) knows as well as I do what they are. Reference has been made to some of them to-day and they have been discussed across the floor. Some, no doubt, continue to exist. Evidence was given before the Tariff Commission as to one. Not only was it admitted that there was a combine to keep up prices, but it was admitted that they had paid foreign manufacturers not to send goods into Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. How would the present resolution touch them?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. To the extent of the duty.

Mr. FOSTER. But they could still continue to pay the foreigner.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But if the duty were taken off, they would not do so.

Mr. FOSTER. That is too thin.

Mr. BENNETT. It is here provided that:

The Governor in Council may make such regulations as may be deemed advisable for the effectual conduct of such inquiry.

If the inquiry is to be conducted on the same line as certain inquiries held with a view to the removal of officials, it will be farcial for the accused to enter upon a trial, because there would be a pre-judgment before the case was heard. In some of these inquiries I refer to, the privilege has actually been denied to the officials of having counsel to appear in their behalf. Is that to be the case here? There is no guarantee that it will not be. The result may be, that, at a moment's notice, an investigation will be sprung upon a person and the privilege of having counsel denied him. I think the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) touched the key-note when he said that he saw in this resolution the fine Italian hand of Sir Oliver Mowat. This is altogether in the line of legislation that has been effected for years past in Ontario, everything being done with the one view, that of suppressing all opposition by keeping as many as possible of those who might oppose under threat or menace. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) contended that this was not done in the administration of the liquor license law. But he did not remain in the House and did not undertake to refute the statements made upon this subject. It is a notorious fact that in the province of Ontario the liquor License Act has been used simply to terrorize and terrify persons who hold licenses. Hon. gentlemen on the other side who come from Ontario will recall that in the city of Toronto, in one of the past elections, there were openly placarded before the public the very checks obtained from license holders in that city with a view of obtaining renewal of their licenses. And they were obtained by whom? By a gentleman who was a candidate on behalf of the party of the present Government and who is now the librarian for the legislature of Ontario, Mr. Preston. Why, Sir, the same principle has been carried out in the administration of the courts. There was a time when the county court judges had the privileges of appointing the county court clerks and bailiffs. That power was taken away from the judges and handed over to the political heelers and supporters; and the experience in my own riding is that the parties who have been appointed to these positions have generally been partisans, and partisans of the vilest kind. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not the privilege of resorting to the liquor administration or the administration of the courts, and, forsooth, they have to come down to this interference with the commerce of the whole country. And they find this is objected to even on their own side by the speech from the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton). They have already seen fit to withdraw the Bill which they first introduced, thereby acknowledging that it was faulty and wrong. I think they should withdraw the Bill now before the House, and, in the few months to elapse between now and the next session, they might inquire closely whether such combinations do exist; and, if they do not exist, there will be no necessity for the passage of such a law as that now before the House.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I have listened very attentively to the debate on this tariff clause which is now under the consideration of the House. The hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches, as well as those who sit behind, have been challenged to mention a few cases of the existence of combines, and they have been unable to find a single case of a trade or industrial combination. It is alleged that combines exist in this country and that this clause has been introduced into our fiscal legislation in order to enable the Government to wipe them out. I am of opinion, in spite of what has been said by my hon. friends on this side of the House, that there exists in Canada a huge combine and that there are to be found here several monopolists. Within easy reach of the Chair where you sit, Mr. Chairman, I see across the floor of this House the most dangerous of all combinesters, sitting on the Treasury benches. There never existed in any country a worse or more dangerous monopoly than that brought about and carried out by the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches and those behind them. That monopoly consists in centralizing everything into the hands of the Government. Not satisfied with embodying in the tariff the most objectionable features, calculated to injure and harass our industries and trade, the hon. gentlemen have thought it fit to insert this clause 17 now before the House, a clause under which they will be enabled to crush out those industries which foreign competition has not yet wiped out.

Now, this is a most despotic, a most tyrannical and most dangerous clause. Although the late Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) has pointed out the dangerous nature of this clause, still none of the hon. gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches, or their followers, have risen and contradicted his statement, or tried to weaken the position taken by my hon. friend. The people of this country are not minors, nor are they willing to submit to the guardianship of the hon. gentlemen opposite, or to hand over to them the management of their own private business. What our industries and trade require is a strong combine law, enabling them to put down monopolies and fight combinesters, and with such a law it would be an easy task to kill combines, without those industries requiring the interference of the Government. While endeavouring to find the means of overcoming the existing evils, the Government, under this clause now before the committee, are applying a remedy much worse than the disease itself, one that will result in destroying the energy and spirit of enterprise in the industrial people of this country. As a matter of fact, the Government are on the eve of inaugurating in this country a kind of paternalism, and making an attempt at controlling even the private business of our citizens; and should such a combine law long remain on our Statute-book, I have no doubt it will result in killing the spirit of enterprise among our people, and they will look up to the Government as the source of prosperity and the dispenser of private wealth. There is not the least doubt that in their vain attempt at general control, the Government will never be able to manage the private business of the community, and their policy of centralization of power is doomed to a complete failure. I said, at the outset, that the most dangerous combinester that existed in this country was the Government of the day, with their policy of centralization of power. Now, this is a most dangerous monopoly. The Government have already evinced this, as already stated by those who addressed the House before me, when, under clause 16 of this tariff, which was carried, they managed to submit the products of home industries to foreign competition, and behold now, under the pretense of protecting the poor consumers, they ask us to vote clause 17, under which they will have an absolute control over our industries. Now, with our industries crushed out under the operation of clause 16, and every vestige of energy and spirit of enterprise destroyed in our people by means of clause 17, under the pretense of reaching monopolies, the consumers of the country will be at the mercy of foreign monopolists, and of competition from the outside, for all the commodities which they have to buy. Let, therefore, the Government leave out that clause 17 and give us a strong law, because if that clause be put into operation, it will merely result in our industries being wiped out of existence. Such will be the result of the law now before the House. And when several of those industries which are now supplying our people with the necessary commodities, are destroyed, when our mills are closed down, we will find ourselves under the control of British monopolists, with this reduction of duties of 25 per cent in favour of English exporters. It is always a matter of surprise to me that the people of this country, who are represented in this House by men of their own nationality—I mean to say the Anglo-Saxon element of our people—should entrust the management of our home industries to the Government of the day; and I cannot really understand how it happens that the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches and the hon. gentlemen behind them should give to the Government of the day such undue and improper powers in dealing with the industries of this country; because, as remarked by the late Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), if the Government wipes out a Canadian industry, such as, for instance, the cotton or the iron industry, the consumers will have to buy the iron and cotton imported from Great Britain or from the United States. Now, as those industries would no longer have to face the competition of our industries in the Canadian market, they would hold an undisputed sway over our market, and one still more dangerous, and far more objectionable, than the one they have destroyed in our national industries. This clause 17, far from offering to the consumers the protection which the Government are bound to give them, is a menace to their interests. Let the Government give to manufacturers and consumers alike the same amount of protection; and while you give the manufacturers the benefit of a good law, allow the consumers the right of practically enforcing that law, because, after all, they are better informed than the Government as to whether those combines are detrimental or not to their interests, and whether the prices of commodities and of the necessaries of life are unduly enhanced by the manufacturers. It may happen, as just stated by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), that some manufacturers or dealers make an agreement or enter into partnership, in order to administer their common interests or their trade, without their action being in the least detrimental to the consumers. I object further to this clause, because I hold that the power which it proposes to entrust to the Government is a very dangerous one. This clause would prove, in the powerful hands of the Government, a most effective weapon to hold over the head of the manufacturers of this country; by this means the screws might be put on them and large sums of money extorted from them for election purposes. Investigations in connection with these mutual agreements, would be calculated to ruin the credit of powerful industrial companies; and even should it turn out that those manufacturers have not unlawfully enhanced the prices of their products, so as to warrant a lowering of the duties on similar products imported from abroad, these investigations, I say, would prove disastrous to business men. The very fact of holding an investigation of that character is sometimes sufficient to ruin the credit of a powerful company. But, as I just said, the chief danger arising from this clause is that it might lead the hon. gentlemen into temptation, politically speaking; as they might be tempted to extort large sums of money from the manufacturers at election times. Let one of the Ministers, not over-scrupulous, turn round and tell a manufacturer: We need $10,000 for election purposes; and unless you give us that sum, we are going to hold an investigation. The hon. gentlemen will easily understand that those manufacturers, in order to get out of the clutches of the commissioners, will subscribe to the terms of the Government, and then the hon. gentlemen will boast that they have educated the people, and raised the tone of public morals, as they did recently, in the county of Champlain.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) That's the principle you acted upon on your side of the House.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) We never could act on that principle, because we never had on this side, any policy of centralization of power. Never did the Conservatives, when in power, introduce such a tyrannical combine law. The hon. gentlemen on the back benches, as the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) ought to understand, that it was in the interest of the Government of the day that I offered that suggestion, that they might not succumb to the temptations which those in power are liable to; for, as the hon. gentleman is aware, it is better even for men of adamant virtue like his friends not to be too frequently tempted or beyond their power of endurance. With such attempts at centralization of power as those embodied in the measures now before the House, the danger is already great enough for the Government without the hon. gentlemen on the back benches entrusting to them any more power. Let them not forget that he who courts danger will fall into it. Now, were this clause carried, the Government of the day would be exposed to a formidable danger, that of extorting money from manufacturers for election purposes and for bribery and corruption. There is a further objection to this clause which was pointed out a little while ago, by one of my hon. friends on our side of the House. The hon. gentlemen remember how shocked the Liberals in the province of Quebec were, how indignant they felt at the appointment of certain commissions of investigation, a matter which the hon. member for Montmagny has often brought to the attention of the House. Why then, I ask, do the hon. gentlemen opposite propose to import the judicial authority into this matter, and have judges inquire into a legislation which concerns only the Government. I am of opinion that you drag the ermine in the mud when you impose upon a judge such duties as are involved in an investigation of this character, in view also of the fact that there will often be great manufacturing interests at stake, and that the judge will have to conduct this investigation in the way determined upon by the Government. For a Government to impose upon a judge so onerous a duty, and to use him as a tool for their political purposes seems to me a prostitution of the judicial authority, under the circumstances. I hope the hon. gentlemen opposite will realize the dangerous nature of such a legislation. I have, upon several occasions, heard the hon. gentlemen, when they sat on this side of the House, raise their voices and thunder against some measures which were at different times introduced by the Conservative Government. When, for instance, certain measures came up before the House, as the redistribution of seats in 1892 and the franchise Bill in 1885, we then heard, I believe, the hon. gentlemen thundering against the attempts of the Conservative Government at administrative and legislative centralization. Now, what were those so-called attempts at centralization on the part of the late Government, if we compare them to the undue powers the Government of the day are given under this clause? The Government, after handing over Canadian industries to foreign competition from Great Britain first, then probably from Germany, Holland and Belgium, later on; not content with having brought about by crooked means the triumph of the fiscal policy of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), now under this clause 17, assume the power of crushing out the industries of the country whenever they think fit. This clause, I hold, is the boldest attempt at administrative centralization yet made in any British colony; it is the most outrageous legislation ever introduced yet in the Canadian Parliament, and the like of which will never be introduced after the hon. gentlemen now sitting on the Treasury benches will have vacated them. Never did the Conservative Government during their long lease of power, ever attempt—withstanding all that has been laid to their door by the hon. gentlemen opposite, the passage of any legislation at all comparable to this most outrageous measure they are now asking this House to adopt. After enacting clause 16, under which they take the power of granting to whomsoever they please the preferential treatment as to the reduction of duties, and having constituted themselves the only judges as to increasing or diminishing the revenue of the country, the Government are attempting now, under this clause 17, to constitute themselves the judges as to the best means to be taken to crush out, whenever they choose, our Canadian industries.

Mr. McCLEARY. I promise the committee I will detain them but for a few moments in giving my reasons for voting in favour of the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition, as against the resolution moved by the Minister of Finance. My first objection to the resolution is that it savours too much of the kind of legislation we have been accustomed to in the province of Ontario by the Liberal party ever since their accession to power in that province, for more than a quarter of a century, namely, legislation to keep themselves in office. Any hon. member of this House who is at all acquainted with the history of the Liberal party in Ontario, knows that from the day they came into power in that province down to this hour, they have never ceased to place upon the Statute-books of that province laws which denuded the people of their liberty of franchises in many regards, laws which were placed there for the sole purpose of fencing themselves in office and keeping their party in power. When the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) to-night referred to the fact that Sir Oliver Mowat's hand could be seen in this legislation, he spoke a most profound truth. No one can read this resolution but can see the hand and read the thought of that pastmaster in political scheming. Why, Sir, what is his record in the province of Ontario, and the record of his party? The first thing he does when he comes to power is to look over the field and see what he can do in order to establish himself in power; and, as has been stated by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) to-night, the first thing he does is to invade the municipalities of the country, and to take from the county councils, from the councils of cities, towns and villages, the rights and privileges they have enjoyed for years, and he arrogates to himself and to his party in Toronto the right to appoint every officer from the sheriff down to the clerk of a division court, and the bailiffs in that province. Then, Sir, not content with that, he saw a broader and a more lucrative field in which to operate, and he at once sets out to build up a machine which has done great and powerful work for him on election day. He saw that the liquor interest of the province of Ontario was a big concern, that the municipalities formerly controlled and looked after that business, and inspected it in a manner satisfactory to the people. But he said to himself: If I can get this under my control, I will have a leverage by which I should not only raise my party to power, but keep them in power for all the years I will be able to manipulate it. And, Sir, he has succeeded, and to-day in the province of Ontario, notwithstanding the fact that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) contradicted the statement of the hon. member for West York, there is not a county in the province, there is not a city in the province, but can rise up and bear testimony to the truth of the statement that the license law has been used most iniquitously, and unjustly, and unfairly, against the Conservative party, and men have been deprived of their liberty to go to the polls and vote as they conscientiously would like to do. Does any one ask me for names? Why, in my own county I know of a hotel-keeper who kept the only hotel in which you could get a night's lodging in the village. Because he refused to vote for the reeve of the municipality, the reeve threatened him and said: You will not get a license next year. And for two years that man was kept without a license, simply because he would not vote for the reeve of the municipality. Not only do they deprive men of the right to vote according to their conscience, but they manipulate the granting of licenses as well, for political purposes. In my own county one of the oldest settled counties in the province of Ontario—and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will believe me that the statement I now make is as true as the ten commandments—in the centre of the county which I have the honour to represent, a hotel-keeper was given a license for no other reason—I must apologize for calling it a hotel, because it was a building that had neither window, nor door, nor floor in it, and the sheep that were grazing along the road went in there for shelter from the sun—but there was a license given to that man in order to help keep a certain gentleman in the county of Welland in line with the party.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Was he a Conservative?

Mr. McCLEARY. No, he was not, or they would not have given him the license. The hon. member from Hamilton (Mr. Wood) knows well how they manipulate licenses in his own city.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the line of discussion the hon. gentleman is pursuing now is out of order. He should confine himself as much as possible to the item under discussion.

Mr. McCLEARY. I am going to be very brief, Mr. Chairman, I am only illustrating the fact that the Government, now in power, is pursuing exactly the same course to retain power as the Liberal Government have been pursuing in the province of Ontario. Now, surely that is germane to the question. The hon. member for Hamilton reminded me that the man of whom I was speaking in the county of Welland who got the license was not a Conservative. I told him that he was a Reformer. And I can tell him about how they manage matters in the city of Hamilton. He knows as well as I do that in 1894, when the city council of Hamilton desired to reduce the number of licenses—

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). And they did do it.

Mr. McCLEARY. Yes, but how did they do it? How did the commission grant licenses? They said: We will not grant any licenses until after the election, and they held that whip over every man who wanted a license until after the election was over in the month of June. But not only does the Ontario Government pursue these tactics in regard to licenses in that province, but in regard to educational matters as well. They have even tried to make a political machine of that. Why, Sir, the Government have formed one of the most rigid combines that exists in this country, and the farmers, the artisans and mechanics of that province have to pay for their school books 25 and 30 per cent more than they would under fair competition. Not only have they put that kind of a law on the Statute-book but they went further, they went to the city of Toronto and passed an Act by which it was impossible for the electorate of that city—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not think that subject has anything to do with the question under discussion. I would ask the hon. gentleman to confine himself to it.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me point out how it is perfectly germane. The argument of my hon. friend is this, that this legislation is simply a policy of centralization of power, that by clause 16 this Government have centralized into their hands a power which was never before taken by any Government of this country, the power of making commercial treaties with any country in the world. They follow that up by a piece of machinery which places in the hands of those thirteen men, power to terrorise and draw political influence to themselves from the whole of the manufacturing industries of this country. My hon. friend is opposed to that, he wants to show to independent men on that side of the House, if any remain, that this is the same tendency which the Liberal party in the province of Ontario has carried out most thoroughly.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not understand that the last part of the speech of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McCleary) has any bearing upon the question before the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, Chair.

Mr. FOSTER. The Chairman has not called me to order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. The Chairman has stated what he thinks should be the trend of the discussion, and I am arguing the point of order. The Chairman has not ruled on the point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Before you give your ruling, Mr. Chairman, will you allow me to state the argument? The argument was that not only were the Liberal party, in regard to licensing, centralizing powers in themselves, but that in educational matters the same thing was going on; and my hon. friend was stating that the Liberal party was evidently going to carry out the same policy by this clause.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman had closed that part of his argument, and had passed to another point, which had no bearing on the clause under discussion.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member for Welland has the floor.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to ask, Mr. Chairman, what is your ruling.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. I have a perfect right to do so.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. I know what my rights are. My rights are that when the Chairman gives his ruling, I have a right to ask him in regard to it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member for Welland was referring to an Act which had been passed in Ontario, not the Act concerning education, but another Act, which, as I understood the hon. gentleman's language, had no bearings on this clause.

Mr. FOSTER. What Act?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is the reason why I asked him to confine himself to the matter under discussion.

Mr. McCLEARY. If the Chairman is quite sure I have the floor, I should like to proceed. With all due deference to the Chair, I may say that I would be very sorry to intrude any matter upon this committee outside of the question in debate. I was trying to illustrate by examples of legislation in Ontario, that the party which has come into power here under the guiding hand of Sir Oliver Mowat, who was the leader and Premier of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario, was falling into the same kind of errors as had been committed in that province—the centralization of power, the Government fencing themselves in office and preventing the voice of the people being fairly and honestly heard and giving fair-play to all parties when an appeal was made to the electors. I was going on to show that the Liberal party has unfairly dealt with the electorate in our province, that they have in fact legislated against the party to which they were opposed, that they really elected a man in Toronto by Act of Parliament and established minority representation there. I sincerely hope there are enough independent members behind the Government who will endeavour to lose sight of their party allegiance and vote for British fair-play in this regard.

Mr. LANDERKIN. We always do so.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. McCLEARY. I do not think I have much to expect from the hon. member for East Grey.

Mr. LANDERKIN. No, you cannot expect anything from East Grey.

Mr. McCLEARY. The Greys have got mixed up. The spirit of this resolution is bad, it is contrary to the genius of British institutions, it is opposed to British fair-play; and I am therefore in favour of the amendment proposed, to give the courts the right to say when wrong has been committed and not leave that right with the Government. I am surprised that instead of calling in a judge, the Government have not seen fit to make it the duty of the member representing the riding where a manufacturing combine is supposed to exist, or the defeated candidate, to decide whether there is a combine or not. That is a scheme by which hon. gentlemen opposite hope to bolster themselves up in dismissing civil servants. I have felt it my duty to give my reasons, as the representative of one of the counties in Ontario, why I shall vote against this resolution. My strongest reason is, because I think it is a piece of political jugglery, and not for the benefit either of political morals or commercial interests. I believe it was conceived and brought forth for no other purpose than the political aggrandisement of the party in power, and I have been trying to illustrate although hon. gentlemen opposite would not accept with grace my illustrations, how the Liberal party has succeeded in Ontario in this regard; and I would warn the representatives in this Dominion Parliament to escape from and abandon the paths of wrong doing, which have been trodden by the leaders of the party in our province, and give us law for the people, by the people and with the will of the people's representatives, instead of placing on the Statute-book this sort of class legislation, making this Government a huge combination by which they hope to be able to control the manufacturing and commercial interests for purposes which I believe should be beneath any government to stoop to adopt.

Mr. KAULBACH. It was not my intention to say anything on this subject this evening, but as I am not anxious to see myself recorded as being in favour of a resolution of this kind, which is not creditable to legislation and entrusts to the Government too much power, I feel I should express in a word or two the sentiments I entertain. The resolution is very clear, inasmuch as it takes the control of this trade matter entirely out of the hands of Parliament and places it in the hands of the Governor in Council, a course which I condemn on the ground that the Government should bring in a Bill whereby the courts of the country should deal with matters of this kind, instead of having them dealt with in a clause embodied in the tariff resolutions. For eighteen long years it has been agitated by the Opposition, that the National Policy was the parent of combines and monopolies, which I deny. I feel that the Government should drop this clause entirely, and allow a Bill to be so framed that this matter can be dealt with properly by the courts of this country. It may happen in some cases that combines are useful and in the interest of the consumer. For example, if there should be two or three or more companies running an industry, and they find that they are maintaining that industry under difficulties, or at a loss, and under different management and under one head, these industries could perhaps be brought under one management successfully, and so curtail expenses and lessen the cost of production so as to enable them to place the articles they manufacture at a lower rate on the market. Then combines are an advantage and in that case the consumer would benefit, instead of, as he has been told throughout Canada, that he was supporting the Conservative party who were the upholders of these bloated monopolies. It is our duty on this side of the House knowing these facts to protest against this clause being embodied as part of the tariff resolutions. In numberless instances we have found that as far as combines are concerned, the old tariff has proved in the interests of the party.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. KAULBACH. I should have said, that it has been found in certain cases to form combines, it was in the interests of the country, and for the reason that the consumer found that employment which he otherwise could not have secured at home.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. KAULBACH. I am glad to find hon. gentlemen opposite express their cordial approval of my sentiments. The Government must feel, that by this they are simply assuming a power which, perhaps, may prove beneficial to themselves as a political party, but under the circumstances, it is most unfair that that power should be extended to them for that purpose. I am therefore anxious to show to the country, and to the people whom I have the honour to represent, that I disapprove of this clause in the tariff resolutions as most objectionable.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the motion is put, I wish to ask the Minister of Finance a question. A few moments ago he made the statement that no combines existed in Canada since the 23rd of June, but later on he made the further statement that during the investigations made by the tariff commissioners he had information that a combine did exist in Canada, and that they were paying money to United States manufacturers to stay out of this country. I want to know how he dealt with that combine, or if it has been dissolved, or is it in force yet? It came under his attention and he knew it to be a combine. Has he dealt with it in the tariff, and has he placed these goods on the free list, or what has he done?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) could answer that, for I suspect that he knows a good deal about that combine.

Mr. TAYLOR. I only know from the Minister in a vague way that some combine did exist. I do not know what he refers to.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Are you sure?

Mr. TAYLOR. It may be agricultural implements or anything else for all I know.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Is it shovels or spades?

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, we have in our town an industry making shovels and spades, but there are several other similar industries in this country. There is a very large one in Montreal, and another in the province of Nova Scotia engaged in the same line. There is strong competition in Canada. I know that in the shovel industry in the United States there is a combine, but whether our people are in a combine or not I do not know. But I do know, and I believe, that this Government has fostered one of the hugest monopolies and combinations it is possible to conceive. I heard the statement made to-day by a gentleman in this House, that previous to the introduction of this tariff, and previous to the elections this Government were approached by a huge monopoly in the United States, the Standard Oil Company, and the arrangement was made with the Standard Oil Company, you contribute so much to the election fund and we will pass legislation in your favour. The legislation favourable to the Standard Oil Company has been passed, which is the best guarantee that the Government carried out the terms that they made with the Standard Oil Company, provided the oil company put up half a million dollars to help the Liberals to carry the country.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) if he is not interested in the shovel and spade factory in Gananoque, and if he does not know, as a matter of fact, that that company, with others, are paying to the shovel combine in the United States a certain sum per year, to refuse to send their goods into Canada.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) I would just say this: I have no interest whatever in the shovel industry in Gananoque—probably not as much as he himself has. I do not know anything about their paying money, except from the evidence taken before the commission which I saw reported in the newspapers. That is all I know about that, but I do know that my hon. friend (Mr. Wood) is an importer, and I have been credibly informed that as soon as the tariff was laid on the Table of the House offering preferential trade to the United Kingdom, or to the world, he sent samples of Canadian shovels over to foreign countries to have his goods made there, and imported into this country and sold here.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I simply say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) could not have heard any such statement, because no such thing has ever taken place. Now, Sir, to confirm the statement that I have made here, that there is a combine in this country to keep American shovels out of the Canadian market, I will read a couple of letters which I think will satisfy the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) himself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Dispense.

Mr. BENNETT. Take it before the Inquisition.

Mr. TAYLOR. Better show them to the Government and let them deal with it under their tariff.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. So they will.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). My firm wanted to buy some spades and shovels, and we sent to the States to get the prices, as we wished to keep our friends on this side of the line in check. We were always willing to buy Canadian goods when we could buy the same article at the same price. We wrote to two or three parties in reference to the matter, and here are two of the replies :

Philadelphia, December 30th, 1896.

Messrs. Wood, Vallance & Co., Hamilton.

Gentlemen,—In further reply to your favour, we would say that the associated shovel manufacturers of the United States have made an agreement with the Canadian manufacturers which will prohibit our filling further orders for export to Canada for the present. Therefore, we are unable to quote you, as desired. We hope, however, you will bear us in mind, and should any change occur, we would be pleased to quote you in the future.

That is from the George Griffith Shovel and Spade Manufacturing Company of Philadelphia. Here is another :

Anderson, Ind., January 20, 1897.

Wood, Vallance & Co., Hamilton.

Gentlemen,—In reply to yours of the 18th inst., we would say that on account of previous arrangements made with Canadian manufacturers, we are unable to make you quotations, as per your request, at the present time.

Yours truly,

WRIGHT SHOVEL COMPANY.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. TAYLOR. I trust the hon. gentleman will send those two letters to "Hansard" so that they may be reported in full, because there is a clause in the first one which he did not give in full.

Mr. WALLACE. The significant point, it appears to me, in the letters just read is this, that a corrupt bargain, or a wrong bargain, or some kind of improper transaction, took place between a Canadian manufacturer and a United States manufacturer. The wrong has been done by these two parties to the transaction. The Government steps in and destroys the Canadian industry, and invites the United States industry to come in and supply our market. They put the United States manufacturer on the head, and say, "You are a good boy; though you have done a wrong equally with the Canadian, we will put the Canadian in jail, and invite you to come over and take his market; we have nothing but good-will for you." That is the result of the proposed arrangement. Yesterday they made an arrangement by which they gave the American manufacturer advantages in the Canadian market in many respects; and then they say, "Let us look round and see in what other way we can benefit the citizens of the United States. We will enable the United States merchant practically to do all the retail business in Canada by charging no duty on goods up to 50 cents in value; that will be quite a bonanza to the wholesale dealer, the retail dealer and the small manufacturer." And now they propose, in their fatherly care and great solicitude for the United States, to add something more. In this case they punish the Canadian who has done wrong, and reward the American who has done wrong. That, I think, should be sufficient to prevent the enactment of this clause. But we find hon. gentlemen opposite who are interested in Canadian manufactures. That is no crime. We are glad to see men invest their money to build up industrial establishments in this country, and to give employment to our own people. These are commendable things, and such men are not to be sneered at, even if they are members of the Government, because they have an experience which should be a benefit to this country. But when you come to consider the practical results of these combinations which are illegal and improper, you may find the boys in Brantford, when they see this clause, saying to each other, "What are we going to do about this?" The others say, "Oh, daddy's on the engine, do not be afraid." They know they are not going to be interfered with so long as "dad is on the engine." The argument used by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McCleary) was a very cogent and applicable one. Here we have imported from the province of Ontario a gentleman who had been for many years the Premier of that province, who by a system of devices had not only controlled the hotel interests, but had used his power in so many different respects, such as appointments to office and the creation of new offices, that he got wound around him a great many interests. And he comes down here in this larger arena, where by clever manipulation he might dictate to thousands, just as he dictated to hundreds in the province of Ontario. We know that these gentlemen who have been engaged in Dominion politics would not of their own accord have thought of these little tricks and devices; or if they thought of them, they would not have sanctioned them. But we have this gentleman coming down here; and, seeing that his scheme had been so successful in the province of Ontario, he proposes to apply the same recipe to the Dominion arena, in the hope of accomplishing the same results here. The scheme is to give the Government of the day full control over the manufacturers of the country, so that they can threaten them; and, if this does not succeed, they can put the machinery of the law into motion and take off the duty, which will have the effect of destroying the industry. In view of these facts, I would ask the Government to reconsider this clause. To strike it out altogether would be my proposal; but I am anxious that they should have a record for some good legislation, and I am sure that if they pass that clause with their majority it will condemn their whole Tariff Act. Strike out that clause in deference to the great public opinion which is so strongly expressed by this side of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. As it is now half-past twelve and several hon. gentlemen on this side wish to speak, I would suggest an adjournment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no; go on.

Mr. FOSTER. If clause sixteen was an important one, this is equally important, equally dangerous and equally subversive of well understood usage. We have now discussed it for six hours, and I think it is time that we should adjourn.

Mr. DAVIN. I feel it incumbent on me to give my views on the clause now under discussion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. I fancy that I ought to be in Parliament.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The returning officer thought so too.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I beg hon. gentlemen to keep quite and listen to the hon. member for West Assinibola (Mr. Davin.)

Mr. DAVIN. If my feelings as a partisan were stronger than my feelings as a citizen of this country. I should be inclined to rejoice at these manifestations on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, but in British history the party that has taken not the least interest in parliamentary institutions and helped to make them what they are to-day in England, is the Liberal party. But what do we find? We find in this country that the moment the Liberal party gets into power, they put their hands upon the jugular of parliamentary government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. I never met man or mob that could make me fear. I have stood before hostile mobs and made them, after half an hour, as quiet as tame mice. I do not say that I am before a mob now, but, Mr. Chairman, you may be perfectly certain that, if not to the intelligence of my hon. friends on the Liberal side—and I will say this, that in this Parliament there is more intelligence on the Liberal side than I have ever known in any Parliament. It is not merely in quantity, but in quality. Not merely have they swelled in numbers but they have risen higher in intelligence, and I am very glad of that, because I am sure, Mr. Chairman, if you will not think it impolite for me to say so, there was room for it.

Now, I say that my hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) did not err on the side of exaggeration in describing this clause, which, I say, is if anything, more important than the previous clause. I say that it puts parliamentary institutions on their trial when hon. gentlemen in a Parliament like this, introduce an institution that has been dead in England for three hundred years—introduce the Star Chamber into this free Canada. After an arraignment of great power by different speakers has been made with regard to that clause, we find my hon. friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Davies) goaded into a few remarks which showed that he had been stung into reply, but evidently the remarks that stung him into replying had not gone to the root of the matter, because they did not lead him to call on that legal acumen which I know he possesses.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. I may say this to hon. gentlemen opposite, that I am going to make for this Parliament and the people of Canada my arraignment of this clause if it takes me all summer.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You will escape a protest by that.

Mr. DAVIN. I hope that my hon. friend, when he interrupts, will take off his hat, because as hon. gentlemen opposite have got into power and high society and are all lords and hon. gentlemen, and have become very great people, I hope the hon. gentleman who used to be a little rough when on this side, will get as polite as the rest of his associates and take for his motto, as the rest of them do: Let us be genteel or die. I want to call attention to the character of this clause which, I say, introduces the Star Chamber into Canada. The clause reads as follows:—

That whenever the Governor in Council has reason to believe that, as respects any article of commerce, there exists any trust, combination, association or agreement of any kind among the manufacturers of such articles, or the dealers therein, or any number of them, to enhance the price of such articles or in any other way to unduly promote the advantage of such manufacturers at the expense of the consumers, the Governor in Council may commission or empower any judge of the Supreme Court or Exchequer Court of Canada, or of any Supreme Court or High Court in any province of Canada—

To do what? Now, I see an eminent Ontario lawyer—Mr. Lister—in the Chair presiding over this Committee. To do what, Mr. Chairman? To take evidence, in order that, as the latter part of the clause—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Lister). Order, order.

Mr. DAVIN. I can wait until hon. gentlemen are ready to let me proceed. You will observe, Mr. Chairman, that the last words I used were the "latter part of the clause." If the hon. gentlemen are prepared to let me finish the sentence, I will go on.

Mr. TALBOT. Go on; it is all right.

Mr. DAVIN. The latter part of the clause provides that the Governor General may pronounce judgment. And let me call attention to the language. It is left to the judgment of the Governor General in Council whether they will act or not. What is the process? Somebody intimates to the Governor in Council, that is the Ministry, that a combine exists. Then, these thirteen or fourteen men—or fifteen or sixteen, because some of them have no portfolios—assemble in that Privy Council room where so many famous men have met, and discuss the question whether any action will be taken at all or not. Well, Mr. Chairman, you are an experienced politician, and you know what elements of the case will be taken into consideration. I do not care whether the Conservatives or the Liberal party is in power, the result would be the same. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) is an experienced politician and he knows that whatever party is in power, under a clause like that, the moment the complaint is made in that council, there is an opportunity for the exercise of political influence. Suppose that a combine is made up, in whole or in part of strong friends of the Government of the day. A gentleman is in the corridor outside the Privy Council room waiting to be heard or he sends in his card to one of the Ministers. Suppose, he asks to see the Minister of Public Works, who is not only a statesman but a politician, not only a man capable of governing an empire, but capable of pulling wires for the whole universe. Hon. gentlemen will see that I have given a correct description. Suppose that this gentleman is a friend of the Minister of Public Works from Quebec and he says to him: Why, you are going to hit at our best friends in the province of Quebec. What will happen? Well, the Minister of Public Works will go back to his colleagues and say:

An hon. MEMBER. Business is business.

Mr. DAVIN. Probably he would say that, for not only is he capable of governing an empire and pulling wires for the universe, but, since he has become a Minister, he has developed the character of a proverbial philosopher. Not only has he given us the proverb "business is business," but he has announced the original apothegm "Honesty is the best policy," thereby sending a thrill of surprise through the whole Dominion. Another of the Ministers would probably be sent for to see somebody from Ontario who would tell him: You are striking at our best friends in Ontario; what are you about? Will you tell me that the Government will not pause before striking at that combine? You know it would. I am not saying that as against the Liberal party. Any Government would do it. Put the Conservative party in power and put this terrible clause in its hands, and the result must be the same. In heated debate, I used the word "bandit." It was in the early part of this session or last session, and I thought that the Government party had stolen all the planks in the Conservative platform, and so I used the word. But, is not this a bandit clause, to enable men to go out in the highways of politics and hold up every man who they think has political influence or who is in a large way of business.

An hon. MEMBER. Is that what you have done?

Mr. DAVIN. I have been twenty years in politics, and ten years in this House, and I can safely say that my political life will bear close scrutiny and lynx-eye inspection.

Mr. BELCOURT. It is going to be very short now.

Mr. DAVIN. Is it? No doubt my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) would be glad of that. But let him not lay the flattering unction to his soul that if he and others could cut short my career in Parliament, they can take the power from my brain or the fire from my blood. Out of Parliament I was before I came here, and just as influential, politically, as I am to-day and I should be as influential as I am to-day if I were out of Parliament. And let the hon. gentleman not suppose that I would not be, to the same small extent that I have been in the past, a force, whether I am in this House or not. Of course, the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) would be glad to get me out. No doubt it would be a good thing to drive out of Parliament such men as I am and fill the House with such large-brained, large-souled, tremendous fellows as the hon. member for Ottawa. If we could only fill this House with gigantic members of the type, the fine, genteel type, the broad-cloth type of the hon. member for Ottawa, it would greatly increase the influence of Parliament. So far as I have seen the exploits of the hon. member, I will say, leaving all joking aside, that I think Parliament and Canada could be very efficient without such little petits maitres as he.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. I say that seriously, not as a joke; and it is my deliberate judgment of that very refined gentleman. I will now pursue my argument. Suppose the combine consists of men who are not in favour of the Ministry of the day. The Ministry, of course, will decide to strike them. But before that can be done, what will happen? Why, a shrewd politician like some of the hon. members I have mentioned, will go to the Ministers or will send somebody to speak for the combine. We know the kind of men who will be sent. Why, it has been done in my own constituency. A man was about to be hit, was about to be destroyed, and they said to him: If you will give up supporting Davin and support somebody else that will be put up, it will be all right. And the same thing will happen here. They would come to these men and say: If you will support the Liberal party, it will be all right. The report will come to this Star Chamber that these men were recalcitrant and would still vote Tory. Then the fiat would go out: Let the judge deal with them.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend had better agree that we should adjourn for to-night.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. FOSTER. We are quite able to stay here all night.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright.) We are perfectly aware of that, from our past experience. However, there is no particular use in exhausting ourselves in this way. What time do you want to conclude this disquisition?

Mr. DAVIN. It will take me about two hours.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Oh, I am speaking to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be concluded in two minutes if my hon. friend and his colleagues would do the right thing by that clause. But provided they are stiff-necked and don't intend to, we will try and give them the bridle and let them go their own way by six o'clock to-morrow night.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That is a reasonable proposition. In that case, I move that the Committee rise and report progress.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.45 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 3rd June, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DISMISSAL FROM LACHINE CANAL.

Mr. MONK asked:

1. How many years has David Dame, of Côte St. Paul, been employed by the Government of Canada on the Lachine Canal?
2. Why was he dismissed from his position on Dredge No. 2?
3. Was there any complaint against him? If so, what was the nature of the complaint, and by whom was it made?
4. Who was named to replace David Dame, and by whom was the new nominee recommended?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: 1. David Dame was employed on Dredge No. 1 for twenty-one years and on Dredge No. 2 for eight years. 2. His services were dispensed with at the request and upon the representation of the members of Parliament for the Montreal district. 3. No written complaint was lodged in the department. 4. S. Whelihan was appointed to replace David Dame.

DISMISSALS FROM KINGSTON PENITENTIARY.

Mr. TAYLOR asked:

1. For what reasons were Keeper McConville and Guards Pugh and Appleton dismissed from the Kingston Penitentiary on the 23rd day of December, 1895?
2. Were these men charged with any offence against the prison regulations?
3. Were these men ever granted any investigation either before or after their dismissal, or were they ever allowed a chance to put in a defence?
4. Was any other investigation ever held in regard to the dismissal of these three officers?
5. What was the result of that investigation?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: 1. For inefficiency. 2. They were charged with having allowed a convict to escape. 3. At an investigation held subsequent to their discharge, and at which they were represented by counsel, they were given full opportunity to file evidence bearing on their case. 4. Previous to their discharge the matter was investigated and reported upon by the warden. 5. The suspension of Pugh and Appleton, and, subsequently, the dismissal of Pugh, Appleton and McConville.

COMMERCIAL AGENT TO JAPAN.

Mr. INGRAM (for Mr. Bennett) asked:

Has Mr. Geo. Anderson, of the Royal Oil Company of Toronto, been appointed a commercial agent to Japan on behalf of the Canadian Government? If so, what is his salary?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). In reply to the first question I beg to say, yes. In reply to the second, he has been appointed for a period of four months at a salary of $300 per month.

RELEASE OF A CONVICT.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of my hon. friend the Solicitor General to the case of the release of a convict in the Kingston penitentiary. No one appreciates more than I do the great desirability of not thrusting upon the House any questions in connection with the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, except in extreme cases, but not only has there been a paragraph going the rounds of the press in regard to this matter but my attention has been specially called to it, and, therefore, I feel impelled to ask my hon. friend for an explanation of the circumstances under which a convict, who was serving a life sentence, was recently pardoned. I find that this convict was convicted in 1887 and sent to Kingston for life for vitriol throwing. He was proved to have been a hardened criminal, who had already spent fifteen years in penitentiary in England. He was there pardoned on the occasion of the Queen's Jubilee in 1887, and came to Canada where he committed this very serious crime. According to the newspapers, his case was investigated by the late Sir John Thompson, on a petition for his release, and the petition was not entertained. Recently, however, a recommendation for pardon was made, and this convict was allowed to escape after ten years imprisonment.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). My hon. friend gave me notice last night of his intention to ask for an explanation, and I looked up the record.

Mr. TAYLOR.

While I had not time to go into it very thoroughly, I think I have sufficient information to answer my hon. friend except with regard to dates. As a matter of fact, that convict was tried by the police magistrate of Toronto for an offence over which he had no jurisdiction. He was tried ten years ago, and the matter was brought up before the late Sir John Thompson, when Minister of Justice, but the fact that the magistrate had no jurisdiction appears to have escaped the attention of all the parties in the case. It escaped the attention of the counsel of the accused as well as of the Crown Prosecutor and also of the magistrate, and does not appear to have been brought to the notice of Sir John Thompson. However, quite recently, this lack of jurisdiction was discovered and brought to the notice of Mr. Murphy, Q.C., who defended the prisoner at the time. The magistrate then joined with Mr. Murphy, counsel for the accused, in an application to the department for a remission or commutation of the sentence. Naturally enough, the attention of the department was drawn to the fact that this man was illegally detained in the penitentiary, and should not have been there at all. He was, in fact, illegally committed. Then the pardon was granted, for the lack of jurisdiction in the origin vitiated all the subsequent proceedings. The question was suggested by Police Magistrate Denison, whether, the accused having consented to come before him, that ratified the position the magistrate took, and obviated the difficulties that arose from the want of jurisdiction; but, after having considered that question, we came to the conclusion that that consent would not give jurisdiction in a case of this kind. I may add that the magistrate himself, in a letter written to the Minister of Justice, stated that his intention originally was to recommend a pardon at the expiration of ten years, independent altogether of all other considerations; and I will give to my hon. friend the name of another gentleman very high in authority who joined in the application for the pardon. It is not necessary, however, to go into these details, because the matter is absolutely concluded upon the question of jurisdiction. Speaking for the Minister of Justice, I may express my obligation to my hon. friend for having given me the opportunity of making these explanations.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

On section 17,

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Chairman, last evening I dwelt on the first part of clause 17, pointing out the character of the tribunal proposed by that clause, and I was proceeding to refer to the next feature of the clause, namely, the introduction of a judge. That provision in the clause in no way gets rid of the objections which have been stated from this side of the House. Let me point out to the committee what is provided :

The Governor in Council may commission or empower any judge of the Supreme Court or Exchequer Court of Canada, or of any Supreme Court or High Court in any province of Canada to inquire in a summary way into and report to the Governor in Council whether such trust, combination, association or agreement exists ; with power to such judge to compel the attendance of witnesses and examine the same under oath, to require the production of books or papers, and with such other necessary powers as may be conferred upon him by the Governor in Council for the purposes of such inquiry.

There you have a second time the introduction of the French system of an interrogatory, which, like the first part of the clause, is contrary to our ideas of British justice. The clause goes on :

If such judge reports that such trust, combination, association or agreement exists, and if it appears to the Governor in Council that such disadvantage to the consumers is facilitated by the customs duty imposed on a like article when imported, then the Governor in Council may place such article on the free list.

A third time the question, what shall be done with the peccant combine or the supposed combine, is inquired into. At the commencement of my remarks last night, I used the phrase "star chamber." That may be thought to compare great things with small ; but I will ask the attention of every member of the House on both sides to the history of the Star Chamber, and I will show that this clause, in the powers given by it, and the motives for enacting it which are put forward, bears a strict analogy to the fact of Henry VII., which, according to the most competent authorities—although there is a dispute about that—was the means of introducing the Star Chamber into England. That Act recites :

The King, our said Sovereign Lord, remembereth how, by unlawful maintenances, giving of liveries, signs and tokens, and retainders—

And it goes on to mention a number of instances in which justice miscarries, and then provides that a committee of the Privy Council associated with judges should be appointed—that committee which afterwards became so notorious in English history. Now, the introduction of the judge is supposed to get rid of the objection to the political character of this tribunal ; but I have an authority here—which cannot, certainly from that side of the House, be questioned—that you cannot rely upon that feature, for I find in "Hansard" of 1896, page 1668, that this was said :

Sir, the hon. gentleman finds fault with that. The hon. gentleman knows the condition of things in this country. I have nothing to say against the bench. I am prepared to admit everything he said in honour of it. But, Sir, judges are men like all other men ; and the hon. gentleman knows very well that whatever may have been the practice before 1878, since that time all appointments to the bench have been made, not so much for judicial fitness, as for the reward of political service. I am sorry to have to speak in that way ; but, Sir, I speak the truth as it is known to every man in this country. That there are men whose political services were not ignored when they were appointed to the bench, but who are a credit to the bench, I admit ; but suppose every man appointed to the bench were ever so free from partisanship, we have all had sufficient experience of life to know that unconsciously, whether Liberals or Conservatives, we grow into one groove of opinion ; and happy is the man who can say that he is never biased by the opinions of his life. Judges on the bench continue to be human. I do not impugn their motives or their good intentions ; and fortunately at this moment it is not necessary for me to do so. But, Sir, who can say, when a case arises, especially one of a political nature, that the judge on the bench is not biased by the political opinions he has held during his life ?

This is the language of the present Prime Minister, and it is fair to suppose that among forty-five or fifty judges—because any judge of a Supreme Court in Canada is eligible for this position—the man would be selected whose well-known bias would serve the purpose which the men using him in that judicial capacity would require. Now, Sir, one of the defects of the Star Chamber, and one of the reasons why it became such an evil influence, and of such evil-fame in England, was this, that avowedly it acted in cases not examinable in other courts. Now, here is a tribunal established, because you are establishing a tribunal that will act in cases not examinable by other courts. Another charge against it was that of indefiniteness. Can anything be more indefinite than this court, in its constitution and in its functions, will be ? But not to labour this point, I will merely quote what Anson says in his Law of the Constitution, page 25 :

Thus, the jurisdiction of the Council, dangerously indefinite, but on the whole salutary in its exercise under Henry VII., had become a formidable engine of oppression before the death of Elizabeth.

This tribunal we are now discussing has that bad feature of the old Star Chamber. And again on pages 28 and 29 this feature of the old Star Chamber is brought out, that it was exercisable at discretion. There is nothing to compel this court, this quasi-judicial court, to act. The initiation is with the political body, that body of men who, when the matter is brought before them, may have recently come through a hot political fight, and there is nothing whatever to compel them to take any action ; it is entirely at their discretion. Now, here is what is said on that head :

So long as the King could use the indefinite jurisdiction of the Star Chamber for the infliction tion of punishments for political offences, it was possible for him to issue proclamations which would be enforced by fine or imprisonment in the Star Chamber, although disobedience to them might not constitute any offence recognizable by the common law courts. It is true, that the use of this power of James I. led to a precise definition by Sir E. Coke of the legal effect of such proclamations, a definition which, as I have elsewhere pointed out, is a locus classicus for the statement of the relations of Parliament and Crown in the making and enforcement of law. But while the Star Chamber was at the service of the Crown, it represented a judicial power residing in the executive, limited by no settled rules, exercisable at the royal discretion, and alleging the interests of government as the ground of the exercise.

In a country like this the man who stands in the relative position of the King is the Prime Minister of the day; and if you read the Prime Minister in there, every word of it will apply to this new and formidable court you are about to establish: "But while this committee of the Governor in Council is at the service of the Crown, or represents a judicial power residing in the executive, limited by no settled rules, exercisable at the discretion of the Prime Minister, and alleging the interests of the Government as the ground of its exercise." Then, again, it was inquisitorial. That is one of my great objections to this clause, it is inquisitorial, and therefore contrary to the spirit of the English law. Anson says at page 97:

Thus, while we have two courts, both of them exercising inquisitorial and judicial powers, we find that one makes only an occasional use of those powers, and is engaged mainly in administrative work.

But he refers to the inquisitorial character as the dangerous feature. Now, as English history went on, we find that this court did what all courts do, and what, so far as may be convenient to the Government of the day, this court of which we are now speaking, will do, it tried to extend its powers. In volume II. of Hume, I read of this court at page 558:

Early in Henry's reign, the authority of the Star Chamber, which was before founded on common law and ancient practice, was in some cases confirmed by Act of Parliament. Lord Bacon extols the utility of this court; but men began, even during the age of that historian, to feel that so arbitrary a jurisdiction was incompatible with liberty; and, in proportion as the spirit of independence still rose higher in the nation, the aversion to it increased.

Sir, in the same way we, in this colony of a British Empire, see that such a court as will be established under this clause, in so far as it affects the subjects of Her Majesty in this colony coming within its purview, is inconsistent with liberty. It may extend its authority, and encroach on the jurisdiction of the courts. Now, I want to call attention to what Hume says, at page 146, vol. IV.:

Mr. DAVIN.

One of the most ancient and most established instruments of power was the Court of Star Chamber, which possessed an unlimited discretionary authority of fining, imprisoning and inflicting corporal punishment, and whose jurisdiction extended to all sorts of offences, contempts and disorders that lay not within reach of the common law. The members of this court consisted of the Privy Council and of judges, men who, all of them, enjoyed offices during pleasure.

Just as those who would sit here would practically hold—with the exception of the judge, and he would be appointed ad hoc—they would practically hold their offices during the pleasure of the Prime Minister:

And when the Prince himself was present, he was the sole judge, and all the others could only interpose with their advice. There needed but this one court in any government to put an end to all regular, legal and exact plans of liberty; for who durst set himself in opposition to the Crown and the Ministry, or aspire to the character of being a patron of freedom while exposed to so arbitrary a jurisdiction?

Now, here again the court that will be established under this will have an arbitrary jurisdiction. How can men be said to have the liberty that they should have in a free colony like this, if they may at any time be haled before an arbitrary tribunal that acts on its own discretion, and that has none of the safeguards that belong to the courts of the country? My hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood) last night referred to the case of shovels. There was a case that you should meet, but this clause won't meet it. This clause won't meet the case of any number of men, either, who are in partnership, or in business combination, and who combine with somebody on the other side of the line. If the initiation of the combine takes place on the other side of the line, this clause will in no way enable this court to deal with it. So that the only case that could be dealt with is the case of a combine within the limits of Canada, and which, in the first place, the Committee of the Privy Council, and in the next place, the judge, should decide that they were combining unduly to enhance a price.

Now, is it to be thought for one minute that any such case will ever come before such a tribunal as this? Mr. Chairman, the fright of having to be brought before such a tribunal will be enough for those manufacturers, and any penalty that those exercising this power wish to inflict, will be gladly borne. When Sir John A. Macdonald was in power, we had accusations made that he obtained for election purposes, in the Red Parlour, large sums from the manufacturers. I happen to be in a position to say that there was no foundation for that statement, that it was a complete mistake on the part of those who made the charge. But it is perfectly clear that those who made the charge thought it was a common occurrence for politicians to demand certain help from manufacturers. If they take that view and determine to act upon such a principle as that, here is a clause which will bring a court into existence that will not meet the cases, that will not help the people to strike at the combines, but will be a pistol in the hands of politicians to hold up manufacturers on the high road of politics. Suppose the Standard Oil Company make an arrangement with a number of gentlemen in Canada. You cannot strike at that combine—there is nothing in this clause to enable you to strike at such a combine. It will not meet such a case as the member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) called attention to last night. The only thing this clause does is to place a weapon, a powerful sword in the hands of the Government whereby, under the guise of exercising a judicial function, they may strike home and exact one of two things, on the eve of an election large subscriptions to the election funds, or from terrified manufacturers political support. Any hon. member who has been in business or has had dealings with business men knows how exceedingly nervous business men and manufacturers are, and therefore, looking at the clause in the last form it has assumed, it seems to involve danger to the liberty of a large class of the people of Canada, and it holds out a false light to the mass of the people. We are all anxious to prevent combines to raise prices to the consumer. It is perfectly right to organize combinations in order to lower the cost of production, but it is a wrong time to organize to raise prices to the consumer. All are anxious to prevent the formation of combinations such as were referred to by the hon. member for Hamilton; and, under these circumstances, why should not this committee take the proper course, as is suggested by the amendment? If it be true that the criminal law is not strong enough, why should we not add clauses which would bring every form of combination within the purview of the criminal law and give the courts power to deal with those cases? The courts would act impartially and without suspicion being aroused, whereas under present circumstances, if there was a combine composed entirely of Reformers, and it was desired to strike it, and was brought before the attention of the Privy Council, we know that the first result would be that influential deputations of leading Reformers would wait on members of the Administration, and say to them: you are proceeding against our friends. If, however, an unfounded complaint were made by some portion of the public that a combination existed, and no action was taken, then they would think that justice had miscarried and that favouritism had been exercised, and thereby uncertainty would be created throughout the entire country. If hon. gentlemen wish to strike at the combines, let them submit a clause that will attack them in an absolutely effective manner, one separate from a tariff, with which it has no real connection, and do not place before the committee a clause like this that will bring into existence a power, not as great, but strictly analogous to the old Star Chamber, capable of being used in the same spirit and relatively to the same extent—a clause that cannot reflect credit on the Government introducing it, or on this Parliament, and which can only be useful to accomplish a sinister end, and that will place in the hands of the Government a weapon with which to strike at political foes under the guise of attacking combines.

Mr. CARGILL. I rise merely to enter my protest against the passing of this clause. I have several reasons for doing so, some of which I will state to the committee. Many arguments have been used against the passing of this clause, notably those delivered by the hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). In addition we have had the able and eloquent argument submitted by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and if anything were wanting to induce me to vote against this resolution or to convince me of its absurdity, the argument just advanced by the hon. member would decide the matter. What can be the aims and objects of this resolution? I can see no other object than this, that the resolution is for the purpose of giving the Government influence and control over the manufacturers and dealers in the products of this country. The present Government will be able to use this legislation very effectively from the practice which they introduced previous to recent Dominion elections. At that time they formed a combine with the Patrons. I had in my own riding a Patron as my opponent. He had been a Conservative. Objection was taken to him for that reason. Steps were then entered upon to displace him and replace him by a Reform Patron. The Reformers of East Bruce do not like the Patrons any more than the Conservatives do, but, having consented to be represented by a Patron in place of a Liberal or a Conservative, they thought it better to have a Liberal-Patron representing them. The result was that a convention was called by the Reformers of the county. At that convention the Patron delegates constituted a majority of those assembled there. In consequence of that, instead of getting a straight Liberal, a Liberal-Patron was nominated. After being subjected to a series of questions by the delegates present, as to whether he adhered more strictly to Patron or Reform views, and getting the answer that he was a Liberal first and a Patron second, the Patron-Liberal delegates joined him and gave him the nomination. It was then arranged that the Patron candidate was to have two or three days to consult the lodge to which he belonged as to whether he should accept the nomination. He attended a meeting held by the Conservative-Patrons and stated that he had received the nomination of the Reformers and Patrons of the county, but if the Conservative-Patron in the field would retire he, the Reform-Patron, would stand and not oppose him, but would turn in and give his support to the Conservative-Patron, and the Liberals would join hands with him. That combination was not successful, and I succeeded in being elected for East Bruce against the combined efforts of Liberals and Patrons.

I object to this clause because it does not propose to deal with all the industries we have in this country, and I believe that legislation should not be discriminatory, but that it should refer to all our industries and to all classes of the community. At the present time we have lumber being imported into Canada, and the lumber industry has never been protected in this country. I would like to know how the present Government propose to deal with the Canadian lumberman, suppose they saw fit to organize a combine to extort from the consumers of lumber in this country, profits over and above what they are entitled to. This clause provides that if a combine is discovered the only way in which it could be dealt with is to deprive the manufacturer and producer of that particular article, of the protective duties placed on his products. In that way this law would place the Government in a position to say to the manufacturers of this country: A rumour is afloat to the effect that you are a party to a combine. That would give sufficient reason for the belief that a combine existed, and all that is necessary then is to notify a judge to go to work, and summon witnesses, and make a report to the Government. I would like to know if upon the eve of a general election several combinations are discovered in this country, and if such an investigation took place, and it was established beyond doubt that those combinations did exist; would the Government of this country put this law into force or not. I rather think it would depend altogether upon the price of votes at that particular time, and on the number of employees that each manufacturer had in his employ.

Now, if the present Government proposed to put a law upon the Statute-book which would effectually stamp out all combinations in this country, they would have my cordial support. I am adverse to combinations of all kinds, although I believe that some combinations have had a good effect upon the country. For instance, combinations have been organized for the purpose of facilitating the manufacture of certain products, and for the purpose of economizing the expense in connection therewith. In these cases the prices have been lowered to the consumer, and in that way they have been beneficial. I might mention in this particular the Massey-Harris firm, the head of which is said to have amassed two or three millions of dollars. We all know that after that combination was organized, the prices of agricultural implements were reduced very materially, and the farmers of this country received the benefit of that reduction. I think, Mr. Chairman, if this clause is retained it should be amended so as to prevent any persons from forming combines. It is quite plain, however, that legislation of this kind will enable the Government of this country to form the most gigantic combine that was ever perpetrated upon any free people. It will enable them to go to the manufacturers throughout the length and breadth of this country, and say: We have an election pending, we want your support and influence and if we cannot have it we will originate an investigation, prove that you have been a party to a combine, deprive you of the protective tariff which has been given you for a number of years, and close up your industry. The clause places too much power in the hands of the Government, and for this reason I have very serious objections to it. When this Government came into power I expected a great deal at their hands, and the people of Canada expected to derive material and great benefit from the present Government. I am very sorry to say, Sir, that the result is not such as I anticipated. We have a Government said to be composed of business men, but I think there are only two business men included in it, and the rest are all lawyers or professional men. In the formation of this Government apparently there could not be found in the rank and file of the representatives on the Liberal side of the House, men of sufficient calibre to compose the Ministry; and so, in order to get able and intelligent men, the Prime Minister went outside and selected the Premiers and ex-Premiers of the various provinces in the Dominion. That, I think, was unjust to these gentlemen who sat in the House of Commons day and night and fought out the battles of the Liberal party. We have therefore a Government composed of the representatives from different provinces; men who in their respective spheres have distinguished themselves, men who as leaders in their respective provinces have held the most prominent positions, and I am surprised that a Government composed of men, who hitherto must have legislated in the interests of their constituents in order to retain power, would introduce such a clause as this in a tariff Bill. In conclusion, I appeal to the Government again, and I say to them that if they will withdraw this resolution and introduce a Bill effectually dealing with combines and which will have the effect of extinguishing combines, I will give them my cordial support; but I conscientiously feel that I cannot endorse their action as set forth in this resolution.

Mr. SNETSINGER. I wish to make a few remarks with regard to the amendment before the House. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) asked if there were any combines in this country. I can point out combines in this country. We have had combines, not only among the cotton mills of Cornwall, but in other branches of manufacture as well. The existence of a monopoly in cotton manufacture in this country has obliged many people to leave the country because they could get no employment here. The nail combine has been the most scandalous combine that we have ever had in this country. Two years ago the nail combine made four advances in their prices—first 50 cents, then 40 cents, then 20 cents, and then 10 cents; a total advance of $1.20 in the price of nails to the consumers of this country. I regret very much that the Government have seen fit to advance the tariff on nails above what it was in their first resolution. Thirty-five per cent was quite enough protection for the nail manufacturers. The hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) talks about manufacturers being compelled by the Government to subscribe to election funds. I have no doubt that not only manufacturers but contractors have been used in that way to a large extent by the late Government.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Mr. SNETSINGER. I know it.

Mr. DAVIN. I know it was not so.

Mr. SNETSINGER. I know that the hat has been passed round among manufacturers in the city of Montreal during the last ten or fifteen years. So I do not wonder at the hon. gentleman being excited in regard to this clause. I hope the present Government will never do anything of the kind.

Mr. DAVIN. Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SNETSINGER. Manufacturers in the city of Montreal have themselves told me that they have been asked to subscribe, and did subscribe, to election funds; and I know that contractors have been subscribing to them. They do not deny it; they told me so themselves. I hope this Government will never ask anything of the kind. It is time that sort of thing should stop. I regret very much that the Government have made changes in the duties on nails and cottons. These changes, I think, are not in the interest of the people of this country, and I hope they will change them back again. The reduction in the duty on cotton to 15 per cent, in the interest of the shirt manufacturers, I do not think is in the interest of the cotton mills of this country. I would like to see the combines in this country destroyed, and they would have been destroyed if the American Government had acted fairly towards us. The tariff would have been put down to such a point that no combines would be possible in this country. I would like to see sugar made free, and duties placed on tea and coffee. Raw sugar especially should have been made free, and enough left on refined sugar to protect the refiners of this country, and no more. When hon. gentlemen talk about combines, I want to remind them that the policy of the late Government was the means of creating combines in this country. It is time they were destroyed, and I think this Government will have very little trouble in destroying them. I am prepared on the whole to accept the tariff resolutions, but I regret that the Government have made some changes in the duties as originally brought down, and I hope they will put them back to where they were at first.

Mr. MARTIN. I think the power asked for by the Government in this resolution is an extreme power, and should not be granted by this House. While hon. members of both sides are prepared to deal with combines, it is a new thing to introduce such a remedy as that proposed by the Government, in a tariff resolution, which will not reach any appreciable number of them. A preferable way to deal with combines and trusts would be to introduce a Bill specially for that purpose. How do the Government propose to deal with combines in other countries? It has been said here, and said truly, that the largest combine in the world exists at present in England, that great free trade country, in the article of cotton thread. Perhaps the next largest in the world is the Standard Oil Company in the United States. There are many other large combines, which are a menace to the industries of Canada; and if the Government took steps to prevent these combines injuring the manufactures of Canada, I think they would be taking a preferable step to the one they are now taking. They may reduce the duty on some articles, and as a result Canada may be flooded with that article from the country to the south of us by some combine or trust there. The combine may at first introduce the article into this country at a low price; but as soon as they get control of the market, they can raise the price again, and eventually the cost to the consumer will be greater than it would be if the article were manufactured in this country. How does the Government propose to deal with that? If they are sincere, if they are anxious to deal fairly with the producer and consumer, let them propose that when articles manufactured by a combine or trust in the United States or in Great Britain or in any other part of the world are imported into Canada, the duty on those articles will be increased. Let them give the manufacturers of this country fair-play. But they appear to be after the manufacturers of this country with a gun.

They appear quite willing that the manufacturers of this country should be slaughtered by the combines of the country to the south of us, which is noted for its combines. If they wish to put down combines in goods coming into this country, let the duty be doubled or increased on these goods. We are to be relieved from the operation of combines in our own country, but subjected to the operation of the combines of a foreign country. I think such a proposal as I suggest would be a remedy, but to say that the Government should be given this most arbitrary power is to reverse the principles of responsible government and injure the manufacturing industries and the interest of the consumer. For that reason I have much pleasure in supporting the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition.

Amendment negatived, on division.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved to amend the said resolution by adding in the fourth line the words "to unduly" before the word "enhance."

Amendment agreed.

Resolution agreed to.

On schedule A, item 1,

Mr. HENDERSON. Before we leave the resolutions, I would ask the attention of the hon. Finance Minister to the suggestion I made with reference to clause 14, namely, to add after the words "port of entry" the words "a justice of the peace, notary public or a commissioner for taking affidavits," so that when goods are entitled to a lower rate of duty or are on the free list on account of being used for manufacturing purposes in the factory of the importer, the proprietor or importer, if he lives say fifteen or twenty miles away from the custom-house, which often happens, would not be held to go to the port of entry in order to make the affidavits before the collector. In my own village, this difficulty frequently occurs. The large canners there and glove manufacturers and others, who import goods for their own factories, which are subject to lower rates of duty or are on the free list on account of being imported for manufacturing purposes, have very frequently to make declarations before the collector at the port of entry, which is fifteen miles away, or else put in a declaration which does not conform to the law, because taken before a commissioner. I feel sure that the hon. Finance Minister can agree to my suggestion without in any way interfering with the working of the clause.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I hope the hon. gentleman will not find it necessary to press his amendment. My first impression is that in the practical working of the Customs Department, his suggestion would be found difficult. However, we both have the same object in view, and if my hon. friend will let the suggestion stand for the present, before we are through with the tariff I promise it shall be very thoroughly considered by the Controller of Customs.

Item agreed to.

7. Spirituous or alcoholic liquors, distilled from any material, or containing or compounded from or with distilled spirits of any kind, and any mixture thereof with water, for every gallon thereof of the strength of proof, and when of a greater strength than that of proof, at the same rate on the increased quantity that there would be if the liquors were reduced to the strength of proof. When the liquors are of a less strength than that of proof, the duty shall be at a rate herein provided, but computed on a reduced quantity of the liquors in proportion to the lesser degree of strength; provided, however, that no reduction in quantity shall be computed or made on any liquors below the strength of fifteen per cent under proof, but all such liquors shall be computed as of the strength of fifteen per cent under proof, as follows:—

(a.) Ethyl alcohol, or the substance commonly known as alcohol, hydrated oxide of ethyl or spirits of wine; gin of all kinds, n.e.s.; rum, whisky and all spirituous or alcoholic liquors, n.o.p.; amyl alcohol or fusel oil, or any substance known as potato spirit or potato oil; methyl alcohol, wood naphtha, pyroxylic spirit or any substance known as wood spirit or methylated spirits, absinthe, arrack or palm spirit, brandy, including artificial brandy and imitations of brandy; cordials and liqueurs of all kinds, n.e.s.; mescal, pulque, rum shrub, schiedam and other schnapps; tafia, angostura and similar alcoholic bitters or beverages, two dollars and forty cents per gallon.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance whether he has had any information of an increase of illicit distillation. What I fear is that the rate of duty that has been placed upon spirituous and alcoholic liquors will defeat its object, so far as the revenue is concerned, by leading to smuggling and illicit distillation. I do not know whether the Government have been watching the matter closely. The Controllers of Inland Revenue and Customs can say how far there is any indication of a movement in that direction.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There has hardly been sufficient time to enable us to say whether there is any unusual movement in that direction, but it is undoubted that there is considerable smuggling and illicit distillation throughout the country. My hon. friends the Controllers of Inland Revenue and Customs are giving that matter special attention, and an extra vote has been taken with a view to dealing more vigorously with the smuggling evil. The hon. gentleman is no doubt correct that every increase of duty increases this evil and necessitates much greater vigilance.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the excise duty now, and what was the old duty?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. $1.90 per gallon instead of $1.70.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the explanation of the difference of the increase between excise and customs ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The difference is against excise, of course. There is a strong opinion among hon. members that the excise duty should be still larger. The difference is 5 cents more against the distiller than the old rates. But it is one of those difficult questions to determine how far the increase of these duties will affect the revenue. We have had some difference of opinion among interested parties on that question, and we have thought that we could afford to make that difference, at all events getting an increased duty of 5 cents upon excise. Whether we shall succeed, remains to be seen.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to hear the Minister of Finance on one point. The customs duty on liquor and spirits is $2.40 per gallon, the excise duty is $1.90 per gallon; therefore, the protection enjoyed by the distiller is 50 cents per gallon on an article that does not cost, including interest, insurance and all other expenses, above 15 cents per gallon. That is, upon an article costing 15 cents per gallon, we give a protective duty of 50 cents per gallon, which amounts to 333 per cent, an amount of protection to an industry that cannot be justified. At the same time, it decreases the revenue by just that amount.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The best I can say is that if it is 300 per cent now, it was more than 300 per cent previously; so whatever change we are making is, according to his own view, in the right direction. The difference between customs and excise before was 55, while now it is 50 cents. The statement of the hon. gentleman as to the cost of the manufacture of whisky is much at variance with the information given by parties in the trade. They will be surprised and shocked by the statement of the hon. gentleman that it costs only 15 cents to make a gallon of good whisky, that is if any whisky is good. Their views are much at variance with that.

Mr. WALLACE. On the question that a bushel of corn makes three gallons of proof whisky, there can be no dispute; the regulation of the Department of Inland Revenue provide for that. It is agreed upon between the distillers and the department that the product of one bushel of Indian corn shall be three gallons of proof whisky.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The exact quantity which is produced from a bushel of corn may be as stated. But the general question of the cost of making a gallon of whisky, is one upon which, if my hon. friend is correct, there is a considerable lack of correct information in other quarters, because the parties interested in the trade have represented that the cost of making a gallon of good whisky, including the expense of carrying it under the two-years law, taking into account the large capital involved, and the interest, &c.—they represent that it is more than double that. Of course, I must not undertake to sit in judgment between them; that is a question largely for expert knowledge. But as I say, the information given by interested parties is that the cost of production of a gallon of whisky is more than double that stated by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WALLACE. I can remember myself when whisky was sold at 20 cents per gallon, distillers were selling it at that price. But there can be no dispute of the fact that a bushel of corn makes three gallons of whisky, that is an established fact. As to the cost of manufacture, anybody who goes to a distillery can see that it is not very great. The barrels that are used are charged extra by the distillers, the offal is valuable for feeding cattle, and produces a great deal of money. The Minister of Finance speaks of the large amount of capital required to carry whisky over for two years; but the capital is only the cost of manufacture and the price of the corn or grain; the duty has nothing to do with that. The two or three dollars a gallon that may be charged for customs or excise, if they are not paid by the distiller, he holds the duty over. The full contents of the barrel are worth only about $6 in bond. So that the interest and insurance are only on the $6, not on the price the consumer has to pay, which is about $100. The cost of insurance and the interest of the capital invested are both exceedingly small. And when you put all these together, including interest for the two years the liquor has to be held, and insurance for the two years that it has been held, and the cost of manufacture—if all these are put together, they will not make more than 15 or 16 cents. As to the statement that the hon. Minister has made, that parties have informed him that the cost is 30 cents or more, I think that before he makes that statement to the House he should give some figures which would justify it. At any rate, the fact remains that the protection to the distiller is over 300 per cent, and, in my opinion, that is much too high a protection to give to any industry in this country. I know that the present Government has refused to give even a very moderate protection to some industries, even some that are just beginning their manufacture. For instance, they have taken off the duty off cream separators, which duty, I think, was 30 per cent under the old tariff. The manufacturers have established their industry in this country only within the last couple of years. They are now, as I pointed out in the case of the John Abell Manufacturing Company, able to make the steel bowls for separators, which before were free and which the Government might fairly be asked to put a duty upon. It seems a most unfair tariff under which these Canadian enterprises are left entirely without protective duties, while the duty is not taken off the raw materials that they are required to import. On what basis of justice does the Government retain the duty of 20 per cent on the larger agricultural implements, and 25 per cent, as I believe it is, on smaller articles of that kind—though I think it is not a high enough duty—and allow no protection to the manufacturer of cream separators and, at the same time, give the distillers of this country a protection of 300 per cent. I do not think that such a thing can be justified. A distillery is not an industry that employs a very large number of men. But here are industries that require protection and get none at all, while the distillers, even if the statement of the hon. Minister be correct—and he does not claim very good authority for making it—have a protection of 166 per cent. The statement is made that the Government are moving in the right direction, that there is less protection for the distillers than there was before. That is quite true. And that may be a reason for criticising the course of the late Government. But we have begun this tariff discussion anew, and must judge everything on its merits.

Mr. FOSTER. The late Government adopted the principle of protection.

Mr. WALLACE. That is true; the late Government proceeded upon the principle of giving protection. In the case of the distillers, I believe, they gave too much. Now that we are making a new tariff, I ask the Government to investigate the matter and see if they can justify such enormous protection to the whisky manufacturers.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I take exception to my hon. friend's statement that I made any representation on my own account as to the cost of making whisky. I do not profess to have expert knowledge on that subject, but I thought it fair to say that it was a matter of dispute, that the parties engaged in the business—who, of course, are interested—have represented very earnestly that the cost of making whisky was about double that stated by my hon. friend. I have no means of proving the truth of that statement; it is a matter of dispute. The most that we can say in support of the item is that at least the distillers have 5 cents less protection than they had in the past.

Mr. WALLACE. Hon. members will notice that the Minister of Finance quotes the distillers as saying that the cost of the manufacture was double what I stated it to be. I showed that the cost was from 2 cents to 3 cents per gallon above the value of the offal. If the representations made to the Minister of Finance are correct, they would show the cost of manufacture to be from 5 cents to 6 cents per gallon above the cost of the offal. The cost of the corn required to make a gallon of whisky is 12 cents. This would make the cost of the whisky, at the utmost, 18 cents per gallon, even according to the representations of the distillers. The cost of the manufacture may be twice what I have stated, but the cost of the corn cannot be twice what I have stated, for we know the price of corn and how much whisky can be made from a bushel. These are points upon which there is no room for dispute, because the Controller of Inland Revenue has the facts and can state them to the House. Even if the cost of manufacture be 6 cents per gallon over the value of the offal, and the price of the corn, that would only make the cost of a gallon of whisky 18 cents. The protection, therefore, afforded to the manufacturer would be about 300 per cent per gallon. Now, particularly as we are going to have a plebiscite very soon—

Mr. McCLEARY. When?

Mr. WALLACE. Right away. The Government is pledged to submit a Bill at this session of the Parliament, and I do not doubt that the electors of the Dominion will be called to vote upon this question within a very few weeks or months. The course of the Government in giving such protection to the distillers is in strange contrast with their desire to pass a prohibitory liquor law.

Mr. McMULLEN. It seems to be singularly inconsistent in an hon. gentleman who has not only been a member of the House, but a member of the Cabinet, or, at least, a Conservative, and who knew all the facts that he has stated to the House with regard to the enormous profit of the whisky manufacturers, never to suggest an increased excise duty on spirits—

Mr. WALLACE. How does the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) know that?

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) never suggested that to the House, but the moment he gets into Opposition, he rises to point out that the manufacturers of whisky are getting too much protection. If the facts stated by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) are correct, unquestionably the distillers have too much protection. For my part, I would like to see the excise duty increased. As the Government have moved in this direction, I hope they will keep on. However, it struck me: How peculiar it was that my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) and my hon. friend from Brockville (Mr. Wood), who must have been cognizant of all the benefits enjoyed by the manufacturers of liquor all these years that they were in power, had quietly permitted the distillers—including my hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster)—

Mr. FOSTER. No, I am not a distiller.

Mr. McMULLEN. But he (Mr. Foster) was in office while this high protection was given.

Mr. FOSTER. But I thought you included me among the distillers.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman allowed these men to enjoy the excessive protection pointed out by the hon. member for West York without making a single suggestion for its reduction. We would have been glad to join with hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were in power, in a proposal to increase the excise duty on spirits. But not a single move was made by them. But now that the Liberal party has come into power, the hon. member for West York rises and questions the propriety of leaving the whisky manufacturers in the enjoyment of the protection that they have, notwithstanding that the Finance Minister has made a considerable inroad into the privileges they enjoyed.

Mr. MACLEAN. I would suggest that further powers might be taken under the combine clause, to increase duties when an occasion of this kind arises.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Does the hon. gentleman wish to move an amendment in that direction?

Mr. MACLEAN. No; I am only making a suggestion in view of the remarks of the hon. gentleman who preceded me.

Mr. WALLACE. I have apparently a little more freedom than the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), whose hands now appear to be tied.

(e.) Vermouth containing not more than thirty-six per cent, and ginger wine containing not more than twenty-six per cent of proof spirits, ninety cents per gallon.

If containing more than these percentages respectively of proof spirits, two dollars and forty cents per gallon.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a change here from the old tariff. Perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite will make some explanations.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. That was made after consideration.

Mr. FOSTER. What were the reasons?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. It was found that the strength of different samples did not come within a degree or two of the standard. It was also stated that the standard was too low, and it was necessary to increase it. In view of some of the rulings of the department, it was impossible to carry out the intention of the Act.

Mutton and lamb, fresh, thirty-five per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. How does this matter now stand with respect to New South Wales?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. At this moment nothing has been done in relation to New South Wales, but I am quite satisfied that it will come in under the reciprocal tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. Then how will it be in regard to the farmers of the North-west supplying the British Columbia market with mutton? New South Wales is a large producer of mutton. Where are the Patrons? Where are the British Columbia members, who must know that their farming interests depend largely on retaining control of the market of that province.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Does the hon. gentleman want me to read part of the speech he delivered before the Intercolonial Conference?

Mr. FOSTER. This will open the market to New Zealand, so that the farmers there will be able to compete with the farmers of British Columbia on a free plane, and this advantage will be given to New South Wales without securing any advantage in return.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The workmen will benefit by it.

Mr. FOSTER. The workmen in Quebec should have a chance as well as those in British Columbia.

Mr. McMILLAN. I cannot see how the hon. gentleman can find fault with New Zealand mutton being allowed to come into British Columbia. He stated at the Intercolonial Conference that the province was utterly unable to furnish mutton for the Pacific coast.

Mr. ROGERS. We are not afraid to compete with the world, but we do not want to pay $150,000 a year in subsidies.

Mr. FOSTER. Is my hon. friend so far in the confidence of the Government that he is aware that they are going to take away these subsidies? Within a few days he will be called upon to vote a much larger subsidy for the new fast line of steamers. Does he propose, or does he think the Government propose to take away the subsidies given in connection with trade on the Pacific coast? With regard to what was stated by my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan), I fail to see the point of his argument. At that conference we were willing to open up our markets on terms mutually advantageous, and we were to receive in return trade advantages with our fellow colonists.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will tell the hon. gentleman where the point lies. The hon. gentleman stated at that conference that Canada was unable to furnish mutton for British Columbia, and that New Zealand mutton could properly come in.

Mr. FOSTER. Ah, my hon. friend (Mr. McMillan) has not read that quite right. He had better turn it up and get the exact words.

Mr. McMILLAN. Perhaps you could explain it, if I have not read it aright.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has made the assertion, and he must carry it out.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I want to draw the attention of the Government to what I think is a failure on their part to act in the interest of Canada. At the great conference which was held in Ottawa, at which South Africa, Australia, and New Zealand were represented, the question of intercolonial trade as well as inter-Imperial trade occupied a very large amount of attention, and an application was made by that conference to the Imperial Government to remove by Imperial legislation the difficulties that prevented the colonies of Australia and of Canada from entering into mutually advantageous reciprocal trade arrangements. My hon. friends know that Lord Jersey in reporting on the proceedings of the conference, strongly urged upon the Imperial Government the desirability of complying with the wishes of Canada, South Africa, and Australia, to have the difficulties which stood in the way removed by Imperial legislation. The Imperial Government assented to that, and by an Act of the Imperial Parliament they placed the Dominion of Canada, and New Zealand, and the provinces of Australasia in a position, for the first time, to negotiate mutually advantageous reciprocal trade arrangements. Now, Sir, I invite the attention of the Government to the fact that Australia and New Zealand joined in this appeal to the Imperial Government, and I want to know under these circumstances, why New Zealand or any of the Australian provinces, should require that this Government should give them a preferential position in Canadian markets, without making a preferential return to our goods in their markets. I want to know, why, under these circumstances, this Government should have thrown away the means they had in their power to secure from the Australian colonies, we will say the opportunity that was presented of negotiating a trade arrangement between the Government of Canada and their Governments under that Imperial legislation which enable them to do so. I cannot see why Canadians should be called upon for a single moment to make concessions for nothing. If my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce had made to the New South Wales Government, the proposal that his Government would give, we will say, this reduction of 25 per cent in the duty on all the products they could send into this country, I have no hesitation in saying that I believe these colonies Governments would reciprocate. I think, Sir, the Canadian Government have failed in their duty to the House, and to the country, in placing our farmers at the mercy of the sharp competition from New South Wales in our own market, without getting any consideration in return. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce had taken up this question, he would I believe have been able to secure a most advantageous reciprocal trade arrangement, which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance now admits he has thrown away, without receiving any return whatever.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) has raised the whole question of the reciprocal tariff again, because every word he has said with regard to New South Wales would equally apply to the admission of goods from Great Britain.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, no. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) mistakes me altogether. The questions are entirely different. England cannot negotiate a reciprocal trade with you, because the treaties by which she has bound herself and bound Canada prevents it, but New South Wales can, under the Act which was passed in the Imperial Parliament permitting her to do so, and of the passage of which Act the Canadian Government has been advised. Before you brought down your tariff, and since you came into power last July, you have been in a position to open up these negotiations, and to make a reciprocal trade arrangement by which Canada would get some return for that privilege, which under the policy pursued by this Government has been absolutely thrown away, although Australia had joined Canada in getting these obstructions removed so as to enable Canada and the provinces of Australia and New Zealand to make these reciprocal trade arrangements.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. So far as their relation to the reciprocal tariff is concerned, England and New South Wales stand exactly in the same position. They have both granted the privileges of their market to us, and from that fact they have the right to obtain the benefit of this reciprocal tariff. In that respect they stand exactly in the same position. It is not easy to see what else New South Wales could do for us.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) does not mean to say that New South Wales admits the goods of Canada into her market, under more favourable treatment than she extends to other countries?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Both England and New South Wales are free trade countries, and they both give us all the facilities we can ask in their markets.

Mr. McMILLAN.

We do not think it is a sound policy to say we will not recognize what they have done in the past, and unless they do something more we will not admit their products under this reciprocal tariff. We maintain that both England and New South Wales have dealt fairly and liberally with us in the past, and although they do not discriminate in our favour, yet we see no reason why they should not come under the reciprocal tariff.

Mr. SPROULE. This is one of the cases in which the reciprocal tariff will strike us pretty heavily, and because of which, in the judgment of members on this side of the House, it was unwise to make this provision. We are not afraid of England sending meat products into Canada, because she always consumes more than this country can supply, but New South Wales has a large superabundance and is exporting it to every market she can find. Notwithstanding that we had a high tariff against New South Wales last year, she sent us 39,000 pounds. If she could send that to Canada with a duty of 35 per cent against her, is it not more likely that she will send a still larger quantity when you reduce that duty to 27 per cent under the reciprocal tariff? The new rate of duty, which the hon. Minister of Finance tells us will apply to New South Wales, will make the tariff on mutton only 27 per cent ad valorem. If that country sends in so much when the duty is 35 per cent, surely it will be a much more serious competitor with the farmers of Canada when the duty is only 26 per cent; and the reduction applies not only to mutton, but to all lines of fresh meat, as well as to lard and tallow.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The duty on fresh lamb and mutton is 35 per cent.

Mr. SPROULE. Well, to New South Wales it will be 25 per cent less than it was before; and if under a 35 per cent duty that country can export so much to Canada, under a 26 per cent duty it can export a great deal more; so that it is sure to become a serious competitor with the Canadian farmer, not only in mutton, but in many other lines of meat.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. My hon. friend will do well to remember that if you desire to extend your trade at all, you have to buy as well as sell. If we want the Australians to buy our wheat and flour, which I am glad to say they are buying in larger quantities from year to year, as well as our manufactures, we must buy something from them, and I am not disposed to be frightened or alarmed if the consuming population of Canada get fresh meats or canned mutton a little cheaper than before.

Mr. SPROULE. But we are trying to establish a trade on equal terms, so that when we gave an advantage to them, they would give one to us.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). They gave you an advantage in advance.

Mr. SPROULE. They gave no advantage to us except what they gave to the whole world. We are giving them a valuable consideration belonging to the farmers of Canada, for which we get no return, and can get no return under this proposal.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a matter of some importance, I think. I recollect not long since hearing one of the Patron representatives in this House declaring that though he had been at one time a Conservative, believing in Conservative doctrines, he had been gradually seduced from the old faith by a conviction, which from time to time stole with great force over him, that nothing was being done for the farmers by the Conservative Government; and that conviction became so strong at last that he had abjured his old faith and took an independent position—occupied a half-way house between the Conservative and Liberal parties. But it was not long before the half-way house was abandoned for the more comfortable house which had been reared by the Liberal Government; and the hon. gentleman is now fraternizing with them under the same roof, eating at the same table, and sleeping in the same caucus with the Government and the supporters of the Government. In the by-elections, the Patrons very forcibly attacked the Liberal-Conservative Government for having introduced undue competition with the farmers of this country by subsidizing a Pacific line of steamers, which they argued would enable freights to be carried at less rates, and consequently give the competing power into the hands of the Australians. In every rural constituency, on every Patron platform, the Liberal-Conservative Government were denounced for this. And so my hon. friend and his Patron friends in the House left the Conservative party, and went over to the Liberal party, because the Liberal party were going to do more for the farmers. The Liberal party are in power, here is their tariff, and my hon. friend has already voted their Estimates, which provide for the same subsidy to the Pacific steamers, and their tariff allows imported lamb and mutton from the Australian colonies to come in at one-eighth reduction now, and one-fourth reduction a year from now. I congratulate my hon. friend on the reason he has given for his change of faith. He has had his reward, and had it quickly. There is more than that in this matter. If there is anything that has been buoying up the interest of the farmers of Manitoba, the North-west and British Columbia, it has been the assumption that as the mining interests of British Columbia developed, and the mining population increased, they would furnish the great home market for the products of the ranch and the farm and the field. Everybody knows that it has been said: "You produce lots of agricultural stuff in the west, but the freights eat up the profit when it goes to the British market. What is needed in the west is a population, and of all population a mining population is the best. They are a well-paid, an extravagant, a generous-living class, who man for man, consume twice as much as any other class." The mining development of British Columbia has commenced; people are flocking into the country; in many of its valleys mining towns are being formed; and the farmers in Manitoba and the Northwest have been saying: "Now is the time to enjoy our markets; now we can sell our beef, our grain, our small fruits and particularly our mutton and lamb." Yet the very first thing that is done by this Government is to open up competition across the margin of any possible profit, by reducing the 35 per cent tariff to one-fourth lower. Added to that, the regulations of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) will allow herds to be driven over from the states adjoining the border without any restrictive conditions of quarantine, which I warn my hon. friend, as the experience of a few months will show, will have the effect of inducing a very large importation all along the line of the mining regions of British Columbia from the states to the south.

So much for the farmer's point of view, but I want to emphasize what my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition brought out so clearly a moment ago and which the Minister of Finance seems to have entirely lost the point of. There is a great difference between the position of Great Britain and that of the colony of Australia, a difference which was recognized by the Imperial legislation passed eighteen months ago under which the Australian colonies were empowered to make a bargain on reciprocal terms with us, which Great Britain is not in a position to do, owing to her treaties. My hon. friend is generous with the products of Canadian industries. He is willing to give away the farmers' or anybody else's interests. Well, while it is a good thing to be generous, it is better to be just. The fact that New South Wales asked for that legislation to enable it to treat with the other colonies is proof conclusive that they were ready to enter into reciprocal arrangements with Canada from which each country would derive compensating advantages. But under my hon. friend's resolution, Canada will obtain no reciprocal advantages for what she is giving away. The hon. gentleman replies that New South Wales is a free trade country. Does he say that she raises all her tariff by direct taxation? Has he looked over the tariff of New South Wales and is he in a position to state that all the goods she obtains from Canada go in there free of duty? The hon. gentleman had better study the question in order to ascertain whether there are not articles of Canadian produce which, under a reciprocal arrangement, might be admitted by New South Wales at lower rates in return for corresponding advantages conceded to that colony by Canada. We ought to guard just as carefully the interests of our farmers in the far west, who raise beef and mutton, as the interests of the farmers in the eastern provinces; and I suppose the consumers in the east are entitled to just as much consideration and ought to be just as much an object of solicitude to the Government as the consumers in the west, if not more, because if there is any one class more than another which is better able to pay for its food, it is the mining class who get their wages regularly paid in cash. We can only come to one conclusion, and that is, that Canada's interests are in every case being sacrificed by this Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) if he would be good enough to lay on the Table of the House, for the information of hon. members on both sides, the last returns from the International Customs Union held at Brussels, of the tariffs of all countries. My hon. friend is aware that Canada makes an annual contribution to that customs union, and the Canadian Government has been on various occasions represented there, and one of the duties of that bureau is to furnish to the governments embraced in the union returns of all tariff changes that may have taken place.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I shall keep that in view.

Mr. FOSTER. What other articles of possible export from New South Wales may be supposed to come in under the reduction of duty proposed? We are now on the item of fresh meats, are there any other products that New South Wales sends to this country?

Mr. DAVIN. I have the tariff of New South Wales here, and my hon. friend the Finance Minister seems to be greatly mistaken when he calls it a free trade tariff. Take timber, for instance, here is its tariff:

Timber.	s.	d.
Dressed, per 100 super feet.....	3	0
Rough and undressed (with the exception of ash, hickory and oak), per 100 super ft.	1	6
Palings, per 100.....	1	0
Laths, per 1,000.....	0	9
Shingles, per 1,000.....	1	0
Pickets, dressed, per 100 super feet.....	3	0

I have not analysed the tariff fully—

Mr. TALBOT. Take time to study it.

Mr. DAVIN. I thought I was doing useful work when I showed to the hon. Finance Minister that he was mistaken in saying that New South Wales had a free trade tariff. I certainly thought I was doing work of much more value than sitting down in my seat, as the hon. gentleman constantly does, with my hat over my eyes and interjecting senseless interruptions.

Mr. SPROULE. As an illustration of what might occur from a very slight change in the tariff, let me point out that last year we imported from Australia, mutton, 22,229 pounds; dead meats, 100,000 pounds; butter, 6,997 pounds, or in all, in these three items alone, 129,206 pounds. That took place under a 35 per cent tariff, but if we reduce that tariff to 26½ per cent, as it would be reduced under the most-favoured-nation clause, Australia would no doubt send in a great deal more. As an evidence of this, I need only mention the fact that, a few years ago, we found fresh meats coming in very largely from the United States, despite the duty.

Now, at the request of the farmers of Canada, the Government raised the duty. How much? Only half a cent a pound. And the result was to shut out over fourteen millions of pounds of this meat. Before the increase of the duty the quantity imported was 33,000,000 pounds a year, and after that, about half the quantity. The farmers of Canada might as well understand what it means to reduce the duty by one-quarter in favour of Australasia. When the representative of Australasia was here a few years ago at the colonial conference, he said: We would consider ourselves well off if we could get $2 apiece for our sheep and $10 apiece for two-year-old steers. If animals and meat are so cheap there, then, notwithstanding the long distance, if you lower our duty, that country must become a serious competitor with the Canadian farmer. It is a very serious matter to the Canadian farmer to have the duty lowered to almost any country but especially to that country that can offer the greatest competition. When the election was on in North Ontario, Mr. Lockie Wilson, one of the representatives of the Patron order went through the riding carrying two cans of Australian mutton, which formed the principal argument that he used. He told his audiences: The Canadian Government have subsidized a line of steamers to bring Australian mutton to compete with you farmers; and here it is. And then he would take from his pocket a can of this mutton that he had got in Montreal. That was the argument used by the Patrons throughout the riding. But what will be the effect when we reduce the duty one-quarter and subsidize the steamers just the same as before—because that subsidy is still continued. Surely the result must be worse for the Canadian farmer. If the competition was injurious before, it must be much more injurious now, and it is well that the Canadian farmer should understand it.

Mr. TAYLOR. The tariff items that we are now dealing with, from item 11 to item 101 inclusive, may be called the farmer's tariff. This schedule is headed "Animals and agricultural, animal and dairy products." I have a copy of the old tariff here and a copy of the new one, which is now before us, and I find that, with few exceptions they are, so far as these items are concerned, line for line the same. I want to ask what this paternal Government are doing for the farmers of this country. They have simply adopted the tariff of their predecessors, the National Policy tariff that gave protection to the farmers. There are a few changes which I will read. In the old tariff there were 87 items bearing upon the products of the farmers; in the new tariff there are 91. The first change that I notice is that eggs, under this tariff, are 3 cents a dozen (item 29) and under the old tariff they were 5 cents a dozen.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is a mistake.

Mr. TAYLOR. That has been amended, has it? Then in that case, there is no change made by this tariff.

Mr. DAVIN. There was a duty of 5 cents a dozen under the tariff of 1894.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is changed, I believe. On condensed milk there is an increase of ¼ cent per pound—the old tariff was 3 cents per pound, and the present tariff 3¼ cents a pound.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is a mistake. The duty is not changed.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have the old tariff here, and the duty on condensed milk is given at 3 cents per pound, while in the new tariff it appears to be 3¼ cents per pound.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There has been no change in this item since this Government has come into power.

Mr. TAYLOR. In that case then they have only adopted the old National Policy tariff on this item also.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There was an amendment of the tariff after the list which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) has was published. I think you will find that there is no change in the duty on condensed milk in the new tariff.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then the next change I find in the tariff is the absence from this schedule in the new tariff of the item of corn. Under the old tariff there was a duty of 7½ cents per bushel while now it is free. Then on the item of cornmeal there is less protection by 15 cents per barrel.

Mr. SCRIVER. Indian corn imported for the purpose of distillation is subject to a duty.

Mr. TAYLOR. So it was under the old tariff. But now it is free for all other purposes except distilling, and no doubt a good deal will be smuggled in for distilling purposes also. Cornmeal is reduced from 40 cents a barrel to 25 cents a barrel, being 15 cents a barrel less protection to the farmer. Then we come to wheat, which has been reduced from 15 cents a bushel to 12 cents a bushel, and flour from 75 cents a barrel to 60 cents a barrel. Fruits in air-tight cans or other packages have been increased from 2 cents per pound to 2¼ cents per pound, for what purpose I do not know.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Something for the farmer.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not think so. There seems to be something for the manufacturer there. I fancy that some manufacturers have made representations that they wanted further protection.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What items is the hon. gentleman referring to?

Mr. TAYLOR. Items 80, 81 and 82.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is no change in any of them.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am reading from the tariff of 1894, and if the hon. Minister has it in his hands, he can see that—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I would call the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Taylor's) attention to the fact that some changes were made after that tariff referred to by the hon. gentleman. The tariff on these three items as brought down is the same as when this Government came into power.

Mr. TAYLOR. If the Conservative Government gave that much protection, before going out of office, that is so much in favour of the Conservative Government and so much less in favour of hon. gentlemen opposite who have adopted that tariff line by line.

Mr. TALBOT. You have the wrong tariff.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am not asking my hon. friend (Mr. Talbot) for information. Where I am wrong the Finance Minister will correct me, and I am ready to accept his statement as to changes made since this tariff was printed. We sent for the old tariff to compare it with the new, and this is what was furnished us.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). There were not a great many changes made after that tariff was printed, but there were some, and I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) may accept the statement of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do accept it. So we see that, as compared with the old tariff, this Government have made only about five changes in this schedule, and all of them against the farmer. There are several new items, Nos. 100 and 101. No. 100 is "fine salt in bulk and coarse salt, n.e.s., 5 cents per hundred pounds." If I am right, under the old tariff, salt was on the free list.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. I think these two items were simply brought from another part of the tariff. This is a change in classification, but the duties remain the same.

Mr. WALLACE. The duties on salt are precisely the same.

Mr. TAYLOR. Therefore, they have kept so much more of the National Policy. They have made about five changes which are against the protection that was given to the farmer. I expected to see the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) get up and defend the farmers whom he claims to represent as belonging to the Patron body. But here he is supporting this Government because they are doing so much for the farmer. What have they done for the farmer in the agricultural list of this tariff? Simply copied the tariff that they found prepared for them by the Government that left power in June last. My hon. friend talked about the subsidy that is already voted, as the ex-Finance Minister has explained, to carry mutton, as he claimed during the election, from Australia to Canada to compete with ours. I thought that hon. gentleman came here as an independent man representing the Patrons, and that he and his party would remain a purely independent party. But what did we find yesterday? We found him in the caucus of the Reform party, gone over body and bones to the Government, attending their caucuses, therefore he is no longer an independent man in this House, nor can he have any more influence as an independent representative of the Patrons. He identifies himself with the Government as well as with their policy, and votes for free corn to the injury of the farmer, votes for a reduction of the protection on wheat and on flour, and these are the only changes. I expected him to advocate the interest of the farmer for which purpose he was sent here; but he comes here and backs up this Government in reducing the protection that the farmer received at the hands of the late Government.

Mr. SPROULE. There is this thing noticeable in connection with it. It was claimed before that there was not sufficient protection for the farmer, those who opposed the Conservative Government did so on that ground. But whatever protection there was for the farmers before, there is 25 per cent less protection for them now under the favoured-nation clause. If you take those ninety-one items affecting the farmers, you will find that on every single item there is a reduction of 25 per cent under the most-favoured-nation clause, and Australasia, we are told by the Minister of Finance, is one of the nations in favour of whom there is a reduction of 25 per cent in the tariff. In addition to that, there is a reduction of the duty on wheat and flour, two of the main commodities in which farmers are interested, and corn is brought in free. Now, if the farmer is satisfied with that, if he feels that he is better protected under the present tariff than he was under the old, if he has any greater reasons for gratitude towards this Government than he had toward the Conservative Government, then I do not understand by what process he reasons.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The difficulty with the western farmer is not that protection is being lessened in the new tariff, but the difficulty is that there is too much protection left in it yet. We did not ask for protection, and the reduction of the duty on wheat amounts to nothing so far as the interests of the farmer are concerned. We sell our corn in the east, and no one in his senses would think of importing or sending corn to the North-west to be sold. This reduction of duty is a matter in which we are not interested, as farmers. You cannot protect the farmer in the North-west Territories, because he has the wide world of free trade as a market for his products. But you can take away as much duty as you please, and we will not grumble.

Mr. MACLEAN. I know that the farmers in my portion of the country desire protection. As a protectionist on principle, and as representing the farmers of East York, I must protest now against a reduction of those agricultural duties. I protest against giving our market for mutton and beef and hides to the Australasians. I protest against the reduction of the tariff in favour of American corn, American wheat, and American flour. I say we ought to keep our own market for our own products, and as long as I am in this House I will maintain that doctrine.

Mr. ROGERS. As regards the bringing in the farm products of the Australian colonies, I never objected to competing with the world on equal terms. What I did object to was giving a bonus to a steamship company to bring them in. That is the ground that we took in the campaign.

Mr. HENDERSON. It seems to me that on this item we should proceed with a great deal of care. It is an important item, because, if we are to receive the mutton of New South Wales at a low rate of duty, no doubt we will receive mutton from all parts of Australia. It will be an utter impossibility for an appraiser at our ports to tell whether a carcass of mutton brought into this country, was produced in New South Wales or in any other part of Australia. We may therefore expect to have our market invaded by a large amount of shipped meat, which must be detrimental to the interests of our sheep-raising farmers. I confess that I cannot understand the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) when he says we do not want articles that are products of the farm to be protected. Whether he means "we," the clergymen of the west, or "we," the farmers of the west, I am not very sure; but on this question I think he must be speaking for the church and not for the farmers. We understood from him a short time ago that he was perfectly satisfied that the duty on agricultural implements should be maintained because the revenue was required, and he was perfectly satisfied that the farmers of Manitoba should be taxed to pay a bounty on iron in order that the producers of iron and the agricultural implement manufacturers should get their raw material cheaper; but he does not ask that the duty on agricultural implements be reduced. He is perfectly satisfied, however, that the duty on the products of the farm should be reduced, a strange representative, to my mind, of an agricultural county. If that is his view, it is not mine. I do not favour the reduction of the duty on wheat from 15 to 12 cents. I am satisfied that it is detrimental to the interests of the farmers of the province of Ontario, if it is not to those of the province of Manitoba. I know that the result would be, and I believe it is being felt already, that the farmers throughout the province of Ontario will be compelled to accept a lower price for their winter wheat. It is true that the people in the maritime provinces may say that they are going to be the gainers, but from the standpoint of the section of the country from which I come, I know that this reduction of the duty on wheat and flour is not received with favour, neither is the putting of corn on the free list. That will be a most injurious thing to the agriculturists of Ontario. It may benefit a few men who are feeding cattle very largely, but only perhaps one out of twenty or thirty, or even one out of a hundred. Another hon. member said that the great bulk of our farmers are not going to be benefited. They are not, they are going to be injured very materially. The effects, of course, are not felt yet, but I know from conversation with the farmers in the western section of the country that the prevailing opinion is that it will result in very great injury indeed to the agriculturists of Ontario. Now, whilst the farmers are being struck right and left, having the duty reduced on their wheat, having the duty reduced on their flour, having corn placed upon the free list, and our markets being invaded by millions of bushels of a cheaply-produced American corn, depressing the value of all our coarse grains, injuring and destroying the quality of our pork, I say the time is come when we should call a halt. I think also that we should look carefully into the item of mutton, and see that the people living on the Pacific coast are not affected injuriously, as well as those in the province of Ontario. The farmers are called upon, although the duties are reduced on the articles they produce in some instances, to submit to increased duties, which it is contended by hon. gentlemen opposite increase the price. Cotton goods are to-day subject to higher rates of duty than before, and they are used very largely among that class of the people. Farmers have to pay their share of the taxes of the country to give the bounty to the iron manufacturers, notwithstanding the fact that they receive no relief by a reduction being made in the duties on agricultural implements. In order to bring the matter to an issue, I move :

That clause 16 be struck out.

The effect of this amendment will be to put mutton and lamb in the same list as other fresh meats, namely, at 3 cents per pound.

Mr. SPROULE. I desire to offer a few remarks in reply to the hon. gentleman who said we in Manitoba do not want protection on wheat. I remember stating the session before last, I think, that we were bringing wheat from the west, and that the same quality of wheat which was sold in Duluth for 66 cents per bushel, realized in Manitoba 75 cents. It was the same quality of wheat.

Mr. MACDONELL (Selkirk). No.

Mr. SPROULE. There is no need for the hon. gentleman to say "no," because I took the figures from the "Globe," and that should be sufficient to satisfy him at any time. There is a difference of 9 cents a bushel in favour of the United States. But the duty was 15 cents a bushel and therefore you could not bring it into Canada. We could obtain 3 cents less freight rates, but even with that we could not bring it in. Hon. gentlemen opposite have now reduced the duty to 12 cents. Let me imagine wheat selling at the same relative prices at the two points I have named. The purchaser in the States would save 9 cents per bushel, being the difference in price between Duluth and Manitoba, and there would be a saving of 3 cents on freight, which would make the reduction 12 cents. Therefore, the purchaser would obtain an advantage if he imported wheat from Duluth instead of Manitoba, for he would get a little better freight rates. Of course, buyers would take advantage of this difference. Every bushel brought in from Duluth would displace the same quantity of wheat from Manitoba, and this hard wheat we have brought in to mix with the soft wheat of Ontario. Although wheat was lower in price at Duluth, it could not be brought in here on account of the 15 cents duty, but as the duty is now reduced to 12 cents, allowing the difference in market value to be the same as formerly, we would be able to bring it in and have a margin of profit.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Reference has been made to the iron industry of Nova

Mr. HENDERSON.

Scotia. I am bound to say that so far as this tariff is concerned, there is no part of it which strikes so heavily as the items referring to the iron duties. When an hon. gentleman says that advantage is gained under this tariff by the iron industry, he is altogether wrong in his statement. I might find a good deal to object to in the various items of the tariff, as a free trader. I recognize the difficulty in which the Government is placed in framing a tariff; but if the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) thinks 35 per cent on mutton and lamb too low from the farmers' standpoint, and he has the idea that he is going to make the farmers rich by increasing it in order to give the farmers the home market, then let us see how the matter will stand. According to statistics, only 12 per cent of our population are engaged in manufacturing, and 60 to 65 per cent in agriculture. The hon. gentleman has been engaged in the past in proving that the farmers who compose 60 or 65 per cent of the population may become rich by supplying the 12 per cent employed in manufacturing. If so, the people employed in manufacturing must be gourmandizers indeed. The home market is the greatest delusion in the world.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). It is good so far as it goes.

Mr. MACLEAN. Make it better.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). We should seek to bring in not only products but people from the outside countries. How are we going to make the farmers rich by having 65 per cent of the population labouring day after day to feed the 12 per cent engaged in manufacturing? I wonder if the Tories will ever understand the common-sense view of the question, namely, that the condition of the farmers is going to be improved by extending their market, and not by making them travel around a little circuit formed by 12 per cent of the people. It is because hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavoured to make the farmers believe that they would become rich in this way and have thus led the farmers astray, that they find themselves with the small fraction of members now occupying the seats on the Opposition side of the House. My hon. friend on my right (Mr. Oliver) offered some remarks in point when he said that the people of Manitoba and the farmers in every part of the Dominion desired the best opportunities for selling their products of the soil, which, after all, are only the products of the soil plus the labour of raising them. Fancy the folly of men who want all the products of our soil to be marketed here. I can understand that an hon. gentleman may urge the advantages of the home market when there are manufacturing industries in the locality, and when he is seeking to get votes. But if you take all the produce of Canada it is evident that our prices depend on the markets of the world.

It being Six o'clock, the Committee rose for recess.

After Recess.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). When the Committee rose at six o'clock I was proceeding to point out that it was somewhat of an extraordinary spectacle to see hon. gentlemen opposite advocating the home market. My genial friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) with whom I have had so much converse, and who together with myself on so many occasions has stood up for the oppressed, he a real radical, possessing many of the qualities which make for that which is best and highest: I cannot understand how such an hon. gentleman is found allied to a system which does not depend upon wealth honestly gained, nor on strength given by the Creator, but upon the power of legislation to help one man as against another. When that hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) spoke about his representing the farmers, it occurred to me that the farming portion of his constituency refused to have him on account of his protectionist views, because I am sure they could not reject him from any other point of view. He therefore cannot pretend to speak for the farmers in this House.

I do not for a moment wish to minimize the importance of the home market. It is a good market, but it depends upon two things: first, the cheapness of transportation in favour of the man who produces the goods near by, and secondly, the freshness of the article, and the facility and rapidity with which it can be taken from the point of production to the point of sale. What can the home market be for the people of Canada? Why, I make bold to say that Ontario, and Quebec, and the lower provinces can produce far more than will feed the people of this Dominion. Therefore, all the products of the west could be exported and sold in the foreign market. The home market must depend upon our raising just enough to supply it, and in order to be successful in that respect, you must have a large number of agents taking the census of the country to know how many people there will be to eat the produce of the farmers in the ensuing year. If they find there are five million consumers, they will have to figure out that these people will use so much wheat, so much barley, so much oats, and so on, and then—according to the style that was followed by hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends outside—they must say to the farmers: You shall only produce a certain quantity to feed exactly five million mouths. Sir, with our great producing country in the west we must have something more than the home market. For years the farmers of Canada have been deluded about the extent of the home market, and at last they have learned the great truth, that the principle of wealth in any community, is to be found in the margin of profit between the cost of production and the selling price of the article produced. The proposition, that you can say, that by selling just in certain places you are going to have the largest margin of profit, needs only to be stated to be laughed at by intelligent men. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) objects to a duty of 35 per cent on fresh mutton and lamb as being too low. I presume the reason that he wants to increase that duty is, that when the preferential tariff comes into operation, his duty will be so high as not to leave a good margin. Now, so far, the preferential tariff can only refer to Great Britain, and just think of the enormous cargoes of fresh mutton and fresh lamb which are going to come from England to Canada. How we will be flooded from England with such products, and how we must protect ourselves with a high duty. It is true that Great Britain can only produce six weeks food supply for her population, but nevertheless, according to the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), she is going to send us innumerable cargoes out of that produce, and therefore we must protect ourselves against Great Britain. And even if Belgium and Germany should come in, what difference does that make? Is the Canadian farmer with an average farm of 100 acres of good land to be afraid of competition from the Belgian farmer with an average farm of from two to five acres? Is he to be afraid of that competition, when the Belgian farmer must pay freight on his produce for over four thousand miles, must have his fresh mutton in as good condition on our market as the fresh mutton of the Canadian farmer, and in addition to that, must pay 35 per cent duty for the privilege of selling as cheaply as we can? Is it the character of the Canadian farmer to be afraid of just competition? Do not hon. gentlemen opposite see that they are placing our Canadian agriculturists in a humiliating position? With one hundred acres of rich loam soil in the province of Ontario, ten acres of which, with diligence and perseverance, would keep a family well, is the Canadian farmer afraid of the few sheep that the Belgian farmer can send over? Still less have we to fear this competition from Germany, where the soil is not so fertile as in Belgium. I tell hon. gentlemen opposite, that the Canadian farmers are not afraid of competition on equal terms with any country. And what of the United States? Think you that in the state of New York, with the Dingley Bill on his shoulders, the farmer can raise the mutton, pay 35 per cent to send it over here to compete with the Canadian farmer? But no one for a moment thinks that the preferential tariff is going to refer to the United States, and so we have this 35 protection tariff against the farmer of that country. The farmers in my province, where the land is not so good as in Ontario, and where they have to work hard to secure a small margin of profit, are not afraid of that competition. To tell the farmers of this country that they need 35 and 40 per cent protection against Great Britain and Belgium and the United States is to teach them false doctrine. Our farmers succeeded in the early days when they did not have this protection. Generally speaking, it is my opinion, that this tariff is in the right direction, but I, perhaps more radical than others, believe that the tariff does not go so far as I would like it to go in the direction of reduced duties. I can tell the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) that while he thinks 35 per cent too low a duty on fresh mutton, the protection on the iron industries in Nova Scotia has been reduced to 20 and 25 per cent. If the materials which the farmer uses in his industry have only 20 or 25 per cent protection, it appears to me that the farmers will see that 35 per cent duty on their products is sufficient. The iron which enters largely into the necessities of the farmer, will be much cheapened by the present tariff, and I am bound to say that the iron business in Nova Scotia has been struck right and left by the tariff introduced by this Government. We had every manufacturer in Canada saying: "Keep the protection I have got, but strike at the iron business; give me free iron, but keep the whole of the protection on my product";—so thievish had they become after eighteen years of protection. Now, I regret that. I believe that in reducing a tariff, we should reduce it as nearly as possible evenly on every article, considering its relationship to other articles. Iron is an article which more than any other manufactured article enters into the consumption of the people; so I suppose we have to bear the treatment we get. So far as I am individually concerned, this strikes me personally far more than the reduction on mutton and lamb strikes the hon. member for Halton; but in the meantime, I am not going to squeal about it. I recognize that the people have given this mandate to the Liberal party, and I am going to accept the result. But what is to be thought of an hon. gentleman complaining that 35 per cent is not enough duty on fresh mutton and lamb, when he gets his iron at less than 25 per cent—at a margin of from 10 to 15 per cent. If the farmer cannot get on with a margin of from 10 to 15 per cent, where are we to land? Without giving hon. gentlemen opposite an opinion of the principle on which they should act, I think they have either over-stated or under-stated the case. I submit that, having raised their objection and put the pleadings on record, that might do; but, instead of that, we have iteration and reiteration of the same thing continuously. Is this because the pure statement of the fact was not sufficient, or is it because they thought they should be heard on account of their much speaking? The one or the other must be true. I would not like to put them in the latter category, because I would have to designate them by a name to which they are not entitled. But it strikes me that having raised the objection, they should stand by it. Was it not amusing to find the ready and facile ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), in his first speech on this tariff, saying that we had all turned protectionists, and now saying that we are destroying every manufacturing industry in Canada? Has that been done since the tariff was brought down? The truth is there has been discovered in this tariff more dynamite than hon. gentlemen opposite thought at first to find in it; that is the explanation. It looked like a protectionist tariff at first, and they said we had turned protectionists. I do not deny that certain industries are going to feel the effect of this tariff very much—just as a man who may have an overcoat, provided by a friend, when he leaves home, and finds that the friend wants the overcoat and takes it from him, feels a little cold in consequence. I do not say that will not be the case with certain industries. But as against that it must not be forgotten that the country is feeling the effects of what they have been receiving for eighteen years, and it is only fair that the consumer and the producer should now change places. I do not think they appear to any great advantage, and really my bowels of compassion went out towards them. This posing first on one side and then on the other, was indicative of something which I did not expect. I felt like Burns:

O Pope, had I thy satire's darts,
To gie the rascals their deserts,
I'd rip their rotten, hollow hearts,
An' tell aloud
Their jugglin' hocus-pocus arts
To cheat the crowd.

I would tell them that; of course, you know, it would not be fair. So far as this particular item is concerned, I do not think the objection that has been raised should be considered for a moment. If the proposal is bad, the hon. gentlemen are going to get the full advantage of it. Let them put their objections on record; then there is the court of appeal to which we all must go, and if the facts sustain the objection, that court will act on the record, as they did before. But why should we, day after day bring up and urge continuously the same facts? It may perhaps be said on the other side that we have not answered them. For myself I have felt, and I suppose others on this side have felt the same, that as time was the essence of our existence, we should not throw it idly away; and though I could wish every hon. gentleman to give a reason for the vote he is to give, yet his vote is a better indication of his position than any reason he can give. I believe this tariff will strike deeper than hon. gentlemen suppose; and, with all due respect to the Government, I believe it will strike deeper than they anticipated at first; and I will tell you why. Because it reverses the position in which we stood before. I will not act towards hon. gentlemen opposite as they acted towards us. I believe they are loyal; but, like a countryman of mine, who, to show his love for a man, hugged him till he fell—

Mr. FOSTER. Are you sure it was a man?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The hon. gentleman is a better authority as to that than I am. The man said: "You may be kindly disposed towards me, but you take a very strange way of showing it." I think hon. gentlemen opposite are taking a very strange way of showing their loyalty to the British Empire. I have sat here year after year to hear them express their loyalty. For myself, I do not need to express my loyalty. But I want to say, what I said before, that in no respect can we show our loyalty more than by copying the tariff and following the example of the only nation on this globe whose example is worth following. Hon. gentlemen may think that a country is made great by manufacturing, or by raising mutton. I am reminded of the fact that I was in Washington a couple of months ago, and I heard a man there rise in his place, and what do you think he said was necessary to make a country great? He said: "No country was ever great that did not make its own clothing." The same thing might be predicted of a country in several other respects. No country was ever great whose people did not wash their faces, no country was ever great whose people did not cook their food or black their boots or do the hundred other things which it is necessary for people to do. That country alone is great which gives to labour the greatest return, that country alone is great in which the margin is widest between the cost of production and what remains in the pockets of the producers in the shape of profits. There are gentlemen, I know, over there who are ready to die for their country as there are gentlemen on this side, and I heard an hon. gentleman who wished to attack the preferential clause reply, when asked how far he would go in giving a preference to Great Britain that he thought he could stand 5 per cent. For myself, I am not ready to trade with Great Britain where the advantage to Great Britain shall be 1 cent. If I thought that we were giving away 1, or 5 or 10 per cent to Great Britain, I would vote against these resolutions. I am for Canada first, last and always; but I am prepared to accept the tariff because I know we will get the benefit as well as Great Britain, for no two people can trade together without both getting the benefit.

We are celebrating with pæans of praise the sixtieth anniversary of the reign of Her Majesty. One little fact will show what Great Britain has done. In 1837 Great Britain taxed 1,200 articles, and her whole trade amounted to $700,000,000. In 1897 she taxed twelve articles, and her whole trade is $3,500,000,000. And before some hon. gentlemen opposite get very gray, they will find that such an impetus will have been given to business by this tariff and a continuance of the course we have entered upon, that Canada will be far ahead in every respect of what she is to-day. You cannot make a country great by confining your attention to a few particular articles; it is by the whole sum of the trade of the country that it is great. I trust that my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson), who is one of the best-natured men in the House, will understand that the iron business is not unduly protected to the disadvantage of the farmers. We in Nova Scotia feel that it has not received as good advantages as other industries; but I defy any hon. gentleman to go through the tariff and so adjust the duties as to make each one nicely balance with the other. How could human skill or ingenuity do it? How could it be expected of any man, except one who lived before the days of Helpa and Shallum, and who lived to almost a thousand years, to make an equitable and evenly-balanced tariff, in which 480 articles were taxed? I know of one man in this country who tried it. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) tried it, he brought all his skill, and no doubt honest intention, to the task, and the result of all his efforts was that in some cases he did exactly the opposite of what he intended to do. I have the authority of the hon. gentleman's own friends in the iron business for saying that he struck one of the worst blows that could have been struck at that industry. I think that proves that the further we advance in the direction in which we have started the better; and, in the meantime, this instalment will teach the people a useful lesson. It will make them understand that trade under conditions less restricted than have hitherto existed is going to increase; and when men get a taste of liberty, whether it be against the bondage of man or trade, you will find them going in the same direction. I ask hon. gentlemen to take a note of that. They will find, if this tariff works as well as I believe it will, that if they still continue in their fossilized ideas of trade, they will find themselves so far behind in the march of progress as to be deaf to the loudest sounds of bugle and gun of the great host of the people in front, determined to have freedom in trade as well as in other matters. I am spoken of as being perhaps a little too radical in this respect. I may not perhaps understand the conditions of trade as well as others, but I trust I understand general principles, and you can never have a trade that is not based on a general principle. We cannot put any number of facts together, as to the number of industries at work, the hands employed, the articles produced, and make a principle out of that. Yet that is the kind of argument we have had year after year. Hon. gentlemen have endeavoured to show our wealth by computation of figures that lie as often as they strike the truth. But when you start upon a well-recognized principle, you need not bother about the facts. The facts will take care of themselves. If you are right in principle, your facts will always bear that relation to it which every fact must bear to a truth.
